The publication of information concerning action taken in respect of international labour Conventions and Recommendations does not imply any expression of view by the International Labour Office on the legal status of the State having communicated such information (including the communication of a ratification or declaration), or on its authority over the areas or territories in respect of which such information is communicated; in certain cases this may present problems on which the ILO is not competent to express an opinion.

ILO publications can be obtained through major booksellers or ILO local offices in many countries, or direct from ILO Publications, International Labour Office, CH-1211 Geneva 22, Switzerland. A catalogue or list of new publications will be sent free of charge from the above address, or by email: pubvente@ilo.org.

The Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations is an independent body composed of legal experts charged with examining the application of ILO Conventions and Recommendations by ILO member States. The annual report of the Committee of Experts covers numerous matters related to the application of ILO standards. The structure of the report, as modified in 2003, is divided into the following parts:

- (a) The Reader's note provides indications on the Committee of Experts and the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference (their mandate, functioning and the institutional context in which they operate) (Part 1A, pages 1–4).
- (b) Part I: the General Report describes the manner in which the Committee of Experts undertakes its work and the extent to which member States have fulfilled their constitutional obligations in relation to international labour standards, and it draws the attention to issues of general interest arising out of the Committee's work (Part 1A, pages 5–44).
- (c) Part II: Observations concerning particular countries cover the sending of reports, the application of ratified Conventions (see section I), and the obligation to submit instruments to the competent authorities (see section II) (Part 1A, pages 45–857).
- (d) Part III: General Survey, in which the Committee of Experts examines the state of the legislation and practice regarding a specific area covered by a given number of Conventions and Recommendations. This examination covers all member States regardless of whether or not they have ratified the given Conventions. The General Survey is published as a separate volume (Report III (Part 1B)) and this year it concerns Labour Relations and Collective Bargaining in the Public Service (Part 1B).

Finally, the Information document on ratifications and standards-related activities is prepared by the Office and supplements the information contained in the report of the Committee of Experts. This document primarily provides an overview of recent developments relating to international labour standards, the implementation of special supervisory procedures and technical cooperation in relation to international labour standards. It contains, in tabular form, information on the ratification of Conventions and Protocols, and “country profiles” (Part 2).

The report of the Committee of Experts is also available at: www.ilo.org/global/standards/lang-en/index.htm.

Overview of the ILO supervisory mechanisms

Since its creation in 1919, the mandate of the International Labour Organization (ILO) has included adopting international labour standards, promoting their ratification and application in its member States and the supervision of their application as a fundamental means of achieving its objectives. In order to monitor the progress of member States in the application of international labour standards, the ILO has developed supervisory mechanisms which are unique at the international level.¹

Under article 19 of the ILO Constitution, a number of obligations arise for member States upon the adoption of international labour standards, including the requirement to submit newly adopted standards to national competent authorities and the obligation to report at intervals on the measures taken to give effect to the provisions of unratified Conventions and Recommendations.

A number of supervisory mechanisms exist whereby the Organization examines the standards-related obligations of member States deriving from ratified Conventions. This supervision occurs both in the context of a regular procedure through annual reports (article 22 of the ILO Constitution),² as well as through special procedures based on complaints or representations to the Governing Body made by ILO constituents (articles 24 and 26 of the Constitution). Moreover, since 1950, a special procedure has existed whereby complaints relating to freedom of association are referred to the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body. The Committee on Freedom of Association may also examine complaints relating to member States that have not ratified the relevant freedom of association Conventions.

Role of employers' and workers' organizations

As a natural consequence of its tripartite structure, the ILO was the first international organization to associate the social partners directly in its activities. The participation of employers' and workers' organizations in the supervisory mechanism is recognized in the Constitution under article 23, paragraph 2, which provides that reports and information submitted by governments in accordance with articles 19 and 22 must be communicated to the representative organizations.

In practice, representative employers' and workers' organizations may submit to their governments comments on the reports concerning the implementation of ratified Conventions. They may, for instance, draw attention to a discrepancy in law or practice regarding a Convention and thus lead the Committee of Experts to request further information from the government. Furthermore, any employers' or workers' organization may submit comments on the application of Conventions directly to the Office. The Office will then forward these comments to the government concerned, which will have an opportunity to respond before the comments are examined by the Committee of Experts.

¹ For detailed information on all the supervisory procedures, see the Handbook of procedures relating to international labour Conventions and Recommendations, International Labour Standards Department, International Labour Office, Geneva, Rev., 2012.

² Reports are requested every three years for the so-called fundamental Conventions and governance Conventions, and every five years for other Conventions. Reports have been due for groups of Conventions according to subject matter.

Origins of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

During the early years of the ILO, both the adoption of international labour standards and the regular supervisory work were undertaken within the framework of the plenary sitting of the annual International Labour Conference. However, the considerable increase in the number of ratifications of Conventions rapidly led to a similarly significant increase in the number of annual reports submitted. It soon became clear that the plenary of the Conference would not be able to examine all of these reports at the same time as adopting standards and discussing other important matters. In response, the Conference in 1926 adopted a resolution³ establishing on an annual basis a Conference Committee (subsequently named the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards) and requesting the Governing Body to appoint a technical committee (subsequently named the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations) which would be responsible for drawing up a report for the Conference. These two committees have become the two pillars of the ILO supervisory system.

Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

Composition

The Committee of Experts is composed of 20 members,⁴ who are outstanding legal experts at the national and international levels. The members of the Committee are appointed by the Governing Body upon the proposal of the Director-General. Appointments are made in a personal capacity from among completely impartial persons of competence and independent standing drawn from all regions of the world, in order to enable the Committee to have at its disposal first-hand experience of different legal, economic and social systems. The appointments are made for renewable periods of three years. In 2002, the Committee decided that there would be a limit of 15 years' service for all members, representing a maximum of four renewals after the first three-year appointment. At its 79th Session (November–December 2008), the Committee decided that its Chairperson would be elected for a period of three years, which would be renewable once for a further three years. At the start of each session, the Committee would also elect a Reporter.

Mandate

The Committee of Experts meets annually in November–December. In accordance with the mandate given by the Governing Body,⁵ the Committee is called upon to examine the following:

- the annual reports under article 22 of the Constitution on the measures taken by member States to give effect to the provisions of the Conventions to which they are parties;
- the information and reports concerning Conventions and Recommendations communicated by member States in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution;
- information and reports on the measures taken by member States in accordance with article 35 of the Constitution.⁶

The task of the Committee of Experts is to indicate the extent to which each member State's legislation and practice are in conformity with ratified Conventions and the extent to which member States have fulfilled their obligations under the ILO Constitution in relation to standards. In carrying out this task, the Committee adheres to its principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality.⁷

The comments of the Committee of Experts on the fulfilment by member States of their standards-related obligations take the form of either observations or direct requests. Observations contain comments on fundamental questions raised by the application of a particular Convention by a member State. These observations are reproduced in the annual report of ⁴ There are currently 18 experts appointed.

⁶ Article 35 covers the application of Conventions to non-metropolitan territories.

⁷ In its 1987 report, the Committee stated that in its evaluation of national law and practice in relation to the requirements of international labour Conventions: "... its function is to determine whether the requirements of a given Convention are being met, whatever the economic and social conditions existing in a given country. Subject only to any derogations, which are expressly permitted by the Convention itself, these requirements remain constant and uniform for all countries. In carrying out this work, the Committee is guided by the standards laid down in the Convention alone, mindful, however, of the fact that the modes of their implementation may be different in different States". the Committee of Experts, which is then submitted to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June every year. Direct requests usually relate to questions of a more technical nature or of lesser importance. They are not published in the report of the Committee of Experts, but are communicated directly to the government concerned.⁸ In addition, the Committee of Experts examines, in the context of the General Survey, the state of the legislation and practice concerning a specific area covered by a given number of Conventions and Recommendations chosen by the Governing Body. The General Survey is based on the reports submitted in accordance with articles 19 and 22 of the Constitution, and it covers all member States regardless of whether or not they have ratified the concerned Conventions. This year's General Survey covers labour relations and collective bargaining in the public service. Pursuant to the decision taken by the Governing Body at its 307 Session (March 2010), the subjects of General Surveys have been aligned with the four strategic objectives of the ILO as set out in the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization, 2008 (the Social Justice Declaration).⁹

Report of the Committee of Experts

As a result of its work, the Committee produces an annual report. The report consists of two volumes. The first volume (Report III 1A)¹⁰ is divided into two parts:

- Part I: the General Report describes, on the one hand, the progress of the work of the Committee of Experts and specific matters relating to it that have been addressed by the Committee and, on the other hand, the extent to which member States have fulfilled their constitutional obligations in relation to international labour standards.
- Part II: Observations concerning particular countries on the fulfilment of obligations in respect of the submission of reports, the application of ratified Conventions grouped by subject matter and the obligation to submit instruments to the competent authorities.

The second volume contains the General Survey (Report III (Part 1B)).¹¹

Furthermore, an Information document on ratifications and standards-related activities (Report III (Part 2)) accompanies the report of the Committee of Experts.¹²

Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference

Composition

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards is one of the two standing committees of the Conference. It is tripartite and therefore comprises representatives of governments, employers and workers. At each session, the Committee elects its Officers, which include a Chairperson (Government member), two Vice-Chairpersons (Employer member and Worker member) and a Reporter (Government member).

Mandate

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards meets annually at the June session of the Conference. Pursuant to article 7 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Committee shall consider:

- measures taken to give effect to ratified Conventions (article 22 of the Constitution);
- reports communicated in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution (General Surveys);
- measures taken in accordance with article 35 of the Constitution (non metropolitan territories).

The Committee is required to present a report to the Conference.

⁸ Observations and direct requests are accessible through the NORMLEX database accessible via <http://www.ilo.org>.

Following the independent technical examination carried out by the Committee of Experts, the proceedings of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards provide an opportunity for the representatives of governments, employers and workers to examine together the manner in which States are fulfilling their standards-related obligations, particularly with regard to ratified Conventions. Governments are able to elaborate on information previously supplied to the Committee of Experts, indicate any further measures taken or proposed since the last session of the Committee of Experts, draw attention to difficulties encountered in the fulfilment of obligations and seek guidance as to how to overcome such difficulties.

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards discusses the report and the General Survey of the Committee of Experts, and the documents submitted by governments. The work of the Conference Committee starts with a general discussion based essentially on the General Report of the Committee of Experts, and with a discussion on the General Survey. With regard to the alignment of the subject of General Surveys with the strategic objective discussed in the context of the recurrent report under the follow-up to the Social Justice Declaration, the outcome of the discussion of the Conference Committee concerning the General Survey is transmitted to the Conference Committee responsible for examining the recurrent report. Following its general discussion, the Conference Committee examines cases of serious failure to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations. Finally, the Conference Committee embarks upon its main task, which is to examine a number of individual cases concerning the application of ratified Conventions which have been the subject of observations by the Committee of Experts. The Conference Committee invites the Government representatives concerned to attend one of its sittings to discuss the observations in question. After listening to the Government representatives, the members of the Conference Committee may ask questions or make comments. At the end of the discussion, the Conference Committee adopts conclusions on the case in question. Furthermore, in accordance with a resolution adopted by the Conference in 2000,¹³ the Conference Committee has held, at each of its sessions since 2000, a special sitting on the application by Myanmar of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29).

In its report¹⁴ submitted to the plenary sitting of the Conference for adoption, the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards may invite the member State whose case has been discussed to accept a technical assistance mission by the International Labour Office to increase its capacity to fulfil its obligations, or may propose other types of missions. The Conference Committee may also request a government to submit additional information or address specific concerns in its next report to the Committee of Experts. The Conference Committee also draws the attention of the Conference to certain cases, such as cases of progress and cases of serious failure to comply with ratified Conventions.

The Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards

In numerous reports, the Committee of Experts has emphasized the importance of the spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility that has always existed in relations between the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee. It has accordingly become the practice for the Chairperson of the Committee of Experts to attend the general discussion of the Conference Committee including the discussion on the General Survey as an observer, with the opportunity to address the Conference Committee at the opening of the general discussion and to make remarks at the end of the discussion on the General Survey. Similarly, the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons of the Conference Committee are invited to meet the Committee of Experts during its sessions and discuss issues of common interest within the framework of a special session held for that purpose.

Part I. General Report

I. Introduction

1. The Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, appointed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to examine the information and reports submitted under articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution by member States of the International Labour Organization on the action taken with regard to Conventions and Recommendations, held its 83rd Session in Geneva from 21 November to 7 December 2012. The Committee has the honour to present its report to the Governing Body.

Composition of the Committee

2. The composition of the Committee is as follows: Mr Mario ACKERMAN (Argentina), Mr Denys BARROW, SC (Belize), Mr Lelio BENTES CORRÊA (Brazil), Mr James J. BRUDNEY (United States), Mr Halton CHEADLE (South Africa), Ms Laura COX, QC (United Kingdom), Ms Graciela Josefina DIXON CATON (Panama), Mr Rachid FILALI MEKNASSI (Morocco), Mr Abdul G. KOROMA (Sierra Leone), Mr Dierk LINDEMANN (Germany), Mr Pierre LYON-CAEN (France), Ms Elena MACHULSKAYA (Russian Federation), Mr Vitit MUNTARBHORN (Thailand), Ms Rosemary OWENS (Australia), Mr Francisco PÉREZ DE LOS COBOS ORIHUEL (Spain), Mr Paul-Gérard POUGOUÉ (Cameroon), Mr Raymond RANJEVA (Madagascar), Mr Yozo YOKOTA (Japan). Appendix I of the General Report contains brief biographies of all the Committee members.

3. The Committee notes with regret that Ms Ruma Pal (India), who had been a member of the Committee since 2006, has submitted her resignation. The Committee expresses its deep appreciation for the outstanding manner in which Ms Pal has carried out her duties during her six years of service on the Committee and, in particular, commends her warmly for the excellent way in which she has carried out her duty as Chairperson of the Subcommittee on Working Methods for the past two years.

4. During its session, the Committee welcomed Mr Lindemann and Mr Pérez De Los Cobos Orihuel, nominated by the Governing Body at its 313th Session (March 2012).

5. Mr Yokota continued his mandate as Chairperson of the Committee and the Committee re-elected Mr Barrow as Reporter. As Mr Yokota did not wish to seek a second mandate as Chairperson, the Committee elected Mr Koroma as Chairperson for its next session.

Working methods

6. The Committee has in recent years undertaken a thorough examination of its working methods. In order to guide this reflection on working methods efficiently, a subcommittee was set up in 2001. The mandate of the subcommittee includes examining the working methods of the Committee and any related subjects, in order to make appropriate recommendations to the Committee.¹ The subcommittee met on three occasions between 2002 and 2004.² During its sessions in 2005 and 2006, issues relating to its working methods were discussed by the Committee in plenary sitting.³ From 2007 to 2011, the subcommittee met at each of the Committee's sessions.⁴

7. This year, a new subcommittee on the streamlining of treatment of certain reports was established. This subcommittee met twice before the beginning of the work of the Committee and examined all the comments related to repetitions (269 observations and 462 direct requests – which are comments repeating what had been said previously by the Committee), as well as the general observations and direct requests. The subcommittee then presented, for adoption in the plenary, its report to the Committee of Experts and drew attention to the most important issues which had been raised during its examination. The approach taken by the subcommittee has enabled the Committee of Experts to save precious time for the examination of individual observations and direct requests regarding ratified Conventions and it was suggested that it should be reconvened every year.

Relations with the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards

8. A spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility has consistently prevailed over the years in the Committee's relations with the International Labour Conference and its Committee on the Application of Standards. The Committee of Experts has always taken the proceedings of the Conference Committee into full consideration, not only in respect of general matters concerning standard-setting activities and supervisory procedures, but also with regard to specific matters concerning the way in which States fulfil their standards-related obligations. Moreover, the Committee has paid in recent years close attention to the comments on its working methods that have been made by the members of the Committee on the Application of Standards and the Governing Body.

9. In this context, the Committee once more welcomed the participation of Mr Yokota as an observer in the general discussion of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 101st Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2012). It noted the decision by the Conference Committee to request the Director-General to renew this invitation for the 102nd Session (June 2013) of the Conference. The Committee of Experts accepted this invitation.

10. The Chairperson of the Committee of Experts invited the Employer Vice-Chairperson (Mr Christopher Syder) and the Worker Vice-Chairperson (Mr Marc Leemans) of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 101st Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2012) to participate in a special sitting of the Committee at its present session. They both accepted this invitation.

11. This year's special sitting was of particular importance in the light of the events that had taken place during the session of the Conference Committee in June 2012 as well as the subsequent developments, including the informal tripartite consultations in September 2012 and the discussions that took place during the November Session of the Governing Body.

12. During the sitting, the Employer Vice-Chairperson insisted that for his group, this internal dialogue within the ILO's standards supervisory system was of utmost importance for the proper functioning of the system. He stressed that the Employers remained fully committed to preserving and strengthening the cooperation and coordination between the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee of Experts.

13. Regarding the issue of the right to strike, he reiterated that the Employers had objected for many years to the view that the right to strike was to be considered to be part of the obligations politically negotiated and agreed by the ILO constituents under Convention No. 87. The Employers had set out on many occasions that a right to strike was not regulated in Convention No. 87 and that the ILO constituents did not agree to the inclusion of the right to strike at the time Convention No. 87 was adopted in 1948. According to the Employers, this was clearly stated in the preparatory work that preceded the adoption of the Convention and the Employers had put forward detailed arguments in the past showing that in considering all applicable rules of interpretation, a right to strike could not be read into Convention No. 87. In this regard, the Employers regretted that in the context of the 2012 General Survey on the eight fundamental Conventions, the Committee of Experts had included nearly 20 pages on their view that Convention No. 87 contained an inherent right to strike.

14. The Employer Vice-Chairperson recalled that the role of the Committee of Experts was first mandated at the ILC in 1926 and that it had been explicitly stated at the time that the functions of this new committee would be entirely technical and that the Committee of Experts would have no judicial capacity, nor would it be competent to give interpretations of the provisions of Conventions or to decide in favour of one interpretation rather than another. Further explanation was provided on the role of the Committee of Experts at the ILC in 1947 when it was stated that the supervisory machinery in question consisted of a Committee of Experts appointed by the Governing Body for the purpose of carrying out a preliminary examination of the annual reports of governments. The Employers were of the view that nothing had changed since then and that the decisions of 1926 and 1947 remained the guiding principles on the role and mandate of the Committee of Experts. Therefore, the fact that the Employers inside the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards had consistently opposed the CEACR's view on the right to strike should not be construed as the view of external opposition but rather as evidence that there had never been an agreement inside the ILO on the issue of the right to strike.

⁴ See General Report, 78th Session (November–December 2007), paras 7–8; General Report, 79th Session (November–December 2008), paras 8–9; General Report, 80th Session (November–December 2009), paras 7–8; General Report, 81st Session (November–December 2010), paras 6–13; General Report, 82nd Session (November–December 2011), paras 6–12.

15. Furthermore, the fact that many countries had enshrined a right to strike, together with restrictions on that right was, in the Employers' view, not determinative of the proposition that Convention No. 87 was the source of that right. To the contrary, it would be far more supportive of a view that countries had rightly found it necessary to regulate this important issue themselves in the face of a lack of clear and explicit guidance from an agreed source. Citing national practice as a basis for interpreting an unstated right into an international document did not, in the Employers' view, advance the argument that Convention No. 87 was the source of the right to strike. In conclusion on this point, the Employer Vice-Chairperson indicated that with regard to Convention No. 87, the Committee of Experts had taken a role more akin to the role of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards than the advisory role the experts were originally assigned in 1926. It appeared that the Committee of Experts had developed and maintained views concerning the right to strike that should have been the subject of tripartite policy debates. In order to move forward with this issue, he recalled that the Employers had expressed their willingness to contribute to a balanced solution in this regard and had proposed, during the 2012 November session of the Governing Body, to have a proper tripartite discussion on the right to strike during the International Labour Conference. Such a discussion would be meant to determine if and to what extent there was common ground amongst ILO constituents for global standard-setting on the right to strike. He once again requested the Committee of Experts to reconsider its position on the right to strike and to immediately suspend any references to this right in future reports until a tripartite discussion had taken place on the right to strike.

16. Regarding the issue of the mandate of the Committee of Experts and more precisely the legal status of its views and observations, the Employer Vice-Chairperson underlined that these were not clearly and precisely set forth in the Committee's report, which could lead to misunderstandings outside the ILO that they were approved by the ILO's tripartite constituents or were legally binding. As stated under the point regarding the right to strike, it was the Employers' understanding that the Governing Body had never decided to amend the stated terms of reference of the Committee of Experts to expressly include the interpretation of international labour standards. In addition, it could not be the Governing Body's intention to change those terms of reference since the ILO Constitution provided that the authority to interpret ILO Conventions was vested with the International Court of Justice, which meant that the Constitution would need to be amended first. Based on this understanding, the Employers were of the view that what needed to be mentioned in all of the Committee of Experts' reports was that their views and observations were meant to provide a basis for the supervisory work of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, they had not been approved by the tripartite bodies of the ILO and that these views were not legally authoritative interpretations and not legally binding for ratifying countries. In view of the above, the Employers respectfully requested the Committee of Experts to consider this issue with a view to clarifying its mandate and the legal status of its views in a clear and concise manner in all of its future reports. This clarification should be made at a visible place, preferably on the first pages in the reports.

17. Following exchanges with the Committee of Experts, the Employer Vice-Chairperson acknowledged that a certain degree of interpretation by the Experts was inevitable when the provisions of a Convention were not clear, but insisted that the main issue was when this rule of interpretation was extended into the development of policy considerations which were the sole domain of the ILO tripartite constituents.

18. While the Employer Vice-Chairperson very much welcomed the opportunity to clarify the respective roles of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee of Experts through this special sitting, he stressed that this dialogue with the two committees should also be extended in terms of participants and time. He suggested that rather than this limited exchange between the two spokespersons of the Conference Committee and the members of the Committee of Experts, the Office should organize one-day consultations, outside the meeting of the Committee of Experts', between the CEACR and a number of Conference Committee Employer and Worker members nominated by the two groups and assisted by ACT/EMP and the IOE as well as ACTRAV and the ITUC respectively. Finally, he expressed the view that in the process which was currently underway in the Governing Body to move forward on all these issues, one element that was missing was the involvement of the members of the Committee of Experts in the discussion of their mandate.

19. For its part, the Worker Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the present meeting was an occasion that was valued by his Group each year as an opportunity to reaffirm its confidence in the Committee of Experts, and also in the other supervisory bodies on the application of ILO standards, and particularly the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee on Freedom of Association, both of which were of tripartite composition. Those two bodies had also contributed over the years to developing principles, beyond the framework of the ILO Constitution, which were of undeniable value for workers, employers and governments, particularly by offering security for key concepts in the context of international labour law. Those concepts were valid because they had their origins in joint tripartite analysis. Moreover, the reports of the supervisory bodies constituted a reference point on standards which ensured stability and social peace in member States, not only in relation to the social partners and the world of enterprise, but also between member States themselves, with a view to avoiding unfair competition based on social dumping.

20. With regard to the question of the mandate of the Committee of Experts, the Worker Vice-Chairperson recalled that as early as 1928 the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards had considered, after noting that the Committee of Experts was confining itself to examining the compliance of national laws and regulations with international Conventions, that its analysis of the subject should not be limited to assessing the concordance of the provisions of national laws and regulations with those of Conventions, but should also go more deeply into the issue of the effective application of the Conventions. He emphasized that the role of the Committee of Experts was fundamental and that its work was an essential and permanent instrument in improving the application of standards. That role consisted of preparing, under unimpeachable conditions of scientific rigour, independence and objectivity, the work that would be taken up by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards with a view to ensuring that effect was given to standards in law and practice.

21. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that the work of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, through the examination of individual cases, was another fundamental aspect of the supervisory system. Its examination was based on the work of the Committee of Experts, as well as the tripartite examination of individual cases. The role of the Committee of Experts was therefore to enter into dialogue with governments through its comments. But, however important that role might be, the Committee of Experts was only one element of the omnipresent tripartite involvement in supervising the application of standards. Indeed, the Governing Body, with its tripartite composition, was a constitutional body which had a determining role to play at the various levels, for example by first approving the questionnaires under articles 19 and 22 of the Constitution. Moreover, the work of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards could only be valid with the total involvement of employers, workers and governments, not only in relation to reporting obligations, but also through the comments made by the social partners under article 23(2) of the Constitution. The Committee of Experts therefore worked in a very precise framework and its mandate, which was the result of an evolutionary process overseen by the Governing Body, had not been left to its sole discretion.

22. The Worker Vice-Chairperson also welcomed the fact that the informal tripartite consultations held in September 2012 had given rise to the promise that working methods would be adopted that should ensure the possibility of serene and effective work at the next session of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2013.

23. With reference to the issue of the right to strike, the Worker Vice-Chairperson warned against the desire to weaken inter-occupational and sectoral social dialogue, which appeared to have its roots within the European Union. In that respect, he emphasized that it would be difficult for the Workers' Group to accept a method of work based on a question of principle arising out of the differences of views concerning the relationship that existed between the right to strike and Convention No. 87. The reasoning put forward by the Employers, calling for the right to strike only to be addressed at the national level, was designed to weaken the trade union movement, social dialogue and the right to collective bargaining. But all of those rights were linked in their spirit to those negotiated in Conventions Nos 87 and 98.

24. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that the ILO supervisory bodies recognized the right to strike and considered it to be a fundamental instrument available to workers' organizations for the defence of their economic and social interests. In its 1959 General Survey the comments of the Committee of Experts had been in line with such recognition, and it currently considered the right to strike to be an essential corollary of the right to organize. That was also the opinion of the Committee on Freedom of Association, which had recognized such a right in 1952. It should also be noted that 137 countries had ratified Convention No. 87 since 1952, and that 115 of those ratifications had been registered after the publication of the 1959 General Survey on freedom of association, which clearly implied recognition of the exercise of the right to strike. The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards also recognized the right to strike. However, those bodies considered that it was not an absolute right and that it could be subject to certain restrictions, or even prohibited. The Committee of Experts had therefore never gone beyond its mandate in formulating its principles on the right to strike. Those principles were in line with reality, with the provisions of other international instruments that referred to the right to strike and with the decisions and principles followed by other supervisory machinery.

25. Finally, in reply to the proposal put forward by the Employers regarding the inclusion of a caveat at the beginning of all future reports of the CEACR, the Worker Vice-Chairperson voiced his strong opposition to the inclusion of such a caveat.

26. The Committee very much welcomed the frank and constructive interventions of both Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons. Concerning its mandate, the Committee recalled that, since 1947, and during the past 50-plus years, it had regularly expressed its views on its mandate and methods of work. Since 2001, it had done so even more thoroughly through the efforts of its subcommittee on working methods. The Committee recalled three elements of particular relevance in this regard: (i) it had repeatedly stressed its status as an impartial, objective, and independent body, with members appointed by the tripartite Governing Body in their personal capacity precisely because of that impartial and independent status; (ii) it had regularly clarified that, while its terms of reference did not authorize it to give definitive interpretations of Conventions (competence to do so being vested in the International Court of Justice (ICJ)), in order to carry out its mandate of evaluating and assessing the application and implementation of Conventions, it had to consider and express its views on the legal scope and meaning of the provisions of these Conventions; and (iii) as from at least the 1950s, it had expressed its views on the meaning of specific ILO instruments in terms that inevitably reflected an interpretive vocabulary.

27. Reviewing the position of the Employers' group over the years, the Committee stressed that, historically, that group had accepted the Committee's interpretive role as part of its mandate. For instance, the Committee recalled that, during the 1987 Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, addressing concerns raised by certain governments, the Employers' spokesperson had "rejected the argument that the CEACR had gone beyond its terms of reference" and both the Employers' and Workers' spokespersons "supported the CEACR's current methods of work." In the 1993 Conference Committee, the Employers' group had remarked that "disagreements over the method and substance of interpretations arose in only a small proportion of the vast number of comments made over the years by the Committee of Experts". More recently, during the 2011 Conference Committee, the Employers' group had not responded to the detailed discussion of the interpretive methods that the CEACR had presented in paragraphs 10–12 of its General Report, which discussed in considerable detail: (a) the logical necessity of interpreting Conventions in order to fulfil its mandate, (b) the necessity that its work remain committed to independence, objectivity, and impartiality, and (c) that the Committee constantly bore in mind all different methods of interpreting treaty law, especially the Vienna Convention.

28. The Committee further stressed that its mandate derived from three main principles. First, assessment and evaluation of textual meaning was logically integral to the application of ratified Conventions. In this regard, the Committee noted that it needed to bring to the Conference Committee's attention: (i) any national laws or practices not in conformity with the Conventions, which inevitably required the evaluation and thus, a certain degree of interpretation, of the national legislation and the text of the Convention; and (ii) in conformity with its working methods, the cases of progress in the application of standards, which also required a degree of interpretation. Second, the equal treatment and uniformity of the application of Conventions assured predictability. The Committee highlighted in this regard that its approach to examining the meaning of Conventions also prioritized achieving equal treatment for States and uniformity in practical application. This emphasis was essential to maintaining principles of legality, which encouraged governments to accept its views on the application of a Convention and, in this manner, promoted a level of certainty needed for the proper functioning of the ILO system. Third, the Committee stressed that its composition, i.e., independent persons with distinguished backgrounds in the law and direct experience of the different national legal systems to which Conventions were applied, helped to ensure a broad acceptance within the ILO community of its views on the meaning of Conventions.

29. The Committee acknowledged the Employers' concerns expressed by the Employer Vice-Chairperson at the June 2012 Conference that its observations were "being viewed by the outside world as a form of soft law labour standards jurisprudence". However, the Committee noted that the world outside of the ILO was not its designated or intended audience. Rather, the Committee directed its non-binding opinions and conclusions to governments, social partners, and the Conference Committee pursuant to its well-settled role in the ILO supervisory structure. While aware that its guidance was taken seriously in certain specific settings, both by domestic courts and international tribunals, the Committee considered that this reflected respect for its independent and impartial nature and for the persuasive value of its non-binding analyses and conclusions. The Committee recalled that those analyses or conclusions could only become authoritative in any "binding" sense if the international tribunal, or instrument, or the domestic court independently established them as such.

30. Regarding its working methods and particularly its examination of governments' reports and comments of social partners, the Committee recalled that it was relying exclusively on written evidence and that there were no oral hearings or scope for oral arguments. While the Committee took due note of the well documented and constructive comments of the social partners, it would welcome receiving more of such comments from the employers to better reflect their views. The Committee underscored the substantial individual and collective work it carried out in reviewing the application of Conventions which further benefited from an intensive exchange of views from a diversity of legal, social and cultural backgrounds. Finally, the Committee recalled that its mandate must by necessity be understood within the framework of the ILO Constitution which firmly anchors the aims and objectives of the Organization as being the elimination of injustice, hardship and privation and the fostering of social justice as the means for ensuring universal and lasting peace.

31. On the matter of the right to strike, the Committee of Experts welcomed the frank discussion of issues that enabled it to address directly a number of points. In the first instance, there appeared to remain the challenge as to whether there was a right to strike at all under Convention No. 87. The Committee indicated that it would take into account the arguments raised by the Employers, although the Committee considered that it had already addressed these arguments in detail in its 2012 General Survey. The Committee recognized that the Employer Vice-Chairperson appeared to make a distinction between interpretive application of the Convention and what the Employers felt was making policy, and gave particular examples of such policy extension. The Committee indicated, however, that once it had decided in 1959 that the Convention included the right to strike, the Committee was faced with the need to determine what the acceptable restrictions were, rather than leaving it as an absolute right. The Committee did this on a case-by-case basis over the years, looking at a country's law and practice, bearing in mind the information provided to it, and taking into account national circumstances, while ensuring equal treatment and universal application. In order to make this assessment, the Committee encouraged, and continues to encourage, all parties, including the employers' organizations, to make use of article 23(2) of the Constitution in order to provide relevant information for its reflection. In so far as the Committee's reliance on the decisions of the Committee on Freedom of Association was concerned, the Committee recalled that it made its own decisions. It takes into account the decisions of the Committee on Freedom of Association but does not justify its observations on the basis of those decisions. Moreover, the Committee recalled several examples of complaints or comments submitted by international and national employers' organizations to the Committee on Freedom of Association and the CEACR in which the employers' organizations requested both supervisory bodies to make statements regarding the need to set limits to the exercise of the right to strike when, in their opinion, the legislative texts contained objectionable provisions.

32. The Committee further emphasized that, contrary to the social partners who often defend conflicting interests, and therefore had to negotiate, it did not defend interests and, although there may be differences between the experts when examining the application of Conventions, they did not negotiate between themselves when preparing their comments. The experts sought legal truth, completely objectively and impartially.

The Committee's views regarding its mandate

33. The Committee is aware that, as a result of the informal tripartite consultation in September 2012, the tripartite constituencies have requested that the Office prepare an information document on the mandate of the Committee of Experts for the 317th Session (March 2013) of the Governing Body. Following its meeting with the Vice-Chairpersons of the Committee on the Application of Standards, the Committee of Experts also has an increased understanding of the concerns expressed by the Employers and of the positions taken by the Workers with regard to its mandate. These concerns and positions were ably presented by the two Vice-Chairpersons at the meeting of the Committee on 1 December 2012. The Committee has decided to put forward the following considerations in the spirit of assisting the ILO constituents in their understanding of the Committee's work. The Committee wishes to draw attention to four principal factors.

- (a) Logically integral to application. The terms of reference of the Committee of Experts call for it to examine a range of reports and information in order to monitor the application of Conventions and Recommendations. In fulfilling this responsibility, the Committee must bring to the attention of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards any national laws or practices not in conformity with the Conventions, including the severity of certain situations. This logically and inevitably requires an assessment, which in turn involves a degree of interpretation of both the national legislation and the text of the Convention.

Further, in conformity with longstanding working methods, the Committee of Experts has identified over 3,000 cases of progress (noting with satisfaction) since 1964, which again logically requires an interpretive judgment that a government's change in law or practice has given fuller effect to a ratified Convention as it has been construed by the Committee.

- (b) Equal treatment and uniformity assure predictability in application. The Committee's approach to examining the meaning of Conventions stresses due regard for achieving equality of treatment for States and uniformity in practical application. This emphasis is essential to maintaining principles of legality, which encourage governments to accept the Committee of Experts' views on application of a Convention. In this manner, the Committee can promote a level of certainty needed for the proper functioning of the ILO system.
- (c) Composition. The Committee of Experts' views on the meaning of Conventions are broadly accepted because the Committee is composed of independent persons who have distinguished backgrounds in the law and direct experience of the different national legal systems for which they must evaluate the application of the Conventions. The Committee's independence is importantly a function of its members' occupations, principally as judges from national and international courts and as professors of labour law and human rights law. This independence is also attributable to the means by which members are selected. They are not selected by governments, employers, or workers, but rather by the Governing Body upon recommendation of the Director-General. The Committee's combination of independence, experience, and expertise continues to be a significant further source of legitimacy within the ILO community.
- (d) Consequences. Governments rely on the valid and generally recognized nature of the Committee of Experts' observations, direct requests, and General Surveys to help structure their conduct in law and practice. If governments were to view the Committee's positions as somehow discounted or of less certain value, some would feel freer to ignore its requests or invitations to comply. This would inevitably undermine orderly monitoring and predictable application of the standards – the precise result that the Committee of Experts mandate was established and then extended in order to prevent.

In addition, the Conference Committee, the Committee on Freedom of Association, and the Governing Body also rely on the Committee of Experts framework of opinions about the meaning of the provisions of the Conventions in the course of the applications process. Without this independent role, the supervisory system would lose a vital element of impartiality and objectivity, an element that has been central to the monitoring system for 85 years.

Prior statements from the CEACR and the Employers regarding the Committee's mandate

34. The Committee believes it may be useful to review certain past and recurrent perceptions with regard to its mandate, as expressed before the Conference.

- (a) Statements by the CEACR. For more than 50 years, the Committee has regularly expressed its views on its mandate and methods of operation. Since 2001, it has done so even more thoroughly through the efforts of its subcommittee on working methods. Three elements are of special relevance here:

First, the Committee has repeatedly stressed its status as an impartial, objective, and independent body, with members appointed by the Governing Body in their personal capacity precisely because of that impartial and independent status.⁵

Second, the Committee has regularly made clear that, while its terms of reference do not authorize it to give definitive interpretations of Conventions – competence to do so being vested in the International Court of Justice (ICJ) under article 37 of the ILO Constitution – in order to carry out its mandate of evaluating and assessing the application and implementation of Conventions, it must consider and express its views on the legal scope and meaning of the provisions of these Conventions.⁶

Third, at least as far back as the 1950s, the Committee has expressed its views on the meaning of specific ILO instruments in terms that inevitably reflect an interpretive vocabulary.

- (b) Statements from the Employers' group. Over the past 25 years, the Employers group has often made clear its support for or endorsement of the Committee's role in construing Convention text as a key element of the supervisory mechanism.

Thus, for example, in 1986 in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, "the Employers' members were of the opinion that the criticism which had been expressed [by certain governments] with respect to the supervisory machinery attested to its effectiveness. They completely rejected the idea of dismantling or weakening the supervisory system. In their opinion, the arguments put forth against this machinery were unfounded. This was particularly the case in regard to comments critical of the supervisory machinery because it allegedly constituted an interference in internal affairs of States. To the contrary, it was a question of knowing whether a member State intended to comply with obligations it had assumed. ... This procedure was clear, unambiguous, fair, and above all necessary" (paragraph 36, page 31/8).⁷

Again in 1987, the Employers responded to arguments by the USSR and other Eastern European countries (paragraph 26) that the Committee of Experts had gone beyond its 1926 terms of reference, which were purely technical, by converting itself into "a kind of supra-national tribunal, interpreting national laws and Conventions" although such interpretation was the responsibility of the national courts or the ICJ. The Employers' spokesperson "rejected the argument that the Committee of Experts had gone beyond its terms of reference" (paragraph 27) and both the Employers' and Workers' spokespersons "supported the Committee's current methods of work" (paragraph 32).⁸

While in 1990, the Employers criticized a statement in the Committee's report that they viewed as saying in substance that competence to interpret Conventions absent an ICJ submission rests solely with the Committee (paragraph 22), following extended discussion involving workers and governments as well, the Employers emphasized their view of the Vienna Convention as "the appropriate – in fact the only – yardstick to be used in interpreting ILO Conventions. It was this yardstick that they invited the Committee to use in their interpretation of international labour standards" (paragraph 30, emphasis added).⁹

In 1993, the Employers remarked that "disagreements over the method and substance of interpretations arose in only a small proportion of the vast number of comments made over the years by the Committee of Experts" (paragraph 21).¹⁰

In 2010, the Employers again made clear that “they were not questioning the valuable role of the Committee of Experts but only certain of its interpretations” (paragraph 75).¹¹

The non-binding nature of CEACR opinions and recommendations

35. (a) In stating that its views are to be considered as valid and generally recognized (absent contradictory ruling from the ICJ), the Committee is not saying that it regards its views as having any res judicata or comparable effect. The Committee does not regard itself as a court of law. Indeed, it has been consistently clear that its formulations of guidance – presented as opinions or recommendations in the context of observations, direct requests, and General Surveys – are not binding. Rather, the persuasive validity of the Committee’s formulations for member countries, social partners, the Conference Committee, and others within the ILO stems from: (1) their logical relation to the standards application process; (2) the equal treatment and uniformity that accompanies their implementation; (3) the quality of their reasoning; and (4) the recognized independence and expertise of the Committee as a whole.

(b) In this respect, the Committee’s guidance is part of the so-called international law landscape. Like the work of independent supervisory bodies created within other UN organizations addressing human rights and labour rights,¹² the Committee’s non-binding opinions or conclusions are intended to guide the actions of ILO member States by virtue of their rationality and persuasiveness, their source of legitimacy (by which is meant the independence, experience, and expertise of the members), and their responsiveness to a set of national realities including the informational input of the social partners. At the same time, the Committee observes that it is only before the ILO supervisory machinery that the social partners can bring forward their concerns relating to the application of Conventions.

Proposed addition of a caveat to the Committee’s General Surveys and Reports

36. The Committee has considered the Employers’ position that some form of caveat or disclaimer should be prominently featured in Committee documents, stating that Committee interpretations are not authoritative and hence not legally binding for ratifying countries, as well as the Workers’ position that such a caveat or disclaimer should not be included. The Committee understands and respects the views of both constituents and wishes to clarify its own position on this matter.

- (a) The Committee believes that such a caveat or disclaimer is not necessary. As noted earlier in this General Report, the Committee repeatedly states with regard to its terms of reference, both in its general reports and in other settings, that its opinions are non-binding. The Committee includes a similarly unambiguous statement as part of the preliminary portion of its 2013 General Survey and will continue with this practice in future years.
- (b) The Committee believes that adding the caveat or disclaimer proposed by the Employers would interfere in important respects with its independence. The Committee fully appreciates and respects that tripartism carries moral force as well as technical authority within the ILO system. The Committee’s moral authority, however, derives substantially from the fact that, while appointed by the tripartite Governing Body, it has remained an independent and impartial body of experts for 85 years. As mentioned earlier, Committee members are nominated and selected with regard to their independence and objectivity, not their participation in a tripartite framework. That this caveat is being proposed by one group of tripartite constituents, and opposed in principle and in its specific language terms by another group of the tripartite constituents, highlights the risks of attempting to add to the Committee’s own work product.
- (c) In this regard, it bears emphasis that the General Surveys and the report of the Committee under articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution are instruments created by the Committee at the direction and pursuant to the constitutional authority of the Conference. The Committee feels strongly about the views expressed above and believes that it should continue to follow its current practice.

II. Compliance with obligations

Follow-up to cases of serious failure by member States to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations mentioned in the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards

37. The Committee recalls that, at the instigation of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 93rd Session (June 2005) of the International Labour Conference, the two Committees, with the assistance of the Office, strengthened the follow-up given to cases of serious failure by member States to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations with a view to identifying more accurately the difficulties underlying these failures and helping the countries concerned to identify appropriate solutions to resolve them. As both Committees have recalled on numerous occasions, such failures hinder the functioning of the supervisory system, which is based primarily on the information provided by governments in their reports. Cases of failure to fulfil reporting obligations therefore have to be given the same level of attention as those relating to the application of ratified Conventions. The Committee also recalls that an assessment of the strengthened follow-up in cases of serious failure to comply with reporting obligations was submitted to the Governing Body at its 306th Session (November 2009).¹³ The assessment emphasized that the systematic and strengthened technical assistance provided in the context of the follow-up on the basis of the comments of the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee has had a significant impact on the submission of reports.

38. The Committee notes that, during the general discussion of the Conference Committee at the 101st Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2012) and the special sitting in which it examines these cases of serious failure, several members of the Conference Committee emphasized once again this positive impact. The Office was invited to continue and intensify technical assistance activities, and particularly to continue identifying the difficulties encountered by member States in compliance with their obligations with a view to resolving them. In the view of certain members, it is also necessary to continue the efforts made to lighten the workload relating to the submission of reports. They also emphasized that, in addition to causes that have their roots at the national level, cases of failure to comply with reporting obligations are related to the workload of governments in sending reports, which illustrates, on the one hand, the need for countries to evaluate their capacity to implement Conventions and to submit the corresponding reports before considering their ratification and, on the other, the need to continue the integration and simplification of ILO Conventions by focusing on essential rules.

39. The Committee was informed that, pursuant to the discussions of the Conference Committee, the Office had sent special letters to the 58 member States mentioned in the relevant paragraphs of the report of the Conference Committee concerning their failure to fulfil their obligations respecting the sending of reports.

40. The Committee welcomes the fact that eight countries which had experienced persistent difficulties and which as such had been mentioned in several reports of both Committees have this year fulfilled part of their constitutional obligations in terms of the submission of reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions.¹⁴ The Committee notes that since the end of the session of the Conference, certain other member States, often with the assistance of the Office have fulfilled part of their reporting and other standards-related obligations.¹⁵

41. The Committee reminds governments that they are required to comply with all the reporting and other standards-related obligations that they have accepted by becoming Members of the ILO. Compliance with these obligations is essential for dialogue between the supervisory bodies and member States on the effective implementation of ratified Conventions. Governments that request technical assistance may benefit from it, yet such assistance can only be useful and adapted to national circumstances if governments inform the Office of their specific difficulties and have the will to adopt lasting solutions. The Committee hopes that the Office will maintain the sustained technical assistance that it has been providing to member States as this is clearly an essential means for overcoming reporting difficulties effectively. Finally, the Committee welcomes the fruitful collaboration that it maintains with the Conference Committee on this matter of mutual interest, which is essential to the proper discharge of their respective tasks.

A. Reports on ratified Conventions (articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution)

42. The Committee's principal task consists of the examination of the reports supplied by governments on Conventions that have been ratified by member States and that have been declared applicable to non-metropolitan territories.

Reporting arrangements

43. The Committee recalls that at its 306th Session (November 2009), the Governing Body decided to increase from two to three years the reporting cycle for the fundamental and governance Conventions and to maintain the cycle at five years for the other Conventions. This decision was implemented starting with the reports for 2012.

44. In addition to the reports requested according to the reporting cycle, the Committee also had before it reports especially requested from certain governments for one of the following reasons:

- (a) a first detailed report was due after ratification;
- (b) important discrepancies had previously been noted between national law or practice and the Conventions in question;
- (c) reports due for the previous period had not been received or did not contain the information requested;
- (d) reports were expressly requested by the Conference Committee.

The Committee also had before it a number of reports that it was unable to examine at its previous session.

45. In some cases, reports are not accompanied by copies of the relevant legislation, statistical data or other documentation necessary for their full examination. In cases where this material was not otherwise available, the Office, as requested by the Committee, has written to the governments concerned asking them to supply the necessary texts to enable the Committee to fulfil fully its task.

46. Appendix I to this report lists the reports received and not received, classified by country/territory and by Convention. Appendix II shows, for each year in which the Conference has met since 1932, the number and percentage of reports received by the prescribed date, by the date of the meeting of the Committee of Experts and by the date of the session of the International Labour Conference.

Reports requested and received

47. This year a total of 2,393 reports (under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution) were requested from governments on the application of Conventions ratified by member States, compared to 3,013 reports last year. At the end of the present session of the Committee, 1,664 reports had been received by the Office. This figure corresponds to 69.53 per cent of the reports requested. Last year, the Office received a total of 2,084 reports, representing 69.01 per cent.

48. In accordance with article 22 of the Constitution, 2,207 reports were requested from governments. Of these, 1,497 had been received by the Office by the end of the present session of the Committee. This figure corresponds to 67.83 per cent of the reports requested (compared to 67.82 per cent last year). The Committee wishes to express its gratitude to the 91 member States, which have submitted all the reports due this year.

49. In accordance with article 35 of the Constitution, 186 reports were requested on Conventions declared applicable with or without modifications to non-metropolitan territories. Of these, 167 reports, or 89.78 per cent, had been received by the end of the Committee's session (compared to 82.37 per cent last year).

50. Furthermore, this year, in view of the fact that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards during its session in June 2012 was not in a position to discuss any of the individual cases which had been enumerated on a preliminary list, and in order to avoid any further disruption of the functioning of the ILO supervisory mechanisms, the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards requested the governments included in this preliminary list¹⁶ to send a report to the Committee of Experts to be examined at this session.

Compliance with reporting obligations¹⁷

51. Most of the governments from which reports were due on the application of ratified Conventions have supplied most or all of the reports requested (see Appendix I of this report). However, no reports due have been received for the past two or more years from the following ten countries: Burundi, Chad, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Kiribati, Libya, San Marino, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone and Somalia. The Committee examines compliance by each of these countries with their reporting obligations in the observations contained at the beginning of Part II (section I) of this report.

52. The Committee urges the governments of these countries to make every effort to supply the reports requested on ratified Conventions. The Committee is aware that where no reports have been sent for some time, it is likely that administrative or other problems are at the origin of the difficulties encountered by governments in fulfilling their constitutional obligations. In certain exceptional cases, the absence of reports is a result of more general difficulties related to the national situation, which often prevents the provision of any technical assistance by the Office. In such cases, it is important for governments to request assistance from the Office as soon as possible and for such assistance to be provided rapidly.

Late reports

53. The reports due on ratified Conventions should be sent to the Office between 1 June and 1 September of each year. Due consideration is given, when setting this date, to the time required to translate the reports and, where necessary, to conduct research into legislation and review other documents that are relevant to the examination of reports.

54. The Committee observes that by 1 September 2012 the proportion of reports received was 36.7 per cent, compared with 35.1 per cent at its previous session. The number of reports received on time this year has once again risen above 30 per cent, as it did in 2007, 2008, 2010 and 2011, following a significant decrease in 2009. The Committee is particularly grateful to the 38 countries which provided all the reports due within the time limits with the information requested.¹⁸ It notes that the request it made last year to member States to make a particular effort to ensure that their reports were submitted in time this year has had a certain effect. Nevertheless, the Committee is bound to emphasize once again that the number of reports received on time remains low. A significant number of reports are received after 1 September, during a very short period, thereby disturbing the sound operation of the regular supervisory procedure.

55. Furthermore, the Committee notes that a number of countries sent some or all of the reports due by 1 September 2011 during the period between the end of the Committee's last session (November–December 2011) and the beginning of the 101st Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2012), or even during the Conference. The Committee emphasizes that this practice also disturbs the regular operation of the supervisory system and makes it more burdensome. As requested by the Conference Committee, the Committee notes that the countries which follow this practice over the indicated period are the following: Algeria, Angola, Bulgaria, Congo, Croatia, Denmark, Eritrea, Fiji, France, France (French Polynesia), Germany, Greece, Guinea, Guyana, Hungary, Iraq, Kenya, Kyrgyzstan, Lebanon, Liberia, Luxembourg, Malaysia, Malta, Mongolia, Nepal, Netherlands (Curaçao), Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Rwanda, Senegal, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Thailand, Timor-Leste, Tunisia, Uganda, United Kingdom (British Virgin Islands, Falkland Islands (Malvinas)) and Yemen.

56. In view of the high number of reports this year which do not include information in reply to its comments, the Committee requests all member States to pursue and strengthen their efforts with a view to ensuring that next year a larger number of reports are submitted within the time limits and with all the required information. The Committee also requests the Office to intensify its technical assistance for this purpose. Finally, in line with the comments of the Conference Committee, the Committee hopes that the measures to streamline the sending and processing of information and reports, including the grouping of Conventions by strategic objective for reporting purposes and the lengthening of the reporting cycle for fundamental and governance Conventions, will facilitate the preparation and sending of reports by member States.

Out of these 49 countries, 45 have sent the reports requested.

¹⁷ In general, the Committee makes observations in the most serious and persistent cases of failure by member States to respect their reporting and other standards-related obligations based on the following criteria: the failure to send reports for two or more years, the failure to supply first reports for two or more years, and the absence of an indication in the reports received (or in the majority of them) of the representative employers' and workers' organizations to which copies of the reports and information are to be communicated. The Committee makes a direct request when a country has not sent the reports due, or the majority of reports due, in the current year.

Supply of first reports

57. The Committee notes that 67 of the 101 first reports due on the application of ratified Conventions were received by the time the Committee's session ended, compared to last year when 61 of the 105 first reports due had been received. However, a number of countries have failed to supply first reports, some of which are more than a year overdue. Thus, certain first reports on ratified Conventions have not been received for a number of years from the following nine member States:

58. The failure of these countries to send the first reports due is raised in observations at the beginning of Part II (section I) of the present report. In general, the Committee, like the Conference Committee, emphasizes the particular importance of first reports, which provide the basis on which the Committee makes its initial assessment of the application of the specific Conventions concerned and, in certain cases, of all the Conventions ratified by the country. The Committee urges the governments concerned to make a special effort to supply the first reports due. The Committee also requests the Office to provide appropriate technical assistance, particularly since first reports are detailed reports and as such need to be prepared in light of the report form approved by the Governing Body for each Convention.¹⁹

Replies to the comments of the supervisory bodies

59. Governments are requested to reply in their reports to the observations and direct requests made by the Committee, and the majority of governments have provided the replies requested. In accordance with the established practice, the Office has written to all the governments which failed to provide such replies requesting them to supply the necessary information. This year, 15 of the governments which were contacted by the Office have provided the information requested.

¹⁹ Detailed reports have to be drawn up in accordance with the report form approved by the Governing Body for each Convention. Detailed reports are requested in the year following the entry into force of a Convention or when the Committee of Experts or the Conference Committee specifically requests such a report. Simplified reports are then requested on a regular basis. See the Governing Body's decisions in this respect (GB.282/LILS/5 (November 2001) and GB.283/LILS/6 (March 2002)).

60. This year, there were 387 cases in which no reply was received to comments (concerning 40 countries). There were 537 such cases (concerning 43 countries) last year.

61. The Committee has made observations to 15 of the countries concerned on compliance with their reporting and other standards-related obligations. These cases of comments to which replies have not been received may be classified as follows:

- (a) no reply has been received to all the reports requested from governments; or
- (b) the reports received contained no reply to most of the Committee's comments (observations and/or direct requests), and/or did not reply to the letters sent by the Office.

62. The Committee notes with concern that the number of comments to which replies have not been received remains significantly high. This has led the Conference Committee and the Committee, with the support of the Office, to pay more sustained attention to cases of failure to comply with the obligation to provide information in reply to the Committee's comments. Moreover, the Committee recalls that, for the past seven years, with a view to helping the countries to provide the required information, it has made the requests addressed to them in this respect more visible in its comments. The Committee underlines that the value attached by ILO constituents to the dialogue with the supervisory bodies on the application of ratified Conventions is considerably diminished by the failure of governments to fulfil their obligations in this respect. The Committee urges the countries concerned to provide all the information due and to have recourse to the assistance of the Office where necessary. In this respect, it requests the Office to give the highest priority to reinforcing the measures already taken and to the provision of specific assistance to the countries concerned so that they can provide the information requested on the application of ratified Conventions.

B. Examination by the Committee of Experts of reports on ratified Conventions

63. In examining the reports received on ratified Conventions and Conventions declared applicable to non-metropolitan territories, in accordance with its normal practice, the Committee assigned to each of its members the initial responsibility for a group of Conventions. Reports received early enough are sent to the members concerned in advance of the Committee's session. The members submit their preliminary conclusions on the instruments for which they are responsible to the Committee in plenary sitting for discussion and approval. Decisions on comments are adopted by consensus.

Observations and direct requests

64. In certain cases, the Committee has found that no comment is called for regarding the manner in which a ratified Convention has been implemented.²⁰ In other cases, however, the Committee has found it necessary to draw the attention of the governments concerned to the need to take further action to give effect to certain provisions of Conventions or to supply additional information on given points. As in previous years, its comments have been drawn up in the form of either "observations", which are reproduced in the report of the Committee, or "direct requests", which are not published in the Committee's report, but are communicated directly to the governments concerned.²¹

²⁰ 331 reports.

²¹ ILO: Handbook of procedures relating to international labour Conventions and Recommendations, Geneva, Rev., 2012. Observations and direct requests are accessible through the NORMLEX database.

65. The Committee's observations appear in Part II of this report, together with a list under each Convention of any direct requests. An index of all observations and direct requests, classified by country, is provided in Appendix VII to the report.

Follow-up of procedures for the examination of representations under article 24 of the Constitution and complaints under article 26 of the Constitution

66. In accordance with the established practice, the Committee examines the measures taken by governments pursuant to the recommendations of tripartite committees (established to examine representations under article 24 of the Constitution) and commissions of inquiry (established to examine complaints under article 26 of the Constitution), after they have been approved (tripartite committees) or noted (commissions of inquiry) by the Governing Body. The corresponding information is examined by the Committee and forms an integral part of its dialogue with the governments concerned in the context of the examination of the reports submitted on the application of the respective Conventions, as well as any comments submitted by employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee considers it useful to indicate more clearly the cases in which it follows up on the effect given to the recommendations made under other constitutional supervisory procedures, as indicated in the following table.

Special notes

67. As in the past, the Committee has indicated by special notes at the end of the observations (traditionally known as footnotes) the cases in which, because of the nature of the problems encountered in the application of the Conventions concerned, it has seemed appropriate to ask the government to supply a report earlier than would otherwise have been the case and, in some instances, to supply full particulars to the Conference at its next session in June 2013.

68. In order to identify cases for which it inserts special notes, the Committee uses the basic criteria described below, while taking into account the following general considerations. First, the criteria are indicative. In exercising its discretion in the application of the criteria, the Committee may also have regard to the specific circumstances of the country and the length of the reporting cycle. Second, the criteria are applicable to cases in which an earlier report is requested, often referred to as a "single footnote", as well as to cases in which the government is requested to provide detailed information to the Conference, often referred to as a "double footnote". The difference between these two categories is one of degree. Third, a serious case otherwise justifying a special note to provide full particulars to the Conference (double footnote) might only be given a special note to provide an early report (single footnote) when there has been a recent discussion of the case in the Conference Committee. Finally, the Committee wishes to point out that it exercises restraint in its recourse to "double footnotes" in deference to the Conference Committee's decisions as to the cases it wishes to discuss.

69. The criteria to which the Committee has regard are the following:

- the seriousness of the problem; in this respect, the Committee emphasizes that an important consideration is the necessity to view the problem in the context of a particular Convention and to take into account matters involving fundamental rights, workers' health, safety and well-being, as well as any adverse impact, including at the international level, on workers and other categories of protected persons;

- the persistence of the problem;
- the urgency of the situation; the evaluation of such urgency is necessarily case-specific, according to standard human rights criteria, such as life-threatening situations or problems where irreversible harm is foreseeable; and
- the quality and scope of the government's response in its reports or the absence of response to the issues raised by the Committee, including cases of clear and repeated refusal on the part of a State to comply with its obligations.

70. In addition, the Committee wishes to emphasize that its decision not to double footnote a case which it has previously drawn to the attention of the Conference Committee in no way implies that it has considered progress to have been made therein.

71. At its 76th Session (November–December 2005), the Committee decided that the identification of cases in respect of which a government is requested to provide detailed information to the Conference would be a two-stage process: first, the expert initially responsible for a particular group of Conventions recommends to the Committee the insertion of special notes; second, in light of all the recommendations made, the Committee will, after discussion, take a final, collegial decision once it has reviewed the application of all the Conventions.

72. This year, under the present reporting cycle the Committee has requested early reports after an interval of either one, two or three years, according to the circumstances, in the following cases:

Practical application

75. It is customary for the Committee to note the information contained in governments' reports allowing it to assess the application of Conventions in practice, such as information relating to judicial decisions, statistics and labour inspection. The supply of this information is requested in almost all report forms, as well as under the specific terms of some Conventions.

76. The Committee notes that 441 reports received this year contain information on the practical application of Conventions. Of these, 59 reports contain information on national jurisprudence. The Committee also notes that 382 of the reports contain information on statistics and labour inspection.

77. The Committee wishes to emphasize to governments the importance of submitting such information, which is indispensable to complete the examination of national legislation and to help the Committee to identify the issues arising from real problems of application in practice. The Committee also wishes to encourage employers' and workers' organizations to submit clear and up-to-date information on the application of Conventions in practice.

Cases of progress

78. Following its examination of the reports supplied by governments, and in accordance with its standard practice, the Committee refers in its comments to cases in which it expresses its satisfaction or interest at the progress achieved in the application of the respective Conventions.

79. At its 80th and 82nd Sessions (2009 and 2011), the Committee made the following clarifications on the general approach developed over the years for the identification of cases of progress:

- (1) The expression by the Committee of interest or satisfaction does not mean that it considers that the country in question is in general conformity with the Convention, and in the same comment the Committee may express its satisfaction or interest at a specific issue while also expressing regret concerning other important matters which, in its view, have not been addressed in a satisfactory manner.
- (2) The Committee wishes to emphasize that an indication of progress is limited to a specific issue related to the application of the Convention and the nature of the measure adopted by the government concerned.
- (3) The Committee exercises its discretion in noting progress, taking into account the particular nature of the Convention and the specific circumstances of the country.
- (4) The expression of progress can refer to different kinds of measures relating to national legislation, policy or practice.
- (5) If the satisfaction or interest relates to the adoption of legislation or to draft legislation, the Committee may also consider appropriate follow-up measures for its practical application.
- (6) In identifying cases of progress, the Committee takes into account both the information provided by governments in their reports and the comments of employers' and workers' organizations.

80. Since first identifying cases of satisfaction in its report in 1964,²² the Committee has continued to follow the same general criteria. The Committee expresses satisfaction in cases in which, following comments it has made on a specific issue, governments have taken measures through either the adoption of new legislation, an amendment to the existing legislation or a significant change in the national policy or practice, thus achieving fuller compliance with their obligations under the respective Conventions. In expressing its satisfaction, the Committee indicates to governments and the social partners that it considers the specific matter resolved. The reason for identifying cases of satisfaction is twofold:

- to place on record the Committee's appreciation of the positive action taken by governments in response to its comments; and
- to provide an example to other governments and social partners which have to address similar issues.

81. Details concerning these cases of progress are to be found in Part II of this report and cover 39 instances in which measures of this kind have been taken in 30 countries. The full list is as follows:

82. Thus the total number of cases in which the Committee has been led to express its satisfaction at the progress achieved following its comments has risen to 2,914 since the Committee began listing them in its report.

83. Within cases of progress, the distinction between cases of satisfaction and cases of interest was formalized in 1979.²³ In general, cases of interest cover measures that are sufficiently advanced to justify the expectation that further progress would be achieved in the future and regarding which the Committee would want to continue its dialogue with the government and the social partners. In comparison to cases of satisfaction, cases of interest relate to progress, which is less significant. The Committee's practice has developed to such an extent that cases in which it expresses interest may encompass a variety of measures. The paramount consideration is that the measures contribute to the overall achievement of the objectives of a particular Convention. This may include:

- draft legislation that is before parliament, or other proposed legislative changes forwarded or available to the Committee;
- consultations within the government and with the social partners;
- new policies;
- the development and implementation of activities within the framework of a technical cooperation project or following technical assistance or advice from the Office;

²³ See para. 122 of the report of the Committee of Experts submitted to the 65th Session (1979) of the International Labour Conference.

- judicial decisions, according to the level of the court, the subject matter and the force of such decisions in a particular legal system, would normally be considered as cases of interest unless there is a compelling reason to note a particular judicial decision as a case of satisfaction; or
- the Committee may also note as cases of interest the progress made by a State, province or territory in the framework of a federal system.

84. Details concerning the cases in question are to be found either in Part II of this report or in the requests addressed directly to the governments concerned, and include 240 instances in which measures of this kind have been adopted in 109 countries. The full list is as follows:

Cases of good practice

85. In accordance with the decision taken at its 78th Session (November–December 2007), the Committee highlights cases of good practice to express its appreciation of the special efforts made in applying a Convention, and so that they might where appropriate serve as a model for other countries to assist in the implementation of ratified Conventions and the furtherance of social progress. At its 79th Session (November–December 2008), the Committee agreed on the general criteria that it would apply to identify cases of good practice. The Committee further agreed that it would continue to follow a two-stage process for the identification of cases of good practice: first, the expert initially responsible for a particular group of Conventions recommends to the Committee that a measure or measures should be identified as a case of good practice; second, in light of all the recommendations made, the Committee will, after discussion, take a final collegial decision once it has reviewed the application of all the Conventions.²⁴

86. At its 80th Session (November–December 2009), the Committee focused, in particular, on clarifying the distinction between cases of good practice and cases of progress. In this respect, the Committee wishes to underline at the outset that cases of good practice are necessarily also cases of progress, although the reverse is not always true. The Committee wishes to point out that the identification of a case of good practice does not in any way imply additional obligations for member States under the Conventions that they have ratified. This identification also does not imply that the concerned member State is in conformity with other ratified Conventions. Moreover, mere compliance with the requirements of a Convention is not sufficient for the identification of a case of good practice, as compliance is a basic requirement deriving from ratification of the Convention. Cases of good practice are therefore of an informative rather than of a prescriptive nature. Their identification forms part of the ongoing dialogue with the government concerned on the application of a ratified Convention and can relate to any measure taken in national legislation, policy or practice. A certain caution must clearly be exercised in the identification of cases of good practice so as to minimize the possibility that such practices may with hindsight come to be viewed as unsatisfactory.

87. Bearing in mind these aspects, the Committee wishes to confirm the following three criteria, which were identified at its 79th Session (November–December 2008), on the understanding that they are indicative, but not exhaustive.

- (1) A case of good practice may consist of a new approach to achieving or improving compliance with the Convention and could therefore be useful as a model for other countries in implementing that Convention.

²⁴ It will be recalled that this two-stage process is also used for the so-called “double footnotes”; see para. 68 above.

- (2) The practice may reflect an innovative or creative way of either implementing the Convention, or of addressing difficulties which arise in its application.
- (3) Recognizing that Conventions lay down minimum standards, the practice may offer an example of a country extending the application or coverage of the Convention to enhance the achievement of its objectives, particularly in cases where the Convention contains flexibility clauses.

Cases in which the need for technical assistance has been highlighted

88. The combination of the work of the supervisory bodies and the practical guidance given to member States through technical cooperation and assistance has always been one of the key dimensions of the ILO supervisory system. Further, since 2005, at the initiative of the Conference Committee, heightened attention has been given to the complementarity between examination by the ILO supervisory bodies and the Office's technical assistance. As pointed out in paragraphs 37–41, this has led to enhanced follow-up of cases of serious failure by member States to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations. In addition, the Conference Committee has made more systematic references to technical assistance in its conclusions regarding individual cases concerning the application of ratified Conventions. The aim of this strengthened combination between the work of the supervisory bodies and the Office's technical assistance is to provide an effective framework to member States for full compliance with their standards-related obligations, including the implementation of the Conventions which they have ratified.

89. In this context, the Committee decided at its 79th Session (November–December 2008) to highlight the cases for which, in the Committee's view, technical assistance would be particularly useful in helping member States to address gaps in law and in practice in the implementation of ratified Conventions. These cases are highlighted in the following table and details can be found in Part II of the report of the Committee of Experts. The Committee also examined a certain number of cases in relation to which the Conference Committee emphasized the need for technical assistance at the last session of the Conference.

Strengthening of programmes for a better application of international labour standards

90. With regard to technical assistance, the Committee further notes that the Governing Body, during its 310th Session, allocated funds of the Special Programme Account for a limited duration to support the strengthening of programmes which would result in the better application of international labour standards. These time-bound assistance activities on international labour standards are being carried out in 2012 and 2013 and are comprised of two elements:

- (1) Reporting assistance to countries, a reporting “safety net” that will enable these countries to catch up on their backlog and to better discharge their reporting obligations in the future.
- (2) Assistance to countries to reduce the implementation gap with respect to specific ratified Conventions.

91. The Committee notes that under this Programme, priority countries were identified (jointly with the field offices) on the basis of the problems encountered in reporting and implementation, and a strategy has been developed to act on several fronts, with the aim of achieving better compliance with reporting obligations and/or ratified Conventions. In each country, selected key actors likely to bring about positive change in terms of standards are given technical assistance, training and are made aware of the issues at stake. Currently some 47 national action plans (discussed or under discussion with the national constituents) have been developed for 38 countries²⁵ and are in the phase of implementation. Activities under each country action plan include one or more of the following: training on the content of selected international labour standards; research to generate information on the status of implementation of international labour standards, including legislative gap analyses, advice on issues that will enable tripartite constituents to take the relevant decisions aiming at full implementation; legal advice on the revision or drafting of legislation and regulations in the light of the supervisory bodies’ comments; strengthening of data collection and reporting capacity of tripartite constituents.

92. The Committee welcomes this technical assistance programme and takes note of the fact that the results will be reported to the Committee in time for its 2013 session to enable it to assess progress made.

Ratification of the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189)

93. The Committee notes that observations and direct requests under a diverse set of Conventions address the status of domestic workers, raising distinct challenges regarding labour standards compliance. In this regard, the Committee notes the International Labour Conference’s recent adoption of the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), and encourages governments to consider ratifying this Convention both for its own value and as a factor contributing to more effective compliance with Conventions Nos 87, 97, 111, 138, 143 and 182.

Comments made by employers’ and workers’ organizations

94. At each session, the Committee draws the attention of governments to the important role of employers’ and workers’ organizations in the application of Conventions and Recommendations. Moreover, it highlights the fact that numerous Conventions require consultation with employers’ and workers’ organizations, or their collaboration in a variety of measures. The Committee notes that almost all governments have indicated in the reports supplied under articles 19 and ²⁵ Bangladesh, Benin, Botswana, Burkina Faso, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, China, Colombia, Comoros, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Ghana, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Indonesia, Jordan, Lebanon, Republic of Moldova, Morocco, Paraguay, Philippines, Peru, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Seychelles, Solomon Islands, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Tajikistan, United Republic of Tanzania, Togo, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

22 of the Constitution the representative organizations of employers and workers to which, in accordance with article 23(2) of the Constitution, they have communicated copies of the reports supplied to the Office. The Committee recalls that, in accordance with the tripartite nature of the ILO, compliance with this constitutional obligation is intended to enable representative organizations of employers and workers to participate fully in supervision of the application of international labour standards. It should be recalled that if a government fails to comply with this obligation, these organizations are denied their opportunity to comment and an essential element of tripartism is lost. The Committee calls on all member States to discharge their obligation under article 23(2) of the Constitution. The Committee also requests governments to provide copies of reports to representative employers' and workers' organizations so that they have enough time to send any comments that they may wish to make.

95. Since its last session, the Committee has received 1,004 comments (compared to 1,051 last year), 112 of which (compared to 129 last year) were communicated by employers' organizations and 892 (compared to 922 last year) by workers' organizations. The Committee recalls the importance it attaches to this contribution by employers' and workers' organizations to the work of the supervisory bodies. This contribution is essential for the Committee's evaluation of the application of ratified Conventions in national law and in practice.

96. The majority of the comments received (846) relate to the application of ratified Conventions (see Appendix III).²⁶ Some 466 of these comments relate to the application of fundamental Conventions, 92 relate to governance Conventions and 288 concern the application of other Conventions. Moreover, 158 comments concern reports provided under article 19 of the Constitution on the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151), and the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154).²⁷

97. The Committee notes that, of the comments received this year, 668 were transmitted directly to the Office which, in accordance with the practice established by the Committee, referred them to the governments concerned for comment. The Committee emphasizes that comments submitted by employers' and workers' organizations should be received by the Office by 1 September at the latest to allow governments to have a reasonable time to respond, thereby enabling the Committee to examine the issues in question at its session in November the same year. Comments received later than 1 September will be examined by the Committee at its session the following year. In 178 cases, the governments transmitted the comments made by employers' and workers' organizations with their reports, sometimes adding their own comments.

98. The Committee also examined a number of other comments by employers' and workers' organizations, consideration of which had been postponed from its previous session because the comments of the organizations or the replies of the governments had arrived just before, during or just after the session. It again had to postpone until its next session the examination of a number of comments when they were received too close to or even during the Committee's present session.

99. The Committee notes that in general the employers' and workers' organizations concerned endeavoured to gather and present elements of law and fact on the application in practice of ratified Conventions. The Committee recalls that it is essential for the organizations, when referring specifically to the Convention or Conventions deemed relevant, to provide detailed information that has real additional value with regard to the information provided by governments and the issues addressed in the Committee's comments. Such information should help to update or renew the analysis of the application of Conventions and emphasize real problems concerning their application in practice. The Committee invites the organizations interested to request technical assistance from the Office to this end.

100. The Committee further notes that the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) has submitted an article 23 comment in relation to 50 countries raising its disagreement with the Committee's observations in relation to the right to strike. This comment reiterates the general views of the IOE that Convention No. 87 does not recognize, either expressly or implicitly, a right to strike. The IOE contests the fact that the Committee of Experts nevertheless persists in interpreting the right to strike arising from Convention No. 87 as a fundamental right of workers and their organizations. The IOE thus requests the Committee to take duly into account all the elements expressed in detail in its submission when examining the application in law and practice of Convention No. 87 in relation to these countries.

101. The Committee has carefully read and noted the detailed discussion on the right to strike at the Committee on the Application of Standards during the 101st International Labour Conference. The Committee observes that the Conference Committee concluded this discussion by noting the different views expressed on the functioning of the Committee in relation to the reports of the Committee of Experts which were submitted for its consideration and recommended that the Conference: (1) request the Director-General to communicate those views to the Governing Body; and (2) invite the Governing Body to take appropriate follow-up as a matter of urgency, including through informal tripartite consultations prior to its November 2012 session.

²⁶ An indication of the observations made by employers' and workers' organizations on the application of Conventions received during the current year is available on the NORMLEX database.

²⁷ See Report III (Part 1B), ILC, 102nd Session, Geneva, 2013.

102. The Committee further notes the decision of the November 2012 Governing Body which, noting the outcome of the informal tripartite consultations which had taken place on 19 September 2012 and the commitment to pursue discussions in a constructive manner, invited the Officers of the Governing Body to pursue informal tripartite consultations and to report to the Governing Body at its 317th Session (March 2013). In light of the above, the Committee observes that this matter, which includes questions related to the application of Convention No. 87, is still pending before the Governing Body. Recalling that all the ILO supervisory bodies have addressed the question of the right to strike for nearly 60 years now, the Committee considers that this question is one of primary importance for the constituents of the ILO and firmly hopes that it will be resolved as soon as possible. The Committee trusts that an open dialogue on the issues of concern with the tripartite constituents will enable the parties to reach a conclusion and observes that the Committee on Freedom of Association, in the constructive spirit of consensus and social dialogue with which it carries out its work, may be an appropriate forum for discussing these issues, as the specialized body, globally recognized, for matters relating to freedom of association.

103. The Committee further notes that the IOE has submitted comments in August 2012 on the application in law and practice of Articles 6, 7, 15 and 16 of Convention No. 169 concerning the requirement of consultation in 15 countries. In this regard, the IOE raises the following issues: the identification of representative institutions, the definition of indigenous territory and the lack of consensus of indigenous and tribal peoples, and the importance for the Committee to be aware of the consequences of the issue in relation to legal security, financial costs and certainty of both public and private investment. The IOE refers to the difficulties, costs and negative impact that the failure by States to comply with the obligation of consultation can have on the projects undertaken by both public and private enterprises. Among other effects, the IOE observed that the erroneous application and interpretation of the requirement of prior consultation can be a legal obstacle and lead to business difficulties, harm the reputation of enterprises and result in financial costs. The IOE also states that the difficulties to comply with the obligation of consultation may have an impact on the projects that enterprises may wish to carry out with a view to creating a conducive environment for economic and social development, the creation of decent and productive work and the sustainable development of society as a whole. The IOE therefore calls on the supervisory bodies and in particular the Committee to avoid broad interpretations of the provisions of the Convention.

104. In this respect, the Committee refers to its general observations of 2009 and 2011, in which it indicated that, in reviewing countries' compliance with the Convention, it has remained true to the understanding of the Convention. The Committee has consistently indicated that "consultation and participation" constitute the cornerstone of Convention No. 169 on which all its provisions are based, and in particular the relevant provisions of the Convention in Articles 6, 7, 15 and 17. Articles 27 and 28 also refer to consultation and, more specifically, regarding education. The Committee confirms the view it expressed in 2011 that its understanding of the meaning of "consultation" has remained faithful to both the letter and spirit of the relevant provisions of the Convention and to the preparatory work leading to its adoption, as well as to the findings of tripartite bodies that the Governing Body has established under article 24 of the Constitution. The Committee also stated that it was not a court of law and that, as a result, cannot issue injunctions or provisional measures. The Committee has also stressed that the Convention is an important tool in achieving the goals of sustainable development. In the observations formulated at the present session on Convention No. 169, the Committee has invited governments to include in their reports, which are due in 2013, comments they may deem appropriate on the observations made by the IOE. It also requested governments, when preparing their reports on Convention No. 169, to hold consultations with the social partners and indigenous peoples' organizations on the results achieved by the measures adopted to give effect to the provisions of the Convention (Parts VII and VIII of the report form).

Treatment of comments received from employers' and workers' organizations in a non-reporting year

105. The Committee recalls that at its 77th Session (November–December 2006), it gave guidance to the Office as to the procedure to be followed in determining the treatment of comments received from employers' and workers' organizations concerning the application of a ratified Convention in a non-reporting year. At its 80th Session (November–December 2009), the Committee examined this procedure in light of the decision by the Governing Body to extend the cycle for the submission of reports from two to three years for the fundamental and governance Conventions. In this respect, the Committee is fully aware of the need to apply in a fair and judicious manner the decisions taken by the Governing Body to extend the reporting cycle and to ensure that employers' and workers' organizations comments may effectively draw its attention to areas of concern, even when no report on the Convention in question is due from the government that year.

106. The Committee confirms that, where the comments received from employers' and workers' organizations simply repeat comments made in previous years, or refer to matters already raised by the Committee, they will be examined in accordance with the normal cycle in the year when the government's report is due, and a report will not be requested from the government outside that cycle. This procedure may also be followed in the case of comments which provide additional information on law and practice concerning matters already raised by the Committee, or on minor legislative changes, although consideration may be given, depending on the specific circumstances, to requesting an advanced report in such cases.

107. However, where the comment raises more serious allegations of important acts of non-compliance with a particular Convention – as opposed to mere repetitions – the government will be requested to reply to these allegations outside the normal reporting cycle and the Committee will consider the comments in the year in which they are received, where the allegations go beyond mere declarations. Comments referring to important legislative changes, or to proposals which have a fundamental impact on the application of a Convention will be considered in the same manner, as will comments which refer to minor, new legislative proposals or draft laws not yet examined by the Committee, where their early examination may assist the government at the drafting stage.

108. The Committee emphasizes that the procedure set out above aims at giving effect to decisions taken by the Governing Body which have both extended the reporting cycle and provided for safeguards in that context to ensure that effective supervision of the application of ratified Conventions is maintained. One of these safeguards consists in giving due recognition to the possibility afforded to employers' and workers' organizations to draw the attention of the Committee to matters of particular concern arising from the application of ratified Conventions, even in a year when no report is due; in such cases, comments received directly by the Office are communicated to the governments concerned in a timely fashion so as to ensure respect for due process. The Committee will continue to give full and careful consideration to all the elements made available to it in order to ensure the effective, up-to-date and regular monitoring of the application of ratified Conventions in the context of the new extended reporting cycle for the fundamental and governance Conventions.

109. Part II of this report contains most of the observations made by the Committee on cases in which the comments raised matters relating to the application of ratified Conventions. Where appropriate, other comments are examined in requests addressed directly to governments.

C. Submission of instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities (article 19, paragraphs 5, 6 and 7, of the Constitution)

110. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee this year examined the following information supplied by the governments of member States pursuant to article 19 of the Constitution of the Organization:

- (a) additional information on measures taken to submit to the competent authorities the instruments adopted by the Conference from 1967 (51st Session) to June 2011 (100th Session) (Conventions Nos 128 to 189, Recommendations Nos 132 to 201 and Protocols);
- (b) replies to the observations and direct requests made by the Committee at its 82nd Session (November–December 2011).

111. Appendix IV of Part II of the report contains a summary indicating the competent authority to which the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 99th Session were submitted and the date of submission. In addition, Appendix IV summarizes the information supplied by governments with respect to earlier adopted instruments submitted to the competent authority in 2011. Some governments mentioned in Annex IV also provided information on the submission of the Social Protection Floors Recommendation, 2012 (No. 202), adopted at the 101st Session of the Conference (June 2012).

112. Other statistical information is to be found in Appendices V and VI of Part II of the report. Appendix V, compiled from information sent by governments, shows where each member State stands in terms of its constitutional obligation of submission. Appendix VI shows the overall submission status of instruments adopted since the 51st Session (June 1967) of the Conference. The statistical data in Appendices V and VI are regularly updated by the competent branches of the Office and can be accessed via the Internet.

100th Session

113. At its 100th Session in June 2011, the Conference adopted the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), and its corresponding Recommendation, 2011 (No. 201). The 12-month period for submission to the competent authorities of Convention No. 189 and Recommendation No. 201 ended on 16 June 2012, and the 18-month period on 16 December 2012. At this session, the Committee examined new information on the steps taken regarding Convention No. 189 and Recommendation No. 201 by the following governments: Algeria, Antigua and Barbuda, Armenia, Australia, Austria, Barbados, Belarus, Belgium, Plurinational State of Bolivia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Brunei Darussalam, Cameroon, Cape Verde, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Estonia, Ethiopia, Gabon, Georgia, Germany, Ghana, Hungary, India, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Republic of Korea, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mauritius, Mongolia, Morocco, Myanmar, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Philippines, Poland, Romania, Saudi Arabia, Serbia, Singapore, Slovakia, South Africa, Spain, Sweden, United Republic of Tanzania, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Turkmenistan, Ukraine, United States, Uruguay, Uzbekistan, Viet Nam and Zimbabwe.

Cases of progress

114. The Committee notes with interest the information sent in the course of the period concerned by the governments of the following countries: Cambodia, Colombia, Cyprus, Ethiopia, Ghana, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan. It welcomes the efforts made by these governments to recognize the significant delay in submission and to take important steps toward fulfilling their obligation to submit to their parliamentary bodies the instruments adopted by the Conference over a number of years.

Special problems

115. To facilitate the work of the Committee on the Application of Standards, this report only mentions those governments that have not submitted to the competent authorities the instruments adopted by the Conference for at least seven sessions. This time frame begins on the 91st (2003) Session and concludes on the 100th (2011) Session because the Conference did not adopt any Conventions or Recommendations during the 93rd (2005), 97th (2008) or 98th (2009) Session. Thus, this time frame was deemed long enough to warrant inviting the governments concerned to a special sitting of the Conference Committee so that they could account for the delays in submission.

116. The Committee notes that at the closure of its 83rd Session, on 7 December 2012, the following 34 countries were in this situation: Angola, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Belize, Comoros, Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Dominica, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Fiji, Guinea, Haiti, Iraq, Kyrgyzstan, Libya, Mozambique, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sudan, Suriname, Syrian Arab Republic, Tajikistan, Uganda and Ukraine.

117. The Committee is aware of the exceptional circumstances that have affected some of these countries for years, as a result of which they have been deprived of the institutions needed to fulfil the obligation to submit instruments. At the 101st Session of the Conference (June 2012), the Government representatives of 11 delegations supplied information explaining why their countries had been unable to meet the constitutional obligation to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to national parliaments. As the Committee of Experts had done previously, the Conference Committee expressed great concern at the failure to respect this obligation. It pointed out that compliance with this constitutional obligation, which means submitting the instruments adopted by the Conference to national parliaments, is of the utmost importance in ensuring the effectiveness of the Organization's standards-related activities.

118. The abovementioned countries have been identified in observations published in this report, and the Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols that have not been submitted are indicated in the statistical appendices. The Committee considers it worthwhile to alert the governments concerned so as to enable them immediately and as a matter of urgency to take appropriate steps to bring themselves up to date. This notice also allows the governments to benefit from the measures the Office is prepared to take, upon their request, to assist them in the steps required for the rapid submission to parliament of the pending instruments.

Comments of the Committee and replies from governments

119. As in its previous reports, the Committee makes individual observations in section III of Part Two of this report on the points that should be brought to the special attention of governments. Observations are made in cases where there has been no information for five or more sessions of the Conference. Furthermore, requests for additional information on other points have been addressed directly to a number of countries (see the list of direct requests at the end of section III).

120. The Committee hopes that the observations and the direct requests that it is addressing this year to governments will enable them better to discharge their constitutional obligation of submission, thereby contributing to the promotion of the standards adopted by the Conference.

121. As the Committee has already pointed out, it is important that governments send the information and documents required by the questionnaire at the end of the Memorandum adopted by the Governing Body in March 2005. The Committee must receive for examination a summary or a copy of the documents submitting the instruments to the parliamentary bodies and be informed of the proposals made as to the action to be taken on them. The obligation of submission is discharged only once the instruments adopted by the Conference have been submitted to parliament and the competent authorities have taken a decision on them. The Office has to be informed of this decision, as well as of the submission of instruments to parliament.

122. The Committee hopes to be able to note progress in this matter in its next report. It again reminds governments that they may seek technical assistance from the ILO, particularly through the standards specialists in the field.

D. Instruments chosen for reports under article 19 of the Constitution

123. The Committee recalls that at its 303rd Session (November 2008), the Governing Body decided to align the subjects of General Surveys with those of the annual recurrent discussions in the Conference under the follow-up to the Social Justice Declaration. This year, governments were requested to supply reports under article 19 of the Constitution as a basis for the General Survey on the following instruments: the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151), the Labour Relations (Public Service) Recommendation, 1978 (No. 159), the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154), and the Collective Bargaining Recommendation, 1981 (No. 163).

124. A total of 768 reports were requested from member States, under article 19 of the Constitution and 339 reports were received. This represents 44.14 per cent of the reports requested.

125. The Committee notes with regret that, for the past five years, none of the reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations requested under article 19 of the Constitution have been received from the following 17 countries: Afghanistan, Brunei Darussalam, Cambodia, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Equatorial Guinea, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Ireland, Libya, Niger, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Tajikistan and Vanuatu.

126. The Committee once again urges governments to provide the reports requested so that its General Surveys can be as comprehensive as possible. It hopes that the Office will supply all the necessary technical assistance to this end.

127. Part III of this report (issued separately as Part 1B) contains the General Survey concerning labour relations and collective bargaining in the public service.²⁸ In accordance with the practice followed in previous years, the survey has been prepared on the basis of a preliminary examination by a working party comprising five members of the Committee.

²⁸ See Report III (Part 1B), International Labour Conference, 102nd Session, Geneva, 2013.

III. Collaboration with other international organizations and functions relating to other international instruments

A. Cooperation with the United Nations in the field of standards

128. In the context of collaboration with other international organizations on questions concerning supervision of the application of international instruments relating to subjects of common interest, the United Nations, certain specialized agencies and other intergovernmental organizations with which the ILO has entered into special arrangements for this purpose, are asked whether they have information on how Conventions are being applied. The list of the Conventions concerned and the international organizations that were consulted is as follows:

- the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107): United Nations (UN), Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR), United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and World Health Organization (WHO), Inter-American Indian Institute of the Organization of American States;
- the Radiation Protection Convention, 1960 (No. 115): International Atomic Energy Agency;
- the Social Policy (Basic Aims and Standards) Convention, 1962 (No. 117): UNFAO, OHCHR and UNESCO;
- the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141): UN, OHCHR and UNFAO;
- the Prevention of Accidents (Seafarers) Convention, 1970 (No. 134), and the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147): International Maritime Organization;
- the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142): UNESCO;
- the Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975 (No. 143): UN, OHCHR, UNESCO and WHO;
- the Nursing Personnel Convention, 1977 (No. 149): WHO;
- the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169): UNFAO, OHCHR, UNESCO, WHO and Inter-American Indian Institute of the Organization of American States.

B. United Nations treaties concerning human rights

129. The Committee recalls that international labour standards and the provisions of related United Nations human rights treaties are complementary and mutually reinforcing. It emphasizes that continuing cooperation between the ILO and the United Nations with regard to the application and supervision of relevant instruments is necessary, particularly in the context of United Nations reforms aimed at greater coherence and cooperation within the United Nations system and the human rights-based approach to development.

130. The Committee welcomes the fact that the Office has continued to provide information on the application of international labour standards to the United Nations treaty bodies on a regular basis, in accordance with the existing arrangements between the ILO and the United Nations. It also continued to follow the work of these bodies and to take their comments into consideration where appropriate. The Committee considers that coherent international monitoring is an important basis for action to enhance the enjoyment of and compliance with economic, social and cultural rights at the national level. The Committee itself had the opportunity to continue its collaboration with the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights in the context of the annual meeting between the two Committees which took place on 23 November 2012, at the invitation of the Friedrich Ebert Stiftung. This year, “the supervision of labour rights in the informal economy” was selected as a topic for discussion.

C. European Code of Social Security and its Protocol

131. In accordance with the supervisory procedure established under Article 74(4) of the European Code of Social Security, and the arrangements made between the ILO and the Council of Europe, the Committee of Experts examined 21 reports on the application of the Code and, as appropriate, its Protocol. The Committee’s conclusions on these reports will be sent to the Council of Europe for examination by its Committee of Experts on Social Security. Once approved, the Committee’s comments should lead to the adoption of resolutions by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on the application of the Code and the Protocol by the countries concerned.

132. With its dual responsibility for the application of the Code and for international labour Conventions relating to social security, the Committee is seeking to develop a coherent analysis of the application of European and international instruments and to coordinate the obligations of the States parties to these instruments. The Committee also draws attention to the national situations in which recourse to technical assistance from the Council of Europe and the Office may prove to be an effective means of improving the application of the Code.

133. Lastly, the Committee would like to express its appreciation for the invaluable assistance again rendered to it by the officials of the Office, whose competence and devotion to duty make it possible for the Committee to accomplish its increasingly voluminous and complex task in a limited period of time.

Part II. Observations concerning particular countries^{*}

^{*} In accordance with the decision taken at its 81st Session (November–December 2010), the Committee recalls that it follows a specific approach in identifying in its comments cases of progress. This approach is described in paragraphs 78–84, Part I (General Report) of the present report. In particular, the Committee recalls that the identification of a case of progress does not mean that it considers the country in question to be in general conformity with the Convention. Further, an indication of progress is limited to a specific issue related to the application of the Convention and the nature of the measure adopted by the government concerned.

I. Observations concerning reports on ratified Conventions (articles 22, 23, paragraph 2, and 35, paragraphs 6 and 8, of the Constitution)

General observation

The Committee recalls that the purpose of the obligation to communicate copies of reports on ratified Conventions to representative employers' and workers' organizations, established in article 23, paragraph 2, of the Constitution, is to enable these organizations to make their own observations on the application of ratified Conventions. The Committee emphasizes that the information received from employers' and workers' organizations bears witness to their involvement in the reporting system and that such information has often led to better knowledge and understanding of the difficulties that countries have met. Further to its general observation of last year, the Committee welcomes the fact that nearly all countries have fulfilled this obligation this year. However, it notes that none of the reports supplied by the following countries indicates the employers' and workers' organizations to which a copy has been communicated: Afghanistan (2012), Guyana (2012), Namibia (2012) and Zambia (2012).

For the following countries, the Committee notes that a majority of the reports received do not indicate the representative employers' and workers' organizations to which copies of the reports were communicated: Bahamas (2012), Côte d'Ivoire (2012) and South Africa (2012). The Committee requests these Governments to fulfil this constitutional obligation without delay.

General observations

Bahamas

The Committee notes that eight of the 18 reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have been received this year, so that ten reports remain due, most of which should include information in reply to comments made by the Committee. Furthermore, a first report due (since 2010) on the application of Convention No. 185 has still not been received. Although a number of officials of the Ministry of Labour and Social Development received training in previous years, the Office reminds the Government that it is ready to provide any further assistance needed. The Committee urges that the Government will soon submit all the reports due, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Burundi

The Committee notes that for the second year in succession, none of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have been received and that 25 reports are now due (for fundamental, governance and technical Conventions), most of which should include information in reply to comments made by the Committee. Furthermore, the Committee notes that a government official received training in 2011 at the ILO International Training Centre in Turin. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon submit the reports due, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Chad

The Committee notes with concern that for the third year in succession, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received and that 16 reports are now due (on fundamental, governance and technical Conventions), most of which should include information in reply to comments made by the Committee. Furthermore, the Committee notes that a government official received training at the ILO International Training Centre in Turin in 2012. The Office nonetheless reminds the Government that it is ready to provide any further assistance that might be necessary. The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary steps without delay to submit all the reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Djibouti

The Committee notes with concern that for the fourth year in succession, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received and that some 50 reports are now due, most of which should include information in reply to comments made by the Committee. The Office reminds the Government that it is ready to provide any necessary assistance. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to submit all the reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Equatorial Guinea

The Committee notes that for the sixth year in succession, apart from a report sent in 2008, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received and that 14 reports are now due, most of which should include information in reply to comments made by the Committee, as well as first reports on the application of Conventions Nos 68 and 92 (due since 1998). It notes that, apart from a report submitted in 2008, the Government has sent no further reports since 2006. The Committee is bound to express deep concern at a situation that has persisted despite numerous initiatives taken by the Office to afford technical assistance. It urges the Government to take the necessary steps without delay, including through further recourse to technical assistance, to submit the reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Kazakhstan

The Committee notes the efforts made by the Government, which are reflected in the fact that the majority of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have been received this year. However, the first reports on the application of Convention No. 167 (due since 2010) and Convention No. 185 (due since 2011) have still not been received. It asks the Government to take the necessary steps to submit these first reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Kiribati

The Committee notes that for the second year in succession, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received and that eight reports are now due (for all the fundamental Conventions), including four first reports (Conventions Nos 100, 111, 138 and 182). It further notes that two government officials received training in 2011. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon submit these reports, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Kyrgyzstan

The Committee notes the efforts made by the Government, reflected in the fact that the majority of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have been received this year. However, the first reports on application of Convention No. 184 (due since 2006), and Convention No. 157 (due since 2010) have still not been received. It asks the Government to take the necessary steps to submit all the first reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Nigeria

The Committee notes that 20 of the 30 reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have been received, so that ten reports remain due, including the first report on the application of Convention No. 185 (due since 2010). Most of these reports should include information in reply to comments made by the Committee. It further notes that two officials of the Ministry of Labour received training in 2011 and that tripartite training on constitutional obligations was organized in collaboration with the Office in the autumn of 2012. The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary steps without delay to submit all the reports and information due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

San Marino

The Committee notes that none of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have been received and that 19 reports are now due (for fundamental and technical Conventions), some of which should include information in reply to comments made by the Committee. The Office reminds the Government that it is ready to provide any necessary assistance. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon submit these reports, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

The Committee notes that this year again the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received and that 17 reports are now due (for fundamental, governance and technical Conventions), including the first report on the application of Convention No. 184 (due since 2007). Some of these reports should include information in reply to comments made by the Committee. Furthermore, the Committee notes that two Ministry of Labour officials received training in 2010 at the ILO International Training Centre in Turin. The Office nonetheless reminds the Government that it is ready to provide any further assistance that might be necessary. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon submit these reports, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

However, the first reports on the application of Conventions Nos 147 and 180 (due since 2007) have not been received. The Committee further notes that the country is benefiting from a standards-related technical cooperation programme organized by the Office, in the course of which a tripartite workshop on constitutional obligations was held in August 2012. The Committee accordingly hopes that the Government will soon submit the other first reports, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Sierra Leone

The Committee notes with deep concern that for the seventh year in succession, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received and that 24 reports are now due (for fundamental, governance and technical Conventions), most of which should include information in reply to comments made by the Committee. Freedom of association, collective bargaining, and industrial relations

Algeria

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike in a communication dated 29 August 2012 which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee. The Committee also notes the Government's reply to the observations of 31 July 2012 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the observations of 31 August 2012 from Education International (EI), the National Autonomous Union of Public Administration Staff (SNAPAP) and the National Autonomous Union of Secondary and Technical Education Teachers (SNAPEST), which refer to legislative issues already raised by the Committee and to violations of trade union rights in practice. However, the Committee observes that the Government has not sent any reply to certain allegations, especially those relating to acts of intimidation and threats, including death threats, towards trade union leaders and members. In this regard, the Committee recalls that the atmosphere of fear induced by threats to the life of trade unionists has inevitable repercussions on the exercise of trade union activities, and the exercise of these activities is possible only in a context of respect for basic human rights and in a climate free of violence, pressure and threats of any kind. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on the abovementioned allegations.

Furthermore, the Committee, like the Committee on Freedom of Association (Case No. 2701, November 2012 session), notes with satisfaction the registration of the National Union of Vocational Training Workers (SNTFP), which had been awaiting approval since 2002.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right to establish trade union organizations. The Committee previously noted that section 6 of Act No. 90-14 of 2 June 1990 restricts the right to establish a trade union organization to persons who are Algerian by birth or who have had Algerian nationality for at least ten years. Recalling that the right to organize must be guaranteed to workers and employers without distinction whatsoever, with the possible exception of those categories specified in Article 9 of the Convention, and that foreign workers too must have the right to establish organizations, the Committee asked the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 6 of Act No. 90-14 so as to grant all workers, without distinction as to nationality, the right to establish a trade union. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates in its report that the amendment requested by the Committee will be examined as part of the reform of the Labour Code. The Committee hopes that the announced legislative reform will occur in the near future and urges the Government to provide information on developments in this respect, especially regarding any amendment of section 6 of Act No. 90-14 securing to all workers, without distinction as to nationality, the right to form a trade union.

Articles 2 and 5. Right of workers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization and to establish federations and confederations. In its previous comments the Committee asked the Government to take specific measures to amend the legislative provisions that prevent workers' organizations, irrespective of the sector to which they belong, from forming federations and confederations of their own choosing (sections 2 and 4 of Act No. 90-14). The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that the Committee's request will be taken into account as part of the reform of the Labour Code. The Committee again urges the Government to report any developments regarding the amendment of section 4 of Act No. 90-14 so as to remove all obstacles preventing workers, regardless of the sector to which they belong, from establishing federations and confederations of their own choosing.

Article 3. Right of organizations to carry on their activities in full freedom and formulate their programmes. In its previous comments the Committee referred to section 43 of Act No. 90-02, under which strikes are forbidden not only in essential services the interruption of which may endanger the life, personal safety or health of the citizen, but also where the strike "is liable to give rise to a serious economic crisis". Noting that the Government reiterates that the interpretation given to this section is similar to that of the Committee, which refers to "strikes which, by reason of their scope and duration, are liable to cause an acute national crisis", the Committee requests the Government to give examples of specific cases in which recourse to strike action has been prohibited on the grounds of its possible effects.

Finally, the Committee previously commented on section 48 of Act No. 90-02, which empowers the minister or the competent authority, where the strike persists and mediation has failed, or where compelling economic or social needs require, to refer the dispute to the National Arbitration Commission after consulting the employers' and workers' representatives. The Committee notes the additional information provided by the Government in its report, especially with regard to the composition of the National Arbitration Commission (section 2 of Executive Decree No. 90-148 of 22 December 1990), which is a tripartite body containing equal numbers of representatives of the employers, the workers and the State and which is chaired by a magistrate. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that only one dispute has been referred to the National Arbitration Commission since its establishment in 1990.

Argentina

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the reply from the Government to the observations from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 4 August 2011, and from the Confederation of Workers of Argentina (CTA), dated 31 August 2010, and in particular that: (1) in connection with the killing of a demonstrator from the railway industry, the judicial authority has brought charges against various persons in relation to this occurrence; and (2) concerning the allegation of an armed attack on the home of a trade union leader in the province of Jujuy in 2011, the Government reported in the framework of a case currently being examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association than an investigation had already been initiated. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that: (1) since 2003 it has adopted a policy of constantly strengthening the principles of freedom of association, and mechanisms for social dialogue have been reinforced; (2) between January 2011 and October 2012 "trade union status" was granted in 298 cases and trade union registration was issued in 682 cases; and (3) since 2004 collective bargaining has experienced continuous dynamics of its own, with close linkage with the prevailing model for strengthening the internal market, and this is combined with constant growth in minimum living wages, the determination of which is also the result of dialogue between representatives of workers and employers (the Government sends statistics on collective bargaining and wages, which will be analysed in the context of the examination of the application of the respective Conventions).

The Committee also notes the comments from the ITUC dated 31 August 2012 and from the CTA dated 31 August and 7 September 2012 referring to legislative issues already raised by the Committee (according to the CTA, the Government has not promoted any amendments to the current regulations applicable to trade unions and has not endorsed any of the drafts brought before the National Congress by legislators from various parliamentary groups), and also referring to allegations of violations of trade union rights in practice (some of the allegations are being examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association). The Committee notes the Government's statement that the disputes reported in various companies have been settled.

Furthermore, the Committee notes the comments from the General Confederation of Labour (CGT), dated 10 September 2012, stating that the Act on trade union associations: (1) establishes sufficient guarantees to give full effect to Convention No. 87 and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), ensuring the full participation of all trade union organizations; and (2) ensures a minimum social protection floor established by workers' organizations having trade union status, as a result of which workers and their organizations enjoy better conditions of work.

Application by the CTA for "trade union status"

The Committee has been noting in its observations since 2005 that the application made by the CTA in August 2004 for "trade union status" (a status which confers certain exclusive rights such as the conclusion of collective agreements, protection of union officers, receipt of trade union dues through deductions from wages by the employer, etc.) is pending. On several occasions, the Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee on Freedom of Association (in Case No. 2477), has urged the Government to secure a decision on this matter without delay. In its comments made in 2012, the CTA affirms that the authorities have still not taken a decision on the application for "trade union status". The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that it is not simply a question of supporting or launching an initiative, as asserted by a number of trade union organizations, or to state that in relation to this matter theories concerning confederations exercising a single activity might be applied, in view of the fact that the legal situation of the CTA has to be analysed and incorporated into the system of Act No. 23551 in line with the applicable legislation and case law. While noting the new information from the Government, the Committee strongly requests that the Government will soon take a decision in this regard. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on this matter.

Act on trade union associations and its implementing decree

For many years the Committee has been referring in its comments to certain provisions of the Act on trade union associations No. 23551 of 1988 and its implementing regulations issued by Decree No. 467/88, which are not in conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's statement that: (1) it is worth noting that the constant developments in the Government's policies (referred to above) strengthening the principles of freedom of association have never been mentioned by the Committee; (2) the Government has maintained this trend even at times of crisis, in the context of an economic and social policy based on the principles of the Global Jobs Pact; (3) the supervisory system also has the obligation to highlight progress and good practices in countries since it has the role of collaborating with the State in solving problems; (4) even though the supervisory bodies are empowered to examine how the State applies the Convention, it must be borne in mind that the form taken by such application may differ according to the States concerned, and these forms are certainly related to the specific political, social and cultural features of each country; (5) the development of social and institutional policies by the Government reflects broad participation in social and labour-related matters by the players concerned and demonstrates unequivocal intent on the part of the State, which must also be taken into account when issuing an opinion on the system of labour relations; (6) if the real situation is taken into account, it does not appear appropriate to use terms such as “urge”, as if it was simply a matter of time for the Government to tackle and resolve problems linked to the trade union history of the country from which a labour relations model has emerged, when the State has given evidence of the importance that it attaches to labour issues in general and to its relationship with the social partners in particular; (7) in other words, to go beyond what the Argentine State has achieved in recent years depends on social and cultural processes resulting in a convergence of interests of all protagonists in the same direction, which are able to reinforce the work initiated by the State through the institutional measures referred to above; (8) the technical assistance mission which visited the country in 2010 considered that the required social dialogue implied a substantial political agreement which the Government was seeking but which was facing difficulties both in terms of direction and in the demands based on legislative differences and certain hostile realities within the social partners’ own context, which hampered identification of a specific position on subjects on the agenda covering any issues raised by the ILO supervisory bodies with regard to the application of the Conventions; (9) despite these difficulties, the Government continues in the quest for committed tripartite social dialogue so that, without abandoning aspirations for greater social justice as identified by the Government’s policies, progress can be made towards the consensus needed to achieve greater compatibility with the observations made within the ILO supervisory system; and (10) accordingly, a tripartite working group has been established on 17 October 2012 with a view to establishing an agenda covering the subjects suggested by the technical assistance mission, in order to examine and determine possible means of action so as to improve conformity with the comments of the ILO supervisory bodies.

The Committee welcomes this information. As regards the Government’s statement that the Committee has not mentioned the positive developments with regard to freedom of association and collective bargaining, the Committee points out that it has included the case of Argentina among the cases of progress on several occasions in recent years (with respect to Convention No. 87 in 2001, 2010 and 2011; and with respect to Convention No. 98 in 2005). Nevertheless, the Committee wishes to point out that a number of problems persist and that at least one trade union federation refers to them each year.

The Committee recalls that the outstanding legislative issues are as follows:

“Trade union status”

- section 28 of the Act on trade union associations, under which, in order to challenge an association’s “trade union status”, the petitioning association must have a “considerably larger” membership; and section 21 of implementing Decree No. 467/88, which qualifies the term “considerably larger” by laying down that the association claiming “trade union status” must have at least 10 per cent more dues-paying members than the organization which currently holds the status. The Committee has pointed out that the requirement of a considerably larger membership, amounting to 10 per cent more members than the union currently holding most representative status, is unduly demanding and contrary to the Convention, since in practice it stands in the way of trade unions that are merely registered being able to claim “trade union status”;
- section 29 of the Act, under which an enterprise trade union may be granted “trade union status” only when no other organization with “trade union status” exists in the geographical area, occupation or category; and section 30 of the Act, under which in order to be eligible for “trade union status”, unions representing a trade, occupation or category must show that they have different interests from the existing trade union or federation, and the latter’s status must not cover the workers concerned. The Committee has considered that the requirements that unions representing enterprises, trades or categories have to meet in order to obtain “trade union status” are unduly demanding, and in practice restrict their access to “trade union status”, giving preferential treatment to existing organizations even where unions representing enterprises, trades or categories of workers are more representative, in accordance with section 28.

Benefits deriving from “trade union status”

- section 38 of the Act, under which the check-off of trade union dues is allowed only for associations with “trade union status”, and not for associations that are merely registered. The Committee has pointed out that, as emphasized by the Supreme Court of Justice of the Nation, “most representative” status should not imply, for the union that obtains it, privileges other than priority of representation in collective bargaining, in consultations with the authorities and in the appointment of delegates to international bodies; the Committee has therefore considered that this provision may adversely affect and unduly discriminate against organizations that are merely registered;
- sections 48 and 52 of the Act, which give special protection (trade union immunity) only to representatives of organizations that have “trade union status”. The Committee considers that sections 48 and 52 provide preferential treatment for representatives of organizations with “trade union status” in the event of acts of anti-union discrimination, and that this exceeds the privileges that may be granted to the most representative organizations by virtue of the principle set out in the previous paragraph.

In its previous observations the Committee noted that the Supreme Court of Justice of the Nation and other national courts had declared some sections of the Act on trade union associations, which are the subject of comments by the Committee, to be unconstitutional. The Committee observes that the CTA refers to rulings by the courts of first and second instance which declared sections 28, 29 and 30 of the Act on trade union associations, which were commented on by the Committee, to be unconstitutional. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report that the rulings of the Supreme Court – apart from being applicable to specific cases – reflect the trend of strengthening the principles of freedom of association and that it also cannot be overlooked that these outcomes have contributed to the Government's policy with the reinforcement of social dialogue and the parameters for "labour citizenship". The Government also declares that the rulings issued by the Supreme Court have not called into question the model of uniqueness advocated by Act No. 23551.

The Committee welcomes that the rulings handed down by the Supreme Court of Justice of the Nation and other national and provincial courts aim at solving some of the pending issues in conformity with the Convention. The Committee welcomes the establishment of the tripartite working group referred to by the Government and trusts that it will take the abovementioned rulings into account.

While noting the progress mentioned by the Government with regard to collective bargaining and wages, which the Committee welcomes, it firmly hopes that, further to tripartite examination of the pending issues with all the social partners, the necessary steps will be taken to bring the Act on trade union associations and its implementing decree into full conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any measures taken in this respect.

Bahamas

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. The Committee recalls that in its previous direct request it noted that the Labour Relations Act does not apply to the prison service (section 3) and requested the Government to guarantee these workers the right to organize. The Committee noted the Government's statement that it was currently reviewing the provisions of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA) with a view to address the right of prison staff to organize. The Committee expresses the hope that the IRA will be amended in the near future so as to formally and expressly recognize the right to organize to prison staff and asks the Government to provide a copy of the amended text as soon as it has been adopted.

Right of workers and employers to establish organizations without previous authorization. In its previous direct request, the Committee noted that, according to section 8(1)(e) of the IRA, the registrar shall refuse to register a trade union if he considers, after applying the rules for the registration of trade unions, that the union should not be registered. The rules for registration are provided in Schedule I. According to section 1 of the Schedule, in applying the rules of the registration of trade unions, the registrar shall exercise his discretion. The Committee noted the Government's statement that this provision is intended to ensure that there is no confusion or ambiguity regarding the rights of workers to certain information (finances and related matters) and that trade unions do not adopt names that are similar in nature and thereby confusing to the bargaining unit. As already stated, it is the Committee's view that provisions which confer on the competent authority a genuinely discretionary power to grant or reject a registration request, or to grant or withhold the approval required for the establishment and functioning of an organization, are tantamount to a requirement for previous authorization which is not compatible with Article 2 of the Convention (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 74). The Committee therefore asks the Government once again to take the necessary measures to ensure that no discretionary power is conferred to the registrar to refuse the registration of trade unions or employers' organizations and to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Article 3. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules and to elect their representatives freely. The Committee noted, in its previous direct request, that section 20(2) of the IRA, according to which the secret ballot for election or removal of trade union officers and for amendment of the constitution of trade unions should be taken under the supervision of the registrar or a designated officer, was contrary to the principles of freedom of association. The Committee noted the Government's statement to the effect that it concurs with the Committee's view regarding this section and that recommendation for its amendment is in the process of being submitted to Cabinet for consideration. The Committee expresses the hope that concrete measures will be taken to amend section 20(2) of the IRA so as to ensure that trade unions could conduct a ballot without interference from the authorities. It requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

The Committee notes that the constitution of every trade union should provide that executive committees and officers of trade unions should be elected at intervals not exceeding three years (section 9(4)(1) of Schedule I). The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether this section implies that trade union officers cannot be re-elected for a consecutive term.

The Committee notes that, according to section 9(4)(3) of Schedule I, the constitution of a trade union should include a provision to the effect that every officer must be a person who is legally entitled to be employed in the Bahamas in the industry, or as a member of the craft or category of employees, which the union represents. The Committee requests the Government to clarify the meaning of this provision and, in particular, to indicate whether only nationals of the Bahamas can be elected to the posts of trade union officers.

Right to strike. The Committee notes section 20(3) requiring a strike ballot to be taken under supervision by an officer of the ministry. If this section is not complied with, a strike is unlawful. The Committee considers that, with a view to ensuring freedom from any influence or pressure by the authorities, which might affect the exercise of the right to strike in practice, the legislation should not provide for supervision of a ballot by the authorities. The Committee requests the Government to amend section 20(3) accordingly to the above principle and to indict any measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee notes that, under the terms of section 73, the minister shall refer the dispute to the tribunal if the parties to the dispute, within non-essential services, failed to reach a settlement. It is unlawful to have recourse to strike action once the dispute is referred to the tribunal (section 77(1)). Furthermore, according to section 76(1), a strike which, in the opinion of the minister, affects or threatens the public interest, might be referred to the tribunal for settlement. The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration to end a collective labour dispute and a strike is acceptable only if it is at the request of both parties involved in a dispute, or if the strike in question may be restricted, even banned, i.e. in the case of a dispute in the public service involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, in the event of an acute national emergency, or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely those services whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend its legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention and to indicate any measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee notes that section 75 restricts the objective of a strike. It appears to the Committee that protest and sympathy strikes are illegal under the terms of section 75. In the view of the Committee, organizations responsible for defending workers' socio-economic and occupational interests should, in principle, be able to use strike action to support their position in the search for solutions to problems posed by major social and economic policy trends which have a direct impact on their members and on workers in general, in particular as regards employment, social protection and the standard of living. Furthermore, the Committee considers that a general prohibition on sympathy strikes could lead to abuse and that workers should be able to take such action, provided the initial strike they are supporting is itself lawful (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 165 and 168). The Committee requests the Government to ensure the right of workers' organizations to recourse to this type of strike and to indicate any measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee notes that, when a strike is organized or continued in violation of the abovementioned provisions, excessive sanctions, including imprisonment for up to two years are provided (sections 74(3), 75(3), 76(2)(b) and 77(2)). The Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and therefore measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. Nevertheless, even in the absence of violence, if the strike modalities had the effect of making the strike illegitimate, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be imposed against strikers. Therefore, the Committee requests the Government to amend the Labour Relations Act so as to bring it into conformity with freedom of association principles on this point.

Article 5. Right of organizations to establish federations and confederations and to affiliate with international organizations. The Committee notes section 4 of Schedule I concerning the registration of federations, etc. The Committee asks the Government to explain how this provision is applied in practice.

The Committee notes section 39 concerning control of foreign connections of unions and federations. Under the terms of this section, it shall not be lawful for a trade union to be a member of any body constituted or organized outside the Bahamas without a licence from the minister, who has discretionary power to grant or refuse it and/or to accompany it with certain conditions. The Committee recalls that Article 5 of the Convention stipulates that first-level organizations, as well as federations and confederations, have the right to affiliate with international organizations of workers and employers. Legislation which restricts the right of international affiliation by requiring prior authorization by the public authorities, or by permitting it only in certain conditions established by law, poses serious difficulties with regard to the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend its legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

Finally, with reference to its previous direct request, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the situation with regard to the draft Trade Union and Labour Relations Act and the draft Industrial Tribunal and Trade Disputes Act.

The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on the issues raised above in its next report.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Finally, the Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 31 July 2012 on the application of the Convention. The Committee further notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike in a communication dated 29 August 2012 which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Prison guards. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the Government's statement to the effect that measures to allow for the organization of prison guards were currently under consideration and that it was envisaged to review the relevant provision. The Committee expressed the hope that, as the Government stated that amendments to the Industrial Relations Act (IRA) were under review, the future legislation would recognize prison guards' right to organize and to collective bargaining and asked the Government to inform it of developments in this regard.

Fire brigade workers. The Committee had further noted the Government's view that, as far as the fire brigade was concerned, it was not desirable that its members be allowed to organize in view of the fact that it consisted exclusively of police officers, that is members of a disciplined force, who doubled as trained firefighters. The Committee had requested the Government to clarify whether they were police agents which also had functions of firefighters or whether they were exclusively firefighters covered by police status.

Other questions. The Committee had also regretted to note that the Government had not replied to the questions raised in its previous comments concerning Article 2 of the Convention (acts of interference). The Committee had requested the Government to adopt legislative provisions to protect workers' and employers' organizations against acts of interference by each other or each other's agents, accompanied by effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions. In a previous comment, the Committee had noted the Government's indication that provisions strengthening this protection were contained in the Trade Unions and Industrial Relations Bill, 2000, a copy of which would be sent to the ILO after its adoption by the Legislative Assembly. The Committee expressed the hope that the future legislation would guarantee an adequate protection against acts of interference and had requested the Government to keep it informed in this respect.

Representativeness for collective bargaining. The Committee had also taken note of the comments on the application of the Convention submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) criticizing the requirement for a trade union to represent 50 per cent of the workers plus one in a unit in order to be recognized for bargaining purposes and the fact that an employer may, after 12 months of unsuccessful negotiations, apply for a union's recognition to be revoked (with some employers deliberately dragging out negotiations for that purpose). The ITUC added that the Government had failed to honour industrial agreements. The Committee requested the Government to send its comments on the ITUC's observations.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC dated 31 July 2012 which refer mostly to matters previously examined by the Committee.

Bangladesh

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1972)

Workers' and employers' organizations' comments. The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 4 and 31 August 2011 concerning allegations of arrests, harassment and detention of trade unionists and trade union leaders, notably in the garment sector. In this respect, the Committee notes that the Government indicates that: (1) the police and the law-enforcing agencies did their duties pursuant to the law and, according to them, there have not been illegal threats, police harassment or arrest and detention of trade unionists, and no death or illegal arrest has happened intentionally; the victims, if any, were accused for their misdeeds and criminal activities; (2) the law enforcement agencies had to interrogate some violence-creating persons to protect public property and to clear the blockade organized in the garment sector, but they did not harass anyone, nor did they have the aim of harassing trade union leaders or disrupting trade union activities; (3) law enforcement agencies are performing their duties under directives and close supervision of the Ministry of Home Affairs; (4) as to the alleged killings in an export processing zone (EPZ), agitated workers attacked members of the police, some of whom were seriously injured as a result (the police used water cannon, tear-gas shells and rubber bullets and a worker died of a heart attack while passing nearby); and (5) workers and employers in the garment sector are not fully aware of the benefits of implementing the principles of the Convention and training should be provided to them in this regard. As to the alleged refusal by the Registrar of Trade Unions to register new unions, the Government indicates that, although trade union activities were totally stopped during the Emergency period (from January 2007 to December 2008), the Labour Act 2006 establishes some legal and reasonable requirements for union registration and, if these are fulfilled, there is no reason to refuse registration of new trade unions. This registration procedure is logical and justified to maintain the discipline in the industrial relations field.

With respect to its request to indicate the status of the court case concerning the Bangladesh Garments and Industrial Sramik Federation (BGIWF) registration, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Department of Labour submitted the case for the cancellation of the registration of the BGIWF for violation of its constitution and unfair labour practice to the labour court in 2008 (No. 51 of 2008), that the case is still pending and that the next hearing will be on 18 September 2012. In this respect, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the ongoing procedure will conclude in the near future and requests the Government to indicate in its next report the status of the registration of the BGIWF.

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the ITUC on 31 July and 31 August 2012 concerning allegations of murder of a trade unionist, a union leader and two striking workers, violence and harassment of trade unionists in the pharmaceutical and EPZs, as well as the refusal to register unions in several sectors, including the telecom and garment sectors. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to carry out investigations concerning these serious allegations with a view to determining responsibilities and punishing those responsible, and to provide information in this respect.

Right to organize in EPZs. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information and statistics on the number of workers' welfare associations (WWAs) established in EPZs and on steps taken to amend legislation so that EPZ workers may fully exercise the rights guaranteed by the Convention. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that referendums on WWAs were carried out in 246 out of 309 enterprises, and that 154 enterprises had formed WWAs up to 8 January 2012. The Government also states that these WWAs are actively performing their activities as collective bargaining agents. The Government indicates that the Bangladesh Export Processing Zone Authority (BEPZA) has been taking all the required steps to ensure the full implementation of the new EPZ Workers' Welfare Associations and Industrial Relations Act 2010 (EWWAIRA) by issuing letters and distributing the Act to enterprises of EPZs for establishing WWAs. The Committee notes the allegation of the ITUC that at their peak, there were roughly 90 WWAs in EPZs, and that it is not clear whether the results of the referendums are reliable and reflect a fully informed vote on the part of the workers. The ITUC alleges that WWAs have been unable to function because employers failed to follow the law (e.g. refusing to provide meeting space, refusing to allow workers to hold meetings, refusing to review grievances, refusing to bargain) and BEPZA has failed to enforce it. The ITUC alleges that, as the initial trade union leaders have left or have been fired, new leaders have not taken their places. The ITUC further alleges that the formation of many WWAs in EPZs has been at the initiative of BEPZA which, through management of the affected enterprises, circulated a document to the workers to “demand” formation of WWAs; the entire procedure was allegedly effectively dictated by BEPZA in consultation with the respective employers. The ITUC claims that such a process is not consistent with workers’ right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the ITUC’s comments.

The Committee further recalls that it had previously commented on the EPZ Workers’ Associations and Industrial Relations Act 2004, which contained numerous and significant restrictions and delays in relation to the right to organize in EPZs, and that it had noted with deep regret the adoption of the EWWAIRA which does not contain any real improvement in relation to the previous legislation and which does not address any of its previous comments.

In these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to take all the necessary measures to bring the following provisions of the EWWAIRA into conformity with the Convention:

- section 16, which provides that a WWA will not be allowed in industrial units established after the commencement of the Act until a period of three months has expired after the start of commercial production in the concerned unit. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that this period is required for the initial understanding and preparation of both management and workers in order to ensure their rights and responsibilities;
- section 17(1), which provides that there can be no more than one WWA per industrial unit. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that this requirement ensures more discipline and more harmonious industrial management within a company;
- sections 6, 7, 9 and 12, which establish excessive and complicated minimum membership and referendum requirements for the establishment of a WWA (a WWA may be formed only when a minimum of 30 per cent of the eligible workers of an industrial unit seek its formation, and this has been verified by the Executive Chairperson of BEPZA, who shall then conduct a referendum on the basis of which the workers shall acquire the legitimate right to form an association under the Act, only if more than 50 per cent of the eligible workers cast their vote, and more than 50 per cent of the votes cast are in favour of the formation of the WWA). The Committee notes the Government’s indication that sections 6, 7, 9 and 12 were introduced to ensure willingness and spontaneous participation of the workers in organizing referendums and to ensure more transparency and accountability;
- section 9(2), which confers excessive powers to the Executive Chairperson of BEPZA concerning the approval of the Constitution Drafting Committee of the WWA. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the Executive Chairperson has always approved the Constitution Drafting Committee within five days, as required by section 9(2) which demonstrates that no excessive power is conferred to the Executive Chairperson;
- section 8, which prevents a referendum from being held for the establishment of a WWA in the workplace for a period of one year, after a first attempt failed to gather sufficient support. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that this delay is required to ensure proper understanding among the workers and organize them more effectively;
- section 27, which permits the deregistration of a WWA at the request of 30 per cent of the workers, even if they are not members of the association, and prevents the establishment of another WWA for one year after the previous one was deregistered. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that section 27 was enacted to prevent mala fide intentions, misleading and misuse of power by WWA members, which may affect workers’ welfare. To the knowledge of the Government, there has been no case of deregistration of a WWA;
- sections 28(1)(c), (e)–(h) and 34(1)(a), which provide for the cancellation of the registration of a WWA on grounds which do not appear to justify the severity of this sanction (such as violation of any of the provisions of the association’s constitution). The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the aim of section 28 is to safeguard the interest of the workers in general, to ensure a congenial atmosphere among the workers as well as smooth production in an enterprise. As to section 34, it ensures transparency and accountability of WWAs;
- section 46(3) and (4), which provides for severe restrictions of strike action, once authorized, and section 81(1) and (2) which establishes a total prohibition of industrial action in EPZs until 31 October 2013. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that section 46(3) and (4) has secured a smooth production atmosphere for greater interest of the company as well as workers;
- section 10(2), which prevents a WWA from obtaining or receiving any funds from any outside source without the prior approval of the Executive Chairperson of BEPZA;

- section 24(1), which establishes an excessively high minimum number of associations to establish a higher-level organization (more than 50 per cent of the WWAs in an EPZ), and section 24(3), which prohibits a federation from affiliating in any manner with federations in other EPZs and beyond EPZs;
- sections 20(1), 21 and 24(4), which do not seem to afford guarantees against interference with the right of workers to elect their representatives in full freedom (e.g. the procedure of election is to be determined by BEPZA); and
- section 80, which provides that WWAs are now prohibited from establishing any connection to any political parties or non-governmental organizations (NGOs). The Committee notes the Government's indication that since BEPZA encourages the welfare of all workers and addresses their grievances through industrial relations officials, counsellors, conciliators, arbitrators, EPZ labour tribunals and EPZ labour appellate tribunals, connections with NGOs and political parties may delay the process of settlement of grievances. Furthermore, the Government emphasizes that workers may approach directly the Executive Chairman of the BEPZA, the labour tribunal and the labour appellate tribunal for settlement of their complaints, if any. The Committee recalls once again that provisions imposing a general prohibition on political activities by trade unions for the promotion of their specific objectives, and provisions which restrict the freedom of trade unions to administer and utilize their funds as they wish for normal and lawful trade union purposes are contrary to the principles of freedom of association.

Moreover, the Committee noted section 38(4) concerning check-off facilities which stipulates that “the executive council at the beginning of the calendar year shall, with the accounts statement of the previous year, submit for approval the current year's revenue budget containing income expenditure to the Executive Chairman or to an officer authorized by him”. The Committee notes, once again, the Government's indication that this section will ensure the transparency and accountability of WWAs. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the scope of application of this new subsection 4 of section 38 and its impact on check-off facilities.

The Committee further noted that a federation of WWAs cannot be legally formed until BEPZA has issued regulations. According to the ITUC, these regulations have yet to be issued. The Government indicates that, in order to streamline the formation of federations, BEPZA is preparing the necessary rules and regulations according to the Act. BEPZA has always supported the formation of WWA federations; but has yet to receive any formal request from a WWA to form a federation fulfilling requirements of the Act. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to issue the regulations concerning the right of WWAs to establish and join federations, in accordance with Article 5 of the Convention.

Other discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention. In previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption of the Bangladesh Labour Act 2006 (the Labour Act), which replaced the Industrial Relations Ordinance of 1969, and noted with deep regret that the Labour Act did not contain any improvements and, in certain regards, contained even further restrictions which were contrary to the provisions of the Convention. The Committee took note of the Government's statement that a tripartite labour law review committee to identify the gaps and discrepancies in the Labour Act and suggest the necessary amendments had been constituted. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the revision of the Labour Act with comments of all levels of stakeholders is under process by a 22-member high-power Tripartite Labour Law Review Committee (TLRQ) headed by the State Minister of Labour and Employment. The draft amendments have been submitted to the Tripartite Consultative Council (TCC) on 9 February 2012. The Committee notes that some of the proposed amendments would provide improvements to the current Labour Act (for example, by including “research institutions” into the scope of application of the Labour Act (section 1(4)); by repealing the provision requiring the Director of Labour to send the list of officers of a trade union to the employer (section 178(3)); and by offering the possibility of electing up to 20 per cent of the members of an executive committee from persons not employed in the establishment where the trade union is formed (section 180(b))). However, the proposed amendments do not take into account most of the observations previously raised by the Committee. The Government indicates that the draft amendments are being reviewed further and will be submitted again to the TCC for finalization. In these circumstances, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the review process of the Labour Act referred to above will be finalized in the near future and will take into account the following discrepancies between the Labour Act and the Convention:

- the need to repeal provisions excluding managerial and administrative employees from the right to establish workers' organizations (section 2(49) and (65) of the Labour Act) as well as new restrictions of the right to organize of firefighting staff, telex operators, fax operators and cipher assistants (exclusion from the provisions of the Act based on section 175). The Committee notes that the Government indicates that telex and fax operators are allowed to exercise their trade union rights. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the legal provisions that grant trade union rights to the abovementioned workers;
- the need to either amend section 1(4) or adopt new legislation so as to ensure that the workers excluded in relation to trade union rights from Chapters XIII and XIV of the Labour Act enjoy the right to organize. The Committee notes the Government's indication that sectors which have been excluded from the operation of the Act have been excluded in the interests of security, public administration and smooth environment and that the country is not in a position to amend section 1(4) considering the socio-economic, cultural and environment situation and practices;

- the need to repeal provisions which restrict membership in trade unions and participation in trade union elections of those workers who are currently employed in an establishment or group of establishments, including seafarers engaged in merchant shipping (sections 2(65), 175 and 185(2));
- the need to repeal or amend new provisions which define as an unfair labour practice on the part of a worker or trade union an act aimed at “intimidating” any person to become, continue to be or cease to be a trade union member or officer, or “inducing” any person to cease to be a member or officer of a trade union by conferring or offering to confer any advantage, and the consequent penalty of imprisonment for such acts (sections 196(2)(a) and (b) and 291). The Committee notes that the Government considers section 196(2)(a) and (b) to be justified in the national context where there is competition in enrolling members of trade unions that results in bloodshed, clashes and litigation. In order to prevent such untoward situations and to restore peace and a good environment, the Government considers these provisions to be sine qua non;
- the need to repeal provisions which prevent workers from running for trade union office if they were previously convicted for compelling or attempting to compel the employer to sign a memorandum of settlement or to agree to any demand by using intimidation, pressure, threats, etc. (sections 196(2)(d) and 180(1)(a));
- the need to lower the minimum membership requirement of 30 per cent of the total number of workers employed in an establishment or group of establishments for initial and continued union registration, as well as the possibility of deregistration if the membership falls below this number (sections 179(2) and 190(f)); the need to repeal provisions which provide that no more than three trade unions shall be registered in any establishment or group of establishments (section 179(5)) and that only one trade union of seafarers shall be registered (section 185(3)); and the need to repeal provisions prohibiting workers from joining more than one trade union and the consequent penalty of imprisonment in case of violation of this prohibition (sections 193 and 300);
- the need to modify section 179(1) which lists excessive requirements that must appear in the content of the constitution of a trade union in order for it to be entitled for registration;
- the need to amend section 190(e) and (g) which provides that the registration of a trade union may be cancelled by the Director of Labour if the trade union committed any unfair labour practice or contravened any of the provisions of Chapter XIII of the Rules. The Committee considers that, while the decision of the Director of Labour can be appealed before the tribunal (section 191) which will have to apply the legislation in force, the criteria for dissolution are too broad and involve serious risks of interference by the authorities in the existence of trade unions;
- the need to amend section 202(22) which provides that if any contesting trade union receives less than 10 per cent of the votes for the election of the collective bargaining agent, the registration of that union should be cancelled. The Committee considers that, while the 10 per cent requirement may not be deemed excessive for the certification of a collective bargaining agent, trade unions which do not gather 10 per cent of workers should not be deregistered and should be able to continue to represent their members (for instance, making representations on their behalf, including representing them in case of individual grievances);
- the need to amend section 317(d), which empowers the Director of Labour to supervise the election of trade union executives, so as to allow organizations to freely elect their representatives;
- the need to repeal provisions denying the right of unregistered unions to collect funds (section 192) upon penalty of imprisonment (section 299);
- the need to modify section 184(1), which provides that workers engaged in any specialized and skilled trade, occupation or service in the field of civil aviation may form a trade union if such union is necessary for affiliation with an international organization in the same field, and section 184(4) which provides that the registration should be cancelled within six months if the trade union is not affiliated to the international organization concerned;
- the need to amend sections 202(24)(c) and (e) and 204 which provide the collective bargaining agent in an establishment with some preferential rights (such as the right to declare a strike, to conduct cases on behalf of any individual worker or group of workers, and the right to check-off facilities), so that the distinction between a collective bargaining agent and other trade unions is limited to the recognition of certain preferential rights (for example, for such purposes as collective bargaining, consultation by the authorities or the designation of delegates to international organizations), in order for the distinction not to have the effect of depriving those trade unions that are not recognized as being amongst the most representative of the essential means for defending the occupational interests of their members for organizing their administration and activities, and formulating their programmes;
- the need to lift several restrictions on the right to strike (concerning the majority required to consent to a strike (sections 211(1) and 227 (c)); the prohibition of strikes which last more than 30 days (sections 211(3) and 227(c)); the possibility of prohibiting strikes at any time if a strike is considered prejudicial to the national interest (sections 211(3) and 227(c)) or if it involves certain services (sections 211(4) and 227(c)); the prohibition of strikes for a period of three years in certain establishments (sections 211(8) and 227(c)); the penalties (sections 196(2)(e), 291 and 294–296); and interference in trade union matters (section 229));

- the need to amend section 301, which imposes a penalty of imprisonment for failure to appear before the conciliator in the framework of settlement of industrial disputes;
- the need to amend section 183(1), which provides that in a group of establishments no more than one trade union can be formed, so as to allow workers in any establishment or group of establishments to form organizations of their own choosing; and the need to amend section 184(2) which provides that only one trade union can be formed in each trade, occupation or service in a civil aviation establishment and if at least half of the total number of workers concerned apply in writing for registration. The Committee considers that the existence of an organization in a specific enterprise, trade, establishment, economic category or occupation should not constitute an obstacle for the establishment of another organization; and
- concerning the draft amendment, the need to modify section 200(1) of the draft amendments which provides that any five or more trade unions, registered in more than one administrative division and formed in establishments engaged, or carrying on, in a similar or identical industry may constitute a federation, so that: (1) the requirement of an excessively high minimum number of trade unions to establish a federation does not infringe the right of trade unions to establish and join federations of their own choosing; (2) workers have the right to establish federations of a broader occupational or interoccupational coverage; and (3) trade unions should not need to belong to more than one administrative division in order to federate.

Finally, the Committee had previously requested the Government to indicate whether rule 10 of the Industrial Relations Rules 1977 (IRR), which previously granted the Registrar overly broad authority to enter trade union offices, inspect documents, etc. without judicial review, had been repealed by the entry into force of the Labour Act 2006. The Committee noted that the Government stated, in this regard, that rule 10 of the IRR remains valid, and that – as its purpose was to maintain discipline in trade union administrations – it was not in favour of repealing the said provision. The Government further indicated that the workers’ representatives in the tripartite review process towards the enactment of the Labour Act had raised no objections to the Registrar’s authority in these matters. The Government further indicates in its report that if any union or federation is aggrieved about the procedure and verification by the Registrar, it can appeal to the labour court. The Government adds that the Registrar does not go to the office of a trade union or federation for inspection unless their secretary or president applies to the Registrar for removal of irregularities, which is frequent. The Committee once again recalls that the right of workers’ and employers’ organizations to organize their administration without interference by the public authorities includes, in particular, autonomy and financial independence and the protection of the assets and property of these organizations. There is no violation of the Convention if such verification is limited to exceptional cases, for example in order to investigate a complaint, or if there have been allegations of embezzlement. Both the substance and the procedure of such verifications should however always be subject to review by the competent judicial authority affording every guarantee of impartiality and objectivity (see General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraphs 124 and 125). The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal rule 10 of the IRR or amend it so as to ensure that this provision granting the Registrar authority to supervise trade union internal affairs is in line with the principles mentioned above.

The Committee takes due note once again of the Government’s statement that it is fully committed to ensuring compliance with the Convention and the promotion of freedom of association in the country, and expects that all measures will be taken to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee once again invites the Government to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in respect of all the matters raised above.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1972)

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Protection of workers in export processing zones (EPZs) against anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 4 and 31 August 2011, concerning the dismissal of more than 5,000 employees in the garment sector in 2010 following their exercise of their trade union rights as well as several cases in which the leaders of worker welfare associations have been fired in retaliation for the exercise of trade union rights. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the number of 5,000 fired garment workers is not based on findings of any survey nor is it established by research. It states that this type of exaggerated figure not only misleads the policy-makers but creates perplexity in the minds of all concerned. The Government indicates that the conflicts that have led to the dismissal of several leaders of worker welfare associations have been resolved. It further explains that in one case, the dismissed workers were involved in illegal activities and that a criminal case has been filed against them (345/2011, under trial at the Chief Judicial Magistrate Court, Dinajpur). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the judicial proceedings in Case No. 345/2011.

Moreover, the Committee had noted that the ITUC referred to numerous problems concerning the application of the Convention in the EPZ sector, particularly in the garment industry. The ITUC further stated that although the law provides for the establishment of an EPZ labour tribunal and an EPZ labour appellate, these two bodies had yet to be established, thus denying workers access to the judicial system for their grievances. The Committee had requested the Government to provide information in respect of these matters, including information on the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination in the EPZ sector submitted to the competent authorities, as well as the outcomes of those complaints.

As concerns the establishment of an EPZ Labour Tribunal and an EPZ Labour Appellate, the Committee had previously noted that according to the Government, EPZ workers could seek judicial redress in cases of anti-union discrimination. The Committee noted that in August 2010, the Parliament passed the EPZ Workers' Welfare Associations and Industrial Relations Act 2010 (EWWAIRA) which provides for the establishment of an EPZ Labour Tribunal and a Labour Appellate Tribunal. The Committee notes the Government's indication that these bodies have been set up by notifications published in the Official Gazette on 16 August 2011. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report: (i) statistics on the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination presented by workers in the EPZs before the EPZ Labour Tribunal and the Labour Appellate Tribunal; (ii) a summary of the decisions reached by the two tribunals, including any remedies awarded; and (iii) a copy of the notifications published in the Official Gazette on 16 August 2011.

The Committee further noted that the Government indicated in its report that the intervention of counsellors is well established in all EPZs to deal with employees' grievances (e.g. harassment, dismissal, violence) and that conciliators and arbitrators have the power to resolve disputes after counsellors, as per sections 40–45 of the EWWAIRA 2010. However, the Committee noted that according to the ITUC's 2011 comments, the Bangladesh Export Processing Zones Authority (BEPZA) had not yet appointed new conciliators (when the 2004 Act expired, the Government did not extend the tenure of the EPZ conciliator who was appointed under that act) as required under the EWWAIRA 2010, thus hampering industrial dispute resolution in the EPZs. The Committee notes the Government's indication that 60 counsellors work in different industries of different zones since 1 June 2005 to implement the EWWAIRA. It further notes the indication of the Government that it will appoint conciliators as soon as the "EPZ Workers' Welfare and Industrial Relations Fund, Constitution and Operation Policy" is approved. General Managers, Officers of the Industrial Relations Department, and counsellors of the respective zones are scheduling frequent hearings between management and workers to mitigate problems. As a result, the Government indicates that the rate of grievances has reduced remarkably. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the approval of the "EPZ Workers' Welfare and Industrial Relations Fund, Constitution and Operation Policy" and on the appointment of conciliators.

Article 2. Lack of legislative protection against acts of interference. The Committee had previously noted that the Labour Act 2006 did not contain a prohibition of acts of interference designed to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination of employers or their organizations, or to support workers' organizations by financial or other means with the object of placing them under the control of employers or their organizations, and had requested the Government to indicate the measures taken to adopt such a prohibition. The Committee noted the Government's indication that protective measures are laid down in the Labour Act, particularly in sections 195 and 196 concerning "unfair labour practice on the part of the employer", and that such act by the employer is an offence punishable under section 291 of the Labour Act, which provides for a prison term which may extend to two years or with a fine of up to 10,000 Bangladeshi taka (BDT), or both. The Committee notes that amendments to the Labour Act have been submitted to the Tripartite Consultative Council (TCC) on 9 February 2012. It notes that the proposed amendments do not seem to contain comprehensive prohibition that covers acts of financial control of trade unions or trade union leaders, as well as acts of interference in internal trade union affairs. The Committee hopes that such a prohibition will be included in the amendments and once again requests the Government to send the latest draft amendments and to provide information on developments in this regard, including on the enactment of the proposed provisions and any complaints filed under them.

Article 4. Legal requirements for collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee had referred to section 179(2) of the Labour Act, which provides that a trade union may only obtain registration if it represents 30 per cent of the workers in an establishment, as well as to section 202(15) of the Labour Act, which provides that if there is more than one trade union in an enterprise, the Director of Labour shall hold a secret ballot to determine the collective bargaining agent. The Committee recalled that the percentage requirements for registration of a trade union, and for the recognition of a collective bargaining agent set out in sections 179(2) and 202(15) of the Labour Act, 2006, may impair in certain cases, in particular in respect of large enterprises, the development of free and voluntary collective bargaining. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the 30 per cent requirement opens the opportunity to workers to form three trade unions in an establishment and to join any of these trade unions. The Committee noted that the Government indicates in its report that the percentage requirement in section 202(15) has been repealed and that it is the trade union that secures the highest number of votes that is declared as the collective bargaining agent. In this regard, the Committee refers to its observations under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

The Committee further noted that according to the National Level Trade Union Federation of Workers (NCCWE), collective bargaining is limited as there is no legal provision for collective bargaining at the industry, sector or national levels. In this regard, the Committee noted the Government's indications that: (i) sections 202 and 203 of the Labour Act, 2006, directly concerns collective bargaining; (ii) the settlement of disputes through bipartite negotiations is done at the industry level and that similarly, different issues are settled through bipartite negotiation or through conciliation at the sector level, such as tea sector, shrimp sector, etc.; (iii) collective bargaining was also done at the national level through consultation with the Workers' Federation but such practice no longer prevails; and (iv) there are currently 7,297 trade unions registered with the Department of Labour, 32 national federations, 112 industrial federations and 36 garments industries federations and a total of 11 collective bargaining agreements. The Committee notes that the proposed amendments to the Labour Act, 2006, which will be examined again by a Tripartite Consultative Council (TCC), do not concern sections 202 and 203. The Committee once again requests the Government to amend sections 202 and 203 of the Labour Act, 2006, in order to provide clearly that collective bargaining is possible at the industry, sector and national levels. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide statistics on the number of collective agreements concluded at the industry, sector and national levels respectively in its next report.

Promotion of collective bargaining in the EPZs. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the extent of collective bargaining in the EPZ sector, including statistics on the number of collective agreements concluded and the number of workers they cover. The Committee notes the Government's indication that in October 2011, there were 302 enterprises eligible for Workers Welfare Associations (WWAs) among 368 in operation and that workers' associations referendums were held in 208 enterprises. Elections of WWAs were held in 146 enterprises and WWAs were formed. The activities of all executive committees of WWAs include being collective bargaining agents. However, no information was provided by the Government concerning the conclusion of collective agreements in the EPZs. The Committee noted that according to the ITUC, while elected WWAs (what, according to the ITUC, substitutes for trade unions in the absence of a legal right to form one) in the EPZs have been established, employers have failed to take the next step and bargain collectively as required by the EWWAIRA 2010. The Committee therefore requests the Government once again to provide information in its next report on the extent of collective bargaining in the EPZ sector, including statistics on the number of collective agreements concluded since 2008, and the number of workers they cover.

The Committee further noted that according to the ITUC, there has been little progress on collective bargaining in the EPZs and that this is largely due to the BEPZA's insistence that there is no room for collective bargaining on any working conditions above the minimum standards already established in the Labour Act and the BEPZA Instructions 1 and 2. The ITUC added that this largely eviscerates the bargaining provisions of the EWWAIRA 2010 and leaves no room for collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that excluding wages, working hours, rest periods, leave and conditions of works from the field of collective bargaining is not in harmony with Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government once again to ensure that this principle is applied in practice in the EPZs and to provide a copy of the BEPZA Instructions 1 and 2.

Articles 4 and 6. Tripartite wages commissions in the public sector. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments, it had requested the Government to take the necessary legislative or other measures to end the practice of determining wage rates and other conditions of employment in the public sector by means of government appointed tripartite wages commissions (section 3 of Act No. X of 1974). The Committee noted that the Government indicated in its report that this system does not prevent free and voluntary collective bargaining. Nevertheless, the Committee, while recognizing the singularity of the public sector which allows special modalities, considered that simple consultation with unions of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State does not meet the requirements of Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee underlines that the Government has not referred to any collective agreement in the public sector. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures, legislative or not, to end the practice of determining wage rates and other conditions of employment of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State by means of simple consultation in government appointed tripartite wages commissions, so as to favour free and voluntary negotiations between workers' organizations and employers or their organizations. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or contemplated in this regard and to provide statistics on the number and nature of collective agreements concluded in the public sector.

Barbados

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. The right of organizations freely to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that for numerous years it has advised the Government to amend section 4 of the Better Security Act, 1920, according to which any person who wilfully breaks a contract of service or hiring, knowing that this could endanger real or personal property, is liable to a fine or up to three months' imprisonment, so as to eliminate the possibility of employers invoking it in cases of strikes. The Committee notes that the Government indicated that the administrative authority has undertaken to move towards the drafting of an essential services legislation. The Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account, including as regards strikes in essential services. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. Nevertheless, even in the absence of violence, if the strike modalities had the effect of making the strike illegitimate, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be imposed against strikers. The Committee trusts that the Government will take duly into account the abovementioned principle when drafting the essential services legislation. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments in this respect and to provide a copy of the legislation once adopted. Moreover, the Committee once again requests the Government to amend section 4 of the Better Security Act, 1920, so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

Furthermore, the Committee recalls that it has been requesting the Government since 1998 to provide information on developments in the process of reviewing legislation regarding trade union recognition to which the Government had referred, or to indicate whether the drafting legislation process concerning trade union recognition could be considered as abandoned. In its previous observation, the Committees had also noted that the Congress of Trade Unions and Staff Associations of Barbados indicated that the Government submitted an amended Trade Union Act Cap. 361 to trade unions for comment and review. The Committee had noted that the Government indicated that the drafting process regarding legislation or trade union recognition is ongoing. The Committee requests the Government to provide with its next report information on any development in this respect.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 4 August 2011 indicating that the right to collective bargaining has still not been regulated by law, stripping the mechanism of its effectiveness and that legislation tolerating certain anti-union practices, such as dismissal for union activities, is also still in place. The Committee also notes the comments submitted by the Barbados Workers' Union (BWU) in a communication dated 1 September 2011 concerning issues already raised by the Committee. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee recalls that in previous observations, it had requested the Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure that the legislation provides adequate protection against all acts of anti-union discrimination, in taking up employment and throughout the course of employment, including at the time of termination, and covering all measures of anti-union discrimination (dismissals, demotions, transfers and other prejudicial acts) as well as adequate and dissuasive sanctions. The Committee also noted the comments made by the ITUC referring to the inadequacy of remedies for workers discharged for their union activity since courts may not reinstate dismissed workers. The Committee had noted that the Government indicates in its report that section 40A of the Trade Union Act, CAP 361 provides that any employer who dismisses a worker or adversely affects the employment or alters the position of a worker, or threatens to dismiss or to adversely affect or alter the position of a worker, because that worker is, or seeks to become, an officer, delegate or member of a trade union or takes part in trade union activities can be subject to a fine not exceeding US$1,000 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to both. As regards the amount of the fines, the Committee recalls again the importance of making sanctions sufficiently dissuasive against acts of anti-union discrimination or interference. The Committee had previously noted with interest that the Government indicated that it was in the final stages of drafting a new employment rights legislation, which will, inter alia, make provisions for an employment rights tribunal to hear cases of unfair dismissals and to make awards where necessary. Given that it appears that the envisaged protection would only cover cases of unfair dismissals, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention as regards not only anti-union dismissals, but also other prejudicial acts perpetrated against union leaders and members because of their affiliation or trade union activities and in particular, to strengthen the amount of the legal fines and other relevant means which can be applied by the tribunal. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the new employment rights legislation once adopted.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Belarus

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

Follow-up to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry (complaint made under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 31 July 2012 alleging numerous violations of the Convention, including arrest and detention of members of independent trade unions, denial of the right to picket, denial of registration of primary trade unions, and interference by the authorities in trade union activities. The Committee notes with concern the ITUC's statement that the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry are still not implemented and that no real effort has been made by the Government to address violations of trade union rights in the country. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed observations on the ITUC's allegations.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report contains no new information on the measures taken to implement the 2004 recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and this Committee's previous requests in respect of the application of the Convention. The Committee also notes the 366th Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association (November 2012) on the measures taken by the Government of the Republic of Belarus to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. It notes, in particular, that the Committee on Freedom of Association expressed its deep concern at the Government's lack of cooperation in providing information on the follow-up given to the Commission of Inquiry recommendations. The Committee urges the Government to cooperate fully with the ILO supervisory bodies.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right to establish workers' organizations. The Committee recalls that in its previous observations it had urged the Government to take the necessary measures to amend Presidential Decree No. 2, its rules and regulations, so as to eliminate the obstacles to trade union registration (legal address and 10 per cent minimum membership requirements). The Committee notes with deep regret that no information has been provided by the Government in this respect. In this connection, the Committee notes with concern the ITUC's allegation that the management of "Granit" enterprise refuses to provide a newly established primary organization of the Belarus Independent Trade Union (BITU) with the legal address required, pursuant to Decree No. 2, for registration of trade unions. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the enterprise management acted in accordance with the law as the BITU failed to submit the minutes of the founding meeting. The Government indicates that on 17 May 2012, the Belarusian Congress of Democratic Trade Unions (CDTU) filed a complaint with the tripartite Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere. The Government points out that the minutes of the founding meeting submitted to the Council were signed only by 16 people, whereas 200 employees were said to have expressed a wish to join the BITU. Furthermore, some employees have stated that union representatives deceived them into signing the papers, without giving adequate explanations of the demands made to the employer. The Government indicates that the Council's secretariat is currently awaiting more information from the CDTU. The Committee recalls that the abovementioned 10 per cent minimum membership requirement is not applicable to primary trade unions and understands that the decision even by 16 workers would be sufficient to establish a primary trade union. In the light of the above, the Committee expresses its concern that the requirements imposed by Decree No. 2 continue to hinder the establishment and functioning of trade unions in practice. The Committee notes with deep regret that, despite the numerous requests by the ILO supervisory bodies, there have been no tangible measures taken by the Government to amend the decree, nor have there been any concrete proposals to that effect. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to that effect in consultation with the social partners, so as to ensure that the right to organize is effectively guaranteed. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all progress made in this respect. The Committee hopes that the BITU primary trade union at "Granit" enterprise will be registered without delay and requests the Government to take all necessary measures to that end.

The Committee regrets that the Government provides no information concerning the allegation previously submitted by the CDTU on the refusal by the Polotsk municipality to register the free trade union primary organization of "Self-employed workers at Polotsk outdoor collective farm market". It therefore expects that the Government's next report will contain detailed observations thereon.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to indicate whether the BITU had applied for the registration of its primary trade union at "Kupalinka" enterprise and, if so, the outcome of the registration procedure. It further requested the Government to provide a copy of the Supreme Court decision in the case of refusal to register "Razam" organization. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the BITU has not applied for registration of its primary trade union. The Committee further notes a copy of the Supreme Court's decision in the "Razam" case and understands that by its decision, the court left without examination the case of refusal to register "Razam" organization submitted by three petitioners. According to the court, pursuant to Decree No. 2, at least 500 founding members from the majority of regions are needed in order to establish a trade union at the national level; this implies that only founding members could be given the authority to represent the interests of the union in the process of registration or in court. The court considered that the decision by the founding conference to admit to trade union membership one of the petitioners, to elect him or her to the union's office and to mandate him or her to represent, together with other persons, the interests of the union before the registering authorities and the courts was without any legal ground. The Committee expresses its concern at this new interpretation of paragraph 3 of Decree No. 2, which appears to create additional obstacles to registration and impede the right of trade unions to elect their representatives and to organize their administration in full freedom enshrined in Article 3 of the Convention. In view of the above, the Committee once again strongly encourages the Government to continue cooperation with the social partners in addressing the issue of registration in practice and to indicate in its next report all progress made in this respect.

Articles 3, 5 and 6. Right of workers' organizations, including federations and confederations, to organize their activities. The Committee recalls that it had previously expressed its concern at the allegations of repeated refusals to authorize the CDTU, the BITU and the Radio and Electronic Workers' Union (REWU) to hold demonstrations and meetings and requested the Government to conduct independent investigations into these allegations, as well as to bring to the attention of the relevant authorities the right of workers to participate in peaceful demonstrations to defend their occupational interests. The Committee once again notes with deep regret that no information has been provided by the Government in this respect. Recalling that peaceful protests are protected by the principles of freedom of association and that public meetings and demonstrations should not be arbitrarily refused, the Committee urges the Government to indicate the measures taken to investigate the alleged cases of refusals to authorize the holding of demonstrations and meetings and to bring to the attention of the relevant authorities the right of workers to participate in peaceful demonstrations to defend their occupational interests.

The Committee recalls that it had previously noted with concern the CDTU's allegation that following a refusal by the "Delta Style" company's management to authorize a trade union meeting, the chairperson of the Soligorsk BITU regional organization met with several women workers (on their way to their workplaces) near the entrance. Following this event, the chairperson was detained by police on 4 August 2010 and subsequently found guilty of committing administrative offence and fined. According to the CDTU, the court had decided that having met members of the union near the entrance gate of the company, the trade union leader had violated the Act on Mass Activities. The Committee had requested the Government to provide its observations on the facts alleged by the CDTU. The Committee regrets that the Government has provided no information in this respect. It therefore once again urges the Government to provide its observations thereon.

In this connection, the Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been requesting the Government to amend the Act on Mass Activities, which imposes restrictions on mass activities and provides for dissolution of an organization for a single breach of its provisions, while organizers may be charged with a violation of the Administrative Code and thus subject to administrative detention. The Committee deeply regrets that once again no information has been provided by the Government on concrete measures taken in this respect. The Committee understands, however, that this piece of legislation has been amended so as to further restrict the right to organize public events. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of these amendments.

The Committee further deeply regrets that the Government has not provided any information in relation to the measures taken to amend Presidential Decree No. 24 concerning the use of foreign gratuitous aid and sections 388, 390, 392 and 399 of the Labour Code, regarding the exercise of the right to strike. Recalling that the abovementioned legislative texts (Act on Mass Activities, Presidential Decree No. 24 and sections 388, 390, 392 and 399 of the Labour Code) are not in conformity with the right of workers to organize their activities and programmes free from interference by the public authorities and their amendment had been requested by the Commission of Inquiry over eight years ago, the Committee reiterates its previous requests and requests the Government to indicate all concrete measures taken or envisaged in this respect. The Committee understands that the Act on Public Associations and the Criminal Code have been recently amended and that these amendments would have bearing on the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide copies of all relevant amendments to these legislative texts.

The Committee also once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure that National Bank employees may have recourse to industrial action without penalty.

The Committee notes with deep regret that no progress has been made by the Government towards implementing the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and improving the application of this Convention in law and in practice during the reporting year. Indeed, the Government has not provided any information on steps taken to amend the legislative provisions in question, as previously requested by this Committee, the Conference Committee, the Commission of Inquiry and the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee therefore urges the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure that freedom of association and respect for civil liberties is fully and effectively guaranteed in law and in practice and expresses the firm hope that the Government will intensify its cooperation with all the social partners in this regard.

Botswana

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 31 July 2012 concerning issues already raised by the Committee.

The Committee further notes the information provided by the Government in response to the comments made by Education International (EI) in a communication dated 19 September 2011 concerning the Public Service Act, the status of the Bargaining Council and the unilateral determination and changes of the terms and conditions of employment in the public sector (in matters that should be left to the parties), through the issuance of Statutory Instrument No. 50 of 2011. The Committee notes in particular that the Government states that: (1) the Public Service Act implementation was initiated in May 2010 and some other issues need to be completed; (2) the Bargaining Council, established and registered in August 2011, is now operational; and (3) the issue of the Statutory Instrument No. 50 of 2011 was heard before the courts that held that the Public Service Act empowers the President to make regulations for conditions of service for public service employee, and therefore the President acted lawfully in promulgating the said statutory instrument. The Committee notes that the Statutory Instrument No. 50 of 2011 has not been received and requests the Government to supply a copy.

It recalls that while Article 6 of the Convention allows public servants engaged in the administration of the State to be excluded from its scope, other categories should enjoy the guarantees of the Convention and therefore be able to negotiate collectively their conditions of employment, including wages. In addition, in the case of negotiations in the public or semi-public sector, intervention by the authorities is compatible with the Convention in so far as it leaves a significant role to collective bargaining. Measures which unilaterally fix conditions of employment should be of an exceptional nature, be limited in time and include safeguards for the workers who are the most affected (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 262 and 265). The Committee once again requests the Government to ensure that the Statutory Instrument No. 50 of 2011 is in conformity with this principle. The Committee requests the Government to examine this issue in full consultation with the most representative organizations and to provide information on the results of this dialogue.

Legislative issues. The Committee recalls that for many years it had been commenting on several legislative dispositions contrary to the Convention.

Scope of the Convention. Application of the Convention to prison staff. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 2 of the Trade Disputes Act, section 2 of the Trade Union and Employers' Organizations (Amendment) Act (TUEO), and section 35 of the Prison Act, so as to ensure that prison staff are afforded all the guarantees provided under the Convention. The Committee had noted that in its previous report the Government had no intention to grant prison staff the right to unionize since their staff association, as provided for in the Prison Act, supposedly caters adequately for the negotiations on their welfare, and their terms and conditions of employment. However, the Committee noted that according to section 35(3) of the Prison Act, a prison officer may only become a member of an association established by the Minister and regulated in the manner prescribed; and that under section 35(4), any prison officer who becomes a member of a trade union or anybody affiliated to a trade union shall be liable to be dismissed from the service. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that this matter is of national interest and thus wider consultations have to be undertaken with relevant Government departments, social partners and other stakeholders. The Committee recalls that all public service workers other than those engaged in the administration of the State should enjoy protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference and their union should enjoy bargaining rights. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the abovementioned consultations and hopes that the Trade Disputes Act, the TUEO Act and the Prison Act will soon be amended so as to ensure prison staff the rights enshrined in the Convention.

Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee had further noted the Government's statement that consultation was ongoing concerning the ITUC's previous observation according to which if a trade union is not registered, union committee members are not protected against anti-union discrimination (e.g. article 23 of the Employment Act). The Committee notes that the Government indicates that: (1) section 23 of the Employment Act has been amended to strengthen it by including more grounds that restrict termination of employment which include gender, health status, sexual orientation and disability; and (2) the Act was further amended by inserting a new paragraph (e) to provide a general provision on non-discrimination during termination of employment. The Committee recalls the importance that the legislation prohibits and sanctions specifically all acts of anti-union discrimination as set out in Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all union committee members, including those of unregistered trade unions, enjoy an adequate and specific protection against anti-union discrimination.

Articles 2 and 4. Protection against acts of interference and promotion of collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the progress made with respect to the following legislative changes:

- the adoption of specific legislative provisions ensuring adequate protection against acts of interference by employers or employers' organizations in the establishment, functioning or administration of trade unions, coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that this issue will be considered in future amendments.
- the repeal of section 35(1)(b) of the Trade Disputes Act, which permits an employer or employers' organization to apply to the Commissioner to withdraw the recognition granted to a trade union on the grounds that the trade union refuses to negotiate in good faith with the employer. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that this issue will be considered in future amendments.
- the amendment of section 20(3) of the Trade Disputes Act, so as to ensure that compulsory arbitration of disputes of interest is permissible only in the following instances: (1) where the party requesting arbitration is a trade union seeking a first collective agreement; (2) disputes concerning public servants directly engaged in the administration of the State; and (3) disputes arising in essential services. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that it has included in the National Development Plan 10 a project to establish an independent dispute resolution system. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that: (1) work is ongoing to review the Trade Disputes Act; (2) it recognizes the need to have an independent dispute resolution mechanism that was planned for in the National Development Plan 10 which runs from 2009 to 2016; and (3) due to the economic downturn, the project was shelved.

The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on any progress made in relation to the abovementioned requested amendments and it encourages the Government to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

ITUC's comments. Section 35(1)(b) of the Trade Disputes Act. The Committee noted the ITUC's comments concerning the necessity for a trade union to represent a significant proportion of the workforce in order to bargain collectively. The Committee noted the Government's indication that in terms of section 48 of the TUEO Act as read with section 32 of the Trade Disputes Act, the minimum threshold to be recognized by the employer is set at one third of the workforce of any organization. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that: (1) the law authorizes the unions to join forces with others to form one third of the workforce in order to bargain collectively; and (2) the Committee's comments have been noted and will be considered. The Committee recalls that where, under a system for nominating an exclusive bargaining agent, there is no union representing the required percentage to be so designated, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all unions in this unit, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee requests once again the Government to take the necessary measures so as to ensure that where no union represents one third of the employees in a bargaining unit, collective bargaining rights are granted to all unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their own members.

Capacity building and implementation gap. The Committee notes the "induction and negotiation skills workshop (of tripartite nature) for the Public Service Bargaining Council (PSBC)" held in August 2012 aimed at: (1) fully sensitize PSBC members on their role and function in the Council; (2) enable them to appreciate the application of collective bargaining in the context of public service; and (3) enhance their negotiation skills. The Committee also notes, from the report of an ILO mission held in the country in September 2012, that it was agreed during discussions between the Botswana delegation and the ILO during the International Labour Conference in June 2012, that: (1) efforts would be geared towards improving freedom of association standards; and (2) the activities in this regard are planned to take place at the end of January 2013, pending confirmation by the Ministry of Labour. The Recommendations adopted during the mission refer to the importance to start addressing the comments of the Committee with, as the main focus, the legal revision process, as a number of comments point out a gap in the national legislation. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information concerning the possible legal revision process abovementioned and, in particular, in relation to the points raised in the present observation.

Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 31 July 2012 concerning the application of the Convention, and particularly mass dismissal of trade unionists from the public sector and interference by employers and the authorities in trade union activities.

Article 1 of the Convention. Application of the Convention to prison staff. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Public Service Act, the Trade Union and Employers' Organizations Act (TUEO), as amended in 2003, and the Trade Disputes Act did not apply to the Botswana prison service. It also noted the Government's statement that national laws define the prison service as a security service. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that: (1) the Trade Disputes Act is under review with the technical assistance of the Office; (2) consultations on this subject are also being held; and (3) the Committee's requests have been noted and will be taken into consideration. Furthermore, the Committee notes that, in its report on the application of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), the Government indicates that this issue is of national interest and that wider consultation is necessary with the ministries concerned, the social partners and other stakeholders. The Committee recalls that under Article 1 of the Convention, only the police, the armed forces and high-level employees whose functions are normally considered as policy-making or managerial, and employees whose duties are of a highly confidential nature may be excluded from the scope of application of the Convention. The Committee hopes that the Public Service Act, the TUEO and the Trade Disputes Act will be amended in the near future to ensure that the prison service enjoys the rights enshrined in the Convention, and urges the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Article 5. Protection against acts of interference. In its previous requests, the Committee indicated that the current legislation does not ensure adequate protection to public employees' organizations against acts of interference by public authorities in their establishment, functioning or administration. The Committee also noted the Government's indication that the Public Service Act was being reviewed and that the Committee's comments would be taken into account. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government repeats its previous statements, adding that the Cabinet authorized the amendment of the Act by Presidential Decree of 7 June 2012. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to report progress in the revision of the Public Service Act and recalls that the Government may, if it so wishes, avail itself of ILO technical assistance in this regard. The Committee urges the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Bulgaria

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 31 July 2012 concerning issues already raised. The Committee also notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of workers' organizations to organize their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been raising the need to amend the following provisions: (1) section 11(2) of the Collective Labour Disputes Settlement Act, which provides that the decision to call a strike shall be taken by a simple majority of the workers in the enterprise or the unit concerned; (2) section 51 of the Railway Transport Act of 2000, which provides that, where industrial action is taken under the Act the workers and employers must provide the population with satisfactory transport services corresponding to no less than 50 per cent of the volume of transportation that was provided before the strike; and (3) section 47 of the Civil Servant Act, which restricts the right to strike of public civil servants, other than those engaged in the administration of the State.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that: (1) with regard to the strike vote, no amendments to the legislation were made; (2) on the issue of the right to strike in the railway transport sector, the Ministry of Transport expressed its consent to amend the Act on Railway Transport in December 2008, and proposed a text to be used for the law amendment purposes. Nevertheless, given the situation in the railway transport, the Ministry afterwards notified that any such proposals needed to be postponed; and (3) concerning the right to strike of civil servants, proposals were drawn up to introduce legislative amendments to the Civil Servant Act and were included in a report of the Minister of Labour and Social Policy, which was presented to the Council of Ministers, thus obtaining its material consent to the proposed amendments. Nevertheless, the process of proposing amendments to the Civil Servant Act was still ongoing, and it was therefore necessary to postpone the discussion of those amendments for 2012.

The Committee hopes once again that due account will be taken of its comments in the process of legislative amendments. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any development in this respect in its next report. It reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 4 August 2011 and 31 July 2012, concerning the dismissal of trade union leaders in several enterprises. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection of workers against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee in its latest observation has requested the Government to supply information regarding the average length of anti-union discrimination proceedings in practice and the compensations paid or sanctions imposed in case of anti-union dismissals, and to indicate the status of the process of establishing specialized labour courts. This request was based on the previous comments received from the ITUC and the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions in Bulgaria (KNSB/CITUB), which indicated that legal proceedings for the reinstatement of dismissed workers can take a long time and sometimes even years, and that the sanctions against employers for unfair dismissal are too weak to be dissuasive.

The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government with regard to the amended Civil Procedure Code in 2010, and especially, with regard to the provisions on the summary labour procedure being now applied to cases concerning illegal dismissals. The Committee welcomes the information provided by the Government that the summary procedure may now be ruled on definitively within a reasonable period of six months. Nevertheless, the Committee invites the Government to compile data on the average duration in practice of court proceedings related to discrimination on the grounds of trade union activities, including appeals procedures and also on the average compensation paid and sanctions imposed, and to communicate this information in its next report.

Article 2. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee had previously noted that national legislation does not provide full protection against acts of interference by employers or employers' organizations and has requested the Government to indicate the legislative measures taken or envisaged to ensure adequate protection, including by means of dissuasive sanctions, against such acts of interference.

The Committee notes that no amendments to the legislation were made according to the information provided in the Government's report. The Committee therefore recalls that under Article 2 of the Convention, all acts which are designed to promote the establishments of workers' organizations under the domination of employers' organizations, or to support workers' organizations by financial means with the object of placing such organizations under the control of employers or employers' organizations, shall be deemed to constitute acts of interference. The Committee further reminds that national legislation should explicitly prohibit all such acts of interference and make express provision for rapid appeal procedures, coupled with dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference, in order to ensure the application in practice of Article 2.

Therefore, the Committee again requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to modify the national legislation accordingly and ensure the application of Article 2 as indicated, and to meanwhile provide information about the steps taken towards an adequate protection against such acts of interference.

Article 4. Promotion of free and voluntary collective bargaining. The Committee has requested article 51(b)(1) and (2) of the Labour Code to be amended in order to enable representative organizations of workers and employers to bargain collectively and to conclude collective agreements in sectorial and branch level without the need to be affiliated to a national representative organization, and thereby, comply with the requirements of Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee notes with satisfaction that, according to the government report, amendments were made to article 51(b)(1) and (2) of the Labour Code, which no longer mentions the need to be affiliated to a national representative organization in order to be entitled to collective bargaining.

Articles 4 and 6. Collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee has previously taken note of the comments made by the ITUC and the KNSB/CITUB regarding collective bargaining rights of public servants and requested the Government to amend the Civil Service Act so that the right to collective bargaining of all public service workers, other than those engaged in the administration of the State, is duly recognized in the national legislation.

The Committee observes that the Government states that an interdepartmental work group was set up with the mission to develop amendments to the Law on Railway Transport and the Civil Service Act in order to meet the standards of the International Labour Organization; these proposals were drawn up to introduce legislative amendments to the Civil Service Act and were included in a report of the Minister of Labour and Social Policy which was presented to the Council of Ministers achieving thereon its material consent to the proposed amendments. The Committee takes note that, according to the Government, the process of proposing amendments to the Civil Servant Act is still open and that the discussion of those amendments needs to be postponed for 2012. In these circumstances the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Civil Servant Act will soon be brought into accordance with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to inform on the evolution of the process and to include the text of the amended Articles in one of the ILO's official working languages in its next report.

Burkina Faso

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee also notes the comments of 31 July 2012 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which refer to legislative issues already raised by the Committee and to violations of trade union rights in practice, in particular dismissals of strikers, police repression of a demonstration organized during a strike and threats against a union leader. While noting the Government's reply to earlier comments by the ITUC raising similar matters, the Committee requests the Government to send its observations on the ITUC's new allegations.

Article 3 of the Convention. Occupation of premises in the event of a strike. The Committee noted previously that, according to section 386 of the Labour Code, the exercise of the right to strike shall on no account be accompanied by occupation of the workplace or its immediate surroundings, subject to the penal sanctions established in the legislation in force. The Committee pointed out in this connection that any restrictions on strike pickets and workplace occupation are acceptable only where the action ceases to be peaceful. The Committee points out that it is nonetheless necessary in all cases to ensure observance of the freedom of non-strikers to work and the right of management to enter the premises. The Committee notes that in its report the Government again states that section 386 of the Labour Code seeks to prevent any lapses arising out of a strike, such as failure to respect the freedom of non-strikers to work. The Committee requests the Government to amend section 386 of the Labour Code so as to abolish the ban on the occupation of workplaces or their immediate surroundings in the event of a strike and to ensure that any restrictions are allowed only in the instances recalled above.

Requisitioning of public employees. In its previous comments the Committee pointed out the need to amend Act No. 45-60/AN of 25 July 1960, under which, in order to ensure continuity of administration and the safety of persons and property, public servants may be required to perform their duties. The Committee observed that it would be advisable to confine the authority to requisition public employees to cases in which the right to strike may be limited or even prohibited, namely: (a) where these employees exercise authority in the name of the State; (b) in essential services in the strict sense of the term; and (c) in situations of acute national or local crisis, although only for a limited period and solely to the extent necessary to meet the requirements of the situation. Noting the Government's statement that measures are envisaged to revise Act No. 45-60/AN of 25 July 1960, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that, in the course of the revision the requisitioning of public employees will be possible only in the instances recalled above. It requests the Government to supply information on relevant developments in the legislation.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the observations dated 4 August 2011 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and to the Committee's request concerning the sending of statistics on collective bargaining in the private sector.

Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention. Collective bargaining in the public sector. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that pursuant to Act No. 013/98/AN of 28 April 1998 establishing the legal regime applicable to posts and employees in the public service, as amended by Act No. 019-2005/AN of 18 May 2005, public servants are entitled to freely engage in bargaining and to conclude agreements in their sectors of activity but that in practice no collective agreement has been negotiated or concluded in the public sector. The Committee notes that the Act in question does not explicitly recognize the right to collective bargaining for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State but that sections 44 and 45 of the Act state that public service employees enjoy the rights and public freedoms secured to all Burkinabé citizens by the Constitution, that they can, inter alia, establish associations or occupational trade unions, become members thereof and hold office therein, under the conditions stipulated by the legislation relating to the right of association, and that the right to strike is secured to public service employees who exercise it within the framework defined by the relevant legislative texts in force. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the legislation explicitly guarantees the right to collective bargaining for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State and to provide information in its next report on any further developments in this regard and on any collective agreement concluded in this sector.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Burundi

Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

The Committee recalls that for many years now its comments have referred to the need to amend Legislative Decree No. 1/90 of 25 August 1967 on rural associations which provides that, in the event of public subsidy, the Minister of Agriculture may establish rural associations (section 1), membership of which is compulsory (section 3) and that he determines their statutes (section 4). It also provides that the obligations of agricultural workers who are members of these associations include the provision of services for the common enterprise, the payment of a single or regular contribution, the provision of agricultural or livestock products and the observance of rules respecting cultural discipline and other matters (section 7), under penalty of the seizure of the member's property (section 10).

The Committee had noted the Government's indication that the Decree in question has not yet been repealed, but that its repeal will take place in the near future. The Committee strongly hopes that the Government will finally take effective measures to amend or repeal Legislative Decree No. 1/90 of 25 August 1967, and requests the Government to provide information in this respect in its next report.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

The Committee requests the Government to send its observations on the comments submitted in 2008 by the Trade Union Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU) and in 2009 and 2010 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), particularly the allegations regarding death threats to trade union officials and an assault on the Chairman of the Trade Union of Medical Doctors of Burundi (SYMEDU) and other acts of intimidation of trade unionists.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of public employees without distinction whatsoever to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee once again notes with regret the lack of the statutory provisions on the right to organize of magistrates and observes that this situation is the reason behind difficulties of registration of the Trade Union of Magistrates of Burundi (SYMABU). The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures without delay in order to adopt such statutory provisions so as to ensure and clearly define the right to organize of magistrates.

Right to organize of minors. For several years, the Committee has been raising the matter of the compatibility of section 271 of the Labour Code with the Convention, as this section provides that minors under the age of 18 may not join a trade union without the explicit permission of their parents or guardians. The Committee requests the Government to recognize the right to join trade unions of minors under 18 years of age who are engaged in an occupational activity without the permission of their parents or guardians being necessary.

Article 3. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules, elect their representatives in full freedom, organize their administration and activities and formulate their programmes without interference by the public authorities. Election of trade union officers. The Committee recalls that its previous comments related to section 275 of the Labour Code which sets the following conditions for holding the position of trade union officer or administrator:

- Criminal record. Under section 275(3) of the Labour Code, holders of trade union office may not have been sentenced to imprisonment without suspension of sentence for more than six months. The Committee recalls that conviction for an act which, by its nature, does not call into question the integrity of the person and implies no real risk for the performance of trade union duties should not constitute grounds for exclusion from trade union office.
- Belonging to the occupation. Section 275(4) of the Labour Code requires trade union leaders to have belonged to the occupation or trade for at least one year. The Committee previously requested the Government to make the legislation more flexible by allowing persons who had previously worked in the occupation to stand for office or by lifting this requirement for a reasonable proportion of trade union officers.

The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 275(3) and (4) of the Labour Code, taking fully into account the principles recalled above.

Right to strike. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the matter of the succession of compulsory procedures to be followed before calling a strike (sections 191–210 of the Labour Code), which appear to authorize the Minister of Labour to prevent all strikes. Recalling that the right to strike is one of the essential means available to trade unions to further and defend the interests of their members, the Committee urges the Government to adopt and provide a copy of the text to be issued under the Labour Code on the modalities for the exercise of the right to strike, taking into account the principles recalled above.

The Committee also noted that, under section 213 of the Labour Code, strikes are lawful when they are called with the approval of a simple majority of the employees of the workplace or enterprise. The Committee recalled that, when voting on strikes, the ballot method, the quorum and the majority required should not be such that the exercise of the right to strike becomes very difficult in practice. If a member State sees fit to establish in its legislation provisions requiring a vote by workers before a strike can be held, it should ensure that account is taken only of the votes cast and that the required majority and quorum are fixed at a reasonable level (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 170). The Committee urges the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken to amend section 213 of the Labour Code in the light of the comments made above.

In its previous observation, the Committee noted that the Government had adopted a legislative decree prohibiting the exercise of the right to strike and to demonstrate throughout the national territory during the period of the elections. According to the Government, this legislative decree has not been used in practice. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether this legislative decree was repealed following the elections.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that trade union organizations can exercise in full their right to organize their activities freely without interference from the public authorities.

The Committee notes that the Government has set up a tripartite committee responsible for rapidly proposing new provisions of the Labour Code which would take into account the claims of the social partners, the reports of the labour inspection and the comments of the Committee. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any progress made in revising the Labour Code and recalls that technical assistance of the Office is at its disposal.

Lastly, the Committee notes the comments of 4 August 2011 by the ITUC on the application of the Convention and requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes with concern the comments made by the ITUC in its communication dated 31 July 2012 concerning the increase in acts of violence in the country, including death threats and intimidation against trade unionists in the education and health sectors. The Committee also notes the comments made by COSYBU dated 31 August 2012 concerning serious deficits in social dialogue, the withdrawal of the check-off facility, the abusive detention of a trade unionist and obstacles to the trade union's right to conduct its activities. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in relation to the comments made by the ITUC and COSYBU.

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee urges the Government to send its observations in response to the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Trade Union Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU) concerning the application of the Convention.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Non-dissuasive nature of the sanctions established by the Labour Code for violations of Article 1 (protection of workers against acts of anti-union discrimination) and Article 2 (protection of employers' and workers' organizations against any acts of interference by each other) of the Convention. In its past comments, the Committee had noted that, according to the Government, the provisions in question would be amended with the collaboration of the social partners. The Committee regrets that no amendments have been made to the legislation and, recalling the need to establish sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, hopes that the Government will be able to make the necessary amendments to the legislation in the near future. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any progress achieved in this respect.

Article 4. Right of collective bargaining in practice. The Committee noted previously that there was only one collective agreement in Burundi. The Committee noted that, according to the Government, it is for the social partners to take the initiative to propose collective agreements and that in practice they limit themselves to concluding enterprise agreements of which there are many in para-public enterprises. The Committee recalls that, although nothing in the Convention places a duty on the Government to enforce collective bargaining by compulsory means with the social partners, this does not mean that governments should abstain from any measure whatsoever aiming to establish a collective bargaining mechanism. The Committee notes the launch of a capacity-building programme for the social partners and once again asks the Government to provide information on the precise measures adopted to promote collective bargaining, together with information of a practical nature on the situation with regard to collective bargaining and, in particular, to indicate the number of collective agreements concluded up to now and the sectors covered. The Committee hopes that the Government will be able to indicate substantial progress in its next report.

Article 6. Right of collective bargaining for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee notes the shortcomings in social dialogue in the public service pointed out by the ITUC and the COSYBU. The Committee previously requested the Government to specify whether provisions that imply restrictions on the scope of collective bargaining for the public service as a whole are still in force in Burundi, particularly as regards the determination of wages, such as: (1) section 45 of Legislative Decree No. 1/23 of 26 July 1988, which provides that, following approval by the relevant ministry, the governing councils of public establishments set the level of remuneration for permanent and temporary posts and determine the conditions for appointment and dismissal; and (2) section 24 of Legislative Decree No. 1/24, which provides that governing councils of public establishments draw up staff regulations for personalized administrations subject to the approval of the competent minister. The Committee noted that, in its reply, the Government indicated that these provisions were still in force, but that, in practice, state employees participate in determining their terms and conditions of employment. According to the Government, they are aware of the right of collective bargaining, and this is the reason for the existence of agreements in the education and health sectors. In the case of public establishments and personalized administrations, the employees participate in the determination of remuneration as they are represented on the governing councils, and wage claims are submitted to the employer by enterprise councils or trade unions, with the competent minister only intervening to safeguard the general interest; in certain ministries, trade union organizations have obtained bonuses to supplement wages. The Committee once again asks the Government to take measures to align the legislation with practice and, in particular, to amend section 45 of Legislative Decree No. 1/23 and section 24 of Legislative Decree No. 1/24 so as to ensure that organizations of public servants and employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State can negotiate their wages and other terms and conditions of employment.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Cambodia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the Government's response to the concerns expressed by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2011, over the increased use of fixed duration contracts which could undermine the enjoyment of freedom of association and collective bargaining rights. The Government indicates that this longstanding issue has been the subject of tripartite consultations on the basis of draft amendments to the legislation, which had been prepared by the Ministry of Labour and Vocational Training, but that no consensus was reached. It adds that the issue would be the subject of further consultations in the tripartite Labour Advisory Committee in the near future.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government fails to respond to other comments submitted by the ITUC, by the Cambodian Labour Confederation (CLC) and by Education International (EI) in 2011, as well as to the 2010 comments by the ITUC and the Free Trade Union of Workers of the Kingdom of Cambodia (FTUWKC), which referred in particular to serious acts of violence and harassment against trade union leaders and members. Moreover, the Committee notes with concern the new comments submitted by the ITUC, in a communication dated 31 July 2012, and by EI and the Cambodian Independent Teachers' Association (CITA), in a communication dated 31 August 2012, which refer again to serious acts of violence and harassment against trade union leaders and members. The Committee urges the Government to send its observations on all the issues raised in 2010, 2011 and 2012, by the ITUC, the CLC, EI and CITA, and the FTUWKC.

The Committee notes the latest conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2318, concerning the murders of trade union leaders Chea Vichea, Ros Sovannareth and Hy Vuthy and the continuing repression of unionists, which had to be examined in the absence of a response from the Government, and was considered as an extremely serious and urgent case (365th Report, November 2012, paragraphs 286–290). In its previous comments concerning these murders, the Committee had noted that: (1) the convictions of Sok Sam Oeun and Born Samnang for the murder of Chea Vichea had been remanded to the Appeal Court by the Supreme Court, and they had been released on bail; (2) an investigation was being conducted, before the case of the murder of Chea Vichea would be referred to the Appeal Court for reprocessing; (3) the Supreme Court had ordered on 2 March 2011 the provisional release on bail of Thach Saveth who had been convicted for the murder of Ros Sovannareth and had been awaiting a review of his conviction for several years; and (4) the case of the murder of Hy Vuthy had been sent to the prosecutor of Phnom Penh Municipal Court on 2 September 2010 for processing. In the case of the murder of Chea Vichea, the Appeals Court had announced that there was insufficient evidence to charge the two persons who had served jail sentences, indicated that the charges against them should be dropped and referred the case for further investigation. The Committee had expressed the firm hope that this would allow full and independent investigations into the murders of the abovementioned Cambodian trade union leaders to be conducted so as to bring to justice the actual murderers and perpetrators of these heinous crimes as well as the instigators. Furthermore, in view of the above and the total absence of due process in relation to the trials of Sok Sam Oeun, Born Samnang and Thach Saveth, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on any steps taken to compensate them for damages. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the Ministry of Labour and Vocational Training sent a letter to the Ministry of Justice, and that information would be provided upon receipt of the latter's response. The Committee urges the Government to provide the information previously requested in relation to the compensation to be granted to Sok Sam Oeun, Born Samnang and Thach Saveth.

Trade union rights and civil liberties. In its previous observations, the Committee urged the Government to take all the necessary measures, in the very near future, to ensure that trade union rights of workers are fully respected and that trade unionists are able to engage in their activities in a climate free of intimidation and risk to their personal security and their lives as well as that of their families. The Committee notes with regret that the Government remains silent on these matters in its report, particularly when the comments made by a number of workers' organizations allege serious acts of violence and harassment against trade union leaders and members, and the discussion on Cambodia in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2011 relates to the persistent climate of violence and intimidation towards union members. The Committee is bound to recall, once again, that freedom of association can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against leaders and members of workers' organizations, and that detention of trade unionists for reasons connected with their activities in defence of the interests of workers, constitutes a serious interference with civil liberties in general and with trade union rights in particular. It further recalls that workers have the right to participate in peaceful demonstrations to defend their occupational interests. In light of the above, the Committee once again urges the Government to take all the necessary measures, in the very near future, to ensure that trade union rights of workers are fully respected and that trade unionists are able to engage in their activities in a climate free of intimidation and risk to their personal security and their lives as well as that of their families, in accordance with the abovementioned principles. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this regard.

Independence of the judiciary. In its previous observations, the Committee, noting the conclusions of the ILO direct contacts mission of April 2008, referring to serious problems of capacity and lack of independence of the judiciary, requested the Government to take concrete and tangible steps, as a matter of urgency, to ensure the independence and effectiveness of the judicial system, including capacity-building measures and the institution of safeguards against corruption. In this regard, the Committee recalls that in 2011 the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards urged the Government to: (1) adopt without delay the proposed law on the status of judges and prosecutors and the law on the organization and functioning of the courts and ensure their full implementation; (2) provide information on the progress made in this regard, as well as in respect of the creation of labour courts; and (3) transmit the draft texts to the Committee of Experts so that it would be in a position to comment as to their conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes that none of these texts have been received. It once again requests the Government to indicate whether these laws have been adopted, and, if so, to provide a copy of these laws. If this is not the case, the Committee urges the Government to adopt them without delay.

The Committee further requests the Government to provide in its next report information on any progress made concerning the creation of labour courts.

Furthermore, in relation to the Government's previous indication that an anti-corruption law had been adopted together with a five-year strategic plan (2011–15) and that an anti-corruption unit (ACU) had been established, the Committee notes from the Government's statement before the ILO Governing Body at its 316th Session that the ACU was established as a part of its commitment to legal and judicial reform in combating impunity, and requests the Government provide information on the composition and mandate of the anti-corruption institution and on its activities, together with a copy of the law, the strategic plan and any other relevant document.

The draft Trade Union Act. In its previous observation, the Committee noted that the ITUC, the CLC and EI, in their 2011 comments, expressed concerns over a number of provisions of the draft Trade Union Act, in particular in relation to the scope of application of the law, the requirements for a local union to be registered, the possibility for the Ministry of Labour to suspend the registration of a union, the qualifications imposed for trade union leadership, and the sanctions on trade union leaders and members for the commission of unfair labour practices. The Committee had also noted that the Government had benefited from the Office's assistance on the draft law. The Committee recalls that in 2011 the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards urged the Government to: (1) intensify its efforts, in full consultation with the social partners and with the assistance of the ILO, to ensure that the final draft legislation on trade unions would be fully in conformity with the Convention; and (2) transmit the draft text to the Committee of Experts so that it would be in a position to comment as to its conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report that many consultations have been conducted on the draft which has been finalized in August 2011 and was sent to the Council of Ministers for review. The Government adds that it hopes that the relevant institutions to which it would be sent afterwards would then review the draft to improve it. The Committee notes that no copy of the final draft legislation on trade unions has been received. It once again requests the Government to provide information on the steps taken towards the adoption of the Trade Union Act, and expresses the firm hope that the social partners will be fully consulted throughout the process, and that the final draft legislation will take into account all its comments and in particular that civil servants, teachers, air and maritime transport workers, judges and domestic workers will be fully guaranteed the rights enshrined in the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Canada

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee also notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 31 July 2012, the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC), dated 27 August 2012, and the Confederation of National Trade Unions (CNTU), dated 31 August 2012, which relate to all the issues under examination. The Committee also notes the allegations of the ITUC and the CLC that there are increasing numbers of violations of trade union rights in Canada, and in particular that there is much evidence that violations of freedom of association have become the norm for the Federal Government. They also denounce the slowness of provincial authorities in giving effect to the recommendations of the Committee in relation to freedom of association, even though the Canadian Constitution entrusts them with primary responsibility in relation to labour legislation. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in reply to the allegations of the ITUC, the CLC and the CNTU.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right to organize of certain categories of workers. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been expressing concern at the exclusion of broad categories of workers from the statutory protection of freedom of association.

Workers in agriculture and horticulture (Alberta and Ontario). The Committee noted in its previous comments that workers in agriculture and horticulture in the Provinces of Alberta and Ontario are excluded from the coverage of the general labour relations legislation and are thereby deprived of the same statutory protection of the right to organize afforded to other workers. The Government referred to the ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada of 29 April 2011 in the case Ontario (Attorney General) v. Fraser, in which the constitutionality of Ontario's Agricultural Employees Protection Act, 2002 (AEPA), was challenged on the basis that it infringed the rights of farm workers under subsection 2(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The ruling found that the AEPA provides a meaningful process for agricultural workers in Ontario to bargain collectively, and therefore upheld the AEPA as constitutional.

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it emphasized that, although the AEPA recognizes the right of agricultural employees to form or join an employees' association, it however maintains the exclusion of this category of workers from the scope of the Labour Relations Act. The Committee notes the indication in the Government's report that the Ontario Government still considers that the AEPA provides adequate protection to this category of workers, particularly to form associations, represent their interests and exercise their constitutionally protected rights. The Ontario Government indicates: (1) that if properly interpreted, the Act requires agricultural employers to consider workers' representations, issues and concerns in good faith; and (2) that it does not intend to amend the legislation.

The Committee also recalls that it noted previously that the Government of Alberta did not envisage reviewing its legislation following the decision of the Supreme Court concerning Ontario's AEPA. Noting the absence of information in this regard in the Government's report, the Committee understands that the position of the Government of Alberta has not changed on this point. Noting the comments of the ITUC and the CLC, which denounce the status quo on this matter, the Committee is bound to recall once again that all workers without distinction whatsoever (with the sole possible exception of the armed forces and the police) shall have the right to organize under the Convention. Therefore, the Committee considers that any provincial legislation that would deny or limit the full application of the Convention in relation to the freedom of association of agricultural workers should be amended. The Committee consequently once again requests the Government to ensure that the Governments of Alberta and Ontario amend their legislation so as to fully guarantee the right of agricultural workers to organize freely and to benefit from the necessary protection to ensure observance of the Convention. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide detailed information and statistics on the number of workers represented by trade unions in the agricultural sector in Ontario and, where appropriate, on the number of complaints lodged to assert the exercise of their rights under the Convention and on any related follow-up action taken.

Domestic workers, architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers and doctors (Ontario, Alberta, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan). The Committee recalls that its previous comments related to the need to ensure that a number of categories of workers excluded from any statutory protection of freedom of association under the labour relations legislation (domestic workers, architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers, engineers and doctors) enjoy the protection necessary, either through a revision of the labour relations legislation or by means of specific regulations, to establish and join organizations of their own choosing.

With regard to the situation of domestic workers, the Committee notes the indication by the Government of New Brunswick that it is continuing consultations with stakeholders regarding potential amendments to the Industrial Relations Act to remove the exclusion of domestic workers. The Committee also notes that the Government of Prince Edward Island indicates that domestic workers are covered under the Labour Act. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain any information with regard to the Governments of Ontario or Alberta on whether any amendment to the legislation is envisaged to remove the exclusion of domestic workers from the scope of industrial relations legislation.

With regard to the other categories, including architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers, doctors and engineers, the Committee notes the indication by the Government of New Brunswick that the Industrial Relations Act does not contain exclusions for architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers, doctors or engineers. The Committee notes the indication by the Government of Prince Edward Island that architects, engineers, lawyers and doctors who are entitled to practice and who are employed in a professional capacity are excluded from the Labour Act, but that their interests are represented by their associations. With regard to Saskatchewan, the Committee notes the indication by the Government of the Province that in May 2012 it began a comprehensive review of its labour legislation, including the labour relations legislation. The objective of the review is to modernize and simplify the legislation, including a possible revision of the definition of the terms “employer” and “employee”, which will help to identify more accurately the relations between employees and employers within the meaning of the definitions.

Taking duly into account the information provided, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that the Governments of Alberta, Nova Scotia, Ontario and Prince Edward Island take the necessary measures to guarantee that architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers, doctors and engineers enjoy the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, in accordance with the principles of the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate in its next report the outcome of the examination undertaken by the Government of the Province Saskatchewan on its labour legislation and its impact in terms of determining the categories of workers which can establish organizations of their own choosing under the terms of the Trade Union Act.

The Committee also trusts that the Government’s next report will include information on the tangible measures adopted or envisaged by the Governments of Ontario and Alberta to amend their legislation in relation to the exclusion of domestic workers from the scope of their labour relations legislation. The Committee hopes that the Government will also report progress in the revision of the Industrial Relations Act of the Province of New Brunswick with a view to removing the exclusion of domestic workers.

Nurse practitioners (Alberta). In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under the terms of the Labour Relations (Regional Health Authorities Restructuring) Amendment Act of the Province of Alberta, nurse practitioners do not have the right to establish and join organizations of their choosing. Noting that the Government’s report does not contain any information on this subject, the Committee urges the Government to ensure that the Government of Alberta takes the necessary measures to amend the above Act so that nurse practitioners have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, in accordance with the principles of Article 2 of the Convention.

Principals and vice-principals in educational establishments and community workers (Ontario). The Committee recalls its previous comments concerning the need to ensure that principals and vice-principals in educational establishments, as well as community workers, have the right to organize, pursuant to the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos 1951 and 1975. The Committee notes that the Government’s report does not contain any information on this point. The Committee trusts that the Government’s next report will contain information on the progress achieved in law and practice by the Government of Ontario in ensuring that principals and vice-principals in educational establishments, and community workers, enjoy the fundamental right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing for the defence of their professional interests.

Part-time employees of public colleges (Ontario). In its previous comments, the Committee noted the entry into force of the amended Colleges Collective Bargaining Act (CCBA), which gives part-time academic staff and support staff in the colleges of Ontario the full right to organize and to bargain collectively. The Committee also noted that the same Act establishes a procedure to change, establish or eliminate bargaining units, including the possibility for colleges to challenge the number of union members holding cards, which the colleges allegedly use widely to delay the certification process. In this respect, the Ontario Public Service Employees’ Union had filed certification applications to represent both part-time academic staff and part-time support staff units. In both cases, representation votes had been held and the ballot boxes had been sealed pending a decision by the Ontario Labour Relations Board (OLRB) concerning the issues that remained at dispute between the parties.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, on 27 March 2012, the OLRB noted that the parties had reached agreement on the outstanding challenges in respect of one college (Centennial College), and that the parties had asked the OLRB to confirm the agreement and to determine a timeline as to how to move forward to deal with the challenges in relation to other colleges. The process and timeline for moving forward are reported to have been agreed. The Government of Ontario emphasizes the importance of the adjudicative role played by the OLRB in the process of certification established by law and considers that it would be inappropriate to interfere with or influence the procedure. It adds that this position is shared by the National Union of Public and General Employees. Noting the positive developments in the treatment of this matter, the Committee requests the Government to indicate any further developments in this regard.

Education workers (Alberta). The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the need to amend the provisions of the Post-Secondary Learning Act which empower the board of a public post-secondary institution to designate categories of employees who are allowed, by law, as academic staff members, to establish and join a professional association for the defence of their interests. Noting that the Government's report does not contain any information on this point, the Committee once again requests it to ensure that the Government of Alberta takes all the necessary measures to ensure that all higher education staff without exception have the right to organize.

Article 2. Trade union monopoly established by law (Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Ontario). The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the specific reference to the trade union recognized as the bargaining agent in the law of Nova Scotia (the Teaching Professions Act), Ontario (the Education and Teaching Professions Act) and Prince Edward Island (the Civil Service Act, 1983). Noting that the Government's report does not contain any information on this matter, the Committee once again requests the Government to ensure that the Governments of Nova Scotia, Ontario and Prince Edward Island take all necessary measures to bring their legislation into full conformity with the standards of freedom of choice on which the Convention is based by removing any specific designation of individual trade unions as bargaining agents and replacing it with a neutral reference to the most representative organization.

Article 3. Right of employers' and workers' organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. Education sector. The Committee's previous comments concerned the recurrent problems in the exercise of the right to strike by workers in the education sector in several provinces (British Columbia and Manitoba). The Committee also notes the allegations of the CLC dated 31 August 2012 that the Government of Ontario announced that it would introduce a bill against education workers and school boards that would block any possible strike for up to two years and end all negotiations, particularly on teachers' wages. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in reply to these allegations.

British Columbia. The Committee previously requested information on any decision by the Labour Relations Board of British Columbia with regard to essential service levels in the education sector. The Committee notes the interim order issued on 28 February 2012 by the Labour Relations Board on an application by the British Columbia Teachers Federation (BCTF), which found as follows: (1) the British Columbia Public School Employers' Association (BCPSA) and the BCTF will work with the Board to designate essential service levels for the BCTF bargaining unit; (2) the interim order will be reviewed on a weekly basis commencing at the beginning of the week of 12 March 2012, and may be varied, modified or amended as the circumstances require and the Board finds to be appropriate; and (3) any issue relating to the application or interpretation of the interim order will be raised as soon as possible and will be dealt with by the Board as expeditiously as possible.

With regard to the discussions between the Government of the Province and the BCTF concerning the Public Education, Flexibility and Choice Act, the Committee notes the Government's indication that these discussions were held between May and November 2011, and that the Government subsequently introduced the Education Improvement Act (Bill No. 22) in February 2012, which was adopted in March 2012. The Committee notes all of this information.

Manitoba. The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the need to amend section 110(1) of the Public School Act, which prohibits teachers from engaging in strike action. The Committee notes once again that the Government does not envisage amending the Public School Act. The Government adds that teachers in the Province voluntarily gave up the right to strike in 1956 in exchange for binding arbitration, and that neither teachers nor school boards have formally petitioned the Manitoba Government to restore the right to strike to teachers. The Act currently provides for a process of arbitration in resolving collective bargaining disputes. Recalling that the right to strike should not be restricted for teachers, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that the Government of Manitoba takes the necessary measures to amend the Public School Act accordingly.

Certain categories of employees in the health sector (Alberta). The Committee's previous comments concerned the prohibition of strikes for all employees within the regional health authorities, including various categories of labourers and even gardeners governed by the Labour Relations (Regional Health Authorities Restructuring) Amendment Act. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain any information on this subject and requests it to ensure that the Government of Alberta takes the necessary measures to ensure that all workers in the health sector who are not providing essential services in the strict sense of the term are guaranteed the right to strike.

Public sector (Quebec). The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned Act No. 43, which put a unilateral end to negotiations in the public sector by imposing the application of collective agreements for a determined period, thereby depriving the workers concerned, including teachers, of the right to strike (the labour law in Quebec prohibits strikes during the term of a collective agreement). The Committee also requested the Government to amend the following provisions: (1) section 30, which establishes severe and disproportionate sanctions in the event of infringements of the provisions prohibiting recourse to strike action (suspension of the deduction of trade union dues merely by the employer declaring that there has been an infringement of the Act for a period of 12 weeks, for each day or part of a day that the infringement is observed); (2) section 32, which provides for a reduction of employees' salaries by an amount equal to the salary that they would have received for any period during which they are in infringement of the Act, in addition to not being paid during that period; and (3) section 38, which prohibits the facilitation of class actions against an association of employees by reducing the conditions required by the Code of Civil Procedure for such an action; and (4) sections 39 and 40, which establish severe penal sanctions.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Act is still subject of litigation before the courts of the Province and that the Government of Quebec therefore reserves its comments until the courts have issued their decisions. The Committee requests the Government to provide full particulars on the decisions of the provincial courts, and the action taken as a result, and hopes that the amendments will be made as requested.

Arbitration imposed at the request of one party after 60 days of work stoppage (section 87.1(1) of the Labour Relations Act) (Manitoba). The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the need to amend section 87.1(1) of the Labour Relations Act, which allows a party to a collective dispute to make a unilateral application to the Labour Board so as to initiate the dispute settlement process when a work stoppage has exceeded 60 days. The Committee notes the Government's indication that no changes are anticipated in the Labour Relations Act. The Committee once again requests the Government to ensure that the Government of the Province of Manitoba takes the necessary measures to amend the above Act so that an arbitration award may only be imposed in cases involving essential services in the strict sense of the term, public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or where both parties to the collective dispute so agree.

Compliance of the Public Service Essential Services Act and of the Act to amend the Trade Union Act of the Province of Saskatchewan. The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the Public Service Essential Services Act (Bill No. 5) and the Act to amend the Trade Union Act (Bill No. 6), which were adopted by the Government of Saskatchewan in May 2008. The Committee also observed that these texts were the subject of a complaint before the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) (Case No. 2654), and it referred to the March 2010 conclusions and recommendations of the CFA, which drew the attention of the Committee to the legislative aspects of the case. The Committee recalls that, in accordance with the recommendations of the CFA, the provincial authorities are called upon, in consultation with the social partners; (1) to amend the Public Service Essential Services Act (Bill No. 5) so as to ensure that the Labour Relations Board may examine all aspects relating to the determination of an essential service and act rapidly in the event of a challenge arising in the midst of a broader labour dispute; (2) to amend the Public Service Essential Services Act, which sets out a list of prescribed essential services; (3) to make compensatory guarantees available to workers whose right to strike may be restricted or prohibited under the Public Service Essential Services Act; and (4) to amend the Trade Union Act (Bill No. 6), so as to lower the requirement, set at 45 per cent, for the minimum number of employees required to express support for a trade union in order to begin the process of a certification election.

The Committee noted previously that a number of national and provincial trade unions had filed a complaint with the provincial court in July 2008 to have Bills Nos 5 and 6 declared unconstitutional for violating, among other fundamental texts, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the international Conventions ratified by Canada. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Court of Queen's Bench for Saskatchewan rendered a decision on 6 February 2012 on the bills. With regard to Bill No. 6, the court found that the amendments were constitutional and, consequently, the Government of Saskatchewan has no intention of changing the amendments made to the Act in 2008. With regard to Bill No. 5, the court found that the amendments were unconstitutional and that the legislation as written infringes upon freedom of association by limiting the right to strike. The Committee notes the indication that the Government of Saskatchewan is appealing the decision of the court and therefore notes that the matter is once again before the courts. The Committee refers to the conclusions of the CFA regarding the need to amend the Trade Union Act, as amended by Bill No. 6, and requests the Government to provide information on any decision taken by the competent jurisdiction concerning the appeal made by the Government of Saskatchewan against the finding that the Public Service Essential Services Act (Bill No. 5) is unconstitutional, and any action taken as a result, taking into account the recommendations of the CFA concerning the amendments to be made to that Act.

Chad

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee noted in its previous comments that, under section 294(3) of the Labour Code, parents or guardians may oppose the right to organize of young persons under 16 years of age. The Committee recalls once again that Article 2 of the Convention guarantees all workers, without distinction whatsoever, the right to establish and join organizations. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that section 294(3) of the Labour Code will soon be amended to guarantee the right to organize to minors who have reached the legal minimum age (14 years) for access to the labour market, either as workers or apprentices, without parental or guardian authorization being necessary. The Committee urges the Government to provide information in its next report on all the measures adopted in this regard.

Article 3. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to organize their administration and activities in full freedom. The Committee has also noted on many occasions that, under section 307 of the Labour Code, the accounts and supporting documents relating to the financial transactions of trade unions must be submitted without delay to the labour inspector, when so requested. Recalling once again that the inspection by the public authorities of trade union finances should not go beyond the obligation of organizations to submit periodic reports, the Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures to amend section 307 of the Labour Code taking into account the abovementioned principle. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the instructions issued by the Director of Labour and Social Security with regard to the inspection of the financial transactions of trade unions.

With regard to Act No. 008/PR/07 of 9 May 2007 regulating the right to strike in public services, the Committee notes that section 19 gives a broad definition of essential services and includes radio and television broadcasting services and abattoirs. The Committee points out that the principle whereby the right to strike may be limited or even prohibited in essential services would lose all meaning if national legislation defined these services in too broad a manner. As an exception to the general principle of the right to strike, the essential services in which this principle may be entirely or partly waived should be defined restrictively: the Committee therefore considers that essential services are only those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 159).

Furthermore, the Committee reiterates its comments on the following provisions of the Act:

- Section 11(3) of the Act, which imposes the obligation to declare the “possible” duration of a strike. The Committee recalls that, under section 13(1), non-compliance with this condition would result in a strike being declared illegal. Recalling that trade unions should be able to call strikes of unlimited duration and considering that the legislation should be amended to this effect, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures adopted for this purpose.
- Sections 20 and 21, under which the public authorities (the Minister concerned) have the discretion to determine the minimum services and the number of officials and employees who will ensure that they are maintained in the event of a strike in the essential services enumerated in section 19. In this respect, the Committee recalls once again that such a service should nevertheless meet at least two requirements: (1) firstly, and this aspect is paramount, it must genuinely and exclusively be a minimum service, that is one which is limited to the operations that are strictly necessary to meet the basic needs of the population or the minimum requirements of the service, while maintaining the effectiveness of the pressure brought to bear; and (2) as this system restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, their organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining such a service, along with employers and the public authorities. The parties might also envisage the establishment of a joint or independent body responsible for examining rapidly and without formalities the difficulties raised by the definition and application of such a minimum service and empowered to issue enforceable decisions (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 160 and 161). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to amend the legislation to ensure that the minimum service is limited to the operations that are strictly necessary to avoid jeopardizing the life or normal living conditions of all or part of the population, that the workers’ organizations concerned are able to participate in defining such a service, along with the employers and the public authorities, and to indicate any progress achieved in this respect.
- Section 22(1) of the Act, which provides that any refusal by officials or employees to comply with requisition orders (sections 20 and 21) makes them liable to the penalties provided for in sections 100 and 101 of Act No. 017/PR/2001 issuing the general public service regulations. In this regard, the Committee recalls that these legislative provisions describe the degrees of disciplinary penalties to be imposed by order of gravity, but without indicating those which correspond to the different degrees of fault. The Committee once again requests the Government to clarify the scope of penalties for contraventions of legal provisions and also requests it to indicate any other penalties that can be imposed for violations of Act No. 008/PR/2007 regulating the exercise of the right to strike in public services.

The Committee notes the International Trade Union Confederation’s (ITUC) comments of 4 August 2011 addressing legislative issues already raised by the Committee. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not sent any response to the comments of 2009 and requests it to do so.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee also requests the Government to provide its observations in relation to the comments made by the ITUC dated 31 July 2012, concerning the violent repression by the law enforcement authorities of a demonstration in the petroleum sector.

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 4 August 2011, reporting obstacles to collective bargaining in the oil sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon. The Committee reiterates its previous observations concerning the effective inclusion of the Union of Trade Unions of Chad (UST) in social dialogue and requests the Government to provide any information on any measures adopted in this respect.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC dated 31 July 2012 reporting again obstacles to collective bargaining in the oil sector and to social dialogue in general.

Colombia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1976)

Comments from workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee notes the comments of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU), dated 11 and 27 June 2012, the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), the Single Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CUT) and the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC), provided in communications dated 31 August 2012, and of the General Confederation of Labour (CGT), dated 5 September 2012. The Committee notes that these comments refer in general to matters already under examination by the Committee, and in particular to acts of violence against trade union leaders and members, including murders and other acts of violence, as well as the impunity relating to many acts of violence. The Committee also observes that some of the comments refer to allegations of anti-union discrimination and matters relating to difficulties in exercising trade union rights by workers in the informal economy or who are covered by subcontracting arrangements. The Committee invites the Government and the social partners to include these subjects in their discussions in the context of the National Dialogue Commission on Wage Policies, or in corresponding dialogue bodies.

The Committee also notes the comments of the National Employers Association of Colombia (ANDI), supported by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), dated 5 September 2012. The Committee notes the comments made by the IOE on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee notes the Government's various communications related to these comments.

Cooperation project on international labour standards

The Committee notes with interest the launching, in August 2012, of the project to promote compliance with international labour standards in Colombia, financed by the Government of the United States. The Committee observes that the objectives of the project are: (1) the strengthening of the institutional capacity of the Ministry of Labour, and particularly labour inspection services; (2) the strengthening of existing social dialogue bodies (the Standing Dialogue Commission on Wage and Labour Policies and the Special Committee for the Handling of Conflicts referred to the ILO-CETCOIT) and of the social partners who participate in them, particularly at the departmental and local levels; and (3) the strengthening of the institutional capacity of the Government of Colombia to improve measures for the protection of trade union leaders, members, activists and organizers and to combat the impunity of those engaging in acts of violence against them. The Committee also notes that the project envisages providing the necessary technical assistance as a priority to the units of the new Ministry of Labour responsible for combating the abuse of employment mediation and other forms of contracting which are in violation of workers' rights (such as associated work cooperatives, simplified limited liability companies and temporary service enterprises) and to guarantee that collective accords are not used to undermine the position of trade unions or to prevent the conclusion of collective agreements.

Technical assistance missions. The Committee notes that the Government requested assistance from the Office to strengthen the work that has been undertaken by the CETCOIT. In this context, the Committee welcomes the participation by the Office in the meetings of the CETCOIT in May and August 2012, in the context of which the parties reached agreements and withdrew certain complaints that had been submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee of Experts notes the comment by the CUT in relation to the CETCOIT that there are no regional structures and that it does not have means of protecting trade union organizations that do not have their headquarters in Bogotá, that the results achieved in recent years have been very disappointing and that in certain cases the agreements concluded are not given effect. In this respect, the Committee takes note of the Government's indication that: (1) tripartite agreement was reached on the appointment of a facilitator in the CETCOIT and that since the facilitator's appointment 15 cases have been dealt with, in eight of which agreement was reached; (2) the members of the CETCOIT have discussed the ILO's recommendation to establish departmental structures, for which reason it has been agreed to establish pilot projects in certain areas of the country; and (3) the regulations of the CETCOIT were approved, with certain adjustments for greater clarity concerning the actors and members. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that in Case No. 2356 (examined by the CETCOIT), in which the Committee on Freedom of Association recommended the reinstatement of 51 workers on the grounds of the causal relationship between their trade union activities and their dismissal, the Constitutional Court accepted the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association, ordered the reinstatement of the workers and that the Court's ruling has already been given effect. The Committee notes all of these initiatives and information, taking into account that the project for the promotion of compliance with international labour standards in Colombia, referred to above, envisages the strengthening of the machinery intended to resolve labour disputes, and particularly the CETCOIT, as recommended by the ILO high-level tripartite mission which visited Colombia in 2011, and it hopes that it will be able to continue noting progress in the work of the CETCOIT.

The Committee further notes that, at the invitation of the Government, the Director of the International Labour Standards Department of the ILO visited Colombia to seek information on the effect given to the conclusions of the high-level tripartite mission which visited Colombia in 2011, and the Tripartite Agreement on Freedom of Association and Democracy concluded in 2006. The Committee notes in particular that the Director of the Department was provided with information on: (1) the structure and objectives of the new Ministry of Labour, which entered into operation in December 2011; (2) the legislative and practical measures adopted to combat the violence affecting the trade union movement and impunity (the creation of the Protection Unit; the adoption of Decree No. 4912 of 26 December 2011 reforming the nature and operation of the Committee to Assess Risks and Recommend Measures; the protection of 1,273 members of trade union organizations; the budget of US$107 million for protection; and the increase in criminal investigation officers, specialized prosecutors and courts); and (3) the measures adopted to strengthen labour inspection (launching of a training, prevention and monitoring programme for enterprises, cooperatives, third-party employers and officials on collective rights on the right of association; the increase in the number of inspectors, with 100 new posts in 2011 and the plan for there to be 904 inspectors by 2014; the inspection services have imposed penalties in the ports, palm and transport sectors for labour mediation and violations of labour standards). The Committee notes with interest that, during the visit by the Director of the ILO Standards Department, the Public Prosecutor of the Nation and the ILO signed a Memorandum of Understanding envisaging the establishment of relations of cooperation and information. The Committee further notes that, according to the information provided to the Director of the ILO Standards Department, the social partners have a different view on the progress that is reported to have occurred; moreover, during her visit, various workers' organizations referred to violations of trade union rights and collective bargaining and, at a meeting of the Standing Dialogue Commission, it was agreed that the complaints concerned would be subject to tripartite review with the aim of them being examined at the national level.

The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on developments with respect to the strengthening of the labour inspection in law and in practice and the examination of conflicts by the CETCOIT.

Trade union rights and civil and political liberties

The Committee recalls that for many years it has been examining allegations of violence against trade unionists and the situation of impunity, which have been submitted to the Committee of Freedom of Association in Cases Nos 1787 and 2761. The Committee notes with concern that the ITUC, CUT, CTC and CGT refer to acts of violence against trade unionists. They allege that, according to the records of the National Trade Union School, 30 trade unionists were murdered in 2011, and 11 in 2012, and that the number of threats increased from 404 in 2010 to 538 in 2011. The CUT indicates that the exercise of the right to freedom of association continues to involve a high level of risk, that there is no public protection policy focused on trade union liberties guaranteeing the right and integrity of the persons concerned and the free functioning of trade union organizations, and that in relation to impunity it is possible to see a first change in the views of certain courts and prosecutors (in relation to the need to adopt a systematic method of investigation in relation to anti-union violence, and to go deeper into the trade union aspects in investigations so that the motives are clearly revealed) and that up to now it has also been possible to discern a commitment in the instructions of the sub-unit of the Office of the Public Prosecutor, without it yet having an impact on the work of prosecutors and the courts.

The Committee further notes the indications by the ANDI that: (1) the Government adopted Decision No. 716 in April 2011 extending trade union protection not only to trade union leaders and members, but also to trade union activists and to workers who were not able to establish a union because they had received threats; (2) Directive No. 013 of April 2011 appointed 153 officers of the criminal police to combat impunity in crimes affecting the trade union membership, and Decree No. 2248 of June 2011 allocated 60 new specialized prosecutors, reaching a total of 162 prosecutors at the national level; (3) in 2012, a budget of US$113.33 million were allocated to the trade union leader protection programme; and (4) the Office of the Public Prosecutor has continued the work of investigation in the context of Cases Nos 1787 and 2761, submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association, and by April 2012 the numbers were 425 convictions and 530 persons convicted for crimes against trade unionists.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (1) it is firmly convinced that as those responsible for crimes committed against trade unionists are investigated and punished, not only are the rights to truth and justice being guaranteed, but a contribution is being made to the prevention of further violations, and that the Government has the absolute commitment and will to combat impunity; (2) in 2010, the number of murders committed in Colombia was 14,459, of which 37 were trade unionists; in 2011, the number of murders was 14,746, of which 30 were trade unionists, and in 2012, the number of trade unionists murdered was 12; (3) in 2011, the number of trade unionists benefiting from protection measures was 1,186, with a budget of US$70 million, while in 2012 the number of trade unionists benefiting from protection was 1,273, with a budget of US$107 million; (4) in compliance with the commitments made, the Protection Unit was created by Decree No. 4065 of 2011 and Decree No. 4912 of 26 December 2011 was issued organizing the Prevention and Protection Programme for the Right to Life, Freedom, Integrity and the Security of Individuals, Groups and Communities under the responsibility of the Ministry of the Interior and the National Protection Unit; (5) the Decree referred to above reformed the nature and operation of the Committee for the Assessment of Risks and the Recommendation of Measures (CERREM) and the Technical Unit for the Compilation and Analysis of Information was created; (6) the representatives of the CUT, CTC and CGT trade union confederations participate in the CERREM with standing invitations; (7) with a view to combating impunity, the Office of the Prosecutor of the Nation has adopted a new criminal investigation policy for violations of human rights and has created the interdisciplinary National Analysis and Situation Unit which will allow progress to be made, among other cases, in those related to macro-criminal structures which violate the human rights of trade unionists, following standards adopted by international courts; (8) the new strategy of the Office of the Public Prosecutor emphasizes the need to give priority to investigations (according to the information provided to the Director of the ILO Standards Department, priority has been given to all cases of the murder of trade unionists included in Case No. 2761) of violations of human rights as an effective response in combating impunity; this policy was discussed with the social partners; (9) the Public Prosecutor has indicated that joint and tripartite machinery will be established with the Ministry of Labour, the trade union confederations and the ANDI, through monthly meetings which will address concerns and comments relating to the management of investigations in cases of anti-union violence, and the first meeting was held on 31 August 2012; (10) the measures adopted will increase the outstanding results achieved up to now, which led in Case No. 1787 to 439 sentences being imposed in relation to the murders, with a total of 531 persons being convicted, while in Case No. 2761 there have been 13 sentences imposed in relation to the murders, and 11 cases are currently before the courts; (11) in relation to impunity, the Office of the Public Prosecutor conducted a study on the sentences handed down for acts of violence against unionized workers and found that in only 17.7 per cent of the cases was there a relation between trade union status or the exercise of trade union activities and the murder, and that the most frequent motive related to the collaboration or membership of the victim in a subversive group; (12) in view of the commitment of the Office of the Public Prosecutor to continue strengthening investigations and prosecutions of all cases of violence against members of trade union organizations and the importance for the management of the Office of the Public Prosecutor of adopting international standards of investigation so as to combat impunity more effectively, a Memorandum of Understanding was concluded between the Office of the Public Prosecutor of the Nation and the ILO (referred to above); and (13) taking into account the absolute commitment of the State to defend workers' rights, the Office of the Public Prosecutor of the Nation has undertaken an institutional campaign in the media defending the right of association, and has participated in social forums and agreements.

The Committee notes with deep concern, with reference to the violence affecting the trade union movement, the murder of 12 trade unionists in 2012. The Committee appreciates the involvement of all the social actors and the authorities in combating violence in general, and particularly violence affecting the trade union movement. In this respect, the Committee welcomes the initiative of the Office of the Public Prosecutor to meet the tripartite actors frequently to address their concerns and comments concerning the management of investigations in cases of anti-union violence (the Committee recalls that the trade union movement has been calling for this initiative for some time). The Committee hopes that the new measures adopted by the authorities will make it possible to provide protection to trade union leaders and members who are under threat, eradicate violence against trade union leaders and members and convict those guilty of such acts. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the effects of these measures in practice.

Pending legislative issues

Articles 3 and 6 of the Convention. Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that for a number of year it has been referring to the need to take measures to amend the legislation in relation to:

- the prohibition of strikes, not only in essential services in the strict sense of the term, but also in a very broad range of services that are not necessarily essential (section 430(b), (d), (f), (g) and (h); section 450(1)(a) of the Labour Code; Tax Act No. 633/00 and Decrees Nos 414 and 437 of 1952; 1543 of 1955; 1593 of 1959; 1167 of 1963; 57 and 534 of 1967). The Committee notes the indication by the ANDI that: (1) section 430(g) of the Substantive Labour Code, which provided that the mining, preparation and distribution of salt was an essential service found to be void by the Constitutional Court and therefore no longer forms part of Colombian legislation; and (2) in general, in relation to essential services, it is important to bear in mind that this is one of the points set out in the plan of action with the Government of the United States and the Tripartite Agreement on Freedom of Association and Democracy of 2011, and that the technical support of the Office is envisaged for their discussion and determination by the social partners in the National Dialogue Commission on Labour and Wage Policies. In this respect, the Committee notes that the Constitutional Court informed the Director of the ILO Standards Department that it had urged the legislative authorities to specify the services which have to be considered essential and that Congress still has to determine this matter;
- the possibility to dismiss workers who have intervened or participated in an unlawful strike (section 450(2) of the Labour Code), even where the unlawful nature of the strike is a result of requirements that are contrary to the principles of freedom of association. The Committee notes the indication by the ANDI that the Constitutional Court ruled that greater guarantees are to be provided to workers who participate in an unlawful strike and that the Court found that merely declaring a work stoppage illegal is not sufficient to immediately dismiss the worker, as the employer has to demonstrate the latter's participation in the collective and illegal work stoppage through a procedure in which the employee can intervene with a view to safeguarding his or her rights to due process and defence; and
- the prohibition of the calling of strikes by federations and confederations (section 417(i) of the Labour Code).

In this respect, the Committee notes the reference by the Government to the launching of the technical cooperation project for compliance with international labour standards, in the context of which dialogue bodies will be reinforced, and particularly the National Dialogue Commission, in which matters related to essential public services will be examined. The Committee trusts that the Government will soon undertake a tripartite analysis of the above legislative provisions and that it will take into account in this respect the rulings of the Supreme Court and Constitutional Court, and reminds it that it may have recourse to the technical assistance of the Office in this process. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any measures adopted in this respect.

Comoros

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2 of the Convention. Anti-union discrimination. The Committee noted that the Workers' Confederation of Comoros (CTC) reports numerous dismissals of trade union members and leaders in the para-public and port sectors in a communication dated 31 August 2011. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect.

Article 4. Right of collective bargaining. The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. For several years, the Committee has been requesting the Government to take measures to promote collective bargaining in the public and private sectors. The Committee had previously noted the Government's expression of regret that there had not been substantial progress in this respect and its reiterated desire to receive technical assistance to help the partners concerned gain a better understanding of the socio-economic importance of collective bargaining. The Committee had noted in this respect the comments made by the Employers' Organization of Comoros (OPACO), according to which collective agreements in the pharmaceutical and bakeries sectors, which had been under negotiation for several years, had still not been concluded and that negotiations in the press sector were currently under way. The Committee had noted with regret that, according to OPACO, the Government had not taken any measures to promote collective bargaining in either the public or the private sectors.

The Committee once again regrets the absence of progress in the collective bargaining that is being undertaken and expressed the firm hope that the negotiations will be completed in the near future. The Committee noted that, according to the CTC, there has still not been progress in collective bargaining and that it is not structured and has no framework at any level. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that ILO technical assistance will be provided in the very near future and it requests the Government to take all the necessary measures to promote collective bargaining in both the private and the public sectors. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Costa Rica

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1960)

Comments from employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee notes the comments on the application of the Convention made by the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU), the National Federation of Employees of the Social Security System and Fund (UNDECA) (23 July 2012), the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) (31 July 2012), according to which it is almost impossible to establish and operate a trade union in the private sector, and the Confederation of Workers Rerum Novarum (CTRN) (30 August 2012), underlining the relevance of the Committee's comments. The Committee also notes the comments of the Costa Rican Federation of Chambers and Associations of Private Enterprise (UCCAEP) (12 April 2012), referring to matters already under examination by the Committee. The Committee notes that the information provided by the Government in its report covers a large part of the problems raised in the above comments. Finally, the Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments of the CTRN, dated 31 August 2011.

ILO missions and pending issues. The Committee recalls that a high-level mission visited the country in 2006, as well as a technical assistance mission in May 2011. These missions emphasized four problematic issues that are still pending and which are examined below.

I. Slowness and ineffectiveness of proceedings regarding sanctions and compensation in the event of anti-union acts. The Committee notes that, according to the ITUC and the CTRN, delays in judicial proceedings exceed six years and that cases relating to unfair labour practices and violations of labour and social rights may take up to eight years before they are concluded.

The Committee noted previously that, according to the high-level mission which visited the country in 2006, the proceedings in cases of anti-union discrimination are so slow that it takes at least four years to obtain a final ruling. The Committee also noted the conclusions of the ILO technical assistance mission in 2011 on this issue:

With regard to the issue of the slowness and ineffectiveness of proceedings relating to anti-union discrimination and interference, the mission draws the attention of the Committee of Experts to the significant Bill to reform labour procedures (which is intended to speed up labour procedures, including those relating to acts of anti-union discrimination or interference, and in practice establishes a special expeditious procedure for matters relating to trade union rights). The Bill is being promoted by the Government, trade union confederations and the UCCAEP, and is under examination in the Legislative Assembly, where it is favoured by the majority of the groups, according to the understanding gained by the mission from its meetings with the heads of groups and the Legal Affairs Commission of the Legislative Assembly. If the Bill is finally adopted, it could give effect to the comments of the Committee of Experts on the need for expeditious and efficient justice and effective procedures to punish acts of anti-union discrimination or interference. Certain authorities and trade union confederations agree that there was a fear of dismissal when wishing to establish or join a union, for which reason the Bill is of the greatest importance. The Bill also deals with other matters relating to the application of Convention No. 87. The mission draws the attention of the Committee of Experts to other measures referred to by the Government and the judicial authorities to combat delays in judicial proceedings.

The Committee notes the Government's indications as follows: (1) the legislative process concerning the bill to reform labour procedures (legislative file No. 15990), and the agreements reached up to now have not been easy; (2) the bill is being given priority with a view to defending workers' rights; (3) it was difficult to adapt the bill during the extraordinary sessions (December 2010 to April 2011), as the four sessions were devoted to hearing comments and the divergences between various streams of political thought and the different visions held in the plenary of the Assembly; (4) the judicial authorities made significant efforts during the period 2009–10 with a view to complying with the constitutional principle of prompt and full justice, thereby guaranteeing an efficient service for users; the Government refers to the creation of a new court, measures for the computerization of files, the restructuring of judicial offices and of the distribution of the workload, and measures to give effect to the principle of oral hearings; (5) the strengthening of labour institutions, both in the judicial system and in the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, have been priority areas that go beyond the current legislative framework, through which it is planned to reduce the duration of procedures to punish cases of anti-union acts, in accordance with the national tradition of democracy and safeguards in relation to the protection of labour rights; and (6) Directive No. 08, of 9 May 2011, includes a procedure for "cases for the re-establishment of protection" intended for unfair practices that remove freedom of association.

The Committee notes the Government's additional indications that: (1) in May 2012, in the context of a special session of the Higher Labour Council, a tripartite dialogue and consultation body, a bipartite agreement was reached between employers and workers who called on the deputies to approve the text of Bill No. 15990, except in relation to the matters on which agreement has not been reached; (2) a passive approach is currently being adopted to the other bills relating to the matters under the Convention to which the ILO supervisory bodies refer (including Bill No. 13475), as Bill No. 15990 is broad and inclusive and takes their content into account; (3) it is clear that Bill No. 15990 is a vital tool for dealing with labour disputes effectively; (4) recently, as part of the efforts that have been made to reduce delays in judicial proceedings, the court in plenary issued the protocol on oral hearings in labour proceedings, the principal objective of which is to guarantee a just, expeditious and economic outcome to any cases heard through oral proceedings; (5) experience shows that in judicial offices in which oral hearings have been used, the period between the lodging of the complaint and the decision was reduced from 300 to 190 days, and sentencing, which previously occurred 45 days after the presentation of the evidence, is now done immediately; and (6) significant progress has also been made in terms of the inefficiency of labour and conciliation procedures which have contributed to improving the efficiency of complaint procedures lodged with the administration.

The Committee notes the confirmation by the UCCAEP of this tendency and its indication that it is continuing to promote the Bill to reform labour procedures, and hopes that it will be adopted in the near future. According to the UCCAEP: (1) the judicial authorities have been working to improve judicial procedures with a view to reducing delays, for example through the implementation of computerized proceedings in labour jurisdictions which facilitate the processing of files and the certification of the quality of proceedings in labour jurisdictions; and (2) the efforts made by courts of law to deal with these matters have resulted in cases of this type being decided in less than two years after passing through all the judicial procedures, which is an achievement in this respect.

The Committee however notes that Bill No. 15590 to reform labour procedures was approved by the Legislative Assembly in September 2012, but vetoed by the executive authorities in October 2012 on the grounds that two of the matters covered were unconstitutional (the regulation of strikes in essential services and the prohibition upon recruiting temporary staff to replace striking workers).

The Committee emphasizes the contradiction between the information provided by the Government and the indications of the trade union organizations on the duration of labour proceedings in cases of the violation of trade union rights. In any event, the Committee notes the information provided by the ILO mission that judicial proceedings last for four years. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that in practice the number of complaints relating to anti-union practices is low (11 cases) and that the unionization rate is 9.6 per cent.

Noting the efforts made to resolve the problem of the slowness of procedures in cases of anti-union discrimination, the Committee hopes that the discrepancies that persist and which were preventing the Government from approving Bill No. 15990 to reform labour procedures will be resolved in the near future. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the parties in the Legislative Assembly will reach an agreement on the divergences and it requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this respect. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on developments in the legislative procedure concerning Bill No. 13475 whose consideration, according to the Government, remains passive at the moment.

II. Submission of collective bargaining to criteria of proportionality and rationality (in accordance with the case law of the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court of Justice, which found unconstitutional a significant number of clauses in collective agreements in the public sector at the instigation of the public authorities (the Citizens' Ombudsperson, the Office of the General Prosecutor of the Republic) or one or other political party). The Committee noted previously the emphasis placed by the trade union organizations on the gravity of the problem of collective bargaining in the public sector and the requirements imposed by the Negotiating Policies Commission on public employees, and that the CTRN and the other confederations in the country considered that the long delay in the adoption of the Bills to amend the legislation and for the ratification of the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151), and the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154) (which resulted from a tripartite agreement), show the lack of interest in moving forward.

The Committee also referred to the report of the 2011 ILO mission, which in its conclusions indicated as follows:

With regard to the judicial removal of clauses of collective agreements through legal actions for unconstitutionality, in which the irrationality or lack of proportionality of certain clauses is invoked, the mission wishes to indicate that the new Attorney-General and the new Citizens' Ombudsperson have a good understanding of ILO principles and that legal actions for unconstitutionality have not been initiated, which is very positive. The statistics provided by the Government appear to indicate that the scope of the problem has diminished in recent years. More specifically, the Government provided statistics (for the period 2008–11) on the rulings on the legal actions challenging the constitutionality of certain clauses in collective agreements. Of 17 rulings, only two found that the challenges had merit, with a total of three clauses being removed. According to the Government, the number of legal challenges currently before the courts is five.

The mission adds that in the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court three of the seven magistrates align themselves with the ILO principles indicated by the Committee of Experts, and it is believed that the other magistrates have a better understanding of the meaning of the comments of the Committee of Experts. It is therefore necessary for the Committee of Experts to continue following developments on this matter, particularly taking into account the fact that in the past one political party filed certain of these legal actions for unconstitutionality.

The mission also welcomes the training provided for members of the three State authorities and the social partners, to which the Government refers, and in particular appreciates the forthcoming workshop on collective bargaining.

The mission recalls that, although there may be cases of serious breaches of constitutional rights in certain clauses of agreements, it is normal and customary for collective agreements to contain provisions that favour trade union members, particularly because many of these agreements are concluded in the framework of a collective dispute in which both parties frequently make concessions, and nothing prevents non-members from becoming members of one or other trade union if they wish to obtain more favourable treatment. In any case, collective bargaining as an instrument of social peace cannot be submitted to recurrent scrutiny of its constitutionality without losing its prestige and enormous value. In other words, it is necessary to endeavour to prevent the abuse of legal actions for unconstitutionality.

The Committee notes the Government's indications that: (1) the scope of the problem has tended to diminish in recent years; (2) of the five pending challenges to find clauses unconstitutional that are before the Constitutional Chamber, which were noted by mission, two have been decided through rulings Nos 2012-01279 and 04942-2012; (3) one of the rulings found the challenge to be without merit as the Constitutional Chamber cannot review or evaluate the content of collective agreements, which govern labour relations in accordance with the fundamental rights of organization and bargaining, and in view of the legal force with which they are endowed by the Constitution in section 62; in addition, it found that such agreements are valid for a certain period and can be revised, although through the due legally established procedures.

The Committee hopes that the three challenges to find clauses unconstitutional that are awaiting decision by the Constitutional Chamber will be finalized in the near future in accordance with the principles of Convention No. 98 and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in the situation, including any further challenges lodged against clauses of collective agreements. The Committee requests the Government to use all the means at its disposal to make progress with the draft legislation, with tripartite support, with a view to reinforcing the right to collective bargaining in the public sector, including the draft texts for the ratification of Conventions Nos 151 and 154.

III. Operation of the Commission on Collective Bargaining Policies in the Public Sector. The Committee noted previously the allegations by the national trade union confederations that the Commission on Collective Bargaining Policies was having a very negative effect on collective bargaining in the public sector. The report of the 2011 ILO mission indicated as follows:

The Deputy Minister of Finance indicated that the role of the Commission on Collective Bargaining Policies in the Public Sector does not relate to matters of substance, but to criteria of a fiscal nature so that public expenditure is not increased in an irrational manner. The trade unions engage in negotiations and consultations each year with the central Government for the negotiation of wages. Sometimes, they are increased above the inflation rate. Normally they are around the past inflation rate, but now the claim is to calculate the increase based on future inflation forecasts.

The Commission on Collective Bargaining Policies in the Public Sector does not challenge clauses of collective agreements that do not have a budgetary impact, and authorizes clauses with a budgetary impact, although in practice wage rises and clauses which breach the legislation have not been permitted (for example, if the recommendations in relation to dismissals by a joint commission envisaged in a collective agreement are binding for the management of the institution concerned). Wage negotiations are held throughout the public sector with the participation of trade union representatives and are undertaken within the framework of the projected level of future state budgets or of the decentralized institution concerned.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that in April 2012 a report was submitted to the President of the Commission on Collective Bargaining Policies in the Public Sector with a view to notifying the members of the Commission of the report prepared by the ILO technical assistance mission which took place in 2011, so that its report could be examined. The Government adds that the criticisms of the trade unions noted by the Committee of Experts concern matters which arose years ago, and that nevertheless in recent years the Commission on Collective Bargaining Policies has endeavoured to discharge the functions set out in Decree No. 29576-MTSS, for which reason these situations have now been superseded and there are no challenges pending currently. During the course of 2011, the Commission on Collective Bargaining Policies in the Public Sector had before it various submissions concerning draft texts, complaints and additions to collective agreements.

The Committee recalls that, with reference to the complaints made by trade union confederations concerning the unsatisfactory operation of the Commission on Collective Bargaining Policies (its slowness, its de facto role as an employer, supervision of the content of clauses with budgetary implications), the 2011 ILO mission indicated that the Government had accepted the mission's proposal that the Higher Labour Council (a tripartite body) should hold meetings with the Commission on Collective Bargaining Policies with a view to evaluating the system and adopting reforms. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on this subject and trusts that evaluation meetings will be held and will address the problems relating to the operation in practice of the Commission on Collective Bargaining Policies.

IV. Direct agreements with non-unionized workers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that in 2007 there were 74 direct agreements in force, whereas only 13 collective agreements remained.

The Committee referred to the conclusions of the ILO mission of May 2011 on this matter, which read as follows:

With regard to the problem of direct agreements with non-unionized workers, the Committee of Experts had noted in its observation the enormous imbalance between their numbers and those of collective agreements in the private sector (there cannot be direct agreements in the public sector). The mission highly appreciated the transparency and openness of the UCCAEP (employers) and the Minister of Labour to discuss this matter with trade unions in the context of the Higher Labour Council (a tripartite body), including the report drawn up in 2007 by an ILO expert.

The mission emphasized that the proportion of direct agreements concluded by standing committees of non-unionized workers had grown worse in relation to the number of collective agreements.

The Minister of Labour accepted the proposal made by the mission to carry out activities, in collaboration with the ILO Subregional Office, to promote collective bargaining with trade unions in both the public and private sectors, including training activities. The mission recalled that Convention No. 98 establishes the principle of the promotion of collective agreements with trade union organizations and that such collective agreements have constitutional rank in Costa Rica.

The mission wishes to note that, at the end of its session, there were before the Legislative Assembly draft amendments of differing content during the examination of the Bill to reform labour procedures: some sought to abolish direct agreements, and others to promote them, others to make them possible in the public sector and others to leave the regulations as they are at present. The mission wishes to point out that the problems raised by the Committee of Experts may be either aggravated or overcome depending on the final decision taken by the Legislative Assembly.

According to the data provided by the Government, there are 298 active unions (with 195,950 members and 1,195 trade union leaders) and six confederations. The unionization rate is 10.3 per cent (8.3 per cent in 2007). The number of members in the public sector is 123,568 and in the private sector 72,382. Seven cases of anti-union persecution were reported in 2010.

With regard to collective agreements, according to the Government, in May 2011 there were 70 collective agreements covering 50,600 workers in the public sector. In the private sector, there are 15 collective agreements in force concluded by trade union organizations and 159 direct agreements concluded by standing committees of (non-unionized) workers. The mission emphasizes that the Government has not yet provided data on the coverage (number of workers covered) of collective agreements and direct agreements in the private sector. The trade union confederations allege that the Government is pursuing in practice a policy of promoting direct agreements with non-unionized workers. The Government asserts that it is the workers who choose between the forms of association that exist in the country, although in the view of the mission the situation is not so clear. Based on all of its meetings, and particularly those with various authorities and certain magistrates of the Supreme Court, it is clear that the expansion of direct agreements is being promoted in the country.

The Committee notes the UCCAEP's indication that direct agreements had their origins as a form of dialogue and in the need for workers to organize, in accordance with the protection afforded by the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135). This does not prevent those workers who so wish from organizing themselves in unions with the protection of the Constitution and international Conventions. Both legal formulae, which have their basis in both international and national law, can coexist with validity as they both allow dialogue between the parties. Nor should it be forgotten that, where unions exist, they prevail over standing workers' committees. Direct agreements are nothing other than negotiations with enterprise committees which are envisaged in many other legislations and which occur when workers decide to organize in the form of standing committees. Trade unions may still conclude collective agreements when they consider it appropriate, and one type of agreement is not prejudicial to the other. There are no international standards prohibiting non-unionized workers from engaging in bargaining and dialogue with their employers, which is even endorsed by the ILO. The UCCAEP indicates that the high-level mission was able to note the existence of such workers' representatives, as an independent organization, seeking dialogue and the improvement of the conditions of workers, and that they cannot be disregarded as a reality recognized by the law, and that the members of the mission called for them to be better regulated based on objective criteria. This recommendation is also contained in the draft Code of Labour Procedure, which was ultimately opposed by trade union representatives.

The Committee notes the Government's indications that: (1) the three authorities of the Republic share a focus on action to consolidate social dialogue between the social partners concerned and the promotion of the right to collective bargaining in the private sector; (2) activities are being undertaken to promote the right to collective bargaining (four new training workshops were held in June and July 2012); (3) in September 2011, in the case of the enterprise ANFO and the trade union SITRAPECORI, based on an appeal for the protection of constitutional rights (amparo) by the union, the Constitutional Chamber found that in a situation of the coexistence of a standing committee of workers and a trade union in the same enterprise, the right to collective bargaining lies essentially with the unions, which prevail over any other type of labour organization in collective bargaining; this ruling by the Constitutional Chamber safeguards the rights of unions and offers the clarification that standing workers' committees are specific bodies for the resolution of economic and social collective disputes, in the following terms: "... they are not envisaged by the ordinary law as permanent bodies to represent the economic and social interests of workers, but merely as a means of resolving specific or circumstantial economic and social disputes (ruling No. 12457-2011); (4) in light of the legal concepts referred to above, the coexistence in the enterprise of a standing workers' committee and a trade union does not give rise to exclusivity in their representative roles and they are complementary within a democratic system of labour relations; (5) the legal purpose of standing workers' committees is to represent workers solely under the circumstances indicated above, on the understanding that their functions do not include activities that are recognized as the exclusive prerogatives of trade unions; (6) it may be considered that direct agreements are another alternative for promoting collective bargaining as a means of achieving peaceful and agreed solutions to disputes between employers and workers; (7) the fact that those who negotiate these agreements are not members of unions is a direct consequence of one of the two possible dimensions of the right to organize, which also implies that membership is not compulsory; and (8) with regard to the disproportionate numbers of collective agreements and direct agreements, the Ministry of Labour and Social Security continues to focus on direct agreements not being used as an alternative to replace the conclusion of collective agreements, based on an understanding of the legal nature and scope of each of these labour instruments.

The Committee notes the Government's further indication that the Constitutional Chamber does not deny the possibility of the existence in the industrial relations system of a dual model of representation, consisting of trade union organizations active at the enterprise level and freely elected workers' representatives. As a consequence, it is clear that the questions raised by the ILO supervisory bodies concerning direct agreements are not addressed directly at these agreements, but rather at the establishment by workers of standing committees to resolve disputes with employers through direct agreements. For this reason, and irrespective of the final text which emerges from the agreements between the social partners concerning the Bill to reform labour procedure, the Ministry of Labour and Social Security has opted to undertake an examination and to hold consultations with a view to issuing regulations respecting the process of the election of workers' representatives as members of standing committees when they lead to a direct agreement, thereby preventing such agreements from being used for anti-union purposes. Furthermore, the National Directorate of Inspection issued circular No. 018-12 of 2 May 2012 to all inspection officials indicating that, in the case of the existence of a trade union and a standing workers' committee, the inspector shall ensure that there are no violations of freedom of association and, in the event of any dispute or difference requiring negotiation or conciliation, it is to be referred to the Directorate of Labour Affairs for confirmation of the applicable procedure.

The Government adds that the Institutional Commission for External Training (CICE) is now in operation within the Ministry of Labour and Social Security. The CICE is composed of various directorates and its principal function is the planning and implementation of training activities. This training is intended to promote workers' rights in accordance with the terms indicated by the mission which visited the country in 2011. The project to promote the fundamental rights of workers (PRODEF), executed by the REAL CARD Foundation, is providing support to develop the structure of the plan of action of the CICE.

The Committee notes with interest the ruling by the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court of Justice (No. 12457-2011) which clearly gives priority to collective agreements (which are recognized in the Constitution) in relation to direct agreements with non-unionized workers.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that there are currently 93 collective agreements in the public sector (covering 57,877 workers), 16 in the private sector (covering 6,934 workers) and 125 direct agreements in the private sector (covering 29,761 workers). The Committee observes that, according to these statistics, the number of collective agreements in the private sector continues to be very low (13 in 2007, 15 in 2011 and 16 in 2012) and there is a very high number of direct agreements with non-unionized workers. The Committee points out that this is an anomalous situation and requests the Government to take measures to give effect to the criteria set out in ruling No. 12457-2011 and to intensify the promotion of collective bargaining within the meaning of Convention No. 98. The Committee hopes to be able to note tangible progress in its next report.

Croatia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1991)

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of employers' and workers' organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules, to elect their representatives in full freedom and to organize their administration and activities. The Committee previously recalled that, since 1996, it had been commenting over the issue of the distribution of trade union assets and had been requesting the Government to determine the criteria for their division. In its previous observation, the Committee expressed the firm hope that, given that the representativeness criteria had already been defined, the Government would take the necessary measures in the very near future to address this issue.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that: (i) the new count of the unions' membership was completed as early as 2009; (ii) the required formal inter-union agreement on property division entered into by the unions' central bodies has still not been reached; and (iii) currently, the union property is to the largest extent being used by the Union of Autonomous Trade Unions of Croatia (UATUC), a smaller portion of real estate belongs to the graphics industry, school and civil service trade unions, and the remaining central union bodies operate out of leased properties, except for the Croatian Association of Trade Unions to which the UATUC gave its premises. In this respect, the Committee hopes that the parties concerned will reach an agreement on the distribution of trade union assets in the near future and requests the Government to provide in its next report any information thereon.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Cuba

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the comments of 31 July 2012 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the comments of 30 August 2012 by the Independent Trade Union Coalition of Cuba (CSIC) – which the Government does not recognize as a union – referring to matters already raised by the Committee, and in particular pointing out that no legislative changes requested by the ILO supervisory bodies have been introduced. The Committee also notes the Government's reply to these comments dated 1 November 2012.

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated of 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

Trade union rights and civil liberties

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had asked the Government to send copies of the court rulings connected with specific cases of convictions of workers belonging to the Independent National Confederation of Workers of Cuba (CONIC), persecution and threats of imprisonment against delegates of the Light Industry Workers' Union (SITIL), and the confiscation of equipment and humanitarian aid sent from abroad to the Single Council of Cuban Workers (CUTC). The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that none of the alleged trade unionists referred to in the Committee's observations were tried or convicted for the exercise or defence of trade union rights. They were all tried by courts in accordance with due process and sentenced for committing crimes to undermine the sovereignty of the State and other crimes clearly established under the law, and none of the penalized actions had anything to do with trade union activity whatsoever. The Committee once again requests the Government to transmit a copy of the court rulings in question. The Committee recalls that these actions had been examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association (Case No. 2258) and it refers to the conclusions reached in this context.

Legislative issues

The Committee recalls that the Government has been stating for many years that it is in the process of revising the Labour Code. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not provide any information whatsoever on the state of progress of this revision. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report whether the revision of the Labour Code is still ongoing or if it has been set aside.

Articles 2, 5 and 6 of the Convention. Trade union monopoly. For many years, the Committee has been referring to the reference to the Confederation of Workers of Cuba (CTC) in sections 15 and 16 of the Labour Code of 1985. The Committee notes that in its report the Government states that: (1) workers may join trade union organizations, as laid down in Article 2 of the Convention, without previous authorization of any kind, either State or enterprise; (2) there are more than 110,000 grass roots with levels of structure decided upon by the workers themselves, ranging from enterprise, sector or branch level to national bodies; (3) in the Cuban trade union movement, freedom is expressed in terms of unity, decided upon by the workers themselves, which is reaffirmed at the level of workers' congresses held regularly; the statutes and resolutions of the Cuban trade union organizations are adopted at these congresses with absolute freedom of expression and opinion; (4) Cuban workers pay trade union dues directly and voluntarily as there is no payroll check-off in Cuba; (5) the Labour Code contains the necessary guarantees for the full exercise of trade union activity in all workplaces throughout the country and for the full participation of workers and their representatives in the entire decision-making process concerning their varying interests; (6) there are no restrictions or bans whatsoever on workers exercising their trade union rights in any workplace, either in law or in the practice of labour relations in the country; (7) neither the Labour Code in force, nor the supplementary legislation, provide for restrictions on the establishment of trade unions, and all Cuban workers have the right to establish trade union organizations and are free to join them without prior authorization; and (8) there is no violation of the Convention in Cuba.

While noting this information, the Committee again stresses that trade union pluralism must remain possible in all cases and that the law must not institutionalize a national monopoly by referring to a specific trade union confederation; even in this situation where at some point all workers have preferred to unify the trade union movement, they should still remain free to choose to set up unions outside the established structures should they so wish and join the organization of their own choosing. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government once again to take measures to amend the above sections of the Labour Code and to provide information in its next report on any measures adopted in this respect.

Article 3. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to the need to amend section 61 of Legislative Decree No. 67 of 1983 which confers on the CTC the monopoly to represent the workers on government bodies. The Committee notes that according to the Government: (1) this legislative decree was repealed by Legislative Decree No. 272 of 16 July 2010; (2) the only provisions of the legislative decree of 1983 that remain in force, until the corresponding legal standard has been adopted, are those referring to the establishment and organization of bodies of the State central administration and to technical advisory councils and other provisions that in no way affect compliance with the Convention; and (3) the new legislative decree makes no reference whatsoever to matters relating to freedom of association. The Committee requests the Government to send a copy of Legislative Decree No. 272 of 16 July 2010.

For years the Committee has referred to the absence of recognition of the right to strike in the legislation and the prohibition of its exercise in practice. The Committee notes the Government's statement that: (1) the legislation in force contains no prohibition whatsoever on the right to strike, nor does the criminal law establish any penalties for the exercise of such rights; (2) any decisions on this matter are the prerogative of the trade union organizations; should Cuban workers at some time decide to resort to a strike, there is nothing preventing them from doing so; (3) Cuban workers are the beneficiaries of participatory and democratic social dialogue at all decision-making levels, from enterprise-level up to the higher echelons of government; and (4) trade union representatives participate in all the processes of drafting labour and social security legislation and workers' assemblies in work units are frequently consulted on these drafts. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government and recalls that in order to safeguard the legal certainty of workers who decide to have recourse to strike action, future legislative reform should contain provisions explicitly recognizing the right to strike.

Djibouti

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes with deep concern the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 4 and 31 August 2011 concerning the application of the Convention, in particular the allegations concerning the obstacles preventing the Labour Union of Djibouti (UDT) from developing its activities. The ITUC also denounces the fact that in October 2009 the preparatory work for the 4th UDT Congress was disrupted by the police who sent all the participants away and arrested several members of the UDT Executive, subjecting them to interrogation. Postponed to a later date, the UDT Congress was finally held quietly on 17–18 January 2010 at the actual headquarters of the UDT. The ITUC also recalls that the passport of the UDT Secretary-General has been confiscated since December 2010, which prevents him from fulfilling his commitments of representation at both regional and international levels; that the UDT has been broken into on numerous occasions; that its bank account has been frozen and then cancelled; and that its letter box is still confiscated. The ITUC points out moreover that interference in the organization of trade union activities not only affects the UDT in its capacity as a national confederation, but also many grass-roots trade unions, such as the dockers' union whose attempts to hold congresses have been violently repressed. Given that the Government has still not provided any observations on the comments made by the ITUC and in the light of their serious nature, the Committee draws the Government's attention once again to the fact that the exercise of trade union rights can only take place in a climate free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind and that the prohibition imposed on a trade union federation to develop its activities constitutes a direct violation of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide, without delay, its observations on the comments made by the ITUC. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government once again to provide its observations on the comments made by the ITUC in August 2009 and August 2010 denouncing persistent actions of harassment and anti-union discrimination, as well as the violent repression of strikes.

The Committee notes that most of the facts reported in the communications of the ITUC, dated August 2011, are the subject of a complaint being examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association (Case No. 2753).

Legislative problems. The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the provisions of Act No. 133/AN/05/5th L of 28 January 2006 issuing the Labour Code. This Act was denounced by the ITUC and also by the UDT and the General Union of Djibouti Workers (UGDT) as challenging fundamental rights relating to freedom of association. The Committee had noted that, according to the report of the direct contacts mission undertaken in January 2008, the Government had reaffirmed that all the social partners were consulted in the process of preparation of the Labour Code. However, the Committee notes that the Government held working meetings with the mission to consider the points of divergence between the national legislation and the Conventions in order to rectify them and that it undertook to bring the recommended solutions to the attention of a tripartite National Council for Labour, Employment and Vocational Training (CNTEFP), which was due to be constituted. The Committee had noted that, in its report of May 2008, the Government had reiterated its commitment to reviewing certain provisions of the legislation in order to bring them into conformity with the Convention and bring them to the attention of the CNTEFP. In this respect, the Committee notes the warning contained in the report of the direct contacts mission regarding any excessive delay in constituting the CNTEFP and the impact thereof on the adoption of the necessary legislative amendments. It also notes the mission's recommendation that, in a context where the representativeness of workers' organizations has not yet been established in a clear and objective manner, no representation from the trade union movement of Djibouti should be discarded from the work of the CNTEFP. The Committee further notes that, in its recent examination of a case concerning Djibouti, the Committee on Freedom of Association has noted the Government's indication that the CNTEFP has been constituted pursuant to Presidential Decree No. 2008-0023/PR/MESN and is chaired by the Minister of Employment, that its secretariat is provided by the Directorate of Labour and Relations with the social partners and that, in addition to its tripartite composition, the CNTEFP also includes a representation of the Parliament (Case No. 2450, 359th Report, paragraph 392). The Committee urges the Government to provide detailed information concerning the current composition of the CNTEFP and its functioning, in particular the manner in which it is consulted on legislative matters and matters affecting the interests of representative employers' and workers' organizations.

With regard to its previous comments concerning points of divergence between the Labour Code and the Convention, the Committee has been informed of the adoption of Act No. 109/AN/10/6th L concerning the partial amendment of the provisions of sections 41, 214 and 215 of Act No. 133/AN/05/5th L of 28 January 2006 concerning the Labour Code. The Committee notes with interest that the relevant Act amends sections 41, 214 and 215 in line with the recommendations it has been making for many years. The Committee trusts that the Government will rapidly take the necessary measures to revise and amend the other legislative provisions taking into account the comments reiterated hereafter:

- Section 5 of the Act on Associations. This provision, which requires organizations to obtain authorization prior to their establishment as trade unions, is contrary to Article 2 of the Convention.
- Section 23 of Decree No. 83-099/PR/FP of 10 September 1983. This provision, which confers upon the President of the Republic broad powers to requisition public servants who are indispensable to the life of the nation and the proper operation of essential public services, should be amended in order to restrict the power of requisition to public servants who exercise authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC dated 31 July 2012 concerning the application of the Convention and in particular the violent repression and the detention of dockers and railway workers during a demonstration. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereof.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the comments contained in the communications from the Labour Union of Djibouti (UDT), the General Union of Djibouti Workers (UGDT) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received between 2005–07, which denounced dismissals, acts of discrimination and anti-union interference in the postal and other sectors. In this respect, the Committee had requested the Government to order without delay an independent inquiry into the alleged acts. It had noted that in its report of 2008, the Government had indicated that the matter had been the subject of in-depth discussions with the direct contacts mission visiting Djibouti in 2008, which had encouraged all the parties to bring an end to the disputes. The Government had further stated that it would provide information on developments in the situation. The Committee had also noted the comments of the ITUC, dated 26 August 2009, indicating that the ILO Mission to Djibouti had offered some hope of an opening, but that the commitments made on that occasion by the Government, including those relating to the reinstatement of workers and trade unionists who suffered abusive dismissal, have not been given effect. The ITUC also denounced the pressure exerted on the Postal Union, which had had to establish a new executive committee. However, the management had interrupted the check-off of workers' trade union dues, thereby preventing the union from defending the rights of postal workers. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not provided any information on the points raised for many years by the UDT, UGDT and ITUC. The Committee once again urges the Government to provide its observations in reply to the comments on the situation in the postal and other sectors and to specify any cases in which penalties established by the law have been imposed following violations of the rights set out in the Convention.

The Committee notes the comments of the ITUC, dated 31 August 2011, denouncing once again acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. The ITUC also denounces the fact that in October 2009, the preparatory work for the fourth UDT Congress was disrupted by the police who sent all the participants away and arrested a number of members of the UDT Executive, subjecting them to interrogation. Apart from these acts of interference, the ITUC also denounces the fact that the passport of the UDT Secretary-General has still not been returned after it was confiscated in December 2010, which prevents him from fulfilling his commitments of representation at regional and international levels; that the UDT headquarters has been broken into on numerous occasions; that its bank account was frozen and then cancelled; and that its letter box is still confiscated. The Committee notes that most of the facts reported in the ITUC's communication are contained in a complaint being examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association (Case No. 2753).

The Committee notes with concern that the trade union situation seems to be deteriorating and firmly recalls the obligation under the Convention to guarantee workers adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination (Article 1 of the Convention) and to ensure adequate protection to workers' and employers' organizations against any acts of interference (Article 2). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in reply to the communication from the ITUC, and to take measures to ensure the trade union rights of the UDT and its officials.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the Decree envisaged under section 282 of the Labour Code, establishing the structure and procedures of the National Joint Committee on Collective Agreements and Wages, and any other relevant information on its work.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Finally, the Committee notes the ITUC's comments dated 31 July 2012 which are dealt with in the observation concerning the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Dominican Republic

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1953)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), the National Confederation of Trade Union Unity (CNUS), the Autonomous Confederation of Workers' Unions (CASC) and the National Confederation of Dominican Workers (CNTD), reiterating earlier comments on the lack of effective sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination in various enterprises, restrictions on the freedom of association of public employees and the requirement that a union must represent an absolute majority of the workers in order to bargain collectively. The Committee notes the Government's reply to these comments.

Lengthy proceedings in the event of violation of trade union rights. The Committee requested the Government to send observations on the ITUC's assertion that court proceedings are excessively long (18 months or more) and that collective agreements have been negotiated in only four enterprises in the export processing zones. The Committee notes that in its report, the Government indicates that under the Labour Code, special labour courts have been set up that deal with cases simply and rapidly. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that according to a survey conducted in 2010 by the Judiciary and based on a sample of 723 cases that were settled between October 2009 and March 2010, 31 per cent of the cases were concluded in less than three months, 45 per cent took from three to six months, 17 per cent from six to nine months, 5 per cent from nine to 12 months and 2 per cent took more than a year; however, according to data supplied by the Legal Statistics Division, the average length of cases judged on the merits is 429 calendar days. The Committee points out that the existence of legal provisions prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination is not enough if they are not accompanied by effective and rapid procedures to ensure their application in practice (see General Survey on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work, 2012, paragraph 190). The Committee asks the Government to ensure that further measures are taken to secure rapid and effective protection against violations of trade union rights and to report on the impact of such measures on the length of proceedings to hear complaints of such violations.

Article 2 of the Convention. Insufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee asked the Government to indicate the specific penalties that may be imposed by law on persons found guilty of anti-union acts. The Committee notes that according to the Government; (1) under section 392 of Labour Code, the ordinary dismissal (without stated cause) of workers protected by trade union immunity shall be null and void; (2) where an enterprise terminates its employment relationship with a worker protected by trade union immunity in breach of the ban on termination without stated cause, the Labour Code establishes the following: (a) the termination shall be declared null and void; (b) the reinstatement of the worker shall be ordered; (c) the wages due from the date of termination to the date of reinstatement shall be paid; (d) a fine ranging from seven to 12 minimum monthly wages shall be imposed; (e) social security shall be paid; and (f) any incidental damages claimed by the worker shall be paid by order of the judge who imposed the penalties.

The Committee also notes that section 333 of the Labour Code prohibits employers from engaging in unfair or unethical labour practices, namely: (1) requiring workers or persons seeking work to refrain from joining or applying to join a union; (2) carry out reprisals against workers for engaging in trade union activities; (3) dismissing or suspending a worker for belonging to a trade union; (4) refusing, without due cause, to establish negotiations for the conclusion of collective agreements on conditions of work; (5) intervening, in any manner, in the establishment or administration of a union of workers or supporting it by financial or other means; (6) refusing to have dealings with the legitimate representatives of the workers; and (7) using force, violence, intimidation or threat, or any other form of coercion against workers or unions of workers, with a view to preventing or obstructing exercise of their rights as established by law. The Committee notes that section 720 classifies unfair practices that violate freedom of association as very serious offences punishable by fines ranging from seven to 12 minimum monthly wages (section 721(3)). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application of these penalties in practice, including statistical information, and on the dissuasive effects of the penalties (amount of the fines imposed and number of enterprises concerned).

Article 4. Requisite majorities for collective bargaining. The Committee points out that for many years it has referred in its comments to the fact that, in order to engage in collective bargaining, a trade union must represent an absolute majority of the workers in an enterprise or a branch of activity (sections 109 and 110 of the Labour Code). The Committee observes in this connection that the Government repeats that tripartite discussions have been held in the Labour Advisory Council with a view to amending the legislation. The Committee further observes that the Government refers to an appendix containing a draft amendment to the Labour Code (the appendix was not received). The Committee recalls that in cases where the law provides that in order to be recognized as a bargaining agent, a trade union must obtain the support of 50 per cent of the members of a particular bargaining unit, problems may arise since a majority union that fails to secure this absolute majority is thus denied the possibility of bargaining. The Committee considers that under such a system, if no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in this unit, at least on behalf of their own members (see General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraph 241). The Committee requests the Government to send the draft amendment to the Labour Code and hopes that sections 109 and 110 will be amended in the very near future in order to bring them into conformity with the provisions requiring the promotion of collective bargaining.

Right to collective bargaining in practice. In its previous comments the Committee asked the Government to take specific measures to promote collective bargaining and send statistical information on any collective agreements concluded in the public and private sectors, including in export processing zones, indicating the number of workers they cover.

The Committee notes from the Government's report that according to data supplied by the General Directorate of Labour, 15 collective agreements were concluded in 2011, covering 10,056 workers, including two agreements signed in export processing zones, covering 3,438 workers. The Committee also notes that between 2010 and 2012, 11 workshops were held on freedom of association and collective bargaining and a course was organized on collective bargaining. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to stimulate collective bargaining and develop it further, and to report on their effects in particular by continuing to provide statistics of the number of collective agreements signed and the number of workers covered.

Articles 2, 4 and 6. As regards public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, in its previous comments, the Committee took note of the adoption of the Public Service Act, No. 41-08, and its implementing regulations (Decree No. 523-09). The Committee expressed the hope that the protection established in the new legislation on the public service would be extended to acts of anti-union discrimination at the time of hiring and in the course of employment, prohibiting discrimination based on union membership or participation in lawful union activities (the protection as it stands covers a union's founders and a number of its leaders, but not public officials or employees). The Committee again asked the Government to secure for associations specific protection from acts of interference by the employer such as interference in or control – financial or otherwise – of the associations' activities. Lastly, the Committee asked the Government to establish sufficiently dissuasive penalties against such acts of discrimination and interference.

The Committee notes in this connection that the Government again refers to the provisions of the Act and its implementing regulations but provides no specific information in reply to the Committee's requests. In these circumstances, the Committee again asks the Government to take the necessary steps to secure for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State and their associations specific protection against acts of anti-union discrimination at the time of hiring and in the course of employment and against acts of interference by the employer such as interference in or control – financial or otherwise – of the associations' activities, and to establish sufficiently dissuasive penalties against such acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on these matters.

Articles 4 and 6. Right to collective bargaining of public servants. With regard to the right to collective bargaining of public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State, who, under the terms of Article 6 of the Convention should enjoy the right to collective bargaining through their organizations, the Committee asked the Government to indicate whether under article 62 of the Constitution or under the legislation, associations of public servants now enjoy the right to collective bargaining. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the Public Service Act, No. 41-08, and its implementing regulations (Decree No. 523-09) establish the right of public employees to form associations. The Committee invites the Government, in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, to take measures to secure recognition in law of the right to collective bargaining of public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State.

Egypt

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

Comments of workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee. The Committee notes the very detailed Government's observations on the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 31 July and 31 August 2012. It notes in particular that, concerning the ITUC allegation that the state-controlled Egyptian Trade Union Federation (ETUF) continues to be the dominant trade union, the Government indicates that: (1) there are large numbers of trade union organizations in the country, some of which are under the ETUF, others are included in other federations, the most important of which is the Egyptian Federation of Independent Trade Unions; (2) the number of trade unions which were allowed to be established in all freedom exceeds 800 trade unions and federations; and (3) the Government does not control the ETUF and it is committed to handling trade union organizations and unions federations in full objectivity. Furthermore, with regard to the ITUC allegation that a court in the city of Helwan sentenced Kamal Abbas, the general coordinator of the Centre for Trade Union and Worker Services (CTUWS), to six months' imprisonment on 26 February 2012 because he denounced Ismail Ibrahim Fahmy, Acting President of the ETUF, while delivering a speech to the International Labour Conference (ILC) in 2011, the Government indicates that: (1) Ismail Fahmy initiated a lawsuit against Kamal Abbas for being insulted during the ILC and the court sentenced Mr Abbas in absentia to six months' imprisonment, according to the law; and (2) Mr Abbas appealed against the sentence, and appeared before the court, which automatically dropped the sentence. Recalling the importance of freedom of expression in the full exercise of freedom of association, as set out in the 1970 resolution concerning Trade Union Rights and Their Relation to Civil Liberties, the Committee welcomes the information that the court has cancelled Mr Abbas' sentence. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it has not received any notifications on specific incidents of violence alleged by the ITUC and that it is committed to referring any violations or allegations with respect to the use of violence against strikes to a tripartite committee for its examination and the adoption of legal measures. The Committee once again requests the Government to submit the ITUC allegations to which it has replied to a tripartite committee for their examination and provide information in this respect.

Legislative issues. The Committee recalls that for several years it has been commenting on the discrepancies between the Convention and the national legislation, namely Trade Union Act No. 35 of 1976, as amended by Act No. 12 of 1995, and Labour Code No. 12 of 2003, with regard to the following points:

- the institutionalization of a single trade union system under Act No. 35 of 1976 (as amended by Act No. 12 of 1995), and in particular sections 7, 13, 14, 17 and 52;
- the control granted by law to higher level trade union organizations, and particularly the Confederation of Trade Unions, over the nomination and election procedures to the executive committees of trade unions, under the terms of sections 41, 42 and 43 of Act No. 35 (as amended by Act No. 12);
- the control exercised by the Confederation of Trade Unions over the financial management of trade unions, by virtue of sections 62 and 65 of Act No. 35 (as amended by Act No. 12);
- the removal from office of the executive committee of a trade union which has provoked work stoppages or absenteeism in a public service or community services (section 70(2)(b) of Act No. 35 of 1976);
- the requirement of the prior approval of the Confederation of Trade Unions for the organization of strike action, under section 14(i) of the same Act;
- restrictions on the right to strike and recourse to compulsory arbitration in services which are not essential in the strict sense of the term (sections 179, 187, 193 and 194 of the Labour Code); and
- penalties for breaches of section 194 of the Labour Code (section 69(9) of the Code).

The Committee notes that the Government indicates that it is paying attention to bringing the Trade Unions Act and the Labour Code into conformity with the provisions of the Convention and that all regulations are currently being prepared for their submission to the new Parliament. In particular, it indicates that in March 2011, it issued the "Freedom of Association Declaration" which reiterates the observance of all ratified international Conventions, including Convention No. 87, as well as the freedom of establishing trade union organizations. After the promulgation of this Declaration, a large number of new trade union organizations and several trade union federations, which group more than one general union, and/or trade union committee, were set up.

The Committee further notes the Government's indications with respect to the draft freedom of association law that: (1) the previous Parliament was annulled by virtue of a judicial decision rendered by the Constitutional Court in June 2012, which hindered the completion of the discussion or the promulgation of the draft law which had been passed by the Egyptian Cabinet on 2 November 2011; (2) societal dialogue process aimed at promulgating the freedom of association law is still ongoing (to this end, a high-level meeting was held in September 2012, which included the Minister of Manpower and Migration, the Secretary of State for Legal Affairs in addition to the former Ministers of Manpower (Dr Ahmed El Bor'ai and Mr Refaat Hassan), and the Director of the ILO in Cairo); (3) the Government is examining several options with respect to the substance of the law and with respect to the procedural alternatives which are available for its promulgation in the absence of Parliament, and the fact that the President is the person who assumes the legislative power temporarily, until the election of a new Parliament; and (4) it is expected that the draft law will be submitted to the Council of Ministers for its adoption and its referral to the President who is currently acting in a legislative capacity. This will be followed by holding new workers' elections based on the texts of the new law which will apply to trade union organizations in Egypt. Concerning the ITUC's allegations on the draft law, the Government indicates that it refutes the allegations that it is not in conformity with the provisions of Convention No. 87 as this is considered to be in anticipation of events, and an interference in Egypt's internal affairs. The Committee expects that the draft will have taken into account its previous comments, recalls that the Government may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in respect of all the matters raised above, and requests the Government to transmit the current draft so that it may consider its conformity with the Convention.

Recalling its previous comments concerning the Decree of Law No. 34 (2011) adopted on 12 April 2011 by the President of the Supreme Council of Armed Forces which provided for sanctions, including of imprisonment, against any person who "during the prevalence of the state of emergency, makes a stand or undertakes an activity that results in the prevention of, obstruction, or hindering a State's institution or a public authority or a public or private working organization from performing its work" or who "incites, invites or promotes [such activity]", the Committee notes with satisfaction the Government's indication that as of 31 May 2012, the state of emergency has been lifted and that since this Decree stated clearly that it applied only during the prevalence of the state of emergency, it is no longer applicable.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equatorial Guinea

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee again recalls that it has been asking the Government for a number of years to: (i) amend section 5 of Act No. 12/1992, which provides that employees' organizations may be occupational or sectoral – so that workers may, if they so desire, establish enterprise trade unions; (ii) amend section 10 of Act No. 12/1992, which provides that for an occupational association to obtain legal personality it must, inter alia, have a minimum of 50 employees – so as to reduce the number of workers required to a reasonable level; (iii) confirm that, as a result of a revision of the Fundamental Act in 1995 (Act No. 1 of 1995), the right to strike is recognized in public utilities and is exercised under the conditions laid down by law; (iv) provide information on the services deemed to be essential, and on how the minimum services to be ensured are determined, as provided for in section 37 of Act No. 12/1992; (v) state whether public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State enjoy the right to strike (section 58 of the Fundamental Act).

The Committee again urges the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation in order to bring it into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention and to send information in its next report on any measures taken or contemplated in this respect. The Committee expresses the strong hope that the Government will take all possible steps without delay to resume a constructive dialogue with the ILO.

Finally, the Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 4 August 2011, on the application of the Convention and the persistent refusal to register various trade unions, namely the Trade Union of Workers of Equatorial Guinea (UST), the Independent Services Union (SIS), the Teachers' Trade Union Association (ASD) and the Agricultural Workers' Organization (OTC). The Committee recalls once again that the discretionary power of the competent authority to grant or reject a registration request is tantamount to the requirement for previous authorization, which is not compatible with Article 2 of the Convention (see the 1994 General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 74). Under these conditions, the Committee once again urges the Government to register without delay those trade unions which have fulfilled the legal requirements and to provide information in this respect in its next report.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee observes that, in its communication dated 31 July 2012, the ITUC reiterates its previous comments.

The Committee further notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 4 of the Convention. Collective bargaining. The Committee notes the comments of 4 August 2011 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), on the repeated refusal to recognize a number of trade unions, namely the Workers' Union of Equatorial Guinea (UST), the Independent Service Union (SIS), the Teachers' Trade Union Association (ASD) and the Rural Workers' Organization (OTC), and the lack of a legal framework for the development of collective bargaining. The Committee again stresses that the existence of trade unions established freely by workers is a prerequisite for the application of the Convention. The Committee urges the Government once again to adopt the necessary measures without delay to create appropriate conditions for the establishment of trade unions that are able to engage in collective bargaining with a view to regulating conditions of employment.

Article 6. Right of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State to engage in collective bargaining. The Committee notes that, according to ITUC's comments, the right of workers in the public administration to establish trade unions has still not been recognized in law, despite the fact that section 6 of the Act on Trade Unions and Collective Labour Relations, No. 12/1992, provides that the right to organize of employees in the public administration shall be regulated by a special law. The Committee notes that the ITUC also indicates that the legal framework for collective bargaining is deficient and ambiguous. The Committee urges the Government to indicate whether a special law has been adopted and whether it establishes the right to organize and to collective bargaining of workers in the public administration, and asks it to send detailed information on the application of the Convention to public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee reminds the Government that it may seek technical assistance on this matter from the Office, and expresses the firm hope that it will take without delay all measures within its reach to resume constructive dialogue with the ILO.

Part V of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee asks the Government to send statistics of the number of employers' and workers' organizations, the number of collective agreements concluded with these organizations and the number of workers and the sectors covered.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC dated 31 July 2012, reiterating its previous comments.

Eritrea

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2000)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination and interference. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to amend the Labour Proclamation to provide for the reinstatement of trade union leaders in cases of unjustified dismissal (section 28(3) of the Proclamation), and also for protection against other prejudicial acts and acts of anti-union discrimination against workers affiliated to a trade union. In its last report, the Government once again indicates that the Ministry of Labour and Human Welfare consulted several studies to amend section 23 of the Labour Proclamation with a view to broadening protection, both from all acts of anti-union discrimination and from any dismissal relating to trade union activity or membership. The Committee once again expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures without delay to amend the Labour Proclamation in this regard.

Sanctions applicable in cases of anti-union discrimination or acts of interference. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled that the fine of 1,200 Eritrean nakfa (ERN), established in section 156 of the Labour Proclamation as a penalty for anti-union discrimination or acts of interference, is not severe and dissuasive enough as a means of protection and requested it to take necessary measures to provide heavier and more dissuasive sanctions. The Committee notes that in its last report the Government reiterates that sections 703 and 721 of the Transitional Penal Code would apply in the event of repeated violations of the right to organize established in the national legislation, though to date no sentences have been handed down for such violations. The Government also indicates that it is working with the social partners to amend section 156. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in amending section 156 of the Labour Proclamation so as to provide heavier and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against persons guilty of anti-union discrimination or acts of interference.

Articles 1, 2, 4 and 6. Domestic workers. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed the firm hope that the next regulation on domestic work will explicitly extend the trade union rights enshrined in the Convention to domestic workers. The Committee notes the Government's indication that domestic workers are not excluded from the definition contained in section 3 of the Labour Proclamation and therefore do have the right to organize and to collective bargaining. Furthermore, the Government indicates that it will take all necessary measures to adopt a regulation that is consistent with the Convention. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that, in the interest of legal certainty, the new regulation on domestic work will explicitly grant the rights enshrined in the Convention to domestic workers and that the Government will be in a position to indicate the adoption of the above regulation in its next report.

Article 6. Right to collective bargaining in the public sector. In its previous comments the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to improve its legislation on public servants in respect of the rights enshrined in the Convention including the right to collective bargaining of public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee notes the Government's indication that public servants are split into two categories, those who work in the Central Personnel Administration (CPA) and those who work in public or semi-public enterprises. The latter are covered by the Labour Proclamation and therefore, like other workers, have the right to organize and to collective bargaining established in the Labour Proclamation. Regarding CPA workers, the Government indicates that the draft Public Service Code provides for the right to organize. However, the Government indicates that up to now no collective bargaining has been undertaken between the Government and these workers on the question of wages or other privileges. The Committee hopes that the new Public Service Code will explicitly recognize for public servants in the CPA, the rights enshrined in the Convention, particularly the right to collective bargaining of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State and that the Government will be in a position to indicate the adoption of the above Code in its next report.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the observations of 31 July 2012 from the International Trade Union Confederation's (ITUC) reporting that in practice there is no collective bargaining in Eritrea. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in response to the ITUC's allegations. More generally, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken to promote the development of collective bargaining in the private and public sectors and to indicate collective agreements signed, the sectors concerned and the number of workers covered.

Ethiopia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee also notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), in a communication dated 31 July 2012, and by Education International (EI), in collaboration with the National Teachers' Association (NTA), in a communication dated 31 August 2012, which refer to issues pending before this Committee and the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) in Case No. 2516 (exclusion of various categories of workers, primarily in the public sector, from the right to form and join trade unions, lack of independent investigations of serious violations of trade unionists' rights). The Committee notes the latest conclusions and recommendations of the CFA in this case (see 365th Report, November 2012, paragraphs 681–692). It also notes the Government's reply to the previous comments of the ITUC and EI.

Teachers' associations. In its previous comments, the Committee had urged the Government to ensure that the NTA is registered without delay so that teachers may fully exercise their right to form organizations for furthering and defending teachers' occupational interests. The Committee notes with regret that the Government merely reiterates in its report the information it had previously provided to this Committee and to the CFA in Case No. 2516. The Committee notes the latest conclusions and recommendations of the CFA which are relevant in this regard, in particular in relation to the Charities and Societies Proclamation and with regard to the question of the registration of the NTA. While noting that in the past the Government has indicated that, in order to be registered, the NTA should revise its application in accordance with the Charities and Societies Proclamation, the Committee reiterates its comments concerning this Proclamation. Deploring that more than three years after the NTA's request for registration, this organization is still not registered, the Committee is bound to recall, once again, that the right to official recognition through legal registration is an essential facet of the right to organize, since that is the first step that workers' or employers' organizations must take in order to be able to function efficiently, and represent their members adequately. The Committee strongly urges the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure that the appropriate authorities register the NTA without further delay so that teachers may fully exercise their right to form organizations of their own choosing for the furthering and defence of teachers' occupational interests. It requests the Government to provide information on the concrete steps taken in this regard.

Civil servants and employees of the state administration. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that neither the Labour Proclamation nor the Civil Servant Proclamation was guaranteeing civil servants and employees of the state administration the exercise of their freedom of association rights. The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report does not indicate that progress has been made in this regard. The Government merely reiterates its previous statement that: (1) the country is under a comprehensive civil service reform programme which will guarantee the rights of all citizens in the country, including civil servants; (2) the right of workers, including civil servants, to form an association is enshrined under article 42 of the Constitution; (3) civil servants can organize under professional associations; and (4) public school teachers are presently enjoying the enabling environment to exercise their constitutional right to form an association, as most have, by being members of the Ethiopian Teachers Association (ETA). In relation to this latter point, the Committee wishes to recall that the right of workers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing in full freedom cannot be said to exist unless such freedom is fully established and respected in law and in practice, and that this implies, in particular, the effective possibility for forming and joining organizations independent of those which already exist in the country. The Committee urges the Government to take, without delay, concrete measures, including in the framework of the civil service reform, in order to fully guarantee the right of civil servants, including teachers in public schools, and employees of the state administration, to establish and join organizations of their own choosing for the promotion and defence of their occupational interests. It requests the Government to provide information on progress made in this respect.

Labour Proclamation (2003)

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish organizations. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to ensure the right to organize of the following categories of workers who were excluded, by section 3, from the scope of application of the Labour Proclamation: workers whose employment relations arise out of a contract concluded for the purpose of upbringing, treatment, care, rehabilitation, education, training (other than apprenticeship); workers under contract of personal service for non-profit-making purposes; managerial employees; and judges and prosecutors. The Committee notes the Government's indications that: (1) it is studying the question of this first category of workers, so that these employment relations could be part of the Labour Proclamation; (2) the process of preparing the regulation governing the conditions of work of workers under contract of personal service for non-profit-making purposes has not yet been finalized; (3) it is examining the necessity of setting a regulation to address the working conditions of managerial employees, including the right to form an organization; and (4) the Constitution guarantees the right to organize for any lawful purposes or causes and that, accordingly, judges and prosecutors are able to form associations of their own. The Committee trusts that the necessary measures will be taken, without delay, to ensure that the abovementioned categories of workers enjoy the rights afforded by the Convention, and that the necessary technical assistance of the Office, requested by the Government, will be provided in the near future. It requests the Government to provide information on all progress made in this respect, as well as on any existing organizations of workers in these various sectors.

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programme. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend the following sections of the Labour Proclamation: section 136(2), concerning the list of essential services in which strike action is prohibited; sections 143(2) and 160(1), concerning conciliation and arbitration procedures; and section 158(3), relating to the quorum and majority required to initiate a strike. The Committee notes the Government's indication concerning the list of essential services that it may not be very far from considering the issue. It also notes the Government's indications in relation to the intention behind sections 143(2) and 160(1), as well as its remarks concerning the required quorum and majority established in section 158(3). The Committee expresses the hope that the necessary measures will be taken, without delay, and in full consultation with the social partners, to amend the abovementioned sections of the Labour Proclamation, to bring it into conformity with the principles that the Committee has been recalling in its previous comments. It requests the Government to provide information on all progress made in this respect.

Cancellation of registration (section 120 of the Labour Proclamation). The Committee notes the Government's indication that the cancellation of registration of an organization (which used to be an administrative measure) is now a decision taken by the competent court, to which the matter is referred by the ministry. The Committee once again requests the Government to ensure that the provisions of the Labour Proclamation which, as noted above, restrict the right of workers to organize their activities, are not invoked to cancel an organization's registration pursuant to section 120(1)(c) until they have been brought into conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures, without delay, to bring the legislation and practice into full conformity with the Convention, and to provide detailed information in its next report on the progress made thereon, as well as on the time frame for such action. The Committee encourages the Government to seek technical assistance from the Office on all the issues raised in its comments.

Fiji

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2002)

Comments of workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 31 July and 31 August 2012, on the application of the Convention. It further notes the communication of the Fiji Mine Workers Union (FMWU) of 19 September 2012, concerning matters examined by the Committee in the framework of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organization of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

ILO direct contacts mission. The Committee notes the latest conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) in the framework of Case No. 2723 concerning, inter alia, acts of assault, harassment, intimidation and arrest of trade unionists, in particular, that it expresses its grave concern that the ILO direct contacts mission that visited Fiji in September 2012, was not allowed to continue its work, and that it draws the Governing Body's attention to the extreme seriousness and urgency of the issues involved in this case. The Committee deeply regrets this loss of opportunity to clarify the facts and assist the Government and the social partners in finding appropriate solutions to the issues raised by the Committee and the CFA. It hopes that a new mission may visit the country in the near future in order to deal with the matters examined by the ILO supervisory bodies.

Trade union rights and civil liberties. The Committee reiterates its great concern about the numerous acts of assault, harassment, intimidation and arrest of trade union leaders and members for their exercise of the right to freedom of association, previously reported by the ITUC and Education International (EI).

Acts of assault. Concerning the alleged physical attacks on several trade unionists, the Committee notes the Government's statement that: (i) to date, neither the Police Department nor the Office of Public Prosecutions has received any complaint filed by Mr Felix Anthony or Mr Mohammed Khalil for the alleged physical assaults, and investigations have thus not been initiated; and (ii) internal legal mechanisms within the country itself have therefore not been fully utilized by these two persons.

The Committee recalls that the resolution concerning trade union rights and their relation to civil liberties, adopted by the International Labour Conference (ILC) at its 54th Session in 1970, lists as first among the liberties essential for the normal exercise of trade union rights the right "to freedom and security of person" since this fundamental right is crucial to the effective exercise of all other liberties, in particular, freedom of association. The Committee once again emphasizes that it has always considered that, in the event of assaults on the physical or moral integrity of individuals, an independent judicial inquiry should be instituted immediately with a view to fully clarifying the facts, determining responsibility, punishing those responsible and preventing the repetition of such acts. Moreover, as regards allegations of the physical ill-treatment of trade unionists, the Committee has always recalled that governments should give precise instructions and apply effective sanctions where cases of ill-treatment are found. The absence of judgments against the guilty parties creates, in practice, a situation of impunity, which reinforces the climate of violence and insecurity, and which is extremely damaging to the exercise of trade union rights. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take all necessary measures without delay to ensure the full respect of the above principles. It also urges the Government, even if the victims have lodged a complaint in the meantime, to conduct ex officio an independent investigation without delay into the alleged acts of assault, harassment and intimidation against Mr Felix Anthony, National Secretary of the Fiji Trades Union Congress (FTUC) and General Secretary of the Fiji Sugar Workers; Mr Mohammed Khalil,

President of the Fiji Sugar and General Workers Union (FSGWU) – Ba Branch; Mr Attar Singh, General Secretary of the Fiji Islands Council of Trade Unions (FICTU); Mr Taniela Tabu, General Secretary of the Viti National Union of Taukei Workers (VNUTW); and Mr Anand Singh, lawyer. The Committee requests the Government to transmit detailed information with regard to the outcome of such inquiry and the action taken as a result. With particular regard to the reported act of assault against a union leader in retaliation for statements made by his colleague at the ILC in 2011, the Committee reiterates that the functioning of the Conference would risk being considerably hampered and the freedom of speech of the workers' and employers' delegates paralysed if the relevant delegates or their associates were victims of assault or arrest due to the expression of views at the Conference. It urges the Government to ensure that no trade unionist suffers retaliation for the exercise of freedom of expression.

Arrest and detention. With respect to the arrested trade unionists (Mr Felix Anthony, Mr Daniel Urai, and Mr Nitendra Goundar), the Committee notes that the ITUC indicates that Mr Daniel Urai, the FTUC President, has two cases pending in court which have still not been heard: one for preparing union members for collective bargaining and the other one for having allegedly incited political violence by urging to overthrow the Government; and that, in the first case which is pending for almost a year, the prosecution has not been able to produce the required disclosures including the identification of the complainant.

The Committee also notes the Government's summary of events: (i) Mr Nitendra Goundar and Mr Daniel Urai convened and conducted a meeting with the Hotel Workers' Union at the Mana Island Resort on 3 August 2011, without the appropriate permit under the Public Emergency Regulations (PER) and allegedly made inciting remarks against the Government of Fiji; (ii) police arrested the two trade unionists and detained them for questioning in the conference room of the Nadi police station for one day; (iii) Mr Goundar and Mr Urai were charged on 4 August 2011 for breaches under the PER; (iv) by their own admission, they erred by not applying for the relevant permit to hold a public meeting but denied allegations that they made statements against the current Government; (v) at no time were the two unionists coerced, threatened or assaulted; and (vi) the hearing of the case is scheduled on 4 June 2012.

While having previously noted that Mr Felix Anthony, Mr Daniel Urai, and Mr Nitendra Goundar had been released from custody, the Committee notes with concern that the criminal charges of unlawful assembly brought against Mr Goundar and Mr Urai on the grounds of failure to observe the terms of the PER are still pending. The Committee considers that, while being engaged in trade union activities does not confer immunity from sanctions under ordinary criminal law, the authorities should not use legitimate trade union activities as a pretext for arbitrary arrest or detention or criminal charges. With respect to the abovementioned trade unionists, the Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all charges against them are immediately dropped, and to provide information of any developments in this regard without delay, including the outcome of the case hearing that the Committee understands has been deferred. The Committee also recalls that the arrest and detention, even for short periods, of trade union leaders and members, engaged in their legitimate trade union activities constitute a grave violation of the principles of freedom of association (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 31). It urges the Government to take full account of this principle in the future.

Restrictions to freedom of assembly and expression. Furthermore, in regard to its previous comments relating to freedom of assembly and expression, the Committee notes the ITUC's view that many of the powers found in the recently repealed PER are included and expanded in the 2012 Public Order (Amendment) Decree (POAD); in particular, the ITUC criticizes the broad definition of "act of terrorism" that could be used for charging trade unions, the increased prison sentence of up to five years for holding a meeting without permission and the circumstances in which the police may refuse a permit. The Committee, moreover, notes the additional allegations that: (i) while union meetings are currently being held with greater frequency, the authorities (police) are selective in their responses to the permissions sought for meetings; (ii) police scrutinize meeting agendas and the content of speeches before they issue any permits; (iii) the FTUC Assistant National Secretary, Rajeshwar Singh, who represents the FTUC on the Air Terminal Services (ATS) Board was removed from the Board on 31 December 2011 by the Government on the grounds that he had a meeting with Australian trade unionists and allegedly called for a boycott; and (iv) freedom of expression is being limited, for example, in April 2012, a daily newspaper has refused to print a paid advertisement from the FTUC on Labour Day for fear of reprisal from the regime.

The Committee takes due note of the Government's indication that: (i) the PER have been lifted as of 7 January 2012 and that Fiji is once again guided by the Public Order Act as modernized through the POAD, which is an important step in the ongoing elaboration of the new constitution; (ii) notwithstanding the above, the PER did not prohibit trade unions from holding public meetings so long as they abided by the conditions required; (iii) over the last five years, the Government has approved numerous meeting permits; and (iv) today in Fiji, trade unions under the Public Order Act are holding meetings and conducting their important work in promoting the rights and well-being of workers in Fiji.

While welcoming the lifting of the emergency legislation in the form of the PER on 7 January 2012, the Committee notes with concern certain provisions of the Public Order Act as amended by the POAD, in particular, the new subsection (5) of section 8, according to which "the appropriate authority may, in its discretion, refuse to grant a permit under this section to any person or organization that has on any previous occasion been refused a permit by virtue of any written law or, to any person or organization that has on any previous occasion failed to comply with any conditions imposed with respect to any meeting or procession or assembly, or any person or organization which has on any previous occasion organized any meeting or procession or assembly which has prejudiced peace, public safety and good order and/or which has engaged in racial or religious vilification or undermined or sabotaged or attempted to undermine or sabotage the economy or financial integrity of Fiji". The Committee considers that the wording of this provision could be used in such a way as to make it difficult for trade unions to hold public meetings, especially given the previous allegations of the use of the PER to restrict their rights in this regard. It once again recalls that the right of assembly, freedom of opinion and expression and, in particular, freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers, constitute civil liberties which are essential for the normal exercise of trade union rights (ILC resolution concerning trade union rights and their relation to civil liberties, adopted at the 54th Session, 1970). Welcoming the decision to temporarily suspend the application of section 8 of the Public Order Act as amended, the Committee requests the Government to consider abrogation or amendment of the POAD so as to ensure that the right to assembly may be freely exercised. The Committee urges the Government once again to take full account of the principles announced above in the future and refrain from unduly impeding the lawful exercise of trade union rights in practice. With regard to Mr Rajeshwar Singh, FTUC Assistant National Secretary, the Committee is of the view that addressing trade unions abroad is part of the normal exercise of trade union rights. It requests the Government to reinstate him in his position representing workers' interests on the ATS Board.

Legislative issues. Essential National Industries Decree No. 35 of 2011. The Committee had previously urged the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the provisions of the Essential National Industries Decree without delay, in full consultation with the social partners, so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention. It notes that, in the view of the ITUC, the Decree continues to devastate trade unions in the covered sectors. The Committee observes that, in the framework of Case No. 2723, the CFA has recalled its previous conclusion that numerous provisions of the Decree and its implementing regulations give rise to serious violations of the principles on freedom of association and collective bargaining, for example, section 6 (cancellation of all existing trade union registrations in essential national industries); sections 10–12 (unions to apply to the Prime Minister to be elected as bargaining unit representative; determination by the Prime Minister of composition and scope of a bargaining unit for election purposes; conduct and supervision of elections by the Registrar); section 14 (50 per cent plus one necessary for a union to be registered as representative of the bargaining unit); section 7 (union officials to be employees of the relevant company); section 27 (providing for serious restrictions of the right to strike); section 26 (lack of judicial recourse for rights disputes; compulsory arbitration by the Government of disputes beyond a certain financial threshold); section 24(4) (prohibition of automatic dues deduction for workers in essential national industries).

The Committee welcomes that, according to the report of the direct contacts mission, within the framework of the current process of developing a new non-race based constitution for Fiji to be ready by early 2013 through an inclusive national dialogue paving the way to the first democratic elections scheduled in 2014, and in view of the fact that the new Constitution will reflect the eight fundamental ILO Conventions and that national labour legislation will need to be compatible with it, the tripartite Employment Relations Advisory Board (ERAB) subcommittee has been tasked with the review of all existing Government decrees relating to labour in terms of their conformity with the ILO fundamental Conventions. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the ERAB subcommittee, the last meeting of which took place on 13 August 2012, is expected to be reconvened with the views of the Public Service Commission (PSC) and the Attorney-General, and that the work of the ERAB and its subcommittee is anticipated to be concluded by October 2012. The Committee further welcomes that, according to the CFA conclusions in the framework of Case No. 2723, the ERAB subcommittee agreed, as stated by the complainant, to delete most of the provisions of the Essential National Industries Decree considered as offending. The Committee trusts that the measures agreed by the tripartite ERAB subcommittee will be actively pursued and given effect in the near future, so as to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention, and requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Noting with deep concern that, according to the ITUC, public sector unions and unions representing "essential national industries" face serious financial difficulties or even struggle for survival due to the discontinued check-off facility, the Committee observes that, in the framework of Case No. 2723, the CFA has considered that the withdrawal of a facility of existential importance to unions that was previously granted could, in the current context, be viewed as another attempt to weaken the Fiji trade union movement. The Committee underlines that the withdrawal of the check-off facility, which could lead to financial difficulties for trade union organizations, is not conducive to the development of harmonious industrial relations. The Committee therefore requests the Government to make the necessary arrangements to ensure that the check-off facility is fully reactivated in the public sector and the sectors considered as essential national industries.

Employment Relations Promulgation of 2007 (ERP). The Committee previously commented on the necessity to amend the following provisions of the ERP in order to bring them into conformity with the Convention.

- section 3(2) so as to ensure that prison guards enjoy the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing;
- section 125(1)(a) so as to ensure that refusals to register an organization under the said section are determined on the basis of objective criteria. While noting that the Government indicates that since 2007 the Registrar has never refused any trade union application to register under the ERP, the Committee still considers that this provision

- confers upon the authorities excessively wide discretionary powers in deciding whether or not an organization meets all the conditions for registration;
- section 119(2), in order to enable workers exercising more than one occupational activity in different occupations or sectors to join the corresponding trade unions as full members. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, all Fijian trade unions have agreed to the one-union policy per person in the context of all other rights that have been packaged under the ERP. The Committee considers that demanding that workers belong to no more than one union, in order to sign an application for registration, may unduly infringe upon the right of workers to join organizations of their choosing;
 - section 127, which provides that officers of a registered trade union must have been engaged or occupied for a period of not less than six months in an industry, trade or occupation with which the union is directly concerned; and forbids non-citizens to be trade union officers;
 - section 184 so as to ensure that the issue of the expulsion from the trade union of members for refusal to participate in a strike is left to trade union constitutions and rules. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the trade unions themselves, citing the fact that they do not have the capacity to resolve internal grievances amongst themselves, requested the Registrar to become involved in these cases. Whilst preferring that unions independently resolve their issues for fear that its participation may be perceived by the ILO to be interference into trade union matters, the Registrar at the behest of the unions has successfully mediated and facilitated the resolution of some of these cases. The Committee notes this information but considers that it should ultimately be up to the trade unions concerned to decide on the expulsion or sanctions against its members, regardless of the invoked reasons;
 - section 128, so as to ensure that only complaints filed by a certain fixed percentage of union members may give rise to an inspection of union accounts. The Committee takes note of the Government's statement that the current practice is consistent with the ILO Recommendations, since the good governance oversight, which is necessary because trade unions in Fiji receive public funds from their members for their daily operations, is only activated when serious complaints of abuse of such funds are raised with the Registrar, or when the audited accounts reveal significant anomalies that warrant investigations. However, the Committee must recall that a provision which grants authorities the power to examine the books of an organization at any time, unless there is a complaint from a certain percentage of the trade union members, infringes the Convention;
 - section 175(3)(b) so as to ensure that, only a simple majority of the votes cast in a strike ballot is required. The Committee notes the Government's indication that this has been agreed by all trade unions and unanimously passed by Fiji's multiparty Government and the Lower House in 2006. In these circumstances, the Committee must once again recall that although a ballot requirement does not, in principle, raise problems of compatibility with the Convention, the quorum and the majority required should not be such that the exercise of the right to strike becomes very difficult, or even impossible in practice. If a member State deems it appropriate to establish in its legislation provisions which require a vote by workers before a strike can be held, it should ensure that account is taken only of the votes cast and that the required quorum and majority are fixed at a reasonable level;
 - section 180 so as to ensure that responsibility for declaring a strike illegal lies with an independent body which has the confidence of the parties involved. It notes that the Government shares the sentiment of the ILO and that the independence element of this provision is currently under scrutiny by the ERAB subcommittee;
 - sections 169, 170, 181(c) and 191(1)(c), so as to ensure that their cumulative effects do not amount to compulsory arbitration. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the policy design of the ERP integrates both the promotion of good faith employment relations and productivity improvement. In practice, this means that those who create employment grievances or disputes have the primary responsibility to solve them and not the State. However, when the parties have exhausted this internal resolution process with good faith, for effective governance, especially in the context of financial global economic crisis, either party to the dispute or the State has to be accorded the right to refer the unresolved dispute to the State mechanism so that the dispute can be amicably resolved speedily without adverse effects to the nation as a whole. In this regard, the referral is not perceived as compulsory, and the system is working very effectively. Nonetheless, the Committee's request is under discussion at the ERAB subcommittee;
 - section 256(a), which, when read with section 250, provides for a possible penalty of imprisonment in case of the staging of an unlawful strike. The Committee notes the Government's statement that it takes note of the ILO position in this matter and is willing to review these provisions through the tripartite dialogue in the ERAB subcommittee. However, the Government indicates that, prior to the ERP, trade unions have abused this right to strike provision due to bad faith and the lack of a deterrent mechanism, and that, while fully recognizing the right of workers to go on strike as effectively protected under the ERP, the Government is bound to also include effective deterrents for those who abuse this right. The Committee wishes to recall that no penal sanctions should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike, and therefore that measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where, during a strike, violence against persons or property, or other serious infringements of penal law have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts, such as the Penal Code.

The Committee welcomes the Government's indication that a national peak tripartite body, the ERAB, is responsible for any amendments to the ERP, and that a tripartite subcommittee of the ERAB has been given the mandate to look into the need for any amendments to the ERP and is going through all proposals for amendments before submitting them to the Board for endorsement. The Government expresses the hope to conclude the amendment process in 2012, reiterates its commitment to honour its obligations under the core ILO Conventions in the new Constitution and states that this proactive and inclusive social dialogue in the labour market through the tripartite ERAB to review current labour market policies, laws, institutions and practices is a vital part of the Government's wider national dialogue in the development of Fiji's modern and non-discriminatory Constitution to be in place early 2013, paving the way for the general election in 2014. The Committee trusts that the issues raised above will be part of the deliberations of the ERAB subcommittee and that, in the framework of this exercise, due account will be taken of the Committee's comments with a view to bringing the ERP into conformity with the Convention. It requests the Government to indicate, in its next report, the results of the ERAB's deliberations.

Decrees relating to the public sector. The Committee previously noted that the Employment Relations (Amendment Decree) No. 21 excluded 15,000 public service workers from the coverage of the ERP who thus lost overnight their fundamental and other trade union rights, and urged the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure that public servants enjoy the guarantees enshrined in the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, since the passing of the Public Service (Amendment) Decree (Decree No. 36), all public servants in Fiji enjoy similar employment safeguard mechanisms as those foreseen in the ERP for the private sector. The Committee welcomes the adoption of the Public Service (Amendment) Decree, which, after the exclusion of public servants from the ERP, restores the protection of their fundamental rights including trade union rights.

The Committee had also noted that the State Services Decree No. 6 of 2009, the Administration of Justice Decrees Nos 9 and 10 of 2009 and No. 14 of 2010 as amended and the Employment Relations (Amendment) Decree No. 21 of 2011 issued by the Government, collectively eliminated the access of workers in the public service to the judicial or administrative review of any executive decision concerning the public service (including on terms and conditions of employment of public servants) and other selected sectors; and terminated any pending or ongoing judicial or administrative proceedings in this regard filed by any individual or organization against the State. The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (i) civil servants have recourse to the High Court of Fiji by way of judicial review should they be unsatisfied with the decision of the PSC Disciplinary Committee; in this regard, the Government refers to the judgment of the State v. Permanent Secretary for Works, Transport and Public Utilities ex parte Rusiate Tubunuarua & Ors HBJ01 of 2012, where the High Court ruled that it has full jurisdiction to accept cases from public servants who seek to challenge a decision of the Government or the PSC; and (ii) to facilitate speedy resolutions of employment grievances and disputes, the PSC has implemented a new internal grievance policy that includes the appointment of conciliators within government Ministries and Departments. The Committee welcomes the decision recently rendered by the High Court and the new PSC internal grievance policy. It requests the Government to supply a copy of the High Court decision and to take all necessary measures to ensure that, in practice, all public servants may also have recourse to administrative review of decisions or actions of Government entities. Moreover, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the relevant mechanisms currently available to public servants to address collective grievances, and to indicate the results of the review by the tripartite ERAB subcommittee of all existing Government decrees relating to the public service in terms of their conformity with the ILO fundamental Conventions.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1974)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 31 July and 31 August 2012. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon. It also notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike in a communication dated 29 August 2012 which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee further notes the latest conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) in the framework of Case No. 2723, in particular, that it expresses its grave concern that the ILO Direct Contacts Mission that visited Fiji in September 2012 was not allowed to continue its work, and that it draws the Governing Body's attention to the extreme seriousness and urgency of the issues involved in this case. The Committee deeply regrets this loss of opportunity to clarify the facts and assist the Government and the social partners in finding appropriate solutions in conformity with freedom of association and collective bargaining principles. The Committee hopes that the Direct Contacts Mission may return to the country in the near future within the framework of the mandate bestowed upon it.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. With reference to the dispute in the Vatukoula Mining Company (concerning the refusal to recognize a union and the dismissal of striking workers 15 years ago), the Committee previously took note of the Government's statement that various measures had been taken with regard to the redundant miners of the company, including the striking workers of the Fiji Mine Workers Union (FMWU), in particular, important amounts of money granted for the purpose of rehabilitation or social assistance, re-employment by the new owner, etc. The Committee had also noted with concern that, according to the FMWU, the above information provided by the Government was simply not true, and had requested the Government to engage in exploratory talks with FMWU representatives with a view to reaching a mutually satisfactory settlement. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, in 2007, it allocated US$600,000 towards the rehabilitation of the redundant miners in the Vatukoula Gold Mine which also included members of the FMWU. The two priority areas for assistance were tertiary education for miners' children and small and micro-enterprise development for the livelihood of the miners' families. According to the Government, the Vatukoula Gold Mines Deed has been signed on 7 December 2009 by the Government and the company, which will see the setting up of the Social Assistance Trust Fund which will benefit around 800 people including the striking workers of the FMWU; the establishment of the Fund would mean that the company would contribute approximately US$6 million over the next five years, i.e. US$1.5 million three months from the initial set-up of this Trust Fund. The Government states that it is fully committed to resolving the long pending grievances of the striking workers that were members of the FMWU. In addition, the first payment from the US$6 million Vatukoula Trust Fund has begun in April 2012, and the payout to mine workers made redundant in 2006 was completed. The Vatukoula Trust Fund Committee screened about 600 applicants and the Government is awaiting the final list of recipients. More than 200 recipients are residing in Vatukoula while the rest are now scattered in other parts of the country. The Committee notes however that, according to the submission of the FMWU received on 19 September 2012, there has been apparently no improvement in the situation. The Committee urges the Government to engage with the FMWU representatives with a view to implementing, without any further delay, a mutually satisfactory settlement for assistance to help the remaining workers re-establish themselves, in particular, by ensuring that they are adequately compensated via the Vatukoula Trust Fund in the very near future. It trusts that, after 22 years, this long-standing dispute which has caused great hardship to the dismissed workers will finally and equitably be resolved.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. Essential National Industries Decree No. 35 of 2011. The Committee notes that, in the view of the ITUC, the Decree continues to negatively affect trade unions in the covered sectors. Observing that, in the framework of Case No. 2723, the CFA has recalled its previous conclusion that numerous provisions of the Essential National Industries Decree and its implementing regulations, give rise to serious violations of the principles on freedom of association and collective bargaining, the Committee considers that the following provisions are not in conformity with the Convention:

- Bargaining unit. According to section 2, “bargaining unit” means a group of at least 75 workers employed by the same employer who perform similar types of work. The Committee notes that, according to the ITUC, this is one of the provisions that have devastated trade unions in practice in the sectors covered by the decree. It has had the effect that several unions have not been able to register bargaining units in certain enterprises where they were represented due to the fact that, in many cases, there are fewer than 75 workers in a job classification. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the concept of “bargaining unit” is found in other countries' laws and does not “replace trade unions” as has been claimed, since the two are quite different concepts; and that trade unions will continue to exist and can represent workers within a bargaining unit in a designated corporation in accordance with the Decree. In this regard, the Committee notes, however, with concern that the threshold to form bargaining units under the Decree has, in practice, precluded many workers from exercising their collective bargaining rights. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to amend the threshold so as to ensure that the application of this provision does not deny the right to bargain collectively to a considerable number of workers in a given enterprise, especially workers working in small enterprises, and to avoid that the right of workers to be represented by a union is thus rendered purely theoretical.
- Elected representatives. The Committee notes that Part 3 in conjunction with section 2 seek to establish the role of representatives – union or not – as collective bargaining agents. The Committee understands that the term “representative” may include a union delegate or an elected workers' representative. In the absence of any information provided by the Government in this regard, the Committee once again recalls that, where there exists in the same undertaking both trade union representatives and elected representatives, appropriate measures are to be taken to ensure that the existence of elected representatives is not used to undermine the position of the trade unions concerned. The Committee also recalls that direct negotiation between the undertaking and its employees, bypassing representative organizations where these exist, is detrimental to the principle that negotiation between employers and organizations of workers should be encouraged and promoted. The Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to ensure that the application of the legislation will be in full conformity with the above principles.
- Annulment of collective agreements. According to section 8, all existing collective agreements are null and void 60 days after the Decree enters into force, and new agreements are to be negotiated by the parties before the expiry of the 60 days; otherwise, the company may unilaterally implement new terms and conditions through a new collective agreement or individual contracts. The Committee emphasizes that legislation which annuls freely negotiated collective agreements in force and requires their renegotiation is contrary to the principle of free and voluntary collective bargaining enshrined in the Convention. In addition, the Committee observes that the Government has provided no clear and imperative connection between any need for economic stabilization in a specific context and the existing collective agreements, and that the legislation has effect on whole sectors without any reference to specific clauses that cannot be implemented in the framework of an acute national crisis. Considering that the abrogation of collective agreements, as well as the unilateral imposition of conditions of employment failing agreement, is contrary to the obligation to encourage and promote collective bargaining, and that section 8 constitutes a direct violation of Article 4 of the Convention, the Committee urges the Government to abrogate this provision.

- Renegotiation of collective agreements in case of financial distress. The Committee notes that section 23 provides that employers may renegotiate all their collective agreements if they are considered to be in financial distress; if bargaining fails to result in a new collective agreement, the employer may submit its proposals for a new or amended collective agreement to the Prime Minister for review, and the Prime Minister shall make a decision on the new terms and conditions of the new or amended collective agreement. With reference to the principles stated above in the context of the annulment and renegotiation of collective agreements, the Committee considers that section 23 amounts to compulsory arbitration by public authorities at the request of one of the parties. Considering that section 23 violates the principle of free and voluntary collective bargaining enshrined in the Convention, the Committee therefore requests the Government to abrogate this provision.
- Moreover, while noting the Government's indication that, where a union has been recognized for collective bargaining purposes, the employer is obliged to recognize and negotiate in good faith with the union representatives, the Committee notes with deep concern that, according to the ITUC, the Essential National Industries Decree has had in practice disastrous effects on the trade unions representing industries coming under its scope and even beyond: for example, several unions have been unable to register bargaining units due to the high threshold of 75 workers employed by the same employer who perform similar types of work, stipulated in section 2 of the Decree; almost no collective agreements have been concluded since the adoption of the Decree; efforts of unions to initiate collective bargaining with the employer and conduct good-faith negotiations usually remained to no avail; instead, unilateral changes to terms and conditions of employment have been imposed or threatened to be imposed by the employer; the check-off facility has been fully or partially withdrawn; union dues have sometimes been remitted directly to the bargaining unit rather than to the trade union concerned; and the delay in collective bargaining has entailed a generalized haemorrhage in union membership and thus a serious loss of resources to defend workers' interests. The Committee had previously urged the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the provisions of the Decree without delay, in full consultation with the social partners, so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention. The Committee welcomes that, according to the report of the Direct Contacts Mission, within the framework of the current process of developing a new non-race based Constitution for Fiji to be ready by early 2013, through an inclusive national dialogue paving the way to the first democratic elections scheduled in 2014, and in view of the fact that the new Constitution will reflect the eight fundamental ILO Conventions and that national labour legislation will need to be compatible with the Constitution, the tripartite Employment Relations Advisory Board (ERAB) subcommittee has been tasked with the review of all existing government decrees relating to labour in terms of their conformity with the ILO fundamental Conventions. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the ERAB subcommittee, the last meeting of which took place on 13 August 2012, is expected to be reconvened towards the end of September with the views of the Public Service Commission and the Attorney-General, and that the work of the ERAB and its subcommittee was anticipated to be concluded by October 2012. The Committee further welcomes that, according to the conclusions reached by the CFA in the framework of Case No. 2723, the ERAB subcommittee agreed, as stated by the complainant, to delete most of the provisions of the Essential National Industries Decree that were considered offending. The Committee trusts that the measures agreed by the tripartite ERAB subcommittee will be actively pursued and given effect in the near future, so as to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention, and requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Counter-Inflation (Remuneration) Act. Previously, the Committee noted the Government's indication that, in the framework of the review of outdated laws, the Government was exploring, in light of the recently adopted commercial legislation, the need of retaining the Counter-Inflation (Remuneration) Act. The Committee had requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated so as to amend section 10 of the Act, which envisages, if need be, the restriction or regulation of remuneration of any kind by order of the Prices and Incomes Boards, and stipulates that any agreement or arrangement which does not respect these limitations will be illegal and deemed to be an offence. In the absence of any information provided by the Government, the Committee considers that this provision allows for excessive restrictions to collective bargaining. The Committee hopes that, in the framework of the above reform, the Government will take all necessary measures to ensure that section 10 of the Counter-Inflation (Remuneration) Act is abrogated. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this respect.

Georgia

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 31 July 2012, Education International (EI) and the Educators and Scientists Free Trade Union of Georgia (ESFTUG) in a communication dated 31 August 2012, and the Georgian Trade Unions Confederation (GTUC) in a communication dated 21 September 2012, referring to the issues raised by the Committee below. The Committee notes the Government's reply to these communications. It observes, however, that the Government's observations do not address in detail the issues raised.

The Committee further notes the Government's latest communication dated 22 November 2012 in which it expresses its strong commitment to collaborate with the social partners and the ILO in order to execute respective changes, including amendments in labour legislation. The Committee welcomes this cooperative spirit and trusts that its comments below will be of assistance in this process.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee recalls that it had previously noted that pursuant to section 5(8) of the Labour Code, an employer was not required to substantiate his/her decision for not recruiting an applicant, even in the event of an allegation of anti-union discrimination, and considered that the application of this section, in practice, might result in placing on a worker an insurmountable obstacle when proving that he/she was not recruited because of his/her trade union activities. The Committee had also noted that, according to sections 37(1)(d) and 38(3) of the Code, the employer has a right to terminate a contract at his/her initiative with an employee, provided that the employee is given one month's pay, unless otherwise envisaged by the contract. The Committee considered that, in light of the absence of explicit provisions banning dismissals by reason of union membership or participating in union activities, the Labour Code did not offer sufficient protection against anti-union dismissals. It therefore requested the Government to take the necessary measures to revise sections 5(8), 37(1)(d) and 38(3) of the Code in consultation with the social partners, so as to ensure that it provides for an adequate protection against anti-union discrimination. It further requested the Government to provide detailed information on the application of the Convention in practice, including statistics on the number of confirmed cases of anti-union discrimination, the remedies provided and sanctions imposed.

The Committee notes that in its report the Government, while stressing that it pays vital attention to the prohibition of anti-union discrimination and explores the possibility to better address the issue in order to ensure a clear and better articulated prohibition of anti-union discrimination, indicates that the legislation in force provides guarantees of freedom of association and prohibits any kind of discrimination based on membership in any type of association, including trade unions. In this respect, it once again refers to the general prohibition of anti-union discrimination enshrined in the national Constitution (article 26(1)), the Law on Trade Unions (sections 2(3) and 11(6)), the Labour Code (section 2(3) and (6)), and the Criminal Code (sections 142 and 146). The Government indicates that prohibition of anti-union discrimination is applicable both at the recruitment and employment termination stages and that penal sanctions may be applied in case of violation of workers' rights. An employer's request to disclose membership in any association, including trade unions, during recruitment, is illegal and punishable. The Government points out that there are no reported cases when a person was not recruited based on his/her trade union membership. Furthermore, the Government indicates that it was able to retrieve ten cases in which trade union members appealed to the courts and that only one involved allegations of anti-union discrimination. In this respect, the Government indicates that most of the cases in which the GTUC claims discrimination concern dismissals of trade union leaders without prior consent of the trade union and not alleged anti-union discrimination per se.

With regard to section 37 of the Labour Code, the Government reiterates that this provision does not stipulate that an employer can dismiss a worker without any reason, but rather that one of the grounds for suspending labour relations is the termination of a labour contract, which is possible upon the initiative of one of the parties or pursuant to the provisions of the contract. If a dismissed worker appeals to the court, the employer is obliged to provide arguments and reasons for the dismissal to the court. Both parties must provide facts and arguments and burden of proof lies with both of them (section 102 of the Code of Civil Procedure). Accordingly, an employer is obliged to provide facts to justify that the dismissal of a worker was not based on an illegitimate reason. The Government refers to the ruling of the Supreme Court (Case No. 343-327-2011, 1 December 2011), according to which, in the course of the termination of a labour contract, the fundamental human rights, including protection against discrimination envisaged by the Labour Code, should be ensured. Thus, in case of a dismissal of a worker, it should be meaningfully investigated whether the dismissal was based on discriminatory grounds; in this case, the burden of proof lies with the employer.

The Committee notes that the Supreme Court case referred to by the Government concerns a dismissal of a trade union leader and that according to the court's reasoning, the Labour Code allows termination of employment of any employee, including an elected trade union officer. According to the court, election to a trade union office does not provide any additional privileges. In this respect, the Committee considers that, while the Convention requires protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in relation to all workers, the protection provided for in the Convention is particularly important in the case of trade union representatives and officers. One of the ways of ensuring this protection is to provide that trade union representatives may not be dismissed or otherwise prejudiced either during their term of office, or for a specified period following its expiry. With regard to the protection at the time of recruitment, the Committee once again recalls that workers may face many practical difficulties in proving the real nature of denial of employment, especially when seen in the context of blacklisting of trade union members, which is a practice whose very strength lies in its secrecy. Since it may often be difficult, if not impossible, for a worker to prove that he/she has been the victim of an act of anti-union discrimination, legislation could provide ways to remedy these difficulties, for instance by stipulating that grounds for the decision of non-recruitment should be made available upon request.

The Committee notes with concern numerous allegations of anti-union dismissals submitted by the GTUC, the ITUC, the ESFTUG and the EI in their respective communications. Thus, while noting the information provided by the Government and observing that general provisions prohibiting discrimination exist in the legislation, the Committee underlines that it is essential that the system in place is an effective one. The Committee considers, for example, that options compatible with the Convention would include: a system establishing preventive machinery by requiring that a dismissal is authorized by an independent body or public authority (labour inspectorate or courts); a system which provides for the reinstatement of an unfairly dismissed worker; or a system providing for compensation for the prejudice suffered as a result of an act of anti-union discrimination and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions imposed on employers found guilty of anti-union discrimination, which also act as an effective deterrent to prevent in practice anti-union dismissals.

In the light of the above, the Committee considers that the system currently in place in Georgia does not afford adequate protection. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to revise sections 5(8), 37(1)(d) and 38(3) of the Labour Code in consultation with the social partners, so as to ensure that the Labour Code provides for adequate protection of trade union members and trade union leaders against anti-union discrimination taking into account the principles above. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged in this respect. The Committee further requests the Government to provide its detailed observations on the comments submitted by workers' organizations.

Article 2. Interference by employers in internal trade union affairs. The Committee recalls that it had previously noted various legislative provisions which provide for the protection against interference by employers in trade union affairs. The Committee notes with concern numerous allegations of employers' interference in trade union internal affairs, in the private and public sectors, which include prohibition of collection of trade union dues, harassment and pressure exercised on trade union members to leave their respective unions. The Committee requests the Government to provide its detailed observations thereon.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. The Committee had previously noted that sections 41–43 of the Labour Code appeared to put in the same position collective agreements concluded with trade union organizations and agreements between an employer and non-unionized workers, including as few as two workers. Considering that direct negotiations between an undertaking and its employees, bypassing representative organizations where these exist, run counter to the principle that negotiations between employers and organizations of workers should be encouraged and promoted, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures in order to amend its legislation so as to ensure that the position of trade unions is not undermined by the existence of other employees' representatives or discriminatory situations in favour of the non-unionized staff.

The Committee regrets that the Government merely reiterates that unionized workers have several privileges over non-unionized workers: for example, an employer is obliged to bargain collectively with a trade union upon the initiative of the latter, but is not obliged to do so with non-unionized workers; trade unions enjoy certain facilities (premises, check-off facilities, etc.), which non-unionized workers do not have; and trade unions are protected in law against acts of interference. The Committee must therefore once again stress that the equal status given in law to collective labour agreements concluded with trade union organizations and agreements concluded with a group of non-unionized workers is difficult to reconcile with the ILO principles on collective bargaining, according to which the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers' organizations and workers' organizations should be encouraged and promoted with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements. If, in the course of collective bargaining with the trade union, the enterprise offers better working conditions to non-unionized workers under individual agreements, there is a serious risk that this might undermine the negotiating capacity of the trade union and give rise to discriminatory situations in favour of the non-unionized staff; furthermore, it might encourage unionized workers to withdraw from the union. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to amend the legislation so as to ensure that the position of trade unions is not undermined by the existence of other employees' representatives or discriminatory situations in favour of the non-unionized staff and to promote collective bargaining with trade union organizations. It requests the Government to provide information on all measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

The Committee recalls that it had also requested the Government to indicate the number of collective agreements concluded in the country and to provide relevant statistics in relation to the private sector. In this respect, it notes the Government's indication that it does not have official statistics regarding the number of collective agreements. The Government points out, however, that according to the 2010 ILO/DIALOGUE study, the collective bargaining coverage rate in the country is 25.9 per cent. It also refers to a collective agreement concluded in 2010 at a mine factory following a strike.

The Committee notes with concern numerous allegations of violations of collective bargaining rights in the country submitted by the abovementioned international and national trade union organizations. It notes, in particular that, according to the information provided by these organizations, employers in the public and private sectors refuse to bargain collectively or to respect those agreements that have been concluded. It further notes the following statistics provided by the GTUC: during 2011, 41 collective agreements were terminated and 32 agreements expired and were not renewed; not a single agreement was signed in the second half of 2011; and between June 2011 and June 2012, only five new collective agreements have been concluded. The Committee requests the Government to provide its detailed observations on the comments submitted by workers' organizations.

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had noted the steps taken by the Government to institutionalize social dialogue in the country through the establishment of the Tripartite Social Partnership Commission (TSPC), which, among other matters, dealt with the allegations of violations of trade union rights submitted by trade unions. The Committee notes with concern the GTUC's allegation that the TSPC remains to be very ineffective and that over two-and-a-half years of its existence, this body has not solved one single issue and not one of its decisions and recommendations has been acted upon. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the nature and number of cases examined by the TSPC, as well as on the effect given to its decisions and recommendations.

The Committee recalls that it had previously noted that a tripartite working group of the TSPC had been established and charged with reviewing and analysing the conformity of the national legislation with the findings and recommendations of the Committee of Experts and to propose the necessary amendments. The Committee expresses the hope that any proposed amendments will take into account its comments above. It requests the Government to provide information on all progress achieved in this respect.

Ghana

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 4 August 2011, particularly concerning a 2008 decision of the Accra High Court to the effect that employers could hire and fire without giving any reasons for the termination of employment and that some employers are using this ruling to get rid of unionists. The Committee had also previously noted the comments made by the ITUC in 2009 concerning the persistent refusal of some employers to the unionization of their employees in export processing zones, a current dispute concerning unionization in the export processing zones pending before the National Labour Commission and instances of anti-union discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to respond to all these comments of the ITUC.

Prison staff. In several of its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary legislative measures to ensure that prison service staff enjoys the right to organize and bargain collectively. The Committee noted that the Government indicated that the Ghana Prison Service is a state agency classified under the security and intelligence agencies which derived its mandate from the Security and Intelligence Agencies Act, 1996 (Act 526). The Committee further noted that the Government indicated that the concerns raised by the Committee had been communicated to the competent authorities. Recalling once again that the Convention's guarantees apply to prison service staff, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Labour Act, so as to ensure that prison service staff expressly enjoy the right to organize and to collective bargaining, and to provide information on any measures taken or contemplated in this regard.

Collective bargaining certification. The Committee had previously noted that sections 99–100 of the Labour Act, 2003, regulate the issue of trade union recognition for collective bargaining purposes by providing that the Chief Labour Officer shall issue, upon request by a trade union, a certificate appointing that trade union as the appropriate representative to conduct negotiations on behalf of the class of workers specified in the collective bargaining certificate. The Committee further noted that under section 99(4), the Chief Labour Officer appeared to have full discretion to decide which trade union to grant recognition to, in situations where more than one trade union existed at the workplace, and that the criteria upon which this decision should be based were not specified. The Committee also noted that the Government indicated that in this situation, the Chief Labour Officer would consult with both trade unions to undertake verification to determine which union is to be issued a bargaining certificate. In these circumstances, the Committee once again recalled that when national legislation provides for a compulsory procedure for recognizing unions as exclusive bargaining agents, certain safeguards should be attached, such as: (a) the certification to be made by an independent body; (b) the representative organization to be chosen by a majority vote of the employees in the unit concerned; (c) the right of an organization, which in a previous trade union election failed to secure a sufficiently large number of votes, to request a new election after a stipulated period; and (d) the right of any new organization other than the certified organization to demand a new election after a reasonable period has elapsed (see the General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraph 240). The Committee once again requests the Government to take measures to adopt the appropriate regulations establishing procedures and objective criteria concerning the Chief Labour Officer's competence to determine which union shall hold a collective bargaining certificate, in keeping with the abovementioned principle, and to provide information on developments in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes the comments of the ITUC dated 31 July 2012 concerning anti-union practices.

Greece

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. It further notes the comments by the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE) in a communication dated 16 July 2012 and by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 31 August 2012. The latter comments also concern the arrest and charge of a trade union leader and trade unionists for conducting a sit-in protesting the cut-off of electricity to those not able to pay the corresponding tax increases. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee observes with concern from the latest GSEE comments the closure of the Workers' Housing Organization (OEK) and the Workers' Social Fund (OEE). The GSEE maintains that these two organizations were funded by workers' and employers' contributions as set out in the National General Collective Agreement (NGCA) and did not burden the state budget. According to the GSEE, these bodies were crucial to trade union social work and funding workers' housing and further provided indispensable social functions. One of the functions of the OEE was to secure minimum financing for trade unions to support their operating needs. The Committee observes with concern the GSEE's comments that this intervention has restricted its autonomy as a trade union organization to determine the management of workers' contributions. The Committee requests the Government to reply to these observations and in particular to indicate the impact these closures have had on the capacity of the GSEE to carry out its activities.

In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide clarification as to whether workers may engage in industrial action despite an arbitral award on wages where the parties are at a deadlock in respect of negotiations on non-wage matters. The Committee notes the information in the Government's latest report that the right to strike is suspended for ten days during arbitration with a view to creating an environment of understanding among the social partners during the process. As the arbitrators' powers are restricted to determining the minimum wage, while the rest of the issues remain open to bargaining, the Government confirms that the suspension concerns only strikes for the determination of the minimum and monthly wage.

As regards the use of civil mobilization orders to curtail industrial action in the maritime sector, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government that this order was made with a view to addressing the most adverse public health effects caused after six consecutive days of strike. The Government stresses that they are not considered in force since the reasons that led to such decisions have ceased to exist. The Government adds that the fact that the Panhellenic Seaman's Federation (PNO) has gone on strike on various occasions from December 2010 to February 2012 without restriction confirms the above.

The Committee takes note of the Government's report, as well as the comments made under article 23 of the ILO Constitution by the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE) in a communication dated 16 July 2012 and by the Hellenic Federation of Enterprises and Industries (SEV) dated 16 November 2012. The Committee requests the Government to provide any observations it may wish to make on these comments.

In its previous comments, the Committee expressed the firm hope that the Government and the social partners would be able to review all of its comments in the constructive vein in which they were given, with the aim of jointly developing a common platform to advance the country in a manner which fully respected organizational rights and the promotion of free and voluntary collective bargaining responsive to the current urgencies.

The Committee observes from the latest comments of the GSEE that the Greek Parliament endorsed, on 12 February 2012, Law No. 4046 on the "Approval of the Plans for Credit Facilitation Agreements between the European Financial Stability Facility (ESF), the Hellenic Republic and the Bank of Greece, the draft Memorandum of Understanding between the Hellenic Republic, the European Commission and the Bank of Greece and other urgent provisions for reduction of public debt and recovery of the national economy". According to the GSEE, the text of the new Memorandum of Economic and Financial Policies sets out the numerous commitments undertaken by the Greek Government including a fresh round of austerity and new permanent measures that further disintegrate fundamental labour rights and industrial relations institutions; these wide-ranging commitments are described as "complete rules of law with direct effect". In addition, the Ministry of Labour and Social Security delivered a Circular (No. 4601/304) concerning the implementation of section 1(6) of Law No. 4046/2012. According to the GSEE, the impact of these measures is devastating for collective labour institutions, freedom of association, social dialogue as well as the principle of independent social partnership. The GSEE considers that these new permanent measures will irreversibly and harmfully compound the effect of standing measures since they demolish almost every aspect of the collective bargaining system; moreover, these measures were adopted wholly, disregarding the agreement reached by the national social partners on 3 February 2012 to respect the agreed minimum standards of work included in the National General Collective Agreement (NGCA) for the years 2010–12. The GSEE denounces that subsequently, under unprecedented pressure by the troika, the Government undertook to abolish the NGCA itself and has explicitly legislated to decrease the wage rates therein and replace them with a statutory minimum wage after July 2012; as opposed to generating jobs, the sum of the measures taken has given rise to spiralling unemployment, massive lay-offs and widespread precariousness with over-flexible low-paid jobs where women and young people are predominant.

The Government, for its part, stresses its firm commitment to the observance of international labour standards and states that the financial crisis and the international economic environment reduce the quality of labour rights, redefining the concept of core labour rights in an economically developed country, which is required to reduce the quality of life of its citizens. The loan conditions and their association with drastic restructuring of the institutional framework of industrial relations constitute an unprecedented challenge for Greece and the international community, a fact that was highlighted both by the high-level mission and the Committee of Experts. The international organizations that are offering financial aid to rescue the Greek economy have chosen the implementation of measures that will enhance labour market flexibility, as being considered the most appropriate method to enhance the competitiveness of the Greek economy. According to the Government, the measures imposed include a partial restructuring of the free collective bargaining system so that the core of trade union freedom and of collective bargaining might not be affected. The Government adds that the text of programmatic convergence of the three parties that support the newly elected Government provides: “The collective autonomy and the validity of labour collective agreements return to the level defined by the European Social Law and the acquis communautaire, according to which the level of wages in the private sector is agreed between the social partners. This also includes the setting up of minimum wage provided for by the NGCA.”

The Committee further notes the new legal framework and context described by the SEV.

The Committee takes note of the conclusions and recommendations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association when examining these same matters in light of their conformity with the principles of freedom of association (Case No. 2820, 365th Report, paragraphs 784–1003). The Committee similarly encourages the Government and the social partners to rapidly re-engage in intensive social dialogue with a view to developing a comprehensive vision for labour relations in the country and requests the Government to indicate in its next report the steps taken in this regard. The Committee once again urges the creation of a space for the social partners that will enable them to be fully involved in the determination of any further alterations within the framework of the agreements with the EC, the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the European Central Bank (ECB) that touch upon aspects which go to the heart of labour relations, social dialogue and social peace, and trusts that the views of the social partners will be fully taken into account.

Article 4 of the Convention. Violation of the NGCA and other collective agreements. The GSEE indicates that the Government has legislatively imposed a reduction of the minimum daily/monthly wages established by the NGCA by 22 per cent compared to the level of 1 January 2012. A further reduction was made for young workers (15–25 years old) of 32 per cent. By Circular No. 4601/304, the Ministry of Labour has extended the scope of this reduction to the wages in all collective agreements. According to the GSEE, the Circular also provides that any work performed by workers between 15–18 years of age is excluded from the protective provisions of labour law and is not counted towards seniority. In addition, the minimum daily/monthly wage is subject to a freeze, contrary to raises provided for in the relevant collective agreements, until the rate of unemployment falls below 10 per cent. The clauses of the NGCA related to seniority are further suspended for indefinite duration.

The SEV explains that minimum wages will be regulated by administrative authority as from 1 April 2013, after consultation with the social partners.

While acutely aware of the grave and exceptional circumstances being experienced in the country, the Committee deeply regrets these numerous interventions in voluntary concluded agreements, including the NGCA for which the social partners, cognizant of the financial and economic challenges, declared their continuing support in February 2012. The Committee recalls, as has been said to other countries in similar situations, that if, as part of its stabilization policy, a government considers that wage rates cannot be settled freely through collective bargaining, such a restriction should be imposed as an exceptional measure and only to the extent that it is necessary, without exceeding a reasonable period, and it should be accompanied by adequate safeguards to protect workers’ living standards. While noting the gravity of the economic crisis the Committee refers to its conclusion above about the importance of a space for social dialogue and the role of the social partners in participating in the determination of measures affecting them and the labour market and urges the Government to review with them all the above measures with a view to limiting their impact and their duration and ensuring adequate safeguards to protect workers’ living standards. Noting the Government’s indication that consultations are taking place between the newly elected Government and the social partners with the aim of signing the new NGCA, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the progress made in this regard and trusts that any mechanism for the determination of wages will ensure that the social partners can play an active role.

As regards its previous comments concerning collective agreements in the banking sector on supplementary pension funds raised by the Greek Federation of Bank Employee Unions (OTOE), the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the steps taken to bring the parties together with a view to achieving a mutually acceptable agreement.

As regards the GSEE reference to the Government's enforcement of a maximum duration of three years for collective agreements and the mandatory expiry of collective agreements (those already in place over 24 months shall have a residual duration of one year), the Committee does not consider that imposing a three year maximum duration on collective agreements constitutes a violation of the Convention, if the parties are free to agree on a different duration.

Binding nature of collective agreements and association of persons. The Committee recalls its previous comments concerning Act No. 3845/2010 which provided that: "Professional and enterprise collective agreements' clauses can (from now on) deviate from the relevant clauses of sectoral and general national agreements, as well as sectoral collective agreements' clauses can deviate from the relevant clauses of national general collective agreements. All relevant details for the application of this provision can be defined by Ministerial Decision." In its previous comments, the GSEE raised its deep concern that this provision paved the way for the dismantling of a solid machinery of collective bargaining which had been functioning smoothly and effectively in the country for 20 years as a result of a "Social Pact" endorsed in 1990.

As regards the matter of the association of persons, the Committee notes the information in the Government's latest report that Act No. 4024/2011 provides that, where there is no trade union in the company, an association of persons is competent to conclude a firm-level collective agreement. The Government adds that the association of persons is established irrespective of the total number of workers and without an indefinite duration. The Government confirms that at least three-fifths of the workers of the enterprise are required for forming an association of persons and thus the minimum number of workers for an association is five. These workers are protected against anti-union dismissal and may exercise strike action; they therefore constitute trade union organizations of a peculiar type. According to the annual report of the labour inspectorate, 22 firm-level agreements were concluded by association of persons and 26 by trade unions from the period 27 October (time of the publication of Act No. 4024) to 31 December 2011. The SEV states that, in its opinion, an association of persons is just another form of trade union organization already recognized by the law and that its role is purely supplementary.

The Committee nevertheless is of the understanding that unions cannot be formed in enterprises with less than 20 workers, thus leaving a void for association of persons to have priority to make firm-level agreements over negotiations which previously took place with respect to small enterprises at the relevant sectoral level. Moreover, the Committee recalls its concern that, given the prevalence of small enterprises in the Greek labour market (approximately 90 per cent of the workforce), the facilitation of association of persons combined with the abolition of the favourability principle set out first in Act No. 3845/2010 and given concrete application in Act No. 4024/2011 will have a severely detrimental impact upon the entire foundation of collective bargaining in the country. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that trade union sections can be formed in small enterprises in order to guarantee the possibility of collective bargaining through trade union organizations.

As regards the favourability principle, while observing the indication in the Government's report that the reinforcement of collective bargaining decentralization was included in the measures indicated by the troika including the suspension of this principle, the Committee highlights the importance of the general principle enunciated in Paragraph 3(1) of the Collective Agreements Recommendation, 1951 (No. 91), that collective agreements should bind the signatories thereto and those on whose behalf the agreement is concluded. The Committee also observes from the examination of Case No. 2820 by the Committee on Freedom of Association, however, that the Government has affirmed that all collective agreements will be binding upon the parties. While recalling the importance in the current situation of ensuring that trade union sections can be established in small enterprises, the Committee requests the Government to ensure full respect for this principle and to continue to provide information on the impact of firm-level agreements, including the number of associations of persons constituted in the country and the number of agreements concluded by them and their coverage, and to indicate whether there have been any first-level agreements in contravention with the abovementioned favourability principle.

Arbitration. As regards the previous concerns raised by the GSEE in relation to the Organization for Mediation and Arbitration (OMED) and recourse to arbitration, the Committee now observes that arbitration can only be carried out at the request of both parties, which is not contrary to the Convention. The Committee further observes from the latest comments of the GSEE, however, that the arbitrator is obliged to adapt the award to the need to reduce unit labour cost by about 15 per cent during the programme period and that all the cases pending in arbitration at the time of Law No. 4046/2012 were compulsorily closed/archived. The Committee further observes that both the GSEE and the SEV contest the limitation of the arbitrators' mandate to only wage issues. The Committee recalls the importance of efficiently functioning independent and impartial arbitration machinery without government interference and requests the Government to review these restrictions with the social partners so as to ensure that the arbitrators are not given such rigid instructions by law in carrying out their mandate so that they may be able to independently determine the matters voluntarily brought before them. The Committee further requests the Government to reply to the GSEE comments that the closing of the Workers' Social Fund (OEE) will have a negative impact on the OMED as it was one of the main sources of funding for their organization enabling it to preserve its autonomy vis-à-vis the State.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union dismissal. More generally, the GSEE has referred to the continuing introduction of measures introducing flexible forms of work which render workers more vulnerable to abusive practices and unfair dismissal (e.g. flexibility in the management prerogative to breach full-time work contracts and unilateral imposition of reduced-term rotation work, extended duration of permissible use of temporary agency work, increased probationary period and extension of the maximum period for fixed-term contracts). The Committee once again requests the Government to provide its observations on the comments made by the GSEE in this regard and to provide all relevant information, including comparative statistics relating to complaints of anti-union discrimination and any remedial action taken, with its next report.

Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154) (ratification: 1996)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report, as well as the comments made by the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE) in a communication dated 16 July 2012. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the latest comments from the GSEE.

Article 5 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that in its previous observations it had noted the GSEE comments in respect of the austerity measures which it considers violate the aim of the Convention to ensure the promotion of collective bargaining progressively extended to all workers, including those in the public service. The GSEE had referred to: the imposition of a temporary freeze in career advancement premiums; the imposition of a "labour reserve" concealing collective dismissals of thousands of workers in the public and broader public sector without any negotiation; and the imposition of unilateral wage and salary reductions through the establishment of a special solidarity contribution. The Committee now observes that the GSEE refers to further measures taken in the public service, including: further wage cuts and wage ceilings and an intervention in the voluntary nature of collective bargaining in the railways and urban transport sector.

In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure the protection of the standards of living of the workers most affected by these interventions. It hoped that the Government and the social partners concerned would be in a position in the near future to fully discuss the time limitations of the measures imposed and to consider any further measures that may need to be taken in relation to the wages of public servants or the imposition of labour reserves in a manner so as to privilege as far as possible the determination of such matters through collective bargaining.

The Committee observes the Government's statement that the content of collective bargaining in the public service is defined by section 3 of Act No. 2738/99 and does not include salaries and the question of a labour reserve. The new grading system in the public service corresponds with the following concrete principles: (a) the principle of fiscal adjustment, the observance of which has become a matter of crucial importance for the economic and political survival of the country in an international environment; (b) the principle of smooth functioning of the administration which is directly associated with the hierarchical classification of the levels of responsibility in the exercise of competences as well as with its performance measurement system; (c) the principle of equality and meritocracy as well as party neutrality, safeguarded through the connection between, on the one hand, the hierarchy according to the employee's grade and wage promotion and, on the other, the employee's typical and essential skills and performance which is assessed on equal terms for every individual, taking into account the graded individual level of responsibility as well as the specific working conditions under which the employees exercise their duties with the aim to achieving the smooth functioning of the service or the body to which they belong; and (d) the principle of ensuring the highest possible standard of employees' performance with a view to serving the public interest. More specifically, the provisions introduce an assessment system based mainly on the objective performance measurement. Furthermore, as regards the allegations of ipso jure dismissal, pre-retirement suspension of work and the labour reserve, the Government maintains that these constitute special provisions established under specific fiscal conditions under which the country observes its commitments to lender-partners to reduce public expenditure. According to the Government, the major benefit of these provisions is the fact that immediate organizational, operational and fiscal results are being guaranteed with the aim of achieving the strategic goal of reducing the state, as well as, public expenditure without causing upheaval in the lives of the personnel working in the public administration and the broader public sector.

The Committee notes the conclusions and recommendations by the Committee on Freedom of Association in relation to these same matters. It is equally aware of the grave and exceptional context in which the Government was required to act to observe commitments made to its lender-partners within the framework of the international loan mechanism. Nevertheless, in the spirit of the Convention, the Committee is firmly convinced that the promotion of collective bargaining is a key element in ensuring constructive processes to maximize the impact of crisis responses to the needs of the real economy; even in respect of clauses with economic impact in the framework of sound negotiations which take into account the gravity of the situation. The Committee further considers that engaging in intensive social dialogue is critical to determining in an inclusive manner the measures necessary to limit the impact of these provisions and to provide for adequate safeguards for the protection of workers' living standards. The Committee refers in particular to its chapter on collective bargaining in times of crisis in its General Survey on Conventions Nos 151 and 154 in this regard in both the public and the private sectors. In this regard, the Committee stresses the relevance of an extraordinary mechanism for enabling social partners to reach conclusions on steps to be taken in times of crisis.

The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information in its next report on the measures taken to review the abovementioned provisions with the social partners with a view to limiting their impact and providing adequate safeguards for the protection of workers' living standards.

Guatemala

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1952)

Comments by workers' and employers' organizations

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 31 July 2012, referring to matters already under examination by the Committee, and particularly the murder of seven trade union leaders and two trade union members between January and October 2011. The Committee also notes the comments on the application of the Convention made by the Trade Union Confederation of Guatemala (UNSI TRAGUA), the General Confederation of Workers of Guatemala (CGTG) and the Trade Unions' Unity of Guatemala (CUSG), dated 30 August 2012, which refer in particular to numerous allegations of violations of trade union rights in practice, in both the private and public sectors, and to acts of violence against trade unionists, including the murder of a trade union leader in August 2012 (the Committee observes that some of the allegations have been submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association). The Committee also notes the comments of the Indigenous and Rural Workers' Trade Union Movement of Guatemala (MSICG) of 31 August 2012 (the MSICG subsequently sent other comments, which were received on 10 September and 3 October 2012, outside the time limits for receiving them) which refer to the murder of a trade union leader in June 2012, allegations concerning acts of violence against leaders of the MSICG, the arrest and the initiation of prosecutions against trade union leaders in a context of the criminalization of the exercise of trade union rights and the policy to weaken the Ministry of Labour and the labour inspectorate. The MSICG also alleges numerous violations of trade union rights in practice, in the public and private sectors, including in maquilas (export processing zones) and industrial free zones. The Committee requests the Government to refer the matters raised by these organizations to the National Tripartite Commission and to provide information in this respect, particularly on the decisions taken.

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

Complaint under article 26 of the ILO Constitution

The Committee notes that a group of Workers' delegates to the 101st Session of the International Labour Conference submitted a complaint in June 2012 under article 26 of the ILO Constitution against the Government of Guatemala for failure to comply with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the President of the Republic and the authorities have observed with great concern the claim made by the workers, which is based on events that have been occurring for approximately the last 25 years. It adds that the current Government, which took office in January 2012, has adopted measures and taken firm action for transformation and change in the management of labour matters, and in this context has invited the Director-General of the ILO and the Director of the International Labour Standards Department to visit the country and support the efforts that are being made by the new Government for the implementation of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that during its first months in office it has made progress in the following principal areas: the implementation of the new national policy for safe, decent and quality employment, and the policy for permanent social dialogue; the budgetary, normative and institutional strengthening of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, including the extension of the coverage of the General Labour Inspectorate; the conclusion of an agreement between the Office of the Attorney-General of Guatemala and the International Labour Standards Department of the ILO establishing relations of cooperation and the exchange of information on matters covered by the ILO supervisory bodies; the broadening of national tripartite dialogue, including the trade union federations and confederations which have been excluded in the recent past, with as its first result the conclusion of the Memorandum of Understanding for the cooperation framework with the ILO, the Decent Work Programme and the Framework Implementation Plan; and coordination between state institutions to give priority to complaints concerning acts of violence against trade unionists and impunity which, unfortunately, also affect the population as a whole.

Acts of violence against trade unionists and the situation of impunity

The Committee recalls that for several years it has been noting in its observations serious acts of violence against trade unionists which have gone unpunished and has requested the Government to provide information on developments in this regard. The Committee notes that in its comments the ITUC, in the same way as the national trade union confederations, continue to highlight serious acts of violence against trade union leaders and members in recent years, including in 2011 and 2012, and describe a climate of fear and intimidation with a view to dismantle existing trade unions and preventing the establishment of new ones. The organizations also emphasize the deficiencies of the labour inspection services and the crisis in the judicial system. The Committee has noted that in recent years many acts of violence have been committed against trade union leaders and members, including murders, death threats and acts of intimidation against trade union members. The Committee observes that the Committee on Freedom of Association (in Cases Nos 2445, 2540, 2609 and 2768) noted with concern that the allegations levelled in the context of its proceedings were extremely serious and included many murders and acts of violence against trade union leaders and members. The Committee recalls that the high-level mission which visited Guatemala from 9 to 14 May 2011 reported as follows:

The mission wishes to recall that the problems of violence referred to by the CEACR are the following:

- alleged murders of trade union leaders and members over the past five years: 2007: 12; 2008: 12;
- 2009: 16; 2010: 10; and 2011: two up to the month of May (a few days after the mission, a trade union leader of the SITRABI was murdered);
- death threats, abductions, raids, etc., alleged over the past four years:

2008: eight death threats, two attacks against the homes of trade union leaders, a raid against trade union premises and a raid against the home of a trade union leader, and two attempted murders of trade union leaders;

2009: 17 death threats against trade union leaders and executive committees, eight cases of physical assault against trade union leaders and members; an attack against trade union premises and an attack against the home of a trade union leader; and a temporary abduction of a trade union leader; and

2010: four death threats, an attempted murder of a trade union leader, an abduction, involving torture and the rape of a trade union leader, an attack against trade union premises, an attack against the home of a trade union leader, and physical assault against a trade union leader.

The mission emphasized to all those with whom it spoke the gravity of the allegations and the figures referred to above, and recalled during its meetings the relevant principles of the supervisory bodies, and particularly that trade union rights can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, and it sought solutions to the matters raised by the Committee. The mission also emphasized that the killing or serious injury of trade union leaders and trade unionists requires the institution of independent and expeditious judicial inquiries in order to shed full light, at the earliest date, on the facts and circumstances in which such actions occurred and in this way, to the extent possible, to determine where responsibilities lie, punish the guilty parties and prevent the repetition of similar events.

The mission observed that the situation of violence is generalized, affects trade unionists, employers and other categories and results in around 10,000 violent deaths a year (according to data provided by the Presidential Coordinating Commission for Executive Policy in the Field of Human Rights (COPREDEH)) in a country of 11,237,196 inhabitants (according to data provided by the Ministry of Labour). The murder figures for trade union leaders over the past five years show that they are a particularly vulnerable category, although at the present time the most affected sector is that of bus drivers and passengers (on the last day of its work, the mission was able to observe this directly by witnessing an attack with firearms on a bus in which five persons died). The mission was informed by various sources that the main perpetrators of acts of violence are related to common crime, organized crime and, recently, drug trafficking, a crime that has been spreading particularly rapidly in recent years in Guatemala and other Central American countries. The mission was able to observe that a large number of people in the country carry weapons. The trade union confederations and the Coordinating Committee of Agricultural, Commercial, Industrial and Financial Associations (CACIF) emphasized the weakness of the security services and the judicial system, their concern at the level of violence and their desire to contribute to the eradication of violence and the restoration of the rule of law. In this context, at the beginning of its work, the mission found that the authorities were only in a position to provide information on investigations concerning a small number of the trade union leaders and members who had been murdered. In various meetings, including those held with certain magistrates and other authorities, the mission was informed that certain murders might be of an anti-union nature. The mission observed that only once investigations have been conducted and those responsible for carrying out, planning and instigating the acts of violence against trade union leaders and members could their anti-union nature be ascertained, and that for that reason it is urgent to conduct expeditious and exhaustive investigations in all cases. The lack of full and up-to-date information on developments in the investigations concerning trade unionists was a matter of concern for the mission, as was the lack of coordination between State services following up these crimes. For this purpose, the Tripartite Commission on Labour Affairs called for the restoration of the specialized prosecution service for crimes against trade unionists and asked the mission to express its concern to the Office of the Attorney-General in relation to this situation. Sharing these concerns, the mission requested the Public Prosecutor to establish a special prosecution service responsible for investigating these crimes and for an acceleration of the investigations of the 52 murders denounced. The Public Prosecutor appointed a few months ago, with a background in the field of human rights, welcomed these proposals, although the proposal for the restoration of the specialized prosecution service was subject to the outcome of the budget discussions in the Congress. The mission also called on the International Commission against Impunity in Guatemala (CICIG) to collaborate with the Office of the Public Prosecutor to investigate and shed light on these cases. The mission is pleased to note that it received an affirmative response from both parties and the undertaking to carry out these investigations. The mission indicated to the authorities the importance that these investigations were undertaken taking duly into account the alleged anti-union nature of the cases, as in recent years there has been a certain tendency in investigations to give priority to other motives, and particularly those based on “passion”. The Public Prosecutor expressed great interest in the possibility of concluding a cooperation agreement with the ILO, which would include activities to provide training to prosecutors on typical contexts of anti-union violence and the factors which give rise to such violence (the Public Prosecutor will soon contact the ILO for this purpose). The mission also suggested that representatives of the Office of the Attorney-General should participate regularly in the meetings of the Tripartite Commission on Labour Affairs with a view to providing information on progress in the investigation of cases of murders of trade union leaders and members. The Office of the Attorney-General and the Tripartite Commission on Labour Affairs welcomed the proposal. The mission noted the urgent call by society, including employers’ and workers’ organizations, to address more decisively the impunity and corruption existing in the country and considers that the authorities need to devote much higher levels of resources and take effective measures to eradicate the corruption that permeates the administration of justice. At present, the impunity rate is 98 per cent, according to official sources. The CACIF and the trade unions agree on the need for criminal and labour court procedures concerning anti-union practices to be expeditious and effective.

The Committee also notes with deep concern that, according to the ITUC and the trade union confederations, since the visit by the mission murders have continued in 2011 and 2012.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication in a communication addressed to the Committee on Freedom of Association and in its report to the Committee of Experts that: (1) the Office of the Attorney-General, in compliance with its constitutional mandate to ensure strict compliance with the laws of the country and its functions in relation to criminal prosecution, has been a member this year of the working group convened by the Ministry of Labour, together with the judicial authorities and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, to monitor the application of the Convention; (2) the Office of the Attorney-General also accepted the invitation by the Tripartite Commission on International Labour Affairs, in which representatives of trade unions and representatives of employers participate, and the Ministry of Labour, to provide information on the progress in the cases denounced at the national level and with the ILO; (3) a group of investigators and support staff were recruited with a view, under the direction of the prosecutors responsible for each case, for pushing forward the investigation of the cases so that they can be resolved in a reasonable time and common factors identified in each case; (4) an overall study was undertaken of all the cases to establish whether there existed a common objective of eliminating trade union leaders; (5) the 58 cases under examination are distributed among 25 offices of public prosecutors, with the majority being assigned to the special prosecution service established to investigate crimes against trade unionists; (6) the examination of the cases found that 32 victims could be trade union members or leaders, while in 17 cases there is no documentation or evidence to prove that the persons concerned were members of a trade union, five cases are related to persons connected with municipal markets and four were members of community organizations; (7) in 45 cases, the motive for the murders is related to common crime, in two cases it was found that the death had its origins in the trade union struggles in which the victims were engaged, four died in relation to social claims, five persons perished due to confrontations between municipal authorities and market stallholders, one person died for political reasons and one in the context of the intervention by the state security forces; (8) of the 58 cases, rulings have been handed down or progress is being made in 24; (9) as a demonstration of the will of the Government and the Office of the Attorney-General, on 10 July a protocol agreement was concluded between the Office of the Attorney-General of Guatemala and the International Labour Standards Department of the ILO with the principal objectives of establishing cooperative relations, and a workshop was held on international labour standards, with emphasis on freedom of association, collective bargaining and impunity; the workshop was attended by the Sub-secretariat for Political Crime of the Office of the Attorney-General, seven district prosecutors, a branch prosecutor, nine investigators and 15 auxiliary investigators from throughout the Republic; and (10) since the establishment of the special investigation service for crimes against trade unionists, measures have been taken to: (i) receive complaints on the premises of the investigation service; (ii) security measures are granted immediately to trade unionists lodging a complaint of a threat; (iii) in the event of murders of trade union members, extended competence is requested so that these cases can be referred to higher-risk courts; and (iv) in the event of raids on the residences of trade union members or trade union premises, security measures are requested from the Ministry of the Interior around the locations where they are required.

The Committee notes all of this information. The Committee welcomes the Government's indications concerning the re-establishment of the special investigation service for crimes against trade union members. The Committee also welcomes the fact that, further to the conclusions of the high-level mission which visited the country in 2011, a cooperation agreement has been concluded between the Office of the Attorney-General and the ILO and that a first activity for the training of investigators has already been undertaken in relation to the typical context of anti-union violence and the factors giving rise to such violence. The Committee hopes that, in accordance with the cooperation agreement, this type of activity will continue to be carried out. The Committee once again draws the Government's attention to the principle that a genuinely free and independent trade union movement cannot develop in a climate of violence and uncertainty; freedom of association can only be exercised in conditions in which fundamental human rights, in particular those relating to human life and personal safety, are fully respected and guaranteed; the rights of workers' and employers' organizations can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations, and it is for governments to ensure that this principle is respected. The Committee also recalls that excessively slow proceedings and the absence of judgments against the guilty parties creates, in practice, a situation of impunity, which aggravates the climate of violence and insecurity, which is extremely damaging to the exercise of trade union rights and incompatible with the requirements of the Convention.

The Committee once again deplores the murders of trade unionists and other acts of anti-union violence and once again firmly requests the Government to: (1) bring to justice those responsible for the violence in order to counter impunity; (2) ensure the protection of trade unionists under threat of death; (3) convey to the Office of the Public Prosecutor and the Supreme Court of Justice its deep concern at the slowness and inefficiency of the justice system and its recommendations concerning the need to elucidate all murders and crimes committed against trade unionists so as to punish the perpetrators; (4) ensure the allocation of sufficient resources for these objectives with the consequent increase in human and material resources, and ensure effective coordination between the various state bodies which may be called upon to intervene in the judicial system, and to provide training for investigators; and (5) as affirmed by the new Government, to give absolute priority to these matters in government policy.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take all the necessary measures to guarantee full respect for the human rights of trade unionists and that it will continue to provide protection measures to all trade unionists who so request. The Committee firmly hopes that the investigations which, according to the Government, are being carried out by the Office of the Attorney-General, will be finalized in the near future and will result in the determination of those responsible for acts of violence against trade union leaders and members, their prosecution and punishment in accordance with the law. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this respect.

Legislative problems

The Committee recalls that for several years it has been commenting on the following provisions, which raise problems of consistency with the Convention:

- restrictions on the freedom to establish organizations (the need, under section 215(c) of the Labour Code, to have 50 per cent plus one of those working in the occupation to establish industry trade unions) and delays in the registration of trade unions, or the refusal to register them. The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (1) this provision is based on article 102(q) of the Political Constitution, which recognizes the right of workers to establish organizations freely; (2) the constitutional and ordinary legislation protect and recognize the freedom to establish organizations and do not restrict the establishment of industry trade unions, and this section sets out clear rules for the establishment of industry trade unions, based on a qualified majority that is sufficiently representative, which ensures legal security and representativity; (3) the reasons set out comply with the need for the negotiation of the collective agreement, and this section guarantees the majority required for the direct negotiation of the collective agreement; (4) there is no discrimination and no requirement for prior authorization for the establishment of an industry trade union, that is to say that the wish of industry groups to associate is not prohibited; (5) the absence of industry trade unions is due to the lack of interest (for example, for economic reasons), and not to legal restrictions; and (6) in light of the above, effect is given to Article 8 of the Convention. While noting this information, the Committee reiterates that the requirement of a minimum number of members is not in itself incompatible with the Convention, but that the minimum number should be kept within reasonable limits so as not to impede the establishment of organizations. The Committee considers in this respect that the majority required in the above section is too high and could therefore hinder the establishment of an industry-level trade union if the workers decided to establish one;
- restrictions on the right to elect trade union leaders in full freedom (they need to be of Guatemalan origin and to work in the enterprise or economic activity in order to be elected as a trade union leader, under sections 220 and 223 of the Labour Code). The Committee takes note of the Government's indication that the legislation is inclusive as it recognizes as being of Guatemalan origin persons originating from the Federation of Central America, for which reason it does not contravene the right to the free choice of trade union leaders, as persons of various nationalities may be elected. While noting that workers who are nationals of the countries of Central America can hold trade union office, the Committee recalls that the national legislation should allow foreign workers, of whatever nationality, to have access to trade union office, at least after a reasonable period of residence in the host country;
- restrictions on the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities freely (under section 241 of the Labour Code, strikes are not declared by the majority of those casting votes, but by a majority of the workers); the possibility to impose compulsory arbitration in the event of a dispute in the public transport sector and in services related to fuel, and the need to determine whether strikes for the purposes of inter-union solidarity are still prohibited (section 4(d), (e) and (g) of Decree No. 71-86, as amended by Legislative Decree No. 35-96 of 27 March 1996); and the labour, civil and penal sanctions applicable in the event of strikes involving public officials or workers in specific enterprises (sections 390(2) and 430 of the Penal Code and Decree No. 71-86);
- the Civil Service Bill: in its previous observation, the Committee noted a Civil Service Bill which, according to UNSITRAGUA and the National Federation of State Workers' Unions (FENASTEG), requires a percentage that is too high to establish unions and restricts the right to strike. The Committee noted previously the Government's indication that the Bill had been withdrawn and that in July 2008 an inter-sectoral consultation committee was established to prepare a Bill that is consistent with the needs of the sectors involved; and
- the situation of many workers in the public sector who do not benefit from trade union rights. These workers, who are under contract under item 029 and others of the budget, should have been recruited for specific or temporary tasks, but are engaged in ordinary and permanent functions and often do not benefit from trade union rights or employment benefits other than wages, and are not covered by social security or by collective bargaining, where it exists. The Committee noted previously that the members of the Supreme Court of Justice indicated to the high-level mission that, in accordance with case law, these workers enjoy the right to organize. Nevertheless, this case law has not been given effect in practice, according to technical assistance reports and the comments of the MSICG.

In this respect, the Committee recalls the conclusions of the 2011 high-level mission, which are as follows:

The mission regrets to note that no progress has been achieved since the previous year in relation to the legislative reforms requested by the CEACR and that the Tripartite Commission on Labour Affairs has not submitted any draft legislation to Congress. The mission reiterated the importance of bringing the legislation into full conformity with the Conventions on freedom of association. The mission forwarded the comments of the CEACR to the Labour Commission of the Congress. The Labour Commission of the Congress expressed the wish that the Tripartite Commission on Labour Affairs should enter into contact with it regularly to address these matters, and the Tripartite Commission agreed. The mission suggested the possibility to the Labour Commission of the Congress to conclude an agreement with the ILO in relation to training on international labour standards and to improve their application; this proposal was received with great interest and it was indicated that the matter would be submitted in the near future to the competent authorities of the Congress. With regard to the situation of the many workers in the public sector engaged under contracts under items 029 and others of the budget, the mission noted that, according to the Supreme Court of Justice, the case law recognizes the right of these workers to organize. The mission also noted that in practice these workers join organizations and in certain State institutions represent 70 per cent of the staff. The mission suggested that the authorities, by means of a circular or a resolution, should remove any doubt on the right to organize of workers engaged under contracts under item 029 of the budget. However, the Minister of Labour expressed reservations for economic and legal reasons.

The Committee noted previously that the Government had established an inter-institutional commission to prepare a Bill on the outstanding legislative matters.

The Committee recalls that, in its 2011 conclusions, the Conference Committee expressed the hope that the Government would be in a position to report substantial progress in the very near future. The Committee regrets to note that, despite requesting improvements in the legislation for many years, there has not been significant progress in the legislative reforms requested, and it considers that much more effort will need to be made. The Committee firmly hopes that, with ILO technical assistance, the Government will be in a position to provide information in its next report on positive developments in relation to the various matters referred to and that tangible progress will be achieved in the near future.

Registration of trade unions. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it referred to the conclusions of the 2011 high-level mission concerning the obstacles to the registration of trade unions, which read as follows:

The mission emphasized to the Government the need for a rapid solution concerning the registration of the remaining organizations. The mission also suggested the establishment of a proactive registration procedure enabling trade unions with the authorization of their assembly to correct directly in the Ministry legal problems arising during the registration process.

The Committee once again invites the Government to discuss this matter in the Tripartite Commission with a view to adopting an approach that allows the very rapid resolution with those establishing trade unions of any substantive and formal problems that may arise and facilitates in so far as possible the registration of trade unions.

Other matters

The maquila sector. For years, the Committee has been noting the comments of trade unions concerning serious problems in the application of the Convention in relation to trade union rights in the maquilas. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it noted the conclusions of the 2011 high-level mission, which read as follows:

With regard to the situation of trade unions in the maquila, the mission noted the indication by the authorities that there are 740 enterprises in the sector, six unions and three collective contracts covering 4,600 workers out of a total of 110,000 workers. The mission notes that the number of workers in the maquila has fallen considerably in relation to previous years (around 300,000). The mission also notes the indication by the authorities that it is a sector which has been subject to special attention to verify compliance with labour rights and that there is a special unit of the labour inspectorate that is particularly active in addressing problems in the maquila. The mission considers, based on meetings with trade union federations, which are very concerned at the low level of unionization in the maquila, that training activities on freedom of association and collective bargaining should be intensified in the maquila sector and it encourages the Government to have recourse to ILO technical assistance in this respect.

The Committee once again requests the Government to continue providing information on the exercise in practice of trade unions rights in maquilas (number of trade unions, their membership, number of collective agreements and their coverage, complaints of violations of trade union rights, decisions taken by the authorities and number of inspections). The Committee expresses the hope that the Government will continue to benefit from ILO technical assistance so that full effect is given to the Convention in the maquilas and it requests the Government to provide information on this subject. The Committee requests the Government to refer problems relating to the exercise of trade union rights in the maquila sector regularly to the National Tripartite Commission and to provide information in this regard.

National Tripartite Commission. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to ensure that the composition of the workers' representation on the Tripartite Commission is based on strict criteria of representativity and it asked the Government to take the necessary measures for that purpose. The Committee welcomes the Government's indication that the trade union federations and confederations that had been excluded recently have now been included.

Statistics and other matters. The Committee noted previously that, according to the report of the 2011 ILO high-level mission, it would be useful for the Government to provide clearer statistics confined to trade unions that are in operation, and not those that have ceased to operate, and making a distinction between the public and private sectors, with a view to indicating the level of trade union membership and the coverage of collective bargaining in both sectors. The Committee considers that such data can also be useful in determining the representativity of trade union confederations. The Committee once again requests the Government to produce statistics on the unionization rate and the coverage of collective bargaining and on other aspects of trade union activities.

Guinea

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1959)

Observations from workers' organizations. In its previous observation the Committee asked the Government to send comments on the observations made in 2008 and 2010 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) containing serious allegations of assaults by the security forces on demonstrators and strikers, and arrests of trade unionists, the ransacking of the headquarters of the National Confederation of Workers of Guinea (CNTG) and the search by military personnel of the residence of the general secretary of the CNTG.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that: (1) following a transition period (2008–10) and free, transparent and democratic presidential elections, acts of violence, murders and disappearances of trade union leaders are a thing of the past, and fundamental rights at work are scrupulously respected; (2) the Government enjoys excellent collaborative relations with the trade union movement; (3) in its desire to create a climate of lasting peace, the Government has just established a forum for periodic consultation with the social partners, including the CNTG; and (4) this forum has enabled negotiations to be held aimed at improving workers' living conditions and the Government will make every effort to ensure the application in law and in practice of the international standards which it has freely adopted. The Committee further notes the observations of 31 July 2012 from the ITUC, which report the attempted assassination of the newly elected general secretary of the CNTG, death threats received by other leaders and an attack on the confederation's headquarters which resulted in serious injuries to seven persons. The Committee recalls that freedom of association can only be exercised in conditions in which fundamental rights, and in particular those relating to human life and personal safety, are fully respected and guaranteed. Moreover, in the event of assaults on the physical or moral integrity of individuals, an independent judicial enquiry should be instituted without delay since this is a particularly appropriate method for fully clarifying the facts, determining responsibility, punishing those responsible and preventing the repetition of such acts. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure observance of these principles.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee's previous comments referred to the need to take steps to set up an independent body having the confidence of the parties, in order to reach a decision without delay on the difficulties encountered in the definition of the minimum service in the event of disagreement between the parties in the transport and communication services. The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (1) to date, no independent body exists for deciding on this matter; (2) by means of Order No. 2732/MEFPRATE/CAB/2010 establishing the structure and operation of the Labour and Social Legislation Advisory Committee, the Government has established a tripartite body whose task is to rule on all questions relating to the world of work; (3) a national body for social dialogue will be established in the very near future; (4) these questions will be placed on the agenda of forthcoming sessions of the Labour and Social Legislation Advisory Committee; and (5) the Government is requesting technical assistance from the Office in this respect. The Committee hopes that the technical assistance requested by the Government will be provided in the very near future and requests the Government to supply information in its next report on the work done by the Labour and Social Legislation Advisory Committee on the definition of minimum services in the transport and communication services.

The Committee's previous comments also referred to the need to take steps to ensure that compulsory arbitration is restricted to cases where both parties agree to request it, in essential services in the strict sense of the term, or in the event of an acute national or local crisis (sections 342, 350 and 351 of the Labour Code). The Committee notes the Government's indication that a draft Labour Code is being prepared and that sections 433(1) and (6) take account of the Committee's comments in this regard. The Committee requests the Government to supply information in its next report on the status of the legislative process relating to the new Labour Code and to send a copy of the legislative text once it has been adopted.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1959)

Observations from workers' organizations. The Committee notes the observations dated 31 July 2012 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which are dealt with in the observation relating to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments the Committee underlined the need to include in the national legislation specific provisions: (1) to protect all workers, and not only trade union delegates, against acts of anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment and during employment; (2) to provide explicitly for appeal procedures and penalties acting as an adequate deterrent against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference; and (3) to provide for rapid appeal procedures and penalties acting as an adequate deterrent for violations of section 3 of the draft new Labour Code (which provides that no employer may take account of membership of a trade union and trade union activities of workers in making decisions about recruitment, performance and distribution of work, and termination of the employment contract). The Committee notes the Government's statement that these issues were not a subject of discussion during the first session of the Labour and Social Legislation Advisory Committee, but that they might be placed on the agenda during forthcoming sessions and before the next legislative consultations. The Committee expresses the strong hope that the Labour and Social Legislation Advisory Committee will deal with these issues in the very near future and requests the Government to provide information on this matter. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on any developments regarding the establishment of the national body for social dialogue which it mentions in its report relating to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Article 2. Protection against acts of interference In its previous comment the Committee emphasized the need to include in the draft new Labour Code specific provisions on protection against acts of interference in the internal affairs of workers' and employers' organizations, together with efficient and speedy procedures and penalties acting as an adequate deterrent. The Committee notes the Government's statement that section 321(1) and (2) of the draft Code provides for protection against acts of interference. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the status of the legislative process concerning the new draft Labour Code – which has been at the preparation stage for many years – and to send a copy once it has been adopted. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary steps to ensure that the new Labour Code is in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

Social dialogue. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it has just established a forum for periodic consultation with the social partners, and this has enabled negotiations to be held aimed at improving workers' living conditions. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the functioning of this forum for periodic consultation and on any further steps taken to develop social dialogue.

Guyana

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report does not reply to the outstanding comments. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee recalls that its previous observation referred to the following questions:

- the need to amend the Public Utility Undertakings and Public Health Services Arbitration Act (Chapter 54:01) in respect to: (1) conferring on the Minister broad powers to refer a dispute in the services listed in the schedule to a tribunal for compulsory arbitration and the sanction (fine or imprisonment) imposed on workers who take part in an illegal strike (section 19); (2) the schedule listing the essential services (which may be revised at the discretion of the Minister) that contains some services that go beyond those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population (dockage, wharfage, discharging, loading or unloading of vessels, the services provided by the Transport and Harbours Department and the National Drainage and Irrigation Board cannot be considered essential services in the strict sense of the term). The Committee recalled that the authorities may establish, with the participation of workers' and employers' organizations, a system of minimum service in those services considered to be of public utility; and
- section 19 of the Public Utility Undertakings and Public Health Services Arbitration (Amendment) Bill 2006 that sets higher fines than those provided for in the previous Act and maintains the imprisonment for those workers who take part in an illegal strike.

The Committee had noted the Government's statement to the effect that there is no restriction on the right to strike and that workers who choose to strike are protected by the law. The Committee once again reminds the Government that, by conferring on the Minister broad powers to refer to compulsory arbitration disputes in services, not all of which are essential, and by providing for sanctions (fine or imprisonment) in the event of an illegal strike, the Public Utility Undertakings and Public Health Services Arbitration Act and the Bill introduced to amend it compromise the workers' right to strike which the Committee considers to be one of the essential means available to them to protect their interests.

The Committee expresses the hope that necessary measures will be taken to amend the legislation so as to bring it in conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any progress made in this respect.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report does not reply to the outstanding comments. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

In its previous observation, the Committee referred to the recognition of only those unions claiming 40 per cent support of the workers, as set out in the Trade Union Recognition Act. The Committee takes note of the Government's statement that, at the request of the Trades Union Congress, the Trade Union Recognition Act provided for the recognition of unions that were recognized prior to the Act without having to prove that they had majority support (section 32). All unions benefited from this provision which the Government says is no longer applicable as all certificates applicable under this section have been issued. Given that the representativeness of unions might change, the Committee recalls once again that, if no union covers more than 40 per cent of the workers in the bargaining unit, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their members (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 241). The Committee hopes that significant progress respecting this issue will be made in the near future and requests the Government to provide information on the results of the consultative process.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Haiti

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1979)

The Committee takes note of the Government's reply to the comments of 4 August 2011 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that referred in particular to acts of violence against demonstrators and the murder of two trade unionists in the transport sector. The Committee notes in particular the indication that one of the trade unionists fell foul of the general climate of insecurity in the country leading up to the elections of 2010 and that the other died following an illness. It also notes the ITUC's new comments of 31 July 2012, some of which concern legislative issues already raised by the Committee.

The Committee has for many years been asking the Government to amend the national legislation, particularly the Labour Code, in order to align it with the provisions of the Convention. In its previous observations the Committee noted that the Government had reported the establishment of a committee to consider the reform of the Labour Code and that in the revision of the Labour Code the Committee's comments would be taken into account and that, to that end, it was receiving technical assistance from the Office. The Committee accordingly expressed the hope that the Government would continue to benefit from the Office's technical assistance so that real progress could be made in revising the legislation to bring it fully into conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes in this connection the technical assistance the country continued to receive in 2012, particularly in the ongoing work to reform the Labour Code. The Committee notes that in its report, the Government reiterates that the social partners have begun to submit their suggestions for the new Code and that it has reason to believe that the reform will address the points raised by the Committee. In previous comments, the Committee made the following points:

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to form and join organizations of their choosing.

- The need to amend articles 229 and 233 of the Labour Code in order to ensure that minors who have reached the statutory minimum age for admission to employment are allowed to exercise their trade union rights without parental authorization.
- The need to amend section 239 of the Labour Code so as to allow foreign workers to serve as trade union officials, at least after a reasonable period of residence in the country.
- The need to guarantee for domestic workers the rights laid down in the Convention (section 257 of the Labour Code establishes that domestic work is not governed by the Code, and the Act adopted by Parliament in 2009 to amend this provision – which has not yet been promulgated but to which the Government referred in its previous reports – likewise omits the trade union rights of domestic workers).

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes.

- The need to revise the Labour Code's provisions on compulsory arbitration so as to ensure that recourse to the latter in order to end a collective labour dispute or a strike may be had only in specific circumstances, namely: (1) when the two parties to the dispute so agree; or (2) where a strike may be restricted, or prohibited, namely: (a) in disputes involving officials who exercise authority in the name of the State; (b) in disputes in essential services in the strict sense of the term; or (c) in situations of acute national or local crisis, although only for a limited period and solely to the extent necessary to meet the requirements of the situation.

While aware of the difficulties the country is facing, the Committee trusts that with the technical assistance it is receiving, in particular for the reform of the Labour Code, and with the political will reaffirmed by the Government, the latter will be in a position in its next report to provide information on progress made in revising the national legislation to bring it fully into conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide copies of any new texts adopted.

Furthermore, the Committee notes with interest that a tripartite training course on international labour standards and the ILO supervisory system, was organized by the Office in July 2012 in Port-au-Prince for stakeholders in the garment sector, as a first stage in the process to build capacity in the area of international labour standards in Haiti. The Committee hopes that this process will continue with technical assistance from the Office.

Lastly, concerning its comments on the need to revise section 236 of the Penal Code, under which government consent is required for the establishment of an association of more than 20 members, the Committee notes the information supplied by the Government to the effect that this provision does not apply to trade unions.

The Committee raises other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the observations dated 31 July 2012 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which deal in particular with legislative issues already raised by the Committee and with allegations of anti-union dismissals and obstacles to the exercise of trade union rights, particularly in the export processing zones. The ITUC also raises the issue of the observance of trade union rights of workers in the informal economy. Noting that most employment in Haiti is in the informal sector, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the application of the Convention to workers in the informal economy is ensured and to clarify, in particular, whether specific measures have been adopted to address the particular difficulties encountered by these workers. The Committee also requests the Government to supply information on the application of the Convention in the export processing zones.

The Committee recalls that it has been asking the Government for many years to amend the national legislation, particularly the Labour Code, in order to bring it into conformity with the provisions of the Convention. In its previous observations the Committee noted that the Government referred to the establishment of a “think tank” for the reform of the Labour Code, that this reform would take account of the Committee’s comments and that the Government was availing itself of technical assistance from the Office towards this end. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would continue to avail itself of such assistance in order to enable real progress in the revision of the national legislation in order to bring it into full conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes the technical assistance that the country has continued to receive in 2012, particularly in the context of the work in progress for the reform of the Labour Code.

The Committee recalls that its comments refer principally to:

Article 1 of the Convention. Adequate protection of workers against acts of anti-union discrimination in respect of their employment. The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the need to adopt a specific provision establishing protection against anti-union discrimination in recruitment practices, and the need to adopt provisions generally affording adequate protection to workers against acts of anti-union discrimination (on the basis of union membership or activity) during employment, accompanied by effective and rapid procedures and penalties acting as an adequate deterrent.

The Committee notes that section 251 of the Labour Code provides that: “any employer who, in order to prevent an employee from joining a trade union, organizing a trade union or exercising his or her rights as a trade union member, dismisses, suspends or demotes the employee or reduces his or her wages, shall be liable to a fine of 1,000 to 3,000 Haitian gourdes (HTG) (approximately US$25 to US$75) to be imposed by the labour tribunal, without prejudice to any compensation to which the employee concerned shall be entitled”. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates in its report that the social partners have begun to submit their views with regard to the preparation of the new Labour Code and that the points raised by the Committee regarding protection against anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment and during employment are due to receive particular attention in the context of the reform in progress. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that, in the context of the reform of the Labour Code, the penalties provided for in the event of anti-union discrimination during employment are made more severe, in order to ensure that they act as an adequate deterrent. It also requests the Government to ensure that a specific provision establishing protection against anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment is adopted.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that its previous comment also concerned the need to amend section 34 of the Decree of 4 November 1983, which empowers the Labour Organizations Branch of the Labour Directorate of the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour to intervene in the drafting of collective agreements and in collective labour disputes with respect of all matters related to freedom of association. Noting the Government’s indication that this matter is due to receive particular attention in the context of the legislative reform in progress, the Committee hopes that the Government will avail itself of the technical assistance provided by the Office in this context to amend section 34 of the Decree of 4 November 1983, in order to ensure that the Labour Organizations Branch can only intervene in collective bargaining at the request of the parties. The Committee requests the Government to send a copy of any amendments adopted to this effect.

Right to collective bargaining of public officials and employees. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the legal provisions relating to this field.

Right to collective bargaining in practice. The Committee appreciates the information to the effect that, further to the tripartite training on international labour standards and the ILO supervisory system organized by the Office in Port-au-Prince in July 2012 for interested parties in the textile manufacturing sector, the participants affirmed the need, in order to continue to strengthen dialogue between the interested parties in this sector, to establish a permanent forum for bipartite dialogue which would meet each month to discuss all ILO-related subjects, and any other subject connected with labour relations. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the activities of this dialogue forum and hopes that this process will be extended to other sectors, with technical assistance from the Office.

Finally, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that there is just one collective agreement in the country. The Government adds that it is essential that the “think tank” on the reform of the Labour Code takes account of the possibilities of promoting collective bargaining for all categories of workers. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the aforementioned possibilities, and on any further developments in the situation (number of collective agreements concluded, sectors concerned and number of workers covered).

Honduras

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

Comments from workers' and employers' organizations

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee also notes the Government's reply to the comments of 2009 and 2011 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) referring to legislative issues still pending and to murders and shootings of trade unionists, and the ITUC's new comments of 31 July 2012 alleging an attempt on the life of a trade union leader and the arbitrary detention of trade union officials and members. The Committee notes that the Government provides information on the investigations and court proceedings under way in these cases. The Government also reports that the cases already investigated and referred to the courts pertain to ordinary law offences and are unrelated to trade union activity. While noting that a Public Safety Reform Committee had been created, the Committee emphasizes that a truly free and independent trade union movement can develop only in a climate that is free of violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations. The Committee asks the Government to ensure that this principle is observed.

The Committee also notes the ITUC's comments on the National Hourly Employment Programme. In this respect, the Committee notes the conclusions and recommendations made in this connection by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2899 (see 364th Report, June 2012, paragraphs 568–574).

Legislative issues. The Committee recalls that for many years it has referred to the need to amend several provisions of the Labour Code to bring them into line with the Convention. The Committee's comments referred to:

- the exclusion from the scope of the Labour Code, and consequently from the rights and guarantees of the Convention, of workers in agricultural and stock-raising enterprises which do not permanently employ more than ten workers (section 2(1) of the Labour Code);
- the prohibition of more than one trade union in a single enterprise, institution or establishment (section 472 of the Labour Code);
- the requirement of more than 30 workers to establish a trade union (section 475 of the Labour Code);
- the requirement that the officers of a trade union, federation or confederation must be of Honduran nationality (sections 510(a) and 541(a) of the Labour Code), be engaged in the corresponding activity (sections 510(c) and 541(c) of the Labour Code), and be able to read and write (sections 510(d) and 541(d) of the Labour Code);
- the ban on strikes being called by federations and confederations (section 537 of the Labour Code); the requirement of a two-thirds majority of the votes of the total membership of the trade union organization in order to call a strike (sections 495 and 563 of the Labour Code); the authority of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security to end disputes in oil production, refining, transport and distribution services (section 555(2) of the Labour Code); the need for government authorization or a six-month period of notice for any suspension or stoppage of work in public services that do not depend directly or indirectly on the State (section 558 of the Labour Code); the referral to compulsory arbitration, without the possibility of calling a strike for as long as the arbitration award is in force (two years), of collective disputes in public services that are not essential in the strict sense of the term, that is services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population (sections 554(2) and (7), 820 and 826 of the Labour Code).

The Committee notes that, in referring to these issues, the Government states that there have been no proposals to amend the legislative provisions in question. The Committee observes that the Government no longer refers to the draft reform of the Labour Code that included several amendments requested by the Committee. Nonetheless, the Committee notes the Government's statement that the country is firmly committed to reforming the labour legislation. The Government adds that, pending the support requested of the International Labour Office, it will take measures with a view to harmonizing the labour legislation with ratified Conventions and that for this purpose a technical committee is working on draft decrees that will implement this high-ranking objective. The Government also indicates that the employers' and workers' sectors will be invited so as to ensure that these drafts, when submitted for tripartite scrutiny in the Social and Economic Council, following awareness-raising action, achieve the expected consensus. Furthermore, the Committee notes that, according to the Government, a comprehensive national programme with an immediate action plan on standards and fundamental rights at work in Honduras is to be proposed. The Government states that its efforts will be backed up with technical assistance from the ILO. The Committee hopes that all the initiatives referred to by the Government will enable the legislation to be brought into line with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee expresses the firm hope that, with technical assistance from the Office, and in full consultation with the social partners, the Government will take all necessary steps to align the Labour Code with the Convention. The Committee trusts that, in that process, all the issues it has raised will be taken into account. It asks the Government to provide information on any measures adopted in this regard in its next report.

Comments from workers' and employers' organizations

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments of 31 July 2009, 2011 and 2012 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) referring to pending legislative matters and to: (1) The framing of a bill which could result in collective bargaining being authorized only for unions that represent more than 50 per cent of all employees in the enterprise. In this regard, the Government indicates that there is no record of such a bill having been submitted to parliament. (2) The creation of parallel unions by employers. The Government indicates in this regard that the competent bodies have received no formal complaints about the establishment of such organizations. (3) Anti-union practices in the export processing zones and various enterprises in the cement and bakery sectors, slow proceedings dealing with complaints of anti-union practices and non-compliance with court orders to reinstate trade unionists. The Government states in this regard that, through the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, it will seek to have these items put on the Economic and Social Council's agenda. (4) Cases of anti-union dismissals. In this respect, the Government indicates that investigations are under way in the course of the General Labour Inspectorate's work, and that court proceedings have been initiated, and in one case a trade unionist was reinstated.

Legislative matters. Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection from acts of discrimination and interference. The Committee recalls that for many years it has referred in its comments to:

- The lack of adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, since the penalties provided for in section 469 of the Labour Code for persons who interfere with the right to freedom of association range from 200 to 10,000 lempiras (200 lempiras being roughly equivalent to US$12) are obviously insufficient and a mere token. The Committee notes that in its report, the Government reiterates that protection against any act of discrimination that undermines freedom of association in the sphere of employment is guaranteed by the provisions of: (1) article 128(14) of the Constitution of the Republic, which confers the right to freedom of association on employers and workers alike; (2) section 517 of the Labour Code, which grants special state protection to workers when they notify to their employers their intention of forming a union and which provides that, from the date of such notification until receipt of the notice of legal personality, none of the notifying workers may be dismissed or transferred or suffer any impairment of their working conditions without due cause, as defined previously by the competent authority; and (3) the provisions of the Code that impose the penalties indicated by the Committee. The Committee again asks the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to take the necessary steps to amend the penalties established in section 469 of the Labour Code so as to make them dissuasive. The Committee further recalls that in its previous observation, it asked the Government to indicate specific cases in which section 321 of Decree No. 191-96 of 31 October 1996 (establishing penal sanctions for discrimination) has been used to apply sanctions for acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee notes that according to the Government, the Ministry of Labour and Social Security sought information on the matter from the Office of the General Prosecutor of the Republic and is awaiting a reply in order to report back to the Committee. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide this information in its next report.
- The absence of full and appropriate protection against all acts of interference, and sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties against such acts. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that the legislation does contain provisions to afford workers' organizations adequate protection against all acts of interference by employers, a case in point being section 511 of the Labour Code, which bars from membership of executive committees of enterprise unions or first-level unions or from appointment to trade union office members who, on account of their duties in the enterprise, represent the employer or hold management posts or positions of trust or who are able easily to exercise undue pressure on their colleagues. The Committee recalls in this connection that the protection of Article 2 of the Convention is broader than that afforded by section 511 of the Labour Code and that in order to ensure that effect is given to Article 2 of the Convention in practice, the legislation must make express provision for sufficiently dissuasive remedies and sanctions against acts of interference by employers against workers and their organizations, including against measures that are intended to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination of employers or employers' organizations, or to support workers' organizations by financial or other means with the objective of placing such organizations under the control of employers or employers' organizations. The Committee again requests the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to take the necessary steps to these ends.

Article 6. Right of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State to bargain collectively. In its previous comments the Committee pointed out that, although Article 6 of the Convention allows public servants engaged in the administration of the State to be excluded from the Convention's coverage, other categories of workers must be able to enjoy the guarantees laid down in the Convention and thus bargain collectively for their conditions of employment, including pay. The Committee asked the Government to take the necessary steps to amend sections 534 and 536 of the Labour Code barring unions of public employees from submitting lists of claims or signing collective agreements. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has sent no information on this matter. The Committee again asks the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the legislation to take account to the abovementioned principle.

The Committee notes that the Government states that it will take steps to align the labour legislation with ratified Conventions, in the framework of the Economic and Social Council, with support from the ILO. The Committee trusts that all the issues it has highlighted will be taken into account, and asks the Government to provide information on any measures adopted in its next report.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 102nd Session and to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Hungary

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the Government's report, including the information provided concerning Act No. LXXIII of 2009 on the National Council for the Reconciliation of Interests and Act No. LXXIV of 2009 on the Sectoral Dialogue Committees and certain issues of medium-level social dialogue, as well as the statistical data concerning the number and coverage of recently concluded collective agreements. It also notes the Government's observations on the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 4 August 2011.

The Committee notes the comments of the ITUC dated 31 July 2012 on the application of the Convention. It requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee also notes the adoption on 13 December 2011 of Act I of 2012 enacting the Labour Code.

Article 1 of the Convention. Anti-union discrimination. The Committee previously noted the Office's comments on the draft labour law, in particular on the need to provide for rapid appeal procedures and dissuasive sanctions in case of acts of anti-union discrimination. With respect to trade union officials, the Committee notes that: (i) section 273 of the new Labour Code provides for the protection of a limited number of union officials against acts of anti-union discrimination in the form of termination or transfer by requiring the prior consent of the higher trade union body; (ii) section 83 grants reinstatement in case of dismissals violating the requirement for prior consent of the union's higher body before terminating a trade union official; (iii) section 82 provides compensation not exceeding the worker's 12-month absence pay in case of unlawful dismissals of trade union officials; (iv) it is unclear whether the new Labour Code stipulates penalties for acts of anti-union discrimination against trade union officials; and (v) the 1996 Labour Inspection Act was amended to cover compliance with rules related to employment protection of employees in an elected trade union position, and levying a fine is mandatory if an employer has failed to grant the protection envisaged in the Labour Code to such employees. As regards trade union affiliates, the Committee notes that: (i) section 271 of the new Labour Code generally prohibits termination or discrimination of employees on the grounds of their trade union affiliation or activity, both at the time of taking up employment and in the course of employment; (ii) in case of unlawful dismissals of trade union members, section 82 provides compensation not exceeding the worker's 12-month absence pay; (iii) it is unclear whether the new Labour Code stipulates sanctions for acts of anti-union discrimination against trade union affiliates; and (iv) the Labour Inspection Act establishes particularly severe sanctions for repeated offences violating the rights of several employees. The Committee requests the Government to provide information concerning the amount of fines and information or other penalties that can be imposed by labour inspection in cases of acts of anti-union discrimination against trade union officials or trade union affiliates.

Moreover, concerning the effective protection in practice against anti-union dismissals and other acts of anti-union discrimination, the Committee notes that: (i) the Government provides information concerning the proceedings instituted by the Equal Treatment Authority; (ii) the ITUC referred in 2011 to a number of alleged specific acts of anti-union discrimination; and (iii) in the framework of Case No. 2775, the Committee on Freedom of Association has examined numerous allegations of this nature as well as alleged delays in the related proceedings. The Committee invites the Government to initiate a forum of dialogue with the most representative workers' and employers' organizations with regard to the functioning and length of the existing proceedings related to anti-union discrimination.

Article 2. Acts of interference. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated so as to adopt specific legislative provisions prohibiting acts of anti-union interference. The Committee notes that the Government once again indicates in its report that it considers that the Constitution, the Labour Code, the Act on the Right to Association along with section 15 of the Public Finance Act and the severe sanctions envisaged in the Labour Inspection Act for repeated offences violating the rights of several employees are sufficient to prevent acts of interference. The Committee also notes that, according to section 271(4) of the new Labour Code, any entitlement or benefit may not be rendered contingent upon affiliation or lack of affiliation to a trade union. In this respect, the Committee recalls that the specific forms of acts of interference likely to impair the guarantees established by the Convention are very varied in nature. The Committee observes that the provisions in force do not seem to cover all forms of anti-union interference. It highlights the necessity to adopt protective provisions against all acts of interference, in particular those designed to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination of employers or employers' organizations, or to place workers' organizations under the control of employers or employers' organizations through financial or other means. The Committee is also of the view that legislation should make express provision for rapid appeal procedures, coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference in order to guarantee the application in practice of Article 2 of the Convention (see 1994 General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 231–232). The Committee requests the Government to adopt specific legislative provisions prohibiting all acts of anti-union interference on the part of the employer. It further requests the Government to provide information on the sanctions imposed in law and in practice in case of acts of anti-union interference.

Article 4. Representativeness for the conclusion of collective agreements. The Committee previously requested the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated so as to lower the 65 per cent requirement set out in the Labour Code, as well as to ensure that, where no union represents 65 per cent of the employees in a bargaining unit, collective bargaining rights are granted to all unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee notes the Government's indication that trade unions will no longer need to represent 65 per cent of the workforce in order to be able to engage in collective bargaining. The Committee notes with satisfaction that, according to section 276(2) of the newly adopted Labour Code, trade unions shall be entitled to conclude collective agreements if the number of their members reaches 10 per cent: (i) of all workers employed by the employers; or (ii) of the number of workers covered by the collective agreement concluded by the employers' interest group; and that two or more trade unions may join to reach the required percentage. Noting also the statistical data provided by the Government regarding collective bargaining, the Committee invites the Government to provide further details with respect to the sectors and the total number of workers covered by collective agreements.

Indonesia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee also notes the response of the Government to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2011. However, the Government does not respond to certain allegations, in particular those relating to violence against striking workers and acts of intimidation against union leaders. The Committee further notes that, in its response to new comments made by the ITUC in a communication dated 31 July 2012, which relate to a number of matters already raised by the Committee, as well as violations of the Convention, the Government also fails to respond to serious allegations relating to excessive violence and arrests in relation to demonstrations and police involvement in strike situations, including in one case of recourse to firing that led to the death of two strikers. The Committee notes that the Government only reiterates in connection with the police role in strikes that it has been regulated in Kapolri Regulation No. 1/2005 (Guidelines on the conduct of the Indonesian Police to ensure law enforcement and order in industrial disputes). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the abovementioned allegations. It further requests it to take all necessary measures to ensure that the use of excessive violence in trying to control demonstrations is avoided, that arrests are made only where serious violence or other criminal acts have been committed, and that the police are called in a strike situation only where there is a genuine and imminent threat to public order.

Trade union rights and civil liberties. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal or amend sections 160 and 335 of the Penal Code, respectively on "instigation" and "unpleasant acts", so as to ensure that these provisions cannot be used abusively as a pretext for the arbitrary arrest and detention of trade unionists. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that progress on the amendment of the Code is still under discussion between ministries. The Committee reiterates its hope that, in the framework of the review of the Penal Code, sections 160 and 335 will be repealed or amended, and requests the Government to provide information on the developments in this regard.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right to organize of civil servants. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed the hope that the Government will adopt an act guaranteeing the exercise of the right to organize to civil servants, pursuant to section 4 of Act No. 21 of 2000, which proclaims that civil servants shall enjoy freedom of association and that the implementation of this right shall be regulated in a separate act, so as to bring the legislation into full conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that there is no prohibition for civil servants to form unions and that the absence of specific legislation on the right to organize of civil servants is the result of the fact that political will from all parties is still needed. In this context, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any development in this regard.

Right to organize of employers. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to specify whether employers' organizations could be established independently of the Indonesian Chamber of Commerce and Industry (KADIN). The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that the Indonesian Employers' Association (APINDO), which is affiliated to KADIN, is an independent employers' organization. The Committee notes that the Government adds that there is no restriction in Act No. 1/1987 creating KADIN to the possibility of forming other employers' organizations.

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes. In its previous comments, the Committee made a number of requests to the Government in relation to the conditions for the exercise of the right to strike, in particular in relation to: the conditions for the determination of failed negotiations (section 4 of Ministerial Decree No. KEP.232/MEN/2003); the conditions for the issuance of back-to-work orders (section 6(2) and (3) of Ministerial Decree No. KEP.232/MEN/2003); the extensive time period accorded to mediation/conciliation procedures (Industrial Relations Dispute Settlement Act No. 2 of 2004); and the imposition of criminal conviction for violation of certain provisions in relation to the right to strike (section 186 of the Manpower Act). The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that a review of Ministerial Decree No. KEP.232/MEN/2003 (concerning section 4, the Government indicates that, in practice, the determination of failed negotiations is left to the parties) and of Act No. 2 of 2004 is under way, in consultation with the relevant stakeholders. It also notes that the Government indicates, in relation to section 186 of the Manpower Act, that it has not yet considered amending it. The Committee expresses the firm hope that, in the context of the review of the legislation, its previous comments will be taken into account so as to bring the legislation into conformity with the principles of freedom of association. It requests the Government to provide information in its next report on steps taken in this regard.

Article 4. Dissolution and suspension of organizations by administrative authority. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that if trade union officials violate either section 21 or 31 of Trade Union/Labour Union Act No. 21 of 2000 – by either failing to inform the Government of any changes in the union's constitution or by-laws within 30 days or failing to report any financial assistance coming from overseas sources – serious sanctions can be imposed under section 42 of the Trade Union/Labour Union Act, namely, the revocation and loss of trade union rights or suspension. Considering that such sanctions are disproportionate, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated so as to repeal the reference to sections 21 and 31 in section 42 of the Trade Union/Labour Union Act. The Committee also requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated so as to ensure that organizations affected by measures of dissolution or suspension by the administrative authority have a right of appeal to an independent and impartial judicial body, and that such administrative decisions do not take effect until that body issues a final decision. Noting that the Government reiterates that it is conducting a review of Trade Union/Labour Union Act No. 21 of 2000, the Committee expresses the hope that, in the framework of this review, the Government will fully take into account the Committee's comments. It requests the Government to provide information on developments in this regard.

The Committee reminds the Government that if it so wishes it may take advantage of technical assistance from the International Labour Office in relation to the issues raised in these comments.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Iraq

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 31 July 2012, denouncing the persistence of violence against trade unionists in the journalism, printing and textile sectors, and acts of interference in the internal affairs of the General Federation of Iraqi Workers (GFIW). The Committee recalls that it noted previously the ITUC's allegations that an order issued by the Ministry of Electricity in July 2011 had prohibited trade union activities by the Electricity Workers' Union, closed all its offices and taken control of its assets and property. The Committee wishes once again to recall the interdependence between civil liberties and trade union rights, and to emphasize that a genuinely free and independent trade union movement can only develop in a climate of respect for fundamental human rights and that the exercise of freedom of association is not possible in a climate of violence, pressure, fear and threats. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that it will be possible in the near future for trade union rights and the right to collective bargaining to be exercised normally and in accordance with fundamental rights, in a climate free from violence, duress, fear and any kind of threat. The Committee also requests the Government to provide its observations in reply to the serious allegations made by the ITUC.

The Committee recalls that for many years the Government has been engaged in a process of the adoption of a new Labour Code, with a view to giving effect to ratified Conventions, including those on freedom of association and the recognition of the right to collective bargaining. In this respect, the Committee recalls that in recent years its comments have focused on the provisions of the draft Labour Code respecting protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, and the promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee however observed in its previous observation that all the provisions respecting trade unions were removed from the draft Labour Code with a view to their eventual inclusion in a special law on trade unions. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Labour Code is currently being examined by Parliament prior to its adoption. The Committee recalls the need to ensure that the legislative process is completed in the very near future so as to ensure the effective implementation of the right to organize and to collective bargaining. It trusts that the Government will report in the near future the adoption of provisions in this respect, whether they are included in the Labour Code or a special law on trade unions, and that these provisions will take duly into account the comments that it has been making for many years on the following points.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee recalls the need to adopt provisions affording adequate protection against all measures (in relation to recruitment, transfer, demotion, dismissal and other measures with adverse affects) which may constitute acts of anti-union discrimination against trade union members and leaders. These provisions should establish effective and expeditious procedures to ensure their application in practice and be accompanied by sufficiently dissuasive sanctions.

Article 4. Recognition of trade unions for the purposes of collective bargaining. While it considers that a system of collective bargaining based on the exclusive bargaining rights of the most representative union is compatible with the principles of freedom of association, the Committee emphasizes that problems may arise where it is established by law that a trade union must receive the support of 50 per cent of the members of a bargaining unit to be recognized as a bargaining agent, since a union that fails to secure this absolute majority would thus be denied the possibility of bargaining. The Committee recalls the need to ensure that if no union, or group of unions, covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights should not be denied to the unions in the unit concerned, at least on the behalf of their own members. The Committee hopes that the new legislation will be fully in conformity with this principle.

Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee recalls the need to ensure that the rights set forth in the Convention are fully guaranteed to all workers in the private sector and in the public sector, and in particular in the latter case to officials who are not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee also recalls that the right to organize, which is a preliminary condition for the development of collective bargaining, is applicable to all public servants, with the sole possible exception of the armed forces and the police.

Trade union monopoly. The Committee recalls the need to remove any obstacles to trade union pluralism and recalls in this respect that its previous comments concerned the need to repeal the Trade Union Organization Act No. 52 of 1987 and Government Decision No. 8750 of 2005.

Kiribati

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

The Committee noted with interest that the Kiribati Tripartite Committee drafted, with the assistance of the ILO, several amendments to national labour laws in order to give effect to the Committee's previous comments. The Committee noted, in particular that, upon adoption of the Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Amendment Bill, section 21 of the Trade Union and Employers' Organizations Act, will be amended by introducing a comprehensive guarantee of the right to organize for all workers and employers. Moreover, upon adoption of the Industrial Relations Code Amendment Bill, section 39 of the Industrial Relations Code will be amended so that a strike decision can be adopted upon approval by a majority of employees who voted in the ballot. These amendments have been recently approved in the first reading by Parliament. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of progress made in the adoption of these amendments to section 21 of the Trade Union and Employers' Organizations Act and section 39 of the Industrial Relations Code.

The Committee also noted, however, that certain issues have not been addressed yet or are still under consideration.

Article 2 of the Convention. Minimum membership requirement. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 7 of the Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Act so as to lower the minimum membership requirement for the registration of an employers' organization which is set at seven members. The Committee noted, from the Government's report, that due note has been taken of this comment, which is currently under review by the Ministry of Labour, the Kiribati Chamber of Commerce and Industry and the Kiribati Trade Union Congress; the Government will inform the Committee on the outcome and measures taken as a result of these discussions. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of the outcome of consultations and to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated with a view to amending section 7 of the Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Act so as to lower the minimum membership requirement for the registration of an employers' organization.

Right of public employees to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee had previously noted that section L.1 of the National Conditions of Service provides that all employees are free to join a "recognized" staff association or union and had requested the Government to amend this section, given that there is no provision in the law relating to the recognition of trade unions. The Committee noted the Government's indication that due note has been taken of this comment which is currently under review with the social partners and the Committee will be kept informed of the outcome and measures taken as a result of these discussions. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of the outcome of consultations and to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated with a view to amending section L.1 of the National Conditions of Service so as to remove the reference to "recognized" staff associations or unions.

Article 3. Right of employers' and workers' organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules, elect their representatives in full freedom, organize their administration and activities and formulate their programmes. Right to elect representatives freely. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that there is no provision in the law regarding the right of workers and employers to elect their representatives. The Committee noted the Government's indication that the current practice in which workers and employers elect their representatives, on the basis of their freely drawn constitution, is in line with the Convention. The Government added that it has taken due note of the Committee's comment which is currently under review by the social partners and the Committee will be kept informed of the outcome and measures taken as a result of these discussions. The Committee took due note of this information.

Compulsory arbitration. In a previous direct request, the Committee had requested the Government to amend sections 8(1)(d), 12, 27 and 28 of the Industrial Relations Code so as to limit the possibility of prohibiting strikes and imposing compulsory arbitration only to those cases which would be in conformity with the Convention. The Committee noted from the Government's report that section 12 will be amended upon adoption of the draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill through addition of a new section 12(A)(1) according to which the registrar may only refer a trade dispute to an arbitration tribunal if: (a) all the parties to the dispute request such referral; (b) the dispute is in the public services involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State; (c) industrial action has been protracted or is tending to endanger or has endangered the personal health, safety or welfare of the community or part of it; (d) conciliation has failed and the parties are unlikely to resolve the dispute.

In this regard, the Committee once again recalls that compulsory arbitration is acceptable under the Convention only at the request of both parties to the dispute, in essential services in the strict sense of the term, and for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State. The existence of protracted disputes (subsection (c)) and the failure of conciliation (subsection (d)) are not per se elements which justify the introduction of compulsory arbitration. Furthermore, the word "welfare" introduced in relation to essential services (subsection (c)) may include issues which go beyond the health and safety of the population in a strict sense and, in that case, would be contrary to the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to amend the Draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill so as to remove subsection (d) from draft section 12(A)(1)(d), as well as the reference to protracted industrial action and the "welfare of the community" from draft section 12(A)(1)(c) with a view to ensuring that compulsory arbitration is possible only where this is in conformity with the Convention.

Furthermore, concerning the conciliation and mediation machinery, the Committee considers that it should have the sole purpose of facilitating bargaining: it should not be so complex or slow that a lawful strike becomes impossible in practice or loses its effectiveness (see General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraph 171). The Committee observes in this regard that there are no specific time limits in the Industrial Relations Code for the exhaustion of conciliation proceedings and that sections 8(1)(a), (b), (c) and 9(1)(a) give the Registrar and the Minister the power to prolong the negotiation, conciliation and settlement procedure at their discretion, without any fixed time limits, while according to section 27(1), a strike which takes place before the exhaustion of procedures prescribed for the settlement of trade disputes, shall be unlawful. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated to ensure that specific time limits are introduced in the Industrial Relations Code so that the mediation and conciliation procedure is not so complex or slow that a lawful strike becomes impossible in practice.

Sanctions for strike action/essential services. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to lift the provision in section 37 of the Industrial Relations Code which has the effect of prohibiting industrial action and imposing heavy penalties including imprisonment in cases where a strike might "expose valuable property to the risk of destruction". The Committee notes with interest that the draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill will amend section 37 of the Industrial Relations Code so as to lift this provision. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in the adoption of the Draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill with a view to removing the provision of section 37 of the Industrial Relations Code which imposes heavy penalties including imprisonment for strikes in case they "expose valuable property to the risk of destruction".

The Committee also recalls that in its previous comments, it had requested the Government to amend section 37 of the Industrial Relations Code which imposes penalties of imprisonment and heavy fines for strikes in essential services. The Committee noted from the Government's report that the draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill will amend section 37 of the Industrial Relations Code so as to increase the relevant fines from US$100 to US$1,000 for strikes in essential services and from US$500 to US$2,000 for inciting others to participate in a strike in essential services; at the same time, the prison sentences of one year and 18 months, respectively, for strikes in essential services and incitement to participate, therein, have apparently not been amended.

The Committee further recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend section 30 of the Industrial Relations Code, which imposes sanctions of imprisonment and heavy fines against unlawful strikes in general. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the prison sentences have been lifted in the draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill but that the applicable fines have been increased to US$1,000 from US$100 in case of participation in an unlawful strike and have remained at US$2,000 in case of incitement to participate in an unlawful strike.

In this respect, the Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and therefore, measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. Nevertheless, even in the absence of violence, if the strike modalities had the effect of making the strike illegitimate, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be imposed against strikers. The Committee requests the Government to review the draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill so as to amend sections 30 and 37 of the Industrial Relations Code in the manner indicated above.

Articles 5 and 6. Right to establish and join federations and confederations and to affiliate with international organizations of workers and employers. In its previous comments, the Committee requested information on the provisions which guarantee the right of workers' and employers' organizations to join federations and confederations of their own choice and to affiliate with international organizations of workers and employers. The Committee noted from the Government's report that the draft Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Amendment Bill will amend section 21(2) of the Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Act, 1998, so as to provide that workers' and employers' organizations shall have the right to join a federation of trade unions or a federation of employers' organizations and to affiliate with and participate in the affairs of any international workers' organization and to contribute to or receive financial assistance from those organizations. The Committee considers that the term "international workers' and employers' organizations" would be more appropriate than "international workers' organizations" given that the right to affiliate with international organizations should be guaranteed not only to workers' but also to employers' organizations. It, therefore, requests the Government to amend the draft Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Amendment Bill and to keep it informed of progress made in the adoption of the Bill with a view to introducing provisions guaranteeing the right of employers' and workers' organizations to establish federations and to affiliate with international organizations of their own choosing.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee noted with interest from the Government's report that the Kiribati tripartite committee drafted, with the assistance of the ILO, several amendments to national labour laws in order to give effect to the Committee's previous comments. The Committee also noted, however, that certain issues had not yet been addressed in the draft or are still under consideration.

Application of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 3 of the Industrial Relations Code excludes prison officers from the application of the provision concerning collective labour disputes and reminded the Government that prison officers should enjoy the rights and guarantees enshrined in the Convention. The Committee noted from the Government's report that due note had been taken of this comment which is currently under review by the Ministry of Labour, the Kiribati Chamber of Commerce and Industry and the Kiribati Trade Union Congress. The Government will inform the Committee on the outcome and measures taken as a result of these discussions. The Committee hopes that the discussions will lead to the amendment of section 3 of the Industrial Relations Code so that prison officers are not excluded from the rights and guarantees enshrined in the Convention.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that protection against acts of anti-union discrimination existed only at the time of hiring, and requested the Government to take measures to amend the legislation so as to ensure comprehensive protection against such acts during the employment relationship and at the time of dismissal. The Committee had also requested the Government to take measures so that the legislation includes express provisions for appeals and establishes sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination for membership or participation in the activities of a trade union.

The Committee noted from the text of the draft Act to Amend the Trade Unions and Employer Organisations Act, 1998, that section 21 of the Trade Unions and Employer Organisations Act is to be amended by adding a subsection (3) according to which "nothing contained in any law shall prohibit any worker from being or becoming a member of any trade union, or cause a worker to be dismissed or otherwise prejudiced by reason of that worker's membership or participation in the activities of a trade union". Furthermore, according to subsection (4) no employer shall make it a condition of employment of any worker to neither be nor become a member of a trade union and any such condition in any contract of employment shall be void. The Committee also noted that according to subsection (5), "[a]ny employer who contravenes subsection (4) ... shall be liable to a fine not exceeding US$1,000 and to a term of imprisonment not exceeding six months". The Committee noted that, whereas sufficiently dissuasive sanctions were provided for in relation to subsection (4), no sanctions were established in relation to a violation of subsection (3). The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken in order to modify the provisions of the draft Act to Amend the Trade Unions and Employer Organisations Act, 1998, so that sufficiently dissuasive sanctions are imposed where a worker is dismissed or otherwise prejudiced because of his or her trade union membership or participation in the activities of a trade union.

Articles 2 and 3. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in the national legislation, no specific legal provisions dealt with the issue of mutual interference between employers' and workers' organizations and that there were no rapid procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference by employers against workers and workers' organizations. The Committee noted from the Government's report that due note had been taken of this comment which is currently under review by the Ministry of Labour, the Kiribati Chamber of Commerce and Industry and the Kiribati Trade Union Congress. The Government will inform the Committee on the outcome and measures taken as a result of these discussions. The Committee hopes that the review currently under way will lead to measures to modify the draft Act to Amend the Trade Unions and Employer Organisations Act, 1998, so as to introduce provisions which ensure adequate protection against acts of interference in the establishment and functioning of trade unions as well as rapid procedures and dissuasive sanctions in this respect, in accordance with Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention.

Article 4. The Committee noted with interest, that upon adoption of the Trade Unions and Employer Organisations Amendment Bill, section 41 of the Industrial Relations Code would be amended by introducing a comprehensive guarantee of the right to engage in collective bargaining over wages, terms and conditions of employment, the relations between the parties and other matters of mutual interest; this guarantee will apply to every trade union or group of trade unions and also cover public servants under the national conditions of service. Moreover, the amendment provides that regulations may be made generally for the effective exercise of the right to collective bargaining, recognition of most representative organizations and the regulation of collective agreements. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the progress made in the adoption of the draft amendment to section 41 of the Industrial Relations Code. It further requests the Government to specify the provisions which guarantee this right to federations and confederations and to indicate in the future any regulations adopted to promote the effective exercise of the right to collective bargaining.

Furthermore, the Committee's previous comments concerned sections 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 14 and 19 of the Industrial Relations Code, which allow referral of any trade dispute to compulsory arbitration at the request of one party or by decision of the authorities. The Committee is addressing this issue under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Liberia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1962)

Comments from workers' and employers' organizations

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee further notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 31 July 2012 concerning the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect, as well as on the ITUC's comments of 2008 and 2010 concerning serious acts of violence against strikers and the closure of a trade union radio station.

Legal issues. The Committee recalls that, for many years, it has been commenting on the need to amend or repeal the following provisions of the Labour Practices Law, which are inconsistent with the provisions of the Convention:

- section 4506 prohibiting workers in state enterprises and the public service from establishing trade unions;
- section 4601-A prohibiting agricultural workers from joining industrial workers' organizations; and
- section 4102, subsections 10 and 11, providing for the supervision of trade unions elections by the Labour Practices Review Board.

The Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it had noted the Government's statement to the effect that a new Labour Code – entitled "Decent Work Bill" (2009) – had been drafted. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government mentions that: (1) the Decent Work Bill takes account of all the matters raised by the Committee and the reform process is almost complete; (2) measures are under way to submit the Bill to the 53rd National Legislature; (3) a seminar with members of committees entrusted with the work of the Parliament and Senate was foreseen for May 2012; and (4) the legislation guaranteeing civil servants the right to establish trade union organizations (Ordinance on the public service) is being revised. The Committee hopes that the Decent Work Bill will be adopted in the near future and that it takes account of the comments the Committee has been making for many years. It reminds the Government that it might, if it wishes, avail itself of the Office's technical assistance. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any developments in the legislative process, as well as a copy of the text once adopted.

Finally, the Committee requests the Government to provide a copy in its next report of the text repealing Decree No. 12 of 30 June 1980 banning strikes.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

Comments from workers' organizations. The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), contained in a communication dated 31 July 2012, on matters that have been raised in previous observations.

Legislative issues. The Committee recalls that it has been making comments for many years on the need to adopt legal provisions guaranteeing:

- adequate protection against anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment and during the employment relationship, accompanied by sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions;
- adequate protection for workers' organizations against acts of interference by employers and their organizations, including sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions; and
- the right to collective bargaining to employees in state-owned enterprises and public servants who are not public officials engaged in the administration of the State.

The Committee recalls that, in its previous observations, it noted the Government's indication that a new Labour Code – entitled the Decent Work Bill – was being finalized and expressed the hope that this text would take into full consideration the comments it had been making for many years. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government states that: (1) the Decent Work Bill takes into account all the issues raised by the Committee and the reform process is almost completed; (2) steps are being taken to submit the Bill to the 53rd National Legislature; and (3) the legislation guaranteeing the right to collective bargaining to public servants and employees in state-owned enterprises (Ordinance on the public service) is currently under revision, with the technical assistance of the Office. The Committee hopes that the Decent Work Bill will be adopted in the near future and that it will take account of the comments it has been making for many years. The Committee hopes that the Government will continue to avail itself of the Office's technical assistance in this respect. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any developments in the legislative process and to provide a copy of the text once adopted.

Malta

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to indicate the procedures applicable for the examination of allegations of anti-union dismissals by public officers, port workers and public transport workers given that those categories are excluded from the jurisdiction of the industrial tribunal pursuant to section 75(1) of the Employment and Industrial Relations Act 2002 (EIRA). The Committee had noted from the Government's report that public officers have the right to appeal to the Public Service Commission, an independent body (the members are appointed by the President of Malta acting on the advice of the Prime Minister given after a consultation with the Leader of the Opposition and they cannot be removed except for inability or misbehaviour causes) established under section 109 of the Constitution of Malta. The Committee also notes from the Government's report that the Public Service Commission's primary role is to ensure that disciplinary action taken against public officers is fair, prompt and effective. The Committee requests the Government to indicate, with regard to cases of anti-union dismissal, whether the Public Service Commission is empowered to grant such compensatory relief – including reinstatement and back pay awards – as to constitute sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee also once again requests the Government to indicate the procedures applicable for the examination of allegations of anti-union dismissals of port workers and public transport workers.

Articles 2 and 3. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated so as to introduce in the legislation an explicit prohibition of acts of interference, as well as sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against such acts given that the EIRA does not expressly protect employers' and workers' organizations from acts of interference by one another, in each other's affairs. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report, the measures taken or contemplated so as to introduce in the legislation an explicit prohibition of acts of interference, as well as sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against such acts.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated with a view to amending section 6 of the National Holidays and Other Public Holidays Act, so as to ensure that this provision: (i) does not render automatically null and void any provisions in existing collective agreements which grant workers the right to recover public holidays falling on a Saturday or Sunday; and (ii) does not preclude voluntary negotiations in the future over the issue of granting workers the right to recover national or public holidays which fall on a Saturday or Sunday on the basis of a collective agreement (see 342nd Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, Case No. 2447, paragraph 752). The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated with a view to amending section 6 of the National Holidays and Other Public Holidays Act.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Myanmar

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1955)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 31 August 2012 which, while raising certain concerns about specific provisions in the recently adopted legislation, observes that there have been a number of welcome and positive developments in the freedom of association situation in Myanmar.

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee observes that, at its 316th Session, the ILO Governing Body decided to take no further action on the complaint under article 26 of the Constitution, which had been pending in relation to the application of this Convention.

Legislative framework. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with interest the enactment, by the President, of the Labour Organizations Law and expressed its firm expectation that it would come into force immediately and be applied in practice so as to ensure to all workers in the country the long-awaited legal framework in which they may exercise the rights set out in the Convention. The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Labour Organization Law came into force on 9 March 2012 and, from the latest Government communication, there are now 264 basic labour organizations, one labour federation and 12 basic employers' organizations registered under the Law. The Committee further notes with interest the enactment of the Settlement of Labour Dispute Law on 28 March 2012 and the issuance of the corresponding Rules on 26 April 2012. The Committee notes with satisfaction that the adoption of this law has given rise to the repeal of the 1929 Trade Disputes Act, upon which the Committee has been commenting for many years. The Committee further notes with interest the statement in the Government's report that Order No. 2/1988 concerning the prohibition of unlawful assembly and unlawful procession is contrary to article 354 of the Constitution and the recently promulgated Law No. 15 on the right to peaceful assembly and peaceful procession and therefore no longer has the force of law. As regards Order No. 6/1988 relating to the forming of organizations, the Government indicates that, since the entry into force of the Labour Organization Law and Law No. 15, this is only operative with respect to social organizations. The Committee therefore trusts that Order No. 6 will no longer be applicable in any way to workers' and employers' organizations within the meaning of the Convention.

As regards the provisions of the new legislation, the Committee had requested the Government in its previous comments to indicate whether more than one confederation could be formed and recognized under the Labour Organization Law and further requested the Government to indicate the steps taken to amend sections 26 and 40(b) so as to ensure the right of all workers' organizations, including at the basic level, to organize their activities and formulate their programmes in full freedom. The Committee notes with interest that a Chief Technical Adviser on freedom of association joined the liaison office in June 2012 and that he has been actively engaged with the Government, workers' and employers' organizations, to raise awareness of freedom of association rights and assist the parties in applying the newly adopted laws in a manner compatible with freedom of association principles. The Committee requests the Government to review these provisions with the social partners and the ILO so as to ensure that they are applied in practice in full conformity with the Convention and amended where necessary and to indicate the steps taken in this regard.

Civil liberties. The Committee notes with satisfaction the release of Thurein Aung, Wai Lin, Nyi Nyi Zaw, Kyaw Kyaw, Kyaw Win and Myo Min, and numerous other persons detained for exercising their basic civil liberties and freedom of association rights. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether Naw Bey Bey and Nyo Win, previously referred to in its comments, have been released.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Unlawful Association Act of 1908 does not hinder workers' freedom of association but rather punishes acts of terrorism. The Committee further notes the concerns expressed by the ITUC in relation to the ambiguous status of Declaration No. 1/2006. The Committee trusts that Declaration No. 1/2006 no longer has any legal force, especially in light of the recent return to the country of leaders and members of the Federation of Trade Unions of Burma and requests the Government to confirm this understanding.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Nigeria

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 100th Session, June 2011)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee further notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 31 July and 31 August 2012 on the application of the Convention, alleging in particular, on 24 October 2011: the storming of a trade union meeting by a combined team of army, police and security services; the physical assault of Osmond Ugwu, Chairperson of the Enugu State Workers Forum; beatings of other trade unionists attending the meeting; the arrest of Mr Ugwu and Mr Raphael Elobuiké, a trade union member; ongoing detention of the trade union leader and the union member until at least end of 2011, on charges for alleged attempted murder of a policeman; and alleged torture and beatings during custody. The Committee recalls that the rights of workers' and employers' organizations can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations. It also wishes to recall that the arrest and detention, even if only briefly, of trade union leaders and trade unionists, for exercising legitimate activities in relation with their right to organize constitutes a violation of the principles of freedom of association. The Committee further recalls that in cases of alleged torture or ill treatment while in detention, governments should carry out inquiries into complaints of this kind so that appropriate measures, including compensation for damages suffered and the sanctioning of those responsible are taken to ensure that no detainee is subjected to such treatment. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these allegations, and to ensure the respect of the abovementioned principles. It also requests the Government to provide its observations on the 2008, 2009 and 2011 ITUC comments.

The Committee also notes the comments submitted by Education International and the Nigeria Union of Teachers (NUT) on 31 August 2012, according to which employers of teachers in private educational institutions resist the express wish of their employees to belong to the NUT, and teachers in federal educational institutions have been coerced to join the Association of Senior Civil Servants of Nigeria and thus have been denied the right to belong to their professional union. The Committee recalls that teachers should have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, without previous authorization, for the promotion and defence of their occupational interests. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon. Civil liberties. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the Government's indication that eight suspects had been arrested in connection with the assassination of Mr Alhaji Saula Saka, the Lagos Zonal Chairman of the National Union of Road Transport Workers. The Committee had requested the Government to provide information concerning the results of the investigations being carried out and of any judicial proceedings. The Committee notes that the Government again indicates in its report that the assassination of Mr Saula Saka has been carried out as a result of internal squabbles within the trade union, that the police is still investigating the criminal case, and that update on the case will be forwarded as soon as the police report is received. The Committee urges the Government to provide the updated information referred to as well as detailed information on the results of the investigations being carried out with respect to the serious allegations of violence against trade unionists. The Committee also urges the Government to provide detailed information on the results of any judicial proceedings in this regard, and, in case of conviction, to ensure that any sentence imposed on the perpetrators is implemented.

Legislative issues

Article 2 of the Convention. Legislatively imposed trade union monopoly. In its previous comments, the Committee had raised its concern over the legislatively imposed trade union monopoly and in this respect, it requested the Government to amend section 3(2) of the Trade Union Act, which restricts the possibility of other trade unions from being registered where a trade union already exists. The Committee notes that the Government states in its report that trade union membership is voluntary and tailored along industrial basis. The Committee recalls that under Article 2 of the Convention, workers have the right to establish and to join organizations of their own choosing without distinction whatsoever, and that it is important for workers to be able to establish a new trade union for reasons of independence, effectiveness or ideological choice. It therefore once again requests the Government to amend section 3(2) of the principal Trade Union Act taking into account the aforementioned principles.

Organizing in export processing zones (EPZs). In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the Government's statement that the Federal Ministry of Labour and Productivity was still in discussion with the EPZ authority on the issues of unionization and entry for inspection in the EPZs. The Committee had also noted the ITUC's comments, according to which section 13(1) of the EPZ Authority Decree 1992 makes it difficult for workers to form or join trade unions as it is almost impossible for worker representatives to gain free access to the EPZs. The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (1) the Export Processing Zone Authority is not opposed to trade union activities; (2) part iii of the Federal Ministry of Labour and Productivity Guidelines on Labour Administration and Issues in Contract Staffing/Outsourcing in the Oil and Gas Sector apply to EPZs; and (3) unionization has commenced, e.g. the Amalgamated Union of Public Corporations, Civil Service, and Technical and Recreational Services Employees has started organizing its members there. Bearing in mind the commitment to tackle the issue expressed by the Government, the Committee welcomes the information concerning the commencement of unionization in EPZs and requests the Government to transmit a copy of the abovementioned Ministerial Guidelines. It requests the Government to continue to ensure that EPZ workers enjoy the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, as provided by the Convention. It further requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the issue of reasonable access to EPZs for representatives of workers' organizations.

Organizing in various government departments and services. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to amend section 11 of the Trade Union Act, which denied the right to organize to employees in the Customs and Excise Department, the Immigration Department, the prison services, the Nigerian Security Printing and Minting Company Limited, the Central Bank of Nigeria, and Nigeria Telecommunications. The Committee noted that this section was not amended by the Trade Union (Amendment) Act. The Committee had noted that according to the Government's statement, the Collective Labour Relations Bill, pending before the lower chamber of Parliament, would address this issue. The Committee notes that, according to the Government's report, the Collective Labour Relations Bill is still pending before the National Assembly. The Committee firmly expects that the Collective Labour Relations Act amending section 11 of the Trade Union Act will be adopted in the near future. It also requests the Government to send a copy of the Collective Labour Relations Act, once it is adopted.

Minimum membership requirement. The Committee had previously expressed its concern over section 3(1) of the Trade Union Act requiring 50 workers to establish a trade union, considering that even though this minimum membership would be permissible for industry trade unions, it could have the effect of hindering the establishment of enterprise organizations, particularly in small enterprises. The Committee had noted the Government's statement that section 3(1)(a) applies to the registration of national unions, and that at the enterprise level, there is no limit to the number of people to establish a trade union. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the country operates an industry-based system, and that workers in small enterprises form branches of the national union. Noting this information, the Committee requests the Government to take measures to amend section 3(1) of the Trade Union Act to clearly indicate that the minimum membership requirement of 50 workers does not apply to the establishment of trade unions at the enterprise level.

Article 3. Right of organizations to organize their administration and activities and to formulate programmes without interference from the public authorities. Administration of organizations. The Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it had requested the Government to amend sections 39 and 40 of the Trade Union Act in order to limit the broad powers of the registrar to supervise the union accounts at any time, and to ensure that such a power was limited to the obligation of submitting periodic financial reports, or in order to investigate a complaint. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Collective Labour Relations Bill that addressed this issue is yet to be passed. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the Collective Labour Relations Act will fully take into account its comments and will be adopted without delay.

Activities and programmes. The Committee recalls that it had previously commented upon certain restrictions to the exercise of the right to strike (section 30 of the Trade Union Act, as amended by section 6(d) of the Trade Union (Amendment) Act, imposing compulsory arbitration, requiring a majority of all registered union members for calling a strike, defining “essential services” in an overly broad manner, containing restrictions relating to the objectives of strike action and imposing penal sanctions including imprisonment for illegal strikes; and section 42 of the Trade Union Act, as amended by section 9 of the Trade Union (Amendment) Act, outlawing gatherings or strikes that prevent aircraft from flying or obstruct public highways, institutions or other premises). The Committee notes that the Government indicates that: (1) the right to strike of workers is not inhibited; (2) the Collective Labour Relations Bill has taken care of the issue of essential services; (3) in practice, trade union federations go on strike or protest against the Government’s socio-economic policies without sanctions; and (4) section 42 as amended only aims at guaranteeing the maintenance of public order. The Committee firmly hopes that, in the process of legislative review, all measures will be taken to amend the abovementioned provisions of the Trade Union Act, taking into account the Committee’s comments in regard to these matters (see General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work in light of the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization, 2008, paragraphs 117 to 161). The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Furthermore, the Committee had previously requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that workers in EPZs have the right to freely organize their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes without interference by the public authorities. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that the Export Processing Zone Authority is not opposed to union activities and refers to the Guidelines on Labour Administration and Issues in Contract Staffing/Outsourcing in the Oil and Gas Sector. The Committee requests the Government to supply a copy of the Guidelines.

Article 4. Dissolution by administrative authority. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 7(9) of the Trade Union Act by repealing the broad authority of the Minister to cancel the registration of workers’ and employers’ organizations, as the possibility of administrative dissolution under this provision involved a serious risk of interference by the public authority in the very existence of organizations. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates its earlier position that the issue has been addressed by the Collective Labour Relations Bill which is currently before the National Assembly. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the Collective Labour Relations Act will be enacted without further delay and adequately address the issue.

Articles 5 and 6. Right of organizations to establish federations and confederations and to affiliate with international organizations. The Committee had noted that section 8(a)(1)(b) and (g) of the Trade Unions (Amendment) Act 2005 requires federations to consist of 12 or more trade unions in order to be registered and had requested practical information. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government refers to and supplies a copy of the Trade Unions (International Affiliation) Act of 1996. The Committee notes that, according to section 1(2) of that Act, the application of a trade union for international affiliation shall be submitted to the Minister for approval. The Committee considers that legislation which requires that government permission be obtained for the international affiliation of a trade union is incompatible with the principle of free and voluntary affiliation of trade unions with international organizations. With regard to the requirement in section 8(a)(1)(b) and (g) of the Trade Unions (Amendment) Act 2005 that federations shall consist of 12 or more trade unions, the Committee recalls that the requirement of an excessively high minimum number of trade unions to establish a higher level organization conflicts with Article 5. The Committee requests the Government to amend sections 8(a)(1)(b) and (g) of the Trade Unions (Amendment) Act 2005 and section 1 of the 1996 Trade Unions (International Affiliation) Act so as to retain a reasonable minimum number of affiliated trade unions in order not to hinder the establishment of federations, and to ensure that the international affiliation of trade unions does not require government permission.

Noting the Government representative’s statement before the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2011 that five Labour Bills had been drafted with the technical assistance of the ILO, the Committee once again expresses the firm hope that appropriate measures will be taken to ensure that the necessary amendments to the laws referred to above are adopted in the very near future in order to bring them into full conformity with the Convention. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect. Lastly, the Committee once again invites the Government to accept an ILO mission in order to tackle the pending issues.

The Committee notes that the comments on the application of the Convention made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 31 July 2012, as well as its comments submitted in 2010 and 2011, refer to specific acts of anti-union discrimination including dismissals, transfers and non-union contract clauses in the banking sector, oil and gas sector and education services; anti-union harassment and interference on the part of the employer in the oil and gas and electricity sectors; and anti-union interference on the part of government authorities in the health and education sectors. The Committee further notes the comments submitted by Education International and the Nigeria Union of Teachers (NUT) on 31 August 2012, referring to the lack of any collective bargaining structure for teachers, non-compliance with the collective agreement concluded between the NUT and the Nigeria Governors’ Forum, and acts of anti-union interference through the promotion by the various state governments of an unregistered union, the Academic Staff Union of Secondary Schools. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the comments above, and invites the Government to submit the issues raised in these comments to a forum of tripartite dialogue and report on its outcome.

In its previous observations, the Committee noted that certain comments submitted by international trade union organizations concerned in particular the fact that: (1) according to the Trade Disputes Act, certain categories of workers are denied the right to organize (such as employees of the Customs and Excise Department, the Immigration Department, the Nigerian Security Printing and Minting Company Limited, the prison services and the Central Bank of Nigeria) and therefore are deprived of the right to collective bargaining; (2) only unskilled workers are protected by the Labour Act against anti-union discrimination by their employer; (3) every agreement on wages must be registered with the Ministry of Labour, which decides whether the agreement becomes binding according to the Wages Board and Industrial Council Acts and to the Trade Dispute Act (it is an offence for an employer to grant a general or percentage increase in wages without the approval of the Minister); (4) section 4(e) of the 1992 Decree on Export Processing Zones states that “employer–employee” disputes are not matters to be handled by trade unions but rather by the authorities managing these zones; and (5) section 3(1) of the same Decree makes it very difficult for workers to form or join trade unions as it is almost impossible for worker representatives to gain free access to the export processing zones (EPZs).

The Committee notes that the Government indicates that: with respect to point (1), the Collective Relations Bill has taken care of the mentioned exemptions from the rights to organize and bargain collectively; as regards point (2), both skilled and unskilled workers are protected in practice against anti-union discrimination; and concerning points (4) and (5), unionization has commenced, e.g. the Amalgamated Union of Public Corporations, Civil Service, and Technical and Recreational Services Employees has started organizing its members within the EPZ. The Committee takes note of this information and refers to its comments made under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Concerning point (3), the Committee had previously noted a similar more recent allegation of the ITUC (2009) that private sector collective bargaining rights are restricted by the requirement of government approval for any collective agreements on wages. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that this practice seeks to ensure that there is no undue economic disruption in a particular industry as there is usually a benchmark agreed to by the relevant employers and trade unions. In this regard, the Committee recalls that legal provisions which make collective agreements subject to the approval of the Ministry of Labour for reasons of economic policy, so that employers’ and workers’ organizations are not able to fix wages freely, are not in conformity with Article 4 of the Convention respecting the promotion and full development of machinery for voluntary collective negotiations. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that the relevant provisions are amended to give effect to the principle of free collective bargaining.

The Committee further notes the Government’s statement that the Collective Labour Relations Bill, which has been elaborated with the technical assistance of the ILO, is still before the National Assembly and will be forwarded when passed. The Committee expects that the Collective Labour Relations Act will be in full conformity with the requirements of the Convention. It requests the Government to send the new law once adopted.

Lastly, the Committee once again invites the Government to accept an ILO mission in order to tackle the pending issues.

Pakistan

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1951)

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 100th Session, June 2011)

Workers’ and employers’ organizations’ comments. The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee further notes the Government’s observation on the 2010 comments submitted by the All Pakistan Federation of United Trade Unions (APFUTU) regarding the difficulties in registering trade unions for the industries established in the City of Sialkot. The Government indicates that, while the management of the two unions concerned went to the Labour Courts and the National Industrial Relations Commission (NIRC) against the registration, the unions lodged cases of unfair labour practices against the management. The cases were decided by the courts in favour of one of the unions, but the members of the union backed down; as for the second union, the establishment was closed due to losses. The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) submitted on 31 July 2012, alleging violence leading to injury and arrests during demonstrations and strikes in the aviation, textile, education and health sectors, as well as dismissals following a strike in the electrical sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide comments on the above ITUC comments as well as on the 2011 ITUC allegations.

Legislative issues. The Committee recalls that, in its previous observation, it had noted that the Government had enacted the 18th Amendment to the Constitution, whereby the matters relating to industrial relations and trade unions were devolved to the provinces. In this respect, the Committee expressed the hope that any new legislation, whether at the provincial or national levels, would be adopted in full consultation with the social partners concerned and that these instruments would be in full conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes that industrial relations acts have been adopted in the Provinces of Balochistan, Khyber-Pakhtoonkhwa, Punjab and Sindh in 2010.

The Committee notes that the Industrial Relations Act (IRA), 2012, which regulates industrial relations and registration of trade unions and federations of trade unions in the Islamabad Capital Territory and in the establishments which cover more than one province (section 1(2) and (3)), replaces the Industrial Relations Ordinance (IRO) of 2011, commented upon by the Committee. It notes with regret that most of its previous comments on the Industrial Relations Act, 2008, and on the IRO, 2011, have not been addressed by the IRA, 2012. It further notes that the Balochistan IRA (BIRA), the Khyber-Pakhtoonkhwa IRA (KPIRA), the Punjab IRA (PIRA), and the Sindh Industrial Relations (Revival and Amendment) Act, 2010 (SIRA), all raise similar issues as the IRA, 2012.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. The Committee notes that the IRA, 2012, excludes the following categories of workers from its scope of application: workers employed in services or installations exclusively connected with the armed forces of Pakistan, including the Factory Ordinance maintained by the federal Government (section 1(3)(a)); workers employed in the administration of the State other than those employed as workmen (section 1(3)(b)); members of the security staff of the Pakistan International Airlines Corporation (PIAC), or drawing wages in a pay group not lower than Group V in the PIAC establishment (section 1(3)(c)); workers employed by the Pakistan Security Printing Corporation or Security Papers Limited (section 1(3)(d)); workers employed by an establishment or institution for the treatment or care of sick, infirm, destitute and mentally unfit persons, excluding those run on a commercial basis (section 1(3)(e)); and workers of charitable organizations (section 1(3) read together with section 2(x) and (xvii)).

The Committee notes that section 1 of the BIRA, KPIRA, PIRA and SIRA further excludes: workers employed in services or installations exclusively connected with or incidental to the armed forces of Pakistan, including the Factory Ordinance maintained by the federal Government; members of the watch and ward, security or fire service staff of an oil refinery or an airport (and seaport – BIRA, KPIRA and SIRA); members of the security or fire service staff of an establishment engaged in the production, transmission or distribution of natural gas or liquefied petroleum gas; and, in the PIRA and KPIRA only, persons employed in an establishment or institution providing education or emergency services excluding those run on a commercial basis. All exclude persons employed in the administration of the State but include those employed as workmen by the railway and Pakistan Post.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (1) the industrial laws are framed by national circumstances and in the light of the space provided by Article 9 of the Convention; and (2) workers engaged in agriculture have the right to form unions under these enactments. The Committee recalls that, by virtue of Article 2 of the Convention, workers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing and that the only exceptions authorized to this principle are set out in Article 9(1), which allows States to determine the extent to which the guarantees provided for in the Convention shall apply to the armed forces and the police. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that it, as well as the governments of the provinces, take the necessary measures in order to ensure that the legislation guarantees the abovementioned categories of employees the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing to further and defend their social, economic and occupational interests.

Managerial employees. The Committee also notes that, pursuant to sections 31(2) of the IRA and 17(2) of the BIRA, KPIRA PIRA and SIRA, an employer may require that a person, upon his or her appointment or promotion to a managerial position, shall cease to be and shall be disqualified from being a member or an officer of a trade union. The Committee notes the Government's indication that managerial workers can form associations. The Committee notes that the definition of workers in section 2 of the IRA, BIRA, KPIRA, PIRA and SIRA, excludes any person who is employed mainly in a managerial or administrative capacity. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate, and to request the governments of the provinces to indicate, the legislation under which, in full respect of the Convention, managerial employees may form and join associations.

Rights of workers and employers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee notes that sections 8(2)(a) of the IRA and 6(2) of the BIRA, KPIRA, PIRA and SIRA, provide that only trade unions of workers engaged or employed in the same industry may be registered. The Committee notes the Government's indication that there is no bar in the IRA for the establishment of inter-professional organizations or for affiliation by such unions with such federations. The Committee notes that this is the case for the BIRA, KPIRA, PIRA and SIRA as well.

The Committee notes that, under section 3(a) of the IRA, no worker shall be entitled to be a member of more than one trade union. The Committee requested the Government to indicate how workers who have more than one occupation and/or are employed by different establishments can exercise their right to establish and join trade unions of their own choosing for furthering and defending their interests, particularly in the light of the restrictions imposed by sections 8(2)(a) of the IRA, providing that only trade unions of workers engaged or employed in the same industry may be registered. The Committee notes the Government's indication that section 3 strengthens trade unions by imposing restrictions on a worker not to be a member of more than one trade union, as being a member of one trade union makes the worker more committed to his political affiliation/cause and if a worker is a member of two unions in different establishments, or in the same establishments, it may create legal complications. The Committee notes that similar issues are raised under section 3(a) of the BIRA and the SIRA, and 3(i) of the KPIRA and the PIRA, in the light of the restrictions imposed by sections 6(2)(a) of the BIRA, KPIRA, PIRA and SIRA. The Committee recalls that it is important to allow workers in the private and public sectors who are engaged in more than one job in different occupations or sectors to join the corresponding unions as full members (or at least, if they so wish, to join trade unions at the branch level as well as the enterprise level at the same time). In other words, obliging workers to only join one trade union could unduly prejudice their right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing (General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work in light of the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization, 2008, paragraph 91). The Committee requests the Government to take all measures to amend the legislation taking into account the abovementioned principle. It requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the governments of the provinces likewise amend the legislation.

The Committee notes that, pursuant to sections 8(2)(b) of the IRA and 6(2)(b) of the BIRA, KPIRA, PIRA and SIRA, no other trade union is entitled to registration if there are already two or more registered trade unions in the establishment, group of establishments or industry with which that trade union is connected, unless it has, as members, not less than 20 per cent of the workers employed in that establishment, group of establishments or industry. The Committee notes the Government's indication that this was fixed after consultation with the social partners and aims at promoting healthy trade union activities. The Committee considers that it is important for workers to be able to change trade union or to establish a new union for reasons of independence, effectiveness or ideological choice. Consequently, trade union unity imposed directly or indirectly by law is contrary to the Convention (General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 92). The Committee requests the Government to ensure that workers may establish organizations of their own choosing and that no distinction as to the minimum membership requirement is made between the first two or more registered trade unions and the newly created unions. It requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the governments of the provinces likewise amend the legislation.

The Committee further notes that sections 62(3) of the IRA, 25(3) of the KPIRA and PIRA, and 30(3) of the BIRA and SIRA, provide that, after the certification of a collective bargaining unit, no trade union shall be registered in respect of that unit except for the whole of such a unit. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the collective bargaining unit is determined in consultation with the employer and collective bargaining agents. The Committee considers that, while a provision requiring certification of a collective bargaining agent for a corresponding bargaining unit is not contrary to the Convention, workers' right to establish and join trade union organizations of their own choosing implies the possibility to create – if the workers so choose – more than one organization per bargaining unit. Taking into account the abovementioned principle, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend this provision so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention and to take the necessary measures to ensure that the governments of the provinces likewise amend the legislation.

Rights and advantages of the most representative trade unions. The Committee notes that certain rights are granted (in particular, to represent workers in any proceedings and to check-off facilities) only to collective bargaining agents, i.e. the most representative trade unions (sections 20(b) and (c), 22, 33, 35 and 65(1) of the IRA; sections 24(13)(b) and (c), 32, 41, 42, 68(1) of the BIRA; sections 24(13)(b) and (c), 28, 37, 38, 64(1) of the KPIRA; sections 24(20)(b) and (c), 27, 33, 34, 60(1) of the PIRA; sections 24(13)(b) and (c), 32, 41, 42, 68(1) of the SIRA). The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (1) the right to check-off facilities and the right to call a strike are genuine rights of a collective bargaining agent; (2) all the social partners agreed on these rights during tripartite consultation for drafting of the new law; (3) as far as the issue of the right of representation is concerned, it can be mutually decided between the collective bargaining agent and the opposition. The Committee considers that workers' freedom of choice would be jeopardized if the distinction between most representative and minority unions results, in law or in practice, in the granting of privileges extending beyond that of priority in representation for such purposes as collective bargaining or consultation by the Government or for the purpose of nominating delegations to international bodies. This distinction should not therefore have the effect of depriving those trade unions that are not recognized as being among the most representative of the essential means of defending the occupational interests of their members (for instance, making representations on their behalf, including representing them in case of individual grievances), of organizing their administration and activities, and formulating their programmes, as provided for in the Convention (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 97). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the legislation so as to ensure full respect for the abovementioned principles.

In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to amend section 27-B of the Banking Companies Ordinance of 1962, which restricted the possibility of becoming an officer of a bank union only to employees of the bank in question, under penalty of up to three years' imprisonment, either by exempting from the occupational requirement a reasonable proportion of the officers of an organization, or by admitting, as candidates, persons who had been previously employed in the banking company. The Committee had noted the Government's statement that: (1) a bill to repeal section 27-B of the Banking Companies Ordinance of 1962 had been submitted to the Senate; (2) the federal Cabinet at its meeting held on 1 May 2010 approved the repeal of this provision and that the final legislation was under preparation. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the matter is under consideration with the Senate. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the relevant amendment will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to transmit a copy thereof.

Right of workers' organizations to organize their administration and to formulate their programmes. The Committee notes that sections 5(d) of the IRA, 15(e) of the BIRA, and 15(d) of the KPIRA, PIRA and SIRA, confers on the registrar the power to inspect the accounts and records of a registered trade union, or investigate or hold such inquiry into the affairs of a trade union as he or she deems fit. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the registrar of a trade union is a public functionary who works for the smooth functioning of trade unions and who does not indulge in internal administration of the organizations during financial audit and scrutiny of annual returns. The Committee considers that supervision of the finances of a trade union is compatible with the Convention when: (1) it is limited to the obligation of submitting annual financial reports; (2) there are serious grounds for believing that the actions of an organization are contrary to the rule of law; or (3) it is limited to cases in which a significant number of workers call for an investigation of allegations of embezzlement or lodge a complaint (General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 109). Furthermore, the Committee considers that problems of compatibility with the Convention arise when the administrative authority has the power to audit the trade union's accounts, to inspect such accounts and records and demand information at any time (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 110). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure full respect of the abovementioned principles. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the governments of the provinces take such measures as well.

Finally, the Committee is raising in a direct request issues regarding certain restrictions to the right to strike (prohibition of types of strike; broad definition of services where strike action can be forbidden; compulsory arbitration at the request of either party to a conflict; and penal sanctions, in particular for supporting illegal strikes).

Article 4. Dissolution of organizations. The Committee notes that the registration of a trade union can be cancelled for the following reasons: following a complaint made by the registrar that the trade union has contravened the provisions of the Act or its constitution, or failed to submit its annual returns to the registrar (IRA), or obtained less than 10 per cent (IRA) or 15 per cent (BIRA, KPIRA and PIRA – the latter specifying “during two consecutive referendums”) of total votes polled in an election for determination of a collective bargaining agent (sections 11(1)(a), (d), (e) and (f) of the IRA, 12(1)(a) and (b), and 12(3)(d) of the BIRA, KPIRA and PIRA, and 12(1)(a) and (b) of the SIRA); if the statement of expenditure of a union is found incorrect following an audit of the annual returns (section 16(5) of the IRA); if a person who is disqualified under section 18 for having been convicted and sentenced to imprisonment for two years or more for committing an offence involving moral turpitude under the Pakistan Penal Code is elected to be an officer of a registered trade union (section 11(5) of the IRA); for having been convicted of the offence of embezzlement or misappropriation of funds (BIRA and PIRA), or of contraventions to the Act (KPIRA and SIRA), or heinous offence under the Pakistan Penal Code, is elected to be an officer of a registered trade union (section 12(2) and (7) of the BIRA, KPIRA, PIRA and SIRA). The Committee recalls that the dissolution and suspension of trade union organizations constitute extreme forms of interference by the authorities in the activities of organizations and should therefore be accompanied by all the necessary guarantees. This can only be ensured through a normal judicial procedure, which should also have the effect of a stay of execution (General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 162). The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention taking into account the principles above and to take all the necessary measures to ensure that the governments of the provinces take the measures to likewise amend the legislation.

The Committee notes that, under the IRA, the Commission's decision directing the registrar to cancel the registration of a union cannot be appealed in court (section 59). The Committee recalls that cancellation of a trade union's registration should only be possible through judicial channels and that measures of suspension or dissolution by the administrative authority constitute serious infringements of the principles of freedom of association. The Committee further emphasizes that judges should be able to deal with the substance of a case to enable them to decide whether or not the measure of dissolution would not be in violation of the rights accorded to occupational organizations by the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the IRA so as to ensure that any decision to cancel trade union registration can be appealed in court.

Export processing zones (EPZs). With regard to the right to organize in EPZs, the Committee recalls that it had previously noted the Government's statement that the Export Processing Zones (Employment and Service Conditions) Rules, 2009, had been finalized in consultation with the stakeholders and would be submitted to the Cabinet for approval. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the rules have not yet been finalized. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide detailed information on the progress made in adopting the Export Processing Zones (Employment and Service Conditions) Rules, 2009, and a copy thereof as soon as they are adopted. The Committee recalls that the Government may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office.

The Committee strongly hopes that all necessary measures will be taken to bring the national and provincial legislation into full conformity with the Convention and requests the Government to provide information on all steps taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the observations submitted by the Government on the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning the allegation of intimidation on the part of employers in which it indicates that: (1) employers and employees are the main actors in industrial relations; (2) the system works with mutual understanding; and (3) any misunderstanding between the parties might lead to mistrust but in case of any grievance, the workers have the right to approach labour courts and any other courts of law. The Committee further notes the comments submitted by the ITUC in a communication dated 31 July 2012, referring to similar issues as the ones raised in its 2010 and 2011 communications and, in particular, to allegations of anti-union dismissals and acts of interference in trade union internal affairs by employers (intimidation, and blacklisting of trade unions and their members). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the 2012 ITUC allegations.

The Committee recalls that in its previous observation, it had noted that the Government had enacted the 18th Amendment to the Constitution whereby the matters relating to industrial relations and trade unions were devolved to the provinces. In this respect, the Committee expressed the hope that any new legislation, whether at the provincial or national levels, would be adopted in full consultation with the social partners concerned and that these instruments would be in full conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes that industrial relations acts have been adopted in the Provinces of Balochistan, Khyber-Pakhtoonkhwa, Punjab and Sindh in 2010. The Committee notes that the Industrial Relations Act (IRA), 2012, which regulates industrial relations and registration of trade unions and federation of trade unions in the Islamabad Capital Territory and in the establishments which cover more than one province (section 1(2) and (3)), replaces the Industrial Relations Ordinance (IRO) of 2011. It notes with regret that most of its previous comments on the Industrial Relations Act, 2008, and on the IRO, 2011, have not been addressed by the IRA, 2012. It further notes that the Sindh Industrial Relations (Revival and Amendment) Act, 2010 (SIRA), revives the IRA, 2008, omitting section 87(3), and that the Balochistan IRA (BIRA), the Khyber-Pakhtoonkhwa IRA (KPIRA) and the Punjab IRA (PIRA) all raise similar issues as the IRA, 2012.

Scope of application of the Convention. The Committee notes that by virtue of their sections 1(3), the IRA, 2012, the BIRA, KPIRA, PIRA and SIRA maintain the same exclusion from their scope of application as previously existed under the IRO 2002 and IRA 2008 (independent agricultural workers, workers of charitable organizations, workers employed by the Pakistan Security Printing Corporation or the Security Papers Limited, etc.), and that the definition of “worker” and “workman” excludes any person who is employed mainly in managerial or administrative capacity, as examined in detail by the Committee in its observation on the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). The Committee further notes that the BIRA excludes tribal areas from its scope. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the industrial relations laws have been framed after consultation with workers’ organizations and that the IRA 2012 is applicable to all categories of workers with certain exceptions that have been made due to the specific security situation in the country. The Committee recalls that the only categories of workers which can be excluded from the application of the Convention are the armed forces, the police and public servants engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to amend the legislation so as to ensure that all workers, with the only possible exception of the armed forces, the police and public servants engaged in the administration of the State, enjoy the rights enshrined in the Convention. It underlines the importance that the governments of the provinces take measures in the same direction. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether workers in Balochistan’s tribal areas enjoy the rights enshrined in the Convention.

With regard to public servants, the Committee notes that the IRA does not apply to workers employed in the administration of the State other than those employed as workmen (section 1(3)(b)) – the BIRA, KPIRA, PIRA and SIRA adds “as workman employed by the Railway and Pakistan Post”. The Government indicates that “persons employed in the administration of the State” imply persons employed in Government departments. The Committee requests again the Government to specify and provide examples of categories of workers employed in the administration of the State excluded from the scope of application of the legislation.

Export processing zones (EPZs). With regard to the right to organize in EPZs, the Committee recalls that it had previously noted the Government’s statement that the Export Processing Zones (Employment and Service Conditions) Rules, 2009, had been finalized in consultation with the stakeholders and would be submitted to the Cabinet for approval. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the rules have not yet been finalized. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide detailed information on the progress made in adopting the Export Processing Zones (Employment and Service Conditions) Rules, 2009, or a copy thereof as soon as they are adopted.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. Banking sector. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 27-B of the Banking Companies Ordinance of 1962, imposing sanctions of imprisonment and/or fines on the grounds of the exercise of trade union activities during office hours. The Government indicated that the Federal Cabinet at its meeting held on 1 May 2010 approved the repeal of this provision and that the final legislation is under preparation. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that amendment of section 27-B is under process with the Senate. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the relevant amendment will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to transmit a copy thereof.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. The Committee notes that, according to section 19(1) of the IRA, 2012, and sections 24(1) of the BIRA, KPIRA, PIRA and SIRA, if a trade union is the only trade union in the establishment or group of establishments (or industry, in the BIRA, KPIRA, PIRA), but it does not have at least one third of the employees as its members, no collective bargaining is possible at the given establishment or industries. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend similar sections which existed under the IRO 2002, IRA 2008 and IRO 2011. The Committee notes the Government's indication that a collective bargaining agent has to bargain for all the workers employed in an establishment and that certifying a union without any strength will not only be unjustified but may also increase chances of pocket unions to become collective bargaining agents. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that if there is no union representing the required percentage to be designated as a collective bargaining agent, collective bargaining rights are granted to the existing union, at least on behalf of its own members. The Committee underlines the importance that the governments of the provinces take measures in the same direction.

The Committee notes that under sections 23(1) of the IRA, 33(1) of the BIRA and SIRA, 29(1) of the KPIRA and 28(1) of the PIRA, shop stewards are either nominated (by a collective bargaining agent) or elected (in the absence of a collective bargaining agent) in every undertaking employing over 50 workers (25 workers, in the case of the IRA) to act as a link between the workers and the employer, to assist in the improvement of arrangements for the physical working conditions, etc. (sections 24 of the IRA, 33(5) of the BIRA and SIRA, 29(5) of the KPIRA and 28(5) of the PIRA). Furthermore, sections 25 of the IRA, 34 of the BIRA and SIRA, 30 of the KPIRA and 29 of the PIRA provide for works councils (bipartite bodies), which are established in every undertaking employing over 50 workers. These sections (and section 26 of the IRA) lists the functions of such councils and further provides that the management shall not take any decision relating to working conditions without the corresponding advice from workers' representatives, which could be nominated (by a collective bargaining agent) or be elected by workers employed by the enterprise in question (in the absence of a collective bargaining agent). Finally, sections 28 of the IRA, 35 of the BIRA and SIRA, and 31 of the KPIRA, provide for the joint management boards to look after the fixation of job and piece-rate, planned regrouping or transfer of workers, laying down the principles of remuneration and introduction of remuneration methods, etc. (these functions are granted to works councils under the PIRA). The IRA specifies that the worker representatives in such boards are nominated by a collective bargaining agent if there are one or more trade unions at the enterprise, or are chosen from amongst workers of the relevant undertaking, if there is no collective bargaining agent. In the light of the abovementioned provision contained in section 19(1) of the IRA and sections 24(1) of the BIRA, KPIRA, PIRA and SIRA, the Committee considers that the position of a single trade union not enlisting over one third of workers employed at the relevant establishment or group of establishments (and therefore, as indicated above, not enjoying collective bargaining rights) may be undermined in practice by other worker representatives represented at the abovementioned bodies, the functions of which have an impact upon the regulation of terms and conditions of employment. The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (1) the position of such a trade union is not undermined by the use of secret ballot for determination of workers' representation as shop steward and in works councils and joint management boards; and (2) the IRA provides under section 6 that there shall be at least two trade unions in an establishment. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend its legislation so as to ensure that the position of such trade unions is not undermined by the existence of other workers' representatives, particularly when there is no collective bargaining agent. The Committee underlines the importance that the governments of the provinces take measures in the same direction. The Committee notes the Government's statement according to which the IRA provides under section 6 that "there shall be at least two trade unions in an establishment". The Committee requests the Government to explain the consequences when there is just one union in an establishment.

Compulsory conciliation. The Committee notes the possibility of compulsory conciliation requested by the law in the collective bargaining process (sections 36 and 37 of the IRA, 45 and 46 of the BIRA and SIRA, 41 and 42 of the KPIRA, 36 and 37 of the PIRA) and refers to the observations made under Convention 87. Moreover, the Committee notes that the conciliator is appointed either directly by the Government (43 of the BIRA and SIRA, 39 of the KPIRA, 35 of the PIRA) or by the Commission whose ten members are appointed by the Government, with only one member representing employers and another one representing trade unions (section 53 of the IRA). The Committee underlines that the system of appointment of the conciliator, as well as the composition of the Commission, could raise questions concerning the confidence of the social parties in the system. The Committee requests the Government to take measures to amend this provision so as to ensure the confidence of the social partners in the conciliation mechanism. The Committee underlines the importance that the governments of the provinces take measures in the same direction.

Panama

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1958)

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 100th Session, June 2011)

Comments from workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the observations dated 17 August 2011 from the General and Autonomous Confederation of Workers of Panama (CGTP) and the National Federation of Public Employees and Public Service Enterprise Workers (FENASEP); and to the observations of the National Confederation of United Independent Unions (CONUSI) dated 14 October 2011. The Committee also notes the observations from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 31 July 2012 and from FENASEP dated 24 August 2012 referring to matters already examined by the Committee, and also the refusal of the administrative authority to grant legal personality to various trade unions. The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

Technical assistance. In its previous observation the Committee noted that further to the discussion that took place within the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2011, the Government accepted the visit of a technical assistance mission with a view to drawing up, as a matter of urgency, a draft of specific provisions to amend the legislation and bring it into conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes that the mission took place from 29 January to 2 February 2012 and in particular it observes with interest that, through the good offices of the mission, the representatives of the Government, the National Council of Organized Workers (CONATO), the National Confederation of United Independent Unions (CONUSI) and the National Council of Private Enterprise (CONEP) signed an agreement to: (1) launch dialogue on the Committee's comments on the application of Convention No. 87 and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98); (2) carry out training and awareness-raising activities on freedom of association, collective bargaining and social dialogue, in the context of which the comments of the ILO supervisory bodies will be examined in depth; and (3) establish with ILO assistance a tripartite commission for the rapid handling of complaints which will examine, as a matter of urgency and with the aim of finding solutions and reaching agreements, any reports of violations of freedom of association and collective bargaining.

The Committee further notes the Government's statements that under the abovementioned tripartite agreement: (1) the Committee on the Implementation of the Tripartite Agreement, whose objective is to seek forms of consensus based on compromise to enable national law to be aligned to the provisions of Conventions Nos 87 and 98, and the Committee for the Rapid Handling of Complaints relating to freedom of association and collective bargaining, have become operational; (2) as a result of the meetings of the two aforementioned committees, with ILO technical assistance, a number of agreements have been signed and the tripartite members of the committees elected their moderator by consensus; (3) with a view to strengthening and giving legal formality to tripartite dialogue which has been occurring in the country on the basis of the tripartite agreement, Executive Decree No. 156 of 13 September 2012 was promulgated, creating the Committee on the Implementation of the Tripartite Agreement and the Committee for the Rapid Handling of Complaints relating to freedom of association and collective bargaining, and appointing a moderator; (4) in July 2012 the President of the Republic convened a meeting with the country's trade union leaders with a view to achieving a rapprochement with the union leadership and launching a positive dialogue with the sector; (5) the education subsidy to FENASEP and the General Workers' Union of Panama (UGT) was restored, demonstrating the Government's wish to settle this matter as one of the pending issues relating to freedom of association which was highlighted by the public sector workers; and (6) with the Labour Foundation of Panama and ILO technical assistance, a workshop on Conventions Nos 87 and 98 was held in May 2012 for the members of the Committee on the Implementation of the Tripartite Agreement and was attended by representatives of workers and employers and independent consultants, as well as officials from the Ministries of Labour, Education and Health, the Administrative Careers Directorate, the University of Panama, the Social Security Fund, private universities and trustees of the Labour Foundation. The Committee further notes that during the 2012 session of the International Labour Conference, the International Labour Standards Department facilitated a meeting between the tripartite delegations of Switzerland and Panama in order to share experiences in the field of social dialogue.

The Committee welcomes the initiatives in the field of social dialogue and trusts that the allegations made by the ITUC and FENASEP concerning the refusal of the administrative authority to grant legal personality to a number of trade unions will be dealt with in the context of the Committee for the Rapid Handling of Complaints.

Pending legislative issues

The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been making comments on the following matters:

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers without distinction whatsoever to establish and join organizations.

- sections 179 and 182 of the Single Text of Act No. 9, as amended by Act No. 43 of 31 July 2009, establishing, respectively, that there may not be more than one association in an institution, and that associations may have provincial or regional chapters, but not more than one chapter per province;
- the requirement of too large a membership (ten) for the establishment of an employers' organization and an even larger membership (40) for the establishment of a workers' organization at the enterprise level, by virtue of section 41 of Act No. 44 of 1995 (amending section 344 of the Labour Code), and the requirement of a large number (40) of public servants to establish an organization of public servants under section 182 of the Single Text of Act No. 9;
- the denial to public servants (non-career public servants, as well as those holding appointments governed by the Constitution and those who are elected and serving) of the right to establish unions.

Article 3. Right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom.

- the requirement to be of Panamanian nationality in order to serve on the executive board of a trade union.
Right of organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes in full freedom.
- legislation interfering with the activities of employers' and workers' organizations (sections 452.2, 493.4 and 494 of the Labour Code) (closure of the enterprise in the event of a strike and prohibition of entry to non-striking workers); the obligation for non-members to pay a solidarity contribution in recognition of the benefits derived from collective bargaining (section 405 of the Labour Code); the automatic intervention of the police in the event of a strike (section 493(1) of the Labour Code);
- the ban on federations and confederations from calling strikes and on strikes against the Government's economic and social policy, and the unlawfulness of strikes that are unrelated to an enterprise collective agreement; the authority of the Regional or General Labour Directorate to refer labour disputes to compulsory arbitration in private transport enterprises (sections 452 and 486 of the Labour Code); and the obligation to provide minimum services with 50 per cent of the staff in the transport sector, and the penalty of summary dismissal of public servants for failure to comply with minimum services in the event of a strike (sections 155 and 192 of the Single Text of 29 August 2008, as amended by Act No. 43 of 31 July 2009).

The Committee notes with interest that: (1) as regards the alignment of national standards relating to administrative careers with the provisions of Conventions Nos 87 and 98, the Committee on the Implementation of the Tripartite Agreement has the specific mandate to deal with this subject and a tripartite subcommittee was established to examine subjects relating to administrative careers; (2) the subcommittee (Working Subcommittee on Administrative Careers) is tasked with examining all matters relating to freedom of association and collective bargaining for public officials; (3) it held meetings on 11 May 2012 with representatives of the Government, the Administrative Careers Directorate and, for the workers, representatives of FENASEP, which chairs the subcommittee; and (4) in the context of the subcommittee, consensus has been reached on a number of points relating to freedom of association and the modalities of representation of public servants, and it is hoped that once consensus has been reached between the parties regarding the Committee's various observations, it will be possible to adopt appropriate measures aligning the Act concerning administrative careers with the provisions of the ILO Conventions.

As regards the other pending legislative issues, the Committee notes the Government's statements that: (1) these subjects are included in the list of pending issues which the Implementation Committee has been preparing and the order of priority will be determined in order to harmonize the legislation in force with Conventions Nos 87 and 98; (2) it is hoped that the dynamics will soon be established to deal with all non-administrative career matters; and (3) many of these subjects are issues that cannot be resolved overnight, since they go back more than ten years, but through the social dialogue fostered by the tripartite agreement every effort will be made in the Implementation Committee to arrive at compromises enabling the national legislation to be aligned to the Convention. The Committee trusts that in the context of the process of tripartite dialogue which has been initiated the national legislation will be brought fully into conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any developments in this regard.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1966)

Observations from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The Committee notes the Government's reply to the ITUC's observations of 2010 and particularly the Government's statement that the cases involving allegations of anti-union dismissals were examined by the administrative and judicial authorities, that the reinstatement of dismissed union leaders and members was ordered in some cases, and that in other cases the complaints concerning dismissal were rejected. The Committee further notes the observations from the ITUC, dated 4 August 2011 and 31 July 2012, concerning issues already examined by the Committee and also allegations of anti-union dismissals and harassment of trade union officers in the education sector.

Technical assistance. The Committee notes that further to the discussion that took place within the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2011 on the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Government accepted the visit of an ILO technical assistance mission. The Committee notes that the mission took place from 29 January to 2 February 2012 and, in particular, it observes with interest that, through the good offices of the mission, the representatives of the Government and of the National Council of Organized Workers (CONATO), the National Confederation of United Independent Unions (CONUSI) and the National Private Enterprise Council (CONEP) signed an agreement to: (i) launch dialogue on the Committee's comments on the application of Conventions Nos 87 and 98; (ii) carry out training and awareness-raising activities on freedom of association, collective bargaining and social dialogue, in the context of which the comments of the ILO supervisory bodies will be examined in depth; and (iii) establish, with ILO assistance, a tripartite committee for the rapid handling of complaints which will examine, as a matter of urgency and with the aim of finding solutions and reaching agreements, any reports of violations of freedom of association and collective bargaining. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that under the abovementioned tripartite agreement the Committee on the Implementation of the Tripartite Agreement, whose objective is to seek forms of consensus based on compromise to enable national law to be aligned with the provisions of Conventions Nos 87 and 98, and the Committee for the Rapid Handling of Complaints relating to Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining, have become operational. The Committee welcomes the initiatives in the field of social dialogue and trusts that the allegations made by the ITUC concerning anti-union dismissals and harassment of trade union officers in the education sector will be dealt with in the context of the Committee for the Rapid Handling of Complaints. Finally, the Committee refers to the observation concerning the application of Convention No. 87 for further information on other measures taken as follow-up to the tripartite agreement mentioned above.

Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention. Right to collective bargaining. Pending legislative issues. The Committee's previous comments referred to:

- the need to amend section 514 of the Labour Code so that the payment of wages for strike days attributable to the employer is not automatically imposed by law but is a matter for collective bargaining between the parties concerned;
- the need to amend section 427 of the Labour Code, which requires that the number of representatives of the parties in negotiations shall range from two to five;
- the need to amend section 12 of Act No. 8 of 1981, which provided that no enterprises (other than construction companies) were bound to conclude a collective labour agreement in the first two years of operation, which could, in practice, imply denial of the right to collective bargaining. The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of Act No. 32 of 5 April 2011, which establishes a comprehensive and specific special regime for the establishment and operation of export processing zones and repeals section 12 of Act No. 8 of 1981;
- the need to regulate mechanisms for the settlement of legal disputes and the possibility for employers to submit lists of demands and initiate a conciliation procedure; and
- the need to guarantee the right to collective bargaining for public employees or officials who are not engaged in the administration of the State.

The Committee trusts that, in the context of the process of tripartite dialogue that has been launched, the national legislation will be brought into full conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any further developments in this respect.

Other matters. Restrictions on collective bargaining in the maritime sector. In its previous comments the Committee noted restrictions on collective bargaining in the maritime sector under section 75 of Legislative Decree No. 8 of 26 February 1998, establishing the conclusion of collective agreements as an option, which in practice leads to the denial of workers' claims by employers and about which an application had been filed for this legislation to be found unconstitutional. The Committee also noted the Government's statement that the Ministry of Labour (MITRADEL), the Ministry of Trade and Industry (MICI) and the Maritime Authority of Panama (AMP) are preparing the first draft of a resolution providing for measures to respect the collective rights of seafarers with a view to ensuring observance of the right to organize and to engage in collective bargaining and further noted that the AMP and MITRADEL had held meetings to seek a consensus on the steps to be taken in this regard. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that: (i) by means of Ministerial Decision No. DM.126.2010 of 19 April 2010, MITRADEL took steps to ensure the application of the provisions of the third volume of the Labour Code, concerning workers' rights to organize and to bargain collectively under the terms of Legislative Decree No. 8 of 1998; and (ii) section 3 of the aforementioned Ministerial Decision designates the Directorate-General for Labour to implement the plan established in section 1 (setting up of a mechanism for handling complaints, inspections in response to complaints, establishment of a freephone number for complaints or requests for advice or guidance) and to prepare the additional regulations and procedures needed for its implementation. The Committee requests the Government to supply information in its next report on any progress made regarding collective bargaining in the maritime sector.

Papua New Guinea

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes the developments with regard to the adoption of the Industrial Relations Bill communicated by the Government, and in particular, the Committee takes note that, according to the Government's report, the Sixth Draft Industrial Relations Bill had gone through several deliberations, revisions and amendments resulting in a final version finalized in November 2011. The Committee notes that the Industrial Relations Bill 2011 had been already endorsed by the National Tripartite Consultative Council in the Ministry of Labour and Industrial Relations and submitted to the Central Agency Consultative Council, being currently awaiting deliberations and preparation of a Ministerial Advice to be attached before it is presented to the National Executive Council, and eventually into Parliament. The Committee notes the Government's commitment to provide the Committee with a copy of the Act once it has been adopted. The Committee requests the Government to ensure the conformity of the Industrial Relations Bill 2011 with the provisions of the Convention and, in particular, with respect to the provisions in relation to Article 4 and the concerns mentioned below.

The Committee takes note of the comments regarding the lack of enforcement of the law in practice in respect with discrimination acts against workers seeking to form or join a union, provided by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 31 August 2011. The Committee requests the Government to reply to the comments made by the ITUC in its next report.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee notes that, according to the Government's report, the amendments requested by the Committee concerning the power of the Minister to assess collective agreements on grounds of public interest and compulsory arbitration when conciliation fails have not been introduced in the Industrial Relations Bill; the Committee's comments were sent to the author of the Bill, however feedback has not yet been received. Therefore the Committee has to mostly reproduce its previous observation with regard to the abovementioned points.

Power of the Minister to assess collective agreements on the ground of public interest. The Committee recalls that the approval of collective agreements may only be refused if the collective agreement has a procedural flaw or does not conform to the minimum standards laid down by general labour legislation (General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 251), but may not be refused for general reasons of public interests. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to bring section 50 of the Industrial Relations Bill 2011 in conformity with the abovementioned principle, and to provide information thereon in its next report.

Compulsory arbitration in cases where the conciliation between the parties has failed. The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration is only acceptable if it is requested by both parties involved in a dispute, or in the case of disputes in the public service only when it involves public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely those services whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to bring sections 78 and 79 of the Industrial Relations Bill 2011 into conformity with the abovementioned principle, and to provide information thereon in its next report.

Paraguay

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 4 August and 31 July 2012 which refer to matters already under examination by the Committee. The Committee also recalls that in its previous comment it requested the Government to send its observations on the comments of the ITUC dated 24 August 2010, which referred to the arrest of trade union members. The Committee once again requests the Government to send its observations in this regard.

Pending legislative issues. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been commenting on the incompatibility of the following legislative provisions with the Convention:

- the requirement of an unduly large number of workers (300) to establish a branch trade union (section 292 of the Labour Code);
- the prohibition on joining more than one union even if the worker has more than one part-time employment contract, whether at the level of the enterprise or industry, occupation or trade, or institution (section 293(c) of the Labour Code);
- imposition of unduly demanding conditions of eligibility for office on the executive board of a trade union: the need to be an employee in the enterprise, industry, occupation or institution, whether active or on leave (section 298(a) of the Labour Code), to have reached the age of majority and to have been an active member of the union (section 293(d) of the Labour Code);

- the requirement for trade unions to respond to all requests from the labour authorities for consultations or reports (sections 290(f) and 304(c) of the Labour Code);
- the requirement that, for a strike to be called, its sole purpose must be directly and exclusively linked to the workers' occupational interests (sections 358 and 376(a) of the Labour Code); and
- the obligation to provide a minimum service in the event of a strike in public services that are essential to the community without any requirement to consult the employers' and workers' organizations concerned (section 362 of the Labour Code).

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it noted the drafting of a Bill to amend certain sections of the Labour Code and Amending Act No. 496/94. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that meetings were held in 2011 with the President of the Legislative Commission of the Chamber of Senators relating to the draft bill to amend certain sections of the Labour Code and that it is proposed to hold an awareness-raising seminar with parliamentarians and representatives of the judicial system on international labour standards with a view to giving an impulse and making progress with the necessary reforms. The Committee firmly trusts that the necessary measures will be taken so that the provisions in question are modified or amended in the near future. The Committee invites the Government to have recourse to the technical assistance of the Office for the process of amending the legislation. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any developments in this respect.

Finally, the Committee recalls that, with reference to sections 284–320 of the Code of Labour Procedure respecting the referral of collective disputes to compulsory arbitration, it noted previously that, according to the Government, these provisions were tacitly repealed by Article 97 by the Constitution of the Republic, promulgated in 1992, which provides that “the State shall facilitate conciliatory solutions to labour disputes and social dialogue. Arbitration shall be optional”. The Committee once again requests the Government, in accordance with the Constitution and in order to avoid any ambiguity in interpretation, to take the necessary measures to repeal explicitly sections 284–320 of the Code of Labour Procedure.

The Committee hopes to be able to note tangible progress at the legislative level in the near future and requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any developments in this regard.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes the observations from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 4 August 2011 and 31 July 2012 and from the National Union of Workers (CNT) dated 31 August 2011, which refer to the issues being examined by the Committee as well as to anti-union practices and to the small number of collective agreements concluded in the public and private sectors. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments in relation to all the observations referred to above.

Pending legislative matters. The Committee recalls that it has been commenting for many years on:

- the absence of legal provisions affording protection to workers who are not trade union leaders against all acts of anti-union discrimination (article 88 of the Constitution only affords protection against discrimination based on trade union preferences);
- the absence of adequate penalties for non-observance of the provisions relating to the employment stability of trade unionists and to acts of interference in workers' and employers' organizations by each other (the Committee previously indicated that the penalties laid down in the Labour Code for non-compliance with the legal provisions on this point in sections 385, 393 and 395 are not an adequate deterrent, except in the case of a repeat offence by the employer, in which case the fine is doubled); the Committee recalls, with regard to protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, that the Committee on Freedom of Association also asked the Government to ensure, in consultation with the social partners, the effectiveness of national procedures to prevent or punish acts of discrimination (see Case No. 2648, 355th Report, paragraph 963); and
- the delays in the application of justice in relation to acts of anti-union discrimination and interference.

In its previous comments, the Committee noted the preparation of preliminary draft legislation amending certain sections of the Labour Code and also noted amending Act No. 496/94. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report that in 2011 meetings were held with the president of the Legislation Committee of the Chamber of Senators in relation to the preliminary draft legislation to amend certain sections of the Labour Code and that it is proposed to hold an awareness-raising seminar with members of parliament and officers of the judiciary concerning international labour standards, with a view to promoting the progress of the necessary reforms. The Committee trusts that the necessary steps will be taken to modify or amend the provisions concerned in the near future. The Committee invites the Government to avail itself of technical assistance from the Office with respect to the process of amending the legislation. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any progress made in this respect.

Article 6 of the Convention. Public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it expressed the view that sections 49 and 124 of the Public Service Act afford adequate protection against the dismissal of trade union officers within the meaning of Article 1 of the Convention but do not cover protection against dismissal or other prejudicial measures against union members because of their membership or legitimate union activities. The Committee notes that the Government does not supply any information on this matter. The Committee again requests the Government to take the necessary steps to establish in the legislation adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination against civil servants and public employees, including those who are not trade union officers, and also to establish penalties that act as an adequate deterrent against violations.

Other matters. Promotion of collective bargaining and social dialogue in practice. The Committee notes the indication by the ITUC that, as a result of the Government's promotion of social dialogue, there are now 14 forums for dialogue; however, collective bargaining only covers 4 per cent of workers. The Committee notes the Government's indication that between August 2010 and July 2012 a total of 14 collective agreements were concluded in the public sector and 55 in the private sector. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on this subject and to take steps to encourage and promote collective bargaining, as provided for by Article 4 of the Convention.

Peru

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

Comments from workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments made in 2010 by the General Confederation of Workers of Peru (CGTP), the Confederation of Workers of Peru (CTP), the Autonomous Workers' Confederation of Peru (CATP) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and notes in particular the information that magistrates have the right to organize and that the National Association of Magistrates has existed since 1977. The Committee also notes the comments of 4 August 2011 and 31 July 2012 by the ITUC, which refer to matters already raised by the Committee, and the Government's reply thereon dated 21 September 2012. It further notes the comments of 31 August 2012 by the CATP stating that the General Labour Bill, referred to by the Government in its report, seeks to delay compliance with the Convention and that the Collective Labour Relations Act has not as yet been amended as advised by the ILO supervisory bodies.

Lastly, the Committee takes note of the comments of 28 August 2010 by the Lima Chamber of Commerce (CCL) referring to the scope of the Convention's application to certain categories of workers, and to decisions by the administrative authority declaring strikes unlawful.

Legislative matters. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to the following matters:

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers to establish and join trade unions. The Committee recalls the need to ensure that workers under special training arrangements enjoy the rights enshrined in the Convention (Act No. 28518 and its regulations, General Education Act). The Committee notes the CCL's assertion that special training arrangements, independent services and activities arising out of civic obligations fall outside the scope of the Convention. The Committee points out that according to Article 2 of the Convention, workers and employers without distinction whatsoever and without previous authorization, shall have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, subject only to the rules of the organization concerned. The only exceptions to this principle that the Convention allows are set forth in Article 9(1), under which States may determine the extent to which the guarantees provided for in the Convention shall apply to the armed forces and the police. The Committee emphasizes that workers under special training arrangements should be able to join organizations, if they so wish, in order to be represented by them.

Article 3. Right of organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls:

- The need to amend section 73(b) of the Industrial Relations Act, which provides that the decision to call a strike has to be adopted in the form expressly set out in the statutes and must in any event represent the will of the majority of the workers concerned. The Committee recalls in this connection the principle that if the legislation provides that a vote by workers is required before a strike can be held, it should be ensured that only the votes casted are counted and that the required quorum or majority is fixed at a reasonable level.
- The need to ensure that authority to declare a strike unlawful lies not with the Government but with an independent body that has the trust of the parties (a point made several times by the Committee on Freedom of Association). The Committee observes in this connection that the CCL believes that responsibility for declaring a strike unlawful must lie with the Government, since participation by an independent body implies a high degree of subjectivity, which would be a hindrance to any feasible settlement and to observance of the social rights involved.

Article 5. The Committee recalls the need to ensure that federations and confederations of public servants may, if they so wish, join confederations consisting of organizations of workers who are not state workers (section 19 of Supreme Decree No. 003-82-PCM on the constitution of federations and confederations of public servants, Supreme Decree No. 003-2004-TR and Directive No. 001-2004-DNRT).

In its previous comments, the Committee noted in this connection that the Government had reported the drafting of a General Labour Bill to repeal the Industrial Relations Act and the provisions in question, and asked the Government to keep it informed in this regard. The Committee notes that in its report the Government states that a new General Labour

Bill, which was examined by the National Council for Labour and Employment Promotion (CNTPE) and has been referred to a Sectoral Technical Committee (CTS) consisting of technicians from the Ministry of Labour and Employment Promotion, and that consultations are still being held. The Committee also notes that since observations on the draft are in the process of being reviewed and evaluated, the State has not adopted an official position on its content since it is not as yet part of the national legislation.

The Committee hopes that in the process to finalize the draft General Labour Bill to amend the Industrial Relations Act, the representative workers' and employers' organizations will continue to be consulted. The Committee also trusts that its comments will be taken into account in the text that is finally adopted and reminds the Government that technical assistance from the Office is available.

The Committee raises other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Comments by workers' organizations. The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 4 August 2011 and 31 July 2012, and the Government's detailed replies thereon. The Committee notes that the Autonomous Workers' Confederation of Peru (CATP) sent comments in a communication dated 31 August 2012 and the General Confederation of Workers of Peru (CGTP) in a communication dated 4 September 2012.

The Committee notes that the workers' organizations denounce anti-union practices, the denial of the right to collective bargaining for workers under training schemes, the shortage of budgetary resources in light of the duration of judicial proceedings in cases of anti-union offences and obstacles to the right to collective bargaining in the public and private sectors (budgetary restrictions on bargaining, obstacles to collective bargaining at the branch level, certain aspects of the regulation of arbitration, etc.). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these issues (some of which are dealt with below) and invites it to refer these matters to tripartite dialogue.

Legislative matters. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government concerning the formulation of the draft General Labour Act (LGT) to repeal the Collective Labour Relations Act and replace it. The Committee notes that the draft text is currently undergoing revision. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this respect and to ensure that this process is still the subject of tripartite consultations, and to take into account its comments. The Committee recalls that the technical assistance of the Office is available to the Government.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against any acts of anti-union discrimination. With reference to the excessive duration of judicial proceedings in cases of complaints of acts of anti-union discrimination or interference, the Committee previously requested the Government to provide information on the impact of the new Act on labour procedure (Act No. 29497 of 30 December 2009) on the length of judicial proceedings in cases of complaints of acts of anti-union discrimination or interference. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the ninth additional provision of the above Act provided for its progressive entry into force. For that purpose, the Technical Institutional Team for the implementation of the new Act on labour procedure was established and entrusted, among other matters, with determining a progressive implementation schedule for the Act (six judicial districts in 2010, five in 2011 and four in 2012). The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Act makes changes in labour proceedings with a view to the rapid resolution of labour disputes (adoption of the principle of oral hearings, the holding of hearings for sentencing, the digitalization of files, access to electronic information, etc.). The Committee notes with interest the indication in the Government's report that the length of proceedings in trade union cases is now approximately four months in courts of first instance and three months in courts of second instance. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on any developments in relation to the length of proceedings and the outcome of proceedings including the sanctions imposed in case of anti-union discrimination.

Article 4. Measures to promote collective bargaining. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the trade union rights of workers employed under "vocational training schemes", and particularly on the right to collective bargaining of the organizations representing them. The Committee notes the Government's indication that vocational training schemes are currently governed by Act No. 28518 on vocational training schemes and its regulations (Supreme Decree No. 007-2005-TR), as well as the General Education Act No. 28044, where applicable, and that such schemes are related to theoretical and practical learning through the performance of programmed vocational training work. The Committee observes that neither Act No. 28518 nor its Regulations, nor the General Education Act recognize the right of association and of collective bargaining of workers covered by such schemes. Noting the information provided by the trade union organizations confirming that it is impossible for workers covered by vocational training schemes to engage in collective bargaining, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that the draft General Labour Act enables such workers to enjoy the right to organize and the possibility to be represented by trade unions in collective bargaining.

Level of collective bargaining and autonomy of the parties. Finally, taking into account the comments made by the various national organizations, the Committee requested the Government to provide additional detailed information on the manner in which collective disputes relating to the level of collective bargaining are resolved, in both law and practice. The Committee notes the Government's reference to sections 59 to 65 of the Collective Labour Relations Act, with the indication that the Ministry of Labour has envisaged the so-called procedure of “extra-proceedings” with the purpose of establishing machinery to prevent and resolve labour disputes through dialogue between the social partners. The Committee further notes the adoption of Supreme Decree No. 014-2011-TR, section 1 of which (amending section 61 of the Collective Labour Relations Act) provides that “the parties shall have the possibility to have recourse to optional arbitration in the following situations: (a) the parties have not reached agreement in the first negotiation at the level or its content; and (b) when, during bargaining on the claims, acts of bad faith occur which have the effect of postponing, obstructing or preventing agreement from being reached”. The Committee further notes the Government’s indication that the above Supreme Decree is based on a ruling of the Constitutional Court of 2010, which found that “the arbitration referred to in section 61 of Supreme Decree No. 010-2003-TR is intended to determine the level of negotiation in cases of lack of agreement, and is optional, and not voluntary. That is, in cases of lack of agreement, and when one of the parties expresses the will to have recourse to arbitration, the other is bound to accept this formula for resolving the dispute”. The Government adds that, according to national jurisprudence, collective bargaining is possible at branch level just like at enterprise level and at bargaining unit level. The Committee notes the comments of the Chamber of Commerce of Lima, which considers that when agreement is not reached on the level of collective bargaining, it should take place at the enterprise level. In this respect, the Committee observes that the appointment of the president of the arbitration court is made by the administrative authority when the parties do not reach agreement, which may raise problems of confidence in the system, particularly in the public sector. The Committee wishes to emphasize that existing bodies and procedures should in so far as possible promote negotiations between the social partners on the issue of determining the level of bargaining and should enjoy the confidence of the parties. The Committee invites the Government to initiate tripartite consultation on these matters.

Philippines

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1953)

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2009 and 2010. In particular, it notes with interest from the Government’s report the following measures taken by the Government to strengthen the operational capacity of the Philippines National Police (PNP) and Armed Forces of the Philippines (AFP), with the objective of fostering an enabling environment for the enjoyment of constitutionally guaranteed civil liberties and trade union rights:

- (i) the issuance on 23 May 2011 of the Joint DOLE-PNP-PEZA Guidelines in the Conduct of PNP Personnel, Economic Zone Police and Security Guards, Company Security Guards and Similar Personnel during Labor Disputes (PNP Guidelines);
- (ii) the conduct jointly by the Department of Labor and Employment (DOLE), PNP and the Philippine Economic Zone Authority (PEZA) of four area-wide orientation seminars for the Regional Coordinating Council and Regional Tripartite Industrial Peace Council (RTIPC) members, to foster common understanding among stakeholders on the PNP Guidelines and the respective functions and jurisdictions of the agencies and to ensure close coordination among DOLE, PNP and PEZA in resolving labour disputes;
- (iii) conduct from February to July 2012 of a total of 17 orientation seminars on the PNP Guidelines (including 13 for human resources personnel and security agencies under PEZA from various economic zones);
- (iv) issuance on 27 February 2012 of a DOLE Internal Operational Guidelines outlining the DOs and DON’Ts in the implementation of the PNP Guidelines to all the Regional Offices of the DOLE;
- (v) adoption by the National Tripartite Industrial Peace Council (NTIPC) on 17 April 2012 of the DOLE-DILG-PNP-DND-AFP Joint Guidelines on the Conduct of the AFP/PNP Relative to the Exercise of Workers’ Right to Freedom of Association, Collective Bargaining, Concerted Actions and Other Trade Union Activities (AFP Guidelines), as an offshoot of the Manifesto of Commitment signed by the participants to the DOLE–Labor Sector–AFP Summit on the Protection and Promotion of Workers’ Rights held on 21 July 2011, and after the input of three area-wide DOLE–Labor Sector–AFP–PNP summits and regional consultations conducted by the different RTIPCs from January to mid-March of 2012 as well as expanded sittings of the Tripartite Executive Committee of the NTIPC in late March 2012; the AFP Guidelines were signed and issued with ILO technical assistance on 7 May 2012 and are applicable to the involvement or mobilization of the members of the AFP, including Citizen Armed Force Geographical Units (CAFGUs), the PNP, the Local Chief Executive, and the Barangay Tanod in all cases of exercise of workers’ rights to freedom of association, collective bargaining, concerted actions and other trade union activities; they set out the rights of workers relative to the exercise of freedom of association; prohibit the deployment of all military personnel to address labour-related mass actions and disputes, except if support to the PNP is needed due to a security situation and at the written request of the DOLE; prohibit the intervention of local chief executives in any labour disputes, except when requested in writing by the DOLE; set out the protocol for the set-up of PNP or AFP detachments if near or proximate to a workplace where there is a potential or actual labour dispute or an ongoing trade union organizing or campaigning for certification as sole and exclusive bargaining agent; prohibit the conduct by the PNP and the AFP of anti-insurgency campaigns vis-à-vis the exercise of trade union rights and civil liberties; and set out remedies in case of violations;

- (vi) the steps planned to ensure the implementation and compliance with the AFP Guidelines, such as: letter-directive of the AFP Chief of Staff to the ground troops; simplified Q&A materials to be issued by the DOLE by July–September 2012 for nationwide dissemination; initial round of nationwide advocacy on the subject by the DOLE, AFP, PNP, Department of the Interior and Local Government, Department of Justice (DOJ), Department of National Defense and the labour sector to be conducted from July to December 2012; inclusion of the labour rights module developed by the ILO into the training programme on human rights of the AFP and the PNP; requirement of PNP/AFP ILO enhanced training module for application or renewal of licence for private security personnel and security guards; and engagement of NTIPC members in the Bantay Bayanihan, a civil society-led oversight initiative on the implementation of the Internal Peace and Security Plan aiming at the reform of security sector institutions and thus extension of its oversight function to include monitoring of respect of labour rights; and
- (vii) the national plan of action 2012–13 towards full freedom of association and collective bargaining rights in the export processing sector concluded by the Government (including DOLE and PEZA) and representatives of national federations of workers’ organizations, which seeks to take steps to achieve improved compliance with the relevant ILO Conventions.

The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government concerning: (1) the NTIPC activity since its establishment and the issuance of NTIPC Resolution No. 3, Series of 2011, recognizing the need to create for the TIPC Monitoring Body a corresponding structure in the RTIPCs and providing that the RTIPCs shall create regional monitoring bodies which shall operate in accordance with the Operational Guidelines of the NTIPC Monitoring Body and ensure observance of international labour standards in the regions, monitor and evaluate complaints and prepare case profiles; (2) the forthcoming establishment of the National Monitoring Mechanism (NMM) led by the Commission on Human Rights, to bring together relevant state agencies and civil society organizations in a credible and inclusive forum for monitoring the nation’s progress in resolving extrajudicial killings and enforced disappearances; (3) the forthcoming establishment of the Presidential Committee for the Prevention and Investigation of Extralegal Killings, Harassments, Intimidation, Torture and Enforced Disappearances, a “super body” intended to replace Task Force 211 and serve as the major government component in the NMM; and (4) the creation of the Special Task Force of the DOJ, which has already started its work, with the mandate to review all unresolved cases of extrajudicial killings and enforced disappearances. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the operation of this monitoring mechanism.

The Committee further notes the Government’s reply to the ITUC’s 2011 comments referring to certain violations of trade union rights in 2010, including the alleged killing of three trade union leaders (Eduard Panganiban, elected Secretary of the United Strength of Workers in Takata; Benjamin Bayles, organizer of the National Federation of Sugar Workers; and Carlo “Caloy” Rodriguez, President of the Calamba Water District Union), as well as arrests and false criminal charges filed against trade union leaders and physical assaults of striking workers. In particular, the Committee notes the Government’s observations that, according to the NTIPC Monitoring Body, the three cases of alleged extrajudicial killings are being monitored by the Regional Tripartite Monitoring Bodies and the other seven cases of alleged violation of trade union rights were all classified as possibly labour-related and taken cognizance of by the NTIPC Monitoring Body. The Committee hopes that the investigations of these serious allegations will be finalized in the near future with a view to establishing the facts, determining responsibilities and punishing the perpetrators, and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

The Committee notes a communication from the ITUC dated 31 July 2012, in which it provides its comments on the application of the Convention in law and in practice. The Committee also notes that the ITUC refers to legislative issues already raised by the Committee, and alleges continuing violations of trade union rights in 2011, including alleged killings of four trade union leaders (Celito Baccay, board member of the Maeno-Giken Workers’ Organization; Noriel Salazar, President of the Union of COCOHEM; Santos V. Manrique, President of the Boringot Small-scale Miners’ Cooperative and Chairperson of the Federation of Miners Aggrupation; and Elpidio Malinao, Vice-President of the University of the Philippines (UP) Los Banos Chapter of the Organization of Non-Academic Personnel of UP); abduction and arbitrary detention of Elizar Nabas, member of the National Federation of Sugar Workers; and continuing harassment of Remigio Saladero Jr., chief legal counsel of the Kilusang Mayo Uno (KMU). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these serious allegations.

Civil liberties and trade union rights

Human Security Act. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide information concerning the impact of the Human Security Act on the application of the provisions of the Convention and to indicate the safeguards which ensure that this Act cannot be used under any circumstances as a basis for suppressing legitimate trade union activities or result in any extrajudicial killing for the exercise of trade union rights. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that the exercise of trade union rights (right to self-organization, peaceful concerted activities, collective bargaining, etc.) is not within its scope, and that legitimate trade union activities could not be included in the rigid definition of crimes provided for in the Act. Moreover, based on the inventory of cases of the NTIPC Monitoring Body, there appears to be no case involving trade union leaders or members where such abuse has been raised with respect to its implementation. The Committee also notes the concern expressed by the ITUC that the broad language of the Act leaves it open to abuse against trade unionists by local police and judicial authorities. The Committee trusts that the Government will take all necessary steps to ensure that this Act will not be misused to suppress legitimate trade union activities.

Legislative issues

Labor Code. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been commenting on certain discrepancies between the provisions of the Labor Code and the Convention. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that there are currently three bills being prioritized, which seek to amend the Labor Code, and that the NTIPC agreed to constitute the Tripartite Labor Code Review Team (two sector-nominated experts each), which was formed on 12 September 2011 as the external partner in the drafting process. The Committee recalls that its previous comments referred to the need to bring the national legislation into conformity with the following Articles of the Convention.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, without previous authorization. The Committee had previously referred to the need to amend sections 269 and 272(b) of the Labor Code so as to grant the right to organize to all workers lawfully residing within the Philippines (and not just those with valid permits if the same rights are guaranteed to Filipino workers in the country of the alien workers, or if the country in question has ratified either ILO Convention No. 87 or Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). The Committee notes with interest that, while again invoking the principle of reciprocity, the Government refers to House Bill No. 894, which is currently pending with the Committee on Labor and Employment of the House of Congress and is entitled: An Act Allowing Aliens to Exercise Their Right to Self-Organization and Withdrawing Regulation of Foreign Assistance to Trade Unions, Amending for the Purpose Presidential Decree No. 442, as Amended, Otherwise Known as the Labor Code of the Philippines. The said Bill aims, inter alia, to extend the right to self-organization to aliens in the Philippines. The Government states that this issue is also a subject for consultation relative to the proposed amendments to Department Order No. 40-03. The Committee hopes that the above Bill and any other provisions enabling all workers legally residing in the country to enjoy the trade union rights provided by the Convention will be adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any progress made in this respect.

The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 234(c) of the Labor Code so as to lower the excessive minimum membership requirement for forming an independent union. The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that one of the labour bills that is presently being prioritized is an NTIPC-endorsed legislative proposal, entitled: Union Registration Bill or An Act Further Strengthening Workers' Right to Self-Organization (House Bill No. 5927), which seeks to amend, inter alia, section 234 of the Labor Code, by removing the 20 per cent minimum membership requirement for registration of independent labour organizations, consistent with the Convention. The Bill is now pending with the Committee on Rules of the House of Congress and was reported out for a second reading, whereas its counterpart Bill (Senate Bill No. 2838) is now pending with the Senate Committee on Labor. The Committee hopes that the above Bill removing the 20 per cent minimum membership requirement for establishing an independent workers' organization will be adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any developments in this regard.

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to organize their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes without interference by the public authorities. The Committee had previously requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 263(g) of the Labor Code and Department Order No. 40-G-03 so as to limit governmental intervention resulting in compulsory arbitration to essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee notes that the Government states in its report that: (1) under Department Order No. 40-G-03, the Secretary of Labor initiates, at the first instance, motu proprio or upon request by either party to the labour dispute, an intensive conciliation–mediation before the Conciliation and Mediation Office under the Office of the Secretary (created to operationalize the conciliation–mediation at the level of the Secretary of Labor in case the conciliation–mediation before the National Conciliation and Mediation Board failed); (2) the limited recourse to section 263(g) (statistics provided by the Government) is a result of the extensive use of alternative dispute resolution through conciliation–mediation before and after the filing of petition for assumption of jurisdiction by either or both parties, thus indicating the strong political will of the Secretary of Labor not to use the power arbitrarily; (3) in an effort to align the country's labour laws to the provisions of the Convention, the Assumption of Jurisdiction Bill (An Act Strengthening Workers' Rights to Peaceful Concerted Activities) seeks to amend, inter alia, section 263 of the Labor Code, so as to limit the automatic issuance of assumption of jurisdiction order by using the “essential services” criterion as a guidepost, whereby the list of industries to be classified as “essential services” shall be determined through tripartite consultation; and (4) the said legislative measure (House Bill No. 5933) is now pending with the House of Congress Committee on Labor and Employment. Its counterpart Bill in the Senate is Senate Bill No. 3210 which is pending for a second reading. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the adopted Bill will be in full conformity with freedom of association principles related to this matter, and requests the Government to indicate any progress made in this respect.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend sections 264(a) and 272(a) of the Labor Code, which provided for penal liability to a maximum prison sentence of three years for participation in illegal strikes, so as to ensure that workers may effectively exercise their right to strike without the risk of being penally sanctioned. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, in an effort to align the country's labour laws to the provisions of the Convention, the Assumption of Jurisdiction Bill (An Act Strengthening Workers' Rights to Peaceful Concerted Activities), seeks to amend sections 264 and 272 of the Labor Code by providing that no criminal prosecution under section 264 may be instituted without a final judgment that an illegal strike or lockout has been committed. The Bill (House Bill No. 5933) is now pending with the House Committee on Labor and Employment. The Committee recalls that no penal sanctions should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike, and therefore that measures of imprisonment or fines should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where, during a strike, violence against persons or property, or other serious infringements of penal law have been committed, and can be imposed exclusively pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. The Committee expresses the firm hope that sections 264(a) and 272(a) of the Labor Code will be amended in the near future taking into account the mentioned principles.

Right of workers' organizations to organize their administration. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 270 of the Labor Code, which subjected the receipt of foreign assistance to trade unions to the prior permission of the Secretary of Labor, and noted the Government's indication that a Bill was currently in preparation that repealed that requirement. The Committee notes that the Government again refers to a Bill (House Bill No. 894), which is currently pending with the House Committee on Labor and Employment and is entitled: An Act Allowing Aliens to Exercise Their Right to Self-Organization and Withdrawing Regulation of Foreign Assistance to Trade Unions, Amending for the Purpose Presidential Decree No. 442, as Amended, Otherwise Known as the Labor Code of the Philippines. The said Bill aims, inter alia, to withdraw both the prohibition of foreign trade union organizations to engage in trade union activities and the regulation of foreign assistance to Philippine trade unions. The Committee hopes that the Bill removing the need for Government permission for foreign assistance to trade unions will be adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any progress made in this regard.

Article 5. Right of organizations to establish federations and confederations. The Committee previously requested the Government to take the necessary measures in order to lower the excessively high requirement of ten union members for the registration of federations or national unions set out in section 237(a) of the Labor Code. The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that the NTIPC-endorsed legislative proposal entitled: Union Registration Bill or An Act Further Strengthening Workers' Right to Self-Organization, also seeks to amend section 237 of the Labor Code, by reducing the required ten local unions to five for the registration of federations, consistent with the Convention, and that House Bill No. 5927 is now pending with the House Committee on Rules and was reported out for a second reading. The Committee hopes that the above Bill lowering the excessively high requirement for registration of federations or national unions set out in section 237(a) of the Labor Code will be adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any developments in this respect.

Lastly, the Committee previously hoped that the undertaken legislative reform will soon be completed and that the aforementioned legislative provisions will be brought into full conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the prioritization of relevant labour reform bills is being worked on, and that, pursuant to the Presidential Directive to align the country's labour policies with international treaties and ILO Conventions in a sound and realistic manner, an orientation on international labour standards and current legislative reforms towards Philippine compliance was conducted on 17 July 2012 for members of the DOLE Technical Committee on Legislative Matters and technical assistants of legislators. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the undertaken legislative reform will bring the aforementioned legislative provisions into full conformity with the Convention. It requests the Government to provide in its next report information on the outcome of this reform and copies of the relevant legislative texts once adopted.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1953)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 4 August 2011, alleging anti-union dismissals and acts of anti-union interference on the part of the employer, as well as the Government's observations thereon, in particular that the relevant cases reported by the ITUC were all classified as possibly labour-related and taken cognizance of by the National Tripartite Industrial Peace Council (NTIPC) Monitoring Body. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report information on any developments in this regard.

The Committee further notes the communication dated 31 July 2012 from the ITUC in which it provides its comments on the application of the Convention in law and in practice and refers to certain violations of trade union rights in 2011, including alleged acts of anti-union discrimination and anti-union interference on the part of the employer. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these allegations.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee notes the Government's observations on the comments submitted by the ITUC in 2010 and previous years on the alleged anti-union practices, acts of anti-union discrimination including dismissals, and employer interference, as well as cases of replacement of trade unions by non-independent company unions, dismissals and blacklisting of activists and other anti-union tactics in export processing zones (EPZs) and other special economic zones. In particular, it notes with interest that the Government reports the following positive measures: (i) the submission of the ITUC allegations to the NTIPC Monitoring Body and the information provided concerning the NTIPC's activity since its establishment; (ii) the creation of a tripartite team for an enterprise in the electronics sector (TTCEC) from among the members of the TIPC Monitoring Body with the mandate to conduct plant-level verification of the parties' claims and make recommendations to the TIPC Monitoring Body; and the management's willingness to negotiate with the union; (iii) the establishment of a tripartite team for an enterprise in the automobile sector (TTTAPI) to conduct plant-level verification of the parties' claims; and (iv) the classification by the NTIPC Monitoring Body as labour-related of 17 cases of alleged trade union rights violations in EPZs and their referral to the concerned agencies for immediate resolution. The Committee trusts that the Government will continue to take steps to ensure that the above allegations of acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, including in EPZs, are expeditiously examined and, if need be, appropriate measures of redress are taken and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions imposed, so as to ensure the effective protection of the right to organize. It requests the Government to continue to provide information concerning any developments in this regard.

Concerning the strengthening in practice of the protection available against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, with special emphasis on EPZs and special economic zones, the Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that, for the purpose of enforcing labour laws and the rights of workers to organize and bargain collectively, especially in EPZs, the Department of Labor and Employment (DOLE) has combined its routine inspection function with developmental approaches through the DOLE Kapatiran WISE-TAV Program, which seeks to ensure compliance in supply chains, and the Incentivizing Compliance Program or Tripartite Certification of Labor Laws Compliance, which consists of several tripartite certification hurdles, including the Tripartite Certification for Labor Standards Compliance and the Tripartite Certification for Industrial Peace, before the Tripartite Seal of Excellence can be achieved. The Government adds that DOLE and the Philippine Economic Zone Authority (PEZA) agreed to include all public zones in the Kapatiran and Incentivizing Programs, and ensure the continuous implementation of the 2006 DOLE-PEZA Memorandum of Agreement on labour-management education, joint inspection and conciliation–mediation in ensuring industrial peace. Furthermore, both DOLE and PEZA are part of the Verite Multi-Stakeholder Initiative, which started in 2010 and is currently being pilot tested through conduct of social audits in select garment and electronics firms inside the economic zones covering freedom of association, labour standards and occupational health and safety standards. The Committee also notes the national plan of action 2012–13 towards full freedom of association and collective bargaining rights in EPZs concluded by the Government (including DOLE and PEZA) and representatives of national federations of workers' organizations, which seeks to take steps to achieve improved compliance with the relevant ILO Conventions. The Committee welcomes this information and requests the Government to continue to provide information concerning any legislative or other initiatives taken or envisaged to strengthen in practice the protection available against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, with special emphasis on EPZs and special economic zones. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide statistical information on the number of complaints of unfair practices and inspections carried out on these matters in EPZs and special economic zones.

Lastly, the Committee notes the copy of the Standard Employment Contract used by the Philippines Overseas Employment Administration (POEA), provided by the Government under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). The Committee notes with concern that, under item 14(a) of the current POEA Standard Employment Contract, engaging in trade union activities constitutes a ground for termination of the contract. The Committee requests the Government to take all necessary measures to delete the engagement in trade union activities from the list of grounds for termination in item 14(a) of the POEA Standard Employment Contract. It further requests the Government to provide an estimate of the number of workers governed by this sample contract.

Article 4. Collective bargaining in the public sector. In its previous comments, the Committee took note of the Government's indication that, under section 13 of Executive Order No. 180, only terms and conditions not otherwise fixed by law may be negotiated between public sector employees' organizations and the government authorities. The Government had further stated that matters relating, inter alia, to wages and all other forms of pecuniary remuneration, retirement benefits, appointment, promotion and disciplinary action were not negotiable. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on measures taken to fully grant to public sector employees not engaged in the administration of the State the right to negotiate their terms and conditions of employment.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report, in particular that the Government indicates that public sector employees not engaged in the administration of the State are afforded the right to self-organize, and that a registered government employees' organization may negotiate, on behalf of the members of the negotiating unit, terms and conditions of employment, provided that it is able to secure an accreditation from the Civil Service Commission (CSC) as sole and exclusive negotiating agent for a particular negotiating unit (i.e. constitutional bodies and their regional offices; the executive department, including services and staff bureaux and regional offices; line bureaux and their regional offices; attached agencies; the legislature; the judiciary; state universities and colleges; government-owned and controlled corporations with original charters; and provinces, cities and municipalities). The following may be subject of negotiation: (a) schedule of vacation and other leaves; (b) personal growth and development; (c) communication system-internal (lateral and vertical), external; (d) work assignment/reassignment/detail/transfer; (e) distribution of workload; (f) provision for protection and safety; (g) provision for facilities for handicapped personnel; (h) provision for first aid medical services and supply; (i) physical fitness programme; (j) provision for family planning services for married women; (k) annual medical/physical examination; (l) recreational, social, athletic and cultural activities and facilities; (m) CNA incentive pursuant to PSLMC Resolution No. 4, s. 2002 and Resolution No. 2, s. 2003; and (n) such other concerns which are not prohibited by law and CSC rules and regulations.

The Committee notes that the subjects covered by collective bargaining do not appear to include such important aspects of conditions of work as wages, benefits and allowances, and working time. The Committee recalls in this connection that section 276 of the Labor Code provides that the terms and conditions of employment of all government employees, including employees of government-owned and controlled corporations, shall be governed by the civil service law, rules and regulations, and that their salaries shall be standardized by the National Assembly as provided for in the Constitution. Noting that the ITUC, in its most recent communication, confirms these restrictions on bargaining rights in the public sector, the Committee recalls that the Convention is compatible with systems requiring parliamentary approval of certain labour conditions or financial clauses of collective agreements, as long as the authorities respect the agreement adopted. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary legislative or other measures in order to expand the subjects covered by collective bargaining, in order to ensure that public sector employees not engaged in the administration of the State fully enjoy the right to negotiate their terms and conditions of employment, including wages, benefits and allowances, in accordance with Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention. It once again requests the Government to indicate any developments in this regard and provide copies of any relevant legislation adopted.

Poland

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 4 August 2011, on the application of the Convention and the Government's reply thereon. The Committee also notes the comments of the ITUC, dated 31 July 2012, referring to issues already highlighted by the Committee, as well as to allegations linked to the application of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). Finally, the Committee notes the comments from the National Commission of the Independent and Self-Governing Trade Union (NSZZ) "Solidarnosc", dated 30 August 2012, referring to the application of the Convention and in particular to Case No. 2888 examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join trade unions of their own choosing. In its previous comments, the Committee took note of the information provided by the Government and of the comments by the ITUC alleging that workers in state-owned enterprises in the health sector, as well as in the water and forestry industries, had their employment contracts terminated and replaced by civil law contracts depriving them of the right to belong to a trade union. The Committee also noted that, according to the Government, the right to form and join trade unions was not granted to those persons who had entered into an employment relationship on the basis of civil law contract, since they could not be considered employees under section 2 of the Labour Code. The Committee recalled that under Article 2 of the Convention, employers and workers, including workers without an employment contract, have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, without distinction whatsoever, with the sole exception of members of the armed forces and the police. It requested the Government to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged to amend its legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes that the Committee on Freedom of Association, when examining a complaint submitted by the National Commission of the NSZZ "Solidarnosc", also requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all workers, without distinction whatsoever, including self-employed workers and those employed under civil law contracts, enjoyed the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing within the meaning of the Convention (see 363rd report of the Committee, Case No. 2888). The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that: (1) the Ministry of Labour and Social Policy has prepared a draft law amending the Act on trade unions, which provides for the extension of the right to form trade unions to outworkers (according to the Government, these workers can only join trade unions); (2) the Tripartite Committee for Socio-economic Affairs decided in June 2012 to start an in-depth discussion on the problem of people working on the basis of civil law contracts, including their right to organize in trade unions; (3) this issue will be addressed at the forum of problem groups of the Tripartite Committee for Socio-economic Dialogue; and (4) there will also be a wider discussion within the framework of the Tripartite Commission on changes in national legislation on the right to organize and it will examine, inter alia, the possibility of extending the right to organize to self-employed people. The Committee welcomes the initiatives on potential improvements to the legislation and hopes that any legislative reform will take account of the abovementioned principles. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any progress made in this respect.

Article 3. Right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom. The Committee recalls that it noted in its previous observation the entry into force of the Act on the civil service, 2008, and that according to its section 78(6), members of the civil service occupying senior positions cannot exercise trade union functions. The Committee recalls that while legislation may restrict the right of civil servants in senior positions to join unions of lower grade employees, the persons concerned should have the right to form their own organizations to defend their interests and the right to elect representatives in full freedom; all workers in the public service should also have the right to perform trade union functions in their respective trade union organizations. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, all the necessary steps to eliminate the incompatibility with Article 3 of the Convention will be taken at the next revision of the Act in question. The Committee hopes that the revision of section 78(6) of the Act on the civil service will be made in the near future and that it will take into account the principle mentioned above.

Right of organizations to organize their activities in full freedom and to formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments, it requested the Government to specify categories of employees whose right to strike was restricted and to provide information on the practical application of the right to strike by such employees. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, section 78(3) of the Act on the civil service forbids public servants to participate in a strike or industrial action interfering with the normal functioning of the office. In this respect, the Committee recalls that public servants who do not exercise authority on behalf of the State must be able to exercise the right to strike. The Committee trusts that in the context of the revision of the Act on the civil service, to which the Government refers in the previous paragraph, the necessary measures will be taken to acknowledge the abovementioned principle.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) sent on 4 August 2011 and 31 July 2012. The Committee also notes the Government's reply to some of the observations made by the ITUC. Similarly, the Committee takes note of the reply from the Polish Confederation of Private Employers (LEWIATAN), dated 3 November 2011, to the ITUC's allegations on the refusal of an enterprise to negotiate improvements in employment conditions, and in particular its statement that the crisis – which started after the agreement had been concluded in 2008 – had had drastic repercussions on the economic situation of enterprises; in September 2011, all the enterprise's shares were sold. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in connection with the ITUC's comments made in 2012 on anti-union dismissals in various sectors of activity. The Committee also notes the comments from the National Commission of the Independent and Self-Governing Trade Union (NSZZ) "Solidarnosc" on matters already highlighted by the Committee.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the allegations of inefficiency of the proceedings and sanctions established in the legislation, and urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective application of the legal sanctions for all cases of anti-union discrimination. The Committee also requested the Government to continue providing information on the number of complaints for anti-union discrimination, the average duration of the proceedings and the outcome of these proceedings. The Committee notes that the Government states as follows: (1) section 38 of the Labour Code contains the obligation to consult with the trade union concerned before the termination of an employment contract; (2) section 18 of the Labour Code stipulates the principle of non-discrimination in employment on grounds of trade union membership and provides for compensation for damages incurred; (3) section 45(1) stipulates that in the event of an unjustified termination of the employment relationship the employee may demand reinstatement with the same conditions as before; (4) freedom of association is protected under article 59(1) of the Constitution and any violation of this right is subject to criminal liability (section 218(1) of the Penal Code and section 35(1) of the 1991 Act on trade unions).

The Committee also notes the Government's information on the following: (1) in 2010, there were 244 complaints lodged for the violation of the principle of special protection for members of trade unions; 20 per cent of the cases were dismissed; 15 per cent were discontinued due to a settlement or withdrawal of the claim; and, to date, only two cases are pending before the judicial authority; (2) as regards the allegation of the excessive length of proceedings in labour matters, out of 63,417 cases submitted to district courts in 2010, 47.4 per cent were completed within a period of three months and 72.5 per cent within six months; less than 10 per cent of the total number of cases were pending for more than 12 months and, of these, only 1.7 per cent of cases were pending for more than two years; (3) there were 35 cases of criminal proceedings related to the violation of the principle of association in 2010, of which 14 were pending in April 2011, 12 persons were convicted, two were acquitted and proceedings against eight people were discontinued. The Committee takes due note of all this information and emphasizes the high number of complaints concerning anti-union practices. The Committee requests the Government to submit in its next report statistics on the number of new cases concerning anti-union practices brought before the courts.

Compensation for anti-union dismissal. The Committee had noted that, according to the ITUC, victims of anti-union dismissals could ask for reinstatement, but court proceedings could take up to two years. In this respect, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government, to which it referred in the previous paragraph, concerning the procedural deadlines for dealing with complaints for violations of trade union rights. Similarly, the Committee notes that the Government refers once again to a possible legislative reform that would introduce an amendment to the Code of Civil Procedure giving the judicial authority the possibility, in cases of termination of an employment relationship in which there are allegations of anti-union discrimination, of granting the right for the persons concerned to remain in their jobs during the proceedings. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report of any initiative to amend the legislation in this respect.

Portugal

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments from: (1) the General Workers' Union (UGT) and the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers (CGTP) – annexed to the Government's report; (2) the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 24 August 2010 and 4 August 2011; and (3) the Confederation of Portuguese Tourism (CTP), received on 22 September 2010. The Committee also notes, in connection with various comments made by the ITUC on 31 July 2012, that the Government requested further clarification to be able to send relevant observations (the Office wrote to the Government in this respect).

Article 4 of the Convention. Legal matters pending. Compulsory arbitration. In its previous comment, the Committee noted that section 508(1)(b) of the Labour Code as revised, provides for compulsory arbitration after a majority vote by the representatives of the workers and employers on the Standing Committee for Social Partnership (CPCS). The Committee requested the Government to look into the possibility of amending the section in question so as to preclude the decision to impose compulsory arbitration from being taken by employers' and workers' organizations that are not parties to the dispute. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's statement that it is not the workers' and employers' associations that impose compulsory arbitration. The fact that arbitration is recommended by the majority of representatives of the workers and employers, provided for under the section in question, is not binding, given that the decision to resort to compulsory arbitration does not arise out of the recommendation. Under section 509(1) of the Labour Code, recourse to compulsory arbitration is determined by an informed decision of the minister responsible for labour matters, taking into account the number of employers and workers affected by the dispute, the social protection of the workers concerned, the social and economic repercussions of the dispute and the position of the parties with respect to arbitration. The Committee recalls that any provisions stipulating that the authority might resort to arbitration in the event of parties to collective bargaining failing to reach agreement are not usually in compliance with the principle of voluntary negotiation contained in Article 4 of the Convention and that compulsory arbitration is only acceptable in the case of acute national or local crisis. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to guarantee the respect of the abovementioned principle.

Representativeness of organizations. The Committee had noted the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2334 which mentioned that the legislation: (1) cites by name the trade union organizations that are to form part of the Economic and Social Council (CES) and the CPCS, which means that some organizations that deem themselves representative are left out; and (2) does not lay down objective criteria for determining the representativeness of employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee had requested the Government, in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers, to work out and lay down objective, precise and predetermined criteria to evaluate the representativeness and independence of employers' and workers' organizations, and to amend section 9 of Act No. 108/91 of the CES by deleting the names of the workers' organizations that are to be members of the CES and the CPCS, referring instead to the most representative organizations. The Committee had noted the information sent by the Government to the effect that: (1) the president of the CES had taken the initiative of launching a general discussion on the composition of the CES with the cooperation of members; and (2) it was impossible to forecast the outcome of these discussions or the proposals and recommendations the president might make. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, there has been no change in this area. The Committee requests the Government once again to take the necessary measures to work out and lay down objective, precise and predetermined criteria to evaluate the representativeness and independence of employers' and workers' organizations that are part of the CES and the CPCS, and to amend section 9 of Act No. 108/91 of the Economic and Social Council on the lines it has proposed.

Furthermore, the Committee notes the CGTP's statement, in connection with the impact of the financial crisis on the trade unions, that Act No. 23/2012 of 25 June 2012 amends a number of sections of the Labour Code. It entered into effect on 1 August 2012 and cut pay and cash benefits in the state enterprises, even when these had been applied under collective agreement. The Government explained that the cut applied to salaries exceeding €1,500 and was an attempt to consolidate the state finances in the prevailing economic crisis; this salary reduction was declared constitutional by the Constitutional Court. The Committee would like to stress, in general, the importance it attaches to full compliance with collective agreements in force and, taking into account the Government's statements concerning the economic crisis, would like to refer to the principles in its General Survey of this year on this matter. Finally, a number of trade union organizations complain about the reduction in the number of collective agreements. The Committee notes that the Government connects this fact with the economic crisis.

Romania

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

Observations of workers' organizations. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments made by the Block of National Trade Unions (BNS) in a communication dated 1 September 2010. Furthermore, it notes the Government's observations on the comments submitted by: (1) the Federation of National Education (FEN) in a communication dated 25 May 2011; (2) the National Trade Union Confederation (CNS "Cartel Alfa") jointly with the BNS in a communication received on 10 June 2011; (3) the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 4 August 2011; (4) the ITUC in a communication dated 31 July 2012; and (5) the CNS "Cartel Alfa" in a communication received on 30 August 2012. It also notes the comments of the Confederation of Democratic Trade Unions of Romania (CSDR) submitted with the Government's report dated 31 August 2012. The Committee requests the Government to provide more detailed information concerning the following matters raised by the workers' organizations: non-resolution of the issue of division of trade union assets; procedures of registration of unions and modification of union statutes or executive committees lasting in practice several months; and procedures instituted by the National Agency for Integrity (ANI) against Bogdan Hossu, President of CNS "Cartel Alfa".

Legislative matters. In its previous comments, the Committee had been commenting upon several sections of Act No. 168/1999 on the settlement of labour conflicts, Act No. 54/2003 on trade unions and the Labour Code. The Committee had noted the Government's indication that these pieces of legislation were being revised. The Committee hoped that in the context of the abovementioned legislative review, due account would be taken of the need to amend the relevant provisions to ensure that: (1) minors have the right to join unions without parental authorization as soon as they are authorized to work; (2) all public servants with the sole possible exceptions found in Article 9 of the Convention, have the right to organize; (3) workers exercising more than one occupational activity have the right to establish and join more than one organization of their own choosing; (4) the procedure for registration is simplified and the requirement of prior approval for amendments to trade union by-laws is removed; (5) the circumstances and conditions under which the assets of a union may be subject to liquidation are brought into conformity with Convention; (6) the powers afforded to public authorities in terms of control over the economic and financial activity of unions are limited to the obligation of submitting periodic reports or cases of complaints; (7) compulsory arbitration may only be imposed in essential services in the strict sense of the term, for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in cases of national or local crisis; and (8) minimum services are negotiated by the social partners concerned and, in the absence of agreement between the parties, determined by an independent body.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that Act No. 62 of 2011 concerning Social Dialogue (Social Dialogue Act) abrogates Act No. 168 of 1999 on the settlement of labour disputes and Act No. 54 of 2003 on trade unions; and that Act No. 40 of 2011 substantially amends the Labour Code. The Committee notes with satisfaction that the following issues raised previously have been resolved through the adoption of the Social Dialogue Act: right of minors who are authorized to work to join unions without parental authorization (section 3(5)); right of workers exercising more than one occupational activity to establish and join more than one organization (section 3(4)); simplified union registration procedure and no prior authority approval for amendments to union by-laws (sections 14–20); no liquidation of union assets for debts payment to the State (sections 21–26); and compulsory arbitration only at the request of both parties (sections 179 and 180).

The Committee notes, however, that certain issues previously raised are still pending after the adoption of the Social Dialogue Act (denial of the right to organize to certain categories of public servants (section 4); excessive control of trade union finances (section 26(2)); and minimum services set by law (section 205)). The Committee also notes a number of additional discrepancies between the provisions of the Social Dialogue Act and the Convention in terms of scope of application (such as self-employed, apprentices, dismissed or retired workers), eligibility conditions for trade union officials, restriction of trade union activities (prohibition of activities with political character), etc.

In this respect, the Committee notes that the Government has recently benefitted from ILO technical assistance seeking to ensure the conformity with the Convention of a draft Emergency Ordinance which substantially amends the Social Dialogue Act. The Committee trusts that the Government will take due account of its comments in the context of this legislative review and that the new legislation will be in full conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any developments in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1958)

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 100th Session, June 2011)

In its previous observation, the Committee noted the debate which took place within the Conference Committee in June 2011 and welcomed the Government's commitment to continue to avail itself of ILO technical assistance. The Committee had also noted the adoption of: (i) Act No. 62 of 2011 concerning Social Dialogue (Social Dialogue Act), which abrogated Act No. 130 of 1996 on collective agreements, Act No. 168 of 1999 on the settlement of labour conflicts, Act No. 356 of 2001 concerning employers' organizations and Act No. 54 of 2003 on trade unions; and (ii) Act No. 40 of 2011, which substantially amended the Labour Code.

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments submitted by: (i) the Federation of Free Trade Unions of the Chemical and Petrochemical Industries (FSLCP) in a communication dated 5 June 2012; and (ii) the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 31 July 2012.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Effective protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. Sanctions prescribed for acts of anti-union discrimination. In its previous observation, noting that sections 10 of the Social Dialogue Act and 220(2) of the Labour Code prohibited acts of anti-union discrimination but that the new legislation did not seem to foresee sanctions in the case of their violation, the Committee had requested the Government to clarify this point. The Committee notes that the Government confirms that the Social Dialogue Act and the Labour Code as amended do not contain sanctions for acts of anti-union discrimination but indicates that sanctions for anti-union dismissals are provided for in the general law such as in Government Ordinance No. 137 of 2000 concerning the prevention and sanctioning of all forms of discrimination. The Committee notes that the mentioned Ordinance contains provisions prohibiting and sanctioning discrimination on the grounds of race, nationality, religion, social origin, HIV, refugee status, conviction, age, sex or sexual orientation, as regards the entry into employment, modification or termination of the employment contract, etc. Noting that union affiliation or the engagement in legitimate trade union activities does not constitute a ground for discrimination under the Ordinance, the Committee recalls that the existence of general legal provisions prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination (such as section 10 of the Social Dialogue Act and section 220(2) of the Labour Code) is not enough if these provisions are not accompanied by effective and rapid procedures to ensure their application in practice. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the general legal provisions, which, according to the Government sanction acts of anti-union discrimination or, if need be, to take the necessary measures to guarantee full protection against acts of anti-union discrimination including by imposing sufficiently dissuasive sanctions.

Sanctions in practice for acts of anti-union discrimination or interference. Furthermore, the Committee had previously noted that, according to the ITUC, sanctions for anti-union activities are rarely imposed in practice due to loopholes in the Penal Code, and that the complaint procedure is too complicated. The Committee notes that the Government provides statistical information on sanctions imposed by labour inspection pursuant to section 217(1)(b) of the Social Dialogue Act, which concerns the refusal to bargain collectively (whereas acts of interference are sanctioned pursuant to section 217(1)(a)). The Committee recalls that the refusal to bargain collectively does not constitute an act of anti-union discrimination or interference. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide in its next report statistical information, or at least the maximum information available, on the number of cases of anti-union discrimination and interference brought to the competent authorities, the average duration of the relevant proceedings and their outcome, as well as the sanctions and remedial measures applied in such cases.

Tripartite meeting regarding recent anti-union practices. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted from the comments of the ITUC and the BNS the occurrence in recent years of certain anti-union practices such as making employment conditional upon the worker's agreement not to create or join a union or anti-union dismissals, and requested the Government to discuss this situation with the most representative organizations of workers and employers. The Committee welcomes the Government's indication that, following the formation of the new Government and the modification of the composition of the National Tripartite Council for Social Dialogue, a debate on the subject will be able to be included on the agenda of the Council, according to the priorities for action and consultation established in agreement with the social partners. The Committee trusts that the meeting will be organized in the very near future and requests the Government to provide information on its outcome and any agreed follow-up measures.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. Bargaining level. The Committee had previously requested the Government to indicate whether the new legal provisions allow the parties, if they so wish, to negotiate and conclude, in addition to sectoral agreements, collective agreements at the national level. It had also requested the Government to communicate comparative statistics for the period 2008–12 on the coverage of collective bargaining. The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (i) the Social Dialogue Act establishes in section 128(1) the "mandatory" bargaining levels (i.e. enterprise, group of enterprises, and sector of activity as determined by the social partners), which does not prohibit collective bargaining at the national level, if the parties so decide, all the more so since the representativeness criteria at national level are already established; (ii) the national collective agreement is no longer valid due to its denunciation by the employer organization; and (iii) given that the requested comparative statistics 2008–12 would not be of relevance because 2012 is a period of transition necessary for the adaptation to the new legal provisions, statistical data is provided only concerning the 2012 collective agreements at the level of sector of activity and groups of enterprises. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government but observes that the information on the sectoral collective agreements in force in 2012 was not attached to the report. The Committee notes with concern that the Government indicates, in a recent request for ILO technical assistance with regard to a draft Emergency Ordinance which substantially amends the Social Dialogue Act, that one of the consequences of the Social Dialogue Act was a drastic decrease in the number of collective agreements concluded at the enterprise level and at the level of sector of activity (due to delay in the determination of the sectors of activity by the social partners). The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on any developments in regard to this decrease and to communicate comparative and other statistics on the coverage of collective bargaining.

Criteria of representativeness. The Committee had previously noted the representativeness criteria at enterprise level set out in section 51 of the Social Dialogue Act (union membership of at least 50 per cent plus one of the workers of the enterprise) and, recalling that if no union secures the absolute majority, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their own members, it had requested the Government to amend the legislation in order to ensure respect for this principle. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, if no trade union attains the majority to be recognized as bargaining agent, the “representatives designated by the employees” become the legitimate partners, which includes the representatives of the trade unions existing at enterprise level and the representatives elected by the workers. While noting this information, the Committee observes that, according to section 135(1): (i) in enterprises without a trade union meeting the representativeness criteria, if an enterprise-level union exists and is affiliated to a federation meeting the representativeness criteria in the relevant sector of activity, the negotiation of a collective agreement will be carried out by the representatives of that federation together with the elected workers’ representatives; and (ii) in enterprises without a trade union meeting the representativeness criteria, if an enterprise-level union exists but is not affiliated to a federation meeting the representativeness criteria in the relevant sector of activity, the negotiation of a collective agreement will be carried out by the elected workers’ representatives. Recalling the principle enunciated above, the Committee underlines that the affiliation to a representative federation should not be required for being able to negotiate at enterprise level. It further emphasizes that direct negotiation between the undertaking and its employees, bypassing representative organizations where these exist, might in certain cases be detrimental to the principle that negotiation between employers and organizations of workers should be encouraged and promoted. The Committee requests the Government to amend the relevant legislation in order to guarantee the application of these principles.

Collective bargaining in the public sector. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that in the public budget sector which covers all public employees, including those who are not engaged in the administration of the State (e.g. teachers), the following subjects are excluded from the scope of collective bargaining: base salaries, pay increases, allowances, bonuses and other staff entitlements which are fixed by law. It had also noted that the salary rights in the budget sector were presently established by Act No. 284/2010 on Unitary Salaries of the Staff Paid from Public Funds, which abrogated Act No. 330/2009 and continued to stipulate that the fixation of salaries in the public budget sector is exclusively by law (section 3(b)) and that no salaries or other pecuniary entitlements exceeding the provisions of this law can be negotiated through collective agreements (section 37(1)). The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to bring national law and practice into conformity with the Convention to ensure that wages and pecuniary entitlements are included in the scope of collective bargaining for the public service workers covered by the Convention.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government, in particular that Act No. 284/2010 is in line with the Government’s wage policy in the public sector, the protocol concluded with the social partners in 2008 and the provisions of the financial agreements of the country with the International Monetary Fund concerning the general budget for personnel expenses in the framework of the consolidated State budget. It further notes that the Government refers to Government Decision No. 833 of 2007 and section 138 of the Social Dialogue Act. In this context, the Committee welcomes the Government’s indication that measures are being taken towards the progressive increase of the salaries of staff paid from public funds that had been reduced by 25 per cent in 2010.

The Committee welcomes in particular section 138(4) of the Social Dialogue Act, according to which, while wages in the public sector are fixed by law within specific limits that cannot be the subject of negotiations nor modified by collective agreements, in cases where wage entitlements are established in special laws between minimum and maximum limits, the concrete wages are determined by collective bargaining, within the legal limits. Considering that this provision may be compatible with the Convention, depending on the practical application, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the categories of public servants for which the wage entitlements are established in special laws between minimum and maximum limits so that the concrete wages are determined by collective bargaining within those limits. For the remaining categories of public servants, while taking into consideration the Government’s statements concerning Act No. 284/2010, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in full consultation with the social partners and, if necessary, with technical assistance from the Office, to bring national law and practice into conformity with Article 4 of the Convention, so as to ensure that wages and pecuniary entitlements are included in the scope of collective bargaining for all public service workers covered by the Convention, on the understanding that upper and lower limits may be set for the wage negotiations. The Committee also requests the Government to supply a copy of Government Decision 833/2007.

Observing that the Government has recently benefited from ILO technical assistance seeking to ensure the conformity with the Convention of a draft Emergency Ordinance which substantially amends the Social Dialogue Act, the Committee trusts that, in the context of this legislative review, the Government will take due account of the technical comments made by the Office in the framework of the technical assistance provided and will soon be in a position to report progress on the issues raised by the Committee. The Committee requests the Government to supply in its next report a copy of the Social Dialogue Act as amended by the Emergency Ordinance.

Lastly, the Committee recalls that, in its conclusions, the Conference Committee had requested the Government to provide detailed information and statistics relating to the impact of the recent legislative changes on the application of the Convention. The Committee trusts that the Government will submit the requested information in its next report.

Russian Federation

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to provide its observations on the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), the Russian Labour Confederation (KTR) and the Seafarers' Union of Russia (RPSM) alleging numerous violations of trade union rights in practice, including the denial of legal personality trade unions, interference by the authorities in internal trade union affairs, harassment of trade union leaders, and restrictions on the rights to strike. The Committee notes the Government's reply thereon. The Committee notes that an ILO mission visited the country in October 2011 in order to discuss similar issues pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association with all interested parties.

The Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC in a communication dated 31 July 2012 alleging numerous violations of trade union rights in practice, including denial of registration of trade unions, dissolution of a migrant workers' union upon a court's order and restrictions on the right to strike. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee notes that the Government's report for the current reporting cycle has not been received, however, it observes that the Labour Code has been amended.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to organize their administration and activities. Labour Code. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend section 410 of the Labour Code so as to repeal the obligation to indicate the duration of a strike in order to allow trade unions to declare strikes of unlimited duration. The Committee notes with interest that this provision has been amended so as to repeal this obligation.

Other legislation. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to ensure that workers of postal services, municipal services and railways can exercise the right to strike and, to that effect, amend section 9 of the 1994 Federal Postal Service Act, section 11(1)(10) of the 1998 Federal Municipal Services Act and section 26 of the 2003 Federal Rail Transport Act. Furthermore, noting that the 2004 Law on State Civil Service prohibits civil servants from stopping their duties to solve a labour dispute, it also requested the Government to amend the relevant legislative provisions so as to ensure that public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State could exercise the right to strike. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that the right to strike of the following categories of workers is restricted: workers of the federal courier communications and the municipal employees, as well as certain categories of railway workers. The Government considers that the restrictions imposed on the right to strike of certain categories of workers do not contradict international standards. It refers in this respect to Article 8(2) and (1)(c) of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and points out that, under these provisions, a State may impose prohibition on the exercise of the right to strike by members of the armed forces, the police, or the administration of the State, as well as other persons, if necessary, in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public order, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. The Government stresses that nothing in this Article shall authorize States parties to Convention No. 87 to take legislative measures which would prejudice, or apply the law in such a manner as would prejudice, the guarantees provided for in that Convention. The Committee once again recalls its basic position that the right to strike is an intrinsic corollary of the right to organize protected by Convention No. 87. It further recalls that, in addition to the armed forces and the police (members of which could be excluded from the application of the Convention), the right to strike may be restricted or prohibited only for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State and in essential services in the strict sense of the term, i.e. services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. The Committee considers that railway services and postal services do not constitute essential services. The Committee therefore requests once again the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the abovementioned legislative acts so as to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention and ensure that workers of the federal courier communications, railway workers, municipal employees, as well as public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State, can exercise the right to strike. It requests the Government to indicate in its next report all measures taken in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to provide its observations on the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), the Russian Labour Confederation (KTR) and the Seafarers' Union of Russia (RPSM) alleging numerous violations of trade union rights in practice, including acts of anti-union discrimination and interference by employers in trade union internal affairs, as well as ineffective mechanisms of protection against such violations. The Committee notes that similar allegations have been submitted by these organizations in 2011. The Committee notes that an ILO mission visited the country in October 2011, in order to discuss a complaint pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association with all interested parties. The Committee also notes the Government's report submitted in 2011.

The Committee further notes the comments made by the ITUC in a communication dated 31 July 2012 alleging new violations of the Convention in practice and referring in particular, to cases of anti-union discrimination, interference by employers in trade union internal affairs and refusal to bargain collectively. It requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Articles 1–3 of the Convention. The Committee had previously noted relevant provisions of the Labour Code, Criminal Code and Code of Administrative Offences providing for sanctions which could be imposed on employers found guilty of anti-union discrimination, as well as sanctions imposed for acts of interference by workers' or employers' organizations or their agents in each other's affairs, particularly in the establishing, functioning and administration of the organizations. Referring, however, to the allegations of ineffective mechanisms of protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference by employers in trade union internal affairs submitted by the ITUC, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the application of these legislative provisions in practice and to indicate the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference submitted, investigated and prosecuted within the last two years, as well as on the number of persons punished and the concrete sanctions imposed. The Committee notes that in its 2011 report, the Government once again reiterated the information it had previously provided describing the relevant applicable legislative provisions and once again stressed that the legislation contains appropriate penalties for offences concerning non-compliance with the labour legislation. The Government further indicates that there have been no recent court rulings dealing with complaints lodged by trade unions alleging anti-union discrimination.

The Committee notes, in this respect, the information contained in the report of the abovementioned mission. It notes, in particular, that according to the KTR despite the fact that the law provides for the prohibition of discrimination, protection, especially against acts of anti-union discrimination, is virtually non-existent in practice and that the bodies whose roles should be to protect trade union rights are not effective. The KTR representatives explained that the system of protection of labour rights involved three bodies: the Prosecutor's Office, courts and the labour inspectorate. The Prosecutor Office's mandate is to deal with the supervision of the application of the legislation and allegations of violations of human rights. However, according to the KTR, it often refuses to deal with the alleged violations of trade union rights considering that such violations fall outside its sphere of competence and should rather be brought to the attention of labour inspectors. Yet, the KTR informs that the labour inspectorate's position was that trade union rights are outside the scope of the labour law; thus, it was not competent to deal with the alleged violations of trade union rights. The trade unions were therefore referred to courts. According to the KTR, in the case of anti-union discrimination, this became particularly difficult as such cases were very difficult to prove; even if discrimination is established by the court, the Prosecutor's Office does not pursue the cases against employers, who refuse to reinstate or compensate a worker who had been subjected to anti-union discrimination; while the legislation provides for administrative and criminal responsibility, in practice, violations of trade union rights are not punished. The KTR representatives explained that administrative responsibility can only be engaged within two months after the lodging of a complaint; in such case, an investigation is carried out but it usually takes over two months. According to the KTR there are no cases where an employer or an official has been found criminally responsible for violating trade union rights.

The Committee further notes that representatives of the State Labour Inspectorate (Rostrud), competent to deal with violations of labour legislation, including alleged cases of discrimination, in general, and anti-union discrimination, in particular, confirmed that it is extremely difficult to prove cases of discrimination in court. They added that trade unions therefore most often file complaints with Rostrud; however, employers, having sufficient means and resources to appeal the decisions of labour inspectors in court do not hesitate to do so. They confirmed that, in practice, if a complaint is lodged with the court, the labour inspection cannot intervene. With regard to the application of penalties, Rostrud officials considered that in general, the fines are very small, to the point that some enterprises preferred to pay fines than to comply with the labour legislation.

The Committee notes the concluding remarks of the mission, which considered that further action is needed to strengthen the protection against violations of freedom of association both in law, and in practice, and that better knowledge of available procedures and further clarification of the practices would help both the social partners and the different state bodies to navigate in a context where responsibilities are not always clear. This applies in particular to the relationship between Rostrud, the Prosecutor's Office and the courts. The Committee notes that a proposal for addressing, among others, the abovementioned matters has been drafted by two trade union centres in the country – the KTR and the Federation of Independent Trade Unions of Russia (FNPR) – and that the Government and employers’ representatives agreed that it should be examined in the framework of the Russian Tripartite Commission (RTK). The proposal refers to the need to draft specific legislative provisions with a view to render protection against violations of trade union rights, in general, and anti-union discrimination, in particular, more effective, and suggests to create a body with a specific mandate to examine cases of violations of trade union rights, including anti-union discrimination (such a mandate can also be undertaken by an existing body). The proposal also calls for training of relevant bodies and courts on freedom of association. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the action taken to consider and make progress on the KTR–FNPR proposal, including the plans for ensuring the application of Articles 1 to 3 of the Convention in practice. In this respect, the Committee reminds the Government that it can avail itself of the technical cooperation of the Office if it so wishes.

Article 4. Parties to collective bargaining. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 31 of the Labour Code so as to ensure that it is clear that it is only in the event where there are no trade unions at the workplace that an authorization to bargain collectively can be conferred to other representative bodies. The Committee regrets that no information has been provided by the Government. It is therefore bound to reiterate its previous request.

Compulsory arbitration. The Committee recalls that it had previously noted the Government’s indication that pursuant to sections 402–404 of the Labour Code, labour arbitration can only be established upon agreement of both parties to the dispute, who also elect the arbitrators, and that the only exception to this rule is set out by section 404 (part 7) of the code. The Committee had noted that this provision referred to section 413 (parts 1 and 2) of the code, dealing with illegal strikes, and thereby imposed compulsory arbitration not only in essential services in the strict sense of the term, but also in other services determined by federal laws. The Committee notes that in its 2011 report, the Government indicates that together with the social partners it had drafted amendments to the Labour Code with a view to improve and increase efficiency of procedures for settling collective labour disputes. The Committee notes that the Labour Code was amended in November 2011. It understands, however, that the abovementioned provision of section 413 remained unchanged. The Committee recalls that recourse to compulsory arbitration in cases where the parties do not reach an agreement is generally permissible only in the context of essential services in the strict sense of the term or in the case of civil servants exercising authority in the name of the State. Noting the Government’s statement that in order to achieve compliance with international labour standards, the labour legislation is under constant review in the framework of the RTK, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the relevant sections of the Labour Code so as to ensure the application of the abovementioned principle and to indicate measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Rwanda

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1988)

The Committee notes the Government’s reply to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010. The Committee also takes note of the comments provided by the ITUC dated 31 July 2012 on the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish organizations of their own choosing. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that Law No. 22/2002 of 9 July 2002, on the General Statute for the Rwanda Public Service was silent on the right of public servants to organize and to collective bargaining, although section 73 of the Law provided that public servants and the staff of public enterprises enjoyed rights and freedoms on the same basis as other citizens, the procedure for the implementation of section 73 of Law No. 22/2002 was still to be determined, and the scope of relevant provisions of the Labour Code respecting occupational organizations needed to be extended to state officials. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the Law on General Statute for Public Servants is being revised and that full legislative expression on public servants’ right to organize and to collective bargaining has been given in the draft Law. The Committee hopes that the Law will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to provide a copy once it is adopted.

Article 3. Right of organizations to freely organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee noted that section 155(2) of the new Labour Code refers to an order of the Minister responsible for labour to determine “indispensable services” and the conditions of exercising the right to strike in these activities. The Committee had noted that the order was being prepared and requested the Government to supply a copy of the legal text once adopted. The Committee notes that a copy of the Ministerial Order No. 04 dated 13 July 2010 has been provided. The Committee raises certain issues related to the content of this Rule in a direct request.

Finally, the Committee had noted in its previous comments that under the terms of section 124 of the Labour Code any organization requesting recognition as the most representative organization had to authorize the labour administration to check the register of its members and property. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that this requirement will be removed from the labour law. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the legal text which repeals the requirement to check the register of property from the Labour Code.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98)
(ratification: 1988)

The Committee takes note of the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in communications dated 4 August 2011 and 31 July 2012 with regard to dismissals of trade unions' representatives or affiliates and to matters previously raised by the Committee. The Committee notes the Government's response to the 2011 ITUC comments.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. In its previous comments the Committee asked the Government to take steps to establish sufficiently dissuasive penalties for acts of anti-union interference and discrimination particularly concerning the amount of legal compensation of trade union affiliates. The Committee noted that, according to the provisions of section 114 of the new Labour Law (Law 13/2009), any act which infringes the provisions providing protection against acts of discrimination and interference should constitute an offence and incur the payment of damages. In this regard the Committee requested the Government to provide further information on the amount of damages applicable for acts of discrimination against trade union members or officials, other than the dismissal of trade unions representatives established in article 33 of the Labour Law. The Committee notes that, according to the government report, such acts can be punished by a term of imprisonment not exceeding two months and a fine ranging from 50,000 to 300,000 Rwandan francs (RWF) (approximately between US$80 and US$480) (section 169 of the Labour Law). The Committee notes that the Government recognizes in its report that the Law 13/2009 does not specify the amount of damages applicable to acts of anti-union discrimination against trade union members or officials; this issue will be addressed accordingly in reviewing the Labour Code by making clear that the amount of damages provided under article 33 of the Labour Law can also apply to acts of discrimination against trade union members or officials. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard and underlines the importance that the future version of the Labour Law applies to all acts of anti-union discrimination and interference in respect of compensation. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the sanctions established in Law 13/2009.

Article 4. With reference to its previous comments concerning compulsory arbitration in the context of collective bargaining, the Committee noted that the collective bargaining dispute settlement procedure provided for in section 143 ff. of the Labour Law culminates, in cases of non-conciliation, in referral to an arbitration committee whose decisions may be the subject of an appeal to the competent jurisdiction, whose decision shall be binding. The Committee recalls once again that, except for the cases of public servants engaged in the administration of the State and essential services in the strict sense of the term, arbitration imposed by authorities is contrary to the principle of voluntary negotiation of collective agreements established by the Convention, and thus the autonomy of bargaining partners (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 257). The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation in such a way that, except in the circumstances referred to above, a collective labour dispute in the context of collective bargaining may be submitted to arbitration or to the competent legal authority only with the agreement of both parties.

Moreover, with reference to its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 121 of the Labour Law provided that, at the request of a representative organization of workers or employers, the collective agreement shall be negotiated within a joint committee convened by the Minister of Labour or his/her delegate or representatives of the Administration participating as advisers. The Committee notes that, according to the Government's report, such a commission is made up of an equal number of employers' and workers' organizations so that negotiations are carried out on an equal footing and the outcome of the negotiations finally reflects the agreement of both parties, and that this provision could rather promote the negotiation of collective agreements. Nevertheless, the Committee recalls once again that such a provision may restrict the principle of free and voluntary negotiation of the parties established by the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 121 of the Labour Law so that the joint committee to negotiate a collective agreement operates without the presence of a representative of the labour administration.

With regard to the question of the extension of collective agreements, the Committee in its previous observations noted that, under section 133 of the Labour Law, at the request of a representative workers' or employers' organization, whether or not it is a party to the agreement or on its own initiative, the Minister of Labour may make all or some of the provisions of a collective agreement binding on all employers and workers covered by the occupational territorial scope of the agreement. The Committee notes that, according to the Government's report, in practice the extension of a collective agreement can be possible only subject to in-depth tripartite consultations. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that extension of collective agreements is not done unilaterally.

Article 6. In its previous observations the Committee noted that, under section 3 of the Labour Law, any person governed by the general or individual public service regulations is not subject to the provisions of the code other than for matters determined by an Order of the Prime Minister. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the Law on the General Statute of Public Servants is being revised and will be sent shortly after it is adopted and that full legislative expression on public servants' right to organize and to collective bargaining has been provided. The Committee hopes that the new Law on the General Statute of Public Servants will enshrine the requirements and provisions set up in the Convention for public servants other than those employed in the Administration of the State and requests the Government to send a copy of this Law upon its adoption.

Collective bargaining in practice. Finally, in its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to supply information on the activities of the National Labour Council with regard to collective bargaining, on the number of collective agreements concluded, and on the sectors and numbers of workers covered. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, one collective agreement was signed on 1 January 2012 between the Congress of Labour and Brotherhood of Rwanda (COTRAV) and the Workers' Trade Union Confederation of Rwanda (CESTRAR) and, on the other hand, the Rwandan Society for Tea Production and Commercialization (SORWATHE Ltd) covering between 700 and 1,000 workers in the tea sector. The Government adds that the two abovementioned trade unions have sent their representatives to the National Labour Council. The Committee also notes that, according to the Government, the National Labour Council is a tripartite organism whose responsibilities are giving advice on bills and draft regulations concerning labour and social security, assisting in the application of laws and regulations, identifying all the shortcomings in the field of labour laws and proposing amendments, among others. The Committee underlines the need to further promote collective bargaining and again requests the Government to take measures in this direction and to provide information on the National Labour Council's activities in the field of collective bargaining and on the number of collective agreements concluded, including the number of workers covered.

Saint Kitts and Nevis

Article 1 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in respect of employment. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government:

- to take the necessary legislative measures so as to ensure that workers are granted adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment, and throughout the course of employment (section 11 of the Protection of Employment Act only refers to protection against termination of employment on the grounds of union membership or participation in union activities); and
- to provide information on any development in relation to the Government's efforts to ensure that the sanctions provided for in the Protection of Employment Act (which only consist of a fine not exceeding 2,000 East Caribbean dollars (XCD) – equivalent to US$745) be reviewed so that they constitute a sufficient deterrent against all acts of anti-union discrimination.

Article 2. Adequate protection against acts of interference. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken towards the adoption of specific provisions that would expressly provide for rapid appeal procedures, coupled with effective and dissuasive sanctions, against acts of interference.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken towards the adoption of specific provisions to explicitly recognize in legislation, and to regulate the right to bargain collectively, in conformity with the principles of the Convention.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that it is in the process of formulating a Labour Code and that it received technical assistance in this process. The Government adds that the next steps will include multipartite consultations, the amalgamation of all existing labour legislation and the upgrading of all legislation that will include all recommendations made by the Committee. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report information on any developments in this regard and hopes that its comments on all the abovementioned matters will be taken into account. Moreover, the Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the Labour Code, once adopted.

Saint Lucia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1980)

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers to establish organizations of their own choosing. Minimum membership requirements. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to reduce the minimum founding membership requirement for trade unions and for employers' organizations, which was set at 30 and ten, respectively (section 14 of the Registration, Status and Recognition of Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Act, 1999). The Committee notes with satisfaction that, with the entry into force of the Labour Act 2006 (which repeals the Registration, Status and Recognition of Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Act, 1999), on 1 August 2012, the minimum founding membership for a trade union and for an employers' organization has been brought down to 20 and six respectively (section 335(3) of the Labour Act 2006).

Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and to join organizations. For several years, noting that the “protective services” – which include the fire services and prison officers – were excluded from the Registration, Status and Recognition of Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Act, 1999, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the right to organize to fire service personnel and prison staff. The Committee notes that section 325 of the Labour Act 2006 also excludes “protective services” (which according to section 2 of the Act include the fire service and the correctional services) from the scope of application of the provisions which are dealing with the right to organize in the new legislation. Noting that the Government indicates in its report that the issue of the right to organize fire service personnel and prison staff would be raised with the Minister of Labour, and recalling previous indications that the workers of these services benefit in practice from this right, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the manner in which service personnel and prison staff are assured the organizational rights provided in the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1980)

Articles 1, 2, 4 and 6 of the Convention. For several years, noting that the “protective services” – which include the fire services and correctional officers – were excluded from the Registration, Status and Recognition of Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Act, 1999, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures in order to grant fire service personnel and correctional staff the rights and guarantees provided for in the Convention. The Committee notes that the Labour Act 2006, which entered into force on 1 August 2012, repeals the Registration, Status and Recognition of Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Act, 1999. It further notes that section 355 of the Labour Act 2006 also excludes “protective services” (which according to section 2 of the Act include the fire service and the correctional services) from the scope of application of the provisions which are dealing with the right to bargain collectively in the new legislation. Noting that the Government indicates in its report that fire service personnel and prison staff benefit in practice from the right to collective bargaining, and that the issue would be raised with the Minister of Labour, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to expressly grant in the legislation the right to collective bargaining to fire service personnel and correctional staff.

Saint Vincent and the Grenadines

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2001)

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. The Committee had previously referred to the need to amend the following sections of the Trade Unions Act (TUA): section 11(3), so as to eliminate the discretionary authority of the registrar in respect of the registration of trade unions; and section 25, so as to limit the powers of the registrar to conduct investigations into the accounts of trade unions. The Committee recalls that, in its previous direct request, it had noted the Government's indication that the new Labour Bill which, as previously stated, would repeal the abovementioned sections of the TUA, was still awaiting Cabinet's approval.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that: (1) there have been some setbacks on the progress of the new Labour Relations Bill as a result of circumstances outside the control of the Department of Labour; (2) it has become necessary to review the draft Bill by way of consultations with the new leadership of the respective social partners; and (3) this process has commenced and it remains hopeful that the new Bill will be adopted in the near future.

The Committee hopes that the new Labour Relations Bill will be adopted in the near future and will address the abovementioned issues. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any progress made in this regard.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take measures to include in the legislation provisions which provide protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference by the employer or employers' organizations in workers' organizations (and vice versa) and which encourage collective bargaining in the private and public sectors (with the sole possible exception of public servants engaged in the administration of the State). The Committee had noted that a new Labour Relations Bill was awaiting Cabinet's approval and that this Bill includes provisions against trade union discrimination and interference by respective employers' and workers' organizations. In this regard, the Committee recalled that the provisions should not only include protection against trade union discrimination and interference by respective employers' and workers' organizations, but also by the employer or any person acting on behalf of that employer.

The Committee notes that the Government expresses its gratitude in its report to the ILO for providing technical comments on the Bill amending the Labour Relations Act, 2001. The Committee further notes that the Government indicates that: (1) copies of the ILO's memorandum of technical comments were submitted to the respective employers' and workers' organizations for their consideration and adoption; (2) the provisions of the revised Bill are expected to address the issues that are of concern to the ILO; and (3) it has initiated a series of consultations with the new leadership of the respective social partners.

The Committee hopes that the revised Labour Relations Bill will address the abovementioned issues and ensure full conformity with the Convention and requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any progress made in this regard.

Samoa

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2008)

Articles 1, 2 and 4 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that tripartite partners had drafted a new Labour and Employment Relations Bill (2010) to address all issues related to the Convention. The Committee also noted that the protection afforded was not complete in all points and requested the Government to ensure that the Bill includes:

- the prohibition of all acts of anti-union discrimination (in taking up employment, during employment, and at the time of termination of employment) as well as effective and expeditious procedures of redress and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions;
- the prohibition of all acts of interference by workers' and employers' organizations or each other's agents or members in their establishment, functioning or administration, including in particular acts which are designed to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination of employers or employers' organizations by financial or other means, with the object of placing such organizations under the control of employers or employers' organizations; and effective and expeditious procedures of redress and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions;
- the recognition of the right to collective bargaining of workers' and employers' organizations to all workers with the sole possible exception being the armed forces, the police and public servants engaged in the administration of the State; and
- the recognition of the principles of voluntary and free collective bargaining and the related prohibition of compulsory arbitration except in the public service (in respect of public servants engaged in the administration of the State) and in essential services in the strict sense of the term, that is services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population.

The Committee notes that the Government states in its report that the Office has provided technical inputs in relation to the Bill on Labour and Employment Relations. The Committee also notes that, according to the Government, the Bill now contains some provisions concerning protection against anti-union discrimination, good faith in collective bargaining, recognition of representative organizations and provisions on collective agreements including in relation to wages and condition of employment, relations between the parties and that other issues raised by the Committee may be addressed by regulations after the adoption of the Bill. The Committee hopes that the Bill will soon be adopted and will take into account its pending comments. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the legislation once adopted.

Sao Tome and Principe

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that it has been commenting for a number of years on the need for the Government to take steps to amend the provisions of Act No. 4/92, which refer to the following issues:

- the majority required for calling a strike is too high (section 4 of Act No. 4/92);
- with regard to minimum services, it is important, in the event of disagreement in determining such services, that the matter be settled by an independent body and not by the employer (section 10(4) of Act No. 4/92);

- the hiring of workers without consultation with the trade unions concerned to perform services essential to maintain the economic and financial viability of the enterprise should it be seriously threatened by a strike (section 9 of Act No. 4/92); and
- compulsory arbitration for services which are not essential in the strict sense (services whose interruption might endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population) (postal, banking and loan services; section 11 of Act No. 4/92).

The Committee asks the Government to take steps to amend the abovementioned legislative provisions so as to bring the legislation into line with the Convention and to indicate, in its next report, any measures adopted in this respect. The Committee also asks the Government to indicate whether federations and confederations are able to exercise the right to strike.

Finally, noting that Law No. 4-2002 of 30 December 2002, allows requisition of workers in cases of strikes in non-essential services, the Committee requests the Government to take measures to modify the legislation so as to guarantee that the requisition of workers is only possible in the essential services in the strict sense of the terms.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. In its previous comment the Committee asked the Government to indicate what sanctions may be imposed against acts of discrimination that undermine freedom of association and acts of interference by employers and their organizations in workers' organizations and vice versa. The Committee noted the Government's indication that there is no legislation that lays down penalties for acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee therefore requests the Government once again to take the necessary steps to adopt appropriate legislation which imposes sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference committed by employers against trade union organizations, in conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether specific legal protection exists for trade union members should they be subjected to acts of anti-union discrimination on the basis of their participation in legitimate trade union activities.

Article 4. The Committee notes the Government's statement concerning the adoption of a new Constitution, a copy of which will be sent to the Office. The Committee observes that the right to collective bargaining is recognized in Act No. 5/92 of 28 May 1992 concerning trade unions but is not itself governed by legislation. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that collective bargaining does not apply to the public service. The Committee notes the Government's indication in various reports on the bill concerning the legal framework of collective bargaining that this bill has still not been adopted. In these circumstances, the Committee reiterates the importance of the bill being adopted as soon as possible and of the right to collective negotiation of their conditions of work and employment being secured to all workers in the public and private sectors, including public servants. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the progress of the legislative procedures relating to the adoption of the bill and to take all possible steps to ensure its adoption in the very near future, in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers.

Application in practice. Finally, the Committee notes the Government's statement that no collective agreements currently exist in the country owing to geographical factors. The Committee requests the Government to avail itself of technical assistance from the ILO to resolve this major issue.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Labour Directorate of the Ministry of Labour might act as an intermediary between the parties to collective bargaining, including in order to ensure the effectiveness of the agreement. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the role of the Labour Directorate in the collective bargaining process.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Senegal

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

Workers' organizations comments. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), the National Confederation of Workers of Senegal (CNTS) and the Free Workers' Union of Senegal (UTLS) referring to the intervention by the security forces during duly authorized protest marches and discriminatory practices in the recognition of unions. The ITUC also denounced the dismissals and suspensions of strikers. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the dismissals and suspensions took place in the context of an illegal strike; the only constraints to freedom to demonstrate in the National Constitution that would justify calling in the security forces are situations in which they would have to intervene to ensure the respect of honour, the consideration of others or public order; and, finally, that the procedure for the recognition of a trade union is contingent upon the state of the file submitted and economic and fortuitous conditions, rather than constituting an act of discrimination. The Committee recalls that the right to organize union meetings is an essential element of the trade union rights of employers' and workers' organizations and that the authorities should refrain from any interference which would restrict this right or impede its legal exercise, unless the exercise of this right endangers public order in a serious and imminent manner. The Committee also recalls that workers and employers should have the right to establish the organizations that they consider appropriate in a climate of security, and any delay caused by the authorities in registering these organizations would constitute a denial of their rights and a violation of the Convention. The Committee trusts that the Government will ensure the full respect of these principles in the future.

Furthermore, the Committee notes the comments dated 31 July 2012 from the ITUC referring to the violent police repression of a general assembly of the National Postal and Telecommunications Workers Union (SNTPTS), held in front of the General Directorate in Dakar. The Committee requests the Government to submit its comments in reply to the allegations made by ITUC.

Bringing legislation into conformity with the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that following a study on the compliance of the national legislation with the ILO fundamental Conventions, carried out with the assistance of the Office, measures had been taken to amend the legislation, particularly the Labour Code, with a view to ensuring full compliance with the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government's latest report reiterates its commitment to amend its legislation on a number of points. Given the time that has elapsed, the Committee notes with regret that no specific measure has yet been taken in this respect and urges the Government to embark upon the necessary consultations without delay with a view to taking measures allowing it to fulfil its commitment. The Committee trusts that the Government's next report will provide information on the specific measures taken to amend its legislation taking into account the following points.

- Article 2 of the Convention. Trade union rights of minors. The need to guarantee the right to organize of minors who have reached the statutory minimum age of employment (persons of 15 years of age, according to section L.145 of the Labour Code), and who have access to the labour market both as workers and as apprentices, without parental authorization being necessary.
- Articles 2, 5 and 6. Right of workers to establish organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. There is a need to repeal Act No. 76-28 of 6 April 1976 and to amend section L.8 of the Labour Code (as amended in 1997) so as to guarantee to workers and their organizations the right to establish organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization from the Ministry of the Interior. The Committee notes that the Government justifies these provisions once again by maintaining that it is the State's role to guarantee the security of its citizens by checking the morality and aptitude of candidates for the posts of trade union officials. The Government also refers to the possibility of lodging an appeal to the Supreme Court. The Committee recalls once again that the provisions of Act No. 76-28 of 6 April 1976, as taken up by section L.8 of the Labour Code, infringe Articles 2, 5 and 6 of the Convention by granting the Minister of the Interior a discretionary power to issue a document conferring recognition of the existence of a trade union.
- Article 3. The right of trade union organizations to exercise their activities in full freedom and to formulate their programmes. The need to take without delay the necessary measures to adopt the Decree implementing section L.276 of the Labour Code in order to establish a list of jobs only authorizing the requisitioning of workers in the event of a strike to ensure the operation of essential services in the strict sense of the term.
- The need to include a provision ensuring that the restrictions set forth in section L.276 of the Labour Code concerning the occupation of workplaces or their immediate surroundings shall only apply when strikes cease to be peaceful or when respect for the freedom to work of non-strikers and the right of the management to enter the premises of the enterprise are hindered.
- Article 4. Dissolution by administrative authority. The need to clearly specify that the dissolution of seditious associations, as envisaged by Act No. 65-40, may in no event be applied to occupational trade union organizations.

The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures in this respect within the context of its legislative reform.

Serbia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2000)

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 100th Session, June 2011)

The Committee notes the comments received up to 31 July 2012 by the following workers' organizations on matters already raised: (1) the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) (31 July 2012 and 4 August 2011); (2) the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions of Serbia (CATUS) (15 and 27 September 2011); and (3) the Trade Union Confederation (TUC) "Nezavisnost" (15 September 2011). The Committee also notes the observations provided by the Government on 17 January and 20 November 2012 and 9 November and 28 October 2011, in reply to the comments provided by the CATUS dated 27 September 2011 and by the ITUC in its communications of 24 August 2010, 4 August 2011 and 31 July 2012. The Committee further notes the comments received after 31 August 2012 from the following workers' and employers' organizations: (1) the Confederation of Free Trade Unions (30 October 2012); (2) the TUC

“Nezavisnost” (5 September 2012); (3) the CATUS (5 September 2012); and (4) the Union of Employers of Serbia (5 September 2012). It requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee also notes the debate which took place within the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2011. It notes, in particular, that, in its conclusions, the Conference Committee urged the Government to ask for the technical assistance of the ILO with a view to bringing the legislation and practice into full conformity with the Convention. The Committee welcomes that, in its report, the Government requests ILO technical assistance. It hopes that the Office will be able to provide such technical assistance in the near future.

Civil liberties. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide its observations on the comments made by the ITUC and the CATUS concerning alleged physical assaults against union officials and members, especially in the educational and health care sectors. The Committee notes that the Government indicated to the Conference Committee that it was not aware of such attacks nor had they been reported to the labour inspectorate, and that once provided with the relevant information it would take the necessary steps to resolve the issue in accordance with the Convention. The Committee also notes that, in its conclusions, the Conference Committee requested the Government to undertake without delay independent investigations into the allegations and report accordingly. The Committee notes with concern the recent ITUC allegation of an attempted physical attack during a strike organized by the Independent Trade Union of Police. The Committee recalls that the rights of workers’ and employers’ organizations can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to institute an independent inquiry into all alleged acts of violence against trade union officials or members, and to ensure the respect of the abovementioned principles.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of employers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. The Committee recalls that for a number of years, it has been commenting upon the need to amend section 216 of the Labour Act, which provides that employers’ associations may be established by employers that employ no less than 5 per cent of the total number of employees in a certain branch, group, subgroup, line of business or territory of a certain territorial unit, in order to establish a reasonable minimum membership requirement. In its previous observation, the Committee had noted the Government’s indication that the Committee’s comments on section 216 will be taken into consideration in the course of the amendment of the Labour Act to be completed by the end of 2010. The Committee notes that in 2011, the Government indicated to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards that the draft amendment to the Labour Act was currently in preparation, but that the adoption of the revised Labour Act was now expected to take place after the parliamentary elections envisaged in 2012. The Committee also notes that, in its conclusions, the Conference Committee considered that the Government should accelerate the long-awaited amendment of section 216 of the Labour Act, especially the repeal of the 5 per cent threshold. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government indicates that all legislative actions have been deferred until the completion of the process of forming a new Government and Parliament. It also notes the indication of the Union of Employers of Serbia that new provisions with regard to establishing employers’ organizations and obtaining and proving their representativeness had been a matter of short-term consultation until the 2011 International Labour Conference and then fell into oblivion. The Committee further notes that according to indications to the Conference Committee and written communications of several employers’ and workers’ organizations, concerns persist about the full participation of the social partners in the announced legislative review. The Committee trusts that, in the process of revising the relevant legislation, which should be conducted in full consultation with the most representative workers’ and employers’ organizations, due account will be taken of the need to amend section 216 of the Labour Act so as to retain a reasonable minimum membership requirement that does not hinder the establishment of employers’ organizations. The Committee hopes that the legislative review process will be completed in the near future and requests the Government to provide a copy of the amendments to the Labour Act as soon as adopted.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the comments made by the Government in reply to the observations made by the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions of Serbia (CATUS), dated 26 August 2011, and by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 24 August 2010. The Committee also notes the comments made by ITUC dated 4 August 2011 and 31 July 2012 and observations submitted by the Trade Union Confederation Nezavisnost (TUC Nezavisnost) on the application of the Convention in practice, with particular regard to anti-union dismissals and limited social dialogue. It takes note of the Government’s reply of 20 November 2012 to the 2011 and 2012 ITUC comments, especially the information provided concerning inspection visits carried out by labour inspectors in the relevant companies and the measures of redress taken as a result. The Committee further notes the comments of the Union of Employers of Serbia dated 5 September 2012 and the comments of the Confederation of Free Trade Unions received on 30 October 2012. The Committee requests the Government to reply in its next report to all pending comments.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination in practice. On several occasions, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice, including statistical data on the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination brought before the competent authorities (labour inspectorate and judicial bodies), as well as on the outcome of investigations and judicial proceedings and their average duration. The Committee urges the Government to provide the abovementioned information.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee had raised the need to amend section 233 of the Labour Law which imposes a time period of three years before an organization which previously failed to obtain recognition as most representative, may seek a new decision on the issue of representativeness. The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 233 of the Labour Law so that the three-year time span is reduced to a more reasonable period or explicitly allows the procedure for determination of the most representative status to take place in advance of the expiration of the applicable collective agreement. The Committee notes that, according to the Government's reply received on 29 October 2012, the legislation establishes that every trade union or employers' association whose representativeness had not been established may at any moment, when it has fulfilled requirements for representativeness, apply for establishment of representativeness. Furthermore, the Committee notes that the Government indicates that the legislation allows the review of collective agreements under certain circumstances, when the representativeness of a non-signatory trade union or employers' association of the agreement is established. The Committee recalls that this issue was raised by ITUC some years ago and invites it to send its comments with regard to the Government's statement.

Representativeness of workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that the conditions and mechanism for the establishment of the representativeness of trade unions and employers' organizations: (a) are decided by the Minister of Labour upon a proposal by a specific tripartite committee; and (b) will be subject to amendments in the process of the current revision of the Labour Law, in consultation with the social partners. In this regard, the Committee also takes note of the comment of the Union of Employers of Serbia, which indicates that, despite the existing Panel for Establishment of Representativeness of Trade Unions and Employers Associations (tripartite body), the Minister for Labour and Social Policy established the so-called "Independent Committee" for assessing the requirements for representativeness, which is not independent at all and interferes in social dialogue and collective bargaining; and that on the basis of one recommendation of this "Independent Committee", the Ministry of Labour and Social Policy established, on 3 May 2012, the representativeness of the Confederation of Free Trade Unions, a matter which had been previously examined by the abovementioned panel which had requested additional supportive documents. In this regard, the Committee notes from the Government's reply to the ITUC communications that: (i) due to its method of decision-making (consensus), the panel was not operational and is currently not able to examine all pending applications nor to adopt new rules of procedure; (ii) the Ministry attempted to find a way out of this situation by establishing an independent committee; (iii) in view of the huge discontent of the panel members, the Ministry dismissed this method of determining representativeness; and (iv) the Ministry is aware that the current issue may be addressed by the adoption of the amendments to the Labour Law or of a separate law. The Committee notes this information and requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any developments relating to the process of revision of the Labour Law as well as a copy of the amended Labour Law once adopted.

Percentage required for collective bargaining. Moreover, the Committee had noted that section 222 of the Labour Law required employers' associations to represent 10 per cent of the total number of employers and employ 15 per cent of the total number of employees in order to exercise collective bargaining rights. The Committee had noted that, according to the Government, this issue would be reconsidered in the framework of the revision of the Labour Law, with the participation of the representative workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee recalls that, in its previous observation, it had requested the Government to lift the 10 per cent requirement for employers' organizations to be entitled to engage in collective bargaining, which is particularly high, especially in the context of negotiations in large enterprises, at the sectoral or national level. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, when employers' or workers' organizations do not fulfil the representativeness requirements, they can conclude an association agreement with another organization in order to fulfil the abovementioned requirement. The Committee notes that, according to the comments of the Confederation of Free Trade Unions received on 30 October 2012, an agreement on association to achieve representativeness may only be signed by two or more unrepresentative trade unions at company level in order to be able to be party in collective bargaining; nevertheless, this is not possible for trade unions and employers associations at higher levels. The Committee considers that the abovementioned percentages are very high and thus difficult to reach. The Committee had taken note of the fact that the amendments to the Labour Law that were under way also addressed the representativeness of trade unions and employers' organizations. The Committee requests the Government once again to take the necessary measures so as to lower the abovementioned percentages.

The Committee notes the fact that, according to the Government's report dated 31 August 2012, elections were held in May 2012 and that all the legislative activities were deferred until the formation of the new Government and Parliament. The Committee expresses its hope that the Government will take the necessary measures without delay in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the requirements of the Convention and requests the Government to indicate the progress made in this respect in its next report.

Seychelles

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee recalls that for several years it has been commenting upon several provisions of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA) concerning the issues of trade union registration and the exercise of the right to strike. The Committee notes that in its report, the Government informs that the review of the IRA remains important and reiterates its desire to receive technical assistance from the Office in this regard. The Government informs in this regard that an ILO mission is planned to take place in 2013 together with national training on various dispute resolution systems for relevant stakeholders. The Government reiterates that once a tripartite committee responsible to make proposals towards the review of the IRA is set up, the Committee's observations will be brought to its attention for further action. The Government explains that the review has been delayed due to the difficulty faced by the Ministry of Labour and Human Resource Development in terms of limited human resources capacity of the division responsible to review the legislation. The Government indicates, however, that notwithstanding the above, as part of the Government's effort to comply with its international obligations, a national tripartite workshop on international labour standards and reporting was organized by the Government in collaboration with the ILO in August 2012. The aim of the workshop was to sensitize key ministries on the terms and provisions of the ratified ILO Conventions and to identify focal points in the relevant departments to ensure sustainability of reporting. The Committee trusts that the review of the IRA will begin without further delay, in consultation with the social partners and with ILO technical assistance, and that the following sections of this legislation will be amended taking into account the Committee's previous comments:

- section 9(1)(b) and (f), which confers to the registrar discretionary power to refuse registration;
- section 52(1)(a)(iv), which provides that a strike has to be approved by two-thirds of union members present and voting at the meeting called for the purpose of considering the issue;
- section 52(4), which allows the minister to declare a strike to be unlawful if he or she is of the opinion that its continuance would endanger, amongst other things, "public order or the national economy";
- section 52(1)(b), which provides for a cooling-off period of 60 days before a strike may begin; and
- section 56(1), which imposes penalties of up to six months of imprisonment for organizing or participating in a strike declared unlawful on the basis of the IRA provisions.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report all progress made in this respect.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1999)

Articles 2, 3, 4 and 6 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that for several years it has been commenting upon several provisions of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA) concerning insufficient protection against acts of interference and restrictions on the right to bargain collectively. The Committee notes that in its report, the Government informs that the review of the IRA remains important and reiterates its desire to receive technical assistance from the Office in this respect. The Government informs in this regard that an ILO mission is planned to take place in 2013 together with national training on various dispute resolution systems for relevant stakeholders. The Government reiterates that once a tripartite committee responsible to make proposals towards the review of the IRA is set up, the Committee's observations will be brought to its attention for further action. It explains that the review of the IRA in tandem with the review of the Employment Act has been delayed due to the difficulty faced by the Ministry of Labour and Human Resource Development in terms of limited human resources capacity. The Committee trusts that the legislative review will begin without further delay, in consultations with the social partners and the ILO technical assistance, taking into account the Committee's previous comments in which it had requested the Government to take the necessary measures in order to:

- adopt legislative provisions providing for protection against acts of interference by employers or their organizations into workers' organizations, in particular, acts which are designed to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination or control by employers or employers' organizations, coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions;
- amend its legislation so as to ensure that recourse to compulsory arbitration in cases where the parties do not reach an agreement through collective bargaining is permissible only in the context of essential services, in the strict sense of the term, and for civil servants engaged in the administration of the State; and
- ensure that prison staff, excluded from the scope of the IRA, are granted the right to bargain collectively.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate any progress made in this respect.

Sierra Leone

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Need to adopt specific provisions accompanied by sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions for the protection of workers and workers' organizations against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference. The Committee had previously noted that the revision of the labour laws, prepared with ILO technical assistance, had already been submitted to tripartite meetings, that the comments of the tripartite body had been received and that the document had just been forwarded to the Law Officers' Department. The Committee had asked the Government to keep it informed of any further progress made in the preparation of the final draft document and to provide a copy of the revised legislation as soon as it had been adopted. Noting that, according to the information previously sent by the Government, the revision of the labour laws was submitted to the Law Officers' Department in 1995, the Committee requests the Government once again to make every effort to take the necessary action for the adoption of the new legislation in the very near future and to indicate the progress made in this regard.

Article 4. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the collective agreements in force in the education sector and in other sectors.

The Committee notes that, since 1992 when a draft Industrial Relations Act was under discussion, the Government only provided a report in 2004. The Committee therefore requests the Government to furnish a detailed report on the application of the Convention, accompanied by copies of any legal texts concerning freedom of association adopted since 1992.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Slovenia

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1992)

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against acts of interference. In its previous comments, the Committee had concluded that the protection against acts of interference afforded by sections 42 (right to associate) and 76 (free establishment, and functioning of, and membership in trade unions) of the Constitution, as well as section 6 of the Representativeness of Workers' Unions Act (providing that independence from employers is one of the characteristics of a representative trade union), was not sufficient and that sufficiently dissuasive sanctions were necessary. The Committee had noted the Government's indication that concrete sanctions for employers or their associations in case of interference in the activities of trade unions were currently not provided for by law and that legislative amendments had not yet been adopted in this regard. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report, that no legislative amendments in this field are foreseen at present, that the relevant rights provided for in the Constitution are subject to judicial protection and that no practical problems have been detected in this area. The Committee considers that the Convention requires the existence of clear and precise legislative provisions ensuring adequate protection of workers' organizations from acts of interference as defined in Article 2(2) of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that national legislation contains specific provisions prohibiting acts of interference by employers or their organizations in the establishment, functioning and administration of workers' organizations, and establishing effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against such acts. It once again requests the Government to indicate any progress made in this respect.

South Africa

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1996)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in communications dated 4 August 2011 and 31 July 2012, alleging in particular, in different sectors, several instances of acts of violence, leading to injuries and death, arrests of striking workers as well as the dismissal of strikers (communication, pharmaceutical, retail chain, poultry, public and municipal sectors). The Committee recalls that it considers that in the event of assaults on the physical or moral integrity of individuals, an independent judicial inquiry should be instituted immediately with a view to fully clarifying the facts, determining responsibility, punishing those responsible and preventing the repetition of such acts. Furthermore, the Committee recalls that the arrest, even if only briefly, of trade union leaders and trade unionists, and of the leaders of employers' organizations, for exercising legitimate activities in relation with their right of association constitutes a violation of the principles of freedom of association. The Committee also notes from the ITUC's communication the difficulties faced by casual workers to join a trade union. While taking due note of the Government's report on the implementation of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to provide its observations to the ITUC's serious comments, as well as the ITUC's 2008 and 2010 comments. Finally, the Committee notes from the ITUC's communication that a Labour Relations Amendment Bill has been finalized in 2012 and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Spain

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), the General Union of Workers (UGT) and the Trade Union Confederation of Workers' Committees (CC.OO.), referring to a 5 per cent wage cut in the public service pursuant to Royal Legislative Decree No. 8/2010 of 20 May on the adoption of special measures to reduce the public deficit, and to restrictions on collective bargaining under Act No. 3/2012 of 6 June on urgent measures for labour market reform.

The Committee observes that the Government's report has been received but points out that these matters have already been referred by the UGT and the CC.OO. to the Committee on Freedom of Association (Cases Nos 2918 and 2947), and are therefore under consideration by that committee.

Sri Lanka

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1995)

The Committee notes the comments made by the Employers' Federation of Ceylon (EFC) and the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) in a communication dated 18 August 2011.

The Committee also notes the Government's response to the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 4 August 2011. The Committee further notes the comments submitted by the Lanka Jathika Estate Workers' Union (LJEWU) dated 6 June 2012, and by the ITUC dated 31 July 2012, which relate to a number of matters already raised by the Committee, as well as violations of the Convention, in particular serious allegations relating to acts of intimidation against trade union activists and leaders, arrests and detention of workers following a strike, as well as police violence during workers' demonstrations, including in one case recourse to firing that led to the death of a worker and hundreds injured. Recalling that a truly free and independent trade union movement can only develop in a climate free from violence, pressure and threats of any kind against the leaders and members of workers' organizations, the Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the abovementioned allegations, and to take the necessary measures to ensure that the use of excessive violence in trying to control demonstrations is prohibited, that arrests are made only where serious violence or other criminal acts have been committed, and that the police are called in a strike situation only where there is a genuine and imminent threat to public order.

The Committee further notes that the Government indicates in its report that a special meeting of the National Labour Advisory Council took place on 1 February 2011 to discuss the implementation of the National Workers' Charter of 1995 (the national labour policy of Sri Lanka) and reflect on how laws and practice should be developed, in particular in relation to freedom of association issues. The Government adds in its report that this meeting aimed at reaching consensus among the social partners to effectively address the issues related to the implementation of the Convention, as well as the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135). Taking note of the summary of the proceedings of this meeting which the Government attaches to its report and of the indication that a tripartite subcommittee was formed for further discussions, the Committee expresses the hope that this process will bring positive results, including progress towards the amendment of the labour legislation, and that the comments made by the Committee for a number of years will be fully taken into account in this regard. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in its next report.

Article 2 of the Convention. Minimum age. In its previous observation, noting that the minimum age for admission to employment was 14 years and that the minimum age for trade union membership was 16 years (section 31 of the Trade Unions Ordinance), the Committee recalled that the minimum age for trade union membership should be the same as the minimum age for admission to employment. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that it is seeking to increase the minimum age for employment to 16 years. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any developments in this regard.

Articles 2 and 5. Public servants. Previously, the Committee had underlined the need to amend section 21 of the Trade Unions Ordinance in order to ensure that organizations of government staff officers may join confederations of their own choosing, including those which also group together organizations of workers from the private sector, and that first-level organizations of public employees may cover more than one ministry or department in the public service. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that action will be initiated to negotiate with the ministry concerned to reach a consensus on this issue. The Committee reiterates its hope that amendments to section 21 of the Trade Unions Ordinance will be adopted in the near future, in order to ensure that trade unions in the public sector may join confederations of their own choosing, and that first-level organizations of public employees may cover more than one ministry or department in the public service, and requests the Government to indicate the progress made in this respect in its next report.

Article 3. Dispute settlement machinery in the public sector. In its previous observation, the Committee noted that the Industrial Disputes Act – which provides for conciliation, arbitration, industrial court and labour tribunal procedures – did not apply to the public service (section 49 of the Industrial Disputes Act), that a mechanism for dispute prevention and settlement in the public sector was being developed with technical assistance from the ILO, and that a document concerning the dispute settlement mechanism had been adopted. Noting the absence of any new information in this regard in the Government's latest report, the Committee expresses the hope that progress will be made in the near future towards the establishment of a mechanism for dispute prevention and settlement in the public sector, which would fully respect the principles recalled in the Committee's previous observations. It requests the Government to provide information in this regard in its next report.

Compulsory arbitration. In its previous observation, the Committee noted that, under section 4(1) of the Industrial Disputes Act, the Minister may, if he or she is of the opinion that an industrial dispute is a minor dispute, refer it, by an order in writing, for settlement by arbitration, to an arbitrator appointed by the Minister or to a labour tribunal, notwithstanding that the parties to such dispute or their representatives do not consent to such reference, and, under section 4(2), the Minister may, by an order in writing, refer any industrial dispute to an industrial court for settlement. The Committee notes that the Government once again reiterates in its report that sections 4(1) and 4(2) were intended to provide safeguards against strikes that are likely to seriously affect the national economy, and that in practice, however, arbitration was seldom imposed without the consent of the trade union. The Committee is bound to reiterate its request to the Government to amend sections 4(1) and 4(2) of the Industrial Disputes Act, so as to ensure that recourse to compulsory arbitration to bring an end to a collective labour dispute and a strike is only possible: (i) when the two parties to the dispute so agree; or (ii) when the strike in question may be restricted, or even prohibited, that is: (a) in the case of disputes concerning public servants exercising authority in the name of the State; (b) in conflicts in essential services in the strict sense of the term; or (c) in situations of acute national or local crisis, but only for a limited period of time and to the extent necessary to meet the requirements of the situation. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this regard in its next report.

Article 4. Dissolution of organizations. In its previous observation, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that in all cases where an administrative decision of dissolution of a trade union is appealed to the courts (in accordance with sections 16 and 17 of the Trade Unions Ordinance), the administrative decision will not take effect until the final decision is handed down. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates its previous comments on the procedure for the withdrawal or cancellation of the registration of a trade union, including the appeal procedures against the decisions of the registrar, but does not confirm that the decision of the registrar will not take effect until the final decision of the appeal procedure is handed down. The Committee is therefore bound to reiterate its request to the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that administrative decisions of dissolution are suspended pending their appeal in court, and to indicate any progress in this respect in its next report.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee notes the Government's response to the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 4 August 2011. The Committee further notes the comments submitted by the Lanka Jathika Estate Workers' Union (LJEWU) dated 6 June 2012, and by the ITUC dated 31 July 2012, which relate to matters already raised by the Committee, as well as allegations of infringements of the Convention, in particular numerous allegations of acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these comments.

The Committee also notes the comments made by the Employers' Federation of Ceylon (EFC) and the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) in a communication dated 18 August 2011, stating in particular that the Industrial Dispute Act provides for mandatory collective bargaining, which they consider is contrary to the essence of the Convention, and that this piece of legislation is discriminatory in that it only sets out unfair labour practices on the part of the employers and not on the part of the workers or their organizations. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these comments.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that a special meeting of the National Labour Advisory Council took place on 1 February 2011 to discuss the implementation of the National Workers' Charter of 1995 (the national labour policy of Sri Lanka) and reflect on how laws and practice should be developed, in particular in relation to freedom of association and collective bargaining issues. The Government adds in its report that this meeting aimed at reaching consensus among the social partners to effectively address the issues related to the implementation of the Convention, as well as the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135). Taking note of the summary of the proceedings of this meeting which the Government attaches to its report and of the indication that a tripartite subcommittee was formed for further discussions, the Committee expresses the hope that this tripartite process will bring positive results, including progress towards the amendment of the labour legislation, and that the comments made by the Committee for a number of years will be fully taken into account in this regard. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that legislation prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination is coupled with effective and expeditious procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions to ensure their application.

- Sufficiently dissuasive sanctions. The Committee notes with interest that the Government indicates in its report that Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act No. 39 of 2011 has increased the amount of the fine provided for in cases of anti-union discrimination from 20,000 (approximately US$367) to 100,000 rupees (approximately US$1,835).
- Effective and expeditious procedures. Noting that in practice only the Department of Labour can bring cases concerning anti-union discrimination before the Magistrate's Court and that there are no mandatory time limits within which complaints should be made to the Court, the Committee had previously requested the Government to indicate whether trade unions had the capacity to bring their grievances directly before the courts, and to take measures in consultation with the social partners to guarantee that short time periods for the examination of the anti-union discrimination cases by the authorities would be established. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that: (i) the opportunity of granting trade unions the right to bring anti-union discrimination claims directly before the courts has been discussed on a tripartite basis on a number of occasions and that no consensus was reached on this matter; (ii) a circular dated 29 April 2011 was addressed by the Commissioner General of Labour to all officers of the Department of Labour, providing guidelines on the procedure to be respected when receiving a complaint of unfair labour practice, including deadlines, and, in particular, that complaints should be enquired within 14 days upon receipt; and (iii) delays in dealing with the complaints were due to time consumed in the collection of the necessary evidence for a case to be filed with the court. Stressing once again that the existence of legal provisions prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination is not enough if they are not accompanied by effective and rapid procedures to ensure their application in practice, and observing that, according to the ITUC's comments, numerous acts of anti-union discrimination occur in practice, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the effectiveness and expeditiousness of the procedures detailed in the new guidelines, and to provide information on the number of cases of anti-union discrimination examined by the courts and the results thereof. The Committee further requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that workers who are victim of anti-union discrimination can lodge a complaint before the judicial courts. The Committee also invites the Government to continue to discuss, on a tripartite basis, the possibility of granting trade unions the right to bring anti-union discrimination cases directly before the courts.

Article 4. Measures to promote collective bargaining. In its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the measures taken by the Social Dialogue and Workplace Cooperation Unit (SDWC), as well as the measures taken under the auspices of the National Policy for Decent Work, to promote collective bargaining. The Committee notes with regret that the Government does not provide information on this matter in its report. The Committee is therefore bound to reiterate its request that the Government provide information on progress achieved to promote collective bargaining, including on the result of the measures taken by the SDWC and those taken in furtherance of the National Policy for Decent Work.

Export processing zones (EPZs). In its previous observation, as regards the need to promote collective bargaining within the EPZ sector, the Committee noted the information provided by the Government according to which 40 per cent of EPZ enterprises have employees' councils that have bargaining rights, and that some of them were in the process of concluding collective agreements. The Committee also noted that, according to the ITUC, employees' councils were bodies funded by the employer without workers' contributions – thus giving them an advantage over trade unions which require membership dues – and that employees' councils were promoted by the Board of Investment as a substitute for trade unions in EPZs. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that Trade Unions' Facilitation Centres have been established in three EPZs, with a view to facilitating private meetings between workers and their representatives. The Government further indicates that the Board of Investment is vigilant that the formation or functioning of employees' councils does not undermine the formation or functioning of trade unions. The Government adds that complaints in this regard can be submitted to the Commissioner General of Labour, to the National Labour Advisory Council and to the Board of Investment. Given the apparent difficulties with regard to the exercise of workers' rights to organize and collective bargaining in EPZs, the Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on specific measures taken to address these difficulties. The Committee also requests the Government to ensure that employees' councils do not undermine the position of trade unions, in particular in relation to their right to collective bargaining, and to indicate any developments in this regard in its next report.

Representativeness requirements for collective bargaining. In its previous observation, the Committee had noted that, under section 32A(g) of the Industrial Disputes Act, no employer shall refuse to bargain with a trade union which has in its membership not less than 40 per cent of the workmen on whose behalf the trade union seeks to bargain. It subsequently requested the Government to ensure that if no trade union covers more than 40 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in this unit, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee notes that, in their comments, the IOE and the EFC express the view that it is important that the bargaining agent on behalf of the workers has sufficient representative strength to bargain with the employer and indicate that all major trade unions of the country have no problem in keeping the 40 per cent threshold. The Committee notes, however, that the LJEWU states that due to the multiplicity of trade unions in the country it is extremely rare that the 40 per cent threshold is met. The Committee also notes that the Government indicates that there is no restriction for small trade unions to negotiate or intervene in matters relating to their members, and that there is no consensus amongst the trade unions on this issue. The Committee therefore requests the Government to continue to discuss, on a tripartite basis, the need to ensure in the legislation that, if no trade union covers more than 40 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in this unit, at least on behalf of their own members, and to indicate the progress made in this regard in its next report.

Article 6. The right to collective bargaining in the public service. In its previous observation, the Committee noted that, as of 31 December 2008, there were 1,933 registered trade unions out of which 1,130 were public officers' unions representing 1.2 million public employees. The Committee also noted that the procedures regarding the right to collective bargaining of public sector workers do not provide for genuine collective bargaining, but rather establish a consultative mechanism – with perhaps some elements of arbitration – under which the demands of public service trade unions are considered, while the final decision on salary determination rests with the Cabinet of Ministers. The Committee notes with regret that the Government does not provide information on this matter in its report. The Committee is therefore bound to reiterate its request that the Government take the necessary measures to recognize and promote civil servants' right to collective bargaining, as long as they are not engaged in the administration of the State, and to indicate any developments in this regard in its next report.

Finally, as regards the establishment of a mechanism for dispute prevention and settlement in the public sector, the Committee refers to its comments made in its observation under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Sudan

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes that the Government's report does not reply to the issues at stake but requests ILO technical assistance. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), referring to the issues the Committee has been raising for a number of years and in particular, trade union monopoly controlled by the Government, denial of trade union rights in the export processing zones (EPZs) and nearly non-existent collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to provide its observation on similar 2008 ITUC comments. The Committee notes the Government's reply denying the ITUC allegations, which it considers general, unfounded and mostly political. It also notes the observations of the Sudanese Businessmen and Employers Federation (SBEF) and the Sudan Workers Trade Unions Federation (SWTUF). According to the SBEF, Sudanese society is characterized by an active involvement of trade union organizations, which enjoy full freedom in carrying out their activities and participate in tripartite activities, as partners of tripartite social dialogue. Finally, the SBEF indicates that it collaborates with workers and enjoys the right to bilateral negotiations to determine the conditions of work and service in conformity with the legislative provisions in force. The SWTUF concurs with the SBEF. It denies the ITUC comments and stresses the independence of the Sudanese trade union movement, the efficiency of its bodies and its democratic structure. The Committee notes that a new Trade Union Act had been adopted on 28 January 2010. The Committee requests the Government to send this legislation and to indicate if it maintains trade union monopoly.

Violence against trade unionists and repression of trade union rights. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed its deep concern over the allegations of harassment, intimidation, arbitrary arrest, detention and torture made by the ITUC. The Committee had urged the Government to take the necessary measures to guarantee the personal safety of trade unionists and ensure respect for the rights enshrined in the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government points out that these issues are of a political nature and are not related to the Convention. In this respect, the Committee recalls the Resolution of 1970 concerning trade union rights and their relation to civil liberties which recognizes that "the rights conferred upon workers' and employers' organizations must be based on respect for those civil liberties which have been enunciated in particular in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and that the absence of these civil liberties removes all meaning from the concept of trade union rights". The Resolution refers, in particular, to the right to freedom and security of person and freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention. The Committee notes with concern the most recent allegations of the ITUC on brutal and fatal repression of workers in the oil sector, who demanded improved working conditions, by security forces. The Committee notes that the Government states that no arrests of workers have occurred at the company in question. The Committee points out that, according to the ITUC, two workers were shot and injured. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the ITUC allegations. It urges the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to guarantee the personal safety of trade unionists and ensure respect for the rights enshrined in the Convention. Recalling that trade union rights can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence and intimidation, the Committee requests the Government to ensure observance of civil liberties and human rights.

Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that it had observed that section 112 of the 1997 Labour Code allowed referral of a collective dispute or a collective labour dispute to compulsory arbitration and had requested the Government to take measures to amend the legislation so that arbitration may only be compulsory with the agreement of both parties, or in the case of essential services. The Committee notes that the ITUC comments also refer to this issue. In this respect, the Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that a new Labour Code was being prepared (the Committee understands that the reference was made to the draft Labour Code for Northern Sudan) and requested the Government to keep it informed of the progress made in this respect. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the law currently in force is the Labour Code of 1997, which provides for optional phases of resolving conflicts and that a draft Labour Code was sent to the ILO Office in Cairo for review, advice and comments. The Committee has been informed that the Office has indeed provided its assistance with regard to the draft Labour Act of Southern Sudan, section 117(1) of which stipulates that parties "may agree" to refer their dispute to arbitration, however no request for assistance was formally made with regard to the draft Labour Code for Northern Sudan, which is currently pending before the Federal Assembly. The Committee expresses the hope that the new Labour Code (for Northern Sudan) will ensure that compulsory arbitration may only be permitted with the agreement of both parties or in the case of essential services. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the said Code as well as a copy of the Labour Act of Southern Sudan, once these legislative texts are adopted.

Collective bargaining in practice. The Committee previously noted the ITUC's allegation that collective bargaining was nearly non-existent and that salaries were set by a government-appointed and controlled tripartite body. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Higher Council for Wages, a body responsible for preparing collective agreements and studies on minimum wages, has a tripartite structure. The Government further indicates that it is up to employers and workers at the level of undertaking, factory, province and industry to engage in open bargaining between each other in order to reach agreements which determine their wages. The Government states that there are many collective agreements attesting to it and provides a copy of one such agreement. The Committee requests the Government to keep providing information on the application of the right of collective bargaining in practice, including the number of existing collective agreements as well as the sectors and workers covered, as well as the ways the authorities promote the exercise of this right.

Scope of the application of the Convention. On the issue of trade union rights in the EPZs, the Committee notes the Government's indication that legislative texts clearly determine the exempted categories of workers employed in the oil exporting zones and the Port of Sudan. The Committee requests the Government to transmit the relevant legislative texts.

The Committee recalls that the only possible exemptions from the application of the Convention are the armed forces, police and public servants engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all workers engaged in the EPZs and the Port of Sudan can enjoy the rights provided to them under the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes that, in its communication dated 31 July 2012, the ITUC states that the new Law on trade unions maintains the former system of monopoly at federation level and that wages are determined by a tripartite committee. The ITUC also refers to infringements of human rights that are crucial to the exercise of freedom of association rights. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in relation to these allegations.

Swaziland

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1978)

Comments from employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee notes the communication dated 31 July 2012 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning the issues under examination, as well as allegations of continued repression of trade union activities in practice throughout the period under review, and reports on police brutality and harassment against trade unionists, including trade union leaders of the Swaziland Federation of Trade Unions (SFTU), the Swaziland Federation of Labour (SFL) and the Swaziland National Association of Teachers (SNAT), and the arrest and expulsion of officials from the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU). The Committee also notes the comments dated 29 August and 25 September 2012 from the Trade Union Congress of Swaziland (TUCOSWA) on the implementation of the Convention in practice, on the exercise of trade union activities in the country under a repressive and tense atmosphere and without any meaningful social dialogue, and on the non-recognition and purported deregistration of the TUCOSWA by the Government. In view of the continued and long-standing comments from national and international trade unions on the exercise of trade union rights in the country, the Committee cannot but firmly recall that rights of workers' and employers' organizations can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations. The Committee urges the Government to ensure that this principle is respected and requests it to provide its reply to the serious allegations of the ITUC and the TUCOSWA. Furthermore, recalling that Article 5 of the Convention recognizes the right of workers' organizations to establish or to join federations and confederations of their own choosing, the Committee requests the Government to take all necessary steps to proceed to the registration of TUCOSWA, including legislative measures if necessary.

Legislative issues. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Public Service Bill was being debated in both Houses of Parliament, after the social partners were given the opportunity to lobby the Senate on July 2011, and the assistance of an ILO expert which gave a presentation at the request of the Senators on August 2011. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the Bill could not be passed into law in the time required and that the process has since been reinitiated. The Government specifies that the Public Service Bill has been republished in a Government Gazette as Bill No. 4 of 2012 and is now open to the public for consultations and inputs, which gives an opportunity for further consultations with stakeholders. The Bill was further circulated to the Labour Advisory Board and will form part of its agenda. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made to adopt the Public Service Bill and expresses the firm hope that it will be in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention with regard to trade union rights of public service workers. The Committee requests the Government to transmit a copy of the Bill once it is promulgated into law.

In its previous comments, the Committee noted the entry into force of the Industrial Relations (Amendment) Act of 2010 (Act No. 6 of 2010) which amended a number of provisions of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA), upon which the Committee had been commenting for many years. However, the Committee recalled that it has been requesting the Government to amend its legislation on other pending legal issues.

Determination of a minimum service in sanitary services. The Committee recalls that it has been requesting the Government for many years to amend the IRA to recognize the right to strike in sanitary services, and establish only a minimum service with the participation of workers and employers in the definition of such a service. In its previous comments, the Committee observed that Act No. 6 of 2010 provides for a clear definition of “sanitary services” in its section 2 and that the Essential Services Committee had engaged in discussion with the trade union and the staff association on the determination of the minimum service that should be provided. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that section 2 of the IRA has been amended to allow for the establishment of a minimum service in sanitary services and that the Essential Services Committee held a number of meetings with the sanitary services trade unions. The Government indicates that the trade unions needed time to consult with other branches in other towns and city councils and are expected to present a proposed minimum service to the Essential Services Committee. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the final outcome of discussions engaged with the social partners with respect to the determination of the minimum service to be afforded for sanitary services.

Civil and criminal liabilities of trade union leaders. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it requested information on the effect given in practice to section 40 of the IRA with regard to the civil liability of trade union leaders and, in particular, the charges that may be brought under section 40(13) (civil liability of trade union leaders), as well as the effect given to section 97(1) (criminal liability of trade union leaders) of the IRA by ensuring that penalties applying to strikers do not in practice impair the right to strike. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that a proposal to amend both sections 40 and 97 of the IRA was tabled to the Labour Advisory Board on 8 May 2012 and that social partners are consulting on the issues and are expected to come back shortly to the board with their proposals. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all progress made to amend sections 40 and 97 of the IRA.

Right to organize for prison staff. The Committee recalls its previous comments on the need to take measures to amend the legislation so as to guarantee for prison staff the right to organize in defence of their economic and social interests. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that the Ministry of Justice and Constitutional Affairs tabled the draft Correctional Services (Prison) Bill to the Social Dialogue Committee on 13 July 2011 but that the said committee could not deliberate on the proposed Bill which was then submitted to Cabinet. However, Cabinet directed that the social partners should be given an opportunity to make their input to the draft text which was circulated to the Labour Advisory Board on September 2012. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all progress made to adopt the Correctional Services (Prison) Bill in order to guarantee the right to organize for prison staff.

Other pending issues concerning legal acts and proclamation. The Committee recalls that its comments also concerned a number of legal acts and proclamation which gave rise to practices contrary to the provisions of the Convention. The Committee takes note of the technical assistance provided by the Office in order to review the provisions of these texts, namely the 1973 Proclamation and its implementation regulations, the Public Order Act of 1963 and the 2005 Constitution of the Kingdom of Swaziland, and to make recommendations for corrective measures where needed. The ILO consultancy took place in 2011 and the report on proposed legislative amendments was circulated to the social dialogue committee on January 2012. It was reported that the said committee reviewed the report several times between February and March 2012. The Committee notes however that, according to the Government, further discussions on the issue were cancelled at the request of the trade unions due to other domestic issues they wanted to deal with. The Committee takes due note of the Government commitment to endeavour to resume the discussions with the social partners in the framework of the social dialogue committee on the recommendations made pursuant to the ILO consultancy and firmly hopes that the Government will be able to report in the near future on progress made on the pending issues:

- The 1973 Proclamation and its implementing regulations. In relation to the status of this Proclamation, the Committee previously observed from the 2010 high-level tripartite mission report that, despite assurances of the Government to the contrary, the social partners considered that there remained a certain ambiguity and uncertainty in respect of the residual existence of the Proclamation. The Committee also took note of the “Attorney-General’s Opinion” which stated that “on the coming into force of the Constitution, the Proclamation died a natural death”. The Committee notes that the Government maintains in its report that there is no state of emergency in Swaziland. The Government adds that the Decree No. 2 of the King’s Proclamation was introduced for a period of six months and was extended by the Continuation of Period Order of 1973. However, the Detention Order of 1978 – which introduced the 60 days detention without trial or appearing before Court – repealed the Continuation of Period Order of 1973. Furthermore, the Detention (Repeal) Decree of 1993 repealed the Detention Order of 1978. Finally, the Government asserts that the Constitution of 2005, once promulgated, became the supreme law and any other law inconsistent with it is null and void to the extent of its inconsistency. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the outcome of discussions with the social partners and any measures taken thereof in relation to the status of the 1973 Proclamation.

- The 1963 Public Order Act. The Committee has been requesting the Government for a number of years to take the necessary measures to amend the Act so as to ensure that it could not be used to repress lawful and peaceful strike action. The Committee previously noted from the conclusions of the 2010 high-level tripartite mission that, despite the provisions exempting trade union meetings from the scope of the Act, it appeared that the Act was resorted to in respect of trade union activities if it was considered that these activities included matters relating to broader calls for democratic reforms of interest to trade union members. The Committee observes that in its report, the Government indicates that the ILO report following the consultancy recommended that the Act be amended and that the Government will submit the proposal to the social dialogue committee. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of the discussions in the social dialogue committee on the amendment of the 1963 Public Order Act and on any measures taken thereof in order to ensure that the Act is not used in practice to interfere in trade union meetings or protest actions.

The Committee notes that the ILO technical assistance has also resulted in the drafting by the Government of a code of good practice for protest and industrial action, which is being submitted to the Office for comments. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made to adopt the code of good practice for protest and industrial action and to provide a copy.

Finally, while acknowledging the Government's commitment to pursue its efforts in order to address all remaining issues on the application of the Convention in line with its long-standing requests, the Committee cannot but firmly hope that the Government will provide in its next report information on concrete progress made. The Committee also reminds the Government of its duty, under the Convention, to take all appropriate measures to guarantee that trade union rights can be exercised in normal conditions with respect for basic human rights and in a climate free of violence, pressure, fear and threats of any kind.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Comments received from the International Trade Union Confederation. The Committee notes the communication dated 31 July 2012 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) which denounces continued repression of trade union activities and reports police brutality and harassment against trade unionists and trade union leaders of the Swaziland Federation of Trade Unions (SFTU), the Swaziland Federation of Labour (SFL) and the Swaziland National Association of Teachers (SNAT), and the arrest and expulsion of officials from the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU). In view of the seriousness of these allegations, the Committee cannot but firmly recall that rights of employers' and workers' organizations can only be guaranteed where fundamental human rights are respected and exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations. The Committee urges the Government to ensure that this principle is respected and requests it to provide its reply to the comments of the ITUC.

The Committee had previously noted allegations from the ITUC on a number of acts of anti-union discrimination in the textile sector and in export processing zones (EPZs), and requested information on collective bargaining practices in the EPZs. The Committee notes the indication that, out of 23 textile factories inspected in 2011 in the EPZs, only six had a recognition agreement with the trade unions, which shows limited collective bargaining in the sector. However, the Government also presents the possibility for a trade union seeking recognition to refer a dispute to the Conciliation Mediation and Arbitration Commission (CMAC) under section 42 of the Industrial Relations Act as amended in 2005. The Committee further notes that in its communication the ITUC alleges that collective bargaining in the public sector is restricted in its coverage since the Ministry of Public Administration, Employment and Social Security sets wages and benefits on an annual basis in consultation – but without negotiation – with the trade unions. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the status of collective bargaining in all sectors, including in the EPZs, following the entry into force of Industrial Relations (Amendment) Act No. 6 of 2010 which modified section 42 by requiring employers with more than two unrecognized unions to give collective bargaining rights to such unions to negotiate on behalf of their members (the Committee had noted this progress in its previous comments). It also requests the Government to clarify whether negotiation with trade unions is possible when setting wages and benefits in the public sector.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee recalls that its previous comments referred to the need to adopt specific provisions accompanied by sufficiently dissuasive sanctions for the protection of workers' organizations against acts of interference by employers or their organizations. The Committee notes the Government's statement according to which this matter is part of the agenda of the Labour Advisory Board meeting scheduled in October 2012 and any progress made in this regard will be reported back to the Committee. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any progress made to ensure that workers and their organizations are effectively protected against acts of interference and anti-union discrimination (in view of the allegations of the ITUC), in accordance with the Convention.

Sweden

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1949)

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the impact of legislative changes and the comments of the Confederation of Swedish Enterprise (CSE) attached to the Government's report. It further takes note of the supplementary comments dated 10 August 2011 and 13 November 2012 made by the Swedish Trade Union Confederation (LO) and the Swedish Confederation of Professional Employees (TCO). The Committee invites the Government to provide any further information it considers relevant in reply to these comments.

The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it had taken note of the comments provided by the LO and the TCO concerning the application of the Convention within the framework of the European Court of Justice (ECJ) judgment in the case Laval un Partneri v. Svenska Byggnadsarbetareförbundet (Laval). The LO and the TCO referred in particular to the ex post facto application of the interpretation given to European Union law in the Laval judgment to the industrial action taken in that case and the punitive damages and legal fees levied against the unions, as well as the subsequent legislative amendments to the Foreign Posting of Employees Act and the Codetermination Act of 1976. The LO and the TCO denounce the new legislation which it states only permits industrial action against a foreign employer where it is aimed at bringing about a collective agreement restricted to the minimum terms covered by article 3(1)(a)–(g) of the Posting of Workers Directive (PWD). They emphasize that industrial action against a foreign employer is thus forbidden as regards any demand for a term or condition of employment higher than the absolute minimum set out in a central collective agreement and in relation to a range of other issues not set out in the PWD, such as insurance coverage for foreign workers. Moreover, section 5(a)(2) provides that industrial action may not be taken if the employer shows that the employees' terms and conditions in substance are as favourable as the minimum conditions in the central collective agreement. The LO and the TCO contest that there are no specific details on how the employer may show this. The Committee had requested the Government to monitor the impact of the legislative changes on the rights under the Convention and provide a detailed report.

General appreciation

The Government in its latest report, observing that the LO and TCO have submitted a similar complaint to the European Committee of Social Rights (ECSR), provides the following information. The Government specifies that a parliamentary committee was assigned on 27 September 2012, composed of representatives of all parliamentary parties, to look at the situation of posted workers and, following its investigation: (1) evaluate whether the application of the regulation ensures that fundamental employment conditions of posted workers in Sweden can be safeguarded; (2) in terms of foreseeability, assess and evaluate the practice of the Swedish Work Environment Authority's statutory task of providing information and the trade unions' obligation to submit information on collective bargaining agreements to the Swedish Work Environment Authority, and if necessary propose legislative changes in this regard; and (3) consider necessary changes to safeguard the Swedish labour market model in an international context. The Committee shall pursue a dialogue with representatives of the social partners on the Swedish labour market and include an analysis of the consequences, if any, in relation to relevant international regulations and present its work on 31 December 2014.

The Government also refers to a Bill regarding agency workers which was submitted to the Swedish Parliament on 18 September 2012 and includes a proposal that would increase the trade unions' possibilities to take industrial action in order to regulate the terms and conditions of employment of posted agency workers. The legislative changes are proposed to enter into force on 1 January 2013. Finally, the Government refers to the directive to improve the application of the EU Posting of Workers Directive which is being negotiated at EU level.

The Committee notes the concerns raised by the LO and the TCO that the new situation makes it difficult to determine in advance what is lawful, and the risk of large claims for damages have made trade unions in Sweden more cautious about demanding collective agreements. No trade union industrial action with a view to bringing about a collective agreement with a foreign company has taken place at all in recent years in the Swedish labour market, leading to a sharp fall in collective agreements. This means that foreign workers are entirely without protection as regards reasonable terms and conditions of pay and employment when they are working in the Swedish labour market and that Swedish workers are exposed to competition from workers with very low pay and wretched employment conditions. A further implication is that Swedish companies can no longer compete on equal terms with foreign companies. In the long term, there is a risk that this will have negative repercussions for the entire Swedish labour market model.

The Committee notes the comments of the Confederation of Swedish Enterprise that: the free movement of services throughout the EU is one of the foundations of the EU which requires that the barriers to providing services between Member States be abolished; the free movement of services is of vital importance in creating growth within Europe, and the positive effects of this in areas such as exports and consumption leading to increased employment and welfare in European countries; the EU's rules also give people the opportunity of employment and work in other countries; the aim of the Posting of Workers' Directive is to enable this free movement without barriers, while ensuring that employees who work temporarily in other European Economic Area (EEA) countries are provided with an adequate level of protection. As Sweden is a small country which is dependent on trade for its prosperity, these rules are of crucial significance. The service sector is expanding in both Sweden and in Europe and the provision of services across borders will become increasingly important.

The CSE and the Swedish Association of Local Authorities and Regions do not consider that the changes made in the Posting of Workers Act and the Codetermination Act in response to the Laval judgment violate ILO Conventions. The Confederation adds that they were necessary to fulfil requirements of EU law in respect of the free movement of services and non-discrimination. With respect to the right to strike, the Confederation stresses that Convention No. 87 does not include any right to strike, which remains therefore a matter for national regulation. The Confederation adds that, in Sweden, it is normal that a trade union which takes illegal industrial action may have to pay compensation for losses arising from that action, as is the case in most legal systems.

The Confederation states that the changes to the legislation only affect the ability of trade unions to take industrial action against foreign companies and do not in any way affect the right to organize and the ability to enter into voluntary collective agreement negotiations. Swedish trade unions are free to request the conditions which they consider appropriate and are not limited to core rights in this regard. Nor are there any barriers preventing employees posted to Sweden from joining a Swedish trade union, nor preventing foreign employers from joining a Swedish employers' association. The Confederation considers that the rules introduced represent a significant improvement in so far as it is now easier for companies from the EEA to operate temporarily in Sweden. The new system is more predictable and legally secure, enabling companies to identify in advance the conditions which they are obliged to apply while working in Sweden, and the conditions which trade unions are entitled to demand through collective bargaining. The Confederation states that Swedish trade unions continue to request foreign companies to sign collective agreements and that the foreign companies usually sign them. It is not aware of any disputes having arisen in this regard, or of steps taken by a foreign employer to protect against industrial action. The Confederation further recalls that the Posting of Workers Act states that high standards of reliability must be placed on statements advanced by the employer to be protected from industrial action so it is likely that the employer would have to demonstrate the salaries and conditions actually provided beyond just citing the employment contract. The Confederation does not consider that the current system would prevent Swedish companies from being able to compete with foreign companies which comply with current Swedish regulations.

The Confederation does however regard with great concern the proposed legislation which the Swedish Government has recently introduced (Bill 2011/12:178, Law on Hiring of Workers) in which the Government proposes that foreign temporary work agencies are to be treated differently than other foreign companies by permitting industrial action against the former with the object of demanding conditions within the areas included in the core rights but not restricted to the minimum levels in collective agreements. The Confederation believes this would likely lead to an increase in collective disputes with foreign companies and will create uncertainty in the differences between those covered by this Bill and other foreign businesses making it unreasonably difficult to predict the precise conditions that they would need to apply when active in Sweden.

In its additional communication dated 13 November 2012, the LO and the TCO welcome the Government's submission which they hope will enable the Committee to carry out its work. They regret however that the Parliamentary Committee set up to evaluate the changes in the Foreign Posting of Employees Act was not given the mandate to review the Act in light of Conventions Nos 87 and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). While the LO and TCO consider that the new legislation on posted agency workers is a step forward, they consider that this does not resolve the issue of the collective agreement free zones on issues outside the Posting of Workers Directive. Finally, they indicate that the discussions within the EU on a directive to improve the application of the Posting of Workers Directive are irrelevant as the proposal being discussed does not address the issue of the right to take collective action.

The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the impact of the legislation and in particular the outcome of the work of the Parliamentary Committee and any proposed legislative changes, as well as the developments relating to the Bill regarding agency workers.

Sanctions for industrial action

In their previous communication, the LO and the TCO refer to the €342,000 in punitive damages, litigation costs and interest that the Swedish Building Workers' Union (Byggnads) and the Swedish Electricians' Union were forced to pay to Laval's Latvian trustee in bankruptcy. In this regard, the LO and the TCO state that the unions were being held liable for an ex-post facto application of the interpretation given to European Law through the Laval judgment. Despite the fact that the initial consideration by the Swedish courts in December 2004 found that the collective action was lawful under Swedish Law (a decision which cannot be appealed), the Swedish labour court revisited the case in 2009 in the light of the 2007 ECJ judgment and, given that the trade unions now conceded that the action was unlawful, ordered payment of damages. While having made the full payment of damages in October 2010, the unions continue to claim that they should not be held liable for industrial action which was considered to be lawful at the time it was undertaken; any expectation that the unions should have known that the action would be found unlawful under European Law several years later is wholly unreasonable.

The Committee, observing that the Government has still not provided any reply to this point, first wishes to recall its considerations when examining the impact of the International Transport Workers' Federation and the Finnish Seaman's Union v. Viking Line ABP (Viking) and Laval judgments in another European country. As in that case, the Committee wishes to recall that its task is not to judge the correctness of the ECJ's holdings in Viking and Laval as they set out an interpretation of the European Union Law, based on varying and distinct rights in the Treaty of the European Community, but rather to examine whether the impact of these decisions at national level is such as to deny workers' freedom of association rights under Convention No. 87. The Committee raised the concern at the time that the omnipresent threat of an action for damages that could bankrupt the union, possible in the light of the Viking and Laval judgments, created a situation jeopardizing the exercise of the rights under the Convention. In this specific case, the Committee is deeply concerned that the union in question has been held liable for an action that was lawful under national law and for which it could not have been reasonably presumed that the action would be found to be in violation of European Law. The Committee recalls that imposing sanctions on unions for leading a legitimate strike is a grave violation of the principles of freedom of association. The Committee considers that this principle is all the more relevant in the circumstances where the action was lawful at the time it was exercised. While aware that the payment has already been made to the trustee in bankruptcy, the Committee requests the Government to review this matter with the social partners concerned so as to study possible solutions for compensation of the two unions, particularly in light of the 2004 court judgment leading the unions to believe their action was lawful.

Lex Laval

The Committee notes the Government's reiteration that the legislative changes made following the Laval ruling, which entered into force on 15 April 2010, do not violate any of the ILO Conventions on freedom of association or collective bargaining. The Government has explained that the core of the relevant change is a new section 5(a) which only refers to the Swedish trade unions rights to take industrial action against a foreign employer who posts workers to Sweden and does not affect either the workers' rights to form or join trade unions or to engage in collective bargaining. Moreover, the restriction only refers to industrial action aimed at conditions going beyond the hard core of the PWD. The Government adds that the amendments do not affect industrial action in a purely national situation and contends that the Convention primarily protects national conditions and not workers who have been posted to another country. Moreover, the Government stated that the Convention primarily protects industrial action against the employee's own employer which is not the case if the posted workers are not members of the Swedish trade union.

The Committee notes the comments of the LO and the TCO that the explicit purpose of the Swedish legislation prior to the Laval case, and in particular the Lex Britannia rule which permitted industrial action with the purpose of compelling a foreign employer to enter into a collective agreement regardless of whether the employer was already bound by a collective agreement with a trade union in its home country, was to achieve equality of treatment on the Swedish labour market of foreign and Swedish companies and employees. The Committee notes that the LO and the TCO denounce the new legislation which it states only permits industrial action against a foreign employer where it is aimed at bringing about a collective agreement restricted to the minimum terms covered by article 3(1)(a)–(g) of the PWD. They emphasize that industrial action against a foreign employer is thus forbidden as regards any demand for a term or condition of employment higher than the absolute minimum set out in a central collective agreement and in relation to a range of other issues not set out in the PWD, such as insurance coverage for foreign workers. Moreover, section 5(a)(2) provides that industrial action may not be taken if the employer merely shows that the employees' terms and conditions in substance are as favourable as the minimum conditions in the central collective agreement. In other words, the employer does not even need to be bound by a collective agreement with a trade union in its own country or prove in a legally binding way the assurance of minimum conditions in order to be protected from industrial action. Finally, the LO and TCO indicate that, while the Swedish trade union movement has been making great efforts to organize foreign workers posted to Sweden, the restriction on industrial action makes no distinction as to whether or not the union has members in the foreign enterprise.

In its latest report, the Government, while observing that there has not yet been any unbiased and comprehensive evaluation of the legislative changes, provides statistics from the Swedish National Mediation Office showing that these statistics show that the number of disputes with foreign employers is low; there was one dispute in 2007 and 2008 and no disputes from 2009 through 2011. There was a slightly higher number of disputes prior to 2007 ranging from five in 2002 and 2003 to 12 in 2004, 11 in 2005 and four in 2006.

As a general matter, the Committee recalls that when elaborating its position in relation to the permissible restrictions that may be placed upon the right to strike, it has never included the need to assess the proportionality of interests bearing in mind a notion of freedom of establishment or freedom to provide services. The Committee has however suggested that, in certain cases, the notion of a negotiated minimum service in order to avoid damages which are irreversible or out of all proportion to third parties, may be considered and if agreement is not possible the issue should be referred to an independent body (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work in light of the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization, paragraphs 136–139). The Committee considers, however, that the principles of the Convention does not impose the recognition of a Lex Britannia rule, which is very particular to Sweden. This would be a matter to be determined at the national level.

The Committee does observe with concern, however, that the amendments to the Foreign Posting of Employees Act restrict recourse to industrial action to conditions corresponding to the PWD minimum conditions and further bar unions from taking industrial action even if they have members working in the enterprise concerned and regardless of whether a collective agreement covers the workers concerned, provided that the employer can show that the employees' terms and conditions are as favourable as the minimum conditions in the central collective agreement. The Committee considers that foreign workers should have the right to be represented by the organization of their own choosing with a view to defending their occupational interests and that the organization of their choice should be able to defend its members' interests, including by means of industrial action. The Committee therefore requests the Government to review with the social partners the 2010 amendments made to the Foreign Posting of Employees Act so as to ensure that workers' organizations representing foreign posted workers are not restricted in their rights simply because of the nationality of the enterprise.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1950)

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the impact of legislative changes and the comments of the Confederation of Swedish Enterprise attached to the Government's report. It further takes note of the supplementary comments dated 10 August 2011 and 13 November 2012 made by the Swedish Trade Union Confederation (LO) and the Swedish Confederation of Professional Employees (TCO). The Committee invites the Government to provide any further information it considers relevant in reply to these comments.

The Committee refers to its comments under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), as regards the general appreciation of the impact of the legislation introduced in Sweden in 2010 in response to the European Court of Justice (ECJ) judgment in the case Laval un Partneri v. Svenska Byggnadsarbetareförbundet (Laval).

Article 4 of the Convention. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee notes the Government's statement, in reply to the LO and TCO comments, that the new legislation places no restriction on collective bargaining but only the conditions under which industrial action can be undertaken (see under Convention No. 87). The Committee takes due note, however, of the further assertions made by the LO and the TCO that the conditions for trade unions to negotiate with foreign employers have deteriorated given that the obligation to register a representative for the business domiciled in Sweden has been removed with reference to EU law and the Services Directive. According to the LO and the TCO, the absence of any legal obligation to have a representative in the country poses a significant obstacle to the exercise of collective bargaining with foreign employers. The LO and the TCO add that this is of particular concern within the Swedish context where legislation on pay rates is nearly non-existent and wages and employment conditions are regulated to a great extent through collective agreements (collective agreements cover 90 per cent of the workforce). Moreover, the LO and the TCO indicate that the impact of the various restrictions ever since the Laval judgment can be seen in the statistics issued by the National Mediation Office. In 2007, 107 collective agreements were signed with foreign companies, in 2008 only 40, in 2009, 29 agreements were signed and in 2010 there were only 27. They state that there is no corresponding decrease in collective agreements for Swedish companies.

In reply to the LO and TCO comments, the Government refers to plans to submit a Bill, at the latest on 30 November 2012, whereby foreign employers must report that they post workers to Sweden and appoint a contact person in Sweden, who shall be authorized to receive notice on behalf of the employer. The contact person shall further be able to provide documentation demonstrating that the requirements of the Foreign Posting of Employees Act, as regards employment conditions for posted workers, are met. Trade union knowledge of posted workers in the country may facilitate negotiations for collective agreements. As to the impact on concluded collective agreements, the Government adds that there were 62 registered collective agreements concluded directly with foreign employers at the end of 2011. The statistics of the Mediation Office indicate that the Swedish Building Workers' Union (Byggnads) concluded 33 collective agreements directly with foreign employers in 2011 (27 in 2010, 29 in 2009, 40 in 2008). An additional five foreign employers became bound by agreements with the construction workers' union through membership in an employer's organization in 2011 (15 in 2010). Byggnads concluded 107 collective agreements in 2007 when approximately 15 foreign employers became bound through membership in an employer's organization. The Government adds that there is no analysis for the reasons behind these figures or information on the number of foreign employers and posted workers in Sweden. The Government observes, however, that the investigation of the parliamentary committee and the legislative proposal on reporting obligations will enable such analysis.

The Confederation of Swedish Enterprise (CSE) does not consider that the fact that a foreign employer established in an EU or EEA country is not, in certain circumstances, required to have a representative resident in Sweden represents a barrier to the right of collective bargaining. A foreign employer who posts employees in Sweden is subject to the rules on negotiating obligations in the Codetermination Act which apply to Swedish employers. The Confederation does support however the part of the Government's proposal that introduces provisions in the Posting of Workers Act under which foreign employers who post workers in Sweden shall be obliged to notify the Swedish Work Authority if the activity continues for more than five days. As regards the reduction in collective agreements signed with Byggnads, the Confederation considers that this cannot be attributed to the changes in the law, given that the amended legislation only came into force in April 2010 and therefore could not be responsible for the reduction between 2007 and 2010. In Sweden, wage-setting is a matter for the labour market parties, largely through the signing of collective agreements in each sector. The Confederation has difficulty understanding the argument advanced by the LO and the TCO that the fact that, in situations involving posting of workers, they are only able to take industrial action to demand the minimum levels set out by collective agreements opens the door to social dumping. To the contrary, it appears that the unions want to demand higher wages for foreign companies than Swedish companies in similar situations.

On this last point, the Committee understands that the concerns raised by the unions are not related to a desire to have better terms and conditions of employment for foreign posted workers than those set out in collective agreements, but rather that they would like to ensure that those terms are comparable to those in the relevant sector and geographic area and are not based on an often non-existent central minimum.

In its latest comment, the LO and TCO consider the plans to submit a bill requiring foreign employers to appoint a contact person in Sweden would be an improvement but remain concerned that, even with a counterpart, there is no requirement that the representative of the employer will be mandated to negotiate and conclude collective agreements. As regards the statistics provided by the Government, the LO and the TCO consider that the most telling are those concerning the reduction in collective agreements concluded after the Laval judgment. In this regard, they indicate that the Byggnads concluded 356 collective agreements with foreign companies between 2004 and 2007 (about 120 agreements per year). After the ECJ judgment in 2007 creating a new legal situation on the labour market, the number of agreements fell dramatically. This situation was made even worse by the 2010 changes in the Swedish legislation.

The Committee welcomes the plans to submit a Bill, at the latest on 30 November 2012, whereby a foreign employer must report that it posts workers to Sweden and appoint a contact person in Sweden, who shall be authorized to receive notice on behalf of the employer and hopes that this will facilitate engagement in collective bargaining with foreign employers. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the developments in this regard in its next report.

The Committee further notes the comments of the LO and the TCO that there are an increasing number of “double agreements” in foreign companies which set terms at a very low level and then provide a second agreement only for presentation to the authorities and the trade union setting out better terms. The Committee further expresses its concern that foreign companies may be exempt from collective bargaining demands provided they only “show” that minimum pay and conditions pertain. The Committee requests the Government to reply to these comments and to continue to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged to combat this practice.

Switzerland

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the communications from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 31 July 2012, from Travail.Suisse on 24 August 2012 and from the Swiss Federation of Trade Unions (USS/SGB) on 30 August 2012 containing observations on the application of the Convention. It notes the recent Government’s response to this communication and it will examine it in its next reporting cycle.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union dismissals. The Committee recalls that its last comments addressed the difference of opinion between the Government and the trade unions on the degree of protection of trade union delegates and representatives against anti-union dismissals. While the trade unions considered that this protection was not adequate on the basis of cases ruled on by courts, the Government maintained that Swiss law offers adequate protection and fully respects the Convention; and that the compensation for unfair dismissal which may amount to as much as six months’ pay is sufficiently dissuasive, given that the great majority of Swiss firms are small and medium-sized enterprises. The Government nevertheless indicated that the Federal Council decided on 16 December 2009 to reconsider the matter of penalties for unfair dismissal, including the dismissal of elected staff representatives, dismissal for membership or non-membership of a trade union or for lawful trade union activity, for the purpose of looking into an increase of the maximum penalty. In September 2010, therefore, the Government was to hold consultations with the social partners on improving protection against unfair dismissals, including dismissal on anti-union grounds. The Committee had welcomed this initiative and asked the Government to indicate the outcome.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the said consultation, which ended in January 2011, revealed strongly conflicting opinions on the need to review the Code of Obligations on the issue of protection against dismissals and that the Federal Council must take a policy decision on actions to be taken on the draft review. The Committee also notes the observations of Travail.Suisse and the USS/SGB which confirm that the consultations ended in January 2011, regret the fact that the Federal Council still has not brought this issue before Parliament over a year and a half after public consultation and objects to the continuation of anti-union dismissals. In this regard, the Committee notes the various cases cited by the USS/SGB and the indication that the Federal Court considered, in a recent ruling of 19 March 2012, that an improvement in the protection of workers' representatives can be implemented only through an amendment to the law.

In these circumstances the Committee is bound to recall its opinion that the applicable compensation for unfair dismissal (up to six months' wages) may be a deterrent for small and medium-sized enterprises, but that this is not so for high productivity enterprises or large enterprises. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the action taken by the Federal Council to follow up the public consultation on improving protection against unfair dismissals. More generally, and despite the conflicting positions reported, the Committee invites the Government to maintain open tripartite dialogue on the issue of adequate protection against anti-union dismissals in the light of its comments.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee notes the latest statistical information available from the Federal Statistics Office on collective agreements concluded in the country and the number of workers covered. The Committee requests the Government to continue to send up-to-date statistical information on the number of collective agreements by sector and the number of workers covered.

Syrian Arab Republic

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 4 August 2011, in which it indicates the following: (1) unions are independent, and their independence is guaranteed under several national laws, including in articles 10 and 45 of the new Constitution promulgated on 27 February 2012; (2) the trade union movement is united, from an organizational perspective, in virtue of the decisions taken by trade unions' confederations and of the new Constitution (article 8) which recognizes political pluralism; and (3) the trade union movement is a pyramidal hierarchy that preserves the legal entity of trade unions, their autonomy and their right to be in possession of property, to defend the interests of their workers and represent them, and to conclude collective agreements and collective contracts.

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the ITUC of 31 July 2012 on the application of the Convention and, in particular, alleging that protests were violently put down throughout the year, that there were deaths and arrests as a result and that the authorities have attempted to stem protests through the increasing use of police and paramilitary force, arrests, trials and the imprisonment of political and human rights activists. The ITUC further alleges that a growing number of strikes are met with violence, injury and often killings. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these serious comments.

The Committee notes the adoption of Labour Law No. 17 in 2010, as well as the new Constitution in 2012.

Article 2 of the Convention. Scope of application. Sections 1 and 5(1), (2) and (4) to (7) of Labour Law No. 17 exclude certain workers from the scope of the law (independent workers, civil servants, agricultural workers, domestic servants and similar categories, workers in charity associations and organizations, casual workers and part-time workers whose hours of work do not exceed two hours per day). Recalling that these workers are covered by the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the rights enshrined in the Convention are provided to these workers by other legislation, and, if this is not the case, to take measures to recognize to these workers, in the legislation, the rights enshrined in the Convention.

Trade union monopoly. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated so as to repeal or amend the legislative provisions establishing a regime of trade union monopoly (sections 3, 4, 5 and 7 of Legislative Decree No. 84; sections 4, 6, 8, 13, 14 and 15 of Legislative Decree No. 3, amending Legislative Decree No. 84; section 2 of Legislative Decree No. 250 of 1969; and sections 26–31 of Act No. 21 of 1974). The Committee recalls that the Government indicates in its report that the trade union movement is united, from an organizational perspective, in virtue of the decisions taken by trade unions' confederations and that the Constitution (article 8) recognizes political pluralism. Noting the Government's information, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to repeal or amend the legislative provisions which establish a regime of trade union monopoly so as to allow possible trade union diversity.

Article 3. Financial administration of organizations. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 18(a) of Legislative Decree No. 84, as amended by section 4(5) of Legislative Decree No. 30 of 1982, so as to lift the power of the Minister to set the conditions and procedures for the investment of trade union funds in financial services and industrial sectors. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that, according to the Constitution, trade unions have the right to supervise and inspect their financial resources, without any interference, through a supervision and inspection body elected directly by trade unions. Taking into full account the information provided by the Government, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 18(a) of Legislative Decree No. 84, as amended by section 4(5) of Legislative Decree No. 30 of 1982. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or contemplated in this respect in its next report.

Right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal or amend the legislative provisions which determine the composition of the General Federation of Trade Unions (GFTU) Congress and its presiding officers (section 1(4) of Act No. 29 of 1986, amending Legislative Decree No. 84). The Committee recalls that it should be up to trade union constitutions and rules to establish the composition and presiding officers of trade union congresses; national legislation should only lay down formal requirements in this respect; any legislative provisions going beyond such formal requirements constitute interference contrary to Article 3 of the Convention (General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraphs 109 and 111). The Committee, therefore, once again requests the Government to provide specific information on the measures taken or contemplated to repeal or amend section 1(4) of Act No. 29 of 1986, amending Legislative Decree No. 84, in accordance with the abovementioned principle. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or contemplated in this respect in its next report.

Right to strike. Penal sanctions. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate the progress made with regard to the adoption of draft amendments to provisions which restrict the right to strike by imposing heavy sanctions including imprisonment (sections 330, 332, 333 and 334 of Legislative Decree No. 148 of 1949, issuing the Penal Code). The Committee further notes that no reference is made to the possibility for workers to exercise their right to strike in the chapter on collective labour dispute of Labour Law No. 17 of 2010. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the GFTU is working to modify the Labour Law in order to ensure coherence with articles of the Constitution granting workers the right to strike. The Committee hopes that the law will be amended so as to bring it into conformity with the principles of freedom of association and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

The Committee expresses the hope that the measures envisaged to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention will be adopted in the near future, in accordance with the abovementioned principle. It requests the Government to provide, with its next report, a copy of the amendments as adopted.

The Committee reminds the Government that, if it so wishes, it may include the issues under this Convention when receiving the technical assistance of the Office it has requested under the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the observations of the Government on the 4 August 2011 International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) comments. The Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC on 31 July 2012 concerning issues that have been raised in the past, including the fact that collective bargaining hardly exists, as well as allegations that, while the right to collective bargaining is recognized in Labour Law No. 17 of 2010, the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour has vast powers to object to and refuse the registration of concluded collective agreements. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the 2012 ITUC comments. The Committee also notes the claim of the ITUC that, while the state of emergency that has been in place since 1963, with heavy restrictions on civil and political rights and trade unions under the full control of the regime, was finally lifted in April 2011 in response to protestor's demands, at the end of 2011 the situation in the Syrian Arab Republic was seen as increasingly one of civil war.

The Committee noted, in its previous observation, the adoption of Labour Law No. 17 of 2010, which contains a chapter on collective bargaining (sections 178–202). In this respect, it draws the attention of the Government to the following issues.

Scope of the Convention. Sections 1 and 5(1), (2) and (4)–(7) exclude certain workers from the scope of the law (independent workers, civil servants, agricultural workers, domestic servants and similar categories, workers in charity associations and organizations, casual workers and part-time workers whose hours of work do not exceed two hours per day). Recalling that these workers are covered by the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the rights enshrined in the Convention are provided to these workers by other legislation, and, if this is not the case, to take measures to recognize to these workers, in the legislation, the rights enshrined in the Convention.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee notes that section 67(a) states that, according to section 67, employers may not dismiss a unionized worker performing, organizing or taking part in trade union activities; in case reinstatement is not possible, section 67(c) provides that compensation equals two months' wages for each year in service. In this respect, the Committee underlines the need to reinforce the sanction against anti-union dismissal by providing sufficiently dissuasive sanctions. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures to amend this provision. The Committee further notes that the Labour Law does not prohibit acts of interference on the part of employers or organizations of workers in each other's affairs, in accordance with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take measures in order to adopt clear and precise provisions prohibiting acts of interference accompanied by sufficiently dissuasive sanctions.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. Section 187(c) states that, during the 30-day period between filing the agreement and having it approved by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour, the Ministry may object to and refuse to register the agreement, and inform contracting parties, by registered letter, of such objection/refusal and the reasons thereof. The Committee underlines that this provision grants excessive power to the Ministry to object or refuse to register a collective agreement. The Committee recalls that such an objection/refusal to register a collective agreement may only be made on the basis of a procedural flaw or because it does not conform to the minimum standards laid down by the labour legislation. The Committee requests the Government to take measures to amend this provision in order to fully guarantee the principle of free and voluntary collective bargaining established in the Convention.

The Committee notes that section 214 states that, in case mediation does not result in an agreement, either party may file a request to initiate dispute settlement through arbitration. The Committee recalls that, in general, arbitration to end a collective labour dispute is acceptable if it is at the request of both parties involved in a dispute, or with regard to disputes in essential services in the strict sense of the term, or in respect of civil servants exercising authority in the name of the State. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that arbitration initiated by only one party to the dispute can only take place in the cases mentioned above.

Arbitration bodies. According to section 215, arbitration tribunals are composed of a chairperson and a member, appointed by the Ministry of Justice, a member appointed by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour, one member appointed by the General Federation of Trade Unions and one member appointed by the Federation of Chambers of Industry, Commerce and Tourism, or the Contractors Association at the governorate level. The Committee underlines that the composition of the arbitration tribunal could raise questions concerning its independence and impartiality and could call into question the confidence of the concerned parties in such a system. The Committee requests the Government to take measures to amend this provision so as to ensure that the composition of the arbitration tribunals is balanced and can engender the confidence of the parties in the arbitration mechanism.

The Committee hopes that legislation and practice will be brought into line with the Convention and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

United Republic of Tanzania

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee takes note of the comments dated 31 July 2012 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning issues already raised by the Committee.

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish organizations without previous authorization. Right of organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes freely. The Committee notes the Government's report which merely indicates that the issues raised by the Committee in its previous comments will be brought to the attention of the Labour, Economic and Social Council (LESCO) which will then advise the minister on measures to be taken. The Committee trusts that the Government will provide in its next report full details on measures taken in consultation with the social partners to comply with its comments and bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention on the following issues:

- the need to amend section 2(1)(iii) of the Employment and Labour Relations Act (No. 6 of 2004) (ELRA) so that prison guards enjoy the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing;
- the need to determine the types of workers included in the category of the “national service” referred to in section 2(1)(iv) of the ELRA – which is excluded from the provisions of the law. In the meantime, the Committee recalls that only the armed forces and the police may be excluded from the application of the Convention (Article 9 of the Convention);
- the need to amend the ELRA which does not provide for specific time limits within which the registration procedure of an organization should be concluded and to adopt a provision determining a reasonable time period for the processing of applications for registration of employers' and workers' organizations; and
- the need to amend section 4 of the ELRA so that restrictions on protest actions are limited to a rights dispute; as well as section 76(3)(a) which prohibits picketing in support of a strike or in opposition to a lawful lockout.

Public sector. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to amend section 26(2) of the Public Service (Negotiating Machinery) Act (No.19 of 2003) requiring certain conditions to be satisfied for civil servants to take part in a strike, since the provision could constitute an act of interference in trade union activities (the supervision by the administrative authority of a strike ballot under section 26(c)), could unnecessarily hinder the possibility of carrying out a strike (the requirement of a decision of the majority of the public servants of the respective service scheme for the calling of a strike under section 26(c)) and could constitute an obstacle to collective bargaining (a 60 days' notice to be served to the Government from the date of the ballot under section 26(d)). The Committee notes the Government's indication according to which the ELRA also applies to workers in the public service in Mainland Tanzania and that it is provided under section 80(1) of the said Act that a strike has to be called by a trade union and a ballot is conducted under the union's constitution. Thus, the public servants have the right to choose either the Public Service (Negotiating Machinery) Act or the ELRA. The Government adds as an example that the Teachers' Trade Union called a strike under the ELRA. While taking due note of the possibility for workers in the public sector to call a strike under the ELRA, the Committee considers that section 26(2) of the Public Service (Negotiating Machinery) Act should be put in line with the relevant provisions of the ELRA in order to align the two pieces of legislation and requests the Government to indicate any development in this regard.

In its previous comments, the Committee noted that no service had been designated as essential by the Essential Services Committee pursuant to section 77 of the ELRA, and recalled that essential services should be defined in the strict sense of the term, that is services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. While noting the indication from the Government that the principles outlined by the Committee are under consideration, the Committee hopes that while establishing a list of essential services the abovementioned principle will be fully taken into account.

Zanzibar

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish organizations. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to review and amend section 2(2) of Labour Relations Act (No. 1 of 2005) (LRA), which excludes the following categories of employees from the LRA's provisions: (a) judges and all judiciary officers; (b) members of special departments; and (c) employees of the House of Representatives. The Committee notes the Government's indication according to which social partners are engaged in consultations to the effect of amending section 2(2). The Committee requests the Government to indicate any progress made in this regard.

Right of workers and employers to establish organizations without previous authorization. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide further information on section 21(1)(c) of the LRA, particularly on the criteria employed by the registrar for determining whether an organization's constitution contains suitable provisions to protect its members' interests, and on the expeditiousness of the registration procedure, including the average time period, from the submission to the application, for an organization to be registered. The Committee notes the Government's indication according to which draft regulations for the implementation of the Act are awaiting publication. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the regulations for the implementation of section 21(1)(c) of the LRA once adopted.

Article 3. Right of organizations to organize their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the Government indicated that section 42 of the LRA forbids the union to use, directly or indirectly, its funds to pay any fines or penalties incurred by a trade union official in the discharge of his or her duties on behalf of the organization. The Committee had recalled that trade unions should have the power to manage their funds without undue restrictions from the legislation. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the social partners are engaging into consultations taking into account the comments of the Committee. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any progress made in this regard.

Finally, the Committee takes due note of the requests for technical assistance from the Government on a number of amendments to the LRA requested by the Committee. It notes that social partners will be engaged in consultations on the issues raised. The Committee hopes that the technical assistance of the Office will be provided to the Government in the near future and that the Government will be in a position to report on progress made to bring its legislation in full conformity with the Convention on the matters recalled hereunder:

- the need to amend sections 64(1) and 64(2) of the LRA, which set forth categories of employees that may not participate in a strike, without any additional indication, and list several services that are deemed essential, including sanitation services, and in which strikes are forbidden. In this regard, the Committee recalls that the prohibition of the right to strike in the public service should be limited to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, that is services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population, or in the case of an acute national crisis;
- the need to amend sections 63(2)(b) and 69(2) of the LRA, which determine that before resorting to protest action, the trade union must give the mediation authority at least 30 days to resolve it and subsequently give 14 days' advance notice explaining the purpose, nature and place and date of the protest action. The Committee requested the Government to shorten this 44-day period (to a maximum of 30 days, for example). The Committee recalls that the period of advance notice should not be an additional obstacle to bargaining, with workers in practice simply waiting for its expiry in order to be able to exercise their right to strike;
- the need to amend section 41(2)(j) of the LRA so that institutions a trade union may wish to contribute to are not subject to the Registrar's approval.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 31 July 2012, according to which employers in the private sector often deny the right of workers to organize and to bargain collectively. Moreover, according to the ITUC, any collective agreement agreed upon must be submitted to the industrial court for approval and may be refused if it does not conform to the Government's economic policy. The Committee requests the Government to provide its reply to the ITUC communication, in particular in the light of the new Labour Act. While awaiting the reply from the Government, the Committee recalls that provisions which prescribe the obligation to submit a collective agreement for prior approval by the authorities are only compatible with the Convention when they are confined to stipulating that approval may be refused if the agreement has a procedural flaw or does not conform to the minimum standards laid down by general labour legislation. On the other hand, if legislation allows the authorities full discretion to deny approval or stipulates that approval must be based on criteria such as compatibility with the general or economic policy of the government, or official directives on wages and conditions of employment, it in fact makes the entry into force of the agreement subject to prior approval, which is in violation of the principle of the autonomy of the parties (see General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 201).

Scope of the Convention. The Committee previously raised a number of points concerning the 2003 Public Service (Negotiating Machinery) Act. In particular, it requested the Government to provide information on the types of workers included in the national service and to take the necessary measures to ensure to prison staff the rights enshrined in the Convention. In this regard, the Committee notes the indication according to which its comments have been forwarded to the Labour, Economic and Social Council for further consultations and any progress made or any difficulty encountered will be reported. The Committee trusts that the next report of the Government will indicate concrete measures taken to determine the types of workers included in the national service and to ensure to prison staff the rights enshrined in the Convention.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. In its previous comments concerning the Public Service (Negotiating Machinery) Act the Committee also requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken or contemplated to include in the legislation adequate protection against all acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference, as well as sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against such acts. The Committee notes that, while acknowledging that section 29 of the Act only prohibits acts of discrimination against a public servant who takes part in a strike or lockout, the Government refers to the Employment and Labour Relations Act (No. 6 of 2004), which applies to all workers, including those employed in the public sector in Mainland Tanzania. The Government specifies that section 7(1) of Act No. 6 of 2004 prohibits discrimination in the workplace and strives to eliminate discrimination in any employment policy and practice. Moreover, section 37(3) of the Act prescribes that it should not be a fair reason to terminate the employment of an employee for the reason that such employee belongs, or belonged, to any trade union, or participated in the lawful activities of a trade union including a lawful strike. The Committee also notes that, according to section 40 of the Act, if an arbitrator or a labour court finds that a termination is unfair, it may order the reinstatement of the employee without loss of remuneration or the payment of compensation of not less than 12 months' wages. Where an order of reinstatement is made and the employer decides not to reinstate the employee, the employer shall pay compensation of 12 months' wages in addition to wages due and other benefits from the date of unfair termination to the date of the final payment. The Committee takes due note of this information.

Article 4. Compulsory arbitration. With regard to its previous comments concerning compulsory arbitration that may be imposed under the Public Service (Negotiating Machinery) Act, the Committee recalled that compulsory arbitration in the framework of collective bargaining is only acceptable if it is at the request of both parties involved, or in the case of disputes in the public service involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely those services whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. Thus, the Committee requested the Government to amend sections 17 and 18 of the Public Service (Negotiating Machinery) Act, so as to ensure their full conformity with these principles. While noting the indication that the Government intends to work on the issue, the Committee trusts that its next report will contain information on progress made in this regard.

Zanzibar

Article 4. Trade union recognition for purposes of collective bargaining. The Committee previously requested the Government to amend section 57(2) of the Labour Relations Act of 2005 (LRA) so that, if no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, the minority unions in the bargaining unit are not denied collective bargaining rights, at least on behalf of their members. The Committee also requested the Government to indicate whether, in practice, minority unions enjoy collective bargaining rights in cases where there is no union representing 50 per cent of the workers concerned. The Committee notes the Government's indication that minority unions enjoy collective bargaining rights in cases where no union represents 50 per cent of the workers concerned. While inviting the Government to indicate the legal provisions in support of its statement, the Committee recalls the importance that the legislation establishes clearly that where no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers in a bargaining unit, the minority unions should be allowed to enter into collective bargaining, at least on behalf of their members. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any development, in both law and practice, as well as to provide examples and statistics, including as regards minority unions that have exercised collective bargaining where no union represents 50 per cent of the workers concerned.

Furthermore, the Committee had requested the Government to ensure that the rules and regulations being drafted for the implementation of the LRA will provide for objective procedures and criteria for the determination of representative trade union status. The Committee notes the Government's indication that draft regulations are awaiting publication and will soon be communicated. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the regulations once promulgated.

Article 6. Public servants. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 54(2)(b) of the LRA, so as to guarantee to managerial employees the right to collective bargaining with respect to salaries and other conditions of employment, and to indicate the categories of employees excluded from the right to bargain collectively by the minister under section 54(2)(c) of the LRA. The Committee notes the Government's indication that social partners are engaged in consultations on this matter and that the Government is requesting technical assistance in this regard. The Committee hopes that the technical assistance of the Office will be provided to the Government in the near future and that the latter will be in a position to report on progress made in this regard.

Comments made by trade unions. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning mostly questions already examined by the Committee.

Article 4 of the Convention. Collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to adopt legislative provisions regulating the procedure for establishing the Negotiation Board (the members of which are appointed by trade unions) when no trade union organization represents 20 per cent of employees or no employers' association meets the legal requirement for representativeness (sections 219 and 221 of the Labour Relations Law). The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that: (1) the representativeness criteria for trade unions and employers associations were defined and harmonized with social partners (the Government sent the rules of procedures for the determination of representativeness attached to its report); (2) employees have the right to form more than one trade union at the enterprise level; (3) in case there exists more than one trade union at the enterprise level, those trade unions are representative and may establish the Negotiation Board; (4) employers' associations have the same right; and (5) trade unions regulate not only the percentage of representation in the Negotiation Board, but also the selection procedures, the negotiation methods and the persons authorized to sign the collective agreement.

Representativeness. The Committee noted that section 213(c) of the Labour Relations Law provides that the application to the Commission for establishment of representativeness to bargain collectively shall be filled by a trade union at a higher level. The Committee requested the Government to indicate if section 213(c) allows trade unions at enterprise level or industry level to apply for their representativeness to be established. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that sections 213(b) and 213(c) only applies to determine trade union representativeness at national and branch levels; these provisions do not apply to trade unions at enterprise level or industrial level as this matter is regulated by another provision. The Committee notes that, in its reply to the ITUC comments on this matter, the Government adds that the criteria for representativeness does not limit the right to collective bargaining but constitutes a precondition for the conclusion and the coverage of collective agreements. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether, in practice, there are collective agreements at the branch level.

Conclusion of general collective agreements. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 205 of the Labour Relations Law provides that the general collective agreement for the private sector (industry) and for the public sector are applied directly and are mandatory for employers and employees in the respective sectors. The Committee requested the Government to clarify whether these collective agreements can only be concluded by the most representative trade union organizations at the national level. The Committee notes that, according to the ITUC, at national level the representative union must represent 10 per cent of the total labour force. The Committee also notes that the Government indicates that: (1) the general collective agreement for the private sector is concluded by the representative association of employers and the representative trade union for the private sector; and (2) the general collective agreement for the public sector is concluded by the representative trade union in the public sector and the Minister in charge of labour matters. The Committee notes this information with interest, in particular observing that the ITUC considers as a progress the collective agreements concluded in the public sector.

Part IV of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the Convention, including statistical data concerning the number of collective agreements concluded in both private and public sectors and the number of workers covered.

Finally, the Committee requests the Government to send its observations concerning the ITUC allegations according to which: (1) the judicial proceedings in case of anti-union discrimination take two to three years to be resolved; and (2) labour inspection does not function in an efficient manner.

Timor-Leste

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2009)

The Committee notes the Government's first report as well as the adoption of Act No. 4/2012 enacting the Labour Code.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination. The Committee notes with satisfaction that sections 45, 55 and 81 of the new Labour Code prohibit acts of anti-union discrimination on the grounds of trade union affiliation or activity, stipulate that anti-union dismissals shall be deemed null and void and provide for reinstatement and compensation of the worker.

The Committee further notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 31 July 2012 on the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Togo

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1983)

Observations by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The Committee notes the ITUC's observations, dated 31 July 2012, on the lack of dialogue with the trade union organizations recently established in the export processing zones, especially with respect to the revision of legal texts on working conditions in the export processing zone. The Committee requests the Government to submit its observations in reply to the allegations made by the ITUC.

Article 4 of the Convention. Bargaining between employers' and workers' organizations in practice. The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that the inter-occupational collective agreement has been revised following negotiations held in 2011 between the National Employers' Council of Togo and six central trade union confederations; this collective agreement entered into effect in January 2012 and was extended to all sectors of activity and all non-signatory social partners pursuant to the Government order of 21 August 2012. The Committee also notes that bargaining is under way in the banking and insurance sector, in oil companies and in the oil transport services with a view to revising their respective collective agreements. Finally, the Committee notes that negotiations have also begun or are planned in various sectors such as the media, private teaching, work in the export processing zone, private health institutions, as well as the trade and services sectors. The Committee notes the figures provided by the Government on the number of workers covered by collective agreement in the public and private sectors, as well as in the export processing zone. Finally, the Committee takes note of the various measures taken by the Government to promote collective bargaining by means of social dialogue forums or the national media. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing detailed information on the collective agreements concluded, the sectors and number of workers covered, and the measures taken by the authorities to promote collective bargaining.

Compulsory arbitration. The Committee recalls its previous comments on section 260 of the Labour Code which stipulates that, in the event of persistent disagreement between the parties to collective bargaining on certain points in a collective dispute, the Minister of Labour might submit the matter to a arbitration board following the failure of conciliation. The Committee noted that the section in question was contrary to the principle of the autonomy of the parties and the principle of free and voluntary negotiation envisaged in the Convention. It had consequently requested the Government to amend the legislation with a view to providing that compulsory arbitration was only possible upon the request of the two parties to the dispute or in the context of disputes relating to essential services in the strict sense of the term or, in the public service, in the case of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in a case of acute national crisis. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it undertakes to initiate consultations in the tripartite dialogue bodies on the possibility of amending the settlement procedure of collective labour disputes. The Committee requests the Government to inform it of any new developments concerning the amendment of section 260 of the Labour Code to bring it in line with the principles of the Convention.

Trinidad and Tobago

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1963)

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of organizations to organize their activities freely and to formulate their programmes. In its previous comments, the Committee has been referring for a number of years to the need to amend or repeal the following sections of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA): (1) section 59(4)(a) concerning the majority required for calling a strike; (2) sections 61(d) and 65 concerning recourse to the courts by either party or by the Ministry of Labour to end a strike; and (3) section 67 (in conjunction with the second schedule) and section 69 concerning services in which industrial action may be prohibited.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that: (1) the Industrial Relations Advisory Committee was established in February 2012, with the mandate, as stated in section 81 of the IRA, to keep this Act under review; (2) it has already commenced its review of the IRA with a view to making proposals to the minister for its development and reform, including in particular the modification of any of the provisions thereof; and (3) while noting that it can avail itself of the technical assistance of the ILO, the Government proposes to do so as work of the Industrial Relations Advisory Committee proceeds and should the need arise. The Committee takes note of these indications and hopes that concrete measures will be taken in the near future to amend or repeal the abovementioned sections of the IRA. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any progress made in this respect.

Finally, the Committee notes the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 31 July 2012 which refer to issues already raised by the Committee. It also notes the Government's reply to the comments made by the ITUC in 2008 and 2010, in particular that the alleged denial of the right of domestic workers to legally join trade unions is not accurate, and that the National Union of Domestic Employees was part of the tripartite delegation of Trinidad and Tobago and an active participant in the discussion of the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), and Recommendation, 2011 (No. 201).

Article 4 of the Convention. Representativeness for the purposes of collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee has been referring to the need to amend section 24(3) of the Civil Service Act, which affords a privileged position to already registered associations, without providing objective and pre-established criteria for determining the most representative association in the civil service. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the matter of amendment of section 24(3) is still under consideration, that it requires extensive continuing dialogue and that efforts will continue to be made to resolve the matter. The Committee recalls that, where there exists a trade union which enjoys preferential or exclusive bargaining rights, as in the current system, decisions concerning the most representative organization should be made by virtue of objective and pre-established criteria instead of simply giving priority to the one which was registered earlier in time, so as to avoid any opportunities for partiality or abuse. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the legislation, including section 24(3), will be modified in the near future so as to bring it into conformity with the principles of the Convention, and requests the Government to indicate any developments in this regard.

In its previous comments, the Committee also referred to the need to amend section 34 of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA) in order to ensure that, in cases in which no trade union represents the majority of workers, the minority unions can jointly negotiate a collective agreement applicable in the negotiating unit, or at least conclude a collective agreement on behalf of their own members. The Committee notes the Government's indication that an Industrial Relations Advisory Committee was established in February 2012 in accordance with Chapter 88:01 of the IRA for the purpose of keeping the IRA under constant review. The Government indicates that the Advisory Committee has commenced its review of the IRA with a view to making proposals for its development and reform, including the amendment of any of its provisions. The Committee notes that the Government states that it has noted that it can avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office and proposes to do so as the work of the Advisory Committee proceeds and should the need arise. The Committee expresses the hope that measures will be taken in the near future to amend the legislation so as to allow minority unions in the unit to bargain collectively, at least on behalf of their own members when there is no union that represents the majority of workers. The Committee requests the Government to communicate progress on these issues in its next report.

Comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the ITUC's 2012 comments.

Tunisia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee. It also notes the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 31 July 2012, referring to issues of a legislative nature already raised by the Committee, as well as to infringements of trade union rights in practice, specifically obstacles to journalists' trade union activities. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in reply to the ITUC's comments.

In its last observation, the Committee noted the election of a Constituent Assembly on 23 October 2011, with the mandate, inter alia, to draw up a new Constitution, and hoped that, as part of the legislative reform movement that should accompany the adoption of a new Constitution, the issues which had been the subject of its comments for many years would be taken into account. In this respect, the Committee notes with regret that the Government does not refer in its report to the progress made in amending the legislation. It therefore feels bound to reiterate the comments it has been making for a number of years.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. As regards the request for information concerning the way in which the Government ensures that magistrates enjoy the guarantees afforded by the Convention, the Committee notes that, according to the Government, magistrates established an independent trade union grouping more than 1,200 magistrates within the judiciary on 18 March 2011; the magistrates of administrative courts have initiated a process to establish their own trade union.

As regards its request concerning the need to amend section 242 of the Labour Code, which stipulates that minors aged 16 years and over may belong to trade unions, if there is no opposition from their father or guardian, the Committee notes the Government's statement that, as the age of majority was reduced from 20 to 18 years in 2010, this is only an issue for minors aged between 16 and 18 years; the protection put in place is prompted by legal considerations connected to the parent's or guardian's exercise of authority in accordance with section 93bis of the Code of obligations and contracts. The Government also points out that the provisions of section 242 of the Labour Code have not given rise to any objections or problems in practice. Recalling the need to guarantee that minors having reached the statutory minimum age for employment (16 years according to section 53 of the Labour Code) should be able to exercise their trade union rights without authorization from their parent or guardian, the Committee urges the Government to amend section 242 of the Labour Code in this respect.

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes without interference from the public authorities. As regards the question of determining the representativeness of trade unions in the higher education sector, the Committee notes that, in the context of Case No. 2592 of the Committee on Freedom of Association (358th Report), the Government stated that it had taken steps to develop objective criteria to determine the representativeness of the social partners pursuant to section 39 of the Labour Code. The Government had indicated that in the event of disputes concerning trade union representativeness, it was the number of members which determined representativeness for the purposes of collective bargaining in the absence of pre-established criteria. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the steps it states it has taken and their outcome.

Right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom. As regards its observation on the need to amend section 251 of the Labour Code so as to guarantee that workers' organizations have the right to elect their representatives in full freedom, including from among foreign workers, at least after a reasonable period of residence in the country, the Committee notes the Government's indication that section 263 of the Labour Code enshrines the principle of equal treatment between foreign and national workers and that approval by the public authorities of the appointment or election of foreign workers to an administrative or managerial position within a trade union is merely an administrative control of their eligibility, ascertaining that the foreign worker has lived for a reasonable length of time in the country. The Government points out, moreover, that there has never been recourse to this requirement and that the employers' and workers' organizations have never made comments concerning its application. Notwithstanding this fact, the Committee feels bound to request the Government once again to amend section 251 of the Labour Code to ensure that the principle recalled above be respected both in law and in practice.

Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that it has been making comments for a number of years on certain restrictions to the right to strike, which include: approval of the central workers' confederation before declaring a strike (section 376bis(2) of the Labour Code); compulsory indication of the duration of the strike in the strike notification (section 376ter of the Labour Code); determination of the list of essential services by decree (section 381ter of the Labour Code); and the possibility of imposing penalties in the event of an unlawful strike (sections 387–388 of the Labour Code). The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report to the effect that: section 376bis(2) of the Labour Code does not raise any problems in practice and the workers' organizations have not made any observations on its application; no time limits are established in section 376ter of the Labour Code, and the organizers of the strike are entirely free to choose the duration of the strike and to continue it as they wish; the decree referred to in the last paragraph of section 381ter has not yet been adopted; the imposition of penalties provided for under section 388 of the Labour Code is contingent upon the court's assessment and the level of severity of the offences. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in the near future to amend these sections of the Labour Code to guarantee respect of the principles of freedom of association to which it has been referring for many years.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on progress made in amending the legislation. It reminds the Government that it may avail itself of technical assistance from the Office with regard to these issues.

Turkey

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee also notes the observations provided by the Government on the 2011 comments of Education International (EI) and the Turkish Union of Public Employees in the Education, Training and Science Services (TÜRK-SEN), as well as those of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The Committee notes the comments submitted by the ITUC in a communication dated 31 July 2012, alleging notably several cases of violence against trade unionists, the sentencing and imprisonment of 25 teachers and one leather worker, as well as the prosecution faced by 111 workers for participating in a demonstration. The Committee also notes the communication of EI, dated 31 August 2012, alleging the arrest and imprisonment of members of the Confederation of Public Employees (KESK), the police raid of KESK offices and of KESK affiliate trade unions members' houses, as well as police violence. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it had also noted the comments submitted by EGITIM-SEN. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Civil liberties. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been commenting upon the situation of civil liberties in Turkey. It has been observing with concern the allegations of important restrictions placed on freedom of speech and assembly of trade unionists, including numerous cases of violence against trade unionists, as well as arrests, again contained in the above-noted 2012 ITUC and EI communications. With regard to the EI 2011 communication alleging: (1) police searches in the KESK offices on 28 May 2009, the arrest of some members as a result, and the abroad travel ban imposed on those arrested, the Government states that the searches were limited to certain rooms and that a number of detained suspects were condemned to prison for being part of a terrorist organization by the High Penal Court on 28 November 2011, which therefore explains the travelling ban; (2) the search of the EGITIM-SEN office on 21 June 2011, where property was damaged and members were later taken into custody, the Government indicates that this search was within the scope of anti-terrorist activities, that no property was damaged and that the members' lawyers were present during the custody and the searches; (3) the use by the police of tear gas against EI members attending a solidarity demonstration on 31 March 2010, the Government indicates that security forces were attacked with stones and sticks and several were injured as a result and that tear gas was used as one of the proportionate intervention tools; (4) the arrest, beating and injury of several EI members during a demonstration, the Government states that security forces intervened as they, along with police vehicles and public buildings, were attacked with stones and sticks; (5) several violations of freedom of speech and assembly (some demonstrations were not allowed for "security" reasons, or because there was no adequate place for them to be held, demonstration organizers have been imprisoned for not informing local authorities of the demonstration, and court cases have been launched against them for violating Act No. 2911), and that the right to peaceful demonstration may not be exercised in practice because of the intervention of the Government and the police, the Government confirms that several legal actions for violating Act No. 2911 have been launched. As to the ITUC's allegation of judicial harassment, the Government indicates that all individuals have equal rights and responsibilities before the law no matter which position or title they have.

The Committee notes with concern the new allegations of restrictions placed on freedom of association and assembly of trade unions. In its report, the Government explains that arrests of trade union members were made because terrorist organizations have infiltrated non-governmental organizations to take advantage of the opportunities of these organizations in accordance with the demands of the terrorist organizations. No union or institution has been interfered with and the Government qualifies as unsubstantiated the claim that people are detained due to union actions. The Government indicates that regular training for prevention of disproportionate use of force is provided to riot police units and that 17,000 riot police are being trained annually, including on human rights compliance. Moreover, the Government indicates that a project on prevention of use of disproportionate force by police, conducted under the General Directorate of Education within the General Directorate of Security, started in September 2011 and is expected to be completed by the end of 2013. A directive to regulate the intervention principles of personnel deployed in social events entered into force on 15 August 2011. The Committee takes note of the measures taken by the Government. The Committee recalls that respect for civil liberties is an essential prerequisite to freedom of association and urges the Government to continue to take all the necessary measures to ensure a climate free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind so that workers and employers could fully and freely exercise their rights under the Convention. The Committee also again urges the Government to review, in full consultation with the social partners, any legislation that might be applied in practice in a manner contrary to this fundamental principle and to consider any necessary legislative amendments or abrogation. It requests the Government to provide information on all measures taken in this respect and to send a copy of the Directive regulating intervention principles of personnel in social events. The Committee also requests the Government to carry out an investigation into the new allegations concerning all the cases of use of violence during police or other security force interventions and to provide information on the ongoing legal proceedings launched for violation of Act No. 2911.

Legislative issues. The Committee notes that Act No. 6289 on public servants' unions and collective agreement, with significant amendments to Act No. 4688, has been adopted on 4 April 2012. The Committee welcomes the fact that this new Act addresses some of the issues raised by the Committee in the past, including lifting the exclusion to the right to form and join trade unions of public employees on probation. However, the Committee notes that the following provisions of Act No. 6289 are not in full conformity with the Convention:

Article 2 of the Convention:

- Section 15 which prohibits several categories of workers, such as senior public employees, magistrates, civilian personnel in military institutions and prison guards, to establish and join a trade union.
- Section 7(d) which requires to provide the place of residence of the founders of an organization in its statutes that must be submitted to the office of the Governor of the province in order to be incorporated.

Article 3. Election of representatives:

- Section 10(8) which provides for the removal of union executive bodies in case of non-respect of requirements concerning meetings and decisions of general assemblies set out in the law upon application that can be made by the Ministry of Labour and Social Security.
- Sections 33 and 34 which provide for the procedures for settlement of disputes by the Public Employees' Arbitration Board and make no mention of the circumstances in which strike action may be exercised in the public service. The Committee recalls the need to ensure that cases in which strikes may be restricted or even prohibited are limited to those involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State.

The Committee hopes that the Government, in full consultation with the social partners, will take the necessary measures to bring Act No. 6289 into full conformity with the Convention.

Supervision of organizations' accounts (Associations Act No. 5253). The Committee had previously observed that section 35 of the Associations Act of 4 November 2004 provides that certain specific sections of this Act apply to trade unions, employers' organizations, as well as federations and confederations, if there are no specific provisions in special laws concerning these organizations. In this respect, section 19 enables the Minister of Internal Affairs or the civil administration authority to examine the books and other documents of an organization, conduct an investigation and demand information at any time, with 24-hours' notice. The Committee notes the Government's indication that no trade union has been audited and that financial reports, within the context of Act No. 2821, are submitted to the Ministry of Interior by trade unions. However, the Committee recalls once again that the supervision of accounts should be limited to the obligation of submitting periodic financial reports or to cases where serious grounds exist for believing that the actions of an organization are contrary to its rules or the law (which should be in conformity with the Convention), or if there is a need to investigate a complaint by a certain percentage of the members of the employers' or workers' organizations; both the substance and the procedure of such verifications should be subject to review by the competent judicial authority affording every guarantee of impartiality and objectivity (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 125). The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to amend sections 19 and 35 of Act No. 5253 of 2004 so as to exclude workers' and employers' organizations from the scope of application of these provisions or ensure that verification of trade union accounts beyond the submission of periodic financial reports takes place only where there are serious grounds for believing that the actions of an organization are contrary to its rules or the law (which should be in conformity with the Convention) or in order to investigate a complaint by a certain percentage of members.

The Committee recalls that for a number of years it had been commenting on several provisions of Act No. 2821 on trade unions and Act No. 2822 on collective labour agreements, strikes and lockouts. The Committee has been informed that the Collective Labour Relations Act, amending Act No. 2821 and Act No. 2822, has been adopted by the Parliament on 18 October 2012. The Committee notes in this regard the communication of the Confederation of Progressive Trade Unions of Turkey (DISK) of 30 October 2012 alleging that the new law brings no substantial change in promoting trade union rights and freedoms and even contains some arrangements which will exacerbate existing problems (for example, the double criteria requirement for gaining authorization to engage in collective bargaining has not been removed). The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of this Act as well as to provide its observations with regard to the allegations of the DISK.

The Committee urges the Government to engage in ongoing assistance with the ILO in order to ensure the rapid adoption of the necessary amendments to Acts Nos 5253 and 6289 and expresses the hope that these amendments will take fully into account its comments above.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the observations provided by the Government on the 2011 comments of the International Metalworkers' Federation (IMF) and of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The Committee also notes the comments made by the ITUC in a communication dated 31 July 2012 alleging violations of collective bargaining rights and numerous cases of anti-union dismissals. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon in its next report. The Committee is examining the Government's observations on matters raised by Education International (EI) in 2011, as well as the comments submitted by EI on 31 August 2012, in the framework of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it had observed that the ITUC referred to widespread acts of anti-union discrimination in the public and private sectors and had noted that similar allegations were submitted by the Public Employees' Trade Unions (KESK). The Committee requested the Government to indicate the procedure that applies for the examination of complaints of anti-union discrimination in the public sector and to provide statistical data showing progress made in addressing effectively allegations of acts of anti-union discrimination and interference both in the public and private sectors (number of cases brought to the competent bodies, average duration of proceedings and remedies imposed). The Committee noted the observations provided by the Government on the ITUC and the KESK comments. The Government indicated, in particular, that in addition to the abovementioned legislative provisions which, in its view provide for sufficient protection against all types of discrimination, the necessary warnings have been issued by the Government and four circulars have been published by the Office of the Prime Minister on the unacceptability of interference in trade union activities of public employees. The Committee further noted that the Government indicated that no statistical database regarding complaints of anti-union discrimination is kept by the Ministry of Labour and Social Security. The Government further explained that, as regards the public sector, public servants have the right to make written or verbal complaints to their supervisors requesting to investigate cases of trade union discrimination. If the alleged cases are not resolved following this procedure, administrative proceedings can be initiated. The Government informed that the State Personnel Administration possesses statistical information and documents submitted to it by the relevant institutions regarding claims relating to cases of anti-union discrimination in the public sector. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide this statistical data. It notes once again that in its latest communication, the ITUC refers to cases of reinstatement ordered by the court but alleges that justice is too slow for many. Noting once again, however, that no information has been provided by the Government with regard to the public and private sector, the Committee reiterates its previous request for information and expresses the firm hope that the Government will take all necessary measures to ensure that the provisions of the Convention are effectively applied.

The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it had noted the draft Act on Trade Unions amending Act No. 2821 on trade unions and Act No. 2822 on collective agreements, strikes and lockouts. The Committee notes that this draft, renamed "Collective Labour Relations Act", was submitted to the Prime Minister in October 2011 and was discussed again in a special committee. The Committee understands from the ITUC that this second draft has been condemned by several trade union organizations for containing regressive provisions compared to the existing law and to the first draft law discussed with social partners earlier in 2011. The Committee notes that the Collective Labour Relations Act was adopted by the Parliament on 18 October 2012. The Committee requests the Government to send a copy of the Collective Labour Relations Act, amending Acts Nos 2821 and 2822. It expresses the firm hope that the necessary amendments were made to the legislation, taking into account the comments of the Committee concerning remedies and compensation and free and voluntary collective bargaining.

Collective bargaining in the public service. The Committee recalls that it had previously noted that Act No. 5982 of 2010 repealed several provisions of the Constitution which previously restricted collective bargaining rights and granted, by virtue of its section 53, the right to conclude collective agreements to public servants and other public employees, and that these constitutional amendments would be followed by the relevant legislative amendments. The Committee notes that Act No. 6289, with significant amendments to Act No. 4688, has been adopted on 4 April 2012. It notes with satisfaction that this new Act addresses some of the issues the Committee has raised in the past, notably regarding the scope of collective bargaining which now extends not only to financial questions but to "social rights" (section 28 of Act No. 6289), the need for the parties to be able to hold full and meaningful negotiations over a period of time longer than that previously provided for (extended from 15 days to one month under section 31 of Act No. 6289), the removal of the possibility for the authorities to modify collective agreements signed by the parties and the change of scope of the law from collective "talks" to collective "agreements". The Committee notes, however, that its observations have not been fully taken into account with regard to the need to ensure that: (i) the direct employer participates, alongside the financial authorities, in genuine negotiations with trade unions representing public servants not engaged in the administration of the State; and (ii) a significant role is left to collective bargaining between the parties. The Committee once again recalls that an additional issue to be overcome in order to allow for free and voluntary collective bargaining in the public sector is the recognition of the right to organize to a large number of categories of public employees not engaged in the administration of the State, such as civilian personnel in military institutions and prison guards, who are excluded from this right and, therefore, from the right to be represented in negotiations.

Finally, the Committee noted that in its statement before the Conference Committee in 2011, the Government referred to the adoption in February 2011 of an Act providing for a collective agreement premium for members of public servant trade unions and to the abrogation of a criticized provision concerning contract personnel in the public sector. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide a copy thereof.

Uganda

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes that, according to the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), collective bargaining in the public service sector is not allowed by the legislation. The Committee requests the Government to take measures in order to recognize the right to collective bargaining to all public employees and public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, in accordance with Article 6 of the Convention.

Article 4 of the Convention. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee noted that section 7 of the Labour Unions Act (LUA) sets forth the lawful purposes for which trade union federations may be established. The said purposes include, inter alia: the formulation of policy relating to the proper management of labour unions and the general welfare of employees; the planning and administration of workers' education programmes; and consulting on all matters relating to labour union affairs. Noting that the lawful purposes delineated under section 7 of the LUA does not include collective bargaining, the Committee recalls that the right to collective bargaining should also be granted to federations and confederations of trade unions (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 249). In this connection, the Committee requests the Government to confirm whether the right of trade union federations to engage in collective bargaining is assured, in the LUA or in other legislation.

Compulsory arbitration. The Committee noted that, under section 5(3) of the Labour Disputes (Arbitration and Settlement) Act of 2006, in cases where a labour dispute reported to a labour officer is not referred to the Industrial Court within eight weeks from the time the report is made, any of the parties or both the parties to the dispute may refer the dispute to the Industrial Court. Section 27 of the Act, the Committee further notes, empowers the minister to refer disputes to the Industrial Court where one or both parties to a dispute refuse to comply with the recommendations of the report issued by a board of inquiry. In this connection, the Committee recalls that recourse to compulsory arbitration is acceptable only for: (1) workers in essential services, in the strict sense of the term; and (2) public employees engaged in the administration of the State. Otherwise, provisions that permit the authorities to impose compulsory arbitration, or allow one party unilaterally to submit a dispute to the authorities for arbitration, run counter to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements enshrined in Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to amend the above legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee requests the Government to reply to the comments of 31 August 2012 sent by the National Organisation of Trade Unions of Uganda (NOTU) alleging anti-union discrimination practices, as well as the need for a document of recognition delivered by the employers as a condition to be able to engage in collective bargaining.

Finally, the Committee notes with satisfaction the ITUC's statements, according to which the Government has signed a recognition agreement with the public service unions, although the Uganda Public Employees Union (UPEU) would appear not to have been included.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the right of judges to establish organizations of their own choosing to further and defend the interests of their members. The Committee notes that in its report, the Government explains that by virtue of article 127 of the Constitution, professional judges cannot be members of trade unions. The Government indicates, however, that by Presidential Decree No. 328/2012 dated 17 May 2012, a special body, Constitutional Assembly, has been established with a specific mandate to prepare draft amendments to the Constitution. In order to ensure the right of judges to establish their organizations, the Ministry of Social Policy addressed the Constitutional Assembly with a request to examine the possibility of amending relevant articles of the Constitution. The Committee hopes that the Government's next report will contain information on the developments in this regard.

The Committee further recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend section 87 of the Civil Code (2003), according to which, an organization acquires its rights of legal personality from the moment of its registration, so as to eliminate the contradiction with section 16 of the Trade Unions Act, as amended in June 2003, providing that a trade union acquires the rights of a legal person from the moment of the approval of its statute and that a legalizing authority confirms the status of a trade union and no longer has a discretionary power to refuse to legalize a trade union. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Social Policy has requested the Ministry of Justice to examine this issue pursuant to the Committee's request. The Committee hopes that the necessary amendments to the legislation will be adopted in the near future and that the Government's next report will contain information on the developments in this regard.

Article 3. The Committee recalls that it had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal section 31 of the Law on employers' organizations, which provided that the bodies of the State authority shall exercise control over economic activities of employers' organizations and their associations. The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption on 22 June 2012 of the Law on employers' organizations and their associations and the Government's indication that this legislation no longer contains provision to that effect.

With regard to the Committee's previous request to take the necessary measures to amend section 19 of the Act on the procedure for settlement of collective labour disputes, which provides that a decision to call a strike has to be supported by a majority of the workers or two-thirds of the delegates of a conference, the Committee welcomes the Government's indication that the draft Labour Code would lower this requirement so as to set it at the majority of workers (delegates) present at the meeting (conference). The Committee notes however, that according to the Government, the draft Labour Code would also provide that an employer is to be invited to the conference. The Committee considers that provisions allowing employers to be present at the meeting when the questions of strike are decided constitute a serious impediment to the exercise of the right to strike. It requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the adopted Labour Code does not contain provisions to that effect. The Committee expresses the hope that the Labour Code will be adopted in the near future and that it will take into account the Committee's comments. It encourages the Government to continue its cooperation with the Office in this respect. It requests the Government to provide information on all progress made with regard to the adoption of the Labour Code.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to indicate categories of public servants whose right to strike is restricted or prohibited. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that public servants are prohibited from exercising the right to strike and that a new legislation on Public Service, which will enter into force on 1 January 2013, contains provisions to the same effect. Recalling that states may restrict or prohibit the right to strike in the public service, only for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, the Committee once again requests the Government to list specific categories of public servants whose right to strike is restricted or prohibited and to provide a copy of the new legislation.

With regard to its previous request to provide information on the practical application of section 293 of the Criminal Code, according to which, organized group actions that seriously disturb public order, or significantly disrupt operations of public transport, any enterprise, institution or organization and active participation therein, are punishable by a fine of up to 50 monthly minimum wages or imprisonment for a term of up to six months and, in particular, in respect of an industrial action, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Social Policy has requested the Ministry of Justice to provide this information. Once this information is provided, it will be forwarded to the Committee. The Committee expresses the hope that the Government's next report will contain detailed information on the application of section 293 of the Criminal Code in practice.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes a communication dated 4 August 2011 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention, alleging, in particular, acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, poor protection against such acts and reluctance of employers to bargain collectively. The Committee notes the Government's detailed observations thereon.

The Committee further notes the communications dated 8 September 2011 and 5 July 2012 from the Confederation of Free Trade Unions of Ukraine (KVPU) providing its comments on the Act on Social Dialogue, which, with the adoption of the draft Labour Code, will become one of its chapters. In this respect, the Committee notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2843 (see 362nd Report) in which the latter examined in detail the provisions of the new legislation and concluded that the set thresholds and privileges granted to representative organizations were acceptable under the Convention.

The Committee further notes the ITUC and KVPU communications dated 31 July and 31 August 2012, respectively, referring to the alleged cases of anti-union discrimination, employers' interference in trade union affairs, and refusal by employers to bargain collectively. While noting that in its report the Government indicates that the number of collective agreements in the country increased in 2012 (from 98,500 agreements in 2011 to 101,700 agreements in 2012), the Committee will examine the Government's reply once it is translated into one of the ILO working languages.

Article 4 of the Convention. Right to collective bargaining. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide its observations on the ITUC allegation that, pursuant to the 2004 Model Statutes and Internal Rules for public limited companies, works councils have a mandate for collective bargaining. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, pursuant to the legislation in force (section 12 of the Code of Labour Laws and section 6 of the Act on Social Dialogue), in collective bargaining at the enterprise level, workers are represented by primary trade unions, and that other workers' representatives can be mandated to bargain collectively only in the absence of trade union organizations.

United Kingdom

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1949)

Workers' and employers' organizations comments. The Committee takes note of the observations of the Government on the communication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 August 2010 as well as of the detailed comments and information provided by the Trades Union Congress (TUC) in a communication dated 30 August 2012 which raises new issues related to recent case law, as well as a number of issues on the application of the Convention in law and in practice that have been the subject of the Committee's comments for many years now. The Committee also notes the comments of the ITUC dated 4 August 2011. The Committee requests the Government to reply to these comments in its next report.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of workers' organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules without interference by the public authorities. The Committee's previous comments concerned the right of trade unions to draw up their rules and formulate their programmes without interference from the authorities, particularly as regards the exclusion or expulsion of individuals on account of membership in an extremist political party with principles and policies wholly repugnant to the trade union. Following the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) reached in the case of Associated Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen (ASLEF) v. the United Kingdom (27 May 2007), section 174 of the Trade Unions and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act, 1992 (TULRA) was amended. The Government considered that this amendment significantly extended the scope for trade unions to exclude and expel individuals on the grounds of their political party membership.

The Committee also noted the detailed comments made by the TUC setting out certain reservations in respect of the amendment both as regards what it saw as a degree of legal uncertainty around its meaning and the perception of excessive complexity in the new legislation. The Committee took due note of the detailed observations made by the Government in its previous report in reply to these concerns. The Government stated that it had attempted to balance competing human rights about freedom of belief and freedom of association in its drafting of these amendments. It therefore included safeguards concerning the essential elements of natural justice, due process and transparency which aim to ensure that: (a) membership of the political party concerned is contrary to a rule or objective of the union; (b) the union has taken the decision to exclude or expel in accordance with its rules; and (c) the union has followed fair procedures when taking that decision, and the individual does not lose his or her livelihood or suffer other exceptional hardship for loss of union membership. As regards this last point, the Government indicated that, since "closed shop" is already unlawful in the country, a loss of union membership is very unlikely to produce hardship on this scale. As regards the TUC allegation that the complexity would lead to unjustified and vexatious litigation, the Government stated that there is no evidence to support that such mischievous litigation has been indulged in since the amendments came into force in April 2009. The Government added in this respect that a compensatory award for unlawful exclusion would only apply where the trade union refused to admit or re-admit the individual and where membership of the political party is not contrary to a rule or objective of the trade union, whereas in the Government's understanding, the rules or objectives of British trade unions often specify that membership of certain political parties, or xenophobic or racist behaviours associated with such parties, are incompatible with union membership. The Government concluded that these amendments do not breach the Convention and are necessary in a democratic society for the protection of the rights and freedom of others. The Committee asked the Government to reply to the further concerns of the TUC. In this regard, the Government indicates that: (1) it was aware of the points raised by the TUC when it introduced its amendments to section 174; and (2) it considers that the provision is consistent with Convention No. 87 and it is satisfied that it does not represent an undue interference in the internal regulation of union affairs. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates the point made in its reports for 2006–08 and 2008–10 that these issues are complex and the law must respect all the competing rights involved. The Committee notes that the TUC reiterates the arguments that it had presented in its previous communication. The Committee expects the Government and the TUC to provide any available information on the practical application of the amendments to section 174 of the TULRA.

Immunities in respect of civil liability for strikes and other industrial action (sections 223 and 224 of the TULRA). In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that according to the TUC, due to the decentralized nature of the industrial relations system, it was essential for workers to be able to take action against employers who are easily able to undermine union action by complex corporate structures, transferring work, or hiving off companies. The Committee generally raised the need to protect the right of workers to take industrial action in relation to matters which affect them even though, in certain cases, the direct employer may not be party to the dispute, and to participate in sympathy strikes provided the initial strike they are supporting is itself lawful. The Committee takes note of the Government indication that: (1) its position remains as set out in its report for 2006–08, that the rationale has not changed and that it therefore has no plans to change the law in this area; and (2) this issue forms part of a matter brought before the ECHR by the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers (RMT) and that the Court has yet to consider the case. The Committee recalls the previous concern it raised that the globalization of the economy and the delocalization of work centres may have a severe impact on the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities in a manner so as to defend effectively their members' interests should lawful industrial action be too restrictively defined. In these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to review sections 223 and 224 of the TULRA, in full consultation with the social partners, and to provide further information in its next report on the outcome of these consultations.

The Committee further recalls that it has been raising the need to ensure fuller protection of the right of workers to exercise legitimate industrial action in practice and considers that adequate safeguards and immunities from civil liability are necessary to ensure respect for this fundamental right. It further raised this issue when reviewing the comments made by the British Airline Pilots' Association (BALPA), the International Transport Federation (ITF) and Unite the Union. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its latest report that the TULRA provides a limit on the damages which trade unions can face when inducing workers to take unlawful industrial action. The Government considers that although the European Court of Justice (ECJ) has ruled on the position where EU legislation interacts with EU Member State domestic legislation, and although this has direct effect on the UK, there is no case law as yet to test whether the involvement of EU rights disapplies the limits in TULRA. The Government further indicates that as a result of concerns expressed about the Viking and Laval case law, the European Commission has published a draft Council Regulation "Monti II" that was being negotiated in the Council and the European Parliament. The Committee notes that the Government was awaiting the outcome of that process. It notes that withdrawal procedures on the proposed Monti II regulation started on 12 September 2012.

The Committee considers that a full review of the issues at hand with the social partners to determine possible action to address the concerns raised would provide this fundamental right the important attention it deserves at national level and requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the outcome of the discussions.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1950)

The Committee notes the observations of the Government on the 2010 comments of both the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Trades Union Congress (TUC). The Committee takes note of the comments submitted by the ITUC in communications dated 31 July and 4 August 2011, as well as those submitted by the TUC in a communication dated 29 August 2012. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Shipping sector. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide its observations on the TUC's allegation that contracts of employment had been found to expressly forbid individuals from contacting a recognized trade union so as to favour the conclusion of "workforce agreements" with workers' representatives rather than collective agreements with trade unions, thereby lowering the terms and conditions of employment in the shipping sector. The Committee noted the Government's indication that it enforces the issues relating to employment contracts in the shipping sector through the Maritime and Coastguard Agency (MCA), entitled to examine contracts of employment, and that it has acted to ensure that the MCA surveyors can readily identify clauses which prevent workers from exercising their rights under the Convention, including through training courses and the MCA Operations Advice Note No. OAN 378 which also addresses this issue. The Committee requested the Government to indicate the number of violations identified within the reporting period and to specify the sanctions applied against the persons responsible for such violations. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its latest report that the MCA has advised that, for this reporting period, no such violations have been identified. The Operations Advice Note No. OAN 378 continues to be current. In addition, the MCA advises that, once the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), comes into force in the United Kingdom, it will be supported by guidance which will specifically address the right to join a union. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Jersey

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that its previous comments referred to certain provisions of the Employment Relation Law (ERL) and its codes of practice concerning the exercise of the right to strike (right to secondary action and social and economic protests – see section 20(3) of the ERL and Code 2; picketing – Code 2; compulsory arbitration – sections 22 and 24 and Code 3; essential services – Code 2).

The Committee notes that in its report, the Government indicates that: (1) the insular authorities confirm that a review of the provisions of the ERL and its codes of practice continues to be included in the Minister for Social Security's programme of work; (2) the insular authorities regret that the review is still pending and hoped that progress would have been made; (3) the global economic downturn continues to have an impact in Jersey; (4) the delay is regretted; however the review will be undertaken as soon as resources allow it. The insular authorities are grateful for the previous comments of the Committee and confirmed that they will be given due account in the review; and (5) Jersey continues to have a very good industrial relations record; since the Employment (Jersey) Law 2003 came into force on 1 July 2005, there have been no claims to the Employment Tribunal of unfair dismissal or selection for redundancy on grounds of trade union membership.

In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any development concerning the review of the ERL and its codes of practice, as well as on the comments previously made by the workers' organization Unite about the conditions for protected industrial action and the application by the courts of sections 3 and 20(2) of the ERL and Code 3.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that according to sections 77B and 77C of the Employment (Amendment No. 4) (Jersey) Law, 2009, the Tribunal does not have the power to compensate an employee for financial losses such as arrears of pay for the period between the dismissal and the order for reinstatement or re-employment. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures in order to guarantee, in cases of anti-union dismissals: (1) the payment of arrears of pay, for the period between the dismissal and the order for reinstatement or re-employment; and (2) a compensation for the prejudice suffered. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, following public consultations in 2008, the Employment Forum, an independent consultation body including representatives of workers, employers and independent members, recommended to the Minister for Social Security that the Employment Tribunal should not have the power to compensate an employee for any financial losses, such as arrears of pay, for the period between the dismissal and the order for re-employment, until such a time as a review of the award-making powers of the Tribunal can be undertaken, which would include a review of how compensatory sums are calculated in other jurisdictions. Moreover, the Minister accepted the concern of the Employment Forum that, given that the equivalent financial compensation is not available to unfairly dismissed employees who are not seeking re-employment, the opportunity to receive additional compensation on these grounds may lead employees to seek re-employment as a matter of course, resulting in a reduced number of pre-hearing settlements. The Committee invites the Government to pursue dialogue with the social partners in order to ensure that in cases of anti-union dismissals, workers reinstated by the judicial authority will be granted full compensation for loss of pay.

Articles 2 and 4. Protection against acts of interference and promotion of collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that there were no specific provisions protecting against acts of interference in the Employment (Jersey) Law (EL) or the Employment Relation Law (ERL), but that it was the Minister's intention to introduce via the ERL a positive duty to prohibit employers from "buying out" employees' rights in respect of union activities by inducing employees not to join a workers' organization, or to relinquish membership of such an organization. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the authorities continue to prepare the relevant provision. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any development in this regard.

Moreover, the Committee had requested that Code 1 on the recognition of trade unions be amended in order to guarantee the right to collective bargaining of the most representative organization of the bargaining unit and to ensure that, where no union represents the majority of employees in a bargaining unit, collective bargaining rights are granted to all unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee notes the Government's indication that Code 1 will be reviewed in relation to the Convention as part of the proposed wider review of the ERL and codes of practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

The Committee notes that the authorities indicate that they regret that provisions to prohibit employer inducement and a review of the ERL and codes of practice are pending and that the global economic downturn continues to have an impact on Jersey; the review will be undertaken as soon as resources allow it. The Committee understands that this review would improve the protection against anti-union interference and collective bargaining rights.

The Committee expresses its hope, once again, that the Government will be in a position to indicate in its next report progress made with regard to reviewing the provisions of the ERL and the accompanying draft codes of practice so as to ensure that trade unions enjoy the full guarantee of the rights available under the Convention.

Uruguay

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1954)

Article 3 of the Convention. Occupation of the workplace and the right of the management of the enterprise to enter the workplace in the context of a labour dispute. The Committee notes that, by a communication of 31 August 2012, the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), the Chamber of Industries of Uruguay (CIU) and the National Chamber of Commerce and Services of Uruguay (CNCS) sent comments on the application of the Convention, in which they refer to the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2699 and state that: (1) contrary to that Committee's findings regarding occupation of the workplace and in flat contradiction of its request, the Government has in practice done nothing and existing standards do not comply with the above principles; (2) the observance in practice of certain principles cannot be secured by mediation and efforts to contain a dispute; (3) it is the Government's duty to protect the freedom of work, as mediation will not protect it; (4) the argument that because there has been recourse to justice the decisions of the supervisory bodies have been implemented does not withstand analysis, and the need to resort to justice in order to protect the rights of employers is a consequence of the Government's failure to comply either with the law or with the demands of the ILO; (5) article 57 of the National Constitution guarantees the right to strike but requires it to be regulated by law, which is what the employers seek; (6) the complainant organizations in the abovementioned case before the Committee on Freedom of Association endorse the IOE's position regarding the right to strike; (7) occupations of workplaces continue to occur and employers have to turn to the courts in the absence of any protection of their rights by the Government; in view of the Government's deliberate inaction and omission in complying with the supervisory bodies' decisions, the justice system is the employer's only refuge; (8) decision No. 184/12 of the Civil Appeals Court, handed down on 15 August 2012, referring to the occupation of an enterprise, ruled that: (a) section 6 of Decree No. 165/06 – to which objections were raised in the complaint before the Committee on Freedom of Association – on no account affords a means of obtaining the same results as are achieved through proceedings brought under the Constitution (amparo), let alone a suitable means or safeguarding the rights in question; (b) human rights recognized in articles 7, 28, 32 and 36 of the Constitution have been breached; (c) de facto situations (such as occupation of the workplace) are an impediment to the enjoyment of freedom, safety, work and property, the availability of personal documents and to freedom in work, agriculture, industry, commerce, occupation and any other lawful activity; (d) in this case, the human rights were violated because the Ministry of Labour and Social Security (MTSS) failed to act on learning of the occupation, and it is not for the MTSS to act as counsel or prosecutor of workers or employers, usurpers or owners, creditors or debtors; it must act spontaneously without having to be asked and without the need for victims or injured parties to demand action; and (9) the Court's decision is accurate in its judgement of the Ministry of Labour's conduct and shows that protection for employers is totally lacking in fact and in law, and the argument that the Government has never refused to comply with a court order carries no weight, is without merit, since failure to obey such an order would indicate an absence of democratic government.

The Committee notes that in its report the Government states that: (1) contrary to the submission of the IOE, the CIU and the CNCS, Uruguay has the lowest conflict rate of recent years according to independent records such as the conflict index compiled by the Labour Relations Programme of the Catholic University of Uruguay; (2) on the protection of freedom to work and the right of employers to enter occupied premises, it should be noted that, although the labour courts do not hear collective labour disputes, the civil courts – by reason of their residual jurisdiction – have authority to hear claims from non-occupying workers who, in general and in accordance with consistent precedent, have seen their claims satisfied once a court order to vacate the workplace takes effect; (3) the fact that non-strikers file claims to the vacation of premises indicates that there are some sound guarantees of the freedom to work, which has been protected through summary proceedings under the amparo procedure (the assumption of jurisdiction by the judicial authority entails the subsumption of claims to vacate workplaces by a body that is clearly independent and suited to the settlement of disputes about the law); (4) decisions have been handed down as a result of claims to the vacation of workplaces; (5) in order to safeguard the rights of non-strikers and the rights of employers, the National Labour Directorate, through the Collective Labour Disputes Unit, devotes thousands of working hours every year to collective bargaining in order to prevent and resolve disputes of this kind (it is a specialized body of mediators to which parties can apply voluntarily, seeking intervention by the executive in settling collective disputes; where the procedure has been exhausted and the dispute persists or takes the form of occupation or picketing, the parties may apply to the courts for amparo proceedings); (6) the judicial authorities have regularly found in favour of the right to work of non-strikers and the rights of employers, in very brief proceedings (three days in the lower courts), and handed down decisions, and in the event of non-compliance by the occupiers, the executive enforces the vacation order through the services of the Ministry of the Interior (police), and there have been no instances of failure to comply with such an order since this would constitute an offence against the Constitution and the principle of the separation of powers; (7) this demonstrates that the constitutional rights of the employers to which the latter refer are guaranteed by the State; according to the Government, the unstated objective of the employers' complaint is to have the right to strike regulated and to reiterate their assertion that "there is no right to strike in the texts of the ILO international Conventions"; (8) this is the very same argument they submitted at the last session of the International Labour Conference, which prompted the situation that arose in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards; (9) the Government fully shares the Committee's position that, in light of the scope and significance of the Convention, it is understood that, in accordance with Articles 3 and 10 of the Convention, industrial action is fully recognized by international standards; (10) the Government reiterates its unqualified respect for human rights, and the employers start off from a wrong premise in that strikes, as a right, are recognized in many international instruments as a human right; (11) the national legislation recognizes the right to strike through the National Constitution (article 57), a fact that the employers appear to overlook in adopting a position that is clearly unconstitutional, and in view of the nature of this right (unquestionably a human right) and its enshrinement in the National Constitution, the State declines to discuss the matter; (12) the employers' theoretical conceptualization is plainly regressive and disregards findings of the Committee on Freedom of Association; what is more, the Committee on Freedom of Association itself acknowledges that the occupation of enterprises or workplaces is a way or form of exercising the right to strike; (13) the advisers of the employers' associations resort to "second-hand" quotations used out of context and their findings about occupation are quite alien to the concept traditionally and customarily adopted by the Committee on Freedom of Association, which regards occupation as a legitimate practice as long as it is peaceful; and (14) the National Constitution protects the right to freedom of work and the right to exercise freedom of enterprise (articles 7, 10, 36 and 53), the right to property (articles 7 and 32), the right to equality before the law (article 8), the right to certainty in law and the right to freedom of movement (article 7).

The Committee notes all this information and recalls that, on analysing the application of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) by Uruguay, it noted that, in the context of an ILO mission that visited the country in August 2011, a tripartite agreement was concluded between the MTSS and representatives of the workers (Inter-Trade Union Assembly – Workers’ National Convention (PIT–CNT)) and of the employers (the CNCS and the CIU), thanks to which a new phase was opened in the dialogue on comments made by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2699, the Committee and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards. The Committee also notes that, further to this agreement, tripartite meetings are being held on these matters.

The Committee recalls that, in examining Case No. 2699, the Committee on Freedom of Association considered that exercise of the right to strike and the occupation of work premises should respect the right to work of non-strikers, and the right of the management of the enterprise to enter the premises, and asked the Government to secure observance of these principles in legal provisions adopted and in practice.

The Committee also recalls that on numerous occasions it has emphasized that “in so far as the strike remains peaceful, strike pickets and workplace occupations should be allowed. Restrictions on strike pickets and workplace occupations can be accepted only where the action ceases to be peaceful. It is, however, necessary in all cases to guarantee respect for the freedom to work of non-striking workers and the right of the management to enter the premises” (see General Survey on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work in light of the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization, 2012, paragraph 149). In these circumstances, the Committee expresses the firm hope that, in the context of the tripartite dialogue under way, the necessary measures will be taken to ensure that, taking into account the comments of the Committee on Freedom of Association and this Committee, observance of this principle is fully guaranteed in law and in practice and in consultation with the most representative organizations of workers and employers. The Committee hopes that during the ongoing consultation process, the decisions of the national tribunals will be taken into consideration.

The Committee notes the Government’s reply to the observations dated 4 August 2011 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), alleging acts of anti-union discrimination and obstacles to collective bargaining. The Committee notes in particular the Government’s statement that: (1) the occasional disputes relating to allegations of obstacles to collective bargaining were settled through collective agreements which strengthened social dialogue and maintained the validity of the agreements on minimum wages which had been concluded in the wages councils; and (2) as regards one of the allegations concerning anti-union discrimination, the administrative authority is already taking action and the file is now with the Legal Division for examination and, as regards the allegations relating to the UPM cellulose plant, the Government indicates that to be able to make any response it needs to know the name of the subcontracting company where the anti-union acts are alleged to have occurred. Finally, the Committee notes the ITUC comments dated 31 July 2012 concerning obstacles to collective bargaining and non-compliance with collective agreements in the health sector. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in this respect.

The Committee also notes the comments from the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), the Chamber of Industry of Uruguay (CIU) and the National Chamber of Commerce and Services of Uruguay (CNCS), mainly relating to Act No. 18566 of September 2009 concerning collective bargaining. The employers’ organizations recall in particular that the Committee on Freedom of Association asked the Government to take steps, in consultation with the most representative workers’ and employers’ organizations, to amend the aforementioned Act in order to implement the conclusions formulated and ensure full conformity with the principles of collective bargaining and the Conventions ratified by Uruguay in this field. They add that: (1) consultation of the organizations cannot be an obstacle to compliance with international labour standards since this would make it easier for a government to avoid having to take action in response to observations by the supervisory bodies; (2) in reply to draft amendments to the Act proposed by the Government, the employers submitted another draft which expresses the content of the seven points covered by the observations of the supervisory bodies; (3) they observe with concern that the position adopted by a single sector cannot act as a veto on the strict fulfilment of the obligations assumed by the Government as a result of ratifying an international labour Convention, and affirm that the holding of consultations with a view to amending the Act requires achieving a consensus among the parties but can never entail sine die (indefinite) negotiations and, if agreement proves impossible, the Government must comply with the instructions of the ILO; (4) the time that has passed without achieving any progress cannot act as legitimation for violation of a Convention, and negotiations cannot be either fruitless or endless; agreements are signed in order to be fulfilled, and the same applies to the recommendations of the supervisory bodies; (5) the principles of the ILO must be applied immediately and any delay in bringing a law into line with an international Convention owing to the search for consensus cannot be allowed to turn into legitimation with regard to fulfilling them, and any other achievements that a government may cite in the sphere of macroeconomic policy or the exercise of full democracy are worthless if the price to be paid for them is the violation of international Conventions; and (6) the Government has had many possibilities throughout this period for amending the Act so as to bring it into conformity as directed by the supervisory bodies but, at its own discretion and in an arbitrary manner, it has decided not to do so; it is the Government’s responsibility to comply with the instructions of the ILO. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in reply to these matters.

Article 4 of the Convention. Collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption of Act No. 18566 of September 2009 concerning collective bargaining, and the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) in Case No. 2699, which raised problems of conformity of the abovementioned Act with the Convention (see 356th Report, paragraph 1389). These were referred to in the following conclusions:

- I. With respect to the exchange of information necessary to allow the normal conduct of the process of collective bargaining and the fact that in the case of confidential information, its communication carries the implicit obligation of secrecy, and breach thereof would give rise to civil liability of those who are in breach (section 4), the CFA noted that, according to the complainant organizations, this provision did not guarantee penalties for any excesses on the part of trade union representatives, and considers that all the parties to the negotiation, whether or not they have legal personality, must be liable for any breaches of the right to secrecy of the information which they receive in the framework of collective bargaining. The CFA requests the Government to ensure that this principle is respected.
- II. As regards the composition of the Higher Tripartite Council (section 8), the CFA considers account could be taken of an equal number of members for each of the three sectors, and also the appointment of an independent chairperson, preferably nominated jointly by the workers' and employers' organizations, who could break the deadlock in the event of a vote. The CFA requests the Government to hold discussions with the social partners on the modification of the law so as to arrive at a negotiated solution to the number of members of the Council.
- III. With respect to the powers of the Higher Tripartite Council, particularly the power to consider and decide on questions related to the tripartite and bipartite bargaining levels (section 10(d)), the CFA has emphasized on many occasions that "the determination of the bargaining level is essentially a matter to be left to the discretion of the parties". The CFA requests the Government to take the necessary measures including the amendment of existing legislation to ensure that the bargaining level is established by the parties and is not subject to voting in a tripartite body.
- IV. As regards the possibility of wages councils establishing conditions of work for each case to be agreed by the employers' and workers' delegates in the respective wage group (section 12), the CFA recalls, firstly, that under ILO standards, the fixing of minimum wages may be subject to decisions by tripartite bodies. On the other hand, recalling that it is up to the legislative authority to determine the legal minimum standards for conditions of work and that Article 4 of the Convention seeks to promote bipartite bargaining to fix conditions of work, the CFA hopes that in application of those principles, any collective agreement on fixing of conditions of employment will be the result of an agreement between the parties, as the section in question appears to envisage.
The Committee noted in this connection the Government's statement in its report that the competence of the wages councils was aligned with the provisions of section 83 of Act No. 16002 of 25 November 1988, covering conditions of work, but extended to the latter only when there was agreement between the social partners, which meant that a tripartite body may not vote on matters pertaining to conditions of work, but does have a vote when it comes to determining minimum wages by category. (The Committee understands that these matters have been cleared up between the parties.)
- V. With respect to the subject of bipartite collective bargaining and in particular the fact that, in company collective bargaining where there is no workers' organization, bargaining authorities should pass to the representative higher-level organization (section 14, last sentence), the CFA observes that the complainant employers' organizations consider that the absence of a trade union does not mean the absence of collective relations in the company. The CFA considers, on the one hand, that bargaining with the most representative higher-level trade union organization should only take place if it has a number of members in the company in accordance with the national legislation. The CFA recalls, on the other hand, that the Collective Agreements Recommendation, 1951 (No. 91), gives pre-eminence to workers' organizations as one of the parties to collective bargaining, and refers to representatives of non-organized workers only in the case of absence of such organizations. In these circumstances, the CFA requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that future legislation takes these principles fully into account.
- VI. As regards the effects of the sectoral collective agreement (which is binding once it has been registered and published by the Executive Power (section 16)), the CFA requests the Government to ensure that the process of registration and publication of the collective agreement only involves checks on compliance with the legal minima and questions of form.
- VII. As regards the duration of collective agreements and, in particular, the maintenance in force of all the clauses of the agreement which have expired until a new agreement replaces it, unless the parties have agreed otherwise (section 17, second paragraph), the CFA recalls that the duration of collective agreements is primarily a matter for the parties involved, but if government action is being considered, any legislation should reflect tripartite agreement. In these circumstances, taking into account that the complainant organizations have expressed disagreement with the whole idea of automatic continuing effect of collective agreements, the CFA invites the Government to hold discussions with the social partners on amendments to the legislation in order to find a solution acceptable to both parties.

The Committee recalled in its previous observation that, in the framework of the ILO's mission to the country in August 2011, a tripartite agreement was drawn up between the Ministry of Labour and Social Security and representatives of the workers' sector (Inter-Union Assembly of Workers–Workers' National Convention (PIT–CNT)) and the employers' sector (National Chamber of Commerce and Services of Uruguay and Chamber of Industry of Uruguay), thereby setting in motion a new dialogue on the comments made by the Committee on Freedom of Association, the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that: (1) maintaining its practice of respecting the decisions of the supervisory bodies, it has worked tirelessly for more than two years to reach a consensual solution with the occupational sectors in relation to the comments made on various aspects of Act No. 18566; (2) countless formal and informal meetings were held to discuss different conciliation techniques and an ILO mission was received; (3) in view of the fruitless efforts made and the ongoing refusal to find a solution based on social dialogue, the Government considers that it has been patient and proactive enough in this situation, exhausting all the mechanisms at its disposal to reach an agreement; (4) hence, aware of its obligations and responsibilities, it considers the process of prior consultation of the social partners to be concluded and proposes to send a Bill for consideration by the National Parliament to seek a definitive solution to this dispute; and (5) this information and the Bill in question were sent to the social partners in communications dated 8 November 2012. The Committee notes with interest the decision to bring a Bill before Parliament relating to the pending issues with a view to overcoming the problems identified and welcomes the indication that the Bill will be submitted to Parliament in November.

The Committee expresses the hope that the new Act to be adopted will take full account of the aforementioned principles and the comments previously made by the Committee. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on all further developments in this regard.

Uzbekistan

Article 4 of the Convention. Collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend sections 21(1), 23(1), 31, 35, 36, 48, 49 and 59 of the Labour Code so as to ensure that the legislation makes it clear that, only in the absence of trade unions at the enterprise, the branch or the territory, can the authorization to bargain collectively be conferred on other representative bodies elected by workers. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government indicates that the responsible Ministry has prepared a draft law to amend the Labour Code with a view to revising several provisions concerning forced labour, foreign enterprises and guarantees provided to certain categories of workers, and to add new provisions concerning employment. The Committee understands that the draft law does not foresee to amend the abovementioned provisions regulating collective bargaining. The Committee once again recalls that direct negotiation between the undertaking and its employees, bypassing sufficiently representative organizations where these exist, might be detrimental to the principle that negotiation between employers and organizations of workers should be encouraged and promoted. It therefore once again requests the Government to amend the abovementioned sections so as to ensure that it is clear that only in the event where there are no trade unions at the enterprise, the branch or the territory, can an authorization to bargain collectively be conferred on other representative bodies. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide the relevant legislative texts establishing the procedure for settlement of collective labour disputes, as referred to in sections 33 and 281 of the Labour Code. The Committee notes the Government's indication that collective labour disputes concerning the application of the legislation in force and of existing collective agreements are examined by courts upon request by one of the parties. The Government further indicates that relevant ministries and non-governmental organizations are currently working on a draft law which would regulate collective labour disputes, and that the views of labour law experts and the experience of certain other countries will be taken into account in this process. The Committee recalls that a distinction has to be made between rights disputes, which concern the application or the interpretation of a collective agreement (the settlement of such disputes may be referred to an independent authority), and interest disputes, which relate to the establishment of a collective agreement or to the modification, through collective bargaining, of wages and other conditions of work contained in an existing collective agreement. With regard to the latter type of disputes, the Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration, including through the judicial procedure, in the case that the parties have not reached agreement, is generally contrary to the principles of collective bargaining. In the Committee's opinion, compulsory arbitration is only acceptable in certain specific circumstances, namely: (i) in essential services in the strict sense of the term, that is those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population; (ii) in the case of disputes in the public service involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State; (iii) when, after protracted and fruitless negotiations, it becomes obvious that the deadlock will not be broken without some initiative by the authorities; or (iv) in the event of an acute national crisis. However, arbitration accepted by both parties (voluntary) is always legitimate. In all cases, the Committee considers that, before imposing arbitration, it is highly advisable that the parties be given every opportunity to bargain collectively, during a sufficient period, with the help of independent mediation. The Committee hopes that the legislation regulating the settlement of collective labour disputes and, in particular, interest disputes, will soon be adopted and that it will reflect the principles above. It requests the Government to provide information on all progress achieved in this respect, including a copy of the draft law or the text of the legislation, if adopted before the next reporting cycle. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

Articles 5 and 6. Collective bargaining in the public sector. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide detailed information on trade union and collective bargaining rights of public servants and to list the categories of workers excluded from the application of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, according to the Federation of Trade Unions of Uzbekistan, sectoral collective agreements cover over 30 ministries and government bodies. Trade unions can be established and collective agreements concluded with regard to employees of both chambers of Parliament, the Cabinet of Ministers and local bodies of executive power. The Government further indicates that the list of categories of public servants who do not enjoy the right to establish trade unions and bargain collectively includes certified personnel of the Ministry of Defence, the Ministry of Internal Affairs, Ministry of Emergency Situations, Service of National Safety and Security, State Customs Committee and State Committee on Protection of State Borders. The Committee takes note of this information.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1982)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), of 31 July 2012, the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV), of 29 August 2011 and 31 August 2012, and of the Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Production of Venezuela (FEDECAMARAS), of 28 August and 12 September 2011, and of FEDECAMARAS and the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) dated 30 and 31 August 2012. The Committee also notes the comments of the Independent Trade Union Alliance (ASI), dated 14 August 2012. The Committee further notes the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association on the cases presented by national and international organizations of workers (Cases Nos 2763 and 2827) and of employers (Case No. 2254), and observes that three more cases are under examination (Cases Nos 2917, 2955 and 2968). The Committee observes that the Committee on Freedom of Association included Case No. 2254 in the category of serious and urgent cases which it especially draws to the attention of the Governing Body of the ILO. The Committee notes the discussion held in the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference in June 2010 on the application of the Convention in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela. The Committee observes that the Conference Committee requested the Government to accept high-level technical assistance from the International Labour Standards Department. The Committee notes that the Government accepted a "tripartite" high-level mission which would examine all the matters pending before the Governing Body in relation to Case No. 2254, as well as all matters relating to technical cooperation. In its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to provide its observations on the communication of the Single National Union of Public Employees of the Venezuelan Corporation of Guyana (SUNEP-CVG) and the ASI dated 10 November 2009. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the most recent communications of the ITUC, ASI and FEDECAMARAS. In its reply, the Government points out that certain of the matters raised, as well as those raised by FEDECAMARAS and the IOE, have been submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association and it refers to the replies that it sent to that Committee.

Trade union rights and civil liberties

The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it examined issues related to the murder of trade union leaders and members in the construction and petroleum sectors since 2007. According to the CTV, these murders amounted to hundreds of workers and trade union leaders in the construction sector. The ASI put the figure of 29 murders during the recent period. The Government referred to the murder of 13 trade union members and two workers and provided information on the proceedings and detention of the presumed culprits. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the outcome of the labour round-table meeting and of the special commission which had been established.

At the request of the Government, the Committee invited the ITUC and the ASI to provide further details on the cases of murders of trade unionists to which they referred (names, trade union functions, date of the murder, criminal complaints made, etc.); the organizations have not provided this information. In its communication of 14 August 2012, the ASI alleges that an independent NGO places the figure for anti-union murders as a result of violence and hired killers at over 200 workers (trade union leaders and members). According to the ASI, the names are "at hand; it is only necessary to ask the workers and the victims' families". It adds that in light of these proven crimes, the authorities have adopted mediatic measures without follow-up (such as a tripartite labour round-table meeting in 2009, which met on six occasions, and round-table meetings in the States with the highest incidence of criminality). In July 2010, the Office of the Prosecutor General appointed a national prosecutor with responsibility for all murders related to the trade union movement, but up to now the country has not been informed of the results of these investigations.

The Committee notes the Government's statements in reply to the request for information on the outcome of the labour round-table meeting on anti-union violence in the construction sector and the Special Commission with the Ministry of Internal Relations and Justice, with a view to following-up cases of violence. The Government indicates that the labour meeting on anti-union violence in the construction sector and the Special Commission to follow-up cases of labour violence, chaired by the People's Ministry for Internal Relations and Justice engaged in an intense day's work in the month of November 2011, and reached the following conclusions:

- Identification of the factors which influenced violence in the construction sector, on which the following conclusions were agreed:
 - (a) in view of the encouragement to build housing and the plans for infrastructure development, the number of men and women workers in the construction sector is above 1,200,000, representing almost 10 per cent of the economically active population in the country;
 - (b) the income of men and women workers in the construction sector has increased significantly as a result of the collective agreements concluded in recent years, which have been extended to apply to all men and women workers in construction, even where the work commences after the collective agreement has been concluded;
 - (c) due to the important mass of workers, their purchasing power and the number of worksites throughout the country, the sector has been liable to criminal activity by certain groups, and
 - (d) the facility of access to the worksites has allowed the presence of persons who are not connected with the work and who circulate among the men and women workers. These persons, when they are approached by the guards of the construction companies, identify themselves as trade unionists, even though they do not belong to any of the trade union structures.
- Investigations into the deaths as a result of criminal action in the construction sector:
 - (a) in most cases of murders attributed to anti-union violence, it was not possible to establish an employment relationship with any enterprise in the construction sector, nor were they identified as belonging to any trade union structures active in the sector;
 - (b) when consulted, the family members indicate that the victim was a "trade union member in the construction sector". It was possible to confirm, through witnesses, that these individuals in practice were in construction worksites, but did not engage in any trade union activities;
 - (c) less than 5 per cent of the cases of deaths denounced as being due to anti-union violence relate to members of any trade union organization, or are the result of action by trade unions, for which reason the term "trade union violence" is not correct;
 - (d) in cases in which it was found that the victim was indeed a construction worker or a trade union leader, it was found that the act of violence was not related in any way to trade union activities; and
 - (e) it was found that in certain cases trade unions were registered which served as a screen for activities by groups unrelated to trade unions.
- Based on the conclusions, agreement was reached on the following points: (a) the need to supervise and monitor entry to construction works to prevent access by unidentified individuals; (b) trade unions need to provide cards for all the members of the union; (c) trade union delegates should be elected from workers engaged in the work so that their presence is guaranteed; (d) trade unions should indicate the members of the union who are authorized to cover a particular worksite so as to ensure security of access; (e) the access of arms to construction sites should be prevented and patrols established on such sites; (f) it should be verified whether those promoting trade unions for the construction industry work in any construction enterprises; (g) information in the press identifying the victims of fatal crimes as trade unionists in the construction sector should be denied when they do not belong to a union; and (h) a follow-up commission should be created for cases of violence in the construction sector. The follow-up commission will meet on the first Monday of each month and will be composed of: (1) a representative of the People's Ministry for Internal Relations and Justice; (2) a representative of the Office of the Attorney-General; (3) a representative of the People's Ministry for Labour and Social Security; (4) a representative of the Office of the Ombudsman; (5) a representative of the Bolivarian National Guard; (6) a representative of the Bolivarian Intelligence Service; (7) a representative of each of the trade union federations (FUNBCAC and FENATC); and (8) a representative of the Bolivarian Chamber of Construction.

With regard to the information requested by the Committee on all cases of violence against trade union leaders and members in the country, investigations and criminal proceedings against those responsible, detention orders and the sentences imposed, the Government indicates that there are no cases of anti-union violence. The cases which have been referred to the ILO relate to victims of criminal acts resulting from common delinquency, and the appropriate measures were taken. The Government adds that in cases in which the ILO has knowledge of anti-union violence in the country, it is requested to provide the following data so that appropriate measures can be taken: the identification of the alleged victim of anti-union violence; the trade union of which the victim was a member; and the allegations on the basis of which it is identified as a case of anti-union violence.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the conclusions of a high-level tripartite labour meeting held in 2011 in the construction sector and the establishment of a follow-up commission. Although it notes that, according to the Government, fewer than 5 per cent of the victims were members of trade unions, and that in such cases it was found by the labour meeting that the act of violence was not related to trade union activity, the Committee observes that, in response to its request for the establishment of a national tripartite committee on situations of violence against trade unionists, the Government indicates that commissions exist in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela for all issues on which it is necessary to hold discussions with workers, and that a commission already exists to review situations of violence in the construction sector, which concluded that these situations were not cases of trade union violence. The Government raises the question of which proven cases of violence and violation of fundamental rights would merit a tripartite commission. The Government demands a firm enumeration with specific data on the cases so that it can provide the respective answers.

Observing that the Government focuses its reply basically on 2011 information concerning the labour round-table meeting of 2011, and taking into account the gravity of the situation and the allegations by the trade union confederations that the murders of many trade union leaders and members were related to trade union activities, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on all cases of anti-union violence in the country, on the investigations and criminal proceedings against those responsible, the detention orders issued and the sentences imposed. It requests the trade union organizations to provide, and to forward to the Government, the names of the trade unionists who were murdered and as many details as possible on the circumstances of their deaths, including any evidence of their anti-union nature. As the violence affecting trade unionists occurs in various States, the Committee requests the Government to establish a national tripartite committee on situations of violence and to provide information on the findings of the investigations carried out by the national prosecutor appointed, according to the ASI, to investigate all cases of violence against trade union leaders and members. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the acts of violence against trade unionists denounced in the communication of the CTV dated 31 August 2012.

With reference to the acts of violence against the headquarters of FEDECAMARAS in February 2008 and the abduction and attack with firearms of four leaders of FEDECAMARAS on 27 October 2010 (Albis Muñoz, Noel Álvarez, Luis Villegas and Ernesto Villasmil), which resulted in the injuries from several bullets to the leader Albis Muñoz, the Committee recalls the Government's indication that the judicial authorities had detained two persons charged with the violence against the headquarters of FEDECAMARAS in 2008, and that the two presumed perpetrators and three other persons had been identified (members of a criminal gang engaged in kidnapping). The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the cases concerning the four leaders of FEDECAMARAS, including Ms Albis Muñoz, and the attack against the headquarters of FEDECAMARAS, have not been concluded. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in the criminal proceedings and firmly hopes that those responsible for these crimes will be punished severely in the near future. The Committee notes with concern the allegations of FEDECAMARAS concerning threats, detention and harassment of employer leaders, for example by numerous state inspection bodies, and the restrictions on the freedom of expression of employers and on independent media, and the raids on private property.

Legislative matters

Provision of lists of trade union members to the Ministry of Labour. With reference to the Committee's conclusion that the legal obligation for trade unions to provide the list of their members to the Ministry of Labour must be accompanied by sufficient guarantees of confidentiality, the Government indicates that in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela the dues paid by trade union members are deducted from wages directly by the enterprise, in a requirement that has been established by law since 1936. The lists of members that have to be provided by trade unions to the People's Ministry of Labour and Social Security are based on the lists provided by enterprises for the deduction of union dues. Trade unions are therefore informed by employers, both public and private, who their dues-paying members are, and it is of no interest to employers to be informed by the People's Ministry of Labour and Social Security of the names of trade union members, when this information is already contained in their records. The Government adds that the information provided to the People's Ministry of Labour and Social Security concerning the names of members once a year is for statistical purposes and is used to review trade union representativeness, generally for the purposes of collective bargaining when it is challenged by another union. It is a requirement that has never been challenged by trade unions, and no cases are known in which the confidentiality of the data has been at issue. When the legislation was amended by a tripartite committee in 1997, which benefited from ILO advice, this provision was not amended in any way. Since 2001 and up to the present, the Government adds that when compulsory membership of unions was prohibited and the union map of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela was transformed, with the emergence of over 80 per cent of the trade unions that are currently active, certain trade unions refused to comply with the requirement because the number of their members had fallen considerably, and even below the minimum number required for them to operate. Nevertheless, all the existing data that have been provided by unions on their members since 1936 are kept in the strictest confidentiality, and this information has never been used for purposes of discrimination or prejudice against trade unions or their members.

The Committee observes that the ITUC and other trade unions criticize the requirement to provide the authorities with a list of trade union members. The Committee considers that, except in cases where the members decide voluntarily to provide their data for the purposes of the deduction of their trade union dues, the trade union membership of workers should not be communicated to either the employer or the authorities. The Committee observes that the new Basic Labour Act maintains the lack of confidentiality of membership, and it addresses this issue below.

National Electoral Council

The Committee has criticized the role of the National Electoral Council (CNE) (which is not a judicial body) in relation to trade union elections, and in its previous observation requested the Government to take measures to ensure that the standards in force provide that appeals relating to trade union elections are determined by the judicial authorities, and do not require, as requested by one of the trade union organizations which has made comments, the publication in the Gaceta Electoral of the results of trade union elections as a requirement for their recognition, nor the provision of the election schedule to the CNE. The Committee also recalls that trade union organizations were required to amend their statutes when the new Constitution of the Republic was adopted so as to recognize the intervention of the CNE in their elections. The Committee requested the Government to indicate whether the trade unions which at that time had to change their statutes to accept the participation of the CNE in the holding of their elections are required to submit to the CNE.

In this respect, the Government states that the democratic election of trade union officers is a constitutional right of the members of all trade unions. The only requirement upon trade unions is to hold their elections in accordance with their statutes, which have to guarantee that the process for the election of the executive board of the organization is held by direct, universal and secret ballot of the members, although this basic requirement of trade union democracy was not respected for over 40 years. Based on an agreement for the defence of democracy, known as the Pacto de Punto Fijo, signed in 1959 by the political parties, under the heading of combating communism, measures were established to “safeguard democracy”, which in practice meant that all trade union elections were suspended. The members of the executive boards of trade unions were selected in agreement with the political parties and, with a view to legitimizing them, it was announced that elections had been held and that a single list had been presented. The Government adds that, during the process of drawing up the Constitution of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, all the workers’ assemblies agreed that the Constitution should establish the requirement to hold trade union elections and that the electoral authority, which is one of the five authorities (together with the executive authority, the legislative authority, the judicial authority and the moral authority, which make up the Venezuelan State), should supervise and guarantee the democratic rights of the members of trade unions. The Government adds that the CNE, a body of the electoral authority, entrusted with ensuring the democratic right of all Venezuelans to elect and to be elected, is entrusted with the functions of ensuring compliance with democratic guarantees in electoral processes. These rights include: (1) the publicity given to elections, as all members are entitled to be aware of the holding of an election in their union, for which reason the convocation of the election has to be posted on trade union notice boards, in workplaces and published in the Gaceta Electoral, which is a weekly publication announcing all elections in the country; accordingly, trade unions have to notify the convocation of an election so that it can be published in the Gaceta Electoral as a guarantee that publicity is given to elections; (2) clear rules for the electoral process; all statutes have to indicate the procedures that make up the election process: of the unions registered prior to 1999, 96 per cent did not establish their electoral process in their statutes; there is no requirement to submit the electoral rules to the CNE, but the statutes have to contain clear rules on the holding of elections; (3) the electoral process has to be planned, organized and directed by the trade union electoral commission, which is an internal body of the union; the CNE can only participate at the request of the parties, or of the trade union electoral commission, where elements exist which may affect the proper conduct of the electoral process; (4) appeals against actions, acts or omissions which affect the rights of members have to receive a rapid and direct response; all challenges have to be lodged with the trade union electoral commission, which is required to respond within three days; only where there is no response, or the challengers are not satisfied with the response, can they have recourse to the CNE, which is the administrative body of the electoral authority, which is the only authority constitutionally empowered to decide electoral disputes; when the administrative channels have been exhausted, challenges can be referred to the judicial courts that are competent for electoral matters, and any appeal through the courts for the protection of constitutional rights and guarantees has to have exhausted the available administrative channels; and (5) it is the responsibility of the trade union electoral commission to proclaim the election of the executive board and to notify the CNE so that the results of the election can be published in the Gaceta Electoral, so as to guarantee that those concerned can make any necessary appeals; publication in the Gaceta Electoral occurs within 15 days of notification of the information.

The Government indicates that this explanation has been given to the ILO and that it is prepared to continue providing explanations carefully to clarify the lack of knowledge of the rights and guarantees set forth in the Constitution of the Republic for all Venezuelan citizens, including the members of trade union organizations. Nevertheless, the reiteration of the request leads the Government to wonder whether in reality there is a lack of knowledge by the ILO concerning the organization of the Venezuela State, as set out in a Constitution approved by popular referendum, which establishes a division between five authorities that are totally independent of each other: the executive, legislative, electoral, judicial and moral authorities, each with specific areas of competence, and that the authority competent in electoral matters, as its name indicates, is the electoral authority. Moreover, if the members of the electoral authority and those of the judicial authority are appointed in the same manner and enjoy the same independence in their functions, why does the ILO wish to transfer the competence that the Constitution has entrusted to one of the authorities to another, which does not have such competence? When the ILO calls for the convocation of elections not to be published in the Gaceta Electoral, does it want citizens not to be informed of the existence of an election in a trade union and to return to the period when trade union elections were conducted without the knowledge of their members? When it is indicated that an attempt is being made to impose electoral rules on a trade union, has a prior verification been carried out whether the statutes or rules of the complainant trade union set out its own electoral rules? May the legislation not require a trade union to set out in its statutes the rules governing the electoral process as a guarantee of the democratic rights of its members without any interference by the electoral body in the formulation of its rules? Does the ILO not want the results of elections to be notified to members so that they can make any necessary appeals?

The Committee wishes to reiterate that trade unions elections are an internal matter for trade unions in which the authorities should not interfere and that trade unions have reported cases of interference by the CNE, which have been confirmed by the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee of Experts observes that the ITUC and other trade unions continue to criticize the role of the CNE in trade union affairs. The Committee reiterates its previous conclusions and examines below the provisions of the new Basic Labour Act respecting trade union elections.

Finally, the Committee notes the ITUC's allegation that the CNE adopted a decision to invalidate and set aside legitimate bodies of the CTV by declaring invalid the V Congress of the CTV, held in March 2011.

The Government indicates in general terms that there is no intervention in trade union elections and that there is no type of interference. While recalling that it has always rejected the role of the CNE in trade union elections, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the specific reasons why the CNE declared the CTV Congress invalid, as alleged by the ITUC, as the Government's comments are confined to indicating in general terms that the CNE does not intervene in trade union elections and to reproducing the text of the legal provisions respecting trade union elections.

Other legislative issues

The Committee notes the Government's indications concerning the enactment of the Basic Act on labour and male and female workers (LOTTT) of April 2012. The Committee welcomes the fact that the new Act takes into account a number of the observations made during the technical assistance provided by the ILO and as requested by the Committee. For example, foreign nationals are no longer required to be resident for ten years to hold trade union office, the functions of the CNE are limited in relation to the previous situation, and the number of workers required to establish a union is reduced.

However, the Committee notes that the minimum number of employers (ten) required to establish an employers' organization (section 380) has not been reduced, the enumeration of the objectives of trade unions and employers' organizations continues to be too extensive (sections 367 and 368), including for example the objectives according to which employers' organizations need to guarantee the production and distribution of goods and services at the correct price in accordance with the law, undertaking studies on the characteristics of the respective industrial branch, providing reports as requested by the authorities in conformity with the law, conducting campaigns to combat corruption actively, etc.

The Committee observes that the new Act provides, as indicated above, that the logistical support of the CNE for the organization of elections is only provided at the request of the trade union executive boards. Nevertheless, the Committee notes that the CNE (which is not a judicial body) continues to be competent to examine any complaints which may be made by members. Furthermore, in breach of the principle of trade union independence, the text of the Act also maintains the principle that delays in the electoral process (including when complaints are lodged with the CNE) prevent the trade unions concerned from engaging in collective bargaining. The Act also imposes a system of ballots which includes the election of the executive board by single vote and proportional representation (section 403), while the Act continues to require trade unions to provide to the authorities the complete list of their members, and to supply the competent officials with the information that they request on their statutory obligations (section 388). The Act also interferes in numerous matters that should be regulated by union statutes, for example, by indicating that the purpose of collective bargaining is to achieve the objectives of the State (section 43), the eligibility of trade union leaders is subject to them having called trade union elections within the time limits when they were leaders of other organizations (387), and a referendum is required to be held to revoke those holding trade union office (section 410).

The Committee further notes that, in the event of a strike, it is the competence of the People's Minister responsible for Labour (and not the judicial authorities or an independent body, particularly in the case of strikes in public enterprises or institutions) to determine the areas or activities which cannot be paralyzed during the strike on the grounds that they would affect the production of goods or essential services, the stoppage of which would harm the population (section 484). The Committee notes the Government's statement that referring this to the judicial authorities would delay the right to strike. The Committee emphasizes that in the public sector the administrative authorities are an interested party in relation to the determination of minimum services. Furthermore, the system for the appointment of the members of arbitration boards in the event of strikes in essential services does not guarantee the confidence of the parties in the system since, where agreement is not reached by the parties, they are appointed by the labour inspector (section 494). The Act also recognizes workers' councils, although their functions are not determined clearly, even though it is provided in the Act that they may not encroach upon the functions of trade unions. The Committee requests the Government to provide additional information on this subject.

The Committee also recalls that, with regard to the right to strike and other trade union rights, it referred previously to certain legislation which, according to the trade union organizations, criminalized the right to demonstrate and to strike and hindered trade union rights in practice: sections 357 and 360 of the Penal Code respecting conduct jeopardizing security in means of transport and the media, sections 358 and 359 of the Penal Code (obstacles and damage to public thoroughfares and means of transport), and the Basic Act on national security and defence, the Act to defend the access of individuals to goods and services, the Special Act on the defence of the people against hoarding, speculation and boycotts and any conduct affecting the consumption of food or products subject to price controls. The trade unions also alleged the very broad use for anti-union purposes of cautionary and judicial measures, such as the regular requirement to appear before the judicial authorities. The Committee notes the Government's indications that there are no ambiguous legal provisions limiting the right to strike and its emphasis that the right to strike is a constitutional right, protected by the Act respecting the protection of constitutional rights and safeguards which cannot be reduced by any laws or regulations. The Government asks whether the ILO knows of any ambiguous penal provision which has limited the right to strike of a trade union. If that is the case, the Government asks for indications to be provided concerning the legal provision and those whose right to strike was limited by such a provision. The Government states that the right to demonstrate and freedom of expression are guaranteed by the Constitution of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela and that there is not one single case of persons taken to court or required to appear before the civil authorities for having participated in a peaceful demonstration or expressed any opinion. The Government calls on the ILO to indicate precisely the cases of which it has knowledge of persons who have been referred to the authorities for having participated in a peaceful demonstration or for expressing any opinion. With regard to the provisions of the Venezuela Penal Code, and specifically sections 357, 358 and 360, the Government indicates that it is important to note that these provisions relate to illicit and unlawful conduct undermining security in the means of transport and communication of the Venezuelan population, thereby complying with the obligation of the State to protect the guarantees and rights of the citizens of the country. The Government therefore adds that in no event do these provisions refer to the imposition of penalties or sanctions for peaceful demonstrations or acts, but on the contrary they cover cases of illicit or illegal conduct. The types of conduct classified by these provisions as illicit are also considered to be crimes in the penal legislation of many countries throughout the world, with penalties and sanctions being established for those who commit crimes against means of transport and communication, for example in the Penal Codes of Spain, Germany, France, Mexico, Peru, Panama, Uruguay, Bolivia and many other countries. Accordingly, by establishing these crimes in the Penal Code, far from limiting the right to strike or to peaceful demonstration, the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela is protecting public security and the safeguards enjoyed by its citizens. With reference to the Basic Act on national security and defence which, according to the CTV, is in violation of the right to strike, the Government cannot conceive how the concept of the State safeguarding the security and defence of the nation and the population can be in violation of the right to strike. It adds that the security of the nation is based on comprehensive development and is the pre-condition which guarantees the enjoyment and exercise by the population, the institutions and each of the individuals who are members of the State and of society of their rights and guarantees in the economic, social, political, cultural, geographical, environmental and military fields. The Government further notes that the Basic Act on national security and defence is to be considered as a series of elements considered to be essential in the structure of the Nation, as they offer confidence and protection to all the persons within its territory. In any State, and particularly in the Venezuelan State, the Government observes that there are a series of elements, both natural and territorial, which have to be preserved and protected from entities which have no place managing or using them. The purpose of the Act is to regulate the activities of the State and of society in relation to overall security and defence in accordance with the policies, principles and objectives set out in the Constitution, also taking into account that the scope of comprehensive security and defence is circumscribed by the provisions of the Constitution and the laws of the Republic, and in international treaties, agreements and conventions, which have not been set aside, and have been concluded and ratified by the Republic, in those areas in which vital national interests lie.

The Committee requests the Government to refer the issues raised to tripartite dialogue.

Social dialogue

National Tripartite Commission on Minimum Wages. The Committee regretted to note in its previous observation that the National Tripartite Commission on Minimum Wages envisaged in the (previous) Basic Labour Act had not been established.

The Committee notes the Government's indications that the fixing of the minimum wage annually is a constitutional obligation of the State, since the adoption of the Constitution of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela in 1999, with which it has been complying rigorously since 2000, after holding consultations with all the social organizations and socio-economic institutions. It adds that the consultations do not prevent trade union representatives from meeting to give their views jointly, although the existence of differing opinions is not an obstacle which prevents compliance with the requirement for the State to fix the minimum wage each year. The stage has been passed of the negotiation of rights, in which the fixing of the minimum wage was regulated in exchange for the granting of other claims demanded by the workers. During the last decade of the past century, the National Tripartite Commission, from which workers and employers were excluded, was not capable for over five years of reaching agreement on adjustments to the minimum wage, and froze it during the period of the highest inflation experienced by the country. For this reason, the workers and their trade unions called for the fixing of the minimum wage to be an annual requirement placed on the State. The Government deplors the fact that the ILO does not understand this important victory for men and women workers and is calling for retrograde steps.

The Committee regrets to note that the National Tripartite Commission on Minimum Wages has disappeared from the new LOTTT of 2012. The Committee emphasizes that it is clear that the Government is entitled to engage in consultations, not only with the most representative workers' and employers' organizations, but also with any social organizations and socio-economic institutions that it wishes. Nevertheless, the Committee emphasizes that, whatever the Government's assessment of tripartite experiences in the past, in view of their representativeness, experience and knowledge of labour matters, consultations with the most representative workers' and employers' organizations should give rise to dialogue and special consideration. However, FEDECAMARAS and at least two trade union confederations report the lack of consultation and social dialogue (the IOE emphasizes that a representative of FEDEINDUSTRIA, a minority organization close to the Government, was appointed to the commission entrusted with drawing up the draft LOTTT), and that the Higher Labour Council (entrusted with supervising the implementation of the LOTTT) is clearly composed of persons close to the official line. According to the employers' organizations, the LOTTT is punitive and discriminatory against employers, and envisages functions and penal sanctions, as well as widespread state intervention in industrial relations. The Act continues to give effect to government policies which have resulted in a 33.5 per cent decrease in the number of private employers and which have the objective of promoting the Bolivarian socialist model, which places enormous limits on economic freedom. The IOE and FEDECAMARAS emphasize that independent employers' organizations find themselves in a situation in which their survival is at great risk.

Other forums for consultation. In its previous observation, the Committee reached the following conclusions:

The Committee notes with regret, with reference to certain of its previous requests and those of the Conference Committee and the Committee on Freedom of Association, that a national forum for social dialogue has not been created in accordance with ILO principles with a tripartite composition and which respects in its membership the representative status of workers' organizations. The Committee further observes that the Government has repeatedly disregarded the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in relation to the important problems encountered by employers and their organizations, in which it requested direct dialogue with this organization, and more specifically its recommendation urging the Government to establish in the country a high-level joint national commission (Government-FEDECAMARAS) assisted by the ILO to examine each and every one of the allegations and matters that are pending so that such problems can be resolved through direct dialogue. As it is not a complex or costly measure, the Committee concludes that the Government is still failing to promote the conditions for social dialogue in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela with the most representative organization of employers. ... In 2009, the Conference Committee requested follow-up action to the 2006 high-level mission to assist the Government and the social partners to improve social dialogue, including through the creation of a national tripartite committee, and to resolve all of the outstanding matters brought before the supervisory bodies. The Committee deplors the fact that this tripartite committee has not been established and that there has been no conclusive progress on the determination of the criteria of representativeness. The Committee recalls that the Government may request ILO assistance for determining the criteria of representativeness in accordance with the principles of the Convention.

The Committee, noting that there are still no structured bodies for tripartite social dialogue, once again emphasizes the importance that should be attached to full and frank consultation without hindrance on any questions or proposed legislation affecting trade union rights and that it is essential that the introduction of draft legislation affecting collective bargaining or conditions of employment should be preceded by full and detailed consultations with the independent and most representative workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee also requests the Government to ensure that any legislation adopted concerning labour, social and economic issues which affects workers, employers and their organizations should be the subject of real in-depth consultations with the independent and most representative employers' and workers' organizations, and that sufficient efforts are being made, in so far as possible, to reach joint solutions, since this is the cornerstone of dialogue. The Committee once again invites the Government to request the technical assistance of the ILO for the establishment of the dialogue bodies mentioned above. In this context, the Committee emphasizes once again that it is important, taking into account the allegations of discrimination against FEDECAMARAS, the CTV and their member organizations, including the establishment or promotion of organizations or enterprises close to the regime, that the Government is guided exclusively by criteria of representativeness in its dialogue and relations with workers' and employers' organizations, and that it refrains from any form of interference and complies with Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in social dialogue and its outcome, and it strongly hopes that it will be in a position to note progress in the near future.

The Committee notes the ITUC's allegation that the Government disregards the representativity of trade unions which are not close to the Government. It indicates, for example, that with a view to drawing up the LOTTT, a special commission was appointed composed of 16 persons following the official line, and that the three trade unionists who were members belonged to the recently created Bolivarian and Socialist Confederation of Workers, selected by the President. The CTV and the ACI report serious shortcomings in social dialogue.

The IOE and FEDECAMARAS emphasize the total lack of consultation and social dialogue in drawing up the LOTTT. They recall that, under the protection of an Act adopted by the Legislative Assembly which empowered the President of the Republic to adopt legislation between January 2011 and May 2012 through legislative decrees, another 16 presidential legislative decrees were adopted on subjects directly affecting the interests of employers, without any consultation with FEDECAMARAS. According to these organizations, the only consultation held was in relation to minimum wages, through a letter, giving a 15-day deadline for replies, without any real social dialogue or discussion.

With reference to the adoption of the LOTT, the Government indicates that the citizen President, by means of Decree No. 8661, published in Gaceta Oficial No. 39818 of 12 December 2011, established a commission for the creation and formulation of the new Basic Labour Act, with a view to adapting, balancing and redefining the essential characteristics of industrial relations within the jurisdiction of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela to the conditions of a social State based on law and justice, in which workers are in a situation of equilibrium in relation to employers. On 1 May, the modern and revolutionary LOTT was adopted. A commission participated in drawing up the LOTT composed of representatives of all sectors: workers, people from rural areas, employers, the Government, the judicial and legislative authorities. The commission had the sole objective of drawing up draft legislation which took into account the feelings of the people and expressed collective interests in compliance with the intangible and progressive rights of workers set out in the Constitution. Over ten years of meetings held by the National Assembly with various sectors were synthesized and, during the last six months prior to the approval of the Act, over 19,000 proposals were forwarded directly to the commission, which were examined and discussed publicly. The Labour Act had its origins in a constructive national debate. The new Act shows that only social dialogue is able to develop the laws and industrial relations urgently required by our countries, in full respect for human rights. Direct dialogue with workers and their employers led to an Act which was welcomed by everyone even before its adoption, and which has been key to the sustained economic growth experienced by the country, with an unemployment rate below 8 per cent, which totally disproves those who foretold the closure of enterprises and unemployment, and demonstrates that guaranteeing and protecting labour rights is a basic condition for the economic stability of the country. The Government adds that the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela is an example of the consolidation of labour laws, the protection of freedom of association, collective bargaining, the right to strike and other rights.

According to the Government, there is a marked difference, not only with the repealed Act imposed by a closed and exclusive form of tripartism in 1997, but also with economic models at the global level which are today giving rise to structural crises with a substantial regression in the rights won by the working classes. The Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela offers the example that social dialogue has to be held directly with the social actors, thereby avoiding blackmail by sordid group interests, that collective interests have to be above manipulation by groups, and that the objective has to be to uphold the progressive rights of workers, since labour is a fundamental process in the achievement of a peace-loving society. Those who excluded themselves from the political debate remained on the margins, the actors of an old form of tripartism who claim a representativity that they no longer have and a role as spokespersons which no longer belongs to them.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that there are very clear and predetermined criteria concerning the representativity of trade union organizations, consisting of determining which organizations have the largest number of members and the greatest trade union activities. There are six trade union confederations of men and women workers and five confederations of men and women employers, and there have always been clear criteria (however, the Government indicates that the trade union confederations are not complying with the legal requirement to provide the names of their members with a view to demonstrating their representativity in numerical terms). The Government nevertheless notes that, in the case of employers, the IOE has wished to impose a criterion of representativity based on only organizations affiliated to it being considered "representative", which constitutes an act of anti-union discrimination prohibited by the national legislation. The Government adds that all the decisions of the national Government and the National Assembly are submitted to the broadest consultation with all the social organizations, and in most cases teams are established for the formulation of draft legislation which include all the social actors. A commission participated in drawing up the draft LOTT which was composed of representatives of all sectors (workers, people from rural areas, employers and the judicial and legislative authorities). There was direct dialogue with workers and their employers. However, there were organizations which excluded themselves from the consultations because they indicated that only they should be consulted, and the other social organizations excluded. The Government asks whether the ILO has information of any case or any draft legislation on which widespread consultation was not held in accordance with the requirements set out in the Constitution, and it is only aware of a complaint by a single organization which has repeatedly refused through its own will to participate in consultations.

The Committee notes that the Government has not provided a schedule of the meetings held in relation to draft legislation, including the LOTT, between the authorities and FEDECAMARAS, or between the authorities and the trade union confederations CTV and ASI. The Committee concludes that (as indicated by the ITUC) only one trade union confederation participated in the commission entrusted with drawing up the new Basic Labour Act, and that FEDECAMARAS was not invited to be part of that commission. The Committee once again notes grave shortcomings in relation to social dialogue and therefore reiterates its previous conclusions and recommendations (which are not repeated here, as they were reproduced above).

The Committee notes the Government's statement that: (1) the allegations of the IOE and FEDECAMARAS concerning the adoption by presidential legislative decrees, under an Act empowering the President to legislate, of 16 legislative decrees which seriously affect the interests of employers without consultations with FEDECAMARAS have been submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association; and (2) that the Government has provided its reply to the Committee on Freedom of Association.

Parallel organizations

With regard to the Committee's requests for the necessary measures to be taken to conduct an investigation into the allegations of the promotion by the authorities of parallel workers' and employers' organizations which are close to the Government, and of favouritism and partiality in relation to such organizations, the Government states that any legal or paralegal machinery which existed that violated the right of men and women workers to establish their own trade union organizations were eliminated with the adoption of the Constitution of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela in 1999. These mechanisms used to be: compulsory membership of official unions throughout the public sector and in the majority of private enterprises; the requirement to be a member of a specific trade union to have access to employment; the requirement for the registration of a trade union for the application to be accompanied by the authorization of the trade union federation or of specific political parties; the prohibition of trade union membership by administrative employees in private enterprises; and the provision of State buildings and resources to trade unions close to the Government. The Government adds that, as a result of the elimination of these restrictions on freedom of association, trade union activity blossomed as from 2000, with the establishment over the past 12 years of 35 per cent of all the trade unions that have been registered throughout history since 1936. Trade unions have acquired political, administrative and operational autonomy, as well as economic independence in relation to the State. The transformation of the union map has been so radical that over 80 per cent of the trade unions existing prior to 1999 disappeared and, of those that remain, most of them have lost over 50 per cent of their members. There are first-level unions which have more members than the whole membership of the four trade union confederations which existed prior to 1999.

The Government raises the question of the reasons for this situation. It also wonders whether these organizations lost the support of the Government as a result of their operation and the elimination of discriminatory provisions requiring workers to be members of trade unions that they did not want to. However, certain organizations find no other explanation of why they have been abandoned by their members than to believe that, as happened previously, the Government is promoting other trade union organizations, without seeing that it has been the protection of freedom of association, freedom of membership and the freedom to establish trade unions which has affected them. Regrettably, according to the Government, it would appear that the ILO is letting itself be used for political games that are far from reality. The Government calls for indications to be provided of any specific cases of trade unions promoted by the State and which do not owe their operation to their voluntary acceptance by men and women workers.

The Committee observes that the Government once again denies the allegations of favouritism towards certain workers' and employers' organizations and that it emphasizes the absolute freedom of association that exists. The Government recalls that trade union membership used to be compulsory and that the registration of a first-level organization required the authorization of the trade union federation or of political parties, and that State buildings and resources were provided to the trade unions concerned. The Government adds that there are now trade unions with more members than the total membership of the four existing trade union confederations, and that over 80 per cent of the organizations existing prior to 1999 have disappeared, and that the number of trade unions at present is greater at any time in history. The Committee indicated previously that it is also important, in relation to social dialogue, for an independent investigation to be conducted into the allegations concerning the promotion by the authorities of parallel organizations of workers and employers that are close to the Government, and of favouritism and partiality in relation to such organizations. The Committee recalls that the ITUC alleges that the Government is promoting parallel trade unions through the CNE and that FEDECAMARAS has been complaining for years that the Government is also promoting parallel organizations of employers. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures for this investigation to be undertaken, and to provide information on this subject.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1968)

Comments from trade union organizations. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) (4 August 2011 and 31 July 2012), the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV) (31 August 2011 and 31 August 2012), the Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Production of Venezuela (FEDECAMARAS) (24 August 2012) and the Independent Trade Union Alliance (ASI) (30 August 2011 and 31 August 2012).

Legislative matters. The Committee notes the adoption of new Basic Labour Act No. 6076 of 7 May 2012 concerning labour and workers (LOTTT), which contains provisions providing full protection for workers against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, with sufficiently dissuasive sanctions.

Article 4 of the Convention. Free and voluntary negotiation. The Committee observes that section 449 of the LOTTT provides that "discussion of proposals for collective bargaining shall take place in the presence of a labour official, who shall chair the meetings". The Committee considers that this amounts to interference in the negotiations between the parties and is therefore contrary to the principles of free and voluntary negotiation and the autonomy of the parties. The Committee emphasizes the importance of amending this provision to bring it into full conformity with the abovementioned principles and requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated in this respect.

Moreover, the Committee notes that section 450 concerning the registration of collective agreements states that “the labour inspector shall verify its conformity with the applicable public order regulations, with a view to granting approval”. Section 451 concerning the granting of approval states that “if the labour inspector considers it appropriate, he or she shall make the appropriate observations or recommendations to the parties instead of granting approval, and such observations and recommendations must be complied with within the next 15 working days”. The Committee recalls that, in general terms, making the entry into force of collective agreements concluded by the parties dependent on their approval by the authorities is contrary to the principles of collective bargaining established by Convention No. 98. The Committee considers that provisions of this sort are compatible with the Convention on condition that refusal of approval is restricted to cases in which the collective agreement contains flaws regarding its form or does not comply with the minimum standards laid down by the general labour legislation. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the scope of sections 450 and 451.

Furthermore, the Committee notes that section 465 concerning mediation and arbitration states, with regard to bargaining by branch of activity, that “if conciliation is not possible, the labour official, at the request of the parties or on his or her own initiative, shall submit the dispute to arbitration unless the participating trade union organizations state their intention to exercise the right to strike”. The Committee further notes that section 493 states that “should a dispute be submitted to arbitration, an arbitration board composed of three members shall be established. One member shall be chosen by the employers from a list submitted by the workers; another shall be chosen by the workers from a list submitted by the employers; and the third member shall be chosen by mutual agreement. If no agreement is reached on nominations at the end of five successive days, the labour inspector shall designate the representatives”. The Committee recalls that arbitration ordered by the authorities should be restricted to essential services in the strict sense of the term and cases involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State and considers that the designation of members by the labour inspector does not ensure that the parties will have confidence in the board that is established. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures contemplated to abolish arbitration ordered on the initiative of the authorities (except in the abovementioned cases) and to ensure that the composition of the arbitration board enjoys the confidence of the parties.

Pending issues. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to send the texts of the administrative decisions issued by the labour authority in the last three years pursuant to the provisions on trade union referendums. The Committee notes that the Government attaches copies of three decisions issued in 2010 and 2011 to its report. The Committee also recalls that it asked the Government for statistics on the collective agreements in force. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that in 2010 a total of 540 collective agreements were signed covering 2,308,542 workers, 452 agreements were signed in 2011 covering 742,647 workers and 230 were signed between January and July 2012. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide statistics relating to the collective agreements signed in both the public and private sectors. The Committee requests the Government to reply to the comment of the CTV that the vast majority of collective agreements in the public sector have expired (more than three years ago), have lost their substance and are being applied without being legally valid, with the right to collective bargaining denied due to the authorities invocation of so-called “overdue elections” (not convocing or not concluding the electoral process).

Yemen

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1976)

Comments from employers’ and workers’ organizations. The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee. The Committee also notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 31 July 2012, alleging that, amidst the uprising and political conflict, there is only one official trade union organization and that the law is not conducive to trade union activities. The ITUC adds that striking teachers were dismissed, striking sanitation workers were injured, and that the offices of the Yemeni Journalists’ Syndicates were attacked. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments thereon.

The Law on Trade Unions (2002). The Committee notes that the Government does not refer to the Law on Trade Unions in its report. In these circumstances, the Committee recalls its previous observations.

Article 2 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had indicated that the reference to the General Federation of Trade Unions of Yemen (GFTUY) made in sections 2 (definition of “General Federation”), 20 and 21, indicating that “All the general trade unions establish a General Federation entitled the General Federation of Trade Unions of Yemen” could result in making it impossible to establish a second federation to represent workers’ interests. The Committee had noted in its previous comments that the Government indicated that: (1) it has never imposed any prohibition on trade union activities; (2) the law does not stipulate that affiliation to GFTUY is obligatory and there are many other general trade unions which are not in this federation, such as the Trade Union of Doctors, Trade Union of Pharmacists, Education Professions’ Trade Unions, Journalists’ Trade Union and Lawyers’ Trade Union; (3) there is no monopoly in representation since, in the framework of social dialogue, the interlocutor is the most representative trade union; and (4) at the moment, the GFTUY is the most representative association of workers. While noting that the Government did not refer to the possibility of the general trade unions to form a federation different than the GFTUY, the Committee recalls that unification of the trade union movement imposed through state intervention by legislative means runs counter to the principle embodied in Articles 2 and 11 of the Convention. In these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Law on Trade Unions so as to repeal specific reference to the GFTUY, allowing workers and their organizations to establish and join the federation of their own choosing and to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this regard in its next report.

The Committee had noted the exclusion from the scope of the Law of employees of high-level public authorities and Cabinets of Ministers (section 4). The Committee had recalled that senior public officials should be entitled to establish their own organizations and that the legislation should limit this category to persons exercising senior managerial or policy-making responsibilities (see General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraph 57), and had requested the Government to indicate whether the categories of workers referred to in section 4 of the Law enjoy the right to establish and join trade unions. The Committee must once again reiterate the abovementioned request.

Article 3. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 40(b) provides that a trade union organization can organize a strike in coordination with a trade union organization of the highest level. The Committee had recalled that a legislative provision which requires that a decision by the first-level trade union to call a strike at the local level should be approved by a higher level trade union body, is not in conformity with the right of trade unions to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee had requested the Government to clarify whether section 40(b) requires an authorization from the higher level trade union for a strike to be organized and, if that is the case, to take the necessary measures in order to amend the legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention. The Committee must once again reiterate the abovementioned request.

The draft Labour Code. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had noted that: (1) a draft Labour Code was under discussion and that several of its provisions were not in conformity with the Convention; (2) with the active participation of the ILO, it is working on the enactment of the new Labour Code; and (3) that the draft Code was referred to the Ministry of Legal Affairs, and will consequently be referred by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour to the Council of Ministers and afterwards to Parliament. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that, due to the circumstances in Yemen since 2011, the House of Representatives has not held meetings for discussing and adopting new laws. The Committee hopes that the draft Labour Code will be adopted in the near future and that it will take into account its comments concerning the need to take the necessary measures to further amend or revise the following provisions:

- Article 2. The need to: (1) ensure that domestic workers, the magistracy and the diplomatic corps, excluded from the draft Labour Code (section 3B(2) and (4)), may fully benefit from the rights set out in the Convention; and (2) consider revising section 173(2) of the draft Code so as to ensure that minors between the ages of 16 and 18 may join trade unions without parental authorization, and noted with interest the Government's intention to do so.
- The need to indicate whether foreign persons holding diplomatic passports and those working in Yemen on the basis of political visas, who are excluded from the scope of the draft Code under section 3B(6) and covered by the specific legislation, regulations and agreements on reciprocal treatment, can in practice establish and join organizations of their own choosing.
- Article 3. The need to provide a list of essential services referred to in section 219(3) of the draft Code, which empowers the Minister to submit disputes to compulsory arbitration, which will be issued by the Council of Ministers once the Labour Code is promulgated.
- The need to further amend section 211 of the draft Labour Code, which provides that strike notice must include an indication as to the duration of a strike to ensure that a trade union can call a strike for an indeterminate period of time.
- Articles 5 and 6. The need to withdraw section 172 from the draft Labour Code since it appears to prohibit the right of workers' organizations to affiliate with international workers' organizations and contradicts section 66 of the Law on Trade Unions which ensures the right to affiliate with international organizations and the current practice.

The Committee trusts that the present legislative reform will bring the national legislation into full conformity with the Convention, in accordance with the abovementioned comments, and requests the Government to indicate any development in this regard in its next report.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1969)

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union practices. While noting that the legislation provides for adequate protection against interference, the Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been requesting the Government to ensure that effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions that guarantee the protection of workers' organizations against acts of interference by employers or their organizations in trade union activities are expressly provided for in the national legislation. The Committee had noted that draft legislative amendments to the Labour Code were under way and that the Government would endeavour to add provisions on penal responsibility of employers committing acts of interference in trade union affairs in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the comments of the Committee would be taken into account when making amendments to the Act on Trade Unions and supplementing the Penal Code. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the progress made in this respect, and to provide copies of the amended legislative texts aimed at ensuring full respect for the rights enshrined in the Convention, as soon as they have been adopted.

Article 4. Refusal to register a collective agreement on the basis of consideration of "economic interests of the country". The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend sections 32(6) and 34(2) of the Labour Code so as to ensure that refusal to register a collective agreement is only possible due to a procedural flaw or because it does not conform to the minimum standards laid down by the labour legislation, and not on the basis of consideration of "the economic interests of the country". The Committee had previously noted that the Government reiterated that it had adopted the Committee's proposal with regard to the amendment of the abovementioned section of the Labour Code. The Committee trusts that the legislative amendments requested in its previous observations will be fully reflected in the new legislation and once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the draft Labour Code as soon as the final version of it is available.

Collective bargaining in practice. The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in its communication dated 31 July 2012, alleging notably that, in both the private and public sectors, many trade unions are not allowed to negotiate collective agreements. The Committee requests the Government to communicate its observations thereon.

In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide statistics on the number of workers covered by collective agreements in comparison with the total number of workers in the country and it had noted the Government's indication that the requested statistics on collective bargaining were available and would be sent in its subsequent reports. While noting that according to the Government trade unions exist in the public sector and that in the private sector trade unions have been established in certain institutions, the Committee expresses once again the firm hope that the Government will provide the statistics requested in its next report or at least the information available.

Finally, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the legal provisions which guarantee the right to collective bargaining of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State.

Zambia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1996)

In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that Industrial and Labour Relations (Amendment) Act No. 8 of 2008 (ILRA) had been adopted. The Committee, however, noted that most of the issues raised in its previous comments still remain unattended to and were not taken into account during the process of the labour law review. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that: (1) the moratorium on the discussion of the ILRA has been lifted as the matters before the courts of law arising from a petition by the Federation of Free Trade Unions of Zambia (FFTUZ) have been withdrawn; (2) it is willing to consider the Committee's concerns and has engaged the social partners through the tripartite structures; and (3) it has engaged a consultant who will aid the Government in conducting a comprehensive labour review. The Committee hopes that this labour review will take into account its comments and recalls in particular that measures should be taken to bring the following provisions of the ILRA into conformity with the Convention:

Article 2 of the Convention.

- Section 2(e), which excludes from the scope of the Act, and therefore from the guarantees afforded by the Convention, workers in the prison service, judges, registrars of the court, magistrates and local court justices, and section 2(2), which accords the Minister discretionary power to exclude certain categories of workers from the scope of the Act.
- Section 5(b) that provides that an employee can only become a member of "a trade union within the sector, trade, undertaking, establishment or industry in which the employee is engaged" since it limits trade union membership to workers in the same occupation or branch of activity. In this respect, the Committee recalls that such conditions may be applied to first-level organizations, on condition that these organizations are free to establish inter-professional organizations, and to join federations and confederations in the form and manner deemed most appropriate by the workers concerned.

- Section 9(3) in order to shorten the period of registration of a trade union which is currently at a maximum of six months, constituting a serious obstacle to the establishment of organizations and amounting to denial of the right of workers to establish organizations without previous authorizations.

Article 3.

- Section 7(3) that allows a labour commissioner to prohibit a trade union officer from holding office in any trade union for a period of one year if, following the commissioner’s refusal to register the union, this union is not dissolved within six months. In this respect, the Committee recalls that having committed an act, the nature of which is not such as to call into question the integrity of the person concerned and is not such as to be prejudicial to the performance of trade union duties, should not constitute grounds for disqualification from trade union office.
- Section 21(5)(6) which confers to the Commissioner the power to suspend and appoint an interim executive board of a trade union, as well as to dissolve the board and call for a fresh election.
- Sections 18(1)(b) and 43(1)(a), under which a person, having been an officer of an employers’ or workers’ organization whose certificate of registration has been cancelled, may be disqualified from being an officer of a trade union if that person fails to satisfy the commissioner that she or he did not contribute to the circumstances leading to such cancellation.
- Section 78(4), which limits the maximum duration of a strike to 14 days, after which, if the dispute remains unsolved, it is referred to the court; section 78(6)–(8), under which a strike can be discontinued if it is found by the court not to be “in the public interest”; section 78(1), under which, as interpreted by a decision of the industrial relations court, either party may take an industrial dispute to court; section 107, which prohibits strikes in essential services, defined too broadly, and empowers the Minister to add other services to the list of essential services, in consultation with the tripartite consultative labour council; and which empowers a police officer to arrest, without any possibility of bail, a person who is believed to be striking in an essential service and which imposes a fine and up to six months’ imprisonment.

The Committee hopes that the future amendments will take into account the comments that it has been making for many years and that they will be adopted in the very near future following full and frank consultations with the social partners. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any progress achieved in this respect and hopes that the amendments to the Act will be in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

Workers’ and employers’ organizations comments. The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 31 July 2012 alleging that protests are not tolerated in the mining sector and that strikers suffer retaliation as well as threats and intimidation. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these comments.

The Committee notes the Government’s observations on the 2010 ITUC comments: (1) concerning the allegation that the Zambia Revenue Authority (ZRA) has consistently used delaying tactics to effectively deny recognition to the Zambia Union of Financial Institutions and Allied Workers (ZUFIAW), the Government indicates that the enabling legislation may need to be reviewed in order for the ZUFIAW to be recognized by the ZRA; and (2) concerning the allegation of intimidation of strikers through police intervention, the Government indicates that it has not used the police to intimidate striking workers but that the police may be called upon to maintain law and order to secure the property of the organization and the lives of employees and employers. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures it will take to amend the legislation in order for the ZUFIAW to be recognized by the ZRA.

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the right to strike, in a communication dated 29 August 2012, which are dealt with in the General Report of the Committee.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98)
(ratification: 1996)

Situation of the revision of the Industrial and Labour Relations Act (as amended by the Industrial and Labour Relations (Amendment) Act, 2008) (ILRA). In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Industrial and Labour Relations (Amendment) Act No. 8 of 2008 had been adopted. The Committee, however, noted that according to the Government’s report, most of the amendments it has previously proposed, still remain unattended to, and were not taken into account during the process of the labour law review. The Committee further noted that according to the Government’s report, the concerns expressed by trade unions and employers’ associations, some of which were presented before the Parliamentary Committee on Economic, Social and Labour Affairs, had been referred to the Government for consideration, although since 1997, the said provisions have not been used against workers or employers. The Committee noted the Government’s indication that the moratorium on the discussion of the ILRA has been lifted as the matter before the courts of law arising from a judicial petition by the Federation of Free Trade Unions of Zambia (FFTUZ) has been withdrawn. The Committee further notes that the Government indicates that it will consider the Committee’s observations, has engaged the social partners through the tripartite structures and has engaged a consultant who will aid the Government in conducting a comprehensive labour review. In addition, the Government and its social partners will undertake a study tour of the Labour Courts within the region to learn from their legal practices. The Committee hopes this labour review will take into account its comments, and recalls in particular that measures should be taken to bring the following provisions of the ILRA into conformity with the Convention, in full consultation with the social partners.

Articles 1–4 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union acts and promotion of free and voluntary collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerning the ILRA were the following:

- Section 85(3) of the ILRA provides that the court shall dispose of the matter before it (including disputes between an employer and an employee, as well as the matters affecting trade unions and collective bargaining rights) within a period of one year from the day on which the complaint or application is presented to it. The Committee understands that, under section 85, the court has jurisdiction over the complaints of anti-union discrimination and trade union interference and recalls that when allegations of violations of trade union rights are concerned, both the administrative bodies and the competent judges should be empowered to give a ruling rapidly. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to shorten the maximum period within which a court should consider the matter and issue its ruling thereon.
- Section 78(1)(a) and (c) and section 78(4) of the ILRA allows, in certain cases, either party to refer the dispute to a court or arbitration. The Committee recalls that arbitration imposed by legislation, or at the request of one party in the services which are neither essential in the strict sense of term, nor involving civil servants exercising authority in the name of the State, is contrary to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements. The Committee therefore requests the Government to give consideration to amending the above provisions so as to ensure that arbitration in services other than those mentioned above, can take place only at the request of both parties involved in the dispute.

Comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). Finally, the Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC in a communication dated 31 July 2012, alleging anti-union intimidation and harassment of workers as well as retaliation towards union representatives. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these comments.

Zimbabwe

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2003)

Follow-up of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry (complaint made under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO)

The Committee recalls that the Commission of Inquiry appointed under article 26 of the ILO Constitution to examine the observance by the Government of Convention No. 87 and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), recommended that: the relevant legislative texts be brought in line with Conventions Nos 87 and 98; all anti-union practices – arrests, detentions, violence, torture, intimidation and harassment, interference and anti-union discrimination – cease with immediate effect; national institutions continue the process the Commission had started whereby people can be heard, in particular referring to the Human Rights Commission and the Organ for National Healing and Reconciliation (ONHR); training on freedom of association and collective bargaining, civil liberties and human rights be given to key personnel in the country; the rule of law and the role of the courts reinforced; social dialogue strengthened in recognition of its importance in the maintenance of democracy; and ILO technical assistance to the country continued.

The Committee notes that the ILO technical assistance to support the Government and the social partners in implementing the above recommendations continued throughout 2012 and in this respect, it notes, in particular, that two Zimbabwe Supreme Court judges have participated in a training course on international labour standards, judicial independence and ethics for judges, magistrates, arbitrators and lawyers and that two training workshops on human and trade union rights for the police, security forces and Attorney General’s Office took place in the country. In relation to the Commission of Inquiry’s recommendation that social dialogue be strengthened, the Committee welcomes the Government’s indication that the principles for the Tripartite Negotiating Forum (TNF) legislation were approved by Cabinet. Following the approval, a tripartite consensus building workshop was carried out in July 2012 towards the drafting of the TNF Bill. In order to expedite the drafting process, two internal workshops were undertaken in September and October 2012, and managed to produce a draft which is now with the Attorney-General’s Office which will subsequently pass it to Cabinet and Parliament. The Government indicates that it would need ILO support to hold a workshop to discuss the Bill with social partners, and that it anticipates that by the second quarter of 2013, Parliament would have enacted the TNF Bill. The Government also provides information on the ongoing dissemination of the Kadoma Declaration – “Towards a shared national economic and social vision” which aims at depoliticization of workplaces. Moreover, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that several workshops will be held in the near future, including training workshops for conciliators and arbitrators on freedom of association and collective bargaining Conventions and two training workshops for national employment councils’ councillors drawn from trade unions and employers’ organizations and the promotion of freedom of association and collective bargaining at sector level.

The Committee recalls that it had previously urged the Government to provide information on the steps taken to ensure that the Zimbabwe Human Rights Commission and the ONHR can adequately contribute to the defence of trade union and human rights. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Human Rights Bill to operationalize the Human Rights Commission was passed by Parliament and now awaits Presidential assent. The Government has also crafted activities involving the Human Rights Commission and ONHR on issues to deal with human rights in the world of work so as to give effect to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report detailed information on the outcome of such activities.

Comments made by workers' organizations. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to provide its observations on the alleged cases of suspension and mass dismissals of workers following their participation in protests and strikes, as referred to by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in its 2011 communication. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it was made aware of these cases through the complaint by the ITUC to the ILO and that no attempt was made to report these cases to the Ministry of Labour for application of domestic remedies given that the law provides for protection of workers from such acts. The Government therefore requests the complainants to approach the Ministry of Labour for redress.

The Committee notes the comments made by ITUC and the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) on the application of the Convention in their communications dated 31 July and 29 August 2012, respectively, as detailed further below.

Trade union rights and civil liberties. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to indicate all measures taken or envisaged to ensure safety of Ms Hambira, General Secretary of the General Agriculture and Plantation Workers' Union of Zimbabwe (GAPWUZ), allegedly forced to exile following threats received for reporting violations of farm workers' rights, should she decide to return to the country. The Committee notes that in its report, the Government reiterates that the police and courts have confirmed that Ms Hambira has no pending case against her. It is therefore the Government's view that she is guaranteed safety upon return, like any other citizen of the country. The Committee notes, however, that according to the ZCTU, while the Government, in response to the request made by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2011, has committed itself to ensuring Ms Hambira's safe return, no measures have been taken to that effect. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure Ms Hambira's safety upon her return to the country. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any concrete measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee further recalls that it had previously noted the allegations submitted by the ZCTU and ITUC relating to the instances of banning of trade union activities (workshops, commemoration events, processions and May Day celebrations) and requested the Government to provide its observations thereon. The Committee notes the Government's indication that during the abovementioned two training workshops for the law enforcement bodies, the Ministry of Labour and Social Services has brought to the attention of the participants its position regarding the non-application of the Public Order and Security Act (POSA) to trade union meetings. The Government stresses that the few information-sharing sessions involving the law enforcement agencies conducted since July 2011 had a positive impact and that the May 2012 celebrations throughout the country took place without incident. In the Government's opinion, this vindicates the idea that with more information-sharing activities involving more law enforcement officers across the country, such incidents will be a thing of the past. The Committee notes, however, that at its May–June 2012 meeting, the Committee on Freedom of Association examined Case No. 2862 concerning similar allegations. In this respect, the Committee notes with concern the alleged difficulties faced by the ZCTU in organizing public processions and gatherings to commemorate International Women's Day and International Labour Day in 2012. The Committee further notes with concern that the ITUC and ZCTU 2012 communications also contain numerous new allegations referring to the obstruction of trade union activities and, in particular, the interruption of trade union activities by the police, interrogations and threats to arrest trade union officials. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed observations thereon. It expects that the Government will intensify its efforts in ensuring that the POSA is not used to infringe upon legitimate trade union rights, including the right of workers' organizations to express their views on the Government's economic and social policy. It also expects that the Government will take the necessary steps to ensure that training on human and trade union rights for the police and security forces continue.

The Committee recalls that it has previously requested the Government to carry out, together with the social partners, a full review of the application of the POSA in practice and considered that concrete steps should be taken to enable the elaboration and promulgation of clear lines of conduct for the police and security forces with regard to human and trade union rights. The Committee notes that the Government submits in this regard that it was necessary to share information on international labour standards with the law enforcement bodies before a joint review of the application of the POSA could be made with the social partners. The Government informs that the participants of the abovementioned workshops for the law enforcement agencies recommended that in the future, such training activities should include representatives of the social partners. The Government also points out that it is currently engaged with the International Labour Office with regard to a handbook on international labour standards and national law and practice for the use in training by various actors in the labour market. While taking due note of this information, the Committee expects that a full review of the application of the POSA in practice will be carried out together with the social partners without further delay. The Committee further expects that in addition to a training handbook referred to by the Government, clear lines of conduct for the police and security forces will be elaborated and promulgated without delay as has been requested by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2011 and more recently by the Committee on Freedom of Association (see 364th Report, June 2012, paragraph 1145). It requests the Government provide information on all measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Furthermore, the Committee recalls that in its previous observation it had noted the Government's indication that the POSA, notwithstanding its non-application to trade union meetings, was being amended. Noting copies of two sets of amendments proposed back in 2009, the Committee had requested the Government to clarify the status of these amendments, particularly in the light of the fact that in the framework of the Universal Periodic Review (UPR) process of the United Nations Human Rights Council, the Government of Zimbabwe had clearly indicated that it did not support the recommendations calling for the amendment of the POSA (see A/HRC/19/14, Human Rights Council, 12th session, 3-14 October 2011). The Committee notes the Government's explanation to the effect that while the role of the Ministry of Labour and Social Services is to ensure that the POSA is not applied to trade union activities, its amendment is under the Ministry of Justice purview. Accordingly, the Minister of Justice is best qualified to make pronouncement on the POSA in the context of the UPR. The Government also indicates that the abovementioned amendments of the POSA were proposals emanating from private members and were not initiated by the Government. In the light of the continuing difficulties with the application of the POSA in practice and the Commission of Inquiry's recommendation that the POSA be brought into line with the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures, in consultation with the social partners, in order to amend the POSA. It requests the Government to provide information on all concrete steps taken or to be taken in this respect.

The Committee further recalls the Commission of Inquiry's recommendation that steps be taken by the authorities to bring to an end all outstanding cases of trade unionists arrested under the POSA. It further recalls that in its previous observation it had urged the Government to ensure that cases of trade unionists arrested under the POSA were withdrawn without further delay and to provide detailed information in this respect. The Committee notes that the Government forwards a communication dated 29 March 2012 addressed by the Office of the Attorney-General to the Ministry of Labour, which contains information on criminal cases involving ZCTU members and leaders. According to this report, which groups the cases by regions, following completion of relevant investigations, the prosecution of the accused trade unionists was either declined or charges against them were withdrawn for the lack of evidence. The report indicates, however, that any updates on cases that were referred to the Supreme Court for constitutional applications will be communicated in due course. The Committee notes, however, that in its 2012 communication, the ZCTU indicates that the recommendation of the Commission of Inquiry to bring to an end to all outstanding cases of arrested trade unionists has not been implemented. In the light of this contradicting information, the Committee requests the Government to further engage with the ZCTU on this matter and to indicate how many cases involving trade unionists arrested under the POSA are still pending, particularly before the Supreme Court, and to provide information on all steps taken by the authorities to bring them to an end.

Labour law reform and harmonization. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide information on all developments and progress made in revising and harmonizing the Labour Act, Public Service Act and all other relevant laws and regulations. The Committee notes the Government's indication that together with the social partners it had finalized the development of principles for harmonization and review of labour laws, which have now been submitted to Cabinet for consideration. The Government submits a copy of the Memorandum to Cabinet by the Minister of Labour and Social Services on Principles for the Harmonization and Review of Labour Laws in Zimbabwe. The Government reiterates that the thrust of the harmonization and reform process, as reflected in the Memorandum, is essentially to give effect to the comments and recommendations of the Committee. The Government adds that it is anticipated that Cabinet would approve the principles by the end of December 2012. After the approval, the Government intends to hold a consensus building workshop in December 2012 towards the drafting of the labour law reform bill. The Government indicates that it has submitted the concept note to the ILO Country Office in Harare, and calls for ILO support during the workshop, in order to have the confidence of the social partners. The Government anticipates Parliament to enact the new labour law by the third quarter of 2013. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all developments and progress made in this respect.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the law and practice will be brought fully into line with the Convention in the very near future and requests the Government to provide, in its next report, detailed information on all other measures taken to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. It encourages the Government to continue cooperating with the ILO and the social partners in this regard.

Follow-up of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry (complaint made under article 26 of the ILO Constitution)

The Committee recalls the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry established to examine the observance by the Government of Zimbabwe of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and Convention No. 98, as detailed in the comments on the application of Convention No. 87. The Committee notes that the ILO technical assistance to support the Government and the social partners in implementing these recommendations continued throughout the reporting period. It recalls in this respect that it had requested the Government to provide detailed information on the outcome of the activities carried out under the ILO technical assistance package and on all other measures taken to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in this regard, as reflected in the 2011 and 2012 comments on the application of Convention No. 87 and further below. It further notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) on the application of the Convention in their communications dated 4 August 2011, 31 July and 29 August 2012, respectively. It requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had taken note of the initiated labour law reform and harmonization process, and expressed the firm hope that the relevant legislative texts, and in particular, the Labour Act and the Public Service Act, would be brought in line with the Convention. More specifically, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that an adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination is enshrined in the national legislation, and applied and respected in practice; that restrictions on collective bargaining rights are lifted; and that public servants, with the only possible exception of those who, by their functions, are directly engaged in the administration of the State, are also granted collective bargaining rights. The Committee recalls that in its 2011 comments on the application of Convention No. 87 it had taken due note of a copy of the draft Principles for the Harmonization and Review of Labour Laws in Zimbabwe and the information provided by the Government on the specific sections of the labour law which it intended to amend in the framework of the reform. On that occasion, the Committee noted with interest that the revision of the labour legislation envisaged taking into account its comments and welcomed the fact that this process involved all social partners. The Committee notes that in its 2012 report, the Government indicates that, together with the social partners, it had finalized the development of principles for harmonization and review of labour laws, and had submitted them to Cabinet for consideration. The Government reiterates that the thrust of the harmonization and reform process is essentially to give effect to the comments and recommendations of the Committee. The Government adds that it is anticipated that Cabinet would approve the principles by the end of December 2012. After the approval, the Government intends to hold a consensus-building workshop towards the drafting of the labour law reform bill. The Government indicates that it has submitted the concept note to the ILO country office in Harare, and calls for ILO support during the workshop, in order to have the confidence of the social partners. The Government anticipates that Parliament will enact the new labour law by the third quarter of 2013. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all developments and progress made in this respect and hopes that the ILO will continue to support this process.

On the issue of protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, the Government refers to section 89 of the Labour Act, which empowers the Labour Court and arbitrators to order reinstatement in a job or payment of damages, including punitive damages to an employee who has been wrongfully dismissed. It is the Government's view that this section provides for sufficiently dissuasive sanctions in cases of anti-union discrimination. The Government further indicates that it will continue to encourage the application of this provision in practice, as requested by the Commission of Inquiry and the Committee. While taking due note of this information, the Committee observes allegations of anti-union discrimination as outlined in the ITUC and ZCTU communications, which involve cases of suspension and dismissals for protesting against poor working conditions and low monthly wages. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon, as well as statistical information on the number of complaints relating to anti-union discrimination lodged with the competent authorities, number of complaints examined, sample judicial decisions issued, average duration of procedures and sanctions applied.

Forced labour

Algeria

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Civil service. For a number of years the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the incompatibility with the Convention of sections 32, 33, 34 and 38 of Act No. 84-10 of 11 February 1984 concerning civil service, as amended and supplemented by Act No. 86-11 of 19 August 1986 and by Act No. 06-15 of 14 November 2006, under which it is possible to require persons who have completed a course of higher education or training to perform a period of civil service ranging from one to four years before being able to exercise an occupation or obtain employment.

The Committee also previously noted that, under sections 32 and 38 of the Act, any refusal to perform civil service and the resignation of the person concerned without valid reason results in the prohibition on their exercising an activity on their own account, and that any infringement will incur the penalties laid down in section 243 of the Penal Code (imprisonment ranging from three months to two years and/or a fine of between 500 and 5,000 dinars). Similarly, under sections 33 and 34 of the Act, all private employers are required to satisfy themselves before engaging any workers that applicants are not subject to civil service or can produce documentation proving that they have completed it. Furthermore, any private employer who knowingly employs a citizen who has evaded civil service is liable to imprisonment and a fine. Hence, even though persons liable to civil service enjoy conditions of work (remuneration, seniority, promotion, retirement, etc.) similar to those of regular public sector workers, they perform this service under threat since, in the event of any refusal, they are denied access to any self-employed occupational activity or employment in the private sector. This means that civil service falls within the concept of compulsory labour within the meaning of Article 2(1) of the Convention. Moreover, since it consists of a contribution by the persons concerned to the economic development of the country, this compulsory service is also incompatible with Article 1(b) of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), which has also been ratified by Algeria.

The Committee further noted that under section 2 of Ordinance No. 06-06 of 15 July 2006, civil service may be performed in private-sector health establishments in accordance with arrangements set forth by regulation. The Committee reminds the Government that, according to Paragraph 3(3) of the Special Youth Schemes Recommendation, 1970 (No. 136), the services of participants should not be used for the advantage of private persons or enterprises.

In its last report the Government indicates that civil service concerns only doctors specializing in public health and that this was established in response to the need to bring essential specialists' care to the populations of isolated regions who have no access to it. Moreover, the Government indicates that, at the National Conference on Hospital Reform Policy (February 2011), discussions were held concerning the abolition of civil service for these doctors, and that the ultimate goal would be to leave them free to choose whether to exercise their profession in the public, private or semi-public sector.

While noting this information, the Committee expresses the strong hope that the necessary measures will be taken to repeal or amend the provisions of Act No. 84-10 of 11 February 1984 concerning civil service in the light of Conventions Nos 29 and 105, and that the Government will soon be in a position to report on the measures adopted in this respect.

Referring to Ordinance No. 06-06 of 15 July 2006, amending and complementing Act No. 84-10 of 11 February 1984 concerning civil service, the Committee reiterates the hope that the necessary measures will be taken to repeal or amend the provisions imposing civil service on specialized doctors. Pending such legislative amendments, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of persons and establishments concerned with regard to civil service, the length of service, and the conditions of work of the persons concerned.

Article 2(2)(a). National service. For a number of years the Committee has been referring to Ordinance No. 74-103 of 15 November 1974 issuing the National Service Code and the Order of 1 July 1987, under which conscripts are required to take part in the running of various sectors of the economy and administration. The Committee observed that they are further required to perform civil service for a period ranging from one to four years, as referred to above. The Committee recalled that, under the terms of Article 2(2)(a) of the Convention, compulsory military service is excluded from the scope of the Convention only where conscripts are assigned to work of a purely military character.

The Committee noted the Government's indication in its previous report that the civil modality of national service had not been used since 2001. The Government explained that this de facto suspension would be reflected in law as soon as the reform of the National Service Code was placed on the agenda. As the Government has not provided any information on this point, the Committee hopes that it will be in a position to send information in its next report on any developments in this matter showing that national law has been aligned with practice and hence with the provisions of the Convention, and to provide copies of the relevant texts.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Bahamas

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(c) of the Convention. Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. For many years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the 1976 Merchant Shipping Act, under which various breaches of labour discipline are punishable with imprisonment (involving an obligation to work, under section 10 of the Prisons Act and rules 76 and 95 of the Prison Rules) and deserting seafarers from ships registered in another country may be forcibly conveyed on board the ship. The Committee has noted the Government's indications in its earlier reports that some amendments to the Merchant Shipping Act have been made. It notes, however, that under sections 129(b) and (c) and 131(a) and (b) of the updated text of the Merchant Shipping Act, which it has consulted on the Government's website, penalties of imprisonment may still be imposed for breaches of discipline such as disobedience to lawful command, neglect of duty, desertion and absence without leave, and section 135 of the Act still provides for the forcible conveyance of deserting seafarers to ships registered in another country, where it appears to the minister that reciprocal arrangements will be made in that country.

The Committee recalls that Article 1(c) expressly prohibits the use of any form of forced or compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline. As the Committee repeatedly pointed out, only acts which endanger the ship or the life or health of persons are excluded from the scope of the Convention (see, for example, paragraphs 179–181 of the General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour). The Committee therefore reiterates its hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken with a view to amending the above provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, either by repealing sanctions involving compulsory labour or by restricting their application to the situations where the ship or the life or health of persons are endangered (as is the case, e.g. in section 128 of the same Act). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard in its next report.

Article 1(d). Punishment for having participated in strikes. Over a number of years, the Committee has been referring to section 73 of the 1970 Industrial Relations Act, as amended, under which the minister may refer a dispute in non-essential services to the tribunal for settlement, if he considers that a public interest so requires; the recourse to strike action in this situation is prohibited, violation being punishable with penalties of imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour, as explained above) under sections 74(3) and 77(2)(a) of the same Act. The Committee has further noted that, according to section 76(1), a strike which, in the opinion of the minister, affects or threatens the public interest, might also be referred to the tribunal for settlement, failure to discontinue the participation in such a strike being punishable with imprisonment under section 76(2)(b).

The Committee previously noted the Government's indications in its earlier report that the proposed Trade Unions and Industrial Relations Bill had been tabled in the House of Assembly, and that it contained no provisions imposing sanctions of imprisonment for breach of the legislation, which may be punished only with fines. The Committee also noted the Government's repeated statement that the above provisions of the Industrial Relations Act had never been applied in practice, and that the legislation would be amended when a consensus is achieved after further consultation with the social partners.

While having noted these indications, the Committee reiterates the firm hope that the review of the Act announced by the Government for a number of years will soon result in the amendment of the above provisions, so that no sanctions involving compulsory labour can be imposed for the mere fact of peaceful participation in a strike, in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention. Referring also to its comments made in 2007 under Convention No. 87, likewise ratified by the Bahamas, the Committee asks the Government to supply a copy of the new legislation, as soon as it is adopted.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Burundi

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1963)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. 1. Compulsory community development work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that Legislative Decree No. 1/16 of 29 May 1979, which established the obligation to carry out community development work under penalty of sanctions, had been replaced by Act No. 1/016 of 20 April 2005 organizing municipal administration. According to this Act, which aims at promoting the economic and social development of municipalities not only on an individual but also on a collective and unified basis – municipalities may cooperate through a system of inter-municipality, and it is up to the municipal council to establish the community development programme, monitor its implementation and carry out the evaluation thereof. The Act also provides for a regulatory text determining the organization, mechanisms and rules of procedure of inter-municipality. The Committee noted that although the principle of community work was upheld in the Act, it did not explicitly provide for the voluntary nature of this work or establish the rules for participation in this work. In this respect, the Committee noted that, according to the observations submitted in 2008 by the Trade Union Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU), community work is decided upon without popular consultation and the Government bans the movement of persons throughout the duration of this work. It also noted, according to information available on the Internet site of the Government and the National Assembly, that community work seemed to be organized on a weekly basis and included work of reforestation, cleaning and the construction of economic and social infrastructure such as schools, colleges and health centres. Taking into account this information, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary steps to adopt the text applying the Act of 2005 and ensure that it explicitly referred to the voluntary nature of participation in this work.

The Committee takes note of new observations received by the COSYBU on 31 August 2012 and forwarded to the Government on 18 September 2012. It notes that the COSYBU confirms that community work is decided upon unilaterally without the population being consulted. The COSYBU refers to the mobilization of the police to prevent the movement of persons during this work. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has failed once again to reply to the observations made by the COSYBU and that, for the second consecutive year, it has not provided a report on the application of the Convention. While noting that the Government previously indicated that the legislation does not provide for penalties to be imposed on persons who fail to carry out community work, the Committee observes that community work is carried out by the population without there being a text regulating the nature of this work or rules determining how this work might be required of the population or the way in which it is organized. In these circumstances, the Committee once again expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary steps to adopt the text applying Act No. 1/016 of 20 April 2005 organizing municipal administration, particularly with respect to the participation in and organization of community work, to ensure that the voluntary nature of participation in this work is explicitly set out in the legislation. Meanwhile, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on the type and duration of the community work carried out and the number of persons concerned.

2. Compulsory agricultural work. For many years, the Committee has been requesting the Government to take the necessary measures to bring a number of texts providing for the compulsory participation in certain types of agricultural work into line with the Convention. It has stressed the need to set out in the legislation the voluntary nature of agricultural work resulting from obligations relating to the conservation and utilization of the land and the obligation to recreate and maintain minimum areas of fruit crops (Ordinances Nos 710/275 and 710/276 of 25 October 1979), as well as the need to formally repeal certain texts on compulsory cultivation, portage and public works (Decree of 14 July 1952, Ordinance No. 1286 of 10 July 1953 and the Decree of 10 May 1957). Noting that the Government previously indicated that these texts, which dated from the colonial period, had been repealed and that the voluntary nature of agricultural work had now been set out in the legislation, the Committee requests the Government once again to send a copy of the texts that repeal the abovementioned legislation and set out the voluntary nature of agricultural work.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Cambodia

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1969)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. 1. Trafficking in persons. The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Law on Suppression of Human Trafficking and Sexual Exploitation (2008), and requested information on its application in practice.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that it has taken measures to prevent and suppress trafficking in persons, as well as to rescue victims and punish perpetrators. The Government states that it disseminates and distributes educational materials concerning the relevant legislation and international legal norms, as well as on the deceitful methods used by the perpetrators of trafficking. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that the National Committee to Lead the Suppression of Human Trafficking, Smuggling, Labour Exploitation and Sexual Exploitation in Women and Children (STLS) has established a national action plan for 2011–13 on the suppression of human trafficking and sexual exploitation. The Government states that the STLS cooperates with groups at the national, provincial and municipal levels, as well as with ministerial working groups and the authorities responsible for the implementation of memoranda of understanding (MOUs) with other countries in the region. In this regard, the Government indicates that it engages in regional cooperation to protect victims of trafficking. In addition, the Committee notes the Government's statement that the Village/Commune Safety Policy is playing a crucial role in the implementation of activities to combat human trafficking.

The Committee notes that the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, in its concluding observations of 12 June 2009, expressed serious concern regarding reports that an estimated 400–800 Cambodian women and children are trafficked to foreign countries per month, as well as regarding the low number of prosecutions and convictions of traffickers (E/C.12/KHM/CO/1, paragraph 26). The Committee further notes that the Committee against Torture, in its concluding observations of 20 January 2011, expressed concern regarding reports that a high number of women and children continue to be trafficked from, through and within the country for purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labour (CAT/C/KHM/CO/2, paragraph 22). The Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to combat trafficking in persons, including within the framework of the national action plan 2011–13 on the suppression of human trafficking and sexual exploitation, and to provide information on the measures taken in this regard. It requests the Government to provide information, in its next report, on the application of the Law on Suppression of Human Trafficking and Sexual Exploitation (2008) in practice, including the number of investigations, prosecutions, convictions and specific penalties imposed. It further requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to provide training to law enforcement officials, including labour inspectors, on the phenomenon of trafficking. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to supply information on the specific measures taken to provide protection and assistance to victims of trafficking, as well as the results achieved.

2. Vulnerability of migrant workers to conditions of forced labour. The Committee notes the information in the report of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) entitled "Internationally Recognised Core Labour Standards in Cambodia: Report for the WTO General Council Review of the Trade Policies of Cambodia" of November 2011 that migrant workers from Cambodia are vulnerable to situations of forced labour, particularly women domestic workers in Malaysia and men on fishing boats in Thailand. This report also indicates that the national legislation on recruitment, placement, and protection of migrant labour is limited and outdated. This report further states that Cambodian migrant workers are generally not aware of their rights during their work abroad, although the Ministry of Labour began providing pre-departure training on rights in 2011. The Committee also notes that the Government is in the process of developing an MOU with the Government of Malaysia concerning migrant domestic workers.

The Committee recalls the importance of taking effective action to ensure that the system of the employment of migrant workers does not place the workers concerned in a situation of increased vulnerability, particularly where they are subjected to abusive employer practices, such as retention of passports, non-payment of wages, deprivation of liberty and physical and sexual abuse. Such practices might cause their employment to be transformed into situations that could amount to forced labour. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that migrant workers are protected from abusive practices and conditions that amount to the exaction of forced labour. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on measures adopted specifically tailored to the difficult circumstances faced by migrant workers, including measures to prevent and respond to cases of abuse of migrant workers. It further requests the Government to provide copies of the legislation relevant to migrant workers with its next report.

3. Work exacted in drug rehabilitation centres. The Committee notes that in 2006, a Circular on the Implementation of Education, Treatment and Rehabilitation Measures for Drug Addicts was issued, stipulating that local authorities must establish compulsory drug treatment centres. The Committee also notes the information in a World Health Organization report entitled “Assessment of compulsory treatment of people who use drugs in Cambodia, China, Malaysia and Viet Nam” that the majority of persons in these drug detention centres in Cambodia are not there voluntarily; they may be admitted following legal procedures, on the request of their families, or simply following arrest. The Committee further notes that the Committee against Torture, in its concluding observations of 20 January 2011, expressed concern at continuing reports of round-ups by law enforcement officials in the streets and the subsequent holding of people, including sex workers, people who use drugs, homeless people, beggars, street children and mentally ill persons in social affairs centres against their will and without any legal basis and judicial warrant (CAT/C/KHM/CO/2, paragraph 20). Lastly, the Committee notes the information from the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime that there have been reports that persons in these drug rehabilitation centres are engaged in compulsory labour. In this regard, the Committee recalls that, according to Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention, work can only be exacted from a person as a consequence of a conviction in a court of law. It therefore requests the Government to provide information on how persons enter drug rehabilitation centres and social affairs centres, and whether persons detained in these centres are required to engage in work. It requests the Government to provide copies of the relevant legislation and regulations governing drug rehabilitation centres, with its next report.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Chad

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2(2)(a) of the Convention. Work in the general interest imposed in the context of compulsory military service. The Committee previously noted Ordinance No. 001/PCE/CEDNACVG/91 organizing the armed forces, according to which military service is compulsory for every citizen of Chad. Under section 14 of the Ordinance, conscripts who are fit for service are classified into two categories: the first, the size of which is determined each year by decree, is incorporated and compelled to perform active service; the second remains at the disposal of the military authorities for two years and may be called up to perform work in the general interest by order of the Government. The Committee noted that similar provisions were contained in Ordinance No. 2 of 1961 on the organization and recruitment of the armed forces of the Republic, on which it commented for many years. Indeed, such provisions are not compatible with Article 2(2)(a) of the Convention under which, to be excluded from the scope of the Convention, any work or service exacted in virtue of compulsory military service laws must be of a purely military character. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures to bring the provisions of section 14 of the Ordinance of 1991 reorganizing the armed forces and, as appropriate, any decrees issued thereunder, into conformity with the Convention.

Article 2(2)(c). For many years, the Committee has been drawing the Government’s attention to the need to amend or repeal section 2 of Act No. 14 of 13 November 1959 authorizing the Government to take administrative measures for the relocation, internment or expulsion of persons whose activities constitute a danger for public order and security, under which persons convicted of penal offences involving prohibition of residence may be used for work in the public interest for a period, the duration of which is to be determined by order of the Prime Minister. This provision would allow the administrative authorities to impose work on persons subject to a prohibition of residence once they have completed their sentence. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures without further delay to amend or repeal section 2 of Act No. 14 of 13 November 1959 referred to above.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Congo

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

Article 2(2)(a) of the Convention. 1. Work exacted under compulsory military service laws. For many years the Committee has been drawing the Government’s attention to the fact that section 1 of Act No. 16 of 27 August 1981 establishing compulsory military service is not in conformity with the Convention. Under this provision, national service is instituted for the purpose of enabling every citizen to participate in the defence and construction of the nation and has two components: military service and civic service. The Committee has repeatedly emphasized that work exacted from recruits as part of compulsory national service, including work related to national development, is not purely military in nature and is therefore contrary to Article 2(2)(a) of the Convention.

The Committee notes that the Government once again indicates that it is committed to repealing the abovementioned Act and this will be seen in practice in the revision of the Labour Code, which is in progress. The Committee again expresses the strong hope that when the Labour Code is revised, the necessary steps will be taken to amend or repeal the Act establishing compulsory military service so as to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Government is requested to supply information on any progress made in this respect.

2. Youth brigades and workshops. In its previous comments the Committee noted the Government's indication that Act No. 31-80 of 16 December 1980 on guidance for youth had fallen into disuse since 1991. Under this Act, the party and mass organizations were supposed to create, over time, all the conditions for establishing youth brigades and organizing youth workshops (type of tasks performed, number of persons involved, duration and conditions of their participation, etc.).

The Committee once again notes the Government's indication that it is committed to repealing the abovementioned Act and this will be seen in practice in the revision of the Labour Code, which is in progress. The Committee expresses the strong hope that when the Labour Code is revised, the necessary steps will be taken to formally repeal Act No. 31-80 of 16 December 1980 on guidance for youth.

Article 2(2)(d). Requisitioning of persons to perform community work in instances other than emergencies. For many years the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the fact that Act No. 24-60 of 11 May 1960 is not in conformity with the Convention in that it allows the requisitioning of persons to perform community work in instances other than the emergencies provided for under Article 2(2)(d) of the Convention, and provides that persons requisitioned who refuse to work are liable to imprisonment ranging from one month to one year.

The Committee again notes the Government's indication that this Act has fallen into disuse and may be considered as repealed, in view of the fact that the Labour Code (section 4) and the Constitution (article 26), which prohibit forced labour, annul all the provisions of national law which are contrary to them. The Government explains that, in order to avoid any legal ambiguity, a text will be adopted enabling a clear distinction to be made between work of public interest and the forced labour prohibited by the Labour Code and the Constitution. The Government also indicates that the practice of mobilizing sections of the population for community work, on the basis of the provisions of section 35 of the statutes of the Congolese Labour Party (PCT), no longer exists. Tasks such as weeding and clean-up work are carried out by associations, state employees and local communities on a voluntary basis, therefore without any compulsion involved. Moreover, the voluntary nature of work for the community will be established in the revision of the Labour Code in such a way as to clearly bring the national legislation into conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee notes this information and hopes that appropriate measures will be taken to clarify the situation in both law and practice, especially by the adoption of a text enabling a distinction to be made between work in the public interest and forced labour.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the observations made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention, which were received on 31 August 2012 and forwarded to the Government on 11 September 2012.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Forced labour and sexual slavery in the context of armed conflict. In its previous observation, the Committee expressed its concern at the various reports of a number of United Nations bodies on the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, which underlined the gravity of the human rights situation in the country and referred to violations committed by the state security forces and other armed groups, including cases of forced labour and sexual slavery. The Committee noted that, following its examination of this case in June 2011, the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards "noted with concern the information provided which bore witness to the gravity of the situation and the climate of violence, insecurity and the violation of human rights which prevailed in the country, especially in North Kivu. This information confirmed that cases of abduction of women and children, with a view to their use as sexual slaves and exaction of forced labour, particularly in the form of domestic work, were frequent and continued to occur. Moreover, in mines, the workers were hostages of conflicts for the exploitation of natural resources and victims of exploitation and abusive practices, some of which amounted to forced labour. The Conference Committee observed that failure to comply with the rule of law, legal insecurity, the climate of impunity and the difficulties faced by victims in gaining access to justice favoured all of these practices [...] The Conference Committee appealed to the Government to take urgent and concerted measures to bring such violations to an immediate end ...".

The Committee also noted that, in its observations submitted in September 2011, the Confederation of Trade Unions of Congo (CSC) confirmed the practices of abduction of women and girls and, to a lesser degree, of men and boys with a view to their being used for forced labour and sexual slavery by the armed groups. Elderly women were also being abducted for domestic work. The trade union referred to specific cases of abduction and indicated that the worst affected areas were Walikale, Rutshuru, Masisi and North Kivu.

The Committee notes that, in its observations, the ITUC confirms the persistence of cases of sexual slavery, especially in mines in the regions of North Kivu, Province Orientale, Katanga and East Kasai, perpetrated by illegal armed groups and elements of the Armed Forces of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (FARDC). The ITUC emphasizes that the persons concerned have no chance of escaping because they are guarded 24 hours a day by soldiers. The ITUC also refers to several cases of the forced enrolment of boys and young men by various armed groups, especially by the troops of Bosco Ntaganda, in the Masisi territory, or by the rebels of the M23, in particular in the province of North Kivu. The ITUC lists several attacks carried out by these groups in 2012 in various communities in this province, during which violence was systematically used to force civilians to transport arms, ammunition, booty from looting and other provisions up to the front line. The ITUC refers to similar action by the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) and the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR). These groups enter camps where displaced persons have taken refuge and threaten them by accusing them of collaborating with one or another armed group. They are then forced to transport arms or goods, to build houses or to work in the fields for the rebels or the militia. The ITUC stresses that the authors of these actions are never punished because no case has ever been brought before the courts.

The Committee deplores the lack of information from the Government on the measures taken to bring an end to these serious violations of the Convention. The Committee is even more concerned because, according to information sent by the ITUC and that available from various United Nations bodies, the east of the Democratic Republic of the Congo has been the scene of a renewed outbreak of hostilities in recent months between the regular Congolese forces and armed groups, resulting in massive human rights violations. In a press release dated 27 July 2012, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) condemned the violence perpetrated against civilians, which included "indiscriminate and summary killings of civilians, rape and other sexual abuse, torture, arbitrary arrests, assaults, looting, extortion of food and money, destruction of property, forced labour, forced military recruitment, including children, and ethnically motivated violence". In view of the gravity of the situation, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures, as a matter of the utmost urgency to bring an immediate end to these practices which constitute a serious violation of the Convention and to re-establish a climate of legal security in which recourse to forced labour does not go unpunished. The Committee recalls that it is vital for appropriate criminal penalties to be imposed in practice on those who exact forced labour, because of the dissuasive nature of these penalties, and it urges the Government to take the necessary measures as a matter of urgency for this purpose.

Article 25. Criminal penalties. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under section 323 of the Labour Code, any infringement of section 2(3), which prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour, shall incur the penalty of a maximum of six months' imprisonment and/or a fine, without prejudice to criminal legislation laying down more severe penalties. Emphasizing that the penalties laid down in the Labour Code do not constitute an effective deterrent, the Committee asked the Government to specify the penal provisions that prohibit and sanction recourse to forced labour. The Government confirmed in 2011 that the Penal Code of 1940 (as amended up to 2006) does not establish any penalties for persons who impose forced labour. The Government explained that the Bill for the eradication of forced labour, which is under examination in Parliament, provides for effective criminal penalties. The Committee trusts that the Government will be in a position to announce in its next report the adoption of the Act for the eradication of forced labour and that the latter will establish criminal penalties that constitute an effective deterrent, in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention.

Repeal of legislation allowing for the exaction of work for national development purposes, as a means of levying taxes and by persons in preventive detention. For a number of years, the Committee has been asking the Government to repeal or amend the following legislative texts and regulations, which are contrary to the Convention:

- Act No. 76-011 of 21 May 1976 concerning national development efforts and its implementing Order, Departmental Order No. 00748/BCE/AGRI/76 of 11 June 1976 concerning the performance of civic tasks in the context of the national food production programme: these legal texts, which aim to increase productivity in all sectors of national life, require, subject to criminal penalties, every able-bodied adult person who is not already considered to be making his/her contribution by reason of his/her employment (political representatives, employees and apprentices, public servants, traders, members of the liberal professions, the clergy, students and pupils) to carry out agricultural and other development work, as decided by the Government;
- Legislative Ordinance No. 71/087 of 14 September 1971 concerning the minimum personal contribution, of which sections 18 to 21 provide for imprisonment involving compulsory labour, upon decision of the chief of the local community or the area commissioner, of taxpayers who have defaulted on their minimum personal contributions; and
- Ordinance No. 15/APAJ of 20 January 1938 concerning the prison system in indigenous districts, which allows work to be exacted from persons in preventive detention (this Ordinance not being on the list of legal texts repealed by Ordinance No. 344 of 15 September 1965 concerning prison labour).

The Government previously indicated that these texts were obsolete and were therefore, de facto, repealed. Furthermore, replying to the Committee's request to repeal these texts formally in order to guarantee legal certainty, the Government indicated that legal certainty was not compromised by the lack of any formal repeal of these texts. The Government indicated in its report of June 2011 that the promulgation of the Act for the eradication of forced labour will provide an answer to the concerns of the Committee with regard to the repeal of Act No. 76-011 concerning the national development effort and its implementing Order, as well as Ordinance No. 15/APAJ of 20 January 1938 concerning the prison system in indigenous districts. The Committee hopes that, on the occasion of the adoption of the Act for the eradication of forced labour, the legal texts to which it has been referring for many years, and which the Government indicates are obsolete and, de facto, repealed, will finally be repealed formally.

Ethiopia

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1999)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions for violation of provisions restricting political freedoms. The Committee previously noted that the following sections of the Criminal Code provide for sanctions of imprisonment which involve an obligation to perform labour (by virtue of section 111(1)) in circumstances covered by the Convention:

- section 486(a): inciting the public through false rumours;
- section 487(a): seditious demonstrations: making, uttering, distributing or crying out seditious or threatening remarks or displaying images of a seditious or threatening nature in any public place or meeting; and
- sections 482(2) and 484(2): punishment of ringleaders, organizers or commanders of forbidden societies, meetings and assemblies.

Following the Committee's request to provide information on the application in practice of the abovementioned sections, the Government indicates in its report that peaceful expression of views or of opposition to the established political, social or economic system are not considered a crime in Ethiopia. The Government further states that the abovementioned provisions are designed and applied observing the protection of the constitutional provision on freedom of expression, thought and opinion.

The Committee furthermore takes note of the adoption of the Anti-Terrorism Proclamation No. 652/2009 in August 2009. Section 3 defines terrorist acts and section 6 provides that anyone who "publishes or causes the publication of a statement that is likely to be understood by some or all of the members of the public to whom it is published as a direct or indirect encouragement or other inducement to them to the commission or preparation or instigation of an act of terrorism is punishable with rigorous imprisonment from ten to 20 years".

The Committee notes that, during the discussion by the United Nations Human Rights Council of the Universal Periodic Review of Ethiopia in December 2009, concern was expressed about Anti-Terrorism Proclamation No. 652/2009 which, due to its broad definition of terrorism had led to abusive restrictions on the press (A/HRC/13/17, 4 January 2010). The Government accepted "to take further measures to ensure that any efforts to counter terrorism are carried out in full compliance with its human rights obligations, including respect for due process and freedom of expression" (paragraph 91).

The Committee observes that, on 2 February 2012, UN human rights experts, including the UN Special Rapporteur on freedom of expression, expressed their dismay at the continuing abuse of anti-terrorism legislation to curb freedom of expression in Ethiopia. The Committee notes with concern that under Anti-Terrorism Proclamation No. 652/2009 journalists and opposition politicians have recently been given sentences ranging from 11 years to life imprisonment and numerous defendants are scheduled to appear on similar charges before the Court.

The Committee recalls that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour, including compulsory prison labour, as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee points out that the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite to violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. The Committee also recalls that the protection conferred by the Convention is not limited to activities expressing or manifesting opinions diverging from established principles; even if certain activities aim to bring about fundamental changes in state institutions, such activities are covered by the Convention, as long as they do not resort to or call for violent means to these ends. The Committee would also like to point out that, if counter-terrorism legislation responds to the legitimate need to protect the security of the public against the use of violence, it can nevertheless become a means of political coercion and a means of punishing the peaceful exercise of civil rights and liberties, such as freedom of expression and the right to organize. The Convention protects these rights and liberties against repression by means of sanctions involving compulsory work, and the limits which may be imposed on them by law need to be properly addressed.

Observing the broad scope of application in practice of Anti-Terrorism Proclamation No. 652/2009, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to limit its scope of application and ensure that no sanctions involving compulsory labour can be imposed on those holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system under this Proclamation. It requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the measures taken to bring its legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention in this respect.

In the light of the above considerations, the Committee again requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the application in practice of the abovementioned sections 482(2), 484(2), 486(a) and 487(a) of the Criminal Code, including copies of any court decisions defining or illustrating their scope, so as to enable the Committee to ascertain whether they are applied in a manner which is in conformity with the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Germany

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1956)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 2(2)(c) of the Convention. Work of prisoners for private enterprises. In comments made for a number of years, the Committee referred to the situation of prisoners in the country who, in law and practice, are obliged to work, without their consent, in workshops run by private enterprises within state prisons, in conditions not comparable to those found in the free labour market. The Committee recalled that work by prisoners for private enterprises can be held compatible with the Convention only where the necessary safeguards exist to ensure that the prisoners concerned offer themselves voluntarily, without being subjected to pressure or the menace of any penalty, by giving their formal, free and informed consent to work for private enterprises. In such a situation, work of prisoners for private parties would not come under the scope of the Convention, since no compulsion is involved. Moreover, the Committee has considered that, in the prison context, the most reliable indicator of the voluntariness of labour is that the work is performed under conditions which approximate a free labour relationship, including wages, social security and occupational safety and health. In this connection, the Committee previously noted that the requirement of the prisoner's formal consent to be employed in a workshop run by a private enterprise, laid down in section 41(3) of the Act on the execution of sentences of 1976, had been suspended by the Second Act to improve the budget structure, of 22 December 1981. It therefore requested that measures be taken to ensure that formal, free and informed consent is required for the work of prisoners in private enterprise workshops inside prison premises.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that in September 2011, ten federal states (Länder) (Brandenburg, Berlin, Bremen, Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania, Rhineland-Palatinate, Schleswig-Holstein, Saarland, Saxony and Thuringia) presented a common model Penal Enforcement Bill, and that this model does not require a prisoner to work. The Committee welcomes this initiative and notes that section 22(1) of the model Penal Enforcement Bill states that work shall be assigned to prisoners upon their request or with their consent. The Committee notes, however, the Government's statement that it is unsure of the extent to which this particular aspect of the model legislation will be followed by legislators in the various Länder. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that as of 2010, 60.19 per cent of prisoners were employed and that 14.94 per cent of all prisoners were employed with private enterprises (ranging from below 1 per cent to 22.6 per cent in the respective Länder). The Government states that the employment of prisoners contributes to their social rehabilitation and that prisoners are in need of the wages provided in order to meet maintenance payments, pay debts and purchase items for their personal use. Additionally, the Committee notes the Government's reiteration that there continues to be a job shortage in prisons and that prison authorities therefore welcome jobs made available by private enterprises. Taking due note of the information provided by the Government and with reference to paragraphs 278 and 279 of the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to encourage the enactment of the model Penal Enforcement Bill in the ten Länder concerned, to ensure that work may only be performed by prisoners in private enterprise workshops with their formal and informed consent, and that such consent is free from the menace of any penalty and authenticated by the conditions of work approximating a free labour relationship. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on developments in this regard, as well as a copies of the relevant legislation adopted in each Land pursuant to this model Bill. In addition, the Committee trusts that similar measures will soon be taken in the remaining six Länder to grant prisoners working for private enterprises within prison workshops a legal status and conditions of employment that are compatible with this Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged in this regard, in its next report.

Ghana

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1958)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a), (c) and (d) of the Convention. 1. In comments made for a considerable number of years, the Committee has referred to provisions of the Criminal Code, the Newspaper Licensing Decree, 1973, the Merchant Shipping Act, 1963, the Protection of Property (Trade Disputes) Ordinance and the Industrial Relations Act, 1965, under which imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour) may be imposed as a punishment for non-observance of restrictions imposed by discretionary decision of the executive on the publication of newspapers and the carrying on of associations, for various breaches of discipline in the merchant marine and for participation in certain forms of strikes. Having requested the Government to adopt the necessary measures in regard to these provisions to ensure that no form of forced or compulsory labour (including compulsory prison labour) might be exacted in circumstances falling within Article 1(a), (c) or (d) of the Convention, the Committee noted the Government's statement that the National Advisory Committee on Labour was discussing the comments of the Committee of Experts and that it was the wish of the Government to bring the legislation concerned into conformity with the Convention. The Government also indicated in its report received in 1996 that the National Advisory Committee on Labour concluded discussions on the Committee of Experts' comments and submitted recommendations to the Minister in March 1994 designed to bring domestic legislation into conformity with ILO standards, and the comments of the Committee of Experts had been submitted to the Attorney-General for a closer study and expert comments.

The Government has previously indicated that the action of the Attorney-General to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention in accordance with the recommendations of the National Advisory Committee on Labour has been halted in view of the proposed review and codification of the labour laws. It has also indicated that the tripartite National Forum that includes representatives of the Attorney-General's Office, the National Advisory Committee on Labour and the employers' and workers' organizations, would consider the comments made by the Committee of Experts regarding the application of the Convention.

The Government indicates that the National Forum has already codified all the country's labour laws into a single labour bill, which is being considered by the Cabinet and will be forwarded to Parliament to be passed into law. The Committee expresses firm hope that the necessary action will at last be taken on the various points which are once again recalled in detail in a request addressed directly to the Government.

2. The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Political Parties Law, 1992, the Emergency Powers Act, 1994, and the Public Order Act, 1994, which gave rise to a number of questions under the Convention that are also reiterated in the request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Guatemala

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes the Government's report as well as the observations made by the Indigenous and Rural Workers' Trade Union Movement of Guatemala (MSICG) on the application of the Convention, which were received on 1 September 2012 and sent to the Government on 24 September 2012.

Article 1(a), (c) and (d) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour imposed for expressing opposition to the established economic and social order, for breaches of labour discipline and for participation in strikes. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take the appropriate measures to amend sections 419, 390(2) and 430 of the Penal Code, given that, under these provisions, prison sentences involving compulsory labour (under section 47 of the Penal Code) can be imposed, in breach of the Convention, as a means of labour discipline or for participation in a strike. Under section 419 of the Penal Code, "any public servant or employee who fails or refuses to carry out, or delays carrying out, any duty pertaining to his position or office, shall be punished with imprisonment of from one to three years"; according to section 390(2), "anyone committing an act intended to paralyze or disrupt an enterprise that contributes to the economic development of the country shall be punished with imprisonment of from one to five years"; and finally, section 430 stipulates that "public servants, public employees and other employees or members of the staff of public service enterprises who collectively abandon their jobs, work or service, shall be punished with imprisonment of from six months to two years. The penalties shall be doubled where such stoppage harms the public interest, and in the case of leaders, promoters or organizers of a collective stoppage". The Committee noted in particular that, although proposals to amend sections 390(2) and 430 of the Penal Code had been drafted with ILO technical assistance by the Tripartite Commission appointed in 2008 to examine the legislative reforms to be made in follow-up to the Committee's comments, no legislative reforms had been made and no bill had been submitted to Congress.

The Committee notes that, according to information submitted by the Government to supplement its report on 5 November 2012, the Government indicates that there is no legislative initiative before Congress to amend the provisions of the Penal Code referred to by the Committee in so far as these provisions do not usually penalize strike action or breaches of labour discipline but rather events that undermine social order – and, in view of their repercussions, also sometimes social peace. The Committee notes that the Government submitted, as an example, a legal ruling based on section 419 of the Penal Code for a case of embezzlement of public funds by a local authority.

The Committee also notes that, in its observations, the MSICG underlines the State's lack of political will to follow through with the necessary legislative reforms. According to the MSICG, the Government has been making formal announcements for many years about the agreements reached in various committees, the drafting of bills, the strengthening of the Tripartite Commission or the recourse to ILO technical assistance, without any of these announcements actually resulting in the adoption of the necessary reforms. The MSICG also refers to other provisions in the Penal Code which give a very wide interpretation of the elements constituting an offence, so that actions considered normal in the context of a social protest, a strike or any other demonstration by civil society could be covered by this definition (sections 256 and 391 of the Penal Code concerning unlawful appropriation of property (usurpación) and the definition of terrorism). The trade union believes that any legal provisions that criminalize social protests on the basis of offences that have been very broadly defined, excludes an environment conducive to the exercise of freedom of association; consequently, given the considerable restrictions imposed on the right to strike, exercising freedom of association runs the risk of trade union activities being penalized.

The Committee recalls that it has been making comments on the need to amend sections 419, 390(2) and 430 of the Penal Code for more than 30 years and that the Government has, on several occasions, given the assurance that the penal legislation will be brought into conformity with the Convention, the last time being in the context of the work of the Tripartite Commission appointed in 2008 to examine the legislative reforms to be made in follow-up to the comments of the Committee. It regrets to note that the Government no longer refers to its intention to review the abovementioned provisions and recalls that, in the context of the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), it is also calling for the amendment of sections 390(2) and 430 of the Penal Code. Consequently, the Committee urges the Government to adopt the necessary measures with a view to amending or repealing the provisions in sections 419, 390(2) and 430 of the Penal Code, to ensure that nobody who peacefully participated in a strike or breached labour discipline may be penalized by a prison sentence involving compulsory prison labour. The Committee also requests the Government to send information on the observations made by the MSICG on the criminalization of social protests and trade union activities.

Guyana

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to observations received from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which contained allegations that there was evidence of trafficking for forced prostitution and for child prostitution in cities and remote gold mining areas.

The Committee has noted the adoption of the Combating of Trafficking in Persons Act, 2005, as well as the Government's indication in the report that 300 volunteers have been trained to identify cases of trafficking. The Committee would appreciate it if the Government would provide information on the following matters:

- the activities of the task force to develop and implement a national plan for the prevention of trafficking in persons, to which reference is made in section 30 of the above Act, supplying copies of any relevant reports, studies and inquiries, as well as a copy of the National Plan;
- statistical data on trafficking which is collected and published by the Ministry of Home Affairs in virtue of section 31 of the Act;
- any legal proceedings which have been instituted as a consequence of the application of section 3(1) of the 2005 Act on penalties, supplying copies of the relevant court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed, as well as the information on measures taken to ensure that this provision is strictly enforced against perpetrators, as required by Article 25 of the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Hungary

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1956)

Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention. 1. Work of prisoners for private companies. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the national provisions allowing law enforcement authorities to conclude agreements with private companies concerning the work of prisoners (section 101(3) of Order No. 6/1996 (VII 12) of the Ministry of Justice on the implementation of provisions concerning prison sentences and detention). The Committee also noted that, pursuant to section 33(1)(d) of Law-Decree No. 11 (1979) on the execution of prison sentences, convicts have to carry out their work assignments given to them in accordance with their vocational qualifications and abilities. The Government indicated that, in practice, only those convicts who expressly ask for a job may be given work assignments, as the number of job opportunities was lower than the number of convicts applying for a job. The Government indicated that convicts did not have an obligation to work, but work may be assigned to them at their request. In order to get a work assignment, convicts must apply for a particular job by signing an application form, which should be examined by admission and employment committees of penitentiary institutions. The Government stated that prisoners work under conditions approximating a free employment relationship, as regards occupational safety and health, working time and rest periods, paid leave, as well as a wide range of health-care provisions and accident-related benefits within the scope of social security benefits. Noting that the Government was pursuing amendments to Law-Decree No. 11 (1979) on the execution of prison sentences, the Committee expressed the hope that measures would be taken to include into the revised legislation a provision requiring free and informed consent for the work of prisoners for private companies, both inside and outside prison premises, so as to bring legislation into full conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that Law-Decree No. 11 (1979) was amended on 1 January 2012. In this regard, the Committee notes with satisfaction that these amendments included the insertion of section 44(5) of Law-Decree No. 11 (1979), which states that a prisoner may work at an external business enterprise with the written consent of the prisoner. Section 44(5) further states that if the prisoner revokes his or her consent, the provisions of the Labour Code on termination of employment shall be applicable, with a notice of cancellation of 30 days. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that Regulation No. 6/1996 of the Minister of Justice on the implementation of rules of conviction and preliminary arrest was also amended on 1 January 2012. The Government states that the amendment included the insertion of a new section 19(c), which states that in order to designate a prisoner for work performed at an external business enterprise (pursuant to section 44 of Law-Decree No. 11 (1979)), the prisoner must make a statement at the time of reception indicating whether he or she consents to being employed in a business enterprise. The Government states that the new rules also state that in case of employment at an external business enterprise, the prisoner may withdraw his or her consent either verbally or in writing.

2. Labour for public interest performed by convicted persons placed at the disposal of private parties. The Committee previously noted the Penal Code provisions concerning labour for public interest, which is labour performed as a penal sanction, without deprivation of a person's freedom and without remuneration, and which may be replaced by confinement in prison, if the convicted person fails to fulfil his or her labour obligations (sections 49–50 of the Penal Code). The Committee noted the Government's indication that work performed as labour for public interest must be for the interest of the public and that the employer (which may be a public institution, or a private business organization) shall observe the safety provisions and ensure the same working conditions as those enjoyed by workers employed on the basis of a contract. The Government also indicated that, according to a 2008 study, probation officers approached municipal bodies or institutions to employ convicts in 60 per cent of cases, private business organizations in 10.9 per cent of cases, and various non-public associations and foundations in 9.3 per cent of cases. The Committee expressed the hope that measures would be taken to introduce a requirement of the informed voluntary consent of convicted persons sentenced to community service to work for a private employer.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that section 7(1) of Act II of 2012 (on offences, infringement procedures and an infringement registration system) provides for the possibility to impose community service as a penalty in the case of an offence, if the convicted person states that he or she consents to the imposition of community service work. In this regard, the Committee notes that section 104 of Act II of 2012 states that the refusal of consent by the convicted person precludes the imposition of community service. Moreover, the Government states that a convicted person may also choose to perform community service work instead of the payment of a fine. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that if a convicted person fails to complete his or her community service work, or chooses not to, the penalty will be changed to another type of punishment.

Concerning the consent of persons sentenced to community work working for private enterprises, the Committee notes the Government's indication that convicted persons must provide their consent to the probation officer concerning the forwarding of their relevant personal data to the designated place of work. The Government also states that convicted persons can request that the designated workplace be changed, under certain conditions. Taking due note of the information provided by the Government, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the conditions under which the designated workplace can be changed at the request of the convicted person, and to provide copies of any relevant provisions in this regard.

India

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1954)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Bonded labour. Magnitude of the problem. The Committee refers to its earlier comments in which it noted the allegations made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), based on findings from various research studies, that bonded labour in agriculture and in industries like mining, brick kilns, silk and cotton production, and bidi making was likely to be affecting millions of workers across the country. The Committee asked the Government on numerous occasions to undertake a national survey on bonded labour, with the involvement of the social partners and using any statistical methods it considers appropriate.

The Committee takes due note of the Government's views expressed in its report that such a national survey cannot be done by using statistical tools/methodologies adopted for the purpose of collecting data on any issue on a macro basis. The Government considers that the issues relating to the identification of bonded labour are sensitive in nature, which requires that the interviewers have to collect information by interviewing the affected persons about the nature of exploitation and their service conditions, in order to be able to identify whether they fall in the category of bonded labour. The Government reiterates that it had provided grants to state governments for conducting district-level surveys of bonded labour, and that a large number of such surveys had been conducted by the state governments. In this regard, the Committee previously noted a detailed report on the survey conducted in the State of Gujarat, supplied by the Government. On the other hand, the Committee noted that the Government, in cooperation with the ILO, was about to undertake a detailed survey on the vulnerable groups of workers who often become victims of bonded labour.

While taking due note of the above information, the Committee trusts that the Government will see no difficulty in preparing a nationwide survey on bonded labour, in cooperation with the ILO and with the involvement of the social partners, by compiling the existing data from all the district-level surveys referred to above conducted by all state governments and using any statistical methodology that might be considered appropriate. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to provide information on the progress made in this regard.

Vigilance committees

In its earlier comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure the proper functioning and effectiveness of the vigilance committees established under the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act, 1976 (BLSA) by all state governments at the district and sub-divisional levels. The Committee notes the Government's indications in its report that state governments are frequently requested to ensure that the vigilance committees hold their meetings on a regular basis, and that the National Human Rights Commission (NHRC), in collaboration with the Ministry of Labour and Employment, continues to organize sensitization workshops at various places in the states. The Government also indicates that, in the State of Gujarat, a Rural Labour Commissioner has been appointed by the State Government to look after the rehabilitation of bonded labourers in rural areas, and the District Labour Officer (Rural) is working as a member secretary in the vigilance committees of district and local levels. The Committee hopes that the Government will continue to describe, in its future reports, the measures taken or envisaged to ensure the proper functioning and effectiveness of the vigilance committees, including copies of the relevant reports, studies and inquiries.

Release and rehabilitation

The Committee previously noted that the NHRC had been involved in the supervision of the implementation of the BLSA and the Centrally Sponsored Scheme for rehabilitation of bonded labour victims, and that Special Rapporteurs had been appointed by the NHRC in order to make periodic visits to districts to assess the situation at the ground level. The Government indicates in its report that sensitization workshops are being held at various places by the NHRC in collaboration with the Ministry of Labour and Employment by the frontline staff and district functionaries. It also indicates that a special group constituted under the chairmanship of the Union Labour and Employment Secretary has continued to monitor the implementation of the BLSA and has held 21 meetings. The Committee notes with interest the updated statistics provided by the Government showing the increased numbers of bonded labourers identified and released (294,155) and rehabilitated (274,193) under the Centrally Sponsored Scheme up to 31 March 2012.

The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide, in its future reports, updated information on the measures taken to effectively implement release and rehabilitation programmes at the state level, including statistical information on the identification, release and rehabilitation of bonded labourers.

Measures to reduce vulnerability of workers to bondage situations

The Committee previously noted the information regarding the project "Reducing vulnerability to bondage in India through promotion of decent work", which had been prepared by the Ministry of Labour and Employment, with the assistance of the ILO Special Action Programme to Combat Forced Labour (SAP-FL), which has the overall objective to reduce the vulnerability of workers to bondage situations in the brick manufacturing and rice mill sectors in Tamil Nadu by achieving a significant improvement in living and working conditions for women and men workers and their family members. The project established close collaboration between the federal Government, state governments, trade unions and employers of the concerned sectors in order to develop and implement a "convergence-based" approach for the prevention and reduction of vulnerability to bonded labour and for the extension of social protection to migrant workers. While a decision was taken to focus in the first instance on Tamil Nadu, the project was subsequently expanded to other states and is currently being implemented also in the States of Andhra Pradesh, Orissa, Uttar Pradesh, Jharkhand and Chhattisgarh. According to the Government's report, an active social dialogue process is set in motion in the brick manufacturing sector with the involvement of employers, trade unions and officials from labour and factories departments. Thus, in Tamil Nadu, the project has been implemented since 2008 with the active involvement of the Ministry of Labour and Employment, the government of Tamil Nadu, Joint Action Forum of Trade Unions (JAFTU), employers' organizations and civil society.

The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide, in its future reports, information on the application of the above project in practice, as well as information on other measures taken to reduce workers' vulnerability to bondage, including information on the activities of the Task Force established by the Ministry of Labour and Employment and composed of members of the Ministry of Social Justice and Empowerment, the NHRC and the ILO, in order to consider various issues related to bonded labour, to which reference is made in the report.

Law enforcement. Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act, 1976 (BLSA)

With regard to the issue of enforcement of the penalty provisions of the BLSA, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that, in Karnataka State, 257 cases have been booked against employers/owners under the Act, of which 156 cases have been disposed and 101 cases are still pending trial. However, while having noted the Government's repeated statement in its reports that the NHRC has been monitoring issues related to prosecutions and convictions under the above Act, the Committee notes from the Government's latest report that no information concerning such prosecutions and convictions has been received by the NHRC from state governments so far. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will not fail to provide, in its next report, information concerning the numbers of prosecutions and convictions, as well as specific criminal penalties which have been imposed on the perpetrators convicted under the BLSA, supplying copies of the relevant court decisions.

Child labour

The Committee notes with interest from the Government's report that the Child Labour (Prohibition and Regulation) Act, 1986 (CLPRA) was amended in 2011, on the advice of the Technical Advisory Committee on Child Labour, to include two additional occupations where the employment of children is prohibited, thus bringing the total of prohibited occupations and processes under the Act to 18 occupations and 65 processes. It also notes the Government's indication that it continues to carry out awareness-raising media campaigns (e.g. through electronic media like Doordarshan and All India Radio) on the effective implementation of the CLPRA. The Committee also notes the statistical information provided by the Government as regards inspections, prosecutions and convictions, both at the Central and State level. It notes, in particular, the Government's indication that, during the period between 2009 and 2011, 22,468 prosecutions were launched and 2,896 employers were convicted under the CLPRA. As regards the strengthening of the legislative framework for protection of children, the Government indicates that the Draft Offences against Children Bill, 2006, which is supposed to cover all offences against children, has not yet been finalized. However, a draft Bill covering only sexual offences against children has been formulated and passed by the Rajya Sabha and the Lok Sabha (Upper and Lower House of Parliament) in May 2012.

The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application in practice of the CLPRA, including information on the specific penalties imposed in cases of convictions under the Act and supplying sample copies of the relevant court decisions. It also asks the Government to keep the ILO informed of the developments concerning the finalization and the adoption of the Draft Offences against Children Bill referred to above.

The Committee welcomes the updated information concerning the implementation of the National Child Labour Project (NCLP), which has been implemented by the Government in 266 districts across 20 states. Under the NCLP scheme, child labourers are identified, rescued and enrolled in special schools before being mainstreamed into the formal education system. The Committee notes the comprehensive statistical information supplied by the Government showing details of rehabilitation of child labourers under the NCLP scheme and under the State Child Labour Project scheme in the State of Karnataka, for the period from 2003 to 2012. As regards a convergence project launched by the Government in cooperation with ILO-IPEC (Converging against Child Labour: Support for India's Model), which is aimed at the educational rehabilitation of victims of child labour and the economic rehabilitation of their families, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that this project is being implemented in ten districts in five States (Bihar, Jharkhand, Madhya Pradesh, Gujarat and Orissa). The Project also seeks to develop strategies for migrant and trafficked children to re-integrate them with their families and to provide them with educational benefits. The Government indicates that the Ministry of Labour and Employment is taking various pro-active measures towards convergence between the schemes of different Ministries: (i) Ministry of Women and Child Development (for supplementing its efforts in providing food and shelter to the children withdrawn from work through their schemes of shelter homes, etc.); (ii) Ministry of Human Resources Development (for providing mid-day meals to the NCLP school children, teachers' training, supply of books, etc., and mainstreaming of NCLP children into the formal education system); (iii) Ministries of Rural Development, Urban Housing and Poverty Alleviation (for covering these children under their various income and employment generation schemes for their economic rehabilitation). The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the practical implementation of the above projects and the results obtained.

The Committee refers to its earlier comments in which it noted a communication dated 16 March 2010, received from the Dakshini Rajasthan Majdoor Union (DRMU), which contained allegations concerning the situation of migrant workers, especially children, who are subject to compulsory labour practices in cotton production in India, particularly in the states of Gujarat, Andhra Pradesh, Maharashtra and Tamil Nadu. The Union alleged that, through the compilation of surveys of India's major cotton producing states, it found that over 400,000 children are working in that industry alone. According to the allegations, migrant workers, particularly children are sought for these jobs especially because they can be paid rates lower than those required by minimum wages laws; there are many cases in which the children are not paid at all if poor working conditions or any other situation had compelled them to return to their villages before the end of the season. According to the DRMU, in most cases of child labour on cotton-seed farms, the children have been persuaded to market their labour by their friends and their families, who make the ultimate decision to send them for work; cotton field labourers work an average of nine to 13 hours per day, and most of them are never paid overtime for their work; their working and living conditions are visibly poor. The DRMU considered that measures to protect children and migrant workers in cotton production are not sufficient and, even if statistical data decreased in some areas, the practice continues to be common and widespread.

The Committee notes the comprehensive information provided by the Government in reply to the above allegations, and in particular, the information on various legislative, rescue and rehabilitation measures, as well as social protection, poverty alleviation and employment generation schemes implemented within the framework of the National Policy on Child Labour and in pursuance of the NCLP and other projects adopted at the national and state levels referred to above. The Committee notes the Government's indication that manufacturing of cotton is not banned under the CLPRA, but is covered by the regulation part of the Act (Part III), which deals with the regulation of conditions of work of children. The Government also indicates that, with regard to the DRMU's allegations, the governments of Tamil Nadu and Gujarat have informed that no complaints have been received regarding children subjected to compulsory labour practices in cotton-seed production farms in the districts concerned. However, an Integrated Child Protection Programme was launched in 2009 for a period of five years by the government of Tamil Nadu in cooperation with UNICEF with specific focus on child labour and for protecting the rights of children in cotton seed/cotton farming communities. The objectives of the programme include, inter alia, strengthening of child protection structures at district and Panchayat (village council) level, making available quality education for children of 6–14 years of age, enhancing access to service providers and social protection schemes for vulnerable families, and making available to all children essential preventive and promotive health and nutrition care services. The government of Gujarat has indicated that, as soon as any complaint is received, appropriate steps will be taken under the law by the Officers of the Labour Department and prosecutions could be launched against the owner of a cotton seed farm. The government of Karnataka has indicated that two projects have been launched at the District level in cooperation with UNICEF to rehabilitate children engaged in cotton seed farming, and that 846 child labourers from cotton fields have been rehabilitated so far.

While noting this information, the Committee requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the labour protection and rehabilitation measures taken to prevent children working in cotton production from engaging in hazardous work in Gujarat, Andhra Pradesh, Maharashtra and other states concerned, including statistics showing the numbers of child labourers rescued and rehabilitated and indicating whether prosecutions have been launched against perpetrators and the penalties imposed.

Prostitution and commercial sexual exploitation

The Committee notes with interest the comprehensive information provided by the Government concerning the implementation of the Ujjawala federal scheme on prevention of trafficking and rescue, rehabilitation and reintegration of victims of trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee notes, in particular, that the Ministry of Women and Child Development has sanctioned 188 projects in 19 states under the scheme and that grants for setting up 96 protective and rehabilitation homes, with the capacity to accommodate 4,350 victims, have been given by the Government under the rehabilitation component of the scheme. The Committee also notes the Government's indications concerning the work of the Central Advisory Committee (CAC) for preventing and combating trafficking of women and children for purposes of commercial sexual exploitation, which has been constituted by the Ministry of Women and Child Development with the participation of several other central ministries and which holds regular meetings at three month intervals. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide, in its future reports, information on the implementation and impact of the Ujjawala federal scheme, as well as information about the work of the CAC, including any official reports assessing the effectiveness of its work and its impact in practice on combating trafficking in women and children for purposes of sexual exploitation.

Referring to its earlier comments, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the Immoral Traffic Prevention Bill, 2006, which has been drafted to amend the Immoral Traffic (Prevention) Act, 1956 (ITPA), with a view to widening its scope and providing for more stringent punishments for trafficking in persons, including children, is still under consideration. The Committee reiterates its hope that the Bill amending the ITPA will soon be adopted and that the Government will supply a copy of the new legislation, as soon as it is promulgated.

The Committee is also raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Indonesia

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1950)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. 1. Law enforcement. The Committee previously requested information on the judicial proceedings instituted under Law No. 21/2007 on combating trafficking in persons. It also requested information on the activities of the Task Force to Prevent and Address the Criminal Act of Trafficking in Persons (Task Force), established pursuant to Presidential Decree No. 69/2008.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that, in practice, Law No. 21/2007 has been strictly applied, and notes the Supreme Court Decision No. 2090 K/Pid.Sus/2009, submitted with the Government's report, on its application. The Committee also notes the Government's indication in its report submitted under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) that in 2011 the police handled cases of trafficking involving 146 adults and 68 children. The Government indicates that 164 trafficking offenders were identified, and 91 of the cases were successfully prosecuted. The Committee further notes that, pursuant to section 4 of Presidential Decree No. 69/2008, the Task Force is responsible for coordinating efforts to prevent and address trafficking in persons, as well as monitoring the progress of law enforcement in this regard. Additionally, concerning enforcement efforts, the Committee notes the Government's indication that it has developed a model for the prevention of trafficking and has provided training to officials on this subject.

The Committee notes that the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), in its concluding observations of 27 July 2012, expressed concern at the gaps in the enforcement of Law No. 21/2007 and on the low number of persons convicted and punished for trafficking (CEDAW/C/IDN/CO/6-7, paragraph 29). The Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to prevent, suppress and combat trafficking in persons, and to continue to provide information on the measures taken in this regard, including by the Task Force. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to effectively enforce Act No. 21/2007 as well as on the results achieved, particularly the number of investigations, prosecutions and convictions. Moreover, recalling that Article 25 of the Convention provides that the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable by penalties that are really adequate and strictly enforced, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the specific penalties imposed on persons convicted under Act No. 21/2007, in its next report.

2. Protection and reintegration of victims. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Task Force had established an integrated service centre for empowering women and child victims of trafficking. The Committee notes that, pursuant to section 4 of Presidential Decree No. 69/2008, the Task Force's responsibilities include monitoring the progress of the implementation of measures taken for the protection of victims, particularly for their rehabilitation, repatriation and social reintegration. Sections 12 and 13 of the Decree establish provincial and district/municipal task forces, to coordinate with the National Task Force. In this regard, the Committee notes the indication in the Government's report that it has established provincial task forces in 21 provinces and district task forces in 72 districts/cities. The Government also indicates that measures have been taken to provide a single identification number to each citizen to prevent the falsification of documents. Moreover, the Government indicates that it has coordinated with relevant agencies and NGOs on the dissemination of information and advocacy concerning trafficking in persons.

The Committee further notes the Government's statement in its report submitted to the Human Rights Committee of 19 March 2012 that the Integrated Service Unit provides integrated activities and services for victims of trafficking and violence (CCPR/C/IDN/1, paragraph 119). The Government indicates that the Standards for Minimum Services for this Unit were launched in August 2010, which includes requiring each district/municipality to have at least two community health-care centres particularly designed to prevent and respond to violence against women and children (CCPR/C/IDN/1, paragraph 41). The Government further indicates in this report, that between March 2005 and June 2010, 3,642 trafficking victims were identified and assisted, including 3,298 female victims (CCPR/C/IDN/1, paragraph 123). The Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to provide appropriate protection and assistance to victims of trafficking with a view to facilitating their subsequent reintegration into society. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the specific measures taken in this regard, as well as information on the number of persons benefiting from these services.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25. Vulnerability of migrant workers to conditions of forced labour. 1. Law enforcement and monitoring. The Committee previously noted that the Government was taking measures to improve the protection of Indonesian migrant workers against forced labour exploitation. These included the provision of training to migrant workers, services provided to migrant workers in Indonesian diplomatic missions overseas and the adoption of Law No. 39 of 2004 on the Placement and Protection of Indonesian Migrant Workers in Foreign Countries, Regulation PER-07/MEN/V/2010 on Insurance for Indonesian Migrant Workers, and Regulation PER 03/KA/II/2010 on the Standard of Services for the Protection of Migrant Workers.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that it continues to provide information to potential migrants on working abroad and on their rights as migrant workers. It also states that the National Agency for the Placement and Protection of Indonesian Migrant Workers (BNP2TKI) has developed a series of best practices to prevent the trafficking of Indonesian migrant workers. The Government further indicates that task forces for the prevention of non-procedural departures of migrant workers have been established in 14 border areas and that the registration of prospective workers is done both online and at the district offices of the Department of Manpower. Concerning the application of Law No. 39 of 2004, the Government indicates that both the BNP2TKI and the Ministry of Manpower and Transmigration (MoMT) conduct direct monitoring of private recruitment agencies with a view to preventing exploitation. The Government also indicates that the BNP2TKI takes measures to contact the relevant private recruitment agencies concerning violations, and if the problem is not resolved, the BNP2TKI recommends to the MoMT that sanctions should be imposed on the company. Moreover, the Government indicates that it has issued a Ministerial Decree on placement fees payable by migrant workers, to protect migrant workers from illegal financing practices.

However, the Committee notes the Government's statement in its report to the CEDAW of 7 January 2011 that Indonesian migrant workers experience a lot of human rights abuses, including forced labour, and that many migrant workers are also victims of human trafficking (CEDAW/C/IDN/6-7, paragraphs 37–38). The Committee also notes that the CEDAW, in its concluding observations of 27 July 2012, welcomed the monitoring of recruitment agencies, but also reiterated its deep concern about the persistence of violence, abuse and exploitation experienced by female migrant workers in the host countries and at the hands of the recruitment agencies that facilitate their placement (CEDAW/C/IDN/CO/6-7/R.1, paragraph 43).

The Committee recalls the importance of taking effective action to ensure that the system of the employment of migrant workers does not place the workers concerned in a situation of increased vulnerability, particularly where they are subjected to abusive employer practices, such as retention of passports, non-payment of wages, deprivation of liberty and physical and sexual abuse. Such practices might cause their employment to be transformed into situations that could amount to forced labour. The Committee therefore urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure that migrant workers are fully protected from abusive practices and conditions that amount to the exaction of forced labour, and to continue to provide information on measures taken in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government to pursue its efforts to monitor recruitment agencies, including through the effective application of Law No. 39/2004 on the Placement and Protection of Indonesian Migrant Workers. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the application of Law No. 39/2004 in practice, particularly the number of violations reported, investigations, prosecutions and the specific penalties applied.

2. International cooperation. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that moratoriums had been established on sending domestic workers to Jordan, Malaysia and Kuwait. The Government indicated that a letter of intent had been signed with the Government of Malaysia to stipulate that Indonesian domestic workers had the right to retain their passports while in Malaysia, were entitled to one rest day a week, and would have wages commensurate with the market.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that a moratorium on sending workers to Saudi Arabia was imposed in 2010, and that it is pursuing MoUs with Saudi Arabia and Kuwait. The Government indicates that it plans to establish legal attachés in Saudi Arabia and Malaysia with a view to providing protection to Indonesian workers in these countries. The Committee also notes that the Government has collaborated with the ILO to implement the Combating Forced Labour and Trafficking of Indonesian Migrant Workers Project, which aims to strengthen the protection of migrant workers against trafficking and forced labour practices as well as empower them financially in order to provide alternatives to hazardous overseas labour conditions and migration practices. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on international cooperation efforts undertaken to support migrant workers in destination countries, including measures specifically tailored to the difficult circumstances faced by such workers to prevent and respond to cases of abuse. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate, in its next report, whether there are plans to include guarantees similar to those contained in the MoU with the Government of Malaysia in bilateral agreements with other countries, as well as information on the implementation of such agreements in practice.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1999)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Use of compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing views opposed to the established political, social or economic system. 1. Penal Code. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, pursuant to sections 14 and 19 of the Criminal Code and sections 57(1) and 59(2) of the Prisons Regulations, sentences of imprisonment involve compulsory prison labour. The Committee also noted that sections 154 and 155 of the Criminal Code establish a penalty of imprisonment for up to seven years and four-and-a-half years, respectively, for a person who publicly gives expression to feelings of hostility, hatred or contempt against the Government (section 154) or who disseminates, openly demonstrates or puts up a writing containing such feelings, with the intent to give publicity to the contents or to enhance the publicity thereof (section 155). However, it noted that the Constitutional Court, in its ruling on Case No. 6/PUU-V/2007, found sections 154 and 155 of the Criminal Code to be contrary to the Constitution of 1945. The Committee further noted that, in ruling No. 013-022/PUU-IV/2006, the Constitutional Court found that it was inappropriate for Indonesia to maintain sections 134, 136bis and 137 of the Criminal Code (respecting deliberate insults against the President or the Vice-President), since they negate the principle of equality before the law, diminish freedom of expression and opinion, freedom of information and the principle of legal certainty. The Constitutional Court stated that the new draft text of the Criminal Code must not include similar provisions.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that it is in the process of amending the Criminal Code, and that these amendments have been included as a priority in the National Legislation Programme 2010–14, to be addressed by the House of Representatives. The Government states that it will take the Committee's comments into consideration during the formulation of this draft. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take into account the above rulings of the Constitutional Court, as well as the comments of the Committee, in the context of the elaboration of amendments to the Criminal Code, to ensure that no prison sentence entailing compulsory labour can be imposed on persons who express certain political views or opposition to the established political, social or economic system. It expresses the firm hope that the amendments to the Criminal Code will be elaborated and adopted in the near future, and requests the Government to provide a copy, once adopted.

2. Law No. 27 of 1999 on the Revision of the Criminal Code. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted that under section 107(a), (d) and (e) of Law No. 27 of 1999 on the Revision of the Criminal Code (in relation to crimes against state security), sentences of imprisonment may be imposed upon any person who disseminates or develops the teachings of "Communism/Marxism–Leninism" orally, in writing or through any media, or establishes an organization based on such teachings, or establishes relations with such an organization, with a view to replacing Pancasila as the State's foundation. In this regard, the Government confirmed that any person who jeopardizes national stability may be punished with a sentence of imprisonment, which involves the obligation to work. The Committee expressed the hope that Law No. 27 of 1999 would be amended in the near future.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that Law No. 27 of 1999 cannot be amended due to the mandate stated in Law No. 1/MPR/2003, on the status of legislative provisions. Section 2 of Law No. 1/MPR/2003 states that Decree No. XXV/MPRS/1966 (which relates to the dissolution of the Communist Party of Indonesia, the prohibition of the Indonesian Communist Party and the prohibition of activities to disseminate and develop a Communist/Marxist–Leninist ideology or doctrine) shall remain valid, and shall be enforced with fairness and respect for the law. In this regard, the Committee recalls that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits all recourse to forced or compulsory labour, including compulsory prison labour, as a means of political coercion or as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. It also points out that the protection conferred by the Convention includes certain activities aiming to bring about fundamental changes in state institutions, as long as such activities do not resort to or call for violent means to these ends. Recalling that it has been raising this issue for more than a decade, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to bring section 107(a), (d) and (e) of Law No. 27 of 1999 into conformity with the Convention, so that persons who peacefully express ideological opposition to the established political, social or economic system cannot be sentenced to a term of imprisonment which includes the obligation to work. It encourages the Government to pursue an examination of these provisions within the ongoing revision of the Criminal Code, and to provide information on measures taken in this regard, in its next report.

3. Law No. 9/1998 on freedom of expression in public. The Committee previously noted that Law No. 9/1998 on freedom of expression in public imposes certain restrictions on the expression of ideas in public during public gatherings, demonstrations, parades, etc., and that sections 15, 16 and 17 of the Law provide for the enforcement of those restrictions with penal sanctions “in accordance with the applicable legislation”. The Committee requested the Government to clarify the sanctions applicable in cases of non-compliance with sections 15, 16 and 17 of Law No. 9/1998.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that Law No. 9/1998 is implemented in line with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. The Government states that, pursuant to section 17 of the Law, persons who violate section 16 (concerning the public expression of opinion in contravention of the applicable legislation) shall be punished in accordance with the criminal legislation in force, with an additional one third punishment. Moreover, the Committee notes the Government’s statement in its report submitted to the Human Rights Committee on 12 March 2012 that Law No. 9/1998 provides some limitations on expression, including that notification must be submitted to the police three days before certain activities (such as the expression of opinions in public or activities such as rallies or demonstrations), and that pursuant to section 15, the act of expressing public opinion can be disbanded if it fails to meet this requirement (CCPR/C/IDN/1, paragraph 68). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of sections 15, 16 and 17 of Law No. 9/1998, including the number and nature of offences, particularly relating to the cases where sentences of imprisonment have been imposed, in its next report.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Jamaica

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1962)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. Legislation and policy. The Committee earlier noted the adoption of the Trafficking in Persons (Prevention, Suppression and Punishment) Act, 2007 and requested information on its implementation in practice. On the basis of the information provided by the Government in its latest report, the Committee notes the legislation, measures and procedures for the implementation of the Trafficking in Persons Act. The Committee takes note of the activities of the National Task Force Against Trafficking in Persons (NATFATIP) responsible for the implementation of the national action plan to combat trafficking in persons. Its core emphasis is the prevention and suppression of trafficking in persons, the provision of protection and assistance to victims of human trafficking and the strengthening of prosecution policies. To address these respective areas three subcommittees have been established.

Prevention. The Committee notes the preventive measures undertaken by the Government, which have included the provision of training programmes for police, security officers, social workers and other relevant authorities; the establishment of a trafficking in persons unit in the Jamaica Constabulary Force responsible for enhanced data collection; the monitoring of immigration and emigration patterns; public awareness-raising activities; the establishment of an Inter-Ministerial Work Permit Committee to critically examine work permit applications and the continuous monitoring of expatriate labour across the country.

Protection and assistance to victims. The Committee notes the social services made available for victims of trafficking, which include: shelter; translation assistance; medical attention; psycho-social care; reintegration support; and legal representation.

Prosecution. The Committee notes the establishment of specific prosecution mechanisms for trafficking in persons; the exchange of information to facilitate prosecution; and the strengthened cooperation with regional and international organizations. Furthermore, the Government states that since 2007, eight suspected cases of trafficking in persons have been investigated, yet the police have encountered problems pursuing investigations as some suspected victims have refused to cooperate.

The Committee notes the information on measures taken by the Government to combat trafficking in persons and protect victims of trafficking. However, it also takes note of the concluding observations of the United Nations Human Rights Committee concerning Jamaica expressing concern at the prevalence of trafficking in persons for sexual exploitation and forced labour and being particularly concerned at the low level of investigations, prosecutions and convictions in this area, and at the lack of prevention and protection mechanisms for victims, including rehabilitation schemes (103rd Session, October–November 2011, paragraph 22).

Referring to its comments made under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), as regards trafficking, the Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to combat trafficking in persons and step up its action to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions are carried out against persons who commit the offence of trafficking in persons. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide in its next report further information on the application of the 2007 Act in practice, including the number of investigations, prosecutions and penalties imposed. It further requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to provide training to law enforcement officials on the phenomenon of trafficking. The Committee also urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure that victims of trafficking are adequately protected and assisted, as well as to undertake efforts for their recovery and social integration. The Committee requests the Government in this respect to provide statistical information on the various kinds of assistance provided. The Committee further reiterates its request to the Government to provide a copy of the National Action Plan against Trafficking.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to the following provisions of the Jamaica Shipping Act, 1998, under which certain disciplinary offences are punishable with imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour under the Prisons Law):

- section 178(1)(b), (c) and (e), which provides for penalties of imprisonment, inter alia, for wilful disobedience or neglect of duty or combining with any of the crews to impede the progress of the voyage; an exemption from this liability applies only to seafarers participating in a lawful strike after the ship has arrived and has been secured in good safety to the satisfaction of the master at a port, and only at a port in Jamaica (section 178(2)); and
- section 179(a) and (b), which punishes, with similar penalties, the offences of desertion and absence without leave.

The Committee recalls, referring to paragraphs 179–181 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, that provisions under which penalties of imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour) may be imposed for desertion, absence without leave or disobedience, are not in conformity with the Convention. Only sanctions relating to acts that are likely to endanger the safety of the ship, or the life or health of persons (e.g. as provided for in section 177 of the 1998 Shipping Act) have no bearing on the Convention.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that the Maritime Authority had given written instructions to the Attorney General's department and the office of the Parliamentary Council to amend the above sections of the Shipping Act, 1998, in order to make its provisions compatible with the Convention. In its 2010 report, the Government confirmed that an opinion had been received by the Attorney General's chambers recommending that amendments be made to the Shipping Act, 1998, to bring it into conformity with the Convention. The Government also stated at the time that the Office of the Parliamentary Council is to be instructed to make the amendments to the relevant legislation accordingly.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its latest report that amendments will be made to the Shipping Act, 1998 after a general review and updating of the legislation. Observing that the Government has been referring to amendments to the Shipping Act, 1998, since 2004, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention, for example, by limiting the scope of the relevant provisions of the Shipping Act, 1998, as indicated above. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to report on the progress made in this regard.

Japan

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1932)

For a number of years, the Committee has been examining the issues of wartime industrial forced labour and sexual slavery (so-called "comfort women") during the Second World War. It has referred in this regard to its earlier considerations and conclusions concerning the limits of its mandate in respect of these historical breaches of the Convention. On numerous occasions, the Committee expressed the hope that, in making further efforts to seek reconciliation with the victims, the Government would take measures to respond to the claims of the aged surviving victims. The Government was requested to continue to provide information about any developments in this regard.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its reports received on 5 September and 1 October 2012, as well as in the Government's communications received on 28 February and 14 and 16 November 2011.

The Committee notes communications received in 2011 and 2012 from the following workers' organizations:

- All-Japan Shipbuilding & Engineering Union (AJSEU) (dated 24 and 28 August 2011 and 17 August 2012);
- Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU) and Korean Confederation of Trade Unions (KCTU) (dated 27 August and 5 October 2011 and 28 August 2012);
- National Confederation of Trade Unions (ZENROREN) (dated 21 September 2012).

Copies of the above communications from workers' organizations were forwarded to the Government for any comments it might wish to make on the matters raised therein. The Committee notes the Government's response to most of these communications received on 5 September and 14 November 2012.

The Committee notes that, in the above communications, the workers' organizations express concern about the position of the Government with regard to the issue of "comfort women" and call on the Government to take urgent measures to resolve the issue. Some of the above communications deny the role of the Asian Women's Fund (AWF) in restoring the victims' dignity, since the surviving victims largely rejected the compensation offered by the Fund and expressed their opposition to its activities. Some of the workers' organizations also express their scepticism about the follow-up activities of the AWF being implemented by the Government. They also call on the Government to review national laws with a view to removing existing obstacles to obtaining full reparations before Japanese courts and to settle the wartime forced labour issue.

Some of the above communications refer to a decision of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Korea passed on 30 August 2011 on the constitutional appeal filed by 109 surviving victims of military sexual slavery, in which the Constitutional Court urged the Korean Government to take proactive action to restore the violated human rights of the victims. In compliance with this decision, the Korean Government proposed bilateral talks to settle the issue with the Government of Japan. Following the above ruling of the Constitutional Court, the Korean Supreme Court ordered the lower courts of the Republic of Korea to retry two cases of wartime industrial forced labour on 24 May 2012.

The communications from the workers' organizations continue to refer to the issue of military sexual slavery as it had been taken up by the United Nations bodies, in particular, in the report of the Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences, submitted to the United Nations Human Rights Council on 23 April 2010 (A/HRC/14/22). Some of the above communications also referred to resolutions adopted by the local councils of Japan and the Republic of Korea. Thus, since March 2008 and up to August 2012, 36 Japanese city councils and 54 Korean city councils adopted resolutions urging the Government to solve the Japanese military sexual slavery issue, to restore dignity and justice to the victims, to provide them with compensation, and to further educate the public.

The Committee has taken due note of the Government's repeated statement in its reports that it remains committed to the position expressed in the August 1993 statement of the then Chief Cabinet Secretary, Mr Yohei Kono, where he expressed sincere apologies and remorse to the former "comfort women", while recognizing that this issue was, with the involvement of the military authorities of the day, a grave affront to the honour and dignity of a large number of women. The Government reiterates that this statement embodies its official position on this matter which remains unchanged. It recalls that the Government of Japan has since expressed its sincere apologies and remorse on many occasions, based on the then Prime Minister Tomiichi Murayama's statement in August 1995. The Government also refers once again to a letter expressing apologies and remorse, which was sent by the Prime Minister, on behalf of the Government of Japan, directly to each former "comfort woman", in connection with the activities of the AWF.

As regards the non-legal measures to respond to the claims of the surviving victims of wartime military sexual slavery and to meet their expectations, the Government refers once again to the activities of the AWF, which was established in 1995 in order to extend atonement from the Government and people of Japan to the former "comfort women" and was dissolved in 2007, after it had completed its objectives. The Committee has noted the Government's indication that it provided all possible assistance for the AWF, including bearing its total operational costs, fully supporting its fund-raising activities and providing the necessary funds to implement its activities. In this regard, the Government once again indicates that it contributed approximately US$60 million from the national budget and Japanese people donated approximately US$7 million to the AWF. However, the Committee recalls that it has considered in its earlier observations that the rejection by the majority of former "comfort women" of monies from the AWF, because it was not seen as compensation from the Government, suggested that this measure had not met the expectations of the majority of the victims. The Committee therefore expressed the hope that the Government would make efforts, in consultation with the surviving victims and the organizations which represent them, to find an alternative way to compensate the victims in a manner that would meet their expectations.

The Committee notes that the Government repeats its previous statement that it will continue to implement follow-up activities of the AWF. The Government reiterates that, as part of such follow-up, the Government of Japan has entrusted the people who were involved in the AWF to implement visiting care activity and group counselling activity (Republic of Korea and the Philippines), as well as exchange of opinions with government officials and academia (Indonesia and the Philippines). The Committee also notes from the Government's report, and from a communication received in February 2011, that Mr Yutaka Banno, then State Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and Ms Makiko Kikuta, then Parliamentary Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs, met with former "comfort women" in November 2010 and January 2011 in Japan and explained in person the Government's views and listened to their current living circumstances, past experiences, wishes and personal feelings. The Government also indicates that, in the light of the meetings, it has increased the budget of the visiting care activities and group counselling activities and will continue to implement follow-up activities of the AWF, while continuing its efforts to grasp the needs of former "comfort women".

Finally, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that, during the period from 1 June 2010 to 31 May 2012, the courts "pronounced" on five cases regarding "conscripted forced labourers" with regard to lawsuits in which the plaintiffs claimed state compensation for damages. The Government indicates that, in all these cases, the plaintiffs' claims for compensation against the Government of Japan have been dismissed by reason that all these cases do not fall under the reasons of final appeals of the Code of Civil Procedure. There were no court decisions regarding the “comfort women” issue. The Government also indicates that, as of 31 May 2012, there were no cases pending in the Japanese courts concerning the “comfort women” and “conscripted forced labourers” issues.

While observing that representatives of the Government met with the “comfort women” in 2010 and 2011, the Committee notes with concern that no concrete outcome has been noted. The Committee expresses the firm hope that, given the seriousness and long-standing nature of the case, the Government will continue to make further efforts to achieve reconciliation with the victims, and that measures will be taken, without further delay, to respond to the claims being made by the aged surviving victims of wartime industrial forced labour and military sexual slavery. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of the follow-up activities of the AWF referred to above and on any other measures taken or envisaged, including any follow-up to the meetings with former “comfort women” referred to above.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Industrial Training and Technical Internship Programme. Referring to its earlier comments, the Committee notes the communications received from the Labour Union of Migrant Workers dated 22 August 2011 and 29 August 2012, which contain information concerning the implementation of the revised Industrial Training and Technical Internship Programme (“Foreign Trainee” Programme), as well as the Government’s response to these communications received on 1 October and 14 November 2012.

The Committee previously noted that the abovementioned programme was established in order to develop the human and industrial resources of developing countries, with the aim of securing the transfer of industrial technology, skills and knowledge. Under this programme, foreign nationals can enter Japan as “trainees” for one year and become “technical interns” for another two years; they are required to go back to their country thereafter. The programme has been monitored by the Japan International Training Cooperation Organization (JITCO), under the supervision of the government organizations concerned, including the Immigration Bureau and labour standards inspection bodies. The Committee also noted that the Training and Technical Internship Programme was revised in July 2010 with a view to strengthening the protection of trainees and technical interns, who had been given a status of residence of “Technical Intern Training” for a maximum period of three years and acquired protection under labour laws and regulations, such as the Labour Standards Law and the Minimum Wage Law, while engaging in skill-building activities under their employment contract. In addition, collection of guarantee money and penalty charges by dispatching organizations and accepting organizations and companies was prohibited, and the suspension period during which organizations found guilty of human rights abuses were not allowed to accept technical interns was extended from three years to five years.

However, according to the allegations contained in the above communications from the Labour Union of Migrant Workers, the conditions of foreign trainees have not improved: they are still forced to work under the menace of deportation, they are not allowed to change their employer and remain vulnerable to employers’ abuses (illegal overtime, violation of industrial safety and health rules, confiscation of trainees’ and interns’ passports by employers, etc.). The Union refers to the statistical information from the JITCO website concerning the death of the foreign trainees and technical interns as a result of work-related accidents and diseases in 2011. It also refers to the information concerning various labour law violations published in reports of some Prefectural Labour Bureaus (of Gifu, Fukui, Aichi and Shimane) related to the Technical Internship Programme. The Union considers that the problems cannot be resolved by superficial change of wording and the programme should be abolished.

In its response to the above communications, the Government reiterates that the Training and Technical Internship Programme explicitly prohibits forced or compulsory labour. The Immigration Bureau and JITCO have been supervising the programme in order to prevent any inappropriate cases from occurring. Moreover, no cases that might fall under the category of forced labour have been recognized in the course of the operation of the programme. In addition, labour standards inspection bodies have been actively implementing supervisory guidance for business operators that employ technical interns and strict actions have been taken when violations of section 5 of the Labour Standards Law (prohibition of the exaction of forced or compulsory labour by employers by means of physical violence, intimidation, confinement or any other unfair restraint on the mental or physical freedom of workers) were observed. As regards, more specifically, cases of serious human rights violations involving inappropriate behaviour toward interns, including violence and taking away passports, etc., the Immigration Bureau has been recognizing “misconduct” of accepting organizations after making the necessary examinations and strictly responding by prohibiting such organizations from accepting trainees/interns for up to five years. The Government indicates that “misconduct” of accepting organizations was recognized for 163 organizations in 2010 and 184 organizations in 2011, including the organizations that failed to pay overtime premium to interns and made them work long overtime hours considerably exceeding the limits stipulated in the labour agreement. Regarding the activities of the labour standard inspection offices in securing appropriate working conditions for technical interns, the Government indicates that, out of 2,748 cases of supervisory guidance provided to implementing organizations in 2011, violations of labour laws and regulations were acknowledged in 2,252 cases, and 23 cases of serious or vicious violations with regard to technical interns have been sent to the public prosecutors’ offices. JITCO has continued to conduct numerous visiting consultations to accepting organizations and companies and has established telephone consultation hotlines in certain native languages. The Government indicates, however, that statistics on the numbers of cases of prosecutions and convictions concerning violations with regard to technical interns are not available.

While noting this information, the Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the various measures taken, both in legislation and in practice, with a view to strengthening the protection of foreign technical interns. Please provide information, in particular, on the measures taken to strengthen the system of supervision against violations through appropriate inspections and monitoring. The Committee also hopes that, in its next report, the Government will be in a position to supply statistics on the numbers of cases of prosecutions and convictions, indicating also the penalties imposed on perpetrators.

Trafficking in persons. The Committee notes with interest the information on various measures taken by the Government under the 2009 Action Plan to combat trafficking in persons provided in its report received on 1 October 2012. It notes, in particular, the Government's indications concerning measures taken in the areas of prevention of trafficking in persons (such as the reinforcement of immigration control measures and measures to raise public awareness), protection of victims (including the functioning of the Women's Consulting Offices, improvement in the status of residence of the victims and assistance for the victims' repatriation), prosecution of offenders (including statistics showing the numbers of persons arrested, prosecuted and sentenced for trafficking-related crimes) and cooperation with foreign governments and international organizations.

The Committee also notes the comments received from the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC-RENGO) concerning anti-trafficking measures, communicated by the Government with its report, in which JTUC-RENGO reiterates its view expressed in its earlier communication that victim protection measures should be reinforced and calls again for the implementation of a multifaceted support system encompassing a broad range of measures in accordance with the 2008 recommendations of the United Nations Human Rights Committee. JTUC-RENGO also calls for the strengthening of countermeasures against fraudulent marriages arranged for the purpose of obtaining working visas in Japan, which can result in the imposition of forced labour conditions by the fake marriage brokers. As regards, more particularly, such countermeasures, the Government indicates in its report that the immigration authorities conduct a stricter residence examination and cooperate with the police in order to identify trafficking in persons cases and to protect the victims in accordance with the 2009 Action Plan to combat trafficking in persons.

The Committee reiterates its hope that the Government will continue to provide, in its future reports, information concerning the implementation of various measures provided for in the 2009 Anti-Trafficking Action Plan, including, in particular, information on the application of criminal sanctions to the perpetrators and available statistics.

Kenya

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1964)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Compulsory labour in connection with the conservation of natural resources. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to sections 13–18 of the Chief's Authority Act (Cap. 128), as amended by Act No. 10 of 1997, according to which able-bodied male persons between 18 and 50 years of age may be required to perform any work or service in connection with the conservation of natural resources for up to 60 days in any year. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that sections 13–18 of the Chief's Authority Act referred to above had never been enforced and that the Chief's Authority Act would be replaced by the Administrative Authority Act. The Government states in its latest report that the Administrative Authority Bill which is intended to replace the Chief's Authority Act has been published and submitted to Parliament for debate and enactment. It also undertakes to communicate a copy of the new Act, once it is approved.

The Committee trusts that the Administrative Authority Act, which is intended to replace the Chief's Authority Act, will be adopted in the near future and that the legislation will be brought into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. It asks the Government to supply a copy of the Administrative Authority Act, as soon as it is adopted.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the Constitution of Kenya, 2010, which contains provisions relating to the Bill of Rights (Chapter 4), including, in particular, provisions prohibiting slavery, servitude and forced labour (article 30), as well as provisions which guarantee freedom of expression (article 33) and freedom of the media (article 34), the right of peaceful assembly, demonstration and picketing (article 37) and the right to form a political party and to participate in its activities (article 38(1)).

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views. Penal Code and the Public Order Act. For many years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Penal Code and the Public Order Act, under which sentences of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour under Rule 86 of the Prison Rules) may be imposed as a punishment for participating in certain meetings and gatherings or the publication, distribution or importation of certain kinds of publications. The Committee has been referring, in particular, to section 5 of the Public Order Act (Cap. 56), under which the police is entitled to control and direct the conduct of public gatherings and has extensive powers to stop or prevent the holding of public gatherings, meetings and processions (section 5 (8)–(10)), contraventions being punishable with imprisonment (sections 5(11) and 17), which involves compulsory labour. The Committee has been also referring to section 53 of the Penal Code, under which printing, publishing, distributing, offering for sale, etc. of any prohibited publication is punishable with imprisonment; under section 52 of the Penal Code, any publication can be declared a prohibited publication, if it is necessary in the interests of public order, public morality or public health.

The Committee recalls that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of “any form of forced or compulsory labour”, including compulsory prison labour, as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. Referring to paragraph 303 of its 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work, the Committee points out that the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. But sanctions involving compulsory labour fall within the scope of the Convention if they enforce a prohibition of the peaceful expression of views or of opposition to the established political, social or economic system, whether the prohibition is imposed by law or by an administrative decision. Such views may be expressed orally or through the press or other communications media or through the exercise of the right of association (including the establishment of political parties or societies) or participation in meetings and demonstrations.

The Committee observes that the scope of the provisions of the Penal Code and the Public Order Act referred to above is not limited to violence or incitement to violence and may lead to the imposition of penalties involving compulsory labour as a punishment of various non-violent actions relating to the expression of views through certain kinds of publications and the participation in public gatherings.

The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that the provisions of the Penal Code and the Public Order Act referred to above will be brought into conformity with the Convention (e.g. by limiting their scope to acts of violence or incitement to violence or by replacing sanctions involving compulsory labour with other kinds of sanctions, such as fines) and that the Government will soon be in a position to report on the progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Kuwait

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1968)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Freedom of domestic workers to terminate employment. Over a number of years, the Committee had been drawing the Government’s attention to the exclusion of migrant domestic workers from the protection of the Labour Code, and requested the Government to take the necessary measures to adopt a protective framework of employment relations that is specifically tailored to the difficult circumstances faced by this category of workers.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that certain decrees and ministerial decisions were adopted, which aim to provide domestic workers with more protection, including Decree Law No. 40/1992 and Ministerial Decision No. 617/1992 regulating the rules and procedures for obtaining licenses for the private recruitment agencies supplying domestic workers and similar workers, as well as Ministerial Decision No. 1182/2010, which defines the rights and obligations of each party in the recruitment contract (agency, the employer, the employee).

Regarding the freedom of domestic workers to terminate employment, the Government indicates that the worker should be informed about all the modalities of the recruitment contract before its signature, including the rules of termination of the contract, and that it is on a voluntary basis that the worker agrees to conclude the contract. In case of any dispute between the parties to the contract, they should resort to the Domestic Labour Department and apply Kuwaiti laws on all matters that do not have an explicit text in the contract (section 7(3)).

Furthermore, the Government indicates that under section 13 of Ministerial Decision No. 200/2011, regulating work in the private sector, it is possible to change the work permit for workers living in the country after a stay of one year without interruption, with the consent of the employer.

The Government further enumerates various measures taken to ensure the protection of migrant workers from abusive practices, including the draft Bill on the regulation of the employment of domestic workers; Ministerial Decision No. 194/2010 prohibiting the retention of identity documents of migrant workers in the private sector and in the oil sector; Ministerial Decision No. 103/a of 2012 establishing a telephone line for receiving complaints; the construction in 2007 of a shelter for domestic workers, as well as a new one that could receive around 700 workers. The Government also indicates that during 2011, 89,685 transfers to other employers of domestic workers occurred.

While noting this information, the Committee highlights the importance of taking effective action to ensure that the system of employment of migrant workers, especially migrant domestic workers, does not place the workers concerned in a situation of increased vulnerability, particularly when they are confronted with employment policies such as the visas “sponsorship” system and subjected to abusive employer practices, such as retention of passports, non-payment of wages, deprivation of liberty, and physical and sexual abuses. Such practices could turn their employment into situations that could amount to forced labour.

The Committee therefore expresses once again the firm hope that the domestic workers Bill, referred to above, will be adopted without delay. It also requests the Government to provide information on any practical measures taken to protect migrant domestic workers from abusive practices that could amount to the exaction of forced labour, facilitated particularly by the visa “sponsorship” system, which prevent this category of workers from freely terminating their employment.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25. Trafficking in persons. Referring to its earlier comments, the Committee notes once again the Government’s indication that the Bill on combating trafficking in persons, which is registered under Decree No. 266 of 2008, has yet to be adopted by Parliament. It also notes the Government’s reference to section 185 of the Penal Code under which anyone who brings a person in or out of the country with the intention of selling that person as a slave, or anyone who buys or offers someone for sale, is punishable with five years of imprisonment and a fine.

The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the Bill on combating trafficking in persons will be adopted in the near future and that the Government will provide a copy once it has been promulgated. Pending the adoption of the Bill, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of section 185 of the Penal Code, to which the Government refers in relation to the punishment of slavery-like practices.

Article 25. Penal sanctions for the exaction of forced or compulsory labour. Over a number of years, the Committee has been drawing the Government’s attention to its national legislation that does not contain any specific provisions under which the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour is punishable as a penal offence. It invited the Government to take the necessary measures, for example by introducing a new provision to that effect in the legislation. The Government referred in this regard to various penal provisions (such as sections 49 and 57 of Law No. 31 of 1970, on the amendment of the Penal Code, or section 121 of the Penal Code of 1960) prohibiting public officials or employees from forcing a worker to perform a job for the State or for any public body, as well as to section 173 of the Penal Code, which provides for the imposition of penalties on anyone who threatens another person physically or with damage to his/her reputation or property with a view to forcing the victim to do something or to refrain from doing something.

The Committee recalls, that under Article 25 of the Convention, the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable as a penal offence, and the penalties imposed by law must be really adequate and strictly enforced. Noting that the Government’s report contains no information in this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to give full effect to Article 25 of the Convention. Pending the adoption of such measures, the Committee requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the application of the above penal provisions in practice, supplying copies of the court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Punishment for expressing political views. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted that Legislative Decree No. 65 of 1979, which imposed certain restrictions on the organization of public meetings and gatherings enforceable with penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour), was declared unconstitutional by the Constitutional Court in 2006. It also noted that a new law concerning public meetings and gatherings was drafted in 2008.

In its latest report, the Government indicates that the draft law referred to above has not yet been adopted. The Committee reiterates its hope that the law concerning public meetings and gatherings will be adopted in the near future and that the Government will communicate a copy for the examination by the Committee.

Article 1(c) and (d). Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. Over a number of years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of Legislative Decree No. 31 of 1980 regarding security, order and discipline on board ship, under which various breaches of discipline (unauthorized absence, repeated disobedience, failure to return to the vessel) committed by common agreement by three persons may be punished by imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour). The Committee recalled that penalties imposed for violations of labour discipline or punishment for having participated in a strike do not come within the scope of the Convention only if such acts endanger the safety of the vessel or the life or health of persons. The Committee observed that sections 11, 12 and 13 of the above Legislative Decree do not appear to limit the application of the penalties to such acts.

The Committee notes the Government’s commitment expressed in the report to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention, and in particular, the Government’s indication that the necessary measures are being taken to amend the abovementioned Decree. The Committee trusts that the Legislative Decree No. 31 of 1980 will be amended in the near future, for example by clearly indicating that the imposition of penalties involving compulsory labour is strictly limited to acts endangering the vessel or the life or health of persons. Pending the amendment, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application of the Legislative Decree in practice, supplying copies of court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Lebanon

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1977)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Vulnerability of migrant domestic workers and the exaction of forced labour. In its previous comments, the Committee noted a series of measures adopted by the Government for domestic workers, such as the preparation of a guidance manual for this category of workers and the establishment of a formal contract governing their employment relationship.

However, the Committee observes that, in the Compilation prepared by the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, it is indicated that migrant domestic workers remain particularly vulnerable and are specifically excluded from the protection of the Labour Code. A number of reports have confirmed the existence of abuses by employers and recruiting agents, including non-payment or delayed payment of wages, withholding of identity papers, inadequate food and housing, forced confinement to the workplace, prohibition of rest time as well as verbal, physical and sexual abuse.

The Committee also observes that the United Nations Country Team recommended that the Government should pursue its efforts to review its labour legislation with a view to including migrant workers in its scope and that previously, in 2006, the Special Rapporteur on the human rights aspects of the victims of trafficking in persons, especially women and children, had also recommended that the protection of the Labour Code be extended to domestic workers (A/HRC/WG.6/9/LBN/2, November 2010, para. 41).

The Committee also notes the Bill regulating the working conditions of domestic workers, which was attached to the Government's report. According to the Government, the Bill was formulated so as to comply with the provisions of the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189). The Committee observes that the Bill contains provisions on the respective obligations of the employer and the worker, particularly concerning the type of contract to be signed, hours of work and remuneration. With regard to the termination of the contract of employment, the Committee notes that it is now possible for the employee to terminate it at any time with one month's notice. In the event of aggression, failure to pay remuneration for two successive months or work outside the tasks set out in the contract, the employee can terminate the contract of employment without complying with the period of one month's notice. The Committee also notes that the Ministry of Labour is competent to resolve any dispute amicably.

In view of the situation of vulnerability affecting migrant domestic workers, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the Bill governing the conditions of work of domestic workers is adopted in the very near future. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the definitive text once it has been adopted.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Liberia

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1931)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Forced labour and captivity practices as a consequence of the armed conflict. Over a number of years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the situation of forced labour and captivity practices which took place in the south-eastern part of the country in connection with armed conflict, where persons were allegedly held hostage and used as a source of forced and captive labour. It requested the Government to provide information on the specific action taken to investigate the situation in the south-east as regards the alleged practices of forced labour, as well as on the measures taken to eliminate such practices.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that a tripartite delegation was dispatched to the south-eastern counties of Sinoe, Maryland, River Gee and Grand Gedeh to conduct investigations on alleged forced labour and captivity practices. The interviews conducted had confirmed that during the civil war, several warring factions were engaged in the practice of forced labour and sexual violence. Since law and order have been restored, no incidence of forced labour was observed. Furthermore, an international non-governmental organization (Save the Children) has done substantial work in reuniting families since the cessation of hostilities.

Regarding the Liberian Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC), the Government indicates that the latter has completed its work recommending, among others, the prosecution of persons accused of gross human rights violations. An Independent National Human Rights Commission has also been established, in this respect. The Committee takes note of the TRC report released in 2009, which provides in-depth information on cases of violations and abuses of human rights collected from the victims of the armed conflicts. It notes that according to the TRC "the armed fighters in Liberia relied to a great extent on those who had been abducted to perform slave labour at the total mercy of their captors. This type of labour was used for both military and civilian tasks and included carrying heavy loads, arms, ammunition and foraging for food, fetching water, doing laundry, cooking and whatever else was needed. While statistics in the report show that men were the larger category of victims for this violation, women, who were abducted for forced labour were compelled to perform work for the fighters of all factions."

The Committee requests the Government to provide, in its next report, full and detailed information on the measures taken to implement the recommendations of the TRC, in particular with regard to the number of prosecutions of the most serious offenders. In this regard, the Committee asks the Government to provide detailed information on the activities of the recently established Independent National Human Rights Commission.

Article 25. Application of really adequate and strictly enforced penal sanctions for the exaction of forced labour. The Committee notes the Government's reference to the National Palaver Hut programme (or peace forums), as form of justice and accountability mechanism, aimed at promoting reconciliation between the communities and seeking the rehabilitation of, and reparation to, victims of the civil war. The Committee notes also that the TRC report recommends a reparations programme of US$500 million over a period of 30 years and that all direct victim support programmes must be implemented including memorials, victim support, and the process of prosecution.

While taking due note of these measures and encouraging this process, as a first step towards the rehabilitation of the victims, the Committee recalls that, under Article 25 of the Convention, the illegal exaction of forced labour shall be punishable as a penal offence and it shall be an obligation of the State to ensure that the penalties imposed are really adequate and are strictly enforced. The Committee therefore hopes that the necessary action to give effect to this Article will be taken in the near future, by imposing penal sanctions on persons convicted of having exacted forced labour, and that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on any legal proceedings which have been instituted for that purpose and on any penalties imposed.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Malaysia

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the communication from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 31 August 2011, as well as the Government's reports dated 15 September 2011 and 8 November 2012.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. 1. Trafficking in persons. The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act, 2007 which, pursuant to sections 12–15, prohibits trafficking in persons and provides for a penalty of imprisonment of up to 20 years. The Committee requested information on the application of the Act in practice.

The Committee notes the ITUC's statement that Malaysia is a destination, and to a lesser extent, a source and transit country for men, women and children subject to trafficking in persons, particularly for forced prostitution and forced labour. The ITUC alleges that prosecution for forced labour trafficking is rare at best, indicating that several NGO's had reported potential labour trafficking cases to the Government, but no arrests or investigations were reported.

The Committee notes the statistical information provided by the Government concerning the application of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act. The Government indicates that, as of May 2011, 226 persons had been charged with the offence of trafficking in persons (pursuant to section 12 of the Act), and 98 persons had been charged with trafficking in persons by means of threat or force (pursuant to section 13 of the Act). The Committee also notes the Government's indication that, with regard to trafficking in persons, there have been 355 cases investigated and 339 persons charged, with 253 cases pending trial, 13 persons discharged and 33 persons convicted, although the Committee observes an absence of information on the specific penalties applied to those convicted. The Government further indicates that 844 trafficking victims were issued protection orders (provided to trafficking victims in need of protection, pursuant to section 51 of the Act), and 2,289 persons were issued interim protection orders of 14 days (issued by a magistrate, pursuant to section 44 of the Act, while an investigation takes place). The Committee further notes the information in the Government's report that the National Action Plan on Trafficking in Persons (2010–15) was launched on 30 March 2010. This National Action Plan is composed of nine main goals, including improving the relevant legal framework; implementing integrated action among enforcement agencies; providing victims with protection and rehabilitation services that conform with international standards; combating labour trafficking; and providing training to personnel involved in implementing the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act. The Committee urges the Government to pursue its efforts to combat trafficking in persons, including within the framework of the National Action Plan on Trafficking in Persons (2010–15), and to provide information on the specific measures taken in this regard, as well as on the results achieved. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act in practice, including the number of investigations, prosecutions and convictions. Moreover, recalling that Article 25 of the Convention provides that the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable by penalties that are really adequate and strictly enforced, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the specific penalties imposed on persons convicted under the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act.

2. Vulnerable situation of migrant workers with regard to the exaction of forced labour. The Committee notes the statement in the ITUC's communication that some workers who willingly enter Malaysia in search of economic opportunities subsequently encounter forced labour at the hands of employers or informal labour recruiters, including workers from Indonesia, Nepal, India, Thailand, China, the Philippines, Cambodia, Bangladesh, Pakistan and Viet Nam. The ITUC indicates that these migrant workers are employed on plantations and construction sites, in textiles factories, and as domestic workers, and experience restrictions on movement, deceit and fraud in wages, passport confiscation and debt bondage. Regarding domestic workers, the ITUC indicates that conditions for these workers are particularly troubling, and that some domestic workers are not paid for three to six months. Moreover, the ITUC alleges that the Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) between Malaysia and Indonesia covering the employment of Indonesian domestic workers explicitly allows for the confiscation of workers' passports. The ITUC further alleges that the Government has failed to report any criminal prosecutions of employers who subject workers to conditions of forced labour or labour recruiters who use deceptive practices and debt bondage to compel migrant workers into involuntary servitude.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that, in May 2012, it conducted a training for labour inspectors, in collaboration with the ILO Tripartite Action to Protect Migrant Workers from Labour Exploitation Project (the ILO TRIANGLE Project). The Committee also notes the information from the International Organization on Migration (IOM) in a document entitled "Labour Migration from Indonesia" that in June 2009, the Government of Indonesia enacted a moratorium on placing domestic workers in Malaysia. However, this moratorium was lifted following the signature of a new MoU in May 2011 between the Governments of Indonesia and Malaysia (superseding the prior MoU of 2006). This MoU stipulates that Indonesian domestic workers have the right to retain their passports while in Malaysia, shall be entitled to one rest day a week and shall have their wages commensurate with the market. The Committee further notes the information from the IOM, that as of 2009, there were approximately 2.1 million migrant workers in Malaysia. This report states that official estimates indicate that there are approximately 700,000 irregular migrant workers in the country, although other estimates are much higher. This report further indicates that migrant workers in Malaysia may be subject to unpaid wages, passport retention, heavy workloads and confinement or isolation. In addition, the Committee notes that in October 2011, the Government of Cambodia signed a suspension on sending Cambodian domestic workers to Malaysia.

The Committee recalls the importance of taking effective action to ensure that the system of the employment of migrant workers does not place the workers concerned in a situation of increased vulnerability, particularly where they are subjected to abusive employer practices, such as retention of passports, non-payment of wages, deprivation of liberty and physical and sexual abuse. Such practices might cause their employment to be transformed into situations that could amount to forced labour. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that migrant workers, without distinction of nationality or origin, are fully protected from abusive practices and conditions that amount to the exaction of forced labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on measures adopted specifically tailored to the difficult circumstances faced by migrant workers, including measures to prevent and respond to cases of abuse of migrant workers, as well as to ensure that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are applied to persons who subject these workers to conditions of forced labour. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate, in its next report, whether there are plans to include guarantees similar to those contained in the MoU with the Government of Indonesia in bilateral agreements with other countries, as well as information on the implementation of such agreements in practice.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Mauritania

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes the reports on the application of the Convention sent by the Government in September 2011 and in 2012, and the observations from the General Confederation of Workers of Mauritania (CGTM), the Free Confederation of Mauritanian Workers (CLTM) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which were received on 22 August 2011, 27 August 2012 and 31 August 2012, respectively.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Slavery and slavery-like practices. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Government had taken a number of positive measures which demonstrated the Government's commitment to combat slavery and the vestiges thereof. However, it observed that, despite these measures, victims were unable to assert their rights and it asked the Government to take appropriate measures in this respect. The Committee also underlined the importance of a comprehensive strategy to combat slavery which would make it possible to address this issue in a broad manner. The Committee notes that, since its last observation, the question of the application of the Convention by Mauritania was examined by the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference in June 2010. It also notes the report published in August 2010 by the United Nations Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of slavery, including its causes and consequences (A/HRC/15/20/Add.2).

(a) Effective application of the legislation. The Committee recalls that Act No. 2007/48 of 9 August 2007 criminalizing slavery and punishing slavery-like practices (hereinafter: Act of 2007) defines, criminalizes and penalizes practices similar to slavery and makes a distinction between the crime of slavery and offences relating to slavery. These provisions state, inter alia, that "any person who appropriates the goods, products and earnings resulting from the labour of any person claimed to be a slave or who forcibly takes that person's monies shall be liable to imprisonment ranging from six months to two years and a fine ranging from 50,000 to 200,000 ouguiyas" (section 6). Furthermore, the Walis, Hakems, local chiefs and officers of the criminal investigation police who do not take action with regard to slavery-like practices that are brought to their knowledge shall be liable to imprisonment and a fine (section 12). Lastly, human rights associations are empowered to denounce violations of the Act and to assist victims, with the latter entitled to judicial proceedings that are free of charge (section 15). The Committee noted that the Act had received considerable publicity with a view to promoting an understanding of the criminal nature of slavery. It stressed the need to continue the awareness-raising process in view of the fact that victims seemed unable to assert their rights with regard to the competent authorities and that the Government had been unable to supply information on complaints submitted, investigations undertaken or legal proceedings instituted.

The Committee observes that the ITUC emphasizes in its observations that it is extremely difficult for victims of slavery to overcome cultural and legal obstacles in order to be able to lodge complaints and take legal action against their masters. The ITUC refers to the reluctance at various levels of the administration to enforce the law. Even though several victims have attempted to take legal action against their masters, only one conviction was handed down in November 2011. The ITUC also reports reluctance to use the Act of 2007 as the basis for investigation, delays in the processing of cases at the investigation stage and at the time of instituting proceedings, and numerous dismissals of cases by public prosecutors, and provides several examples in this respect.

The Committee notes the Government's reference in its 2011 report to five cases examined in 2010 by the National Commission on Human Rights (CNDH). Of these five cases, only one led to a court conviction, and this was following the intervention of the Public Prosecutor's Office, which took action to overturn, in the interests of the law, the decision by the Court of Appeal to release a woman accused of having kept two children as slaves. Further to the ruling being overturned, the woman concerned was sentenced to six months' imprisonment. The Government emphasizes that this outcome was possible thanks to the unbending determination of the public authorities, the prompt instructions issued by the Prefect, cooperation between NGOs and the police, and intervention by the Public Prosecutor's Office. The Committee observes that the Government makes a general reference in its 2012 report to the responsiveness of the authorities in pursuing investigations into allegations of slavery and bringing the cases before the courts, but it fails to provide any specific information on new cases of enforcement of the law or on court decisions that have been handed down. The Government points out that proven cases of vestiges of slavery in Mauritania have become rare.

The Committee notes that the United Nations Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of slavery states in her report that she had heard of cases of slavery being reported to the relevant authorities. However, either the cases were reclassified under the heading of "inheritance or land dispute" or were not pursued owing to insufficient documentary evidence, or the person who put forward the claim was put under pressure from his or her extended family, master or sometimes local authorities to retract his or her claim. This results in cases never being reported as "slavery" cases and therefore, judicially, slavery cases do not exist.

The Committee notes with concern that this information shows that victims continue to face problems in being heard and asserting their rights with regard to both the relevant authorities responsible for law enforcement and the judicial authorities. It recalls that the Conference Committee already expressed its concern in this regard. The Committee emphasizes that victims of slavery are in a situation of considerable economic and psychological vulnerability which calls for proactive measures by the State. However, the public authorities which should protect them appear to be reluctant to enforce the Act of 2007. The Committee recalls that, under the terms of Article 25 of the Convention, States which ratify the Convention are obliged to ensure that the penalties imposed by law for the exaction of forced labour are really adequate and are strictly enforced. The Committee urges the Government to take the appropriate steps to ensure that victims are actually able to turn to the police and judicial authorities to assert their rights and that these authorities conduct investigations promptly, effectively and impartially throughout the country, as required by the Act of 2007. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the number of cases of slavery reported to the authorities, the number of cases for which an investigation has been conducted and the number of cases which have resulted in court proceedings. The Committee considers it essential with a view to eliminating slavery that the prison sentences provided for by the Act of 2007 are actually imposed on the perpetrators of these practices.

(b) Comprehensive strategy to combat slavery. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption of the National Plan to Combat the Vestiges of Slavery (PESE), with a budget of 1 billion ouguiyas (MRO) (approximately US$3.3 million) covering the fields of education, health and income-generating activities. It emphasized that, by addressing poverty, the National Plan represented one component of the action required to combat slavery, although such action should also encompass other measures such as raising the awareness of society and the competent authorities or measures to combat impunity and protect victims. The Committee thus drew the Government's attention to the importance of a comprehensive strategy to combat slavery.

The Committee notes that the Government, in its last two reports, has not supplied any details of the measures taken in the context of the PESE or any information on the adoption of a strategy or comprehensive plan to combat slavery. However, it notes that during the discussion of this case by the Conference Committee, the Government indicated that more than 1,000 actions had been undertaken in the context of the PESE, benefiting a total of 93,000 persons in 282 localities. The Conference Committee underlined that while the measures adopted to combat poverty were an important element in the strategy to overcome slavery, the programmes implemented needed to have the objective of ensuring the economic independence of those who were victims of slavery, and it asked the Government to take measures to improve the economic situation of the most vulnerable categories of the population so that they could escape from the vicious circle of dependence. The Conference Committee also emphasized that the issue of slavery needed to be addressed by Mauritanian society as a whole, and the Government needed to play a key role in raising the awareness of the population and the authorities in relation to the issue and to adopt, in the very near future, a national plan to combat slavery.

The Committee notes that the CGTM, in its observations, complains about the Government's lack of determination to establish a coherent policy for combating slavery and underlines the urgent need to establish specific programmes, in cooperation with all the social partners. The CGTM indicates that the State must launch a genuine national dialogue on this issue in order to contribute to a real raising of public awareness and put an end to these practices once and for all. The CLTM, for its part, is of the view that, despite the measures taken, there is no real political will to end slavery. It asserts that, with the complicity of the State, slavery remains a current practice throughout the country and appears in different forms which keep slaves and former slaves subjugated to their masters or former masters through denial of the right to property, expropriation, and keeping slaves in a state of need and dependence. The CLTM considers that the State fails to ensure that these categories of citizens have access to basic infrastructure (schools, health care, roads, etc.) and adopts a discriminatory policy regarding access to certain benefits. Finally, the ITUC emphasizes that it is essential for the Government to formulate a national strategy or a plan to combat the persistent and widespread practice of slavery, and also its vestiges and consequences. The ITUC considers that an inter-institutional body must be established for this purpose and that one of its initial functions would be to conduct research into the number of persons who are victims of slavery.

The Committee notes all of the above information. It expresses its concern regarding the lack of information since 2010 on the specific measures taken in the context of the PESE, a copy of which has still not been sent by the Government, and also at the lack of progress regarding the formulation and implementation of a comprehensive strategy to combat slavery. The persistence of slavery in Mauritania is rooted in many causes, including economic and cultural factors. In view of the complexity of this phenomenon and its various manifestations, the Committee again emphasizes that the required responses must form part of a comprehensive strategy to combat slavery covering all spheres of action, including awareness-raising, prevention, specific programmes enabling victims to leave the situation of economic and psychological dependence, reinforcement of the capacity of the authorities responsible for prosecution and for the administration of justice, cooperation with NGOs, and the protection and reintegration of victims. In this regard, the Committee recalls, as the Conference Committee also observed, that it is essential for the Government to have reliable qualitative and quantitative information on the characteristics of slavery. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary steps to adopt and implement a comprehensive strategy to combat slavery, which encompasses the various aspects described above. The Committee firmly hopes that this strategy will be accompanied by research to enable an overview of the realities of slavery to ensure better planning of government action in this sphere and to ensure that planned measures target all the population groups and regions concerned.

(c) Protection and reintegration of victims. The Committee recalls that it is essential that victims, once they have been identified, are the recipients of measures to support and reintegrate them. It asked the Government to indicate whether the PESE envisaged the creation of structures intended to facilitate the social and economic reintegration of victims. The Committee observes that the Government, in its 2011 report, indicates that five persons, whose cases had been referred to the National Commission on Human Rights, received direct financial aid or funding for income-generating activities in the context of the PESE. The ITUC points out that the PESE has not been allocated sufficient financial or human resources to combat slavery effectively, that it is not in a position to identify victims or provide them with comprehensive and systematic follow-up, and that the financial assistance given to victims is insufficient to meet their long-term needs. The ITUC adds that the PESE has not been operational for almost a year, since the resignation of its Director-General in 2011.

The Committee notes this information, which demonstrates the need to strengthen the material and financial support for victims so that they can lodge complaints and avoid reverting to a situation of dependence in which their labour would once again be exploited. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the specific steps taken to ensure effective protection for victims of slavery, either as part of the strengthening of the PESE or in the context of the adoption of a comprehensive strategy to combat slavery. In this regard, the Committee hopes that the measures taken will take account of the need to provide victims with legal, economic and psychological support. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the mechanisms whereby victims receive compensation for the personal and material damage suffered.

In conclusion, the Committee hopes that the Government will be in a position to provide detailed information in its next report on the steps taken to continue to combat slavery, which, according to the various sources cited in this comment, remains a widespread practice, with the United Nations Special Rapporteur concluding that “de facto slavery in Mauritania continues to be a slow, invisible process which results in the ‘social death’ of many thousands of women and men”. The Committee therefore trusts that the Government will tackle the resistance which still exists in the various spheres of Mauritanian society.

Lastly, the Committee hopes that the Government will avail itself of technical assistance from the Office to help it to overcome the difficulties that it faces.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Mauritius

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(c) of the Convention. Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Merchant Shipping Act, No. 26 of 2007, which had repealed the Merchant Shipping Act of 1986. The Committee noted, in particular, that under section 217(8)(n) of the Act, refusal to obey the master's order or neglect of duty by a seafarer is punishable with imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour). Referring to the explanations in paragraphs 179–181 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, the Committee recalls that, in order to be compatible with the Convention, provisions imposing penalties of imprisonment on seafarers for breaches of labour discipline should be restricted to actions that endanger the safety of the ship or the life or health of persons.

The Committee notes the Government's previous indication that the Government has drawn the attention of the competent ministry that the above provision is not compatible with the Convention, and the ministry concerned has undertaken to initiate action towards the amendment of this provision in order to bring it into line with the Convention. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will soon be taken to amend section 217(8)(n) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 2007, for example by limiting its scope to situations where the safety of the ship or the life or health of persons is endangered, so as to bring this provision into conformity with the Convention, and that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Mexico

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1934)

The Committee notes the adoption of the General Act of 14 June 2012 concerning the prevention, punishment and elimination of offences connected with the trafficking of persons and protection and assistance for the victims of such offences. It notes that the Act not only makes the trafficking of persons a criminal offence but also criminalizes a number of related offences such as slavery, debt bondage, the imposition of forced labour or services, and the exploitation of labour. The Act also establishes a comprehensive legal and institutional framework for combating these offences, and establishes the competence, powers and coordination of the various players involved in the prevention and punishment of these offences and also in the protection of the victims. The Committee notes with interest that this new Act enables a comprehensive body of legislation to be used against all forms of forced labour, as defined by Article 2(1) of the Convention.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25. Trafficking in persons. 1. Strengthening of the legislative and institutional framework. The Committee refers to its previous comments and notes that the new Act of 2012 covers in a more comprehensive and detailed way the various aspects of action against trafficking in persons already established in the legislation that was already in force. The Committee notes that the Inter-Ministerial Committee set up to prevent and penalize the trafficking of persons drew up the National Programme for the Prevention and Punishment of Trafficking in Persons which was adopted on 6 January 2011. The Programme comprises four objectives: increasing knowledge of trafficking in persons; preventing and raising awareness of this phenomenon; contributing to the effective functioning of the justice system; and providing comprehensive protection for victims. The Committee duly notes the detailed information supplied by the Government on the range of activities undertaken within or outside this programme by the numerous ministerial departments concerned, including the National Institute for Migration, consular services abroad, the National Institute for Women, the unit of the Public Prosecutor's Office which specializes in dealing with violence against women and the trafficking of persons (FEVIMTRA), and the National Committee for the Development of Indigenous Peoples. These activities concentrated on raising public awareness of the complex phenomenon of trafficking in persons, particularly through the Corazón azul campaign and many of them targeted persons most at risk of becoming victims of trafficking, such as indigenous or migrant workers. Moreover, a large number of activities were undertaken to train public officials on victim identification and protection.

The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts and expresses the hope that the application of the new Act will allow for trafficking in persons to be more effectively combated. The Committee requests the Government to continue to supply information on the implementation of the National Programme and on the activities undertaken by the Inter-Ministerial Committee with the aim of preventing and punishing trafficking in persons. The Government is also requested to send a copy of the annual report of the Inter-Ministerial Committee on the results achieved in the context of the implementation of the National Programme and on evaluations of the policies pursued in this area, as provided for in sections 93 and 94 of the Act of 2012.

2. Participation of public servants in the trafficking of persons. With reference to allegations of complicity and direct participation of law enforcement officials in the trafficking of persons, the Committee asked the Government to take the necessary steps to conduct the appropriate investigations into cases of participation by public servants, in particular law enforcement officials, in the trafficking of persons. In its report, the Government provides statistics on the administrative penalties imposed on officials of the National Institute for Migration for disciplinary offences such as abuse of authority, mistreatment and negligence. The Government states that in 2011 two preliminary investigations were opened further to complaints made against public servants in trafficking matters. The Committee observes in this regard that both the United Nations Committee on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families and the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) of the Organization of American States noted with concern during two visits to the country the allegations concerning the involvement of public servants in a number of cases of trafficking, particularly the abduction of migrant workers for handing over to organized crime networks (document CMW/C/MEX/CO/2 of 3 May 2011 and IACHR press releases 105/2011 and 82/2011). The Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure that both appropriate administrative and criminal investigations are conducted and that public servants who are found guilty are punished. It is essential that the victims of trafficking in persons, who are often migrant workers in an extremely vulnerable situation, can trust the authorities whose task it is to protect them.

3. Protection of victims. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes that the third title of the new Act sets forth in greater detail the rights and the protection already granted to victims as established by the previous legislation (sections 59–83). In this regard, the Committee notes the actions undertaken by the National Institute for Migration to inform victims of their rights (including the right for foreign victims to remain on the national territory) and to promote their access to the justice system. Moreover, the unit of the Public Prosecutor's Office which specializes in dealing with violence against women and the trafficking of persons (FEVIMTRA) has drawn up a protocol for comprehensive assistance to victims aimed at ensuring their safety and providing them with legal, psychological and social support. The Government indicates that FEVIMTRA has established four specialist centres in the country, which have provided 163 trafficking victims with assistance. Moreover, a refuge that specializes in providing protection for trafficking victims has been established and by 30 April 2011 this had assisted 117 victims, with another 98 being referred to reception centres run by civil society. The Committee expresses the hope that the Government will continue to take steps to ensure the safety and protection of victims of trafficking and to enable them to assert their rights with regard to the competent authorities. The Government is also requested to indicate the measures taken to promote the rehabilitation of Mexican victims of trafficking who return to the national territory.

4. Adequate and strictly enforced penalties. With reference to its previous request concerning court rulings issued on the basis of the provisions that make trafficking in persons a criminal offence, the Committee notes the Government's indication that it does not have any relevant information. It provides statistics on preliminary investigations opened between June 2010 and May 2011. Out of 100 investigations opened in this period, 35 have been referred to the courts. The Committee can only note with concern the absence of more precise information on the cases of trafficking in persons that are before the courts or which have resulted in convictions, inasmuch as the powers of the Inter-Ministerial Committee include the gathering of quantitative and qualitative data on criminal offences relating to trafficking in persons. Noting that the Act of 2012 confers special powers to combat the trafficking of persons on the Public Prosecutor's Office and on the police, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the steps taken to strengthen the capacities of the police and Public Prosecutor's Office, particularly the unit which specializes in dealing with violence against women and the trafficking of persons (FEVIMTRA), to enable them to identify the victims of trafficking and conduct effective investigations leading to the institution of judicial proceedings. The Committee recalls that, in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention, the exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable as a criminal offence by penalties that are adequately and strictly enforced. The Committee therefore requests the Government to supply information on judicial proceedings under way and on convictions that have been issued, both on the basis of the new Act of 2012 referred to above and the Act that was applicable at the time of the events. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate whether, as provided for by the Act, the criminal courts have also ruled on the amount of damages to be paid to the victims concerned.

Morocco

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1957)

Article 2(2)(d) of the Convention. Requisitioning of persons. For many years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the fact that several legislative texts are not in conformity with the Convention, as they authorize the requisitioning of persons and of goods in order to satisfy national needs (the Dahirs of 10 August 1915 and 25 March 1918, as retained in the Dahir of 13 September 1938 and reintroduced by Decree No. 2-63-436 of 6 November 1963). The Committee also noted that consensus had been achieved with the social partners concerning the provisions of the legislation and, in light of the fact that in practice the public authorities did not seem to make use of these provisions for the requisitioning of persons, it hoped that contacts between the Department of Labour and the Ministry of the Interior would rapidly result in the Dahir of 1938 being brought into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Dahir of 1938 only concerns the requisitioning of the population in wartime, and that no use is made of this text, which has fallen into disuse. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that the following texts: the Dahir of 10 August 1915 on the requisitions for military needs; the Dahir of 13 September 1938 on the organization of the country in time of war; and the Dahir of 11 May 1931 on civil requisitions, can only be effectively applied in case of force majeure and in order to protect the nation's general interests. The Committee recalls that the abovementioned texts exceed the scope of the exception provided for under Article 2(2)(d) of the Convention, according to which requisitioning and imposing work should be strictly limited to situations endangering the existence or well-being of the whole or part of the population. Therefore, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the Dahir of 1938 is repealed or amended so as to ensure that the national legislation is in conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice.

Article 25. Effective and strictly applied penal sanctions. For a number of years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the relatively undissuasive nature of the penalties set out in section 12 of the Labour Code against persons requisitioning employees to perform forced labour or to work against their will (a fine of between 25,000 and 30,000 dirhams and, in the event of repeated offences, a fine of double that amount and imprisonment for between six days and three months, or only one of these two penalties). The Committee emphasized that recourse to forced labour is a serious offence and that the penalties incurred must be considered effective enough to act as a deterrent.

The Committee notes the Government's indications that the penalties set out in section 12 of the Labour Code for forced labour correspond to similar penalties which may be imposed for criminal offences. The Government adds that the Penal Code criminalizes any act associated with forced labour, including recourse to violence or torture, and that the Committee's comments will be taken into account in subsequent revisions of the Penal Code. While noting these indications, the Committee hopes that the Government will be able to indicate in its next report the adoption of the necessary measures to supplement the national legislation in order to ensure that persons who have recourse to forced labour are subject to penal sanctions that are really effective and dissuasive.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1966)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Imposition of prison sentences involving the obligation to work as punishment for expressing political views. The Committee noted previously that the Press Code (Dahir No. 1-58-378 of 15 November 1958, as amended by Act No. 77-00 of 3 October 2002) provided for sentences of imprisonment for several press-related offences. It requested the Government to indicate whether the revision of the Press Code, to which it had referred in previous reports, was still on the agenda.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the draft Press Code has been prepared in dialogue with the professionals and actors concerned. It contains no reference to forced labour and tends to decrease the penalties of imprisonment contained in the current Code, as well as extending the discretionary powers of judges to opt for appropriate sanctions. The Committee notes this information and expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures, within the framework of the adoption of the draft Press Code, to ensure that persons who express political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system in the press cannot be punished with a sentence of imprisonment involving compulsory labour. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the new Press Code, once adopted.

With regard to the application in practice of section 179 of the Penal Code, which establishes a penalty of imprisonment and a fine for any offence against the King, the heir to the throne or members of the royal family, the Committee observes that in practice those committing such offences are prosecuted under section 41 of the Press Code. In this regard, the Government refers to a number of court cases in which journalists have been convicted under section 41 of the Press Code for misrepresentation of the royal family.

The Committee recalls that, under the terms of the national legislation, persons convicted to a sentence of imprisonment are subject to the obligation to work, by virtue of sections 24, 28 and 29 of the Penal Code and section 35 of Act No. 23-98 on the organization and operation of prison establishments. In view of this obligation to work, the Committee observes that legislative provisions, such as section 41 of the Press Code, which punish peaceful journalistic activities with a prison sentence, are not in conformity with the Convention. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to abolish prison sentences for press-related offences, so that the expression of peaceful views opposed to the established political system cannot be punished by prison sentences involving the obligation to work. In the meantime, the Committee requests the Government to provide copies of court rulings under which defendants have been sentenced to prison for the various offences set out in the Press Code.

Article 1(d). Imposition of prison sentences involving an obligation to work as punishment for having participated in strikes. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the information illustrating the scope given by the courts to the provisions of section 288 of the Penal Code. Under the terms of this section, any person who, through the use of violence, force, threats or deception, causes or maintains, or endeavours to cause or maintain a concerted stoppage of work with the aim of forcing an increase or decrease in wages or jeopardizing the free exercise of industry or work, shall be liable to a sentence of imprisonment of from one month to two years. The Committee also noted that a bill regulating the right to strike was in the process of being adopted.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the basic Bill regulating the right to strike is currently the subject of dialogue with the social partners and that the national courts have not made use of the provisions of section 288 of the Penal Code. The Committee hopes that the Government will be in a position to provide additional information on the progress made in the adoption of the Bill regulating the right to strike and that within the framework of this process, the Government will take into account the comments of the Committee. In the meantime, please continue indicating whether national courts have recently had recourse to the provisions of section 288 of the Penal Code and, if so, provide copies of the respective court rulings.

Mozambique

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1977)

Article 1(a) and (b) of the Convention. Compulsory labour for persons identified as "unproductive" or "anti-social". The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that the Ministerial Directive of 15 June 1985 on the evacuation of towns, under which persons identified as “unproductive” or “anti-social” may be arrested and sent to re-education centres or assigned to productive sectors, had become obsolete. It notes the Government’s indication in its latest report that this directive was due to be repealed in conjunction with the revision of the Penal Code. The Committee recalls that, under the terms of Article 1(a) and (b) of the Convention, States which ratify the Convention undertake to not make use of any form of forced or compulsory labour as a means of political coercion or education or as a method of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of economic development. In view of the fact that the Government has been indicating for several years that the abovementioned re-education centres no longer exist, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps, in the context of the reform of the penal legislation, to formally repeal the Ministerial Directive of 15 June 1985 on the evacuation of towns, so as to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice and thereby ensure legal certainty.

Article 1(b) and (c). Imposition of prison sentences involving an obligation to work for the purposes of economic development and as a means of labour discipline. For many years, the Committee has been emphasizing the need to amend or repeal certain provisions of Act No. 5/82 of 9 June 1989 concerning the defence of the economy. This Act provides for the punishment of conduct which, directly or indirectly, jeopardizes economic development, prevents the implementation of the State National Plan or is detrimental to the material or spiritual well-being of the population. Sections 10, 12, 13 and 14 of the Act prescribe prison sentences involving compulsory labour in repeated cases of failure to fulfil the economic obligations set forth in instructions, directives, procedures, etc., governing the preparation or implementation of the State National Plan. Section 7 of the Act penalizes unintentional conduct (such as negligence, the lack of a sense of responsibility, etc.) resulting in the infringement of managerial or disciplinary standards.

The Government previously indicated that Act No. 5/82 concerning the defence of the economy and Act No. 9/87 amending it were repealed by the Assembly of the Republic on 21 March 2007. The Committee noted, however, that on 20 June 2007 the Constitutional Council declared the law adopted by the Assembly repealing Acts Nos 5/82 and 9/87 to be unconstitutional, considering that the blanket repeal of these Acts would have the effect of no longer criminalizing or punishing certain conducts that jeopardize economic development which are not punishable by other legislative texts, thereby leaving a legal vacuum. Noting that the Government has not supplied any information in its latest report on the current status of Act No. 5/82 concerning the defence of the economy and Act No. 9/87 amending it, the Committee invites the Government to pursue its efforts to decriminalize the conducts and breaches provided for in the abovementioned provisions of Act No. 9/82 and Act No. 9/87 and to take the necessary steps, in the context of the reform of the penal legislation, to repeal the provisions of Act No. 5/82, as amended by Act No. 9/87, which are contrary to the Convention.

Article 1(d). Penalties imposed for participation in strikes. In its previous comments the Committee noted that, under section 268(3) of the Labour Act (Act No. 23/2007), striking workers who violate the provisions of section 202(1) and section 209(1) (obligation to ensure a minimum service) face disciplinary penalties and may incur criminal liability, in accordance with the general legislation. The Committee asked the Government to indicate the nature of the penalties that may be imposed on striking workers in cases where they incur criminal liability and the provisions of the general legislation applicable in this regard.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its 2011 report that the relevant information has not yet been received from the competent authorities and that it will be sent as soon as possible. The Committee recalls in this regard that, according to Article 1(d) of the Convention, persons who participate peacefully in a strike cannot be liable to imprisonment involving compulsory labour. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to indicate the nature of the penalties that may be imposed on striking workers in cases where they incur criminal liability pursuant to the provisions of section 268(3) of the Labour Act. Referring also to its comments on the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that no prison sentences involving compulsory labour are imposed on workers who participate peacefully in a strike.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Myanmar

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1955)

Follow-up to the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry (complaint made under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO)

For a number of years, the Committee has been examining this case and it is pleased to note the various positive developments that have occurred in Myanmar over the past year, including with regard to the application of this Convention.

Historical background

The Committee has, over a number of years, been following up on the effect given to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, appointed by the Governing Body in March 1997 under article 26 of the Constitution. In its recommendations, the Commission of Inquiry urged the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that:

- the relevant legislative texts, in particular the Village Act and the Towns Act, be brought into line with the Convention;
- in actual practice, no more forced or compulsory labour be imposed by the authorities, in particular the military; and
- the penalties which may be imposed under section 374 of the Penal Code for the exaction of forced or compulsory labour be strictly enforced, which required thorough investigation, prosecution and adequate punishment of those found guilty.

The Commission of Inquiry also emphasized the need for concrete action to be taken immediately in order to bring an end to the exaction of forced labour in practice, to be accomplished through public Acts of the Executive promulgated and made known to all levels of the military and to the whole population. The Committee of Experts identified four areas in which such “concrete action” should be taken by the Government to fulfil the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. In particular, the Committee indicated the following measures:

- issuing specific and concrete instructions to the civilian and military authorities;
- ensuring that the prohibition of forced labour is given wide publicity;
- providing for the budgeting of adequate means for the replacement of forced or unpaid labour; and
- ensuring the enforcement of the prohibition of forced labour.

Developments since the Committee’s previous observation

There have been a number of discussions and conclusions by ILO bodies, as well as further documentation received by the ILO, which has been considered by the Committee. In particular, the Committee notes the following information:

- The report of the ILO Liaison Officer submitted to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards during the 101st Session of the International Labour Conference (ILC) in May–June 2012, as well as the discussions and conclusions of that Committee (ILC, 101st Session, Provisional Record No. 19, Part Three (A) and document D.5(C)).
- The documents submitted to the Governing Body at its 313th and 316th Sessions (March and November 2012), as well as the discussions and conclusions of the Governing Body during those sessions, including the decision concerning the implementation of the Joint Strategy for the Elimination of Forced Labour in Myanmar.
- The report of the mission of the Officers of the Governing Body submitted to the ILC at its 101st Session in May–June 2012 (ILC, 101st Session, Provisional Record Nos 2-2 and 2-2(Add.)).
- Resolution concerning the measures on the subject of Myanmar adopted under article 33 of the ILO Constitution (ILC, 101st Session, Provisional Record No. 2-4).
- The communication made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received in August 2012, with appendices.
- The reports and communications of the Government of Myanmar received on 14 and 23 March, 5 and 18 April, 4 May, 25 July, 31 August and 17 October 2012.

The Committee welcomes the positive developments in the application of the Convention by the Government referred to above, and, in particular, the amendment of the legislation, the adoption of the Action Plan for the elimination of all forms of forced labour in Myanmar by 2015, and various measures undertaken by the Government, in collaboration with the ILO, aimed at the eradication of forced labour in practice.

The Supplementary Understanding of 26 February 2007 – Extension of the complaints mechanism

In its earlier comments, the Committee has referred to the Supplementary Understanding (SU) of 26 February 2007 between the Government and the ILO, which supplemented the earlier Understanding of 19 March 2002 concerning the appointment of an ILO Liaison Officer in Myanmar. The Committee has noted, in particular, that the SU has set out a complaints mechanism with the object “to formally offer the possibility to victims of forced labour to channel their complaints through the services of the Liaison Officer to the competent authorities with a view to seeking remedies available under the relevant legislation and in accordance with the Convention”. The Committee notes that the SU was extended for the fifth time on 23 January 2012, for a further 12-month period from 26 February 2012 until 25 February 2013 (ILC, 101st Session, Provisional Record No. 19, Part Three, document D.5(G)).

Discussion and conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards

The Committee on the Application of Standards once again discussed this case in a special sitting during the 101st Session of the Conference in June 2012. The Conference Committee welcomed the progress achieved towards complying with the 1998 recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. It observed that many important steps had been taken by the Government in this regard and noted, in particular, the following: (i) the orders issued by the Commander-in-Chief of the Defence Services in March 2012 advising all military personnel that strict and stern military disciplinary actions shall be taken against perpetrators of military under-age recruitment, and those of April 2012 which make the new law prohibiting forced labour applicable to the military with perpetrators being prosecuted under section 374 of the Penal Code; (ii) budget allocations made for the payment of wages for public works at all levels for 2012–13; (iii) the progress made on the translation into local languages of the brochure on the complaints mechanism; (iv) the statement made by the President on May Day 2012 committing the Government to acceleration of action to ensure the eradication of all forms of forced labour; and (v) disciplinary measures taken against 166 military personnel and action taken under section 374 of the Penal Code against 170 other government officials and five military personnel. The Conference Committee also welcomed the elaboration of a draft Action Plan, developed between the Government and the ILO, to implement the comprehensive, proactive joint strategy for the elimination of all forms of forced labour in Myanmar, which was the subject of a Memorandum of Understanding on the elimination of forced labour in Myanmar signed on 16 March 2012. Welcoming the elaborate and detailed Action Plan, the Conference Committee insisted that all the social partners and civil society organizations should play an active role in prioritizing the elements in the Plan most relevant to the immediate implementation of the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations.

However, the Conference Committee reiterated its concern over the provision of the Constitution which provides for an exception to the prohibition of forced labour for "duties assigned by the Union in accordance with the law in the interest of the public". It trusted that steps would be taken to ensure that any exception to forced labour provided for in the constitutional and legislative framework is strictly limited to the narrow scope of exceptions established by Convention No. 29.

The Conference Committee welcomed the Government representative's statement that a culture of impunity would not be tolerated. The Committee trusted that the newly adopted legislation would be effectively applied with effective and dissuasive sanctions imposed to punish the use of forced labour in all sectors, and requested the Government to review the impact of the measures that it had reported on so as to be in a position to strengthen them where necessary. It firmly emphasized the importance of the rule of law and the independence of the judiciary as necessary preconditions for real democratization and change. The Conference Committee encouraged the Government and the ILO to monitor closely the progress made in the implementation of the Action Plan, especially as regards the use of forced labour by the military, and requested that information be provided in this regard to the ILO this year.

The Conference Committee also welcomed the release of numerous political and labour activist detainees and expected that all further such prisoners would be immediately released. It trusted that complainants and facilitators would continue to be protected in relation to their use of the complaints mechanism, the retention of which the Conference Committee considered to be critically important. It once again called on all investors to ensure that their activity in Myanmar was not used to perpetuate the use of forced labour but rather made a contribution to its complete eradication, in full respect for international labour standards. Finally, the Conference Committee called for the strengthening of the capacity of the ILO Liaison Office to assist the Government, the social partners and all other relevant stakeholders to play a full and constructive role in the efforts made to eliminate forced labour.

Resolution concerning the measures on the subject of Myanmar adopted by the Conference

The Committee notes a resolution on ILO action regarding Myanmar adopted by the ILC at its 101st Session in June 2012. This resolution followed up on the conclusions of the 313th Session of the Governing Body in March 2012, the Report and the recommendations of the mission to Myanmar undertaken by the Governing Body Officers in May 2012, and the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards at its special sitting on the application of the Convention by Myanmar.

The Committee notes that the mission concluded in its report that there is sufficient political will and technical need in Myanmar to justify a substantially increased and diversified engagement by the ILO. As to whether sufficient progress has been made in implementing the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry to justify a modification or withdrawal of the measures decided by the Conference in 1999 and 2000, the mission concluded that the legislative changes introduced by the new Government, and increasingly taking effect in recent months, appear to respond appropriately to the Commission of Inquiry's first recommendation on amending the legislation. The mission also concluded that, notwithstanding the progress made in creating an appropriate legal framework, the greatest outstanding challenge in the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry is the total elimination of the actual practice of forced labour in Myanmar. The mission emphasized that existing practices, which have been accepted for decades, will require a major and sustained effort of awareness raising. As long as the practice of the use of forced labour persists, those responsible for it must be investigated, prosecuted and punished. An independent and impartial judiciary trained on issues of forced labour will help put an end to the climate of impunity. The mission also recalled that the finalization and determined implementation of the comprehensive strategy for the total elimination of all forms of forced labour by 2015 are of critical importance in the definitive fulfilment of the recommendation of the Commission of Inquiry.

The Committee notes that the 2012 resolution effectively removed the restrictions on ILO cooperation with the Government of Myanmar that had been set by the Conference resolution of June 1999. It also suspended for 12 months the recommendation contained in paragraph 1(b) of the resolution adopted by the Conference under article 33 of the Constitution in June 2000. Under the terms of this resolution, the Conference decided, in particular, to lift the limitation imposed on ILO technical cooperation or assistance to the Government of Myanmar, enunciated in the 1999 resolution, to enable the ILO to assist the Government, employers and workers of Myanmar on a variety of issues coming within the ILO's mandate; allow the Government of Myanmar once again to participate in ILO meetings, symposia and seminars in the same way as any other Member, with social partners from Myanmar receiving the same treatment; and suspend for one year the recommendation contained in paragraph 1(b) of the 2000 resolution, which called on the Organization's constituents to review their relations with Myanmar and take appropriate measures to ensure that these relations could not be taken advantage of to perpetuate or extend the system of forced labour referred to by the Commission of Inquiry. The resolution also requested the Government of Myanmar to facilitate the enlarged scope of the activities of the International Labour Office in Myanmar through appropriate arrangements.

Discussions in the Governing Body

The Governing Body continued its discussions on this case during its 313th and 316th Sessions in March and November 2012 (GB.313/INS/6, GB.316/INS/5/5). The Committee notes that, following the discussion in March 2012, the Governing Body welcomed the following developments in Myanmar since November 2011: adoption of the Ward or Village Tract Administration Act in February 2012, which contains a provision punishing the exaction of forced labour as a penal offence; repeal of the Village Act and the Towns Act of 1907, and prosecution of some offenders; declaration of intent by the Government to develop a joint strategy with the ILO for the full elimination of all forms of forced labour by 2015; further awareness-raising activities for the civilian and military authorities; and the further release of labour activists from detention. While welcoming these important developments which represent major steps towards meeting the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, the Governing Body observed that the strict application of the new law and the prosecution and punishment of offenders are critical to achieving this objective. Such measures should therefore be built into the proposed strategy, which should be accompanied by a high-level public commitment to its implementation and be applied throughout the entire territory of Myanmar, including the border areas, in the context of achieving sustainable peace agreements.

The Committee also notes that, in the course of the discussion in November 2012, the Governing Body noted that the Government, which took office in March 2011, continued to carry out a complex political, economic and social reform and transition to democracy following decades of military rule. The Governing Body welcomed, inter alia, the following developments in Myanmar since March 2012: (i) several meetings of the newly expanded Committee for the elimination of forced labour chaired by the Minister of Labour, with the Deputy Minister of Labour, the Deputy Minister of Defence and the ILO Liaison Officer as co-secretaries; (ii) the establishment of a technical Committee of the Working Group to ensure that the commitments of the Action Plan for the elimination of forced labour are addressed in a timely manner with appropriate coordination and inter-ministry cooperation; (iii) the beginning of the work on the implementation of both the ILO Action Plan on under-age military recruitment and the Joint Action Plan on children in armed conflict under Security Council Resolution 1612, of 27 June 2012; (iv) the release of 46 under-age recruits during the current year, which brings the total of under-age recruits released/discharged from the military under the ILO complaints mechanism to date to 261; (v) preparation of a forced labour brochure in seven languages, which was distributed since June 2012 through the military, the General Administration Department, the Ministry of Labour, and the Ministry of Information and at various seminars and workshops, reproduced in full in Myanmar-language newspapers and journals and broadcast over national radio and television; and (vi) further awareness-raising activities for the civilian and military authorities.

The Governing Body observed that there is a significant degree of commitment by all parties to the implementation of the Action Plan for the elimination of forced labour. However, this was only the beginning of a process to develop the foundations for ongoing concerted work to realize the stated objective. Although there were continuing indications that the practice of using forced labour is being reduced, complaints continue to be received under the mechanism set up by the 2007 SU. Thus, between 1 June and 11 October 2012, 158 complaints have been received under the complaints mechanism, including individual cases of under-age recruitment, forced labour complaints with multiple complainants and human trafficking allegations.

Communication received from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC)

The Committee notes that, in its comments, the ITUC welcomes the repeal of the Village Act and the Towns Act and the adoption of the new legislation which contains a provision punishing the exaction of forced labour as a penal offence, in accordance with the Convention. It also welcomes the apparent decline in the exaction of forced labour in practice and the adoption by the Government and the ILO of a joint strategy for the full elimination of all forms of forced labour by 2015. The ITUC expects that all social partners and the civil society organizations will play an active role in prioritizing and assisting in the accelerated application of the elements of the Plan that are most relevant to the immediate implementation of the Commission of Inquiry recommendations.

However, in spite of these positive developments, the ITUC refers to several recent reports which contain allegations about the continued use of forced or compulsory labour in practice in certain regions of the country, in particular by the military. This includes, for example, portering, road construction and repair, military camp construction, fence building and road clearing. Moreover, the ITUC alleges that penal sanctions for the exaction of forced or compulsory labour have not been strictly enforced against the military and civilians. Appended to the ITUC's communication are three reports which contain allegations relating to forced labour practices by civil and military authorities in Karen, Chin and North Arakan States. The reports contain documented evidence of the incidents of forced labour which involved orders issued by military and civilian officials; information on the results of the surveys based on replies to questionnaires given by heads of household; and a number of field interviews. However, a report concerning Chin State, which focuses on the incidents of forced labour that occurred in 2011, recognizes that the lack of documentation of forced labour exacted by the military in 2012 may be seen as an early indication of efforts on the part of the military to eradicate the practice of portering and other forms of forced labour. A report concerning North Arakan State notes the persistence of forced labour practices in the north, though they noticeably decreased in the central and southern regions of the state. The ITUC concludes that, while some progress is being made, reports covering the three states referred to above provide evidence that forced labour, including forced child labour, remains a serious problem in some areas of the country.

The Government's reports

The Committee notes the Government's reports referred to above, which include replies to the Committee's previous observation, as well as the Government's response to the above comments by the ITUC and to the earlier comments received from workers' organizations. It notes, in particular, the Government's indications concerning the implementation in practice of the Action Plan for the elimination of all forms of forced labour in Myanmar by 2015, elaborated by the Government in cooperation with the ILO. The Government states that the Action Plan has strengthened the activities for the implementation of the SU complaints mechanism and that awareness-raising activities have been intensified in conformity with the Plan. Thus, a series of joint Ministry of Labour/ILO awareness-raising seminars and presentations have been held for villagers, representatives of military and civilian government authorities, police officers, judges, NGOs and representatives of community-based organizations. Military orders have been issued instructing that civilians are not to be used for any military support activity, including portering, sentry/guard duty and camp construction/maintenance in conflict zones. Further orders have been issued instructing that any such civilian support to military operations in non-conflict zones should be freely entered into and provided in the framework of paid employment or service contracts. Orders have also been issued by the Commander-in-Chief of the defence services to all military personnel advising that strict disciplinary actions shall be taken against perpetrators of military under-age recruitment. As regards budget allocations made for the payment of wages for public works at all levels, the Government indicates that officials from the Ministry of Labour and the ILO Liaison Officer had a meeting with officials from the budget department of the Ministry of Finance and Revenue and discussed the national budget allocation procedure; the expenses for labour have been identified, which permits the Ministries concerned to submit their proposals.

The Committee notes that, in his message to the first May Day celebration with tripartite representation, the President committed his Government publicly to the full elimination of all forms of forced labour and to the successful implementation of freedom of association. His statement was widely distributed through all media outlets.

The Committee's concluding remarks

As regards the amendment of the legislation, the Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption by Parliament of the Ward or Village Tract Administration Law, of 24 February 2012 (as amended on 28 March 2012), which has repealed the Village Act and the Towns Act of 1907 (section 37) and makes the use of forced labour by any person a criminal offence punishable with imprisonment and fines (section 27A).

However, the Committee notes that no action has been taken or contemplated to amend section 359 of the Constitution (Chapter VIII – Citizenship, Fundamental Rights and Duties of Citizens), which exempts from a prohibition of forced labour “duties assigned by the Union in accordance with the law in the interest of the public”. In its earlier comments, the Committee observed that the exception encompasses permissible forms of forced labour that exceed the scope of the specifically defined exceptions in Article 2(2) of the Convention and could be interpreted in such a way as to allow a generalized exaction of forced labour from the population. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its reports that the 2008 Constitution has been approved by the people of Myanmar and that no request to amend it has yet been received by Parliament. However, the Committee expresses the firm hope that, following the legislative amendment referred to above, the necessary measures will at last be taken with a view to amending section 359 of Chapter VIII of the Constitution, in order to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee welcomes the positive developments in the application of the Convention by the Government referred to above and, in particular, the amendment of the legislation, the adoption of the Action Plan for the elimination of all forms of forced labour in Myanmar by 2015, and various measures undertaken by the Government, in collaboration with the ILO, aimed at the eradication of forced labour for men, women and children in practice. The Committee fully endorses the conclusions concerning Myanmar made by the Conference Committee and the Governing Body and encourages the Government to pursue with vigour its ongoing efforts towards the elimination of forced labour in all its forms, both in law and in practice, by fully implementing the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. It requests the Government to provide, in its next report, full information on the measures taken to that effect and, in particular, on the urgent measures taken to ensure that, in practice, forced labour is no longer imposed by the authorities, in particular by the military, as well as on the measures taken to ensure the strict application of the new legislation, so that penalties for the exaction of forced labour under this legislation and the Penal Code are strictly enforced against perpetrators. The Committee also asks the Government to continue to provide information on various practical measures aimed at the eradication of all forms of forced labour, such as the expansion of awareness-raising activities; improvements in dealing with under-age recruitment by the military, including the release of children and imposition of disciplinary and penal sanctions on military personnel; cooperation in the functioning of the SU complaints mechanism; and measures taken to budget adequate means for the replacement of forced or unpaid labour. The Committee reiterates the firm hope that all the necessary measures will be taken without delay to achieve full compliance with the Convention, so as to ensure that all use of forced or compulsory labour in Myanmar is completely eliminated.

Namibia

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 2000)

Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention. Work of prisoners for private enterprises. The Committee previously noted that, under section 83(1) of the Prisons Act, 1998, the Commissioner may enter into a contract with any institution, person or body of persons for the employment of the labour or services of prisoners who are under a sentence of imprisonment, upon the terms and conditions which may be agreed between the parties. The Committee recalled that while Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention expressly prohibits that convicts are hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations, work for private enterprises can be compatible with Article 2(2)(c) only if prisoners voluntarily enter a normal employment relationship with private employers and perform work in conditions approximating a free employment relationship. If these requirements are fulfilled, the work of prisoners for private companies does not come under the definition of forced labour in the Convention, since no compulsion is involved. In this regard, the Committee noted the Government's indication that, in practice, prisoners volunteered for performing work and the opportunity to perform work was conditional on their good behaviour. The Committee requested the Government to provide sample copies of contracts concluded by the Commissioner with private enterprises for the employment of the labour or services of prisoners, as well as copies of any rules or regulations governing their conditions of work.

The Committee takes due note of the Prison Service Orders B submitted with the Government's report. These Orders state that persons who wish to hire prison labour must apply in writing and that the inmate must volunteer to participate. Section 10.6.7 of the Prison Service Orders states that the officer in charge must ensure that prisoners to be hired to private enterprises have indicated their willingness and readiness to work for the enterprise, by completing Form 107D. The Committee notes with interest that Form 107D is a consent form, stating that an inmate is voluntarily engaging in the work on the conditions agreed upon by the officer in charge and the prison labour hirer, whereby inmates indicate their name, the name of their prison, the name of the person for whom they volunteer to work and the date. Form 107D requires the inmate's signature, the signature of two witnesses and the signature of the officer in charge. The Committee further notes the copies of Form 107D that have been completed and signed, submitted with the Government's report. In addition, concerning the conditions of the labour performed, the Committee notes that inmates will be paid 35 per cent of the tariff paid for his or her labour. Section 10.6.6 of the Prison Service Orders state that the officer-in-charge should ensure that the hirer of prison labour, as well as their guards, are fully advised regarding the use of prison labour, safeguarding of prisoners and precautions against injuries to prisoners. Moreover, following the performance of labour, prisoners are required to fill out a specific form (Form 107E) confirming that the work they performed was as per the agreed conditions. Lastly, the Committee notes that section 10.7 of the Prison Service Orders prohibits the use of prison labour for the erection of buildings, excavation of foundations, mixing of concrete, transportation of sand, stone and bricks to building sites, as well as in mines, in tasks at railways where injury is common, in carrying heavy objects and in sanitary services outside of the prison.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Nepal

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee notes the Government's report, as well as the communications from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 31 August 2011 and 31 August 2012.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. 1. Trafficking in persons. The Committee previously requested information on the application of the Human Trafficking and Transportation (Control) Act of 2007 in practice, as well as on the measures taken to prevent, suppress and punish trafficking in persons.

The Committee notes the statement in the ITUC's communication that the Government should take action to enforce the provisions of the Human Trafficking and Transportation (Control) Act of 2007. The ITUC also states that the legal framework should be reviewed to ensure that those involved in trafficking and forced labour can be effectively prosecuted and that the punishments are commensurate with the crimes committed.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Ministry of Women, Children and Social Welfare is reviewing the progress of the National Plan of Action (NPA) against trafficking in children and women, in close collaboration with development partners and other key stakeholders. The Government also indicates that it is implementing a country programme on trafficking in persons, in close collaboration with various NGO's, focusing on prevention, prosecution and protection mechanisms. However, the Committee notes with concern the absence of information in the Government's report on the application of the Human Trafficking and Transportation (Control) Act of 2007. The Committee further notes that the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), in its concluding observations of 11 August 2011, expressed concern about the lack of effective implementation of the Human Trafficking and Transportation (Control) Act, 2007 (CEDAW/C/NPL/CO/4-5, paragraph 21). The Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to combat trafficking in persons, including within the framework of the NPA against trafficking in children and women, and to provide information on the specific measures taken in this regard. It requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on measures taken to enforce the Human Trafficking and Transportation (Control) Act, 2007 in practice, and on the impact achieved, particularly the number of investigations, prosecutions and convictions. Moreover, recalling that Article 25 of the Convention provides that the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable by penalties that are really adequate and strictly enforced, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the specific penalties imposed on persons convicted under the Human Trafficking and Transportation (Control) Act, 2007.

2. Vulnerability of migrant workers to conditions of forced labour. The Committee previously noted the ITUC's communication which outlined migrant workers' vulnerability to trafficking and forced labour. The Committee requested information on the measures taken to protect migrant workers from exploitative practices amounting to forced labour.

The Committee notes that the ITUC, in its more recent communications, expresses concern that recruitment agencies and brokers are involved in the trafficking of Nepalese migrant workers and their subsequent exploitation in conditions of forced labour. The ITUC refers to a study of returned migrant workers, which found that recruitment agencies were routinely involved in the trafficking of migrant workers: the majority of migrant workers interviewed for this study were deceived concerning a substantial aspect of their employment terms, and many faced high recruitment fees and subsequent debt, the confiscation of their passports, threats, physical and verbal abuse. The ITUC states that the Government has not taken appropriate action in its own jurisdiction to reduce and eliminate the incidence of forced labour and highlights that the effective enforcement of the Foreign Employment Act would significantly reduce migrant workers' vulnerability to forced labour. While the Foreign Employment Act regulates the activities of recruitment agencies, this Act is not effectively enforced to punish recruitment agencies who repeatedly violate the Act. The ITUC states that the Government has failed to adequately monitor and punish recruitment agencies for failing to comply with their responsibility under the Foreign Employment Act and that, despite widespread violations, only 14 recruitment agencies have been fined under the Act. The ITUC also indicates that, while in August 2012, the Government banned women under the age of 30 from migrating for domestic work in Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, these bans are likely to have the unintended outcome of increasing risks for these women who will continue to seek work through informal routes. Furthermore, the ITUC states that the measures taken by the Government to combat trafficking have not addressed the wider problems of trafficking for labour exploitation which affects migrant workers. The ITUC further alleges that complaints and compensation mechanisms are largely inaccessible to most migrant workers. Lastly, the ITUC references a research study which indicated that the several heads of recruitment agencies admitted to paying bribes to government officials. The ITUC states that the Government must establish an independent body to carry out a prompt, thorough and impartial investigation into allegations of bribery and corruption relating to migration for foreign employment, including of government officials.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that, in collaboration with the ILO, the Ministry of Labour and Transport Management implemented a project entitled "Protection of Nepalese migrant workers from forced labour and human trafficking" from June 2009 until September 2011. The Government states that major accomplishments of this project include: (i) the translation and promotion of ILO Conventions related to forced labour; (ii) the revision of the foreign employment regulations; (iii) increased compensation for migrant workers who are victims; (iv) strengthening of the data and information system in the Department of Foreign Employment and Foreign Employment Tribunals; (v) trainings for the concerned government officials and stakeholders on issues of forced labour, human trafficking, the monitoring of recruitment of migrant workers and the role of labour attachés; and (vi) partnerships with the association of foreign employment recruitment agencies to promote ethical recruitment procedures and the implement its code of conduct. The Committee also notes the implementation of an ILO project entitled "Preventing trafficking of women and girls for domestic work" from November 2011 to June 2012. According to information from the ILO Special Action Programme to Combat Forced Labour (SAP-FL) of August 2012, results from this project include: (i) awareness raising on safe migration and trafficking as well as training to women and girls on these subjects; (ii) the production and distribution of 13,000 brochures and 9,000 posters on safe migration and the risks of human trafficking and forced labour for domestic work; (iii) the provision of training to governmental and non-governmental representatives on anti-trafficking; (iv) preliminary steps towards developing a skills-building programme to at-risk or former victims of trafficking; and (v) training for law enforcement officials on countering trafficking for forced labour.

The Committee takes due note of the measures taken by the Government. However, the Committee notes that CEDAW, in its concluding observations of 11 August 2011, expressed concern about the situation of Nepalese women migrant workers and in particular, the fact that a large number of Nepalese women are undocumented, which increases their vulnerability to sexual exploitation, forced labour and abuse. It also expressed concern at the limited initiatives to ensure pre-departure information and skills training as well as the lack of institutional support both in Nepal and in countries of employment to promote and protect the rights of Nepalese women migrant workers (CEDAW/C/NPL/CO/4-5, paragraph 33).

The Committee recalls the importance of taking effective action to ensure that the system of the employment of migrant workers does not place the workers concerned in a situation of increased vulnerability, particularly where they are subjected to abusive employer practices, such as retention of passports, non-payment of wages, deprivation of liberty and physical and sexual abuse. Such practices might cause their employment to be transformed into situations that could amount to forced labour. The Committee therefore urges the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that migrant workers are fully protected from abusive practices and conditions that amount to the exaction of forced labour, including through the effective application of the Foreign Employment Act. The Committee requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the application of the Foreign Employment Act in practice, particularly the number of violations reported, investigations, prosecutions and the specific penalties applied. Expressing its concern at allegations of complicity of government officials, the Committee urges the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that perpetrators of trafficking in persons and forced labour of migrant workers, and complicit government officials, are investigated and prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on steps taken in this regard, particularly on measures adopted specifically tailored to the difficult circumstances faced by migrant workers, including measures to prevent and respond to cases of abuse of migrant workers and to grant them access to justice, as well as to other complaints and compensation mechanisms.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Niger

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1961)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Slavery and slave-like practices. For several years, the Committee has examined the matter of slavery in Niger which exists in a number of communities where the status of slave continues to be transmitted by birth to persons from certain ethnic groups. The relations between master and slave are based on direct exploitation: slaves are obliged to work for their masters without remuneration, largely as shepherds, agricultural workers or domestic employees. The Committee noted previously a number of legislative and institutional measures taken by the Government, including the adoption of Act No. 2003-025 of 13 June 2003 incorporating into the Penal Code sections 270-1 to 270-5, which define the elements constituting the crime of slavery and slavery offences and lay down the applicable penalties, and the establishment in August 2006 of the National Committee to combat the vestiges of forced labour and discrimination, which has responsibility for devising a national action plan to combat the vestiges of forced labour and discrimination. The Committee nonetheless expressed concern at the lack of information on the adoption of new measures specifically targeting slavery and its vestiges, particularly as in October 2008 the Court of Justice of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) found that Niger had failed to afford sufficient protection to the rights of a young girl who was a victim of slavery, and as the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations, expressed deep concern that Niger had not provided information in its report on caste-based slavery practices while such practices existed throughout the country (CRC/C/NER/CO/2, 18 June 2009).

The Committee notes that, in its report received in September 2011, the Government states only that the national action plan to combat all forms of forced labour, and slavery in particular, has not yet been adopted.

The Committee notes that the survey produced by the National Statistics Institute and the International Labour Office on the forms of forced labour found in Niger and involving adults and children was validated in September 2011. According to the survey, more than 59,000 adults are victims of forced labour, that is 1.1 per cent of the total adult population. For the most part, these victims perform domestic work (48.2 per cent) or work in agriculture or stock breeding (23.6 per cent). The survey sets three criteria for defining forced labour: non-voluntary recruitment (the adult works under traditional hiring practices for a private individual, an enterprise or a landowner); a situation of dependency (the adult works in exchange for food or accommodation, is paid in kind or not at all, or pays his wage back to a landowner and is unable to enjoy the fruits of his labour); and deprivation of freedom (the adult is prevented from changing jobs either by the employer or because of the social set up). Thus, an adult is deemed to be subjected to forced labour where his recruitment is not voluntary, or where he is deprived of freedom and when, in addition, he or his household are in a situation of dependency.

Lastly, the Committee notes that in the Universal Periodic Review of Niger undertaken by the Human Rights Council in March 2011, the Government agreed to all the recommendations regarding measures to be taken to combat slavery and ensure that the perpetrators of such practices are effectively prosecuted and the victims protected and compensated (see particularly recommendations 76.37 to 76.46 in document A/HRC/17/15).

In light of the above, the Committee once again notes with regret the absence of any information from the Government in its reports on measures taken to combat slavery. The Committee expresses the firm hope that in its next report the Government will be in a position to indicate the measures taken to secure the adoption of a national plan of action to combat all forms of forced labour, particularly slavery. It draws the Government's attention to the importance of a comprehensive strategy to combat slavery that includes measures to raise awareness in society and among competent authorities, measures to combat poverty and also accompanying measures to reintegrate the victims so as to prevent them from returning to a situation of vulnerability in which they would once again be exploited for their labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken by the National Committee to fight the vestiges of forced labour and discrimination and on the means it may draw on to perform its duties.

Article 25. Application of effective penal sanctions. The Committee recalls that according to Article 25 of the Convention, the Government must ensure that the penalties established in law are really effective and strictly enforced. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government states that no judicial decisions have been taken under sections 270-1 to 270-5 of the Penal Code which make slavery a criminal offence. The Committee underlines that it is essential that victims should have access in practice to the police and judicial authorities in order to assert their rights so that the perpetrators of the crime of slavery or of slavery offences, as prescribed in the Penal Code, are brought to justice, and where appropriate, convicted. The Committee accordingly hopes that the national action plan will provide for measures to ensure that the provisions of the Penal Code criminalize slavery are publicized, as well as measures to raise awareness among those stakeholders participating in the fight against slavery, including local authorities, criminal investigation officers and judges, as well as associations able to file civil suits in slavery cases. It requests the Government to provide information in its next report on judicial decisions handed down under sections 270-1 to 270-5 of the Penal Code and to provide copies thereof.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Punishment for expressing certain political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee notes that, following the adoption of Ordinance No. 2010-035 of 4 June 2010 establishing the freedom of the press, the Ordinance of 1999, which in turn repealed Act No. 97-26 on which the Committee had commented previously, has been repealed. The Committee notes with satisfaction that, with the adoption of Ordinance No. 2010-035, press-related offences such as insults and defamation may no longer be punished by prison sentences.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Nigeria

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1960)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views. 1. Public Order Act. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the Public Order Act, Cap. 382, Laws of the Federation of Nigeria, 1990, which contains provisions imposing certain restrictions on the organization of public assemblies, meetings and processions (sections 1–4), with such offences being punishable with imprisonment (sections 3 and 4(5)), which involves compulsory prison labour. The Committee recalled that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour (including compulsory prison labour) as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee further recalled that since opinions and views opposed to the established system are often expressed at various kinds of meetings and assemblies, restrictions affecting the organization of such meetings and assemblies may also fall within the scope of the Convention if such restrictions are enforceable with penalties involving compulsory labour.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that contraventions of the Public Order Act may be sanctioned with a fine, arrest and/or imprisonment. However, noting the Government's reference to the Constitution of 1999, the Committee observes that in 2007, the Court of Appeal examined the constitutionality of the Public Order Act. The Committee requests the Government to provide copies of the relevant court decisions on the constitutionality of the Public Order Act, with its next report. In this regard, it requests the Government to indicate whether the Public Order Act is still in force, and if so, to provide information on the application of this Act in practice.

2. Legislation relating to the press and media. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the Nigerian Press Council (Amendment) Act, 2002, which imposes certain restrictions on journalists' activities enforceable with penalties of imprisonment (section 19(1) and (5)(a)), which involves compulsory prison labour. It expressed the hope that measures would be taken to amend or repeal these provisions.

The Committee notes with regret an absence of information on this point in the Government's report. The Committee also notes the information in a report prepared by the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, for the Human Rights Council's Universal Periodic Review of 5 January 2009, that the Special Representative of the Secretary-General on human rights defenders expressed concern about freedom of expression in the country, in particular regarding the work of journalists (A/HRC/WG.6/4/NGA/2 paragraph 42). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal or amend the abovementioned provisions of the Nigerian Press Council (Amendment) Act, 2002, to ensure that no penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. It also requests the Government to provide copies of any relevant court decisions relating to the application of this Act in practice. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of criminal penalties for the offence of libel related to the activities of journalists, with its next report.

Article 1(c). Punishment for breaches of labour discipline. 1. Labour Act. The Committee previously noted that, pursuant to section 81(1)(b) and (c) of the Labour Act, 1974, a court may direct the fulfilment of a contract of employment and posting of security for the due performance of so much of the contract as remains unperformed, and a person failing to comply with such direction may be committed to prison. The Committee recalls that since Article 1(c) of the Convention expressly prohibits the use of any form of forced or compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline, the punishment of breaches of labour discipline with sanctions of imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour) is not in conformity with the Convention. Noting an absence of information on this point in the Government's report, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend or repeal the abovementioned sections of the Labour Act, to ensure that penalties of imprisonment involving compulsory labour, cannot be imposed for breaches of labour discipline.

2. Merchant Shipping Act. The Committee previously noted certain provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1990 (section 117(b), (c) and (e)) under which seafarers are liable to imprisonment for breaches of labour discipline, even in the absence of danger to the safety of the ship or to persons. The Committee expressed the firm hope that this Act would be amended to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that a new Merchant Shipping Act was adopted in 2007, repealing the Merchant Shipping Act of 1990. In this regard, the Committee notes with serious concern that section 196(2) of the Merchant Shipping Act of 2007 provides for penalties of imprisonment for various breaches of labour discipline (in the absence of a danger to the safety of the ship or of persons), including wilfully disobeying any lawful command (section 196(2)(b)) or continuing to wilfully disobey such commands or neglecting duties (section 196(b)(c)). The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to amend or repeal the abovementioned sections of the Merchant Shipping Act, to ensure that penalties of imprisonment, involving compulsory labour, cannot be imposed for breaches of labour discipline where such breaches do not endanger the safety of the vessel or the life or health of persons.

Article 1(d). Punishment involving compulsory labour for participation in strikes. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, pursuant to section 17(2)(a) of the Trade Disputes Act, Cap. 432, of 1990, participation in strikes may be punished with imprisonment. In this regard, the Government indicated that these provisions would be addressed in the Collective Labour Relations Bill.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Collective Labour Relations Bill is still pending in the National Assembly. The Committee also notes that the Trade Unions (Amendment) Act of 2005, amending the Trade Unions Act, included additional penalties of imprisonment for the participation in strikes. Referring to its comments made under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the Collective Labour Relations Bill does not provide for penalties of imprisonment for the peaceful participation in a strike, in conformity with the Convention. It expresses the firm hope that this Bill will be adopted in the near future, and requests the Government to provide a copy, once adopted.

Pakistan

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1957)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. 1. Debt bondage. Difficulties in the implementation of the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act (BLSA), 1992. The Committee refers to its earlier comments in which it noted the allegations concerning the difficulties in the implementation of the BLSA made by the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions (APFTU), the All Pakistan Trade Union Federation (APTUF), the Pakistan Workers' Federation (PWF) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The workers' organizations considered that the BLSA had not been properly applied and those who used bonded labour had been able to do it with impunity. The ITUC observed, in particular, that the vigilance committees set up under the BLSA had not performed their functions of identifying and releasing bonded labourers and had not been restructured as envisaged in the National Action Plan. The lack of adequate labour inspection machinery was another key reason why bonded labourers were not being identified and released.

The Committee further notes that, in a communication received from the Pakistan Workers' Confederation (PWC) on 21 November 2011, the PWC observes that there is still prevalence of bonded labour and human trafficking, in particular, in rural areas, which could only be prevented through the provision of economic and social measures for the elimination of poverty and providing education and access to gainful employment to the victims, as well as by enforcement and respect of the law.

The Government indicates in its reply that the district vigilance committees are in place and functional, and their meetings are held regularly in most of the districts. However, the Committee observes that copies of minutes of the district vigilance committees' meetings supplied by the Government date back to 2007 (Faisalabad), 2009 (Nankana Sahib, Rawalpindi and Gujrat) and July 2011 (Gujranwala), and the only document relating to a complaint cell working under the district vigilance committee (Faisalabad) dates back to 2006. The Committee therefore asks the Government to provide, in its next report, updated information concerning the functioning of the vigilance committees, including copies of monitoring/evaluation reports, and to indicate measures taken or envisaged to ensure their proper functioning and effectiveness.

Implementation of the National Policy and Plan of Action for the Abolition of Bonded Labour. The Committee notes the Government's indications concerning measures taken within the framework of its 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action for the Abolition of Bonded Labour and Rehabilitation of Freed Bonded Labourers. It notes, in particular, that a project entitled "Elimination of Bonded Labour in Brick Kilns" was initiated in the Province of Punjab in 2009, and a project entitled "Strengthening Law Enforcement Responses and Action against Internal Trafficking and Bonded Labour" was started in 2010 by the ILO in Sindh and Punjab Provinces. It also notes the Government's brief indications concerning several projects aiming at providing free legal aid services to bonded labourers undertaken in various Provinces by the Bonded Labour Fund established under the BLSA rules. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that, following the 18th Constitutional Amendment, the Provinces are drafting and adopting legislation on bonded labour in collaboration with the local office of the ILO.

While noting this information, the Committee reiterates the firm hope that the Government will redouble its efforts in order to ensure the effective implementation of the 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action and will provide detailed information on progress made and practical results achieved. The Committee asks the Government to provide, in particular, information on the implementation and the outcome of the 2009 and 2010 projects to combat bonded labour referred to above, including copies of the relevant reports and available statistics. The Committee hopes that the Government will continue to provide information on the activities of the National Committee for the Abolition of Bonded Labour and Rehabilitation of Bonded Labourers which was established to coordinate the implementation of the Plan and to review the implementation of the BLSA, as well as information on the activities of the Bonded Labour Fund established under the BLSA rules. Please also provide information on the legislative developments at the provincial level and supply copies of the legislation on bonded labour, as soon as it is adopted.

Debt bondage. Data-gathering measures to ascertain the current nature and scope of the problem. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to a report entitled "Rapid assessment studies of bonded labour in different sectors in Pakistan" conducted at the initiative of the Ministry of Labour and the ILO under the auspices of the Bonded Labour Research Forum (BLRF), with a view to exploring the existence and nature of bonded labour in ten sectors. The report represented the first phase of a larger research programme and was intended to lay the groundwork for detailed sector studies and a national survey to determine the incidence of bonded labour across the country, as foreseen in the Government's National Plan of Action.

The Committee notes that no such national survey has yet been carried out. The Government indicates, however, referring to the difficulties in the identification of bonded labourers, that it will consult the social partners to devise strategies for a survey on bonded labour through Provinces, as the subject of labour has been transferred to them following the 18th Constitutional Amendment. The Committee also notes a survey conducted in the brick kiln industry of the Provinces of Punjab and Sindh showing the numbers of brick kilns registered and workers employed as of 31 December 2011, communicated by the Government with its report.

The Committee reiterates the firm hope that the Government will soon be in a position to undertake, in accordance with the mandate of its 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action, a statistical survey on bonded labour throughout the country, using a valid methodology, in cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations and with human rights organizations and institutions, and that it will supply in its next report, information on the progress achieved in this regard.

2. Trafficking in persons. The Committee previously noted from the report of the International Organization for Migration (IOM) that Pakistan continued to be a major destination country for trafficked women, as well as a major transit country of persons trafficked from Bangladesh to Middle Eastern countries, where women are subject to sexual exploitation. The report emphasized that there was an urgent need to carry out comprehensive national baseline surveys with the aim of developing a South Asian database on trafficking in persons.

The Committee notes an Anti-Human Trafficking report for 2009 provided by the Government, which contains information on the prevention and victim protection measures, as well as on the prosecution of perpetrators. It notes, in particular, that 21,735 cases against human traffickers were registered until 31 October 2009, which resulted in 3,371 convictions.

The Committee asks the Government to provide, in its next report, updated information on the anti-trafficking measures taken by the competent agencies and organizations, including statistics on the number of trafficking cases registered under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance (2002), the number of prosecutions and convictions and indicating the penalties imposed on perpetrators. The Committee reiterates its hope that the Government will undertake a national baseline survey on trafficking in persons, in cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations, as well as other organizations and institutions concerned, and that it will supply information on the progress achieved in this regard.

3. Restrictions on voluntary termination of employment The Committee refers to its earlier comments, in which it noted the Government's indication that an amendment to the Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, 1952, under which government employees who unilaterally terminate their employment without the consent of the employer are subject to a term of imprisonment, was to be considered by the tripartite commission on the consolidation, simplification and rationalization of labour laws.

While duly noting the Government's indication in its report that the Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, 1952, is applied prudently and in rare cases, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will soon be taken in order to bring the federal and provincial essential services Acts into conformity with the Convention on this point and that the Government will report on the progress achieved in this regard.

Article 25. Penalties for the exaction of forced or compulsory labour. The Committee notes the Government's indications concerning the number of cases of bonded labour detected after raids by the police in 2010–12. It also notes the number of the trafficking-related complaints registered under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance (2002), Emigration Ordinance, Passport Act and other relevant laws, as well as the number of prosecutions and convictions registered until 31 October 2009.

The Committee asks the Government to provide updated information on the enforcement of the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance (2002), communicating the numbers of trafficking-related complaints registered, court proceedings initiated and convictions obtained, including copies of the relevant court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed. The Committee also requests the Government once again to supply information on the legal action taken against employers of bonded labourers under the BLSA, including copies of the court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed.

Paraguay

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes the Government's report and its annexes, as well as the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the National Confederation of Workers (CNT), dated 31 August 2011, which were forwarded to the Government on 6 and 15 September 2011, respectively.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Debt bondage of indigenous communities in the Chaco. For many years, the Committee's comments have been addressing the situation of the many indigenous workers in agricultural ranches in the Paraguayan Chaco, who are victims of debt bondage. On the basis of several comments made by workers' organizations, the discussion of this case by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2008 and the report Debt bondage and marginalization in the Chaco of Paraguay, prepared in the context of the technical assistance provided to Paraguay by the ILO Special Action Programme to Combat Forced Labour (SAP-FL), the Committee expressed concern at the mechanisms which result in the debt bondage of indigenous workers who are trapped in situations of forced labour. It also emphasized that the fact that these workers do not have any land increases their vulnerability.

In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Government had taken a number of measures, including the creation of the Commission on Fundamental Rights at Work and the Prevention of Forced Labour (Resolution No. 230 of 27 March 2009), which developed an action plan including: awareness-raising activities and training for labour inspectors; the establishment of an office of the Department of Labour in the locality of Teniente Irala Fernandez (central Chaco); and the adoption with the support of the ILO of the Decent Work Country Programme, in which the eradication of forced labour is an important component. The Committee emphasized that these measures are a first step, but that they must be reinforced and lead to systematic action commensurate with the gravity of the problem.

In its latest report, the Government refers to the relief activities undertaken in the context of the National Programme for Indigenous Peoples (PRONAPI). PRONAPI also prepared a questionnaire intended to compile data on the living conditions of indigenous communities. The Government enumerates a number of awareness-raising activities undertaken in 2009 and 2011 by the Commission on Fundamental Rights at Work and the Prevention of Forced Labour, as well as the training activities for labour inspectors and workers' and employers' organizations. The latter Commission established a Subcommission in July 2011 in the Chaco region, the mandate of which includes receiving complaints concerning violations of labour rights, promoting the dissemination of fundamental rights at work and preparing a regional action plan on fundamental rights and the prevention of forced labour. The Subcommission met twice in 2011. The Government adds that, up to May 2011, the Ministry of Justice and Labour carried out over 50 inspections of agricultural ranches in the Chaco and that no situation of forced labour was detected. Minutes were drawn up and fines imposed for violations of labour legislation relating to the registration of workers and the payment of wages.

The Committee notes the comments of the Central Confederation of Workers-Authentic (CUT-A), forwarded by the ITUC. The CUT-A, based on interviews held with representatives of indigenous organizations of the Chaco, emphasizes that the problem of forced labour in agricultural ranches and factories in the Chaco persists, and that the State has not adopted effective measures to eliminate these practices. The trade union insists on: the marginalization of indigenous communities, which have been forgotten by the State; the system of permanent debt in which major agricultural enterprises keep workers from these communities, thereby preventing them from seeking alternatives; the discrimination of which these workers are victims, as they systematically receive wages that are lower than those of other workers and, in many cases, are not even paid half of the minimum wage; the corruption which prevents the public authorities from discharging their duties appropriately, including when dealing with complaints, and also prevents the restitution of ancestral lands; and the inadequacy of the resources available to the Ministry of Justice and Labour to protect indigenous communities.

The Committee notes all of this information. It observes that the activities undertaken up to now by the Commission on Fundamental Rights at Work and the Prevention of Forced Labour are mainly related to awareness raising, and that those carried out in the context of the PRONAPI are concerned with food self-sufficiency. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to pursue its efforts with a view to combating the forced labour of indigenous workers in the Chaco. It hopes that measures will be taken that will allow the Subcommission on Fundamental Rights at Work and the Prevention of Forced Labour in the Chaco region to adopt a regional plan of action to strengthen the measures taken by the various bodies involved in combating forced labour, both with regard to prevention and repression, and the protection of victims. It requests the Government to ensure that this plan responds to the situation of vulnerability of indigenous workers so as to protect them against the debt mechanisms that result in debt bondage. The Committee also refers the Government to the comments that it is making under the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169).

The Committee notes that a number of inspections have already been undertaken in the Chaco region and that none of them detected situations of forced labour. However, the Committee observes that, in their comments, the ITUC and the CNT and the CUT–A confirm the persistence of forced labour in the Chaco region. The Committee emphasizes the need to strengthen the labour inspectorate, and particularly the office of the Labour Department in the locality of Teniente Irala Fernandez as well as the Subcommission on Fundamental Rights at Work and the Prevention of Forced Labour in the Chaco region, the mandate of which includes receiving complaints concerning violations of labour rights. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that these bodies have at their disposal adequate human and material resources as well as access to appropriate training so as to identify victims and to enable them to assert their rights; deal effectively with the complaints received and conduct relevant investigations; and travel rapidly and effectively in the areas at risk.

Article 25. Imposition of effective penalties. The Committee emphasizes that the effective imposition of penalties in the event of violations of labour legislation is an essential element in combating forced labour, as it is characterized by the accumulation of several violations of labour law, which must be penalized as such. Moreover, taken together, these labour law violations constitute the criminal offence of forced labour, which must themselves be criminalized and give rise to penal sanctions.

(a) Administrative sanctions. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the number of cases in which the inspection services have detected infringements of sections 47, 176 and 231 of the Labour Code respecting the protection of wages, including with regard to compliance with the minimum wage and the operation of work stores. Please provide information on the fines imposed on employers and on the compensation granted to workers. The Committee refers in this respect to the comments made on the application of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95).

(b) Penal sanctions. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that no complaint of forced labour has been made. The Committee recalls that, under the terms of Article 25 of the Convention, penal sanctions must be imposed and strictly enforced upon those found guilty of the exaction of forced labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to raise the awareness of the Office of the Public Prosecutor with regard to the issue of debt bondage and to strengthen its cooperation with the labour inspection services in this respect. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the provisions of the penal legislation which may be used to prosecute persons exacting forced labour and, where appropriate, to ensure that the national legislation contains sufficiently precise provisions so that the competent authorities can criminally prosecute and penalize those responsible for such practices.

Article 2(2)(c). Obligation to work imposed on non-convicted detainees. For many years, the Committee has been emphasizing the need to amend the Act on the prison system (Act No. 210 of 1970), under the terms of which work in prison shall be compulsory for persons subjected to security measures in a prison establishment (section 39 read in conjunction with section 10 of the Act). The Committee recalled in this respect that, under the terms of Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention, only prisoners who have been convicted in a court of law may be subjected to the obligation to work. The Committee observes that in the past the Government indicated that the provisions of the Act on the prison system would be amended or repealed, first within the framework of the adoption of a Prison Code, then through the adoption of a new Code of Penal Procedure. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided any information in its latest report on the progress made in the adoption of a new Code of Penal Procedure. It has provided a copy of the internal rules of the Esperanza prison unit, to which only convicted prisoners are sent. As this matter has been the subject of the Committee's comments for many years, the Committee trusts that the Government will not fail to take the necessary measures to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention by ensuring that prisoners awaiting judgment and persons detained without being convicted are not subject to the obligation to perform prison work. The Committee particularly emphasizes the need to amend the Act of 1970 on the prison system since, according to the information available on the website of the Ministry of Labour and Justice, of the 6,146 persons who are detained, only 1,772 have been convicted in a court of law.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Peru

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report, which contains very detailed information in reply to its previous comments, and of the observations submitted by the Single Confederation of Workers of Peru (CUT) on the application of the Convention, forwarded to the Government in September 2011.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Preliminary remarks. In its previous comments the Committee noted the measures taken by the Government to strengthen the institutional and legislative framework for combating the different forms of forced labour that exist in Peru: practices akin to slavery and debt servitude inflicted on indigenous peoples, trafficking in persons and the exploitation of women in domestic service. It noted in particular the approval of the National Plan to Combat Forced Labour and the creation of the National Committee to Combat Forced Labour (CNLTF) and of various other institutions dealing with forced labour, in particular in the labour inspectorate and the police. It asked the Government to provide information on the implementation of the various components of the action plan.

The Committee notes that, in its observations, the CUT underlines that Peru has made progress in combating forced labour by strengthening the legal and institutional framework to do so, but that much remains to be done in order to eradicate all forms of forced labour in the country. Peru has no statistical estimates of the phenomenon other than the figures compiled by the authorities that receive complaints, which represent only the tip of the iceberg. By way of illustration, the CUT describes in detail the process leading to the exaction of forced labour in two specific situations in the Madre de Dios region: the first concerns farmers from very poor regions in the Andes who are victims of trafficking and debt servitude in the goldmines, and the second concerns indigenous communities working in the logging sector. The CUT likewise refers to nut harvesting and emphasizes that the common denominator in the imposition of such practices is poverty and the limited presence of the State.

1. Combating forced labour, particularly as imposed on indigenous communities. (a) National Plan to Combat Forced Labour (PNLCTF). The Committee notes that the PNLCTF has been updated following the adoption of an operational plan for the period 2012–13 covering six sets of priority actions. It also notes that the CNLTF has drawn up a proposal for a new national plan, which has been submitted to a process of consultation at national and regional levels. The plan, which covers the period from 2013–17 and sets specific objectives and indicators for implementation of its various components, will provide a comprehensive and inter-institutional framework for combating forced labour. The Committee hopes that the new National Plan (2013–17) will be adopted in the near future and that due account will be taken, in the consultation process, of the obstacles that have prevented the effective implementation of some of the measures set forth in the current PNLCTF. It requests the Government to provide information on any reports assessing the implementation of the 2012–13 operational plan. The Committee also asks the Government to ensure that the plan will have the necessary financial support for its implementation at both national and regional level. In this context, the Committee notes from the 2012–13 operational plan that one of the priorities is to promote the establishment of regional committees to combat forced labour and to provide them with technical support in terms of design, standards and operations, with a view to enabling them to carry out a diagnosis of forced labour and develop regional plans to fight forced labour. The Committee welcomes in this connection the creation of a regional committee for the Ucayali region. Considering that it is essential to strengthen the State's presence in regions with a marked prevalence of forced labour, the Committee expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to allow the establishment and effective functioning of regional committees to combat forced labour.

(b) Legislative measures. In its previous comments the Committee underscored the need to supplement the national legislation by incorporating in the criminal law a provision that expressly criminalizes forced labour and defines its various components in order to cover all forced labour practices that exist in Peru. It notes from the information sent by the Government in its report that the proposal to amend the Penal Code, drafted by the Ministry of Labour, which aimed to make forced labour a criminal offence, has been unsuccessful because the general office of the legal counsel, within the Ministry of Justice, is of the view that forced labour is already covered by the provisions of section 153 of the Penal Code under which the trafficking of persons is a criminal offence. The Committee notes that the Ministry of Labour's General Directorate of Fundamental Rights and Safety and Health does not share that view and has drafted a new proposal that will be submitted directly to the Ministry of Justice. The Committee further notes that, in its observations, the CUT is adamant that the law should prohibit forced labour, and particularly any type of employment relationship that involves the settlement of a debt by work and leads to debt bondage. The CUT also submits that some elements of the process whereby forced labour is imposed on indigenous communities in the logging sector ought to be dealt with in regulations.

The Committee points out in this connection that forced labour as defined in the Convention is a broader concept than the trafficking of persons and that, in view of the principle that criminal law must be strictly interpreted, it is important that national courts should have precise rules to follow. Furthermore, the modi operandi of human trafficking are not necessarily found in the other forms of forced labour, particularly debt bondage or certain forms of exploitation of the labour of indigenous communities. Therefore the Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary steps to ensure that the Ministry of Labour's legislative proposal to include forced labour in the Penal Code as a separate offence making all forms of forced labour punishable and providing for penalties commensurate with the seriousness of the offences, is adopted at the earliest possible date, as provided in the 2012–13 operational plan of the PNLCTF.

With reference to its previous observation, the Committee notes that an amendment has been drafted to the regulations on the registration of private employment agencies, providing for the removal from the National Business Register of any enterprises which would have participated, allowed or intervened in the commission of the offences of human trafficking or forced labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the status of the draft amendment.

(c) Diagnosis. The Committee notes that in its report, the Government refers to various initiatives of the Ministry of Labour's Directorate General of Fundamental Rights and Safety and Health, asking certain ministries, authorities empowered to hear grievances and regional authorities to provide information on the areas and locations where forced labour is practised, with a view to compiling and analysing such data. Some of the information has already been forward to the labour inspectorate so that it can prepare an inspection campaign. The Committee notes that the 2012–13 operational plan devotes a section to the collection of information on forced labour and on diagnosing the situation. The Committee considers that the collection of reliable data on the extent and the characteristics of the different forms of forced labour is essential and constitutes an indispensable prerequisite for the planning and success of government intervention. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to conduct a qualitative and quantitative survey to supplement the information already available on forced labour practices with a view to ensuring that the measures to be implemented under the national plan target all the peoples and regions concerned, adjusting them as necessary.

(d) Labour inspection. With reference to the special labour inspection unit set up to combat forced labour (GEIT), the Committee expressed the view that the establishment of a group of inspectors who are specialized in combating forced labour was a positive step. It nonetheless noted with concern that the GEIT appeared not to have the financial resources needed to carry out its tasks, and asked the Government to take the necessary remedial action. The Committee notes that according to the Government, the labour inspectorate has been reinforced by the appointment of 46 new auxiliary inspectors and labour inspectors have been transferred to the regions to enhance the means of action available to regional governments in this domain. The Committee takes note of the statistics of visits undertaken for the inspection of forced labour and observes that they focused on two regions, Lima and Madre de Dios, and that of the 64 visits conducted between 2007 and 2010, none led to the identification of any workers subjected to forced labour. The Government confirms that no fines have been imposed under section 25 of the implementing regulations of the General Labour Inspection Act (Supreme Decree No. 019-2006-TR), pursuant to which, forced labour, whether or not remunerated, and the trafficking or capture of persons for this purpose, are very serious offences against proper employment relationships, punishable by fines.

The Committee expresses its concern at the absence of any information on the work done by the GEIT and the measures taken by the Government to build the GEIT's capacity for action and at the fact that no offences have been reported, despite surveys having identified some regions where forced labour exists and the processes whereby such practices are imposed. The Committee notes that the 2012–13 operational plan intends to “reactivate and reinforce the GEIT”, pointing out that “the GEIT's current problems” need to be assessed and that measures must be promoted to build its capacity for mobility in the field by targeting regions of prevalence and providing it with adequate resources. The Committee recalls the essential role played by labour inspection in combating forced labour. Through the inspection visits carried out by the GEIT it should be possible not only to identify the workers who have fallen victim to forced labour and release them from such situations, but also to gather evidence allowing civil and criminal suits to be brought against the offenders. The Committee accordingly expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary steps to provide the GEIT with the staff and material resources it needs to accomplish its missions throughout the country. Please specify the number of inspections carried out, the cases of forced labour identified and the legal action taken on the offences reported.

(e) Awareness-raising and prevention. The Committee notes the detailed information sent by the Government on the many activities undertaken by the Ministry of Labour and other ministries involved in combating forced labour, to raise awareness about the problems of forced labour and to provide appropriate training. The Committee notes in particular that many of these activities have targeted indigenous communities and the authorities directly responsible for identifying and punishing forced labour practices, such as the labour inspectorate or the police. The Committee encourages the Government to continue to develop actions to raise awareness among the population as a whole and among groups that are at risk, as well as activities to train the public authorities responsible for combating forced labour.

2. Domestic work in conditions of forced labour. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee takes due note of the measures taken to step up protection for women in domestic work, particularly the activities conducted to make them aware of their rights. The Committee also notes that the Ministry for Women and Social Development is drafting a bill to amend the Act on Women in Domestic Work in order to strengthen their rights and particularly to ensure their right to a contract in writing, limited working hours and remuneration equal to the minimum living wage. The Committee hopes that the bill will soon be adopted in order to reinforce the legal framework applying to domestic workers. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken under the National Plan to Combat Forced Labour to protect this group of workers from practices amounting to forced labour, providing them with the assistance they need in order to assert their rights and report any abuse they may have suffered to the competent authorities.

3. Trafficking in persons. The Committee notes the detailed information sent by the Government on the measures taken to combat trafficking in persons in the context of activities conducted and coordinated by the Standing Multisectoral Working Group against Trafficking in Persons (GTMPPT) particularly as regards prevention, training and the protection of victims, and on the action taken by the division to combat trafficking in persons established in the national police force's Criminal Investigation Directorate. The Committee notes in particular that the trafficking in persons hotline that operates around the clock receives a large number of calls (1,268 in 2010 and 1,024 in 2011) and that the professionals who provide assistance and advice to callers succeeded in forwarding a number of complaints to the competent authorities which were followed up by investigations and court proceedings (31 in 2010 and 36 in 2011). Furthermore, thanks to the system of recording statistics of trafficking in persons and similar offences (RETA), which compiles data on complaints, police investigations, locations, incidents and victims of trafficking, targeted supervision and training were carried out. Lastly, figures compiled by the Crime Observatory show that out of 228 complaints filed for trafficking in persons most of the 396 victims are minors (65.3 per cent), female (81.6 per cent) and of Peruvian nationality (92.4 per cent).

While observing that the full and detailed information sent by the Government on the measures it is taking to combat trafficking in persons bears witness to its commitment to combating this scourge, the Committee encourages the Government to pursue these efforts and requests it to continue to provide information on these issues. It would be grateful if the Government would indicate how the activities undertaken to combat human trafficking are coordinated with the action taken under the National Plan to Combat Forced Labour, and to specify the measures taken to strengthen cooperation between the institutions responsible for combating forced labour practices, particularly the labour inspectorate as well as the police and the prosecuting authorities.

Article 25. Effective and strictly applied penal sanctions. In its previous comments, the Committee observed that forced labour in Peru takes a number of forms (practices akin to slavery or debt bondage inflicted on indigenous populations, trafficking in persons, exploitation of domestic workers) and that the absence of any penal provisions that specifically suppress and punish forced labour appeared to be an obstacle to the initiation of criminal proceedings against offenders. The one exception is trafficking in persons, the constitutive elements being clearly defined in sections 153 and 153A of the Penal Code. The Committee notes with interest from the information sent by the Government that a large number of criminal actions were brought for trafficking in persons and penal sanctions were imposed on the offenders. This is not the case of other forms of forced labour, since no offenders appear to have been punished. In these circumstances, the Committee refers to the comments it made above on the need to supplement the penal legislation in order to criminalize forced labour specifically and define the offences it covers so that the police and prosecuting authorities have a basis in law for conducting proper investigations and bringing judicial actions against the perpetrators of the various forms of forced labour existent in Peru. The Committee recalls in this connection that in order to reduce forced labour, it is essential that the perpetrators of such practices be punished by sufficiently dissuasive penal sanctions, in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention. With regard to trafficking in persons, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application in practice of sections 153 and 153A of the Penal Code.

The Committee encourages the Government to continue to avail itself of ILO technical assistance.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Philippines

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1960)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee previously noted that, pursuant to section 142 of the Revised Penal Code, penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed for inciting to sedition by means of speeches, proclamations, writings or emblems; uttering seditious words or speeches; writing, publishing or circulating scurrilous libels against the Government, and pursuant to section 154, for publishing any false news which may endanger the public order or cause damage to the interest or credit of the State, by means of printing, lithography or any other means of publication. The Committee observed that these provisions of the Revised Penal Code are worded in terms broad enough to lend themselves to be applied as a means of punishment for the peaceful expression of views and, in so far as they are enforceable with sanctions involving compulsory labour, they fall within the scope of the Convention. The Committee expressed the hope that measures would be taken to amend or repeal sections 142 and 154 of the Revised Penal Code so as to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that a committee composed of experts in criminal law is in the process of studying the amendment to the Revised Penal Code. Recalling that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that sections 142 and 154 of the Revised Penal Code are amended or repealed so as to ensure that no prison sentence entailing compulsory labour can be imposed on persons who, without using or advocating violence, express certain political views or opposition to the established political, social or economic system. It requests the Government to provide information on measures taken in this regard with its next report. Pending the amendment of the Revised Penal Code, the Committee again requests the Government to provide information on the application of sections 142 and 154 in practice, including copies of relevant court decisions defining or illustrating the scope of these provisions.

Article 1(d). Punishment for having participated in strikes. The Committee previously noted that pursuant to section 263(g) of the Labor Code, the Secretary of Labor and Employment has discretionary authority to enjoin or force an end to strikes in labour disputes that occur in industries which, in his or her opinion, are "indispensable to the national interest", by "assuming jurisdiction" over the dispute and certifying it for compulsory arbitration. Section 263(g) also provides that the President may determine the industries "indispensable to the national interest" and assume jurisdiction over a labour dispute. The declaration of a strike after such "assumption of jurisdiction" or submission to compulsory arbitration is prohibited (section 264), and participation in an illegal strike is punishable by imprisonment (section 272(a) of the Labor Code), which involves an obligation to perform labour (pursuant to section 1727 of the Revised Administrative Code). The Revised Penal Code also provides for sanctions of imprisonment for participation in illegal strikes (section 146).

The Committee notes the statement in a report from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) entitled "Internationally recognized core labour standards in Philippines: Report for the WTO General Council Review of the Trade Policies of Philippines" of 20 and 22 March 2012 that in 2010, the Department of Labor and Employment assumed jurisdiction in seven disputes. The ITUC report also indicates that severe penalties are applied for participation in illegal strikes, including up to three years of imprisonment.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that one of the priorities of the Philippine Labor and Employment Plan 2011–15 is responding to labour market realities through policy reforms and aligning labour legislation with the Philippine Constitution, international treaties and ILO Conventions, in a sound and realistic manner. The Department of Labor and Employment is initiating the review of labour legislation through the Labor Code Review Project, on a tripartite basis and under the auspices of the Joint Congressional Committee on Labor and Employment. This Labor Code Review Project will create a tripartite commission on labour law reform composed of representatives from the National Tripartite Industrial Peace Council (NTIPC) and national and international experts on labour law and social legislation. The Government indicates that through consultations with tripartite support, these reforms will include the amendment of sections 263, 264 and 272 of the Labor Code. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its report submitted under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), that two bills are undergoing tripartite consultations for submission to the NTIPC, one of which removes the possibility of imposing a criminal sanction for mere participation in an illegal strike on grounds of non-compliance with the administrative requirements.

The Committee recalls that Article 1(d) of the Convention prohibits the use of any form of forced or compulsory labour as a punishment for having participated in strikes. It refers in this connection to the explanations contained in paragraph 315 of its 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work, in which it has considered that, regardless of the legality of the strike action, any sanctions imposed should not be disproportionate to the seriousness of the violations committed, and the authorities should not have recourse to measures of imprisonment for the mere fact of organizing or participating in a strike. Referring also to its comments addressed to the Government under Convention No. 87, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures, within the framework of the Labor Code Review Project, to amend the Labor Code so as to ensure that penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) cannot be imposed for participation in a strike. It requests the Government to provide information on measures taken in this regard in its next report.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Russian Federation

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1956)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. 1. Strengthening the legal framework. The Committee previously noted that section 127.1 of the Penal Code prohibits trafficking in persons. It also noted the Government's indication in its 2008 report that a draft text of the Law on combating trafficking in persons had been finalized and submitted to the State Duma of the Russian Federation. In 2010, the Committee expressed the firm hope that immediate steps would be taken towards the adoption of the draft Law on combating trafficking in persons.

The Committee notes with concern an absence of information on this point in the Government's report. The Committee also notes that the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR) in its concluding observations of 1 June 2011, encouraged the Government to adopt the comprehensive draft Law on combating trafficking in persons (E/C.12/RUS/CO/5, paragraph 23). The Committee therefore urges the Government to take measures to ensure that the draft Law on combating trafficking in persons is adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide information on progress made in this regard in its next report.

2. Law enforcement. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the communication from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), according to which thousands of persons were trafficked from the Russian Federation to other countries, including Canada, China, Germany, Israel, Italy, Japan, Spain, Thailand and the United States. Internal trafficking within the Russian Federation also reportedly took place; women were generally forced to work as prostitutes while men were trafficked into agricultural or construction work. The Committee also noted the Government's indication in its 2007 report that detection of trafficking in persons cases had increased sixfold in three years. Furthermore, according to the 2009 ILO Global Report on forced labour, data from the Russian Federation indicated a steady increase in the number of identified persons trafficked for labour exploitation. The Committee therefore noted that, in spite of the legal prohibition of trafficking in persons, it remained a concern in practice, and it requested information on measures to combat this phenomenon.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that, in addition to internal affairs institutions (including special departments dealing with trafficking), staff from the Federal Customs Service and the Federal Security Service have also been assigned to identify cases of trafficking. The Government further indicates that from March to August 2009, operational and preventive measures were carried out by the Ministry of Internal Affairs and the Federal Migration Service to counter illegal migration, including trafficking in persons. The Government states that this included investigations into 750 "job placement" organizations which act as intermediaries in the transfer of persons, including 107 model and marriage agencies and 544 tourist companies involved in the preparation of travel documents and visas.

The Committee also notes the information in the Government's report that between 2004 and 2008, a number of organized criminal groups were identified which had been involved in recruiting Russian citizens to perform sexual services in countries of Western Europe, the Middle East, Africa, Asia and North America. The Government states that more than 25,000 cases of trafficking were identified in addition to over 15,000 perpetrators.

While welcoming the measures undertaken by the Government, the Committee notes an absence of information on the specific number of prosecutions, convictions or penalties applied in relation to the 25,000 trafficking cases that were identified. However, the Committee notes that the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), in its concluding observations of 10 August 2010, expressed concern at the high prevalence of trafficking in the Russian Federation, and that the country is a source, transit and destination country for trafficking in persons. CEDAW further expressed regret regarding the lack of disaggregated data on the number of victims of trafficking, and compensation received as well as statistics on complaints, investigations, prosecutions and penalties imposed on the perpetrators of such crimes (CEDAW/C/USR/CO/7, paragraph 26). Moreover, the Committee notes that the CESCR, in its concluding observations of 1 June 2011, expressed concern, in spite of the steps taken by the Government, about continued reports of trafficking in women and children for sexual exploitation and abuse (E/C.12/RUS/CO/5, paragraph 23). The Committee therefore requests the Government to pursue and further strengthen its efforts to prevent, suppress and combat trafficking in persons, and to continue to provide information on the measures taken. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to provide appropriate training to law enforcement officials, border officials and the judiciary in order to strengthen their capacity to combat trafficking in persons. It also requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of section 127.1 of the Penal Code, particularly the number of investigations, prosecutions, convictions and the penalties applied.

3. Protection and reintegration of victims. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the majority of victims of trafficking in persons are women and girls from socially vulnerable segments of the population. The Government indicates that the Ministry of Health and Social Development, the guardianship authorities, the social services administration, and psychological assistance offices contribute to the social rehabilitation of victims of trafficking, and their subsequent integration into society. The Committee also notes that CEDAW, in its concluding observations of 10 August 2010, urged the Government to take measures to ensure that victims of trafficking are adequately protected and assisted, as well as to undertake efforts for their recovery and social integration (CEDAW/C/USR/CO/7, paragraph 27). The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken to protect and assist the victims of trafficking with a view to facilitating their safe return and subsequent social reintegration.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1998)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political or ideological views. The Committee previously noted the adoption of a law of 24 July 2007 to amend certain legal acts with a view to increasing liability for "extremist activities", which include acts based on political, ideological, racial, national or religious hatred or enmity. It noted, in particular, that under sections 280, 282.1 and 282.2 of the Penal Code, the following acts are punishable with sanctions of imprisonment (which involves compulsory prison labour): public appeal to perform extremist activities; establishment of an extremist group or organization; and participation in such a group or organization prohibited by a court decision. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the application in practice of sections 280, 282.1 and 282.2 of the Penal Code, as well as clarification of the term “extremist activities”.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that to ensure that judicial practice is consistent in cases involving offences of an extremist nature, the Plenum of the Supreme Court adopted Decision No. 11 (28 June 2011) on judicial practice in criminal cases involving offences of an extremist nature. This Decision seeks to provide guidance to ensure uniformity in the judicial procedure related to cases brought under sections 280, 282.1 and 282.2 of the Penal Code. The Committee also notes the Government’s statement that the current legislation of the Russian Federation contains no legal definition of the term “extremist activities”. However, the Government refers to section 1 of the Law on Combating Extremist Activity (Federal Act No. 114-FZ of 25 July 2002 as amended), which states that extremist activity/extremism includes, inter alia: stirring up of social, racial, ethnic or religious discord; propaganda of the exceptional nature, superiority or deficiency of persons on the basis of their social, racial, ethnic, religious or linguistic affiliation or attitude to religion; public calls inciting the carrying out of the aforementioned actions or mass dissemination (or the production or storage) of knowingly extremist material; making a public, knowingly false, accusation that an individual holding state office of the Russian Federation has committed actions mentioned in this section while discharging their official duties; and organization and preparation of the aforementioned actions and also incitement of others to commit them.

In this regard, the Committee notes that the Human Rights Committee, in its concluding observations of 25 November 2009, noted that there have been numerous reports that laws on extremism are being used to target organizations and individuals critical of the Government. The Human Rights Committee expressed regret that the definition of “extremist activity” in the Law on Combating Extremist Activity remains vague, allowing for arbitrariness in its application and that the 2006 amendment to this law has made certain forms of defamation of public officials an act of extremism (CCPR/C/RUS/CO/6, paragraph 25). Moreover, the Committee notes that the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, in its concluding observations of 1 June 2011, urged the Government to review sections 280, 282.1 and 282.2 of the Penal Code, under which a number of acts are punishable with sanctions of imprisonment together with compulsory labour (E/C.12/RUS/CO/5, paragraph 13).

The Committee recalls that limitations may be imposed by law on individual rights and freedoms in order to ensure respect of the rights and freedoms of others and to meet the requirements of morality, public order and the general welfare in a democratic society, and the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite to violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. However, the Committee wishes to emphasize that if such restrictions are formulated in such wide and general terms that they may lead to penalties involving compulsory labour as punishment for the peaceful expression of views or of opposition to the established political, social or economic system, such penalties are not in conformity with the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide information on the impact of Decision No. 11 of the Plenum of the Supreme Court of 2011 in ensuring that no prison sentence entailing compulsory labour can be imposed on persons who, without using or advocating violence, express certain political views or opposition to the established political, social or economic system. In this regard, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the application of the laws concerning “extremism” in practice, including information on any prosecutions, convictions and sentences pursuant to sections 280, 282.1 and 282.2 of the Penal Code and the Law on Combating Extremist Activity. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of Decision No. 11 of the Plenum of the Supreme Court of 2011, with its next report.

Saudi Arabia

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1978)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Vulnerable situation of migrant workers with regard to the exaction of forced labour. In its previous comments, the Committee had referred to the vulnerable situation of migrant workers, particularly domestic workers who are excluded from the provisions of the Labour Code, who are often confronted with employment policies such as the visa “sponsorship” system and subjected to abusive employer practices such as the retention of passports, non-payment of wages, deprivation of liberty and physical and sexual abuse which cause their employment to be transformed into situations that could amount to forced labour. The Committee had requested the Government to provide information on any measures taken to adopt regulations on the employment conditions of migrant domestic workers, pursuant to section 7 of the Labour Code.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that it is aware of the magnitude of the seriousness of the situation of migrant domestic workers and that it is committed to expediting the process of adopting regulations on the work of this category of workers, especially in light of the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189).

The Committee also notes in the report of the UN Special Rapporteur on violence against women dated 14 April 2009, that “upon arrival, all migrants have their passport and residency permit taken away from them [...] and some find themselves in slave-like conditions”. Moreover, “female domestic workers who are among the most vulnerable to abuse [...] are sometimes locked up in the house with no possibility to make or receive phone calls, or are prohibited from leaving the house at their will” (A/HRC/11/6/Add.3 paragraphs 57 and 59).

Finally the Committee notes the statement in the report of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), for the World Trade Organization General Council on the Trade Policies of Saudi Arabia of 25 and 27 January 2012, entitled “Internationally recognized core labour standards in Saudi Arabia” that migrant workers are forced to work long hours, often all day long with little or no time for rest. Moreover, this ITUC report underlines that a “sponsor” system, also known as Kafala system, ties migrant workers to particular employers, limiting their options and freedom. A migrant worker is not allowed to change employer or leave the country without written consent of the employer. Workers cannot leave their job and in case a worker escapes the employer, then she/he cannot search for a new job, nor leave the country. This system in conjunction with the practice of confiscating travel documents and withdrawing wages puts workers under conditions akin to slavery.

The Committee highlights the importance of taking effective action to ensure that the system of employment of migrant workers, including migrant domestic workers, does not place the workers concerned in a situation of increased vulnerability, particularly when they are confronted with employment policies such as the visas “sponsorship” system and subjected to abusive employer practices, such as retention of passports, non-payment of wages, deprivation of liberty, and physical and sexual abuses. Such practices might cause their employment to be transformed into situations that could amount to forced labour.

The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the regulations on migrant domestic workers will be adopted without delay. It expresses the firm hope that these regulations will include provisions specifically tailored to the difficult circumstances faced by migrant domestic workers and in particular to the problems caused by the visa “sponsorship” system, and will ensure that domestic workers are fully protected from abusive practices and conditions that amount to the exaction of forced labour. It requests the Government to provide a copy of these regulations as soon as they are adopted.

Article 25. Penalties for the exaction of forced or compulsory labour. Over a number of years, the Committee has been observing that the Labour Code does not contain any specific provisions prohibiting forced labour. In this regard, it notes the Government’s reiterated explanations referring to section 61 of the Labour Code, which prohibits employers from using workers to exact labour without the payment of wages. The Committee observes, once again however, that section 61 does not contain a general prohibition of forced labour but merely lays down an obligation to remunerate the performance of work within the framework of a normal employment relationship.

The Committee recalls, that the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable as a penal offence, and that States must ensure that the penalties imposed by law are really adequate and strictly enforced. Article 25 provides a repressive component which ultimately plays a preventive role, since the effective punishment of perpetrators encourages victims to lodge complaints and has a dissuasive effect (paragraph 140 of 2007 General Survey on forced labour).

The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures with a view to amending the national legislation, so as to provide for the prohibition of forced labour, and to make violations punishable with penal sanctions, which should be really adequate and strictly enforced, as required by Article 25 of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Sierra Leone

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1961)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Compulsory agricultural work. Over many years, the Committee has been referring to section 8(h) of the Chiefdom Councils Act (Cap. 61), under which compulsory cultivation may be imposed on “natives”. On numerous occasions, it requested the Government to repeal or amend this provision. The Committee also noted the Government’s statement that the abovementioned section is not in conformity with article 9 of the Constitution and would be held unenforceable. The Committee noted the Government’s repeated indication that section 8(h) is not applicable in practice and that information on any amendment of this section would be communicated to the ILO in the near future. The Committee notes with serious concern the absence of information from the Government on this point. Recalling that the Government has repeatedly indicated since 1964 that this legislation would be amended, the Committee regrets to note that no action has been taken in this regard. Therefore the Committee reiterates the firm hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken in order to bring section 8(h) of the Chiefdom Councils Act into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. It requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

Spain

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1932)

The Committee notes the statistical data provided by the Government on the inspections carried out by the labour inspection services to verify compliance with labour and social security rights, as well as occupational safety and health regulations, for prisoners performing work in the framework of a special employment relationship.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. 1. Trafficking in persons. With reference to its earlier comments, the Committee notes the measures taken by the Government to reinforce the legislative and institutional frameworks to combat trafficking in persons. The Committee accordingly notes with interest that, further to the adoption of Act No. 5/2010 of 22 June 2010, a title on trafficking in human beings has been incorporated into the Penal Code. Section 177bis determines in detail the elements that constitute trafficking in human beings (both for the imposition of forced labour and services and for sexual exploitation) and establishes penalties of imprisonment of between five and eight years, which may be increased in the event of aggravating circumstances. The Committee also notes the amendment of the legislation on the rights and freedoms of foreign nationals in Spain and their social integration (Act No. 2/2009 of 11 December 2009 and Royal Decree No. 557/2011 of 20 April 2011) so as to encourage cooperation by victims with the investigation authorities, including through the granting of a period of recovery and reflection and the possibility to live and work on the national territory under exceptional circumstances related to their association with judicial procedures or their personal situation. The Government adds that, following the approval in 2009 of the Comprehensive Plan to Combat Trafficking in Human Beings for Sexual Exploitation (2009–12), a second plan of action was drawn up at the end of December 2010 specifically covering trafficking in human beings for labour exploitation. In this context, measures are to be taken to evaluate the problem, as well as for prevention, repression and the protection of victims. The Government also emphasizes the specific role of the labour inspection services which, in the context of their action to combat “irregular economy”, can detect criminal conduct relating to the exploitation of labour, sexual exploitation or trafficking for the purposes of exploitation and, where appropriate, forward for action to the Office of the Public Prosecutor (Ministerio Fiscal) a minute setting out the evidence for the violations observed. In this connection, the labour inspectorate has drawn up a list of indicators of trafficking for labour exploitation and is preparing a guide on action in this field by inspectors and deputy inspectors, with the latter having to receive specific training. Finally, the Government provides statistical data on the inspections carried out by the labour inspection services in collaboration with the security forces and institutions in relation to forced labour and the supervision of the “irregular economy”. In 2010, of the 822 inspections that reported situations of forced labour, 364 concerned cases of labour exploitation not involving trafficking, 134 cases of trafficking for sexual exploitation, 124 cases of sexual exploitation not involving trafficking and six cases of trafficking for labour exploitation. The Government specifies that the labour inspection data do not provide a complete picture of the situation and have to be viewed with the data of the Office of the Public Prosecutor and the state security forces, which are the competent institutions for these violations.

The Committee notes all of this information, which bears witness to the Government’s commitment to combat trafficking in persons. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of the Comprehensive Plan to Combat Trafficking in Human Beings for Sexual Exploitation (2009–12), particularly on the evaluation carried out by the inter-ministerial coordination group and on the annual reports drawn up by the group. Please also indicate whether the Comprehensive Plan to Combat Trafficking in Human Beings for Labour Exploitation has been adopted and whether measures have been taken for its implementation. The Committee would also be grateful if the Government would provide statistical data on judicial procedures under new section 177bis of the Penal Code. In this regard, please indicate the measures taken to strengthen the resources and capacities of law enforcement bodies (the labour inspectorate, the security forces, the Office of the Public Prosecutor and the courts) and to ensure effective cooperation between them. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted for the protection of victims (for example, through the creation of structures to provide them with psychological, medical and social support) and to help them assert their rights. Please indicate the number of victims who have benefited from a period of recovery and reflection, and the number of those who have been granted a residence or work permit, as envisaged by the legislation on the rights and freedoms of foreign nationals in Spain and their social integration.

2. Exploitation of vulnerable workers involving forced labour. The Committee observes that, according to the statistics provided by the Government on the inspections carried out by the labour inspection services in 2010 resulting in the identification of situations which constitute forced labour, the majority of such situations concerned cases of labour exploitation not involving trafficking. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the action taken by the labour inspection services for the identification of situations of labour exploitation involving forced labour, the penalties imposed and the manner in which such situations are referred to the Office of the Public Prosecutor for the appropriate judicial procedures, in accordance with the respective provisions of the Penal Code. In this regard, the Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the number of prosecutions initiated and the penal sanctions imposed on perpetrators.

Sri Lanka

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 2003)

The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government in its report, as well as the comments made by the Lanka Jathika Estate Workers’ Union (LJEWU) on the application of the Convention.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. 1. Emergency regulations. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the Emergency (Miscellaneous Provisions and Powers) Regulations, adopted in 1989 and revised in 1994, 2000 and 2005, which contained various prohibitions concerning meetings, processions and publications, enforceable with sanctions of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour by virtue of section 65 of the Prison Ordinance). The Committee notes that upon request by the President, these emergency regulations expired on 30 August 2011.

2. Penal Code. The Committee notes that section 120 of the Penal Code provides that whoever by words, signs or visible representations excites or attempts to excite feelings of disaffection to the President or the Government, or hatred to or contempt of the administration of justice, or excites or attempts to excite people, or attempts to raise discontent or to promote feelings of ill will and hostility between different classes of people, shall be punished with imprisonment for up to two years. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application of section 120 of the Penal Code in practice in order to ascertain the scope of these provisions and to ensure that they are not used to penalize the expression of political opinions by sanctions of imprisonment involving compulsory labour.

3. Prevention of terrorism regulations. The Committee notes that on 29 August 2011, Prevention of Terrorism Regulations Nos 1–5 were decreed which entered into force following the expiration of the emergency regulations. The Committee notes that section 3 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Proscription of the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam) Regulations No. 1 of 2011 provides a broad definition of punishable activities, including taking part in meetings, promoting, encouraging, supporting, advising, assisting, and causing the dissemination of information, within or outside Sri Lanka, linked to the Sri Lanka Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam or any other organization presenting or acting on behalf of the said organization. This definition also covers any person connected or concerned in or reasonably suspected of being connected with or concerned in any of such activities. Any person found guilty of an offence as defined in section 3 shall be sentenced to imprisonment involving compulsory prison labour of up to 20 years (section 4) and any person who conspires to commit, attempt, abet, or engage in any conduct in preparation to commit an offence as defined in section 3 shall be sentenced to imprisonment up to ten years involving compulsory prison labour (section 5). The Committee further notes that the Prevention of Terrorism (Proscription of the Tamil Rehabilitation Organization) Regulations No. 2 of 2011 likewise imposes penalties of imprisonment involving compulsory prison labour of up to 20 years for a range of activities linked to the Tamil Rehabilitation Organization including attending meetings and publication of material (sections 3, 4 and 5).

The Committee also notes that the Prevention of Terrorism (Detainees and Remandees) Regulations No. 4 of 2011 provides for measures to continue to detain suspects who had been previously detained under the Emergency Regulations under the Prevention of Terrorism Act (section 2(2)). According to section 3, no person detained shall be released until the expiry of 30 days from 30 August 2011 provided that no detention order is issued pursuant to the Prevention of Terrorism Act or any other Act in force.

The Committee further notes that the Prevention of Terrorism (Surrendees Care and Rehabilitation) Regulations No. 5 of 2011 requires that any person who surrendered for any offence under the Prevention of Terrorism Act, or has surrendered in terms of the emergency regulation previously in force, shall be assigned to a “Protective Accommodation and Rehabilitation Centre” and provided with appropriate vocational, technical or other training. The surrendee may be kept for a period not exceeding ten months, which may be extended for a further 12 months.

The Committee recalls that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour, including compulsory prison labour, as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee points out that the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite to violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. The Committee also recalls that the protection conferred by the Convention is not limited to activities expressing or manifesting opinions diverging from established principles; even if certain activities aim to bring about fundamental changes in state institutions, such activities are covered by the Convention, as long as they do not resort to or call for violent means to these ends. The Committee would also like to point out that, if counter-terrorism legislation responds to the legitimate need to protect the security of the public against the use of violence, it can nevertheless become a means of political coercion and a means of punishing the peaceful exercise of civil rights and liberties, such as the freedom of expression and the right to organize. The Convention protects these rights and liberties against repression by means of sanctions involving compulsory work, and the limits which may be imposed on them by law need to be properly addressed. In this regard, the Committee refers also to the explanations in paragraphs 302–307 of its 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work.

Considering the broad definition of terrorist activities in the Prevention of Terrorism Regulations Nos 1 and 2, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that no sanctions involving compulsory labour can be imposed on those holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all persons condemned with prison sentences under the emergency regulations for expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system are not subject to compulsory prison labour. It further requests the Government to ensure that no sanctions involving compulsory labour can be imposed on surrendees in Protective Accommodation and Rehabilitation Centres for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the measures taken to bring its legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Sudan

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1957)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Abolition of forced labour practices. For many years, the Committee noted the existence of the practices of abduction and forced labour exploitation, which affected thousands of women and children in regions of the country where an armed conflict was under way. The Committee repeatedly pointed out that such situations constituted gross violations of the Convention, since the victims are forced to perform work for which they have not offered themselves voluntarily, under extremely harsh conditions, and combined with ill treatment which may include torture and death.

The Committee also recalled that this case had been discussed on numerous occasions by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards. In its conclusions adopted in June 2010, the Conference Committee noted the Government's efforts to improve the human rights situation in the country and that steps had been taken towards the full implementation of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement of 2005. However, the Conference Committee observed that there was no verifiable evidence that forced labour had been completely eradicated in practice and that there were no up-to-date statistics concerning the activities of the Committee for the Eradication of Abduction of Women and Children (CEAWC) showing the number of cases of identification of victims and reunification with their families. The Committee of Experts subsequently noted the report of the independent expert on the situation of human rights in the Sudan (A/HRC/15/CRP.1) for the period from 1 May to 31 August 2010 indicating that while the Government continued to take steps towards democratic transformation, the general human rights situation in Sudan had deteriorated. The Committee further noted the allegations from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of August 2010 that there continued to be serious problems with forced labour as well as compensation for victims of forced labour. The ITUC indicated that the practice of abduction and forced labour exploitation was still in place affecting thousands of women and children in armed conflict areas.

In this regard, the Committee noted the Government's statement that it was committed to completely eradicating the phenomenon of abductions and to providing continued support to the CEAWC. Moreover, the Government stated that abductions had stopped, and that this fact had been confirmed by the Dinka Chiefs Committee (DCC). However, the Committee noted that this statement was in contradiction with other reliable sources of information, including from United Nations bodies, the representative organizations of workers and non-governmental organizations. Therefore, while noting the Government's renewed commitment to resolving the problem, the Committee urged the Government to redouble its efforts in order to completely eradicate forced labour practices. It expressed the firm hope that the Government would continue to provide detailed information on the liberation and reunification process, supplying updated and reliable statistics supported by CEAWC reports.

The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report of November 2011 that it is fully committed to the implementation of ILO Conventions. The Government states that it has adopted dialogue as the approach to resolving conflicts within the country. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's description of developments relating to the cessation of hostilities in the country, such as the continued implementation of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement of 2005, the referendum and subsequent secession of southern Sudan to create South Sudan, the signing of an agreement in the east of the country which ended the armed conflict in this part of the country and the signing of the Doha Document for Peace in Darfur between the Government and 20 armed movements in the region. With regard to cases of abduction, the Government indicates that psychological and social support, education and training opportunities on skills were provided, and that training programmes were organized for 78 social workers with regard to the tracking of children and family reunion. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that the majority of abduction cases which were recorded in the past occurred among tribes in the regions where there was an armed conflict, including the area which is now South Sudan, or in the regions subject to joint administration. In this regard, the Committee observes the information from various United Nations documents indicating that hostilities and accompanying human rights violations, including abductions, continue in parts of Sudan, particularly in Darfur and in Southern Kordofan.

With regard to Darfur, the Committee notes the information in the report of the Secretary-General on the African Union-United Nations Hybrid Operation in Darfur (UNAMID) of 17 April 2012 that the signatory parties to the Doha Document for Peace in Darfur continued to work towards the implementation of its provisions. However, this report indicates that, between December 2011 and April 2012, clashes between Government and movement forces occurred sporadically, particularly in Northern and Central Darfur (S/2012/231, paragraphs 3 and 18). This report indicates that the human rights situation in Darfur deteriorated during this period, and ten incidents of kidnappings involving local residents were reported (paragraphs 29 and 40). Moreover, this report indicates that UNAMID documented three cases of abductions (paragraph 43). In addition, referring to its comments made under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), the Committee observes that according to the report of the Secretary-General on children and armed conflict of 26 April 2012, the country task forces on monitoring and reporting documented 45 cases of recruitment and use of children for armed conflict in Darfur in 2011, the majority of these incidents taking place in Government-controlled areas (A/66/782, paragraph 109).

With regard to Southern Kordofan, the Committee notes the information in the 13th periodic report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights on the situation of human rights in the Sudan entitled “Preliminary report on violations of international human rights and humanitarian law in Southern Kordofan from 5 to 30 June 2011” that the Human Rights Component of the United Nations Mission to Sudan received several reports of alleged abductions or disappearances of people in the region. This report indicates that while precise figures are unknown, the victims were reportedly suspected supporters and affiliates of the Sudan People’s Liberation Movement/Army (paragraph 30). Moreover, with regard to the Abyei area, the Committee notes that the information from the report of the Secretary-General on the situation in Abyei of 24 March 2012 that the security situation remained tense and highly unpredictable owing to the continued presence of unauthorized armed forces in the area and that significant concern remained regarding the protection of civilians in Abyei (S/2012/358, paragraphs 2 and 23). This report also indicates that there had been no further developments with regard to the operationalization of human rights monitoring in the Abyei area (paragraph 24). Lastly, referring to the application of Convention No. 182, the Committee notes that according to the report of the Secretary-General on children and armed conflict of 26 April 2012, cases of recruitment and use of children in armed conflict significantly increased in Abyei, Blue Nile and Southern Kordofan in 2011, including allegations of abductions of children with the aim of forcefully recruiting them (A/66/782, paragraph 114).

The Committee therefore urges the Government to redouble its efforts in order to ensure the complete eradication of any forced labour practices in the country and, in particular, to ensure the resolution of all cases of abductions in the country and to ensure the victims’ right to be reunified with their families. Furthermore, the Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to guarantee a climate of stability and legal security in which recourse to forced labour cannot be legitimized or go unpunished. In this regard, the Committee reiterates the need for the Government to take urgent measures, in accordance with the recommendations of the relevant international bodies and agencies, to put an end to all human rights violations and impunity, which would help to ensure the full observance of the Convention. Lastly, noting the Government’s request for the technical assistance of the ILO, the Committee hopes that the Government will take all the necessary measures, with the Office’s assistance, in order to ensure full compliance with the Convention, both in law and in practice, and that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

Article 25. Penalties for the exaction of forced or compulsory labour. The Committee previously noted the Criminal Code provisions punishing the offence of abduction with penalties of imprisonment. However, the Committee also noted the Government’s repeated indication in its reports that the CEAWC, which was initially of the view that legal action was the best measure to eradicate the abductions, had been requested by all the tribes concerned, including the DCC, not to resort to legal action, unless the amicable efforts of the tribes were not successful. The Government stated that within the context of the comprehensive peace process, an argument could be made for not pursuing prosecutions against those responsible for abductions and forced labour in the spirit of national reconciliation. Moreover, the Committee noted the Government’s statement to the Conference Committee in June 2010 that bringing perpetrators to justice would have a negative impact on helping people return or settle.

However, the Committee noted that the United Nations Security Council Resolution No. 1881 (2009) emphasized the need to bring to justice the perpetrators of human rights violations and urged the Government of Sudan to comply with its obligations in this respect. The Committee also noted that the report of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Sudan (A/HRC/11/14, June 2009) reiterated the recommendation that all allegations of violations of human rights and international humanitarian law be duly investigated and that perpetrators be promptly brought to justice (paragraph 92(d)). Moreover, the Committee subsequently took note of the report of the independent expert on the situation of human rights in Sudan (A/HRC/15/CRP.1) for the period from 1 May to 31 August 2010 which recommended that the Government “ensure that all allegations of violations of human rights and international humanitarian law are duly investigated and that the perpetrators are brought to justice promptly, in particular those with command responsibilities”. The Committee further noted that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, in June 2010, noted with concern that there was a lack of accountability of perpetrators and strongly urged the Government to pursue its efforts, including through the CEAWC, to ensure the full application of the Convention, both in law and in practice. In addition, the Committee noted the allegations of the ITUC that the Government continued to refuse to punish forced labour offenders, insisting that such cases would be settled through the traditional community chief mediation process. In this regard, the ITUC indicated that there was no documented evidence of such an informal community mediation process having yielded positive results. The ITUC considered that the Government should strengthen the work of the CEAWC in terms of prosecution of perpetrators of abduction and forced labour, as a number of perpetrators remained unwilling to cooperate.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement in its most recent report that in 2010 the Advisory Council for Human Rights was entrusted to follow-up on the issue of women and children’s abduction, and that this was carried out by the CEAWC. The Government states that the cases of abduction which occurred outside of the region that is now South Sudan or the jointly administered territories were resolved through direct contacts through a joint committee made up of the Government and UNICEF. The Government also indicates that, at present, gathering statistics on this topic is not possible.

The Committee notes with regret the lack of up-to-date information on any investigations and prosecutions related to abductions and forced labour in the country or on the activities of the CEAWC. However, with regard to the situation in Darfur, the Committee notes that, according to the information in the report of the Secretary-General on UNAMID of 17 April 2012, the Sudanese Minister of Justice issued a decree in January 2012 to appoint the Prosecutor for the Special Court for Darfur, with jurisdiction over gross violations of human rights and serious violations of international humanitarian laws since 2003 (S/2012/231, paragraph 83). The Committee also notes that the 13th periodic report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights on the situation of human rights in the Sudan entitled “Preliminary report on violations of international human rights and humanitarian law in Southern Kordofan” of August 2011 recommends that an independent, thorough and objective inquiry be conducted into alleged violations of international human rights and humanitarian law that occurred during the hostilities of Southern Kordofan, with a view to holding perpetrators accountable. This report recommends that immunities for members of the military and security forces be lifted to allow for prosecutions in compliance with due process and fair trial standards (page 12).

The Committee once again recalls in this connection that, under Article 25 of the Convention, “the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable as a penal offence, and it shall be an obligation on any Member ratifying this Convention to ensure that the penalties imposed by law are really adequate and are strictly enforced”. The Committee therefore considers that the failure to apply penal sanctions in respect of perpetrators is contrary to this provision of the Convention and may have the effect of creating an environment of impunity for abductors who exploit forced labour. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that legal proceedings are instituted against perpetrators of abductions and that penal sanctions be imposed on persons convicted of having exacted forced labour, as required by the Convention. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on measures taken through the CEAWC and the Special Court for Darfur regarding abductions related to the exaction of forced labour. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that information is made available on the application in practice of the penal provision punishing the offence of abduction, as well as the provisions punishing kidnapping and the exaction of forced labour (sections 161, 162 and 163 of the Criminal Code), including the number of investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1970)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Punishment for expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee previously noted that penalties of imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform prison labour) could be imposed under sections 50, 66 and 69 of the Criminal Act (committing an act with the intention of destabilizing the constitutional system, publication of false news with the intention of harming the prestige of the State and committing an act intended to disturb public peace and tranquillity). The Committee also noted the Government’s indication that the Sudanese Parliament was engaged in revising the whole body of the Sudanese legislation in order to bring it into conformity with the Comprehensive Peace Agreement and the Interim National Constitution of 2005. However, the Committee noted that the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Sudan noted that one of the amendments to the 1991 Criminal Procedures Act, adopted on 20 May 2009, gives powers to state governors or commissioners to issue orders prohibiting or restricting the organization of public meetings. The Special Rapporteur recommended that the Government ensure that human rights defenders, humanitarian workers, parliamentarians, members of political opposition, journalists and other civil society members were not arbitrarily detained or ill-treated by State agents on account of their work, opinions or peaceful assembly (A/HRC/11/14, June 2009). In this regard, the Committee recalled the importance for the effective respect of the Convention of legal guarantees regarding freedom of assembly, expression, demonstration and association and expressed the hope that, as a result of the legislative reform, the national criminal and labour legislation would be brought into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that, at present, a permanent Constitution is being formulated, by virtue of which the national legislation shall be reviewed. The Committee also notes the Government’s statement in its report to the Human Rights Council for the Universal Periodic Review of 11 March 2011 that the Press and Publications Act was adopted in 2009 to regulate freedom of expression through the press and guarantee broad freedom of expression and access to information (A/HRC/WG.6/11/SDN/1, paragraph 40). However, the Committee notes that, according to the information in the compilation prepared by the Office of the High Commissioner of Human Rights for the Human Rights Council’s Universal Periodic Review, the United Nations Mission in Sudan (UNMIS) noted that the realization of the right to freedom of expression, association and assembly had been consistently frustrated through the application of the 2010 National Security Act, the 2009 Press and Publication Act and the 1991 Criminal Procedure Act. The Committee also notes the information in the UN Country Team Country Analysis of February 2012 that the Criminal Act of 1991 was amended in 2009, but observes that these amendments did not amend or repeal sections 50, 66 and 69 of the Criminal Act. Lastly, the Committee notes the information in the 13th periodic report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights on the situation of human rights in the Sudan entitled “Preliminary report on violations of international human rights and humanitarian law in Southern Kordofan from 5 to 30 June 2011” that in July 2011, 16 civilians were arrested outside of the UNMIS headquarters in Khartoum while attempting to deliver a petition to the UNMIS Special Representative of the Secretary-General and were subsequently charged with disturbance of public peace under section 69 of the Criminal Act of 1991 (paragraph 42).

In this regard, the Committee recalls that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits all recourse to forced or compulsory labour, including compulsory prison labour, as a means of political coercion or as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. It also points out that the protection conferred by the Convention is not limited to activities expressing or manifesting opinions diverging from established principles; even if certain activities aim to bring about fundamental changes in state institutions, such activities are covered by the Convention, as long as they do not resort to or call for violent means to these ends. Therefore, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that sections 50, 66 and 69 of the Criminal Act are repealed or amended so that no prison sentence entailing compulsory labour can be imposed on persons who, without using or advocating violence, express certain political views or opposition to the established political, social or economic system. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard, including through the review of national legislation following the adoption of a permanent Constitution. Pending the adoption of such amendments, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application of sections 50, 66 and 69 of the Criminal Act in practice. Lastly, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide copies of the amendments to the Criminal Procedures Act of 1991 of 20 May 2009.

Article 1(d). Punishment for having participated in strikes. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to sections 112, 119 and 120 of the 1997 Labour Code, which specify that labour disputes which cannot be settled amicably within three weeks will be automatically referred to an arbitration body whose decision will be final and without appeal. Section 126(2) of the Labour Code provides for a punishment of imprisonment (which involves compulsory prison labour) for a period of up to six months in cases of violation or refusal to apply the provisions of the Labour Code. While noting the Government's indication that these provisions of the Labour Code are aimed at the observance of arbitration body decisions, the Committee observed that such provisions could also be applied to workers in a manner which exposes them to sanctions involving compulsory labour. Nonetheless, the Committee also noted the Government's indication that a new draft Labour Code had been finalized and prepared for submission to the competent authorities for adoption.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the new Labour Code has yet to be adopted. In this regard, the Committee must once again recall that Article 1(d) of the Convention prohibits the use of any form of forced or compulsory labour, as a punishment for having participated in strikes. The Committee refers in this connection to the explanations contained in paragraph 315 of its 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work, in which it has considered that, regardless of the legality of the strike action, both in legislation and in practice, no sanctions involving compulsory labour should be imposed for the mere fact of organizing or peacefully participating in strikes. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the draft Labour Code does not contain provisions providing for imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) as a punishment for the peaceful participation in strikes. It expresses the hope that the new Labour Code will be adopted in the near future, and requests the Government to provide a copy, once adopted.

Compulsory prison labour. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's statement that an Act concerning the regulation of prisons and the treatment of prisoners was adopted in 2010. The Government indicates that section 25 of this Act of 2010 specifies that any convicted prisoner shall be required to work in productive work. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the 2010 Act concerning the regulation of prisons and the treatment of prisoners, with its next report.

Syrian Arab Republic

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1958)

Article 1(a), (c) and (d) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views, for breaches of labour discipline and for participation in strikes. Over a number of years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Economic Penal Code, the Penal Code, the Agricultural Labour Code and the Press Act, under which prison sentences involving compulsory labour can be imposed as a means of political coercion or as a punishment for expressing views opposed to the established political system, and as a punishment for breaches of labour discipline and for the participation in strikes. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that it is endeavouring to resolve the problems identified in the Committee's comments by way of the adoption of the new Penal Code, which was going through various legal channels and phases of adoption.

The Committee previously noted, in this regard, the statement of the President of the UN Security Council of 3 August 2011 (6598th Meeting), in which the Security Council expressed its grave concern at the deteriorating situation in the Syrian Arab Republic, condemned the widespread violations of human rights and the use of force against peaceful protesters, and stressed that the only solution to the crisis was through a political process that addressed the legitimate concerns of the population and allowed the exercise of the freedoms of expression and assembly.

The Committee notes that, more recently, the UN Human Rights Council called on the Government to put an end to all attacks against journalists, fully respect freedom of expression in line with international obligations, allow independent and international media to operate in the Syrian Arab Republic without restrictions, harassment, intimidation or risk to life, and ensure adequate protection for journalists (A/HRC/19/L.38/Rev.1, 22 March 2012).

In the light of the above, the Committee once again expresses its deep concern regarding the current human rights situation in the country and recalls that restrictions on fundamental rights and liberties may have a bearing on the application of the Convention, if such measures are enforced by sanctions involving compulsory labour.

The Committee recalls once again that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system, and that sanctions involving compulsory labour are not in conformity with the Convention if they enforce a prohibition of the peaceful expression of views that are critical of government policy and the established political system, whether the prohibition is imposed by law or by an administrative decision (see General Survey on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work, 2012, paragraphs 302–304 and 313–315).

The Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure that persons who express views or an opposition to the established political, social or economic system, benefit from the protection accorded by the Convention and that in any case penal sanctions involving compulsory labour cannot be imposed on them. In this connection, the Committee expresses the firm hope that, a new Penal Code will be adopted in the near future and that persons convicted for activities coming under the purview of the Convention, and, in particular, persons convicted under the provisions of the Economic Penal Code, the Penal Code, the Agricultural Labour Code and the Press Act will not be sentenced to imprisonment involving an obligation to work.

United Republic of Tanzania

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1962)

Articles 1(1), and 2(1) of the Convention. 1. Imposition of compulsory labour for purposes of economic development. For many years, the Committee has been commenting on serious discrepancies between national law and practice and the provisions of the Convention. The Committee has referred in this connection to the following legislative provisions:

- article 25(1) of the Constitution, which provides that every person has the duty to participate in lawful and productive work and to strive to attain the individual and group production targets required or set by law; article 25(3)(d), of the Constitution, which provides that no work shall be considered as forced labour if such work forms part of (i) compulsory national service in accordance with the law, or (ii) the national endeavour at the mobilization of human resources for the enhancement of the society and the national economy and to ensure development and national productivity;
- the Local Government (District Authorities) Act, 1982, the Penal Code, the Resettlement of Offenders Act, 1969, the Ward Development Committees Act, 1969, and the Local Government Finances Act, 1982, under which compulsory labour may be imposed, inter alia, by the administrative authority for purposes of economic development; and
- several by-laws adopted between 1988 and 1992 under section 148 of the Local Government (District Authorities) Act, 1982, entitled “self-help and community development”, “nation-building” and “enforcement of human resources deployment”, which provide for an obligation to work.

In this regard, the Committee expressed its concern at the institutionalized and systematic compulsion to work established in law at all levels, in the National Constitution, Acts of Parliament and District by-laws, in contradiction with the Convention. However, the Committee also noted the adoption of the Employment and Labour Relations Act, 2004, which introduced a provision prohibiting the exaction of forced labour, pursuant to section 6(1). Moreover, the Government indicated that the Law Reform Commission was carrying out legal research on laws that required amendment or repeal to reflect the current economic, social and political arrangements, including laws which were not in conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that it hopes to take measures to bring the provisions of the relevant legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Government indicates that it would like to avail itself of technical assistance in developing public-awareness strategies for both authorities involved in the administration of these laws and the legislative bodies. Recalling that the Committee has been raising this issue for more than two decades, the Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to repeal or amend the abovementioned provisions which permit compulsory labour to be imposed by an administrative authority or which provide for an obligation to work for the purposes of “self-help and community development”, “nation-building” and “enforcement of human resources deployment”. It requests the Government to provide information on progress made in this regard. Moreover, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which these provisions are applied in practice, in its next report.

2. Freedom of career military personnel to leave the service. The Committee previously noted that pursuant to section 35 of the National Defence Act, 1966, officers or other members of career military personnel may be released at any time for such reasons and on such conditions as may be prescribed by Defence Forces Regulations. In this regard, the Government indicated that the reasons and conditions for resignation from active service, as provided for in the Regulations, were: retirement age; sickness; service completed; and release of a female service person on marriage. The Committee therefore observed that section 35 did not appear to allow career military servicemen to resign at their own request, other than for one of the specific reasons listed. However, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the National Defence Act, 1966, as well as the Defence Forces Regulations, had been listed among the identified laws to be addressed by the Task Force on the Labour Law Reform, with a view to making appropriate recommendations to the Government.

The Committee once again recalls that career military personnel who have voluntarily entered into an engagement should have the right to leave the service in peacetime within a reasonable period, either at specified intervals, or with previous notice. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged, including in the context of the ongoing Labour Law Reform, to ensure that career members of the armed forces enjoy fully the right to leave their service in peacetime at their own request, within a reasonable period, either at specified intervals, or with previous notice. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of section 35 of the National Defence Act, 1966, and its relevant regulations, including in particular, the number of resignations accepted, or refused, over a specified period, as well as the reasons for refusal. The Committee also requests the Government to provide a copy of the Defence Forces Regulations, with its next report.

3. Imposition of labour for public purposes. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to by-laws issued by local government authorities in 1984 and 1986 under sections 13 and 15 of the Local Government Finances Act, 1982, which imposed "development levies" on every resident under the menace of penal sanctions of fines or imprisonment. The Committee requested the Government to take measures to ensure that jobless persons unable to pay are not obliged, through the imposition of a cash levy, to engage in compulsory public works. In this regard, the Government indicated that the "development levies" which were imposed under these provisions had been waived out, and that the Local Government Finances Act, 1982 had been listed among the identified laws to be addressed by the Task Force on the Labour Law Reform, with a view to making appropriate recommendations to the Government.

The Committee takes due note of the Government's statement that the authorities took the decision to abolish development levies which were being implemented under the Local Governance Finance Act. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that several pieces of legislation have been repealed through the first phase of the Labour Law Reform, and that the Local Governance Finance Act remains on the list of laws to be addressed by the Task Force. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures, within the framework of the Task Force on Labour Law Reform, to bring the Local Governance Finance Act into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard in its next report.

To address these issues, the Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to avail itself of ILO technical assistance to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Thailand

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. Prevention and protection measures, law enforcement. The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the new Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act B.E. 2551 (2008), which repeals the Measures in Prevention and Suppression of Trafficking in Women and Children Act B.E. 2540 (1997) and provides for a broad definition of "exploitation" to cover sexual exploitation, production and distribution of pornography, other forms of sexual exploitation, slavery, forced begging, forced labour, or other similar forms of exploitation. The Committee notes, in particular, the information on the mechanisms and special procedures developed by the Government, under the new Act, to ensure the effective prevention of human trafficking as well as protection of victims noting, in particular, the establishment of the Operational Guidelines on the Prevention and Suppression of Trafficking for Labour Purposes, and Assistance and Protection for Trafficked Persons. The Committee further notes that under the new Act, victims may claim compensation from the offenders for the damages caused by human trafficking.

The Committee also noted the statistics provided by the Government on the number of cases related to human trafficking during the period of June 2009 and June 2010, as well as the information on the activities of the Anti-Human Trafficking Division (AHTD), which has been established within the Royal Thai police and is, since 2009, the main body responsible for the prevention and investigation of human trafficking crimes. Finally, the Committee notes the information on the activities of the Centre against International Trafficking under the Office of the Attorney-General. The Committee considered that the detailed information provided by the Government in 2011 demonstrated the significant efforts it has made in the fight against trafficking.

The Committee once again asks the Government to continue to provide information, in particular on the application in practice of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act B.E. 2551 (2008), providing copies of further court decisions concerning trafficking and forced labour cases, as well as information on any difficulties encountered by the competent authorities in identifying victims and in initiating legal proceedings.

Trafficking in persons for the purpose of exploitation. Migrant workers. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted the observations on the application of the Convention by Thailand, made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) – now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). In its communication dated 31 August 2006, the ICFTU expressed its concern about the persistence of trafficking in persons from and into Thailand and referred to a report published by the UN Office on Drugs and Crime (April 2006), in which Thailand had been listed in the group of countries which had a very high level of trafficking, as a country of destination, origin and transit. According to the report, Cambodian and Lao women and girls were trafficked into Thailand for factory and domestic work and the sex trade; Burmese, Cambodian and Lao men were trafficked into Thailand for forced labour in such sectors as construction, agriculture and in particular the fishing industry.

In its reply to the observations submitted by the ICFTU, the Government indicated that the new Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act B.E. 2551 (2008) addresses both female, child and male victims equally, providing for heavier penalties on offenders involved in human trafficking, as well as victim protection and a fund to be established to support the prevention and suppression of human trafficking. As regards bonded and forced labour in particular, the Government indicated that, together with the new Act, provisions of the Labour Protection Act (B.E. 2541) concerning overtime work and minimum wages (such as sections 70, 90, 24, 25 and 144) can also serve as tools to prevent bonded and forced labour.

The Government further indicated that, as regards trafficking and forced labour, its practices on labour inspection and labour protection include coordination with relevant government agencies, NGOs, international organizations and Thai embassies overseas to ensure victims' protection, recovery and reintegration to prevent them from being re-trafficked. Finally, it informed that repatriation programmes have been arranged with Cambodia, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Myanmar and the Yunnan Province of China in order to develop effective and safe repatriation procedures.

As regards statistics and documentation on the problems of trafficking and exploitation for forced labour of workers from Myanmar on board Thai vessels and in Thai ports, the Government informed that during the fiscal year 2005–6, 15 complaints concerning workers on board Thai fishing vessels were submitted to the Department of Labour Protection and Welfare (DLPW), two of which were categorized as forced labour cases.

The Committee noted the addendum to the report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the human rights of migrants, presented at the 17th Session of the UN Human Rights Council on 17 May 2011 (A/HRC/17/33/Add.1), which contains communications to and from governments. In the communications addressed to the Government of Thailand, the Special Rapporteur expressed its concern regarding violations of the human rights of migrants in the country, in particular as regards the negative impact of the National Verification (NV) registration process for migrant workers. The Committee noted that, according to the report, approximately 300,000 migrant workers who failed to enter the NV process by the extended deadline of 31 March 2010 and an estimated 1 million unregistered migrant workers who were ineligible for the NV process are deemed as migrants with irregular status and particularly vulnerable to arbitrary arrest, violence and exploitation. According to the report, unregistered migrant workers may be asked to pay bribes ranging from 200 to 8,000 baht (THB) or more to the police in exchange for their freedom, either when stopped by the police or when in police custody.

The Committee further noted the information in the report concerning the Prime Minister's order of 2 June 2010, issued to set up a Special Centre to Suppress, Arrest and Prosecute Alien Workers Who Are Working Underground (No. 125/1223), according to which the Centre is mandated to suppress, arrest and prosecute alien workers who illegally enter the country. The Special Rapporteur expressed particular concern about the pattern of arbitrary arrest, violence and exploitation of migrants, which was exacerbated by the mentioned order and notes that an increasing number of cases of systematic abuse of official powers have been reported, "including the 'sale' of irregular migrants to various brokers who then transfer the migrants back to their worksites for fees or who 'resell' or traffic the individuals to various employers in the fishing and domestic industries". Finally, the Special Rapporteur expressed concern about information received suggesting that arrested migrant workers from Myanmar were deported to their country of origin by boat through informal checkpoints controlled by the Democratic Karen Buddhist Army (DKBA) and that the DKBA demanded fees from the deportees in exchange for their freedom. According to the report, migrants who cannot afford the fees imposed are subject to beating and forced labour.

Corroborating the communications of the UN Special Rapporteur, the Committee noted the report of the International Organization for Migration (IOM) on Trafficking of Fishermen in Thailand (14 January 2011), which refers to violations on the human rights of migrant workers in Thailand, in particular in the fishing sector. In its report the IOM expressed concern about the conditions under which migrant workers are hired to work in the Thai fishing industry, with labour recruitment processes that remain largely informal, mostly on the basis of verbal agreements, often leading to abuse and fostering human trafficking. In addition, the IOM drew attention to the fact that many fishermen are "sold" to fishing boat owners by brokers, having to work for long periods without receiving any wages in order to repay their debts. The IOM further noted that, despite the degrading working conditions, fishermen often have no alternative but being subject to them, since fishing boats tend to be offshore for long periods of time, preventing workers to leave or escape. According to the report, migrant fishermen, who are usually undocumented and unregistered, are often held on boats indefinitely, working and being forcibly transferred between fishing boats in case one boat needs to return to shore, under threats of being reported to immigration authorities.

While noting this information, and considering the seriousness of the facts abovementioned, the Committee recalled that, despite the Government's efforts in preventing, combating and suppressing trafficking in persons, the uncertainty surrounding the legal status of migrant workers, in particular those employed in the fishing sector, put them in an extremely vulnerable situation. Such vulnerability could lead to abuse and practices likely to undermine the protection provided by the Convention. Moreover, the itinerant nature of this type of work and the long periods of time spent away from shore hampers the identification of migrant fishermen victims of trafficking and working under forced labour conditions.

The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take effective measures to protect migrant workers, particularly those in the fishing industry, with a view to the complete elimination of the exaction of forced labour from this category of workers. It also once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to further strengthen its law enforcement mechanisms, including measures to enforce anti-trafficking laws against those who target migrant fishermen and that such measures address the problems identified in the abovementioned reports. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide, in its next report, detailed information about the progress of such measures, including not only numbers of prosecutions and convictions, but the specific criminal penalties which have actually been imposed on employers of migrant fishermen convicted under the new Anti-Trafficking Act. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the above Prime Minister's order of 2 June 2010, issued to set up a Special Centre to Suppress, Arrest and Prosecute Alien Workers Who Are Working Underground (No. 125/1223). In this connection and bearing in mind the seriousness of the situation, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to prevent the exploitation of migrant workers and to ensure protection of their rights, regardless of their legal status.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1969)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views. Criminal Code and the Computer Crimes Act. The Committee notes that section 112 of the Criminal Code states that whoever defames, insults or threatens the King, the Queen, the Heir-apparent or the Regent, shall be punished with imprisonment of three to 15 years. The Committee also notes that sections 14 and 15 of the Computer Crimes Act of 2007 prohibit the use of a computer to commit an offence under the provisions of the Criminal Code concerning national security (including section 112 of the Criminal Code), with a possible sanction of five years imprisonment. Moreover, the Committee notes that, according to the Report of the Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of the right to freedom of opinion and expression, of 4 June 2012, there has been a recent increase in lèse majesté cases pursued by the police and the courts. In this regard, the Special Rapporteur urged the Government to hold broad-based public consultations to amend its criminal laws on lèse majesté, particularly section 112 of the Criminal Code and the Computer Crimes Act (A/HRC/20/17 paragraph 20). The Committee further notes the information in a compilation prepared by the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights for the Human Rights Council's Universal Periodic Review that the UN Country Team in Thailand indicated that a number of individuals have received lengthy prison sentences for breaching the lèse majesté laws.

In this regard, the Committee recalls that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour, including compulsory prison labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or of opposition to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal or amend section 112 of the Criminal Code and sections 14 and 15 of the Computer Crimes Act, so that persons who peacefully express certain political views cannot be sentenced to a term of imprisonment which involves compulsory labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on measures taken in this regard, in its next report.

Article 1(c). Sanctions involving compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline. The Committee previously noted that pursuant to sections 131–133 of the Labour Relations Act BE 2518 (1975), penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed on any employee who violates or fails to comply with an agreement on terms of employment or a decision on a labour dispute under sections 18, 22–24, 29 and 35(4) of the Act. It observed that such provisions were contrary to the provisions of the Convention, as it provided for sanctions involving compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline. However, the Committee noted the Government's statement that the Ministry of Labour was trying to take measures to bring the Labour Relations Act into closer conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that there has been significant progress concerning the revision of the Labour Relations Act. The Government indicates that the Committee on the Revision of Labour Relations Laws has considered a draft revised version of the Act, which proposes repealing sections 131–133, in order to achieve compliance with the Convention. The Government further indicates that this draft version has been submitted to the Council of State for further consideration. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the draft revision of the Labour Relations Act, repealing sections 131–133, is adopted in the near future, to ensure that sanctions of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) cannot be imposed as a means of labour discipline. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on progress made in this regard, in its next report.

Article 1(d). Sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for having participated in strikes. The Committee previously noted that pursuant to provisions of the Labour Relations Act penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed for participation in strikes, if: (i) the minister orders the strikers to return to work, being of the opinion that the strike may affect the national economy or cause hardship to the public or endanger national security or be contrary to public order (pursuant to section 140 read in conjunction with section 35(2)); and (ii) the matter is awaiting the decision of the Labour Relations Committee or a decision has been given by the minister under section 23(1), (2), (6) or (8) or by the Labour Relations Committee under section 24 (pursuant to section 139 read in conjunction with section 34(5)). The Committee also noted that the State Enterprise Labour Relations Act BE 2543 (2000) (SELRA) prohibits strikes in state enterprises (section 33), and that violation of this prohibition is punishable with imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) for a term of up to one year. This penalty is doubled in the case of a person who instigates this offence (section 77). However, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the Committee on the Revision of Labour Relations Laws was going to examine the feasibility of revising the SELRA to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Committee on the Revision of Labour Relations Law has considered a revision of both the Labour Relations Act and the SELRA, with a view to bringing them into conformity with the Convention. The Government states that there has been progress with regard to repealing sections 139 and 140 of the Labour Relations Act, as well as repealing sections 33 and 77 of the SELRA. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that the draft revision of both Acts has been submitted to the Council of State for further consideration. The Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that draft revisions of both the Labour Relations Act (repealing sections 139 and 140) and the SELRA (repealing sections 33 and 77) are adopted in the near future to ensure that no sanctions involving compulsory labour can be imposed for peaceful participation in a strike. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on progress made in this regard, and a copy of the amended Acts, once adopted.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Turkey

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee notes the comments made by the Turkish Confederation of Employers' Associations (TİSK) dated 8 November 2011, as well as the Government's report.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. 1. Law enforcement measures. The Committee previously requested information concerning the application in practice of sections 80 (prohibiting trafficking in persons for the purpose of both forced labour and prostitution), 117(2) (prohibiting the employment of homeless, helpless or dependent persons without payment or for substandard wages or forcibly subjecting them to inhumane working and living conditions), and 227(3) (prohibiting sending a person in or out of the country for the purpose of prostitution) of the Penal Code.

The Committee notes the information in a report from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) entitled "Internationally Recognized Core Labour Standards in Turkey: Report for the WTO General Council Review of the Trade Policies of Turkey" of 21 and 23 February 2012 that trafficking in persons occurs in the country, with most of the trafficking cases relating to prostitution of women from Eastern Europe and forced labour of persons from Central Asia. This ITUC report indicates that the authorities have prosecuted several hundred individuals for trafficking in recent years. However, this report states that while authorities have prosecuted police officers for collaborating with traffickers before, uncorroborated reports indicate that complicity in trafficking remains a problem.

The Committee notes the detailed information in the Government's report concerning the application in practice of the Penal Code. Concerning section 227(3) of the Penal Code, the Government indicates that 37 persons were convicted of this offence, and 21 persons acquitted in 2009, while 65 persons were convicted and 32 persons were acquitted in 2010. Concerning the application of section 117(2), nine persons were convicted of this offence, and five persons acquitted in 2009, while three persons were convicted and ten persons were acquitted in 2010. With regard to the application of section 80 of the Penal Code, the Government indicates that there were 256 cases brought in 2009, involving 1,314 defendants, and 282 such cases brought in 2010, involving 1,827 defendants. The Committee also notes the information in the Government's report submitted under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) that 12 law enforcement officers suspected to be involved in cases of trafficking were identified in 2009, and eight in 2010. The Government further indicates that through a project entitled "Supporting Turkey's struggle against Human Trafficking and Trafficking Victims Access to Justice", carried out in coordination with the International Organization for Migration (IOM) in 2009, 135 officials attended courses on combating trafficking in persons. The Government further indicates that a seminar was held in 2011 on combating trafficking in persons, in cooperation with the UN High Commissioner of Refugees and the IOM, with the participation of more than 130 inspectors of the Board of Inspection. The Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to prevent, suppress and combat trafficking in persons, and to continue to provide information on the measures taken. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application in practice of sections 80, 117(2) and 227(3) of the Penal Code, particularly the number of investigations, prosecutions, convictions and the specific penalties applied. Lastly, it requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that governmental officials complicit with human traffickers are prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive criminal penalties are imposed in practice.

2. Protection and assistance for victims of trafficking in persons. The Committee notes the statement in the abovementioned ITUC report that law enforcement officials make insufficient use of trafficking victim identification procedures and that many such victims are detained and deported. This report states that the Government does not operate any victim shelters and does not provide adequate resources to NGO centres that offer assistance and services.

The Committee also notes the statement by the TİSK that a Memorandum of the General Directorate for Social Assistance and Solidarity (in the Office of the Prime Minister) of 20 May 2009 makes provisions enabling victims of human trafficking to benefit from free health services. The TİSK indicates that in 2010, 37 victims of trafficking received assistance. The TİSK also indicates that the General Directorate for Social Assistance and Solidarity signed an agreement to provide funding to civil society organizations for shelters for victims of trafficking in persons in both Ankara and Istanbul. The TİSK further indicates that coordination between various institutions for the identification of victims of trafficking occurs within the framework of the National Referral Mechanism, and that a telephone hotline for victims of trafficking has been established. In addition, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, within a project entitled "Consolidating Capacity of Local Administration and Law Enforcement to Identify Victims of Human Trafficking" organized in collaboration with the IOM, 28 persons were trained. Through this project, a "human trafficking victim identification form” was prepared by the General Directorate of Security and 6,000 copies were distributed to provincial police commands, particularly in areas where trafficking occurs.

Lastly, the Committee notes the information from the UN country team in Turkey, in a report compiled by the Office of the High Commissioner of Human Rights for the Universal Periodic Review of 19 February 2010, that access to justice for victims of trafficking in persons remained limited and that redress and compensation mechanisms are not yet supported by the provision of sustainable public funding (A/HRC/WG.6/8/TUR/2, paragraph 42). The Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to strengthen mechanisms for the identification of victims of trafficking in persons. It also requests the Government to intensify its efforts to provide protection and assistance (including medical, psychological and legal assistance), to victims of trafficking, and to provide information on the number of persons benefiting from these services. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that victims are able to assert their rights.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes the observations made by the Confederation of Turkish Trade Unions (TÜRK-IS) dated 10 November 2011 and by the Turkish Confederation of Employers’ Associations (TISK) dated 8 November 2011, as well as the Government’s report.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Political coercion and punishment for holding or expressing views opposed to the established system. 1. The Penal Code. The Committee previously noted that penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour, under section 198 of the Regulations pertaining to the administration of penitentiaries and to the execution of sentences, adopted by the decision of the Council of Ministers of 5 July 1967, No. 6/8517, as amended) may be imposed under section 301 of the Penal Code. Section 301(1) and (2) of the Penal Code (as amended by Law No. 5759 of 30 April 2008) penalizes denigrating the Turkish Nation, the State of the Republic of Turkey, the Grand National Assembly of Turkey, the Government of the Republic of Turkey as well as the judicial bodies, the military and the security structures of the State with imprisonment of a term of between six months and two years. The Committee noted that section 301(3), as amended, stated that the expression of ideas in the form of criticism shall not be punished. The Committee requested information on the application of section 301 of the Penal Code in practice.

The Committee notes that section 301(4) of the Penal Code, as amended, specifies that prosecution under this section shall be subject to the approval of the Minister of Justice. In this regard, the Committee notes the information in the Government’s report that between May 2008 and March 2011, a total of 1,570 files were received by the Ministry of Justice from the Office of the Chief Public Prosecutor pursuant to section 301 of the Penal Code. Approval was given to investigate only 5.8 per cent of the files submitted; 1,382 files were not approved for investigation, and permission was granted to investigate 88 files. Of these files, 30 pertained to actions committed through the press, while 58 related to offences of “flagrant contempt”. Of these 88 files investigated, 49 files (involving 62 suspects) have been concluded, and a total of 34 persons were convicted pursuant to section 301, and 28 persons were sentenced to imprisonment. The Government states that the number of investigations permitted by the Minister of Justice pursuant to section 301 has declined significantly, and that this provision is not being used systematically for restricting freedom of expression, including freedom of the press.

The Committee notes the statement of the TISK that the amendment of section 301, to require the permission of the Minister of Justice for investigations, resulted in a fall in the number of cases under this section. In the first seven months of 2010, only 3.57 per cent of the files submitted were allowed an investigation. The Committee also notes the statement of the UN country team in a report prepared by the High Commissioner of Human Rights for the Universal Periodic Review of 19 February 2010, that section 301 of the Criminal Code is no longer used systematically to restrict freedom of expression, and that the amendment to this section led to a significant decline in prosecutions in comparison with previous years (A/HRC/WG.6/8/TUR/2 paragraph 46). Taking due note of the information provided by the Government, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application of section 301 of the Penal Code in practice, including the number and nature of offences, particularly relating to the cases where sentences of imprisonment have been imposed.

2. Act on the Fight against Terrorism. The Committee previously noted that section 8 of the Act on the Fight against Terrorism (No. 3713 of 1991) prohibited propaganda against the indivisibility of the State. However, it also noted that this legislation had been amended in 2006, and requested information on these amendments.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that Act No. 3713 was amended in 2006 by Act No. 5532. It notes that, pursuant to these amendments, section 8 of Act No. 3713 was replaced, and this section now relates to the financing of terrorism. However, the Committee also notes that section 6(2) of Act No. 3713, as amended, provides that printing or publishing declarations or leaflets emanating from terrorist organizations is punishable by a term of imprisonment from one to three years (previously a monetary fine). If such an offence is committed via print media, section 6(4) provides for imprisonment of the owners (ranging from 1,000 to 10,000 days) and editors (up to 5,000 days) of press or other media, even if they have not personally participated in the commission of this offence. Moreover, section 7(2) of Act No. 3713 provides for a term of imprisonment from one to five years for propaganda in favour of a terrorist organization. This penalty is increased by half if committed through the press, and the owner and editor of the periodical are liable for imprisonment of between 1,000 days to 10,000 days.

In this connection, the Committee recalls that limitations may be imposed by law on individual rights and freedoms in order to ensure respect of the rights and freedoms of others and to meet the requirements of public order and the general welfare in a democratic society, and the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite to violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. However, the Committee wishes to emphasize that if such restrictions are formulated in such wide and general terms that they may lead to penalties involving compulsory labour as punishment for the peaceful expression of views or of opposition to the established political, social or economic system, such penalties are not in conformity with the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that no prison sentence entailing compulsory labour can be imposed under Act No. 3713 on persons who, without using or advocating violence, express certain political views or opposition to the established political, social or economic system. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the application in practice of sections 6(2), 6(4) and 7(2) of Act No. 3713, as amended, including information concerning prosecutions, convictions and the specific penalties applied.

3. Political Parties Act. The Committee previously noted that penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) can be imposed under sections 80–82, read in conjunction with section 117, of the Political Parties Act (No. 2820 of 1983), which prohibits political parties from seeking to alter the principle of the unity of the State, asserting the existence of minorities based on a national or religious culture or on racial or linguistic differences, seeking to form minorities by protecting and promoting languages and cultures other than the Turkish language and culture, using any language other than Turkish in the drafting and publication of parties' statutes and programmes, or advocating regionalism. The Committee subsequently noted the Government's indication that changes were to be made in the Political Parties Act, in accordance with the Emergency Action Plan published on 3 January 2003, with a view to ensuring that the whole population would be able to participate in political parties and to make possible the establishment of equity and justice in political representation.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that section 83 of the Political Parties Act prohibits political parties from promoting regionalism or racism in the country. The Committee also notes the Government's reference to several provisions of the Penal Code, including section 122 of the Penal Code which prohibits discrimination against persons in commercial activities, public services and economic activity. The Committee observes that these provisions do not directly relate to the application of the Political Parties Act. Referring to paragraph 307 of its General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work, the Committee recalls that the prohibition of political views as a consequence of the prohibition of political parties or associations (subject to penalties involving compulsory labour) are not in conformity with the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal or amend sections 80–82 of the Political Parties Act to ensure that penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) cannot be imposed for having expressed political views as a consequence of the prohibition of political parties or associations. Pending the adoption of such an amendment, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application of these provisions in practice.

Article 1(b). Use of conscripts for purposes of economic development. The Committee previously noted that section 10 of the Military Service Act, No. 1111, as amended by Act No. 3358, as well as section 5 of Council of Ministers Resolution No. 87/11945 of 12 July 1987, adopted pursuant to section 10 of Act No. 1111, lay down procedures relating to the surplus reserves, including procedures concerning persons liable to perform military service who are assigned duties in public bodies and institutions. The Committee subsequently noted the Government's statement that Act No. 3358, which amended section 10 of the Military Service Act, No. 1111, was no longer applied after 1991. Moreover, the Committee noted the Government's indication that a new draft Military Service Bill, aimed at bringing legislation into conformity with "current conditions" had been examined by a special expert committee of the Turkish Grand National Assembly. The Government indicated, in particular, that the Bill had been drawn up in a way to embody a policy of protecting persons conscripted into military service from being assigned duties in public bodies or undertakings without their consent. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the adoption of this Bill.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Bill to amend the Military Service Act, No. 1111, was submitted to the Turkish Grand National Assembly in 2008, but was not discussed during this legislative term. However, the Government also states that persons working for the Ministry of National Defence are employed under service contracts. The Committee therefore requests the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the amendment of the Military Service Act, No. 1111, to bring it into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice.

Article 1(c) and (d). Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under section 1467 of the Commercial Code (Act No. 6762 of 29 June 1956), seafarers may be forcibly conveyed on board ship to perform their duties, and that, under section 1469 of the Commercial Code, various breaches of discipline by seafarers are punishable with imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour). However, the Committee noted the Government's indication that a new draft Commercial Code had been developed which did not include provisions similar to sections 1467 and 1469 of the present Commercial Code. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the draft Commercial Code would soon be adopted.

The Committee notes that the new Commercial Code No. 6102 was adopted on 13 January 2011, and that section 1533 of this Code repeals Act No. 6762. The Committee notes with satisfaction that this legislation does not contain any provisions providing for the forcible conveyance of seafarers or penalties of imprisonment on seafarers for breaches of labour discipline.

Article 1(d). Punishment for participation in strikes. The Committee previously noted that Act No. 2822 of 1983 on collective agreements, strikes and lockouts, pursuant to sections 70–72, 75, 77 and 79, provides for penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) as a punishment for participation in unlawful strikes, in circumstances falling within the scope of Article 1(d) of the Convention. It expressed the firm hope that Act No. 2822 would be amended. The Committee notes the Government's statement that negotiations with the social partners are ongoing with regard to the amendment of Act No. 2822. The Government states that amending this Act is one of the Government's priorities. Referring to its comments under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that Act No. 2822 is amended so that it does not contain any penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for the peaceful participation in strikes.

Uganda

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1963)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Legislation concerning compulsory placement of unemployed persons on agricultural enterprises in rural areas. For many years, the Committee has been referring to section 2(1) of the Community Farm Settlement Decree, 1975, under which any unemployed able-bodied person may be settled on any farm settlement and required to render service. Section 15 of the Decree makes it an offence punishable with a fine and imprisonment for any person who fails or refuses to live on any farm settlement or who deserts or leaves such settlement without authorization. The Government indicated in its earlier report that the abovementioned Decree was in the process of being repealed and the Committee had also noted the assurances provided by the Government representative before the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2006 that the 1975 Decree was no longer applied in practice. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the Community Farm Settlement Decree has been repealed and that the Community Settlement Act was adopted in 2005. Noting that the Government's report does not contain a copy of the text repealing the Community Farm Settlement Decree 1975, the Committee requests the Government to supply a copy of this document with its next report.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to the following legislation:

- the Public Order and Security Act, No. 20 of 1967, empowering the executive to restrict an individual's association or communication with others, independently of the commission of any offence and subject to penalties involving compulsory labour;
- sections 54(2)(c), 55, 56 and 56A of the Penal Code, empowering the minister to declare any combination of two or more people an unlawful society and thus render any speech, publication or activity on behalf of, or in support of, such combination illegal and punishable with imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour).

As the Committee repeatedly pointed out, any penal sanctions involving an obligation to perform prison labour are contrary to the Convention when imposed on persons convicted for expressing political views or views opposed to the established political system, or having contravened a widely discretionary administrative decision depriving them of the right to publish their views or suspending or dissolving certain associations (see, for example, paragraphs 152–166 of its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour).

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken to repeal or amend the abovementioned provisions of the Public Order and Security Act, No. 20 of 1967, and of the Penal Code, in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention, and that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

United Arab Emirates

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1997)

Preliminary remarks concerning the impact of compulsory prison labour on the application of the Convention. Over a number of years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the national legislation, under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour) may be imposed in circumstances falling under Article 1(a),(c) and (d) of the Convention. It noted the Government's repeated explications that all the provisions in question refer only to sanctions of imprisonment, without mentioning forced labour as a penalty.

The Committee once again takes note of these indications, as well as the Government's reference to the definition of forced labour contained in Article 2(1) of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29). In this regard, the Committee once again draws the Government's attention to the explanations provided in paragraphs 144–147 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, according to which, in the great majority of cases, labour imposed on persons as a consequence of a conviction in a court of law will have no relevance to the application of Convention No. 105, such as in the cases of the exaction of compulsory labour from common offenders convicted, for example, of robbery, kidnapping or other acts of violence or of having endangered the life or health of others, or numerous other offences.

However, the Committee emphasizes that if a person is required to perform compulsory prison labour because that person holds or has expressed certain political views, has committed a breach of labour discipline, or has participated in a strike, the situation is covered by the Convention which, prohibits the use "of any form" of forced or compulsory labour as a sanction in these circumstances.

Article 1(a). Political coercion and punishment for holding or expressing political or ideological views. Following its previous comments, the Committee takes due note that Federal Law No. 6 of 1974 on non-profit-making organizations has been repealed by Federal Law No. 2 of 2008 on non-profit-making associations and organizations, which annuls the penalty of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour) to persons who violate the provisions of Law No. 6 of 1974 and replaces it by financial penalties (section 57).

In its previous comments, the Committee noted that Federal Law No. 15 of 1980 governing publications and publishing imposes penal sanctions of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) in accordance with sections 86 and 89 of the Law, for the violation of the following provisions of the law:

- section 70: prohibition upon criticizing the President of the Republic or the rulers of the Emirates;
- section 71: prohibition on publishing documents harmful to Islam, or to the Government, or to the country's interests or the basic systems on which society is founded;
- section 76: prohibition on publishing material containing information shameful to the President of an Arab or Muslim country or a country with friendly ties, as well as material which may threaten the ties of the country with Arab, Muslim or friendly countries;
- section 77: prohibition on publishing material which causes an injustice to Arabs or constitutes a misrepresentation of Arab civilization or cultural heritage;
- section 81: prohibition on publishing material which harms the national currency or causes confusion over the economic situation of a country.

The Committee recalls that limitations may be imposed by law on individual rights and freedoms in order to ensure respect of the rights and freedoms of others and to meet the just requirements of morality, public order and the general welfare in a democratic society (such as, for example, laws on defamation, sedition and subversion, public order and security). But where the restrictions of these rights and freedoms are formulated in such wide and general terms that they may lead to the imposition of penalties involving compulsory labour as punishment for the expression of political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system, it falls within the scope of the Convention (paragraph 153 of its 2007 General Survey).

In the light of the above considerations, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that Federal Law No. 15 of 1980 is reviewed or abrogated, so that no sanctions involving compulsory labour can be imposed for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system.

Regarding the promulgation on 24 September 2007 of a Decree prohibiting the imprisonment of journalists in judicial cases related to publications, freedom of expression or the exercise of their occupation, the Committee notes the Government's statement that the abovementioned Decree is currently in force before the State courts, and based on it, a draft bill (dated 2009 and annexed to the Government's report), concerning the regulation of mass media activities, is currently in the process of adoption. Section 2 of this draft bill specifies that freedom of opinion and expression whether reflected orally or by any other means is guaranteed by the law. The Committee also notes that Chapter 6 of the draft bill lays down financial penalties in case of a violation of any provision and does not include any penalties which restrict or deprive freedom. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in the adoption of the draft bill of 2009, as well as a copy of the text once adopted.

Over a number of years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the incompatibility with the Convention of certain provisions of the Penal Code which prohibit the establishment of an organization or the convening of a meeting or conference for the purpose of attacking or mistreating the foundations or teachings of the Islamic religion, or calling for the observance of another religion, with such offences being punishable with imprisonment for a maximum period of ten years (sections 317 and 320). It also referred to sections 318 and 319 of the Penal Code which might impose a prison sentence, involving an obligation to work, on any person who is a member of an association specified in section 317, who challenges the foundations or teachings of the Islamic religion, proselytizes another religion or advocates a related ideology.

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no information regarding this point. The Committee recalls that sanctions involving compulsory labour fall within the scope of the Convention where they enforce a prohibition of the expression of views or of opposition to the established political, social or economic system, whether such prohibition is imposed by law or by a discretionary administrative decision (paragraph 154 of its 2007 General Survey).

The Committee therefore once again expresses its firm hope that appropriate measures will be taken to bring sections 317–320 of the Penal Code into conformity with the Convention and that, pending the adoption of such measures, the Government will provide information on the application of sections 317–320 in practice, including copies of any relevant court decisions, indicating the penalties imposed.

Article 1(c). Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted that under the Federal Law on Merchant Shipping (No. 26 of 1981), penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour) may be imposed on seafarers for various breaches of labour discipline, such as violation of service-related orders, neglecting to serve on vessels or to mount guard, being absent from a vessel without authorization, or any other act that may disrupt order or the service on board (section 200(a)(c)(g) and (j)), refusal to comply with an order concerning work on board the vessel, repeated acts of disobedience (section 204(d) and (e)), or the performance of any acts mentioned in section 204 by more than three persons in agreement (section 205).

The Committee points out once again that Article 1(c) of the Convention prohibits the use of compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline, and that sanctions involving compulsory labour for breaches of labour discipline, such as desertion, absence without leave or disobedience, are not in conformity with the Convention, unless the acts committed were liable to endanger the ship or the life or health of persons (paragraph 179 of its 2007 General Survey).

Noting that the Government's report does not contain relevant information on these matters, the Committee once again reiterates its hope that the necessary measures will be taken to bring the abovementioned provisions into conformity with the Convention by limiting their scope to circumstances in which the ship or the life or health of persons are endangered.

Article 1(d). Punishment for having participated in strikes. In its earlier comments, the Committee had referred to section 231(1) of the Penal Code which provides for sanctions of imprisonment (involving an obligation to work) in cases in which at least three public officials abandon their jobs or voluntarily abstain from performing any obligations related thereto, acting in agreement among themselves or pursuing an illegal objective.

The Committee notes the Government's detailed explanations in its report. It however, observes that the Government's report contain no relevant information on how the abovementioned provision is applied in practice. The Committee recalls, once again, that no one who has participated in a strike should be subject to penal sanctions for the mere fact of peacefully participating in a strike and in no event should risk a prison sentence involving compulsory labour.

The Committee hopes that the Government will provide in its next report further information on the application of section 231(1) of the Penal Code in practice, including copies of any court decisions defining or illustrating its scope.

United States

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1991)

Article 1(d) of the Convention. Sanctions involving compulsory labour for participation in strikes. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, pursuant to article 12, section 95-98.1, of the North Carolina General Statutes, strikes by public employees are declared illegal and against the public policy of the state. Under section 95-99, any violation of the provisions of article 12 is declared to be a Class 1 misdemeanour. Under section 15A-1340.23, read together with section 15A-1340.11 of Chapter 15A (Criminal Procedure Act), a person convicted of a Class 1 misdemeanour may be sentenced to "community punishment" and, upon a second conviction, to "active punishment", that is, imprisonment. In this regard, the Committee noted the information in the Compendium of Community Corrections Programs in North Carolina (published by the North Carolina Sentencing and Policy Advisory Commission) indicating that the imposition of community punishment may include assignment to the state's Community Service Work Program, which requires the offender to work for free for public or non-profit agencies in an area that will benefit the greater community. The Committee also noted that article 3 (Labor of Prisoners), section 148-26, of Chapter 148 (State Prison System) states that it is the public policy of the state of North Carolina that all able-bodied prison inmates shall be required to perform diligently all work assignments provided for them. In response, the Government indicated that the Committee's observations had been forwarded to the authorities in North Carolina.

The Committee notes that the Government once again indicates that state court records do not reveal a single instance in which an individual has been convicted for engaging in an illegal public sector strike. The Government states that, even if an individual were to be convicted, under North Carolina law a judge would have the discretion whether or not to order the convicted individual to perform work. The Government indicates that it communicated in writing, in September 2011, to the authorities in North Carolina regarding the Committee's comments, and that it requested these authorities to provide information on any steps taken by the state government relating to these comments. The Government indicates that it will keep the Committee informed of any developments in this regard.

Observing that it has been raising this issue for a decade, the Committee must once again recall that Article 1(d) of the Convention prohibits the use of any form of forced or compulsory labour as a punishment for having participated in strikes. The Committee refers in this connection to the explanations contained in paragraph 315 of its 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work, in which it has considered that, regardless of the legality of the strike action, any sanctions imposed should not be disproportionate to the seriousness of the violations committed, and that in both legislation and practice, no sanctions involving compulsory labour should be imposed for the mere fact of organizing or peacefully participating in strikes. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the North Carolina General Statutes into conformity with both the Convention and the indicated practice, in ensuring the repeal or amendment of sections 95-98.1 and 95-99, so as to ensure that penalties of compulsory labour (through the Community Service Work Program or during imprisonment) cannot be imposed for participation in a strike. The Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will be in a position to provide information on the progress achieved in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Uzbekistan

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), dated 22 October 2012, which relate to the mobilization of adults, particularly teachers, university students and employees from the private and public sectors, in the national cotton harvest, as well as the Government's reply to these comments dated 20 November 2012.

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Mobilization and use of labour for purposes of economic development in agriculture (cotton production). In its earlier comments, the Committee noted the allegations made in 2008 and 2009 by the IOE and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning the systematic and persistent use of forced labour, including forced child labour, in the cotton fields of Uzbekistan. The Committee recalled that similar allegations were made in 2004 by the Council of the Trade Unions Federation of Uzbekistan, which referred to practices of a mobilization and use of labour for purposes of economic development in cotton production, in which public sector workers, schoolchildren and university students were involved.

As regards practices of forcible involvement of schoolchildren in the cotton harvest, the Committee previously asked the Government to refer to its comments on the application of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), likewise ratified by Uzbekistan.

However, as the Committee previously noted from the above allegations made by employers' and workers' organizations, not only children but also adults were subject to forced labour during the cotton harvest. The ITUC asserted, in particular, that, despite the existence of the legal framework against the use of forced labour, local administration employees, teachers, factory workers and doctors were commonly forced to leave their jobs for weeks at a time and pick cotton with no additional compensation; in some instances refusal to cooperate could lead to dismissal from work; even elderly people and mothers of young babies had been reportedly ordered by local government officials to pick cotton or lose their pensions or child benefits.

The Committee previously noted that, in its reply to the above communications by the IOE and the ITUC, the Government denied the allegations about coercion of large numbers of people to participate in agricultural works and reiterated that under no circumstances may employers use compulsory labour for the production or harvesting of agricultural products in Uzbekistan, the exaction of forced labour being punishable with penal and administrative sanctions and employers being liable for violation of labour legislation. The Government further indicated in its reply to the Committee's comments received in May 2011 that, according to the legislation in force, public sector workers and university students may participate in the cotton harvest if such work is performed under a labour contract concluded between an employer and a worker under section 72 of the Labour Code. Any other exaction of labour from these categories without payment would be considered as compulsion to work, which involves responsibility and punishment of perpetrators in accordance with the legislation. The Government also added that the State Legal Labour Inspection intervenes upon every revealed case of the exaction of forced labour and applies appropriate legal measures, while informing the competent bodies of the detected violations of labour legislation. The Government further made reference to the recent legislative measures aimed at improving the legal framework for the abolition of forced labour, such as the adoption of the Law on Measures to Combat Trafficking in Persons and respective amendments to the Criminal Code.

The Committee refers, however, to its comments addressed to the Government under Convention No. 182, in which it notes the ITUC observations under that Convention received in 2010, 2011 and 2012, as well as the IOE comments received in 2010 and 2012 and, in particular, the assertion contained in these communications that, despite the Government's denial, sources in the country indicate the widespread mobilization of forced labour (particularly of children) in the annual cotton harvest in a number of Uzbekistan's regions.

Recalling that the Convention prohibits the use of compulsory labour for purposes of economic development, the Committee requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the concrete measures taken, including through labour inspection, to ensure the elimination of the use of compulsory labour of public sector workers and students in cotton production. Noting also the general statistical data concerning a number of violations of the labour legislation detected in 2011 and a number of cases in which administrative penalties (fines) have been imposed on responsible public officials for such violations, the Committee requests the Government to provide statistics on the number of cases of forced labour detected by the State Legal Labour Inspection, indicating in particular whether judicial proceedings have been instituted in such cases and indicating the penalties imposed on perpetrators.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1964)

Article 1(a) and (d) of the Convention. Imposition of sentences of imprisonment involving the obligation to work as a punishment for expressing political opinions or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system or as a punishment for having participated in strikes. The Committee notes the comments submitted on 31 August 2011 by the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV) on the application by the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela of a number of Conventions. The Committee observes that the CTV refers to several provisions of the national legislation (the Penal Code and the Framework Act on national security and defence) as restricting the exercise of the right to strike and serving as a basis for criminalizing social protest in the country, and accordingly constituting a form of blackmail and coercion to prevent workers from defending their interests legitimately. According to the union, these provisions can be used to penalize, through high fines as well as sentences of imprisonment, persons who, in the exercise of their right to strike, paralyse the activities of an enterprise.

The Committee observes that, in the context of the supervision of the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), both the Committee of Experts and the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference have expressed concern at the criminalization of legitimate trade union activities, at restrictions on the public freedoms that are necessary for the exercise of trade union rights and at allegations that a climate of intimidation prevails around trade union organizations, employers' organizations and heads of enterprises that are not sympathetic to the Government.

The Committee notes the report of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) entitled "Democracy and human rights in Venezuela" (OEA/Ser.L/V/II. Doc.54, of 30 December 2009) and its 2010 Annual Report (OEA/Ser.L/V/II. Doc.5 corr.1, of 7 March 2011), and in particular paragraphs 608–837 covering the situation in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela. In its 2009 report, the IACHR examined with concern the situation with regard to freedom of thought and expression in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela. It considered that the lack of independence and autonomy of the judicial authorities in relation to the political authorities is a fragile aspect of democracy. It analysed the serious obstacles faced by human rights defenders and it expressed concern at the information attesting to a trend of acts of reprisal against individuals who express public disapproval of Government policies, which affect both opposition bodies and citizens who exercise their right to express their disagreement with the policies adopted. In its 2010 report, the IACHR indicates that this worrying trend has continued and also notes a trend to take disciplinary, administrative and penal action against the media and journalists. The IACHR recommended the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela to refrain from carrying out reprisals or using the punitive power of the State to intimidate or sanction individuals on the basis of their political opinions and to guarantee the plurality of spaces for democratic activity, including respect for demonstrations and protests that are carried out in exercise of the right of assembly and peaceful demonstration. In its press releases Nos 36/10 and 61/10, the IACHR also expressed its deep concern at the use of the punitive power of the State to criminalize human rights defenders, judicialize peaceful social protests and bring criminal prosecutions against persons the authorities considered to be political opponents.

The Committee also notes that, in the context of the Universal Periodic Review carried out in October 2011 by the United Nations Human Rights Council, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) stated that the situation with regard to the right to freedom of expression had deteriorated in recent years and referred to a series of provisions of the national legislation that were also likely to restrict the right to freedom of expression (A/HRC/WG.6/12/VEN/2, paragraphs 44 and 46).

The Committee recalls that, under the terms of Article 1(a) and (d) of the Convention, persons who express political views, or who express opposition to the established political, social or economic system, or who participate in a strike, cannot be the subject of sanctions under the terms of which work is imposed upon them. The Committee notes that, under the terms of sections 12 and 15 of the Penal Code, persons sentenced to a penalty of presidio or of prisión are subject to the obligation to work. Only persons sentenced to a penalty of arresto are excluded from the obligation to work (section 17). The Committee draws attention to the following provisions of the Penal Code which establish penalties of prisión for certain forms of behaviour:

- offending or showing a lack of respect for the President of the Republic or for a number of public authorities (sections 147 and 148);
- public denigration of the National Assembly, the Supreme Court of Justice, etc. (section 149);
- offending the honour, reputation or prestige of a member of the National Assembly or a public servant, or of a judicial or political body (sections 222 and 225); proof of the truth of the facts is not admitted (section 226);
- defamation (sections 242 and 244).

In view of the above, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that no one who expresses political views, who peacefully opposes the established political, social or economic system or who participates peacefully in a strike can be sentenced to imprisonment under the terms of which compulsory labour would be imposed. It also requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the above provisions, with a copy of court decisions based thereon and an indication of the facts that gave rise to the convictions.

Zambia

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1964)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. 1. National Plan of Action. The Committee previously noted the adoption of the National Plan of Action to Combat Human Trafficking, and requested information on its implementation in practice. The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that the implementation of this Plan of Action has included research on the nature and extent of internal trafficking for domestic labour, as well as training programmes on human trafficking and forced labour and the development of a toolkit on forced labour and human trafficking, including several resources for employers in Zambia. The Government also indicates that it is taking measures to establish the Inter-ministerial Committee on Human Trafficking. The Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts, within the framework of the National Plan of Action to Combat Human Trafficking to prevent, suppress and combat trafficking in persons, including internal trafficking, and to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and the results achieved. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information from the research conducted on internal trafficking for the purpose of domestic labour, once completed.

2. Protection and assistance to victims. The Committee previously noted that sections 34, 37, 40–47 and 58 of the Anti-Human Trafficking Act provided for measures related to victim protection. It requested information on the application of these provisions in practice. The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that the number of identified victims of trafficking increased significantly from eight victims in 2009 to 53 victims in 2010. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that it is granting temporary residence permits to victims of trafficking who are willing to cooperate with law enforcement officials, pursuant to section 34 of the Anti-Human Trafficking Act. The Committee further takes due note of the Government's indication that, pursuant to sections 37 and 40–47 of the Anti-Human Trafficking Act, the Government works with non-governmental organizations to provide victims of trafficking with shelter, food, clothing, counselling, medical services and security. The Government states that it is collaborating with a non-governmental organization to build a modern shelter for victims of trafficking, and that the Immigration Department collaborates with the International Organization for Migration (IOM) to repatriate victims of trafficking to their countries of origin.

Lastly, the Committee notes the Government's indication that there have been no records of rulings from the courts pursuant to section 58 of the Anti-Human Trafficking Act, which allows the court to impose on the offender the obligation to pay compensation to trafficking victims. Observing the rising number of trafficking victims identified in the country, the Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to provide protection and assistance to victims of trafficking, and to provide information on the number of persons benefiting from these services. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to provide legal assistance to victims of trafficking so they can assert their rights and be compensated for the damage suffered, pursuant to section 58 of the Anti-Human Trafficking Act.

3. Law enforcement and penalties. The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Anti-Human Trafficking Act (No. 11 of 2008), and it requested information on the application of the Act in practice. The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that in 2009, three persons were prosecuted for trafficking in persons (in two cases) involving eight victims. In 2010, while eight suspects were identified in five separate cases (involving 53 victims), only two persons have thus far been prosecuted. The Committee also observes that, according to the information in the Government's report, in the years 2010 and 2011, no convictions were secured under the Anti-Human Trafficking Act.

The Committee also notes the indication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), in a report entitled "Internationally Recognized Core Labour Standards in Zambia: Report for the WTO General Council Review of the Trade Policies of Zambia", produced in July 2009, that despite the legislative prohibition, trafficking in persons remains a problem in practice. The Committee further notes that the Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences, in a report concerning her mission to Zambia presented to the Human Rights Council of 2 May 2011, indicated that trafficking occurs within the country's borders where women and children from rural areas are exploited in cities in involuntary domestic servitude or other types of forced labour (A/HRC/17/26/Add.4, paragraph 27). Moreover, the Committee notes that the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), in its concluding observations of 19 September 2011, expressed concern that Zambia remains a country of origin, destination and transit for the trafficking of persons (CEDAW/C/ZMB/CO/5-6, paragraph 23). The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations and effective prosecutions are carried out against those who commit the offence of trafficking in persons, including internal trafficking. It requests the Government to provide information on measures taken in this regard, including measures to provide appropriate training for law enforcement officials, border officials and the judiciary in order to strengthen their capacity to address this issue. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application of the Anti-Human Trafficking Act in practice, particularly the number of cases of trafficking detected, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and the specific penalties applied.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Zimbabwe

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1998)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for the expression of views opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee previously noted the continued recourse to the Public Order and Security Act (POSA) and the Criminal Law (Codification and Reform) Act to repress basic civil liberties and trade union rights. The Committee referred to the following provisions of national legislation, under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour by virtue of section 76(1) of the Prisons Act (Cap. 7:11) and section 66(1) of the Prisons (General) Regulations, 1996) may be imposed in circumstances falling within Article 1(a) of the Convention:

- sections 15, 16, 19(1)(b), (c) and 24–27 of the POSA (Cap. 11:17) (publishing or communicating false statements prejudicial to the State; making any false statement about or concerning the President; performing any action, uttering any words or distributing or displaying any writing, sign or other visible representation that is threatening, abusive or insulting, intending thereby to provoke a breach of peace; failure to notify the authority of the intention to hold public gatherings, violation of the prohibition of public gatherings or public demonstrations, etc.);
- sections 31 and 33 of the Criminal Law (Codification and Reform) Act (Chapter 9:23), which contain provisions similar to those of the POSA referred to under the previous point concerning the publishing or communicating false statements prejudicial to the State or making any false statement about or concerning the President, etc.;
- sections 37 and 41 of the Criminal Law (Codification and Reform) Act (Chapter 9:23), under which sanctions of imprisonment may be imposed, inter alia, for participating in meetings and gatherings with the intention of “disturbing the peace, security or order of the public”; uttering any words or distributing or displaying any writing, sign or other visible representation that is threatening, abusive or insulting, “intending thereby to provoke a breach of peace”; engaging in disorderly conduct in public places with similar intention, etc.

In this respect, the Committee also referred to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry appointed under article 26 of the ILO Constitution to examine the observance by the Government of Zimbabwe of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), which recommended that the POSA be brought into line with these Conventions. In this regard, the Committee also refers to the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards of June 2011, which requested the Government, to carry out, together with social partners, a full review of the POSA in practice, and considered that concrete steps should be taken to enable the elaboration and promulgation of clear lines of conduct for the police and security forces with regard to human and trade union rights.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that the Criminal Law (Codification and Reform) Act and the POSA are consistent with the Constitution of Zimbabwe, which ensures the general protection of the rights to freedom of conscience, expression, assembly and association.

The Committee furthermore notes that during the discussion by the United Nations Human Rights Council of the Universal Periodic Review of Zimbabwe in October 2011, concern was expressed about the Criminal Law (Codification and Reform) Act and the POSA and their effects on freedom of expression, freedom of association and assembly, and freedom of the press. The working group made numerous recommendations in order to amend the legislation and ensure the respect of these freedoms in practice, yet the Government of Zimbabwe clearly indicated that it did not support these recommendations (see A/HRC/19/14, Human Rights Council, 19 December 2011).

The Committee recalls once again that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. It refers in this connection to paragraphs 302 and 303 of its 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work, where it observed that the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. But sanctions involving compulsory labour are not in conformity with the Convention if they enforce a prohibition of the peaceful expression of non-violent views that are critical of Government policy and the established political system, whether the prohibition is imposed by law or by an administrative decision. Since opinions and views opposed to the established system may be expressed not only through the press or other communications media, but also at various kinds of meetings and assemblies, if such meetings and assemblies are subject to prior authorization granted at the discretion of the authorities and violations can be punished by sanctions involving compulsory labour, such provisions also come within the scope of the Convention.

While taking due note of the Government's statement that section 14(2)(a) of the Constitution specifically excludes from the definition of forced labour persons who perform any labour required in consequence of the sentence or order of a court, the Committee recalls that the Convention prohibits the use of "any form" of forced or compulsory labour, including compulsory prison labour, as a punishment in respect of the persons covered by Article 1(a).

The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that the provisions of the POSA and the Criminal Law (Codification and Reform) Act are repealed or amended, in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention. Pending the adoption of such measures, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application of these provisions in practice, supplying copies of the court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed.

Article 1(d). Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for having participated in strikes. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to certain provisions of the Labour Act punishing persons engaged in an unlawful collective action with sanctions of imprisonment, which involves compulsory prison labour by virtue of section 76(1) of the Prisons Act (Cap. 7:11) and section 66(1) of the Prisons (General) Regulations, 1996. The Committee noted, in particular, that section 104(2), and (3) of the Labour Act, as amended, not only prohibits collective job action in essential services and in the case of the agreement of the parties to refer the dispute to arbitration, but also provides for other restrictions on the right to collective job action related to procedural requirements, which are equally enforceable with sanctions of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour), under sections 109(1), (2) and 112(1) of the Act. Besides, it follows from the wording of section 102(b) of the Act that the Minister can declare as essential any service, other than that interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. The Committee recalled that Article 1(d) of the Convention prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour as a punishment for having participated in strikes.

The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report that these sections of the Labour Act are included in the draft Principles for the Harmonization and Review of Labour Laws in Zimbabwe, which are currently being finalized by the social partners and will be submitted to the ILO following Cabinet approval. In August 2011, the social partners agreed to the principle of streamlining mechanisms to deal with collective job action and review ministerial powers and those of the Labour Court on collective job action. This principle would provide the framework to amend section 103 defining essential services, section 104 on balloting for strike action, sections 107, 109 and 112 on excessive penalties, including lengthy periods of imprisonment and de-registration of trade unions and dismissal of employees involved in collective job action.

In these circumstances, the Committee trusts that the necessary measures will soon be taken to amend the provisions of the Labour Act imposing restrictions on the right to strike enforceable with sanctions involving compulsory prison labour, so as to ensure that no such sanctions can be imposed for the mere fact of organizing or peacefully participating in strikes. The Committee requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 29 (Algeria, Angola, Armenia, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cambodia, Chad, Comoros, Congo, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Gabon, Gambia, Georgia, Ghana, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Honduras, India, Islamic Republic of Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Jamaica, Jordan, Kazakhstan, Kenya, Kiribati, Kuwait, Kyrgyzstan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Latvia, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Mali, Mauritius, Republic of Moldova, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Namibia, Nepal, Netherlands, Netherlands: Aruba, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Paraguay, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Russian Federation, Rwanda, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Solomon Islands, South Africa, Sri Lanka, Switzerland, United Republic of Tanzania, Timor-Leste, Togo, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukraine, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom: Anguilla, United Kingdom: St Helena, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Zambia, Zimbabwe); Convention No. 105 (Angola, Armenia, Barbados, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Chad, Comoros, Congo, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Gabon, Gambia, Georgia, Ghana, Grenada, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Israel, Italy, Jordan, Kazakhstan, Kenya, Kiribati, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Madagascar, Malawi, Mali, Mauritania, Republic of Moldova, Mongolia, Mozambique, Namibia, Nepal, Netherlands, Netherlands: Aruba, Niger, Peru, Philippines, Romania,

The Committee noted the information supplied by the following State in answer to a direct request with regard to:
Convention No. 29 (Peru).

Elimination of child labour and protection of children and young persons

Bahamas

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with interest that the Child Protection Act, 2007, entered into force on 1 October 2009.

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to a study carried out in June 2005 within the framework of the ILO and the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) Regional Child Labour Project and entitled “Review of child labour laws of the Bahamas – A guide to legislative reform” (ILO and the CIDA Regional Child Labour Project Study), the Ministry of Labour and Immigration had established a National Committee on Child Labour whose task is to make recommendations for a policy on child labour. Once again noting that the Government’s report does not provide any information on this point, the Committee expresses the hope that a national policy on child labour will be elaborated in the near future. It once again requests the Government to provide information on any progress made to this end in its next report.

Article 2(1). Scope of application. The Committee previously noted that section 50(1) of the Employment Act, 2001, provides that a child (any person under the age of 14 years) shall not be employed in any undertaking except as expressly provided in the First Schedule. It also noted that, according to the ILO and the CIDA Regional Child Labour Project Study, children were found working in a variety of activities that were suggestive of child labour. Moreover, the Committee noted that, according to the ILO and the CIDA Regional Child Labour Project Study, the Labour Inspectorate Unit does not have the human resource capability or the administrative framework to conduct the requisite inspection of workplaces for child labour, and that the majority of children work in the informal economy, which is not generally inspected by the inspectorate. The Committee noted the Government’s indication that it would consult its relevant agencies on this point and that it had initiated the process of hiring additional labour inspectors. In light of the above, the Committee observed that the minimum age for admission to employment only applies to undertakings whereas the majority of children work in the informal economy. It reminded the Government that the Convention applies to all branches of economic activity and covers all types of employment or work, whether or not there is a contractual employment relationship and whether or not the work is remunerated. Noting the absence of information in the Government’s report on this point, the Committee once again expresses the hope that, in hiring additional labour inspectors, the labour inspection component concerning children working on their own account or in the informal economy will be strengthened. In this regard, it once again requests the Government to adapt and strengthen the labour inspection services in order to ensure that the protection established by the Convention is secured for children working in these sectors. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any steps taken in this regard in its next report.

Article 2(2) and (5). Raising the minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee previously noted that the minimum age for admission to employment or work specified by the Bahamas at the time of ratification was 14 years. The Committee also noted that section 50(1) of the Employment Act provided for the general prohibition of employing children under 14 years of age in any undertaking, save for certain exceptions.

The Committee notes that section 7(2) of the Child Protection Act provides that no child under the age of 16 shall be employed, save as is provided by subsection (3), which provides that a child under the age of 16 may be employed in any occupation in which his/her employment is sanctioned by any other law or prescribed under this Act. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether it intends to raise the minimum age for admission to employment or work initially specified (14 years) to the age of 16, in accordance with the Child Protection Act, and amend the Employment Act in order to eliminate this discrepancy in the national legislation. If so, the Committee takes the opportunity to draw the Government’s attention to the provisions of Article 2(2) of the Convention, which provides that any Member having ratified this Convention may subsequently notify the Director-General of the International Labour Office, by a new declaration, that it has raised the minimum age that it had previously specified. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would consider the possibility of sending a declaration of this nature to the Office.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee noted that, by virtue of section 22(3) of the Education Act, the age of completion of compulsory schooling is 16 years. It also noted that, according to data from the UNESCO Institute for Statistics of 2005, the school enrolment rate at the primary school level is 92 per cent for girls and 89 per cent for boys, and at the secondary level 84 per cent for girls and 83 per cent for boys. Moreover, the Committee noted that, according to the 2008 Education for All UNESCO Report entitled Education for All by 2015 – Will we make it? (2008 EFA UNESCO Report), progress was made in attaining the EFA agenda. The Committee noted however that, according to the 2008 EFA UNESCO Report, the Bahamas is at risk of not achieving the EFA goal by 2015 because progress is too slow.

The Committee notes the absence of information in the Government’s report on this point. Considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective ways of combating child labour, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to increase the school enrolment rate as well as completion rate at both the primary and secondary school levels in order to achieve the EFA goal by 2015, and to provide information on the results attained.

Article 3(1). Minimum age for admission to hazardous work. The Committee previously noted the Government's information that the Employment Act does not prohibit young persons between 14 and 18 years of age from being employed in hazardous work. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would take the necessary measures to establish the minimum age for admission to hazardous work at 18 years in the near future.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 7(1) of the Child Protection Act provides that no child – a person below the age of 18 years – shall be employed or engaged in any activity that may be detrimental to his or her health, education, or mental, physical or moral development.

Article 3(2). Determination of types of hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the national legislation did not contain a determination of the types of employment or work likely to jeopardize the health, safety or morals of young persons below 18 years of age. It also noted the Government's indication that it would address this issue in forecasted amendments to the Employment Act after consultation with representatives of employers' and workers' organizations. In this regard, the Committee noted that, according to the Government, it had arranged with the ILO Regional Office to establish a list of hazardous occupations as part of its Decent Work Country Programme.

The Committee notes the absence of information in the Government's report on this point. However, the Committee notes that a delegation of the Bahamas attended the ILO Subregional Workshop on the Elimination of Hazardous Child Labour for Select Caribbean Countries in October 2011. The Committee notes that this workshop aimed to enhance skills for the preparation of a list of hazardous work through internal consultations and collaboration. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption, in the near future, of legal provisions determining the types of hazardous work to be prohibited for persons under 18 years of age. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the consultations held with the organizations of employers and workers concerned with this subject.

Article 7. Light work. The Committee previously noted that section 7(3)(a) of the Child Protection Act provides that a child under the age of 16 may be employed by the child's parents or guardian in light domestic, agricultural or horticultural work. It requested the Government to provide information on the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, light domestic, agricultural or horticultural work may be undertaken by children under the age of 16 years. The Committee noted the Government's indication that it would undertake to provide information to the Committee on the measures taken or envisaged in respect of provisions or regulations which would determine light work activities and the conditions in which such employment or work may be undertaken by young persons from the age of 12 years. Once again noting the absence of information in the Government's report on this point, the Committee urges the Government to take these measures in the near future in order to give effect to the Convention on this point. It once again requests the Government to provide any information on progress made in this regard.

Article 9(1). Penalties. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Child Protection Act does not provide for penalties in case of contravention of section 7 of the Act regarding child labour. It requested the Government to indicate the legal provisions that prescribe penalties in case of violations of the Convention.

The Committee notes the absence of information in the Government's report on this point. It once again recalls that, by virtue of Article 9(1) of the Convention, all necessary measures, including the provision of appropriate penalties, shall be taken by the competent authority, to ensure the effective enforcement of the provisions of this Convention. The Committee urges the Government to take measures to ensure that regulations provide for penalties in case of violation of section 7 of the Child Protection Act regarding child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard in its next report.

Article 9(3). Registers of employment. The Committee noted the Government's indication that some provisions of the Employment Act give effect to this Article of the Convention, particularly section 61(1) which lays down that every employer shall keep a register of wage payments and accounts in respect of each employee for a period of three years. The Committee observed that this provision of the Employment Act does not meet the conditions provided by Article 9(3) of the Convention. It also observed that the Child Protection Act does not include a provision requiring the keeping of registers or other documents by employers.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that, by virtue of section 71(a) of the Employment Act, employers are required to make, and keep for such period as may be prescribed after the work is performed, such records of the names, addresses, ages, wages, hours worked, annual vacations and other conditions of work of each of their employees as may be prescribed. By virtue of section 71(b), employers are required to furnish such information to the Minister of Labour if it is requested by the Minister. The Government also indicates that it is currently considering a proposal made by workers' organizations to amend section 71 of the Employment Act in order to allow a worker or his or her union representative to request his or her employer to provide the information contained in these records to the Minister of Labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in amending section 71 of the Employment Act and to communicate a copy of the new section, once amended.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice. Noting the absence of information on this point in the Government's report, the Committee once again requests it to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including, for example, statistical data on the employment of children and young persons, especially regarding children working in the informal economy, as well as extracts from the reports of inspection services and information on the number and nature of contraventions reported and penalties applied. To the extent possible, this information should be disaggregated by age and sex.

Burkina Faso

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments the Committee noted that a national study on child labour had been conducted in the country and that a new national plan of action on child labour was being drawn up.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that in 2006 Burkina Faso conducted a national survey of child labour (ENTE) with the support of ILO-IPEC-SIMPOC. The results of this survey were published in 2008 and are the most recent data available concerning child labour. The Committee notes that, according to the ENTE, child labour affects 41.1 per cent of children between 5 and 17 years of age in Burkina Faso, a total of 1,658,869 working children, who devote between 19 and 25 hours per week to their work. Moreover, 39.3 per cent of children are forced to perform harmful activities and 35.8 per cent do work that is classified as hazardous. The survey shows that there are more working children in rural areas (44.1 per cent) than in urban areas (23.2 per cent). The main sectors where economically active children are present are agriculture, fishing, hunting and domestic work. The proportion of working children increases considerably with age. Nearly 30 per cent of children between 5 and 9 years of age and 47.6 per cent of children between 10 and 14 years of age work in various economic sectors. In the 15–17 age group, more than half (56 per cent) are working children. The Committee notes that on 15 February 2012 the Government adopted the National Plan of Action against the worst forms of child labour in Burkina Faso 2011–15 (PAN/PFTE), drawn up in cooperation with ILO-IPEC, with the general objective of reducing the incidence of child labour by 2015. Noting with concern that a significant number of children are working below the minimum age, especially in dangerous conditions, the Committee requests the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the gradual elimination of child labour. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide detailed information on the implementation of PAN/PFTE in its next report. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to supply information on the application of the Convention in practice, particularly statistics on the employment of children under 15 years of age and reports of the inspection services.

Article 3(1) and (2). Hazardous work and determination of these types of work. The Committee previously noted that the Ministry of Labour and Social Security sponsored a study in 2008 in order to produce an overview of hazardous types of work and propose draft legislation prohibiting the performance of these types of work by children. The Committee reminded the Government that under Article 3(2) of the Convention, hazardous types of work should be determined after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, where such exist.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Government, in cooperation with the employers' and workers' organizations concerned, drew up and adopted Decree No. 2009-365/PRES/PM/MTSS/MS/MASSN of 28 May 2009 determining the list of hazardous types of work prohibited for children in Burkina Faso. This Decree, which defines a child as any person under 18 years of age, determines the list of hazardous types of work prohibited for children. The Committee observes that section 2 of the Decree specifically prohibits: work which, by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to jeopardize the health, safety or morals of children; work which exposes children to physical, psychological or sexual abuse; work performed underground, under water, at dangerous heights or in confined spaces; and work performed with dangerous machinery, equipment or tools, or which involves the handling or carrying of heavy loads. Moreover, section 5 of the Decree establishes a list of hazardous types of work prohibited for children by sector of activity, including agriculture, stock rearing, fishing, agro-forestry and hunting, industry, mining, quarries and small-scale gold mines, construction and public works, the informal sector, craft industries, performing arts, transport, and the human and animal health sector.

Article 9(1). Penalties. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the precise penalties applicable for violations of section 149 of the Labour Code of 2008 concerning the prohibition on the performance of hazardous work by children and young persons.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that, since hazardous work is one of the worst forms of child labour, violations of section 149 of the Labour Code incur the penalties established by Act No. 029-2008/AN of 15 May 2008 combating trafficking in persons and similar practices. The Committee observes that section 7 of the Decree of 2009 determining the list of hazardous types of work prohibited for children in Burkina Faso provides that violations of the provisions of the Decree shall be penalized according to the provisions of section 5 of the Act of 2008 combating trafficking in persons and similar practices. The Committee notes with interest that, under the terms of section 5 of this Act, any person who commits an offence constituting one of the worst forms of child labour, including hazardous work, shall be liable to imprisonment ranging from ten to 20 years. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the nature of the violations reported by the labour inspectorate, the number of persons prosecuted and the penalties imposed.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

Articles 3(a) and 7(1) of the Convention. Sale and trafficking of children and sanctions. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the broad extent of internal and trans-border trafficking of children for the exploitation of their labour. The Committee also noted with interest the adoption of Decree No. 2008-332/PRES of 19 June 2008 issuing Act No. 29-2008/AN of 15 May 2008 to combat trafficking in persons and similar practices (Act to combat trafficking in persons and similar practices). The Committee took due note that sections 3 and 4 of the Act to combat trafficking in persons and similar practices provides for terms of imprisonment ranging from five to 20 years. The Committee noted several decisions handed down by the High Court between 2004 and 2007. The Committee also noted that individuals who had been prosecuted for trafficking in children had been found guilty and sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from two to 24 months, sometimes accompanied by a fine, and were ordered to pay costs. The Committee, however, observed that, of the seven prison sentences handed down, six were suspended; one person had been sentenced to two months' imprisonment and another to a fine of 50,000 CFA francs.

The Committee notes the Government's indications that, in total, 349 cases of the abduction of children and 44 prosecutions for trafficking in children have been recorded by the national courts over the past four years. The Government adds that in 2010 a police operation in the Cascades region resulted in the arrest of 17 traffickers in two days, who were then referred to the judicial authorities. The Government also conducted, with Interpol support, a police operation involving around 100 police officers and around 20 child protection workers, as a result of which, within two days, 173 children were intercepted and protected and 15 traffickers arrested. However, the Committee observes that the Government has not provided any information on the imposition of penalties on those responsible for violations relating to trafficking in children. The Committee also notes that, according to the examination of the reports submitted in accordance with the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography (examination of the reports submitted to the CRC/OPSC) of 7 May 2012 (CRC/C/OPSC/BFA/1, paragraphs 47–48), the available data on the cases of trafficking in children registered by the courts are not sufficient to indicate whether prosecutions have been opened in all of the presumed cases of trafficking.

The Committee once again reminds the Government that trafficking in children is a serious crime and that, under Article 7(1) of the Convention, the Government is obliged to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, including the application of sufficiently effective and dissuasive penal sanctions. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the penalties imposed on individuals found guilty of trafficking in children are sufficiently effective and dissuasive and that they are applied in practice. It once again requests the Government to provide information in this respect. The Committee further requests the Government to continue providing information on the application in practice of the Act to combat trafficking in persons and similar practices, particularly by providing statistics on the number and nature of the violations reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions imposed.

Article 4(1). Determination of hazardous types of work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Ministry of Labour and Social Security had sponsored a study in 2008 to assess the situation with regard to hazardous work and to propose draft legislation prohibiting the performance of these types of work by children. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the draft legislation prohibiting the performance of these types of work by children under 18 years of age and determining these types of work would be drawn up in the near future.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Government, in collaboration with the employers' and workers' organizations concerned, prepared and adopted Decree No. 2009-365/PRES/PM/MTSS/MS/MASSN of 28 May 2009 to determine the list of hazardous types of work prohibited for children in Burkina Faso. This Decree, which defines a child as any person under 18 years of age, determines the list of hazardous types of work that are prohibited for children. The Committee notes that section 5 of the Decree contains a detailed list of hazardous types of work prohibited for children by sector, including agriculture, stock-raising, fishing, agro-forestry and hunting, industry, mines, quarries and gold-washing sites, construction and public works, the informal economy, artisanal work, arts and theatrical representations, transport, and the human and animal health sector.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. National Multi-Sectoral Committee to Combat Trafficking in Persons. The Committee notes the Government's indication that a National Multi-Sectoral Committee to Combat Trafficking in Persons and Assimilated Practices, chaired by the Department of Social Action, was established by Joint Decree No. 2009-529/PRES/PM/MASSN/MATD/SECU of 17 July 2009. The Multi-Sectoral Committee meets annually in its ordinary session to review action to combat trafficking in persons, identify trends and make recommendations. During the 2011 session the need was identified to train actors in the field, and the necessity to disseminate widely certain papers on trafficking. The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to combat trafficking in children by reinforcing the capacity of the bodies responsible for law enforcement, including through the action of the National Multi-Sectoral Committee to Combat Trafficking in Persons. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this respect.

Article 6. Plan of action. The Committee notes that, according to the examination of the reports submitted to the CRC/OPSC on 7 May 2012 (CRC/C/OPSC/BFA/1, paragraph 76), national action plans are being prepared, including the National Plan of Action to Combat Trafficking and Sexual Violence against Children in Burkina Faso, which sets out clear strategies for combating child trafficking and the sexual exploitation of children. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the specific measures adopted or envisaged in the context of the National Plan of Action to Combat Trafficking and Sexual Violence against Children in Burkina Faso, and the results achieved as a result of the implementation of these measures. It also requests the Government to provide a copy of the Plan of Action with its next report.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee notes the Government's indications concerning its initiatives and prevention measures to combat trafficking, particularly of children. Through the Ministry of Social Action and National Solidarity (MASSN), the Government is undertaking awareness-raising activities with the principal stakeholders. Between 2008 and 2009, over 15,000 copies of the Act to combat trafficking in persons and similar practices were made available. These measures are combined with awareness-raising campaigns conducted among at-risk categories of the population through informal talks, cinema discussions and theatrical forums. The Government indicates that its awareness-raising activities as a whole have directly reached out to 70,834 people, including 18,815 men, 19,679 women and 32,340 children. The Committee encourages the Government to continue its efforts to prevent children under 18 years of age from becoming victims of trafficking for economic or sexual exploitation. It requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved following the implementation of the MASSN's awareness-raising activities.

Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's indications that victims of trafficking in Burkina Faso are put up in transit centres, where boys are separated from girls. These victims are provided with food, medical and psychosocial care and clothing, as well as psychological support for those suffering from trauma, in accordance with the UNICEF guiding principles. The Government adds that victims of trafficking, without distinction as to nationality, benefit from reintegration measures on the basis of projects formulated with their participation with a view to facilitating their integration into the community. The repatriation of foreign victims of trafficking is not compulsory, particularly where victims are likely to be subject to reprisals in their country of origin. The Committee notes that there are now 23 transit centres and that the Government is continuing the construction and equipment of such transit centres in various regions, cities and departments of the country. The Committee notes with interest the Government's indications that, during the years 2009–11, some 2,299 child victims of internal trafficking (742 girls and 1,557 boys) and 329 child victims of trans-border trafficking (72 girls and 257 boys) were intercepted. The Committee takes due note of the measures adopted by the Government for the removal of children from sale and trafficking and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration, and it considers these measures to be a demonstration of its political will to eliminate this worst form of child labour. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to pursue its efforts and requests it to continue providing information on the time-bound measures taken for the removal of child victims of sale and trafficking and their rehabilitation and social integration, and the results achieved. It requests the Government to provide information on the number of child victims of trafficking, both internal and trans-border, who have benefited from rehabilitation and social integration measures in transit centres.

2. Project for small-scale gold mines in West Africa. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's indications that it has been undertaking, in partnership with UNICEF, the project "Child labour in artisanal mines and quarries", launched in 2009 under the coordination of a technical guidance committee chaired by the MASSN. The project activities cover 23 artisanal mines and quarries in five regions of Burkina Faso. The Committee notes that, since the inception of the project in 2009, it has led to the removal of 11,123 children (6,021 boys and 5,012 girls), who benefit from support for their rehabilitation in the education and economic systems. Accordingly, 3,062 children between the ages of 3 and 6 years benefited from pre-school care in bisongos; 6,216 children between 6 and 12 years have been registered in primary school; 897 children between 13 and 17 years of age have been placed in income-generating activities; 948 children between 15 and 17 years of age have been enrolled in vocational training in various sectors in partnership with the National Employment Agency; and 1,000 mothers of children working in mines have benefited from support for income-earning activities with a view to increasing their capacity to protect their children from the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that, with a view to guiding the project activities more effectively, it undertook a study in 2010 on child labour in gold-washing sites and artisanal quarries in five regions of the country. This study shows that around one third of the population on the 86 artisanal gold-washing sites are children, or a total of 19,881 children, of whom 51.4 per cent were boys and 48.6 per cent girls. The study also reveals the use of children at all levels in the production of minerals, work in mine galleries, dynamiting rocks, rock breaking, crushing and sieving, the sale of food and water and hauling minerals to sheds. On mine and quarry sites, it is generally children who act as intermediaries for access to illicit products (the sale of drugs) or who procure prostitutes. While noting the considerable efforts made by the Government, the Committee is bound to express concern at the number of children engaged in the worst forms of child labour in gold-washing sites and artisanal quarries in Burkina Faso. The Committee, therefore, requests the Government to intensify its efforts to remove children from the worst forms of child labour in artisanal gold mines and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration in the context of the UNICEF project “Child labour in artisanal mines and quarries” and through any other time-bound measures. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the results achieved.

Article 8. International cooperation and assistance. Regional cooperation. The Committee noted previously that the Government has signed bilateral cooperation agreements on the cross-border trafficking of children with the Republic of Mali and multilateral cooperation agreements on combating the trafficking of children in West Africa.

The Government indicates in its report that Burkina Faso generally enjoys good cooperation with countries in the region, which facilitates the processing of cross-border trafficking cases. For example, solely during the first half of 2012, cooperation with the police in Benin resulted in the interception and repatriation of nine children, all boys, and the arrest of one trafficker. Cooperation with Côte d’Ivoire led to the removal of 14 boys from trafficking and their reintegration into their families. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that the conclusion of a cooperation agreement with Côte d’Ivoire is envisaged for 2012 and that Burkina Faso is in the process of addressing a specific problem of the trafficking of young girls to Lebanon through the intervention of several ministries of justice, including that of the United States. The Committee encourages the Government to continue its efforts to reinforce international cooperation and assistance for the elimination of the trafficking of children for economic and sexual exploitation and requests it to continue providing information on the results achieved in this respect.

Parts IV and V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee noted previously that a national study on child labour had been conducted in the country and requested the Government to provide a copy of it.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that Burkina Faso conducted a National Survey of Child Labour (ENTE) in 2006 with the support of ILO/IPEC/SIMPOC. The findings of the survey were published in 2008 and are currently the most recent data on child labour. The Committee notes that, according to the ENTE, child labour affects 41.1 per cent of children between 5 and 17 years of age in Burkina Faso, or 1,658,869 child workers. The ENTE also indicates that 1,447,146 children are engaged in hazardous types of work in Burkina Faso, or 35.8 per cent of all children between the ages of 5 and 17 years. Children engaged in hazardous activities are found more in rural than in urban areas (38.5 per cent compared with 19.9 per cent), and boys are more affected than girls (41.4 per cent compared with 29.9 per cent). The sector which employs the largest number of children between the ages of 15 and 17 years in hazardous work is agriculture, fishing and hunting, in which 85.8 per cent (or 774,041 children) of the children involved in the sector are engaged in hazardous types of work. The figures are 88 per cent (219,883 children) in domestic work, 79.7 per cent (58,263 children) in commerce and repairs, 91.5 per cent (27,268 children) in mineral extraction, 84.8 per cent (20,909 children) in manufacturing, water, electricity and gas, 94.4 per cent (10,941 children) in construction and 75.8 per cent (9,909 children) in other services. Expressing concern at the situation and number of children under 18 years of age engaged in hazardous forms of work, the Committee requests the Government to intensify its efforts for the elimination of these worst forms of child labour. It requests the Government to continue providing information on any progress achieved in this respect and on the results obtained. The Committee further asks the Government to continue providing information on the nature, extent and trends of the worst forms of child labour, the number of children covered by the measures giving effect to the Convention and the number and nature of infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied. To the extent possible, the information provided should be disaggregated by age and sex.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Burundi

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Scope of application. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the indication by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that child labour constitutes a serious problem in Burundi, particularly in agriculture and informal activities in urban areas. It also noted the statement by the Government that the socio-political crisis experienced by the country had aggravated the situation of children, some of whom were obliged to perform work “illegally” to support their families, very frequently in the informal economy and in agriculture. The Committee noted that section 3 of the Labour Code, in conjunction with section 14, prohibits work by young persons under 16 years of age in public and private enterprises, including farms, where such work is carried out on behalf of and under the supervision of an employer.

In its report, the Government confirmed that the country’s regulations did not apply to the informal sector, which consequently escapes any control. Nevertheless, the question of extending the application of the labour legislation to this sector was to be discussed in a tripartite context on the occasion of the revision of the Labour Code and its implementing texts. The Committee reminded the Government that the Convention applies to all sectors of economic activity and covers all forms of employment and work, whether or not there is a contractual employment relationship, including own-account work. It once again expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to extend the scope of application of the Convention to work performed outside an employment relationship, particularly in the informal economy and in agriculture. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee previously noted the ITUC's indications that the war had weakened the education system due to the destruction of many schools and the death or abduction of a large number of teachers. According to the ITUC, the school attendance rate is lower and the illiteracy rate higher for girls. The Committee further noted that, according to a report of the International Bureau of Education (UNESCO) of 2004 relating to data on education, Legislative Decree No. 1/025 of 13 July 1989 reorganizing education in Burundi does not provide for free and compulsory primary education. Entry into primary education is around the age of 7 or 8 years and lasts six years. Children therefore complete primary education around the age of 13 or 14 years and then have to pass a competition to enter secondary education. The Committee further noted that in 1996 the Government had prepared a Global Plan of Action for Education designed to improve the education system, among other measures, by reducing inequalities and disparities in access to education and achieving a gross school attendance rate of 100 per cent by the year 2010.

The Committee duly noted the information provided by the Government in its report with regard to the various measures adopted in the field of education. It noted that, under article 53(2) of the Constitution of 2005, the State is under the obligation to organize public education and promote access to such education. It further noted that basic education is free of charge and that the number of children attending school tripled during the 2006 school year. In 2007, primary schools would be constructed and other mobile and temporary schools would be established. Furthermore, coordination units for girls' education had been established and over 1,000 teachers recruited. The Committee once again encourages the Government to pursue its efforts in the field of education and to provide information on the impact of the above measures in terms of increasing the school attendance rate and reducing the drop-out rate, with special attention to the situation of girls. It also requests the Government to indicate the age of completion of compulsory schooling and the provisions of the national legislation which determine this age.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Chad

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under section 14 of Ordinance No. 01/PCE/CEDNACVG of 16 January 1991 reorganizing the armed forces of Chad [Ordinance No. 1 of 16 January 1991], the age of recruitment is 18 years for volunteers and 20 years for conscripts.

The Committee noted that, according to the report of the United Nations Secretary-General of 7 August 2008 on children and armed conflict in Chad (S/2008/532, for the period July 2007–June 2008), the political, military and security situation in the country remains highly volatile, owing to the continuation of armed conflict between the Chad armed forces and armed rebel groups, the presence in eastern Chad of foreign rebel groups, cross-border raids by the Janjaweed militia and continuing inter-ethnic tensions. The Committee noted that, according to the Secretary-General's report, the Government of Chad and the three main rebel groups, namely the Union des forces pour la démocratie et le développement (UFDD), the Rassemblement des forces pour le changement (RFC) and the Concorde nationale tchadienne (CNT), signed a peace agreement on 25 October 2007 which provided for an immediate ceasefire. However, despite the signature of this agreement, fighting has continued and all the parties concerned have continued to recruit and use children in the conflict.

The Committee noted that the Secretary-General's report showed that the forced recruitment and use of child soldiers in the conflict in Chad is related to the regional dimension of the conflict. The Toroboro or Sudanese armed groups allied with the Government of Chad are recruiting children from two refugee camps, at Tréguine and Bredjing, during the rainy season. Furthermore, heavy recruitment also occurs on the basis of needs in Darfur. The Sudanese rebel movement Justice and Equality Movement (JEM) continues to recruit in and around refugee camps, notably Oure Cassoni (Bahai). According to information in the Secretary-General's report, between 7,000 and 10,000 children are associated with the armed forces and armed groups. The Committee noted that the Working Group on Children and Armed Conflict, in its conclusions of December 2008 (S/AC.51/2008/15), expressed grave concern that all parties to the conflict continue to recruit and use children and called for measures to be taken to prosecute the perpetrators and put an end to impunity.

The Committee noted that the situation in Chad has been unstable for many years and that it remains fragile. The Committee also noted that, despite the fact that Ordinance No. 1 of 16 January 1991 provides that the age of recruitment is 18 years for volunteers and 20 years for conscripts, the recruitment of children for use in armed conflict is continuing in practice. In this regard, it noted that no penalties are laid down for violations of this prohibition. The Committee expressed deep concern at the current situation, especially as the persistence of the worst forms of child labour leads to other violations of the rights of the child, such as abduction, death and sexual violence. It reminded the Government that under Article 3(a) of the Convention, the forced or compulsory recruitment of children under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict is considered to be one of the worst forms of child labour and that, under Article 1 of the Convention, members States must take immediate and effective measures to secure the elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures as a matter of urgency to stop in practice the forced recruitment of children under 18 years of age by armed forces and groups and immediately undertake the full demobilization of all children. With reference to Security Council resolution 1612 of 26 July 2005, which recalls the "responsibilities of States to end impunity and to prosecute those responsible for genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and other egregious crimes perpetrated against children", the Committee urges the Government to take immediate steps to ensure that perpetrators are investigated and prosecuted and that penalties which are sufficiently effective and dissuasive are imposed on persons found guilty of recruiting and using children under 18 years of age in armed conflict. It requests the Government to supply information in this respect.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (b) and (c). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration, including access to free basic education and vocational training. Children who have been enlisted and used in armed conflict. Further to its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the report of the United Nations Secretary-General of 7 August 2008 on children and armed conflict in Chad (S/2008/532), the Government of Chad signed an agreement with UNICEF on 9 May 2007 to ensure the release and sustainable reintegration of all child soldiers associated with armed forces and groups in the country. According to the Secretary-General's report, since the agreement was signed, 512 child soldiers have been released to UNICEF, which has provided support at five transit centres. So far 265 children have voluntarily returned to or been reunited with their families, and 220 have been placed in schools and 85 in professional activities. Most of the demobilized children were associated with non-governmental armed groups. Very few children associated with the Chadian armed forces have been released. According to the Secretary-General's report, negotiations are under way for placing the demobilized children in vocational training institutions and providing them with gainful employment. Some NGOs which are partners of UNICEF are currently working on the reintegration programme. Moreover, the encouraging start of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration activities in Chad is likely to lead to the release of another estimated 2,500 children associated with armed forces and groups.

The Committee also noted that, according to the Secretary-General's report, Chad undertook to release as a matter of priority children associated with armed groups held in detention. Moreover, it decided that an inter-ministerial task force would be established to coordinate and ensure effective reintegration of children. The Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of February 2009 (CRC/C/TDC/CO/2, paragraph 71), urged the Government to take the necessary measures immediately to facilitate contact between armed groups operating in Chad and the United Nations in order to promote the demobilization of children and prevent the recruitment of children, particularly in refugee camps. In this regard, the Committee on the Rights of the Child urges the Government to extend the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme, placing particular emphasis on the demobilization and reintegration of girls.

The Committee noted the measures taken by the Government to demobilize and reintegrate child soldiers, particularly through collaboration with UNICEF. It noted, however, that the current situation in the country remains a source of concern. The Committee therefore requests the Government to intensify its efforts and continue its collaboration with UNICEF and other organizations in order to improve the situation of child victims of forced recruitment for use in armed conflict. Moreover, the Committee requests the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to ensure that child soldiers removed from armed forces and groups receive adequate assistance for their rehabilitation and social integration, including reintegration into the school system or vocational training, wherever possible and appropriate. It requests the Government to supply information in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Congo

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or similar practices. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's statement that there is child trafficking between Benin and the Congo for the purpose of forcing children to work in Pointe-Noire in trading and domestic work. According to the Government, the children are forced to work all day in harsh conditions by their host families, and are subjected to all kinds of hardships. The Committee noted that sections 345, 354 and 356 of the Penal Code lay down penalties for anyone found guilty of the forcible or fraudulent abduction of persons including young persons under 18 years of age. It requested the Government to indicate to what extent sections 345, 354 and 356 of the Penal Code have been implemented in practice. The Committee requests the Government once again to supply information on the application of sections 345, 354 and 356 of the Penal Code in practice, including, in particular, statistics on the number and nature of offences reported, investigations, prosecutions and penalties imposed.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous observations, the Committee noted the Government's statement acknowledging that the trafficking of children between Benin and the Congo for the purpose of forcing children to work in Pointe-Noire in trading and domestic work is contrary to human rights. It also noted that the Government has taken certain measures to curb child trafficking, including: (a) the repatriation by the Consulate of Benin of children who have either been picked up by the national police or removed from families; and (b) the requirement at borders (airport) for minors (young person under 18 years of age) to have administrative authorization to leave the territory of Benin. The Committee asked the Government to provide information on the impact of the measures taken with regard to the rehabilitation and social integration of children following their withdrawal from labour. It noted that the Government's report does not contain any information on this subject. The Committee requests the Government once again to supply information on the time-bound measures taken to remove young persons under 18 years of age from this worst form of child labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. It also requests the Government to supply information on the impact of these measures.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee noted that, according to the concluding observations of the Committee on the Rights of the Child on the initial report of the Congo of October 2006 (CRC/C/COG/CO/1, paragraph 85), a study of the root causes and repercussions of trafficking is due to be conducted in the country. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the results of this study and to supply a copy of it once it has been prepared.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Dominican Republic

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946 (No. 77) (ratification: 1973)

Articles 2(1) and 3(1) of the Convention. Thorough medical supervision up to the age of 18 years. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 248 of the Labour Code provides that any minor under 16 years of age wishing to carry out any kind of work must undergo a thorough medical examination. It also noted that sections 52 and 53 of Regulation No. 258-93 of 12 October 1993 issuing regulations under the Labour Code (hereinafter, Regulation No. 258-93 of 12 October 1993), provide that working minors shall be under medical supervision until they reach the age of 16 years, as envisaged in section 17 of the Labour Code. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to raise the age set out in the Labour Code and in Regulation No. 258-93 of 12 October 1993 from 16 to 18 years so that the above texts are brought in compliance with the Convention. It noted the Government's indications that preparatory work in this regard had concluded that the age established by the Labour Code should be raised and that a resolution relating to Regulation No. 258-93 of 12 October 1993 had already raised the age from 16 to 18 years.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that, on 10 August 2012, the Ministry of Labour presented for tripartite discussion to the most representative employers' and workers' organizations a proposal to amend the Labour Code. The Committee hopes that the proposal to amend the Labour Code to be adopted will ensure that the Labour Code and Regulation No. 258-93 of 12 October 1993 are brought into conformity with the Convention and raise from 16 to at least 18 years the age established for thorough medical supervision. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard. Noting the absence of information on this point in the Government's report, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the resolution which is reported to have already raised the age established for thorough medical supervision from 16 to 18 years.

Article 4(1). Medical examinations and re-examinations for fitness for employment until at least the age of 21 years. The Committee noted previously that, under the terms of section 53 of Regulation No. 258-93 of 12 October 1993, the medical examination only applies to those under 16 years of age and has to be renewed annually or every three months where the work involves high risks for the health of the young person. The Committee recalled that, by virtue of Article 4(1) of the Convention, in occupations which involve high health risks for children or young persons, the medical examination and re-examination for fitness for employment shall be required until at least the age of 21 years. The Committee hopes that the proposal to amend the Labour Code, referred to above, will soon be adopted so as to bring legislation in compliance with the Convention on this point and requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 4(2). Specification of the occupations in which a medical examination for fitness for employment shall be required until at least the age of 21 years. The Committee notes the Government's indications that resolution No. 52/2004 establishes a detailed list of hazardous and unhealthy types of work prohibited for children under 18 years of age. However, the resolution does not specify the occupations or categories of occupations in which a medical examination for fitness for employment shall be required until at least the age of 21 years, or empowers an appropriate authority to specify such occupations. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the process of amending the Labour Code referred to above takes into account this matter in order to bring legislation in compliance with the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Gabon

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

Article 3(a) of the Convention and Part III of the report form. Sale and trafficking of children and court decisions. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the information contained in a 2006 UNICEF report entitled "Trafficking in human beings, in particular women and children, in West and Central Africa", a number of children, particularly girls, are victims of internal and cross-border trafficking, for the purposes of work as domestic servants or in the country's markets. Children from Benin, Burkina Faso, Cameroon, Guinea, Niger, Nigeria and Togo are victims of trafficking to Gabon. The Committee noted that the Government had brought the national legislation relating to the sale and trafficking of children into line with the Convention. However, it observed that, according to the report of the UNICEF West and Central Africa Regional Office submitted to the United Nations Economic and Social Council during its second regular session in September 2010 (E/ICEF/2010/P/L.17, paragraph 21), even though policies and laws existed to protect children against trafficking and several structures had an operational mandate in this area, legislation was not regularly enforced and coordination was weak, and for this reason trafficking was a major threat to children in the country. It also noted that 11 court cases were in progress, most of which had been referred to the Office of the Public Prosecutor.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that decisions on the 11 court cases have not yet been handed down. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that a police operation was undertaken from 6 to 15 December 2010 with the collaboration of Interpol, during which over 38 presumed traffickers were arrested. The police forces also arrested two men of foreign nationality who were presumed to have engaged in trafficking in children. In January 2012, a woman of foreign nationality was arrested for the ill-treatment and forced labour of six children. The Government adds that prosecutions have been initiated in relation to all of these arrests.

The Committee notes that the United Nations Special Rapporteur on trafficking in persons visited Gabon in May 2012. The Committee notes the preliminary conclusions of the mission of the Special Rapporteur, in which she observes that it is alarming that up to now no case relating to trafficking has been judged by the criminal courts, which contributes to the impunity enjoyed by traffickers who engage in illicit and clandestine operations. The Special Rapporteur therefore recommends that the performance of the courts needs to be improved to ensure the rapid examination of cases of trafficking through regular sittings of the criminal court. The Committee expresses concern at the fact that the prosecutions of those who are presumed to be responsible for trafficking in children in Gabon do not appear to be dealt with by the national courts in good time. The Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the in-depth investigation and robust prosecution of persons who engage in the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years of age, in accordance with the national legislation in force and to ensure the speedy determination of trafficking cases in the courts. In this respect, it once again requests the Government to provide specific information with its next report on the application of the provisions relating to this worst form of child labour, including statistics on the number of convictions and penalties imposed, as well as copies of the court decisions relating to the cases referred to the Office of the Public Prosecutor.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. 1. Council to Prevent and Combat the Trafficking of Children. In its previous comments, the Committee once again requested the Government to provide information on the operation of the Council and the watchdog committees entrusted with preventing and combating trafficking in children.

The Committee notes the Government's indications that the Council to Prevent and Combat the Trafficking of Children is an administrative authority under the responsibility of the Ministry of Human Rights. In practice, the monitoring of the phenomenon of trafficking is ensured by a Monitoring Committee and watchdog committees. The Monitoring Committee is the national focal point to combat trafficking in children and is competent to assist the Council in its functions and for the implementation of its decisions. At the national level, the Monitoring Committee is entrusted with coordinating the formulation and implementation of the national strategy to combat trafficking in children. At the international level, the responsibilities of the Monitoring Committee include the establishment of bilateral cooperation and judicial assistance mechanisms for the protection of child victims of trans-border trafficking. The watchdog committees, which were created in 2004 in the context of the ILO/IPEC/LUTRENA project, are responsible for monitoring and combating trafficking in children for their exploitation within the country. The Monitoring Committee is the body responsible for planning and coordinating the activities of the watchdog committees in the seven provinces where they are currently operational. The watchdog committees are composed of two bodies, namely: (1) the intervention unit, which is responsible for detecting and repressing trafficking in children; and (2) the support unit, which provides aid and assistance to child victims of trafficking. The Government adds that, in the context of the "Bana" operation in December 2010, around 20 children were identified and removed from trafficking as a result of the action of the watchdog committees.

The Committee takes due note of the structures that exist to combat trafficking in children. However, it notes that, in her preliminary conclusions on her mission to Gabon, the Special Rapporteur on trafficking in persons observes that the coordination of action against trafficking remains weak, particularly among public institutions and between the central administration and local communities. The Committee, therefore, requests the Government to intensify its efforts to strengthen the capacity of the watchdog committees and their coordination with the Council to Prevent and Combat the Trafficking of Children and the Monitoring Committee, so as to ensure the application of the national legislation against trafficking in children for sexual or economic exploitation. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this respect. It also asks the Government to continue providing information on the number of child victims of trafficking identified and protected by the watchdog committees.

2. Labour inspection. The Committee noted previously that, under Decree No. 007141/PR/MTE/MEFBP of 22 September 2005, the labour inspector may immediately draw up a notification of any violations relating to the trafficking of children. It noted that the Conference Committee on the Applications of Standards, in its conclusions in June 2007, asked the Government to strengthen the authority of the labour inspection services to enforce the law and to increase their human and financial resources. The Committee on the Application of Standards further asked the Government to ensure that regular inspections are carried out by the labour inspectorate. In this respect, the Committee noted that, under section 178 of the Labour Code, as amended by Ordinance No. 018/PR/2010 of 25 February 2010, labour inspectors are required to report any evidence of the exploitation of children for the purposes of labour. Noting the absence of information on this point in the Government's report, the Committee once again requests it to provide statistics on the number of violations reported by the labour inspectorate involving children under 18 years of age engaged in any of the worst forms of child labour, particularly in the informal sector. It also requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to strengthen the capacity of the labour inspectorate in order to ensure that regular inspections are carried out.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Removing children from the worst forms of child labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Reception centres and medical and social assistance for child victims of trafficking. The Committee previously noted that the country has four reception centres, three in Libreville and one in Port-Gentil. Children removed from a situation of exploitation are given an initial medical examination a few days after their placement in a centre. Children who are ill are taken care of by doctors and, if necessary, are hospitalized. In addition, with a view to their rehabilitation and social integration, children are supervised by specialist teachers and psychologists and benefit from social and educational activity programmes and administrative and legal support in association with the Monitoring Committee and the watchdog committees. The Committee also noted that children removed from trafficking are, during their stay in the centres, enrolled free of charge, according to their age, in state schools in which they enjoy the same advantages as other children. Those who are no longer of school age are enrolled in literacy centres.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government concerning the “National manual of procedures for the care of child victims of trafficking”, which sets out a series of procedures and duties required of all actors called upon to play a role in the return of child victims of trafficking to their country of origin or their social integration. The Government indicates that in 2011 the Monitoring Committee trained social workers with a view to providing them with sound knowledge of the rules contained in the manual on the identification and removal of victims of trafficking, and on their administrative and psycho-social care. The Government adds that the administrative authorities have identified around ten victims, who have received care in reception centres, and that ten children (one boy and nine girls) have been repatriated with the collaboration of their countries of origin. However, the Committee notes that, according to the Special Rapporteur on trafficking in persons, although the Government offers victims of trafficking access to reception centres, there is a discrepancy between those who need assistance and those who actually receive it in public reception centres, which only take in children under the age of 12 years. The Committee, therefore, firmly encourages the Government to continue taking immediate and effective measures for the removal of child victims of sale and trafficking, and requests it once again to provide information on the number of children under 18 years of age who have in practice been removed from this worst form of child labour and placed in reception centres.

Article 8. International cooperation. The Committee emphasized previously that, during the discussion which took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2007, the Government representative indicated that consideration was being given to the possibility of taking steps to increase the number of police officers at land, maritime and aerial borders, using joint border patrols and opening transit centres at these borders. It noted that the Government had signed the Multilateral Regional Cooperation Agreement against the Trafficking of Children in West and Central Africa in July 2006 (the 2006 Regional Cooperation Agreement), and that a bilateral agreement relating to trafficking in children was being negotiated with Benin. The Committee requested the Government to continue providing information on the measures taken to give effect to the 2006 Regional Cooperation Agreement and expressed the hope that the bilateral agreement on trafficking in children with Benin would be concluded in the near future.

The Committee notes the absence of information on this point in the Government’s report. However, it observes that, although the Special Rapporteur on trafficking in persons, in her preliminary conclusions, welcomes the Government’s intention to sign bilateral agreements on trafficking in persons with several neighbouring countries, the conclusion of memoranda of understanding has not yet taken place in practice. The Special Rapporteur observes that, with a maritime border of over 800 kilometres and a porous frontier with three countries, Gabon is in need of sound cooperation with its neighbours to combat the phenomenon of trafficking. The Committee, therefore, firmly encourages the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure that bilateral agreements on trafficking in persons, with Benin and other neighbouring countries, are concluded in the very near future, particularly with a view to strengthening the numbers of border police. It requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the progress achieved in this respect.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the lack of recent statistics on trafficking in children in the country was emphasized in the discussion in the Committee on the Application of Standards in 2007. In this respect, the Government representative indicated that the Government would carry out an analysis of the national situation concerning trafficking in children in Gabon and a mapping of trafficking routes and areas in which forced labour involving children was practiced would be carried out as soon as the necessary resources allowed.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that it will present the study on the situation of trafficking in children as soon as it has been conducted. It also notes the Government’s indications that Decree No. 0191/PR/MFAS establishing a Child Protection Indicators Matrix (MIPE) was adopted on 22 May 2012, with a view to creating a guidance tool for measures intended to help the Government to follow trends in the problems related to the rights of the child. This tool, which is one of the means used by the National Observatory of the Rights of the Child (ONDE), established by Decree No. 0252/PR/MFAS of 19 June 2012 organizing the social assistance and family protection implementation scheme, is intended to ensure the availability on a permanent basis in Gabon a database of precise statistics on child protection.

However, the Committee notes the remark by the Special Rapporteur on trafficking in persons, in her preliminary conclusions, that she had noted in Gabon the absence of a corpus of reliable national data for the determination of the prevalence rate, forms, trends and manifestations of trafficking in persons.

Observing that the Government has been referring to the study on the situation of trafficking in children in Gabon for several years, the Committee urges it to take the necessary measures to ensure that the study on the situation of trafficking in children in Gabon is undertaken in the very near future, and requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the progress achieved in this respect. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the activities of the ONDE and on the statistics gathered by the ONDE through the MIPE on children under 18 years of age engaged in the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Georgia

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1996)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the comments of the Georgian Trade Unions Confederation (GTUC) dated 21 September 2012.

Article 2(1) and (3) of the Convention and Part V of the report form. Minimum age for admission to employment, compulsory education and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the comments made by the GTUC that according to UNICEF estimates, 30 per cent of children between the ages of 5–15 years worked in Georgia and that there were reports of children between the ages of 7–12 years working on the streets of Tbilisi, in markets, carrying or loading wares, selling goods in underground carriages, railway stations, etc. Moreover, based on the information provided by the Trade Union of Agricultural Workers, the GTUC alleged that child labour is widespread in the agricultural sector at harvest time in several regions of Georgia.

The Committee had noted the Government's statement that allegations by the GTUC were based on unverified sources and that UNICEF was planning to conduct a study on street children which would help to assess the actual situation of child labour in the country. It had noted that the child labour estimates of the Multiple Indicator Cluster Survey (MICS), UNICEF 2005, indicated an important drop in the percentage of children involved in labour, from 30 per cent in 1999 to 18 per cent in 2005. The Committee had further noted the Government's information that education was one of its priorities and that it had taken a number of steps to strengthen the educational system and the school attendance of children, through increasing expenditure on general education and renovating more than 300 public schools under the "Public Schools Rehabilitation Programme". The Committee noted that as per the UNICEF statistics on education, in Georgia, the gross primary school enrolment rate in 2008 was 100 per cent for males and 98 per cent for females. The Committee had requested the Government to provide recent statistical information on the employment of children and young persons, in particular children working in the streets and in the agricultural sector.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that Georgia has a strong tradition of education with almost universal primary school enrolment rates across the country. Hence the possibility of children being involved in child labour is very low. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that in order to ensure the well-being of street children, an inter-agency commission was created which elaborated a new strategy to protect street children. Furthermore, the Government has implemented a voucher system for street children, enabling them to receive financial support. The Committee notes that according to the UNICEF report entitled "Georgia and the Convention on the Rights of the Child, 2011", the primary net attendance ratio for 2010 was 93 per cent which indicates that 20,000 primary school-aged children were not enrolled in school while the net attendance ratio at the secondary level was 86 per cent. The Committee further notes that according to the UNICEF study report on street children of 2009, there was an average of 1,049 street children in the four cities of Tbilisi, Kutaisi, Rustavi and Batumi where the study was conducted, of which 66 per cent was children between the ages of 5–14 years. The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts in the field of education by taking measures to enable children to attend and complete compulsory education and to ensure free basic education to all children, particularly street children. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and the results achieved.

Article 2(1). Scope of application. The Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that self-employment was not regulated by the legislation of Georgia. It had also noted that section 4(2) of the Labour Code permits the employment of children below 16 years, on the condition that such work is not against their interests, does not damage their moral, physical or mental development or limit their right and ability to obtain elementary, compulsory and basic education, and upon the consent from their legal representative, tutor or guardian.

The Committee had noted the comments made by the GTUC that the Labour Code applied only to hired labourers. As such, children working on family farms or in the agricultural sector are not afforded the protection guaranteed under the Convention. Furthermore, with the abolition of the labour inspectorate by the Labour Code of 2006, there exists no public authority to observe the implementation of labour legislation, including child labour provisions.

In this context, the Committee had noted the Government's reference to Article 5(3) of the Convention which provides for the possibility of limiting the scope of application of the Convention to certain branches of economic activity, "excluding family and small-scale holdings producing for local consumption and not regularly employing hired workers". The Government had further stated that children's work in the agricultural sector is not hired work and therefore their activities cannot be considered as incompatible with the Convention, as it is excluded under Article 5(3) of the Convention. Observing that at the time of ratification, Georgia did not avail itself of this provision and therefore the provisions of the Convention apply to all branches of economic activity, including family undertakings and small-scale holdings, and cover all types of employment, whether hired or self-employed, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that children working in the agricultural sector, whether paid or unpaid, as well as those working on their own account, are entitled to the protection afforded by the Convention.

The Committee notes the comments made by the GTUC that according to the data of the Department of Statistics, the number of self-employed minors is much higher than that of those employed in the formal sector. The GTUC further states that child labour is widespread in various regions of Georgia during the crop period in the agriculture sector.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that in order to enhance the rights of a child, the Government is currently exploring the possibility to more precisely address the minimum age provisions as well as restrictions on working hours of children in Georgia's labour laws. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government, in its attempt to address more precisely the minimum age provisions under the Labour Code, will take the necessary measures to ensure the application of the Convention to all branches of economic activity, including family undertakings and small-scale holdings and cover all types of employment, whether hired or self-employed, in order to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 7(1) and (3). Light work and determination of light work. The Committee had previously noted the comments by the GTUC that the hours of work of young workers are not limited. It had noted that as per section 14 of the Labour Code, if parties do not agree otherwise, a working week shall not exceed 41 hours, which is also applicable to young workers. The Committee also noted the comments made by the GTUC that the regulation on the work of young persons under the Labour Code does not guarantee sufficient protection to minors in employment relations. The GTUC further added that it is important to restrict the working hours of young persons and to also include provisions for rest periods, breaks and holidays.

The Committee had noted that section 18 of the Labour Code which prohibits night work (10 p.m. to 6 a.m.) by young persons if read in conjunction with section 4(2) which lays down the condition that work by children below 16 years of age shall not limit their right and ability to obtain elementary, compulsory and basic education, implies that children may work for about eight hours per day, excluding school hours and night work. In this context, the Committee drew the Government's attention to Paragraph 13(1)(b) of the Minimum Age Recommendation, 1973 (No. 146), that in giving effect to Article 7(3) of the Convention, special attention should be given to the strict limitation of the hours spent at work in a day and in a week, and the prohibition of overtime, so as to allow enough time for education and training (including the time needed for homework related thereto) for rest during the day and for leisure activities. Noting that the Labour Code allows children between 14 and 16 years to perform light work under the conditions specified under section 4(2) of the Labour Code, the Committee had urged the Government to take the necessary measures to determine light work activities permitted for children between 14 and 16 years of age and to prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, light work may be undertaken by such persons.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that it is attempting to review the Labour Code for further enhancement of the provisions regarding restrictions on working hours of children. The Committee expresses its concern that the national legislation allows children between the ages of 14 and 16 years to work for eight hours a day. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures in the near future to determine the light work activities that may be undertaken by children of 14 years and above and the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such work may be undertaken.

Article 8. Artistic performances. The Committee had previously noted the information contained in the Government's report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC/C/41/Add.4, 1997, paragraph 13) that, under certain conditions, children under 15 years of age may be engaged in artistic activities, such as the circus or the cinema. It had also noted the Government's statement that the working conditions of young persons in all spheres, including artistic performances, were well protected under the Labour Code and therefore no separate method of issuance of permits for artistic performances had been set up. The Committee had noted the provisions under section 4(3) of the Labour Code which states that a labour contract can be concluded with a child below 14 years only for work related to sport, art, cultural and advertising activities. Observing that there were no provisions under the Labour Code which limit the number of working hours or set maximum working hours or conditions for employment of young persons who participate in artistic performances, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that approval for young persons below 15 years of age to take part in artistic activities is granted in individual cases, and that permits so granted shall prescribe the number and hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work is allowed.

The Committee notes the Government's reference to section 4(2) of the Labour Code which states that the labour capacity of a child below 16 years shall be concluded only with the consent of his/her legal representative, tutor or guardian, if it is not against his/her interests, does not damage his/her moral, physical or mental development and does not limit his/her right and ability to obtain elementary, compulsory and basic education. It further notes the Government's statement that accordingly, the activities in which employment or work may be permitted for an under-age person and the number of hours of such work may be defined as per the consent of the child's legal representative, tutor or guardian. The Committee once again recalls that Article 8 of the Convention allows exceptions to the specified minimum age of admission to employment or work for such purposes as artistic performances only by permits granted in individual cases by the competent authority and not just with the consent of the parent or legal guardian and that such permits so granted shall limit the number of hours during which, and prescribe the conditions in which, such employment or work is allowed. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate whether the labour contracts or certificates of consent concluded under section 4(2) and (3) of the Labour Code which allow children below the minimum age (15 years) to participate in sport, art, cultural and advertising activities and which lay down the conditions and the number of hours during which such activities may be undertaken, are granted by the competent authority. It also requests the Government to provide a copy of such labour contracts or certificates along with its next report.

Article 9(1) and Part III of the report form. Penalties and labour inspection. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the Government's statement that the labour inspectorate stands abolished according to the Labour Code of 2006. It had noted the comments made by the GTUC that with the abolition of the labour inspectorate, there exists no public authority to observe the implementation of labour legislation, including child labour provisions.

The Committee had noted the Government's indication that the police are responsible for the monitoring of infringements related to child labour. While noting that the Government's report contained information on the activities of the police with regard to crime prevention, child abuse and the protection of minors with unusual social behaviour, the Committee observed that these did not relate to infringements of the Labour Code related to child labour. It had observed with concern that there existed no public authority to monitor the implementation of the child labour-related provisions in the country and therefore urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective monitoring and implementation of the provisions giving effect to the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the competencies of the Patrol Police Department and district police units are divided according to regions/districts of Georgia. It notes the Government's information that the district police inspectors who keep information about minors within the area of their coverage, visit families of minors to make them aware of their rights. Furthermore, the district police inspectors also conduct classes for school teachers on children's rights and their infringement. The Government further states that the Ministry of Education and Science (MoES) is responsible for monitoring the security of school children and also to provide legal consultations to teachers, parents and children. The Committee also notes the Government's information that the Department of Social Protection within the Ministry of Labour, Health and Social Assistance (MOLHSA) focuses on policy recommendations related to rights of children, including child labour. Furthermore, the Social Issues and Programmes Division within this department receives and forwards complaints of child labour violations to the Social Service Agency within MOLHSA and law enforcement agencies for further investigations. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of violations detected by the district police inspectors as well as the number of complaints received by the Social Issues and Programmes Division related to child labour.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Greece

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1986)

The Committee notes the Government's report and its communication of 16 May 2011, as well as the communication of the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE) dated 28 July 2011.

Article 3(3) of the Convention. Authorization to carry out hazardous work from the age of 16 years. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 7(5) of Presidential Decree No. 62/1998 provides that certain exceptions regarding the authorization to carry out hazardous work of "adolescents" may be made. The Committee noted that section 2(c) of Presidential Decree No. 62/1998 seems to define an "adolescent" as a young person of at least 15 years of age who has ceased to attend compulsory school in accordance with the relevant provisions. The Committee reminded the Government that, according to Article 3(3) of the Convention, national laws or regulations or the competent authority may authorize employment or work as from the age of 16 years on condition that the health, safety and morals of the young persons concerned are fully protected and that the young persons have received adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the employment of adolescents in dangerous work, as provided for by section 7(5) of Presidential Decree No. 62/1998, may only be permitted under certain conditions, such as the performance of these tasks under the supervision of the safety technician and/or labour physician or the Protection and Prevention Services in order to ensure the protection of these adolescents' health and safety. However, the Committee notes once again with concern that Presidential Decree No. 62/1998 continues to permit the performance of hazardous work by persons as of the age of 15 years, pursuant to sections 2(c) and 7(5). The Committee therefore once again strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to bring its national legislation into conformity with Article 3(3) of the Convention by providing that no person under 16 years of age may be authorized to perform hazardous work under any circumstance. In this regard, it once again urges the Government to take measures to ensure that section 2(c) of Presidential Decree No. 62/1998 is amended to define a "young person" as a person of at least 16 years of age.

Article 6. Apprenticeship and conditions of employment. The Committee previously noted that the Greek Parliament adopted, on 5 May 2010, Act No. 3845/2010 (FEK A'65/6-5-2010) on "Measures to implement a mechanism to support the Greek economy by the Member States of the Euro area and the International Monetary Fund". The Committee also noted the adoption of Act No. 3863/2010 on the "New social security system and relevant provisions" (FEK A'115) which is aimed at implementing the time-bound commitments made in the two memoranda with regard to structural policies on strengthening labour markets. The Committee noted the statement in the previous communication of the GSEE that Act No. 3845/2010 includes provisions that directly exclude (or serve as a legal authorization for the introduction of further exclusions) groups of workers, including young workers, from the scope of the National General Collective Labour Agreement, and from the generally binding provisions on minimum wages and conditions of work. The GSEE further alleged that, pursuant to Act No. 3863/2010, minor workers of 15 to 18 years of age will be employed under contracts of "apprenticeship" with extended probationary periods and will receive 70 per cent of the minimum wage established in the national collective agreement. According to the GSEE, these young workers will be excluded from the protective provisions of labour legislation on permissible working hours, the start and end of the working day taking into account course schedules, obligatory periods of rest, obligatory paid annual leave, time off for attending school, studying and sick leave (pursuant to section 74(8) and (9) of Act No. 3863/2010). The GSEE stated that the deregulation of the existing minimum protective legislative framework, in addition to the absence of adequate guarantees and deficient inspection mechanisms, will have multiple harmful side effects for young workers. In this regard, the Committee drew the Government's attention to Part IV, Paragraphs 12 and 13 of the Minimum Age Recommendation, 1973 (No. 146). Paragraph 12 states that measures should be taken to ensure that the conditions in which children and young persons under the age of 18 years are employed or work reach and are maintained at a satisfactory standard. Paragraph 13 states that in connection with Paragraph 12 "special attention should be given to: (a) the provision of fair remuneration and its protection, bearing in mind the principle of equal pay for equal work ...; and (e) coverage by social security schemes, including employment injury, medical care and sickness benefit schemes, whatever the conditions of employment or work may be". The Committee requested the Government to provide information in its next report on measures taken or envisaged to ensure that the conditions of work for young persons under the age of 18 are maintained at a satisfactory standard and that adequate safeguards are adopted to protect them from hazardous work, taking into account Greece's ratification of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182).

The Committee notes the Government's information, in its communication of 16 May 2011, concerning the conditions of apprenticeship contracts. According to section 74(9) of Act No. 3863/2010, employers are given an incentive to conclude special apprenticeship contracts of up to one year's duration with young persons aged between 15 and 18 years, in order for them to acquire skills and professional experience and ease their entry into the labour market. Apprenticeships are paid at a rate of 70 per cent of the minimum wage provided for by the National General Collective Labour Agreement. The period of apprenticeship for persons aged over 16 years cannot exceed eight hours per day and 40 hours per week, while those who are under 16 years of age cannot work for more than six hours per day and 30 hours per week. Moreover, the apprenticeship cannot take place between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that, in accordance with Cabinet Decree No. 6 of 28 February 2012 on the "Regulation of issues concerning the application of article 1(6) of Act No. 4046/2012", the statutory minimum wages and salaries for young persons aged below 25 years have been reduced by 32 per cent, and section 74(9) of Act No. 3863/2010 has been amended only with regard to the remuneration of apprentices, which now amounts to 68 per cent of the minimum wage and salary thresholds, but retains all other requirements and conditions of employment.

The Committee notes the allegation of the GSEE according to which new provisions allow the employment of young workers of 18 to 25 years of age under apprenticeship contracts of prolonged duration – 24 months – while excluding young workers from the scope of minimum wage standards.

However, the Committee once again recalls that Paragraph 12 of the Minimum Age Recommendation, 1973 (No. 146), provides that measures should be taken to ensure that the conditions in which children and young persons under the age of 18 years are employed or work reach and are maintained at a satisfactory standard. Moreover, the Committee recalls that, by virtue of Article 6 of the Convention, apprenticeships may be permitted for persons of at least 14 years of age in undertakings, where such work is carried out in accordance with conditions prescribed by the competent authority, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned. In this regard, the Committee observes that children under 18 years of age performing apprenticeships may not do so at night and may not perform overtime. Moreover, the Committee observes that children appear to always be under the supervision of the professionals who train them. The Committee therefore observes that there appear to be adequate safeguards to protect apprentices under the age of 18 years from hazardous work.

With regard to the issue of the provision of fair remuneration and its protection, the Committee refers to its comments made under the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. Labour inspection. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's information that in 2010 the labour inspectorate recorded three complaints of illegal employment of under-age persons and imposed four fines, while in 2011 it recorded two complaints of illegal employment of under-age persons and imposed 21 fines. The Government further indicates that 1,462 young persons (between the ages of 15–18) were permitted to work in 2009, pursuant to Act No. 3850/2010 on the ratification of the code of laws on workers' health and safety, and 874 such young persons in 2011. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied, including, for example, statistical data on the employment of children and young persons, extracts from the reports of inspection services and information on the number and nature of violations detected and penalties applied involving children and young persons.

Guatemala

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1990)

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the statistics on child labour in Guatemala and expressed concern at the number and situation of children under 14 years of age who work. It noted the development by the Government, in collaboration with ILO–IPEC, of a “roadmap” to ensure that Guatemala is a country free from child labour and its worst forms, as well as the results of the programme Mi Familia Progresá. It also observed that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 25 October 2010, regretted that the implementation of the various initiatives to address violations of children’s rights was insufficient and suffered from a lack of adequate evaluation due to institutional weaknesses and the inadequate allocation of resources (CRC/C/GTM/CO/3-4, paragraph 19). In these circumstances, the Committee urged the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour, including through strengthening the labour inspectorate.

The Committee notes the extracts from the reports of the inspection services and information on the number and nature of the violations reported for 2011. It observes that the labour inspection services identified two children under 14 years of age engaged in work.

The Committee notes from the Government’s report on the application of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that the Government has developed a plan of action which puts forward detailed measures to implement the “roadmap” to ensure that Guatemala is a country free from child labour and its worst forms. The Committee notes, on the basis of the report of June 2012 on the ILO–IPEC project entitled “Eliminating child labour in Latin America (Phase IV)”, that the Ministry of Labour in collaboration with ILO–IPEC is developing a monitoring and evaluation system to measure the results and impact of the implementation of the roadmap. The Committee likewise notes from the information provided by the Government on the application of Convention No. 182, that in 2011 the Government’s National Commission for the Eradication of Child Labour (CONAPETI) established inter-agency committees for the eradication of child labour in the 22 departments of the country, which aim to prevent, identify and reduce child labour at the local level. It notes the plan for the institutional strengthening of these inter-agency committees, which provides for a detailed strategy, planned activities, and indicators for measuring results.

However, the Committee notes the statistics of the Understanding Children’s Work project, based on the 2011 results of the National Study of Living Conditions in Guatemala (ENCOVI), according to which 13.4 per cent of children between 7 and 14 years of age are engaged in economic activity (8.4 per cent of girls and 18 per cent of boys in this age group). Of these children, 39.4 per cent are exclusively working, whereas 17.3 per cent are working and attending school. The agricultural sector is the branch of economic activity with the most child workers (68.3 per cent), followed by services (18.3 per cent) and manufacturing (12 per cent). The 2010 UNICEF statistics indicate that 21 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 14 are working.

While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee expresses concern at the large number of children who work and who are below the minimum age for admission to employment or work, and again urges the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour. It requests the Government to take practical measures to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate in its action to prevent and combat child labour, taking into account its important role for the purpose of monitoring the implementation of the minimum age for employment. In this regard, the Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved in the context of the implementation of the roadmap to ensure that Guatemala is a country free from child labour and its worst forms. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, based in particular on statistics on the employment of children under 14 years of age, extracts from the reports of the inspection services and information on the number and nature of the violations reported and the sanctions imposed.

Article 3(1). Minimum age for admission to hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 148(a) of the Labour Code prohibits work by minors in unhealthy and dangerous workplaces. However, it observed that the Labour Code does not define the term “minor” and that it is therefore impossible to determine the minimum age from which a minor may be admitted to perform hazardous work. In this respect, it noted that section 4 of the draft reform of the Labour Code (Initiative No. 4205) envisaged the revision of section 148(a) so as to prohibit the engagement of young persons under 18 years of age in various types of hazardous work. The Committee also noted that section 32 of Government Agreement No. 112-2006 of 7 March 2005 issuing Regulations on the protection of children and young persons at work prohibits work by children and young persons under 18 years of age in various types of hazardous work.

The Committee notes Government Agreement 250-2006 regulating the application of ILO Convention No. 182, which in section 7 provides a detailed list of the types of hazardous work prohibited for children under 18 years of age. The Committee also notes the official statement by the labour inspectorate, which while recalling ILO Convention No. 138 and section 148 of the Labour Code, declares the prohibition of any employment or work which is likely to jeopardize the health, safety and morals of persons under 18 years of age, and contains a detailed list of types of employment which, due to their nature or condition, are considered hazardous for minors. Yet, the Committee notes that the Government's report contains no information about the draft reform of the Labour Code.

In order to ensure that the law is unambiguous on this point, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to harmonize the provisions of the Labour Code with Agreement No. 112-2006, Agreement No. 250-2006 and the declaration of the labour inspectorate. To this end, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the draft reform of the Labour Code will be adopted in the very near future so that the national legislation is in conformity with the Convention on this point. It again requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this regard.

Article 6. Apprenticeship. Age of admission to apprenticeship. The Committee noted previously that section 171 of the Labour Code does not establish a minimum age for admission to apprenticeship. It also noted that, by virtue of section 150 of the Labour Code, the General Labour Inspectorate can issue a written authorization allowing daily work by minors under 14 years of age. This authorization must state that the minor will be working as an apprentice. The Committee also pointed out that a reading of section 24 of the Regulations on the protection of children and young persons at work and section 2 of Decree No. 27/2003 issuing the Act on the comprehensive protection of children and young persons suggests that the age of admission to apprenticeship is 13 years. For its part, the Government indicated that the Special Labour Inspectors Unit provides the basis for the application of Article 6 of the Convention by providing that no minor under 14 years of age may be a party to an apprenticeship contract. The Committee noted the Government's indication that the Tripartite Committee on International Labour Affairs had started a review of the national labour legislation and that the issue of the minimum age for admission to apprenticeship would be brought to its attention.

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no information relating to the reform of the national labour legislation on the issue of the age of admission to apprenticeship. The Committee therefore again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to harmonize the provisions of the national legislation with Article 6 of the Convention so as to establish a minimum age for admission to apprenticeship of 14 years. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the progress achieved in this respect in its next report.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

Articles 3(a) and 7(1) of the Convention. Sale and trafficking of children for commercial sexual exploitation and the penalties applied. The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Law against sexual violence, exploitation and trafficking in persons (Decree No. 9/2009). It noted the sanctions prescribed by the Law, as well as the statistics provided by the Government relating to the application in practice of these new provisions. The Committee observed that no sanctions appeared to have been applied for the crime of trafficking of children between 2008 and 2009 and that also the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), in its concluding observations of 25 October 2010 expressed concern at the lack of convictions for sexual exploitation since the adoption of Decree No. 9/2009, and at the tolerance of the competent authorities in relation to trafficking (CRC/C/GTM/CO/3-4, paragraph 94). The Committee expressed concern at the information bearing witness to the persistence of the problem of the trafficking of children under 18 years of age for their commercial sexual exploitation and at the allegations of the complicity between officials entrusted with the enforcement of the law and persons engaging in the trafficking of persons. In this regard, it urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions were carried out against the perpetrators and requested it to provide detailed information on the number of investigations conducted, and prosecutions and convictions applied.

The Committee notes the statistics available on the website of the National Centre for Analysis and Legal Documentation as regards the application of section 202ter and section 202 quarter of the Penal Code, as amended by Decree No. 9-2009 issuing the Act against sexual violence, exploitation and trafficking in persons. The Committee notes that 294 cases concerning trafficking in persons were brought to the attention of the judicial bodies during the period 2009–April 2012, of which 86 concerned girls and 20 concerned boys under the age of 18. 38 judgments were rendered resulting in ten convictions. Yet the information does not specify how many judgments and sentences concerned the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years of age for commercial sexual exploitation and of officials who are complicit in such acts, nor the types of sanctions applied.

The Committee notes, on the basis of the report of June 2012 on the ILO–IPEC project entitled “Eliminating Child Labour in Latin America (Phase IV),” that the Government through Agreement 1-2012 established a prosecution office specialized in trafficking in persons and that the judiciary set up specialized courts for exploitation and trafficking to ensure specialized expertise of the judges.

While noting the statistics on the application of Decree No. 9/2009, as well as the measures taken to reinforce the prosecution of trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation offences, the Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions are carried out against the perpetrators of trafficking of children under 18 years of age for commercial sexual exploitation, and of officials who are complicit in such acts. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of investigations, prosecutions, convictions and sanctions imposed against persons who engage in the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years of age for commercial sexual exploitation.

Article 3. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (d). Hazardous types of work. Production and handling of explosive materials and products. The Committee previously noted the measures adopted by the Government to combat child labour in the fireworks industry. It also noted that national legislation prohibits work by persons under 18 years of age in the manufacture, preparation and handling of explosive substances or products and the production of explosives or fireworks. It requested the Government to continue to provide information on the number of inspections carried out by the labour inspection services in firework factories, as well as the nature of the violations reported and the penalties imposed as a result of such inspections.

The Committee notes from the information provided by the Government that many factories manufacturing fireworks have disappeared, due to the stringent legislation in this regard and many factories have therefore favoured homework. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that the labour inspectorate has only managed to visit ten factories in 2011, since the population of the places where most factories manufacturing fireworks are concentrated have prevented surveillance by the labour inspectorate out of fear of becoming unemployed. In 2011, the labour inspectorate did manage to carry out 167 visits of distribution centres of fireworks. The Committee notes that a total of 16 contraventions were found and presented to the Labour Tribunal, the resolution of which is currently still pending.

Noting the Government's information that firework production has been largely moved from the factory premises to work carried out at home, the Committee urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that persons under 18 years of age are not engaged in the manufacturing, preparing and handling of explosive substances or products and the production of explosives or fireworks at home. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken and results achieved in this regard. In addition, it urges the Government to step up its efforts to carry out labour inspections in all firework factories. It requests the Government to provide information on the number of inspections carried out in this regard, as well as the nature of the violations reported and the penalties imposed as a result of such inspections.

Article 6. Programmes of action. National Plan of Action to Combat the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the National Plan of Action to Combat the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children was being revised. The Committee observed that, in the Government's reports submitted to the CRC on 23 November 2009 (CRC/C/GTM/3-4, paragraphs 255–256), the Government indicated that the National Plan of Action to Combat the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children had been adopted as official policy by the Secretariat of Social Welfare, but that the secretariat had not been able to implement the Plan and, in view of the inadequacy of the budget allocated, it was only able to implement programmes for the children of female sex workers in the area around the airport. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the programmes of action developed as part of the implementation of the National Plan.

Noting that the Government's report again does not provide information on this point, the Committee once again urges the Government to adopt immediate and effective measures to ensure the implementation of the National Plan of Action to Combat the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children. It requests the Government to provide information on this subject in its next report.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, removing them from these forms of labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Commercial sexual exploitation and trafficking for that purpose. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption in 2007 of a "Public Policy to combat the Trafficking of Persons and Ensure the Full Protection of Victims and a National Plan of Strategic Action (2007–17)", with the objectives of the immediate and full protection of victims, namely medical and psychological care and reintegration into the family and society. It also observed that the CRC, in its concluding observations of 25 October 2010 noted with concern that the competent authorities did not provide specialized or appropriate care for victims of trafficking and sexual exploitation and that the Government did not provide appropriate support to organizations working in this field (CRC/C/GTM/CO/3-4, paragraph 94). The Committee requested the Government to take time-bound measures to prevent the commercial sexual exploitation of children and provide direct assistance to children to remove them from these worst forms of child labour.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report concerning the results of the project Conrado de la Cruz carried out by the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare. Between September 2011 and January 2012 the project reached out to a total of 11,175 children to prevent their engagement in child labour; 4,575 children below the minimum age for employment (14) were reintegrated in the education system and received funding for this purpose and 417 children above 14 years old received vocational and technical education. In addition, numerous information activities have been organized to raise awareness about child labour, in particular its worst forms, existing protection measures, in particular for vulnerable children.

The Committee also notes from the Government's report on the application of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), that, in the context of the implementation of the "Public Policy to combat the Trafficking of Persons and Ensure the Full Protection of Victims and a National Plan of Strategic Action (2007–17)", the Secretariat against Sexual Violence, Exploitation and Trafficking of Persons (SVET) has been established. The SVET, which started its operations in 2011, has been created to ensure compliance with the Law against sexual violence, exploitation and trafficking in persons (Decree No. 9/2009) and to coordinate and supervise Government policies and programmes in this respect. The Committee notes that the first activities of the SVET have focused on prevention and so far 49 seminars and conferences for different Government institutions, inter alia, the Ministry of Education, the Ministry of Health and the labour inspectorate, have been carried out.

While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to take effective and time-bound measures to prevent and remove children from the worst forms of child labour, in particular from becoming victims of commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking for that purpose; and to provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance to remove the child victims from these worst forms of child labour. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged as part of the implementation of the "Public Policy to combat the Trafficking of Persons and Ensure the Full Protection of Victims and a National Plan of Strategic Action (2007–17)".

Article 8. International cooperation. Trafficking of children for commercial sexual exploitation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the CRC, in its concluding observations of July 2007 (CRC/C/OPSC/GTM/CO/1, paragraph 29), while recognizing the conclusion of memorandums of understanding with neighbouring countries of Guatemala, expressed concern at the fact that undocumented foreign children, including victims of trafficking, are subject to deportation and must leave the country within 72 hours. The Committee also noted the Government's indication that a new Inter institutional Protocol for the repatriation of victims of trafficking was adopted in December 2009. While observing that the Protocol was not yet implemented in practice, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken to implement the Protocol.

While the Government's report contains no information on the implementation of the Protocol, the Committee notes from the Government's report on the application of Convention No. 29 that one of the tasks of the SVET is to promote the conclusion and implementation of bilateral and multilateral agreements to ensure international protection of victims.

In these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of child victims removed from trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation in their country of origin in the context of the implementation of the Inter-institutional Protocol for the repatriation of victims of trafficking and the activities of the SVET.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Guinea

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2003)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. The Committee noted previously the information provided by the Government that it had taken urgent measures to bring the national legislation into conformity with the provisions of international instruments on children ratified by the country. The Committee hoped that the legislative reforms undertaken by the Government would be adopted in the very near future and requested it to provide information in this respect.

The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the Guinean Children's Code (Act No. L/2008/011/AN) of 19 August 2008.

Articles 3(a) and 4(1) and (3). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery and determination and revision of the list of types of hazardous work. Sale and trafficking of children and hazardous types of work. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction that sections 385 to 396 of the Children's Code of 2008 effectively prohibit trafficking in persons, including children, for sexual exploitation or for the exploitation of their labour. Section 386 provides that anyone who engages in or is an accomplice to trafficking in children shall be liable to a sentence of imprisonment from three to ten years and a fine from 1 to 3.5 million Guinea francs (GNF).

The Government adds that a Bill prohibiting child labour and trafficking is currently being prepared. The Committee notes the Government's indication that this new Bill includes provisions bringing the national legislation into conformity with the Convention with regard to hazardous work and that, to that effect, the list of hazardous types of work has been reviewed in relation to the various sectors. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in the preparation of the Bill prohibiting child labour and trafficking and to provide a copy once it has been adopted, including the duly revised list of hazardous types of work.

Article 3(a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction that section 429 of the Children's Code of 2008 provides that no child under 18 years of age shall participate in hostilities, directly or indirectly, or be enrolled into the armed forces or an armed group, under penalty of imprisonment from two to five years and a fine from GNF50,000 to GNF500,000.

Article 3(b) and (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances and use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs. The Committee notes with satisfaction that sections 359 and 360 of the Children's Code prohibit the production, offering, dissemination, procuring, possession and representation of any pornography involving the performance by children of explicit sexual activities, whether real or simulated, or any representation of the sexual organs of a child, under penalty of imprisonment from one to five years and a fine from GNF300,000 to GNF1 million. It also observes that section 383 of the Children's Code provides that the act of directly causing a child to transport, hold in their possession, offer or provide drugs shall be punishable by imprisonment from one to five years and a fine from GNF250,000 to GNF1 million, or one of these penalties.

Article 3(d). Hazardous types of work. Self-employed workers. The Committee noted previously that, under the terms of section 187 of Ordinance No. 003/PRG/SGG/88 of 28 January 1988 issuing the Labour Code (the "Labour Code"), apprentices and employed persons under 18 years of age may only be engaged in unhealthy or hazardous work under special conditions of protection determined by ministerial orders. The Committee noted that, under section 1(1), the Labour Code is applicable to workers and employers exercising an occupational activity in Guinea. However, it also noted that section 1(2) defines the term "worker" as "[...] any person who has undertaken to place her or his occupational activity [...] under the direction and authority of another person [...]". The Committee observed that, by virtue of this provision, the Labour Code does not apply to young persons under 18 years of age without contractual employment relations who perform hazardous types of work. It requested the Government to indicate the measures adopted to ensure that young persons under 18 years of age benefit from the protection afforded by Article 3(d) of the Convention.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that, under section 411 of the Children's Code, the worst forms of child labour are prohibited, including all types of work which, by their nature or the circumstances in which they are carried out, are likely to harm the health, safety or morals of children. Under the terms of section 1 of the Children's Code, any human being aged under 18 years is a child.

Article 7(1). 1. Penal sanctions. The Committee notes that the Children's Code of 2008 establishes several sanctions in relation to cases of the worst forms of child labour envisaged in Article 3(a) to (c) of the Convention. The Committee also notes the Government's indications that in 2011 there were 13 cases of trafficking in persons, but that these cases are currently before the courts and that no convictions have yet been handed down. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number and nature of the violations of the Children's Code relating to the worst forms of child labour, and particularly trafficking in children for sexual exploitation or the exploitation of their labour, the investigations conducted, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed.

2. Sanctions. The Committee noted previously that section 205 of the Labour Code establishes sanctions for those committing infringements of the Child Labour Order, and particularly for the employment of children in hazardous types of work.

The Committee further notes that section 428 of the Children's Code of 2008 provides that persons violating the prohibition to employ children under 18 years of age on work which, by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to harm their health, safety or morals (section 411), shall be liable to the sanctions envisaged in the Labour Code to that effect. The Committee notes the Government's indication that no reports by the labour inspectorate refer to cases of child labour, as a result of which no court rulings exist imposing penalties under section 205 of the Labour Code. However, the Committee notes that, according to the report on the National Survey on Child Labour and Trafficking (ENTE) in Guinea of November 2011, conducted in collaboration with ILO/IPEC/SIMPOC and the National Statistical Institute of Guinea, 40.1 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 17 years in Guinea, or 1,427,778 children, are engaged in types of work that are to be abolished, of whom 84.1 per cent are engaged in hazardous types of work, amounting to 33.7 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 17 years (a total of 1,200,292 children). The Committee, therefore, requests the Government to take immediate measures to strengthen the capacity of the labour inspection services as a matter of urgency, so as to ensure adequate monitoring and detection of children under 18 years of age engaged in the worst forms of child labour, and particularly in hazardous types of work. The Committee also requests the Government to provide extracts from labour inspection reports relating to children engaged in hazardous types of work.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Haiti

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2007)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the communication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 31 August 2011.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child had expressed deep concern at the number of cases of trafficking of children from Haiti to the Dominican Republic (CRC/C/15/Add.202, 18 March 2003, concluding observations, paragraph 60). The Committee also noted the September 2006 report on the fact-finding mission of the General Secretariat of the Organization of American States (OAS) relating to the situation with regard to the trafficking of persons and human smuggling in Haiti, which emphasized a trend for trafficking and human smuggling to become systematic in the country.

The Committee also noted that, according to the report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of slavery, its causes and consequences (A/HRC/12/21/Add.1, of 4 September 2009, paragraph 19) (report of the Special Rapporteur), a new trend has been observed with regard to the employment of children as domestic workers (designated by the Creole term restavèks). This consists of the emergence of persons who recruit children from rural areas to work as domestic servants in urban families and outside the home in markets. The Special Rapporteur noted that this new trend has caused many observers to describe the phenomenon as trafficking, since parents are now handing their children over to strangers, whereas previously they entrusted the children to relatives. The Committee also observed that, according to a UNICEF press release of 15 October 2010, the number of child victims of trafficking had increased since the earthquake of January 2010, with traffickers taking advantage of the resulting chaos to prey on children who were lost or separated from their parents.

The Committee previously noted with interest the Government's information concerning the preparation and adoption of preliminary draft legislation on trafficking in persons, under the terms of which the procuring, enlistment, transfer, transportation, accommodation or reception of a child for the purposes of exploitation are considered as trafficking and constitute a violation of the law. The draft legislation provides that trafficking in children, defined as any persons under 18 years of age, constitutes an aggravating circumstance giving rise to liability to the maximum penalty established by law. However, the Committee observed that, in its concluding observations, the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW) expressed concern at the fact that, despite the alarmingly high number of women victims of trafficking in Haiti, specific legislation criminalizing trafficking was still in draft form and had not yet been submitted to Parliament (CEDAW/C/HTI/CO/7, of 10 February 2009, paragraph 26). CEDAW observed that cases of trafficking might result in insufficient investigations, consequently leading to impunity for perpetrators.

The Committee notes the ITUC's allegations that smuggling and trafficking in children is continuing, particularly towards the Dominican Republic. The ITUC has gathered serious eyewitness reports of sexual abuse and violence, even including murder, against young women and young girls who have been trafficked, particularly by Dominican military personnel. The ITUC expresses concern at the fact that there does not appear to be a law under which those responsible for trafficking in persons can be brought to justice. The ITUC is launching an appeal to the Government of Haiti for every effort to be made to ensure that the draft legislation on trafficking and the protection of victims of trafficking is adopted as a matter of great urgency, in consultation with the social partners, and that resources are made available for its implementation.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the absence of specific legislation on the smuggling and trafficking in persons constitutes a significant legal void. The Government adds that efforts are being made to prevent, punish and suppress trafficking in persons, but that these efforts have not up to now had any impact, as the draft legislation on smuggling and trafficking in persons has still not been adopted by Parliament. According to ILO/IPEC information, very little progress has been achieved in the adoption of the draft legislation. The Committee, therefore, expresses its deep concern at the situation and exploitation of children, and particularly young girls, who are victims of trafficking in Haiti, and at the fact that the draft legislation on smuggling and trafficking in persons does not appear to be in the process of being adopted. The Committee, therefore, requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the Bill on trafficking in children is adopted as a matter of great urgency and requests the Government to provide information on any further developments in this respect. It also urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that in-depth investigations and effective prosecutions are completed with regard to persons who have engaged in delivering children under 18 years of age for sale or trafficking.

Clauses (a) and (d). Forced or compulsory labour and hazardous work. Child domestic labour. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the situation of hundreds of thousands of restavèk children who are often exploited under conditions that qualify as forced labour. It noted that in practice many of these children, some of whom are only 4 or 5 years old, are the victims of exploitation, are obliged to work long hours without pay, face all kinds of discrimination and bullying, receive poor lodging and food and are often victims of physical, psychological and sexual abuse. In addition, very few of them attend school. The Committee also noted the repeal of Chapter IX of Title V of the Labour Code, relating to children in service, by the Act of 2003 for the prohibition and elimination of all forms of abuse, violence, ill-treatment or inhumane treatment of children (the Act of 2003). It noted that the prohibition set out in section 2(1) of the Act of 2003 covers the exploitation of children, including servitude, forced or compulsory labour, forced services and work which by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out is likely to harm the health, safety or morals of children, without however establishing penalties for violations of its provisions. The Committee noted that the repealed provisions included section 341 of the Labour Code, under which a child from the age of 12 years could be entrusted to a family to be engaged in domestic work. The Committee nevertheless observed that section 3 of the Act of 2003 provides that a child may be entrusted to a host family in the context of a relationship of assistance and solidarity.

The Committee noted previously that the Special Rapporteur, in her report, expressed deep concern at the vagueness of the concept of assistance and solidarity and considered that the provisions of the Act of 2003 allow the practice of restavèk to be perpetuated. According to the report of the Special Rapporteur, the number of children working as restavèk is between 150,000 and 500,000 (paragraph 17), which represents about one in ten children in Haiti (paragraph 23). Following interviews with restavèk children, the Special Rapporteur ascertained that all of them were given heavy workloads by their host families, which were often incompatible with their full physical and mental development (paragraph 25). Moreover, the Special Rapporteur was told that these children are often ill-treated and subjected to physical, psychological and sexual abuse (paragraph 35). Representatives of the Government and of civil society pointed out that cases of children being beaten and burnt were routinely reported (paragraph 37). The Committee noted that, in view of these findings, the Special Rapporteur described the restavèk system as a contemporary form of slavery.

The Committee notes the ITUC's allegations that the earthquake of 12 January 2010 resulted in an abrupt deterioration in the living conditions of the population of Haiti and increasingly precarious working conditions. According to the ITUC, an increasing number of children are engaged as restavèk and it is highly probable that their conditions have deteriorated further. Many of the eyewitness accounts gathered by the ITUC refer to extremely arduous working conditions, and exploitation is often combined with degrading working conditions, very long hours of work, the absence of leave and sexual exploitation and situations of extreme violence.

The Committee notes the Government's recognition that the engagement of restavèk children in domestic work is similar to forced labour. It once again expresses deep concern at the exploitation of children under 18 years of age in domestic work performed under conditions similar to slavery and in hazardous conditions. It once again reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 3(a) and (d) of the Convention, work or employment by children under 18 years of age under conditions that are similar to slavery or that are hazardous comprise the worst forms of child labour and, under the terms of Article 1, are to be eliminated as a matter of urgency. The Committee requests the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure in law and practice that children under 18 years of age are not engaged as domestic workers under conditions similar to slavery or in hazardous conditions, taking into account the special situation of girls. In this respect, it urges the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the provisions of the national legislation, and particularly section 3 of the Act of 2003, which allow the continuation of the practice of restavèk. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that in-depth investigations are conducted and effective prosecutions of persons subjecting children under 18 years of age to forced domestic work or to hazardous domestic labour, and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. Child protection brigade. The Committee notes the ITUC's allegations that a child protection brigade (BPM) exists in Haiti protecting the borders. However, the ITUC indicates that the corruption of officials on both sides of the border has not been eradicated and that the routes for trafficking in persons avoid the four official border posts and pass through remote locations where more serious situations of abuse against the life and integrity of migrants probably occur.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the BPM is a specialized police unit which arrests traffickers, who are then brought to justice. However, the Government adds that, during judicial inquiries, procedural issues are often used by those charged to escape justice. The Committee is bound to express concern at the weakness of the monitoring mechanisms in preventing the phenomenon of trafficking in children for exploitation. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen the capacity of the BPM to monitor and combat trafficking in children under 18 years of age and to bring those guilty to justice. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted in this respect and the results achieved.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Providing the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Sale and trafficking. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime report of February 2009: Global Report on Trafficking in Persons, no system exists to provide the victims of trafficking with care or assistance, nor are there any reception centres for victims of trafficking. It also noted that CEDAW, in its concluding observations (CEDAW/C/HTI/CO/7, 10 February 2009, paragraph 26), expressed concern at the lack of reception centres for women and girls who are victims of trafficking.

The Committee notes the ITUC's allegations that there is a public system of care and assistance for persons who are victims of trafficking. The reports gathered by the ITUC indicate that victims are referred to the police forces, which relay them to the Social Welfare and Research Institute (IBESR), which then places them in reception centres.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that a pilot social protection programme was envisaged, but that the earthquake of 12 January 2010 undermined the implementation of the programme. The Committee urges the Government to take effective measures for the provision of the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of child victims of sale and trafficking and for their rehabilitation and social integration. In this respect, it requests the Government to provide information on the number of children under 18 years of age who are victims of trafficking and who have been placed in reception centres through the police forces and the IBESR.

Clause (d). Identifying and reaching out to children at special risk. Restavèk children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the existence of programmes for the reintegration of restavèk children established by the IBESR in cooperation with various international and non-governmental organizations. It noted that these programmes focus on reintegration in the family setting with a view to promoting the social and psychological development of the children concerned. However, it noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations, had expressed deep concern at the situation of restavèk children placed in domestic service and recommended that the Government take urgent steps to ensure that restavèk children are provided with physical and psychological rehabilitation and social reintegration services (CRC/C/15/Add.202, 18 March 2003, paragraphs 56 and 57).

The Committee notes the ITUC's indications that it has been informed of initiatives for the reintegration of restavèk children implemented, among others, with the support of UNICEF and the International Organization for Migration (IOM). While welcoming these initiatives, the ITUC calls on the Government to ensure that these programmes continue to be combined with measures intended to improve the living conditions of the families of origin of the children.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that cases of the ill-treatment of children in domestic service are taken up by the IBESR, which is responsible for placing them in families for the purposes of their physical and psychological rehabilitation. However, the Government recognizes that there are still only a few such cases. The Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure that restavèk children benefit from physical and psychological rehabilitation and social integration services in the framework of programmes for the reintegration of restavèk children or through the IBESR. It requests the Government to provide information on the tangible results achieved in terms of the number of children who have benefitted from such measures. The Committee encourages the Government to ratify the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), which has key provisions for child protection.

Article 8. International cooperation. Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee previously noted that the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour, in cooperation with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, was studying the problem of the exploitation of persons in sugar cane plantations in the Dominican Republic and of children reduced to begging in that country, and intends to engage in bilateral negotiations with a view to resolving the situation. It also noted that CEDAW, in its concluding observations (CEDAW/C/HTI/CO/7, 10 February 2009, paragraph 27), encourage the Government "to conduct research on the root causes of trafficking and to enhance bilateral and multilateral cooperation with neighbouring countries, in particular the Dominican Republic, to prevent trafficking and bring perpetrators to justice".

The Committee notes once again that the Government's report does not contain information on this subject. It once again requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the progress made in the negotiations for the adoption of a bilateral agreement with the Dominican Republic.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Honduras

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1980)

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the measures taken to combat child labour and the results achieved, particularly in the context of the implementation of the Plan of Action for the Elimination of Child Labour (2008–15). It noted the objectives, the components and the development of indicators to evaluate the implementation of the Plan of Action, as well as the daily workshops on rights and duties at work in relation to children and young persons, the involvement of the labour inspectorate, and the integration of a "child labour" module into household surveys carried out by the National Institute of Statistics (INE). Yet, the Committee raised concerns at the results of the 2010 INE household survey according to which 14.3 per cent of children and young persons between the ages of 5 and 17 are engaged in an economic activity and the UNICEF 2009 statistics indicating that 16 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 14 are working. Due to the large number of children who are below the minimum age for admission to employment and who work, the Committee requested the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour and provide information in this regard.

The Committee notes with interest the Government's indications as regards the measures taken to implement the Plan of Action for the Elimination of Child Labour (2008–15), which have included, inter alia, the appointment of 30 municipal child defenders in the departments of Valle, Copan and La Paz; the decentralization of activities to eliminate child labour through the establishment of four subregional technical advisory committees composed of workers' and employers' organizations, Government and civil society with coordinating authority on the local level in Choluteca, San Pedro Sula, Progreso and Ceiba; as well as other institutional changes.

The Committee notes that in order to achieve the objective to eliminate child labour by 2020 (set out in the Decent Work in the Americas: An agenda for the Hemisphere), the Government together with the ILO–IPEC formulated a Roadmap for the Prevention and Eradication of Child Labour and its Worst Forms. The Committee notes the Government's indications that the Roadmap provides the basis for strategic programming and the link between the different policies and measures that have a direct or indirect impact on the prevention and eradication of child labour. The Roadmap sets out action at the regional, subregional and local levels and contains dimensions on poverty, health, education, the protection of rights, capacity building, awareness raising and the creation of knowledge base on child labour. The Committee notes that the Government through Executive Decrees PCM-011-2011 of February 2011 and PCM-056-2011 of August 2011, approved the Roadmap as national policy instructing all secretariats and their dependencies to incorporate the eradication of child labour into their institutional and strategic planning processes. The Committee notes from the Government's report and on the basis of the report of June 2012 on the ILO-IPEC project entitled "Eliminating Child Labour in Latin America (Phase IV)" that the Government has finalized the programming measures for 2012–14 to implement the Roadmap.

The Committee furthermore notes the Government's information provided in its report concerning the implementation of the conditional cash transfer programme "Bono 10.000" extending financial assistance to families with minors under 18 years of age conditional on children's school attendance and benefiting 345,000 families so far. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that in 2011 the Secretariat of Labour provided 492 daily workshops on rights and duties at work for children, young persons and their legal representatives, which were attended by 4,227 participants (compared to 2,528 participants between January 2009 and April 2010). Moreover, it notes the Government's indications as regards the labour inspectorate and its programme for the gradual and progressive eradication of child labour. In this regard, the Committee notes that according to the 2012 Report on Child Labour prepared by the Secretary of State in the Offices of Justice and Human Rights, 122 labour inspectors are working in the area of child labour dispersed over 17 regional offices. In 2011, 3,736 child labour inspections were carried out covering 72,488 persons, yet the abovementioned report indicates that no violations were found. The Committee raises serious concern about the lack of contraventions reported, all the more so because according to the 2010 UNICEF statistics (and 2009 statistics), 16 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 14 years are working in Honduras, indicating a large number of children who work that are below the minimum age for admission to employment or work.

The Committee recalls that, pursuant to the Convention, the minimum age should apply not only to formal arrangements but also to the informal economy, which can be achieved through appropriate monitoring mechanisms, including labour inspections. While noting the Government's efforts, the Committee requests the Government to take practical measures to further strengthen the labour inspectorate in its action to prevent and combat child labour, taking into account its important role for the purpose of controlling the implementation of the minimum age for employment. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, based in particular on statistics on the employment of children under 14 years of age, extracts from the reports of the inspection services and information on the number and nature of the violations reported and the sanctions imposed. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved through the implementation of the Plan of Action for the Elimination of Child Labour (2008–15) and the measures taken and results achieved in 2012–14 on the implementation of the Roadmap for the eradication of child labour.

Article 2(1) and (4). Scope of application. The Committee previously noted that, under the terms of section 32(2) of the Labour Code, the authorities responsible for supervising work by persons under 14 years of age may permit them to work if they consider it indispensable in order to provide for their subsistence or that of their parents or brothers and sisters, and provided that it does not prevent them from following compulsory schooling. Furthermore, under the terms of section 2(1), agricultural and stock-raising undertakings that do not permanently employ more than ten workers are excluded from the scope of the Labour Code. It also noted that the Regulations on child labour of 2001, in accordance with sections 4–6, only apply to contractual labour relations. The Government indicated in this respect that a draft revision of the Labour Code had been prepared which contained provisions to bring the national labour legislation into conformity with the international Conventions ratified by Honduras, and therefore to harmonize the provisions of the Labour Code and the Regulations on child labour of 2001 with the Code for Children and Young Persons of 1996. The draft text would also allow the application of the provisions on the minimum age for admission to employment to all children, whether they are engaged under an employment contract or work on their own account. The Committee observed that the majority of children under 14 years of age work in agriculture, forestry, hunting and fishing.

The Committee notes that the Government's report again does not contain information on the situation regarding the legislative process for the adoption of the draft revision of the Labour Code. The Committee notes the Government's indications that the most recent laws concerning child labour, that is the Code for Children and Young Persons of 1996 and Regulations on Child Labour of 2001, which expressively prohibit under all circumstances the employment of children under 14 years of age (in its sections 120(2) and 15 respectively) are strictly applied. In this regard, the Committee recalls its earlier observation that the Regulations on Child Labour of 2001, in accordance with sections 4–6, only appear to apply to contractual labour relations and therefore would not cover children carrying out economic activities without an employment agreement, including self-employed children and children working in the informal economy.

The Committee recalls that, under the terms of Article 2(1) of the Convention, no one under the age specified shall be admitted to employment or work in any occupation, subject to the exemptions set out in Articles 4–8 of the Convention. It also recalls that the Convention applies to all branches of economic activity and covers all types of employment or work, whether or not they are performed within the framework of an employment relationship or a labour contract, and whether or not the employment or work is paid.

The Committee again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to harmonize the provisions of the Labour Code and the Regulations on Child Labour of 2001 with the Code for Children and Young Persons of 1996 to ensure that no child under 14 years of age is permitted to work, including children who work in agricultural and stock-raising undertakings which do not permanently employ more than ten workers and those who work on their own account. It once again requests the Government to provide information on any progress achieved in this respect.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, although the net school enrolment rate at the primary level was relatively high, the net school attendance rate at secondary level remained low. The Committee also noted that a preliminary draft of the General Education Act, which is to replace the Consolidated Act of 1966, had been submitted to the Directorate of Education. The new legislation would, among other provisions, establish that school is compulsory and free of charge for ten years, namely one year of pre-school and nine years of primary education. The Committee also noted that education is one of the components of the implementation of the National Plan of Action for the Elimination of Child Labour 2008–15.

The Committee notes that the Government's report again does not provide any information on progress in relation to the envisaged reform of the Consolidated Act of 1966. Neither does the Government report contain any information on the efforts undertaken by the Government to improve the operation of the education system with a view to increasing school attendance rates among children under 14 years of age in compulsory basic education, in the context of the National Plan of Action for the Elimination of Child Labour (2008–15).

Notwithstanding the absence of information on this point, the Committee observes that, according to UNICEF statistics for 2010, the net school attendance rate for primary education has improved and stands at 90 per cent for girls and 87 per cent for boys (compared to 80 per cent and 76 per cent respectively in 2009). The net school attendance rate for secondary education remains low with only 43 per cent of girls and 35 per cent of boys attending this level of education (compared to 36 per cent and 29 per cent respectively in 2009).

Considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee once again firmly requests the Government to intensify its efforts to improve the functioning of the education system with a view to increasing school attendance completion rates for secondary education among children under 14 years of age in compulsory basic education. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted in this respect, particularly in the context of the National Plan of Action for the Elimination of Child Labour and the Roadmap for the Eradication of Child Labour. The Committee also once again expresses the firm hope that the preliminary draft General Education Act will be adopted in the near future and that it will contain provisions guaranteeing compulsory schooling up to the age of 14. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the Act once it has been adopted.

Articles 3(a)–(b) and 7(1) of the Convention. Sale and trafficking of children for commercial sexual exploitation, use of children for prostitution and for the production of pornography or pornographic performances, and penalties applied. In its previous comments, the Committee noted information on the denunciations received by the Office of the Public Prosecutor concerning the economic exploitation of minors, child pornography and the procuring and trafficking of persons, the number of crimes reported relating to the commercial sexual exploitation of minors and the number of prosecutions initiated concerning the trafficking of persons and the commercial sexual exploitation of children. While noting that the national legislation, in particular Decree No. 234-2005 of 28 September 2005 amending the Penal Code, prohibits the trafficking of children for commercial sexual exploitation and the use of children for prostitution and for the production of pornography and for pornographic performances, the Committee expressed concern at the allegations of corruption and complicity between those engaged in trafficking and law enforcement, and at the fact that no investigations had been conducted of these cases. In this regard, it urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions were carried out against the perpetrators and requested it to provide detailed information on the number of investigations conducted, prosecutions and convictions applied.

Although the Government indicates that special units were created within the Police and Public Ministry for the prosecution of cases of trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation and that various convictions against trafficking in persons were handed down, the Committee notes with regret that the Government's report contains no information on the number of prosecutions, convictions or sanctions imposed for the sale and trafficking of persons under 18 years of age for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation or for the use of persons under 18 years of age for prostitution, the production of pornography or for pornographic performances, as well as for officials who are accomplices in such crimes.

The Committee also notes that the Special Rapporteur on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography visited the country in September 2012 and called on the Government to increase its efforts to protect children from sexual exploitation, adding that the country still faces many challenges to ensure that children are not victims of prostitution, pornography and abuse. According to the Special Rapporteur these challenges consist of difficulties in accessing mechanisms to guarantee rapid protection and security of children, lack of coordination among government mechanisms, limited resources and slow judicial investigations and impunity denying protection to victims and witnesses (UN News Wire, 10 September 2012).

The Committee notes with interest the Law against Trafficking in Persons, which was adopted by the National Congress on 30 May 2012 through Legislative Decree No. 59-2012. Section 6 of the Law prohibits all forms of trafficking, and also includes the prohibition of commercial sexual exploitation and the use of children below 18 years of age in illegal activities. The Law mandates the establishment of the Inter-Institutional Commission on Sexual Exploitation and Trafficking in Persons, which is to promote inter-agency cooperation and the coordination of activities for the prevention, protection and eradication of these crimes. For this purpose, the Law establishes a range of measures for the protection of victims, to ensure compensation and to provide rehabilitation services. The Committee notes that as a general principle the Law sets out the best interests of the child (section 3) and special attention is paid to child victims of trafficking (section 25). Section 52 prescribes penalties from ten to 15 years of imprisonment and fines between 150 and 250 daily wages for the crimes enumerated in section 6 of the Law and establishes that these penalties are increased by 50 per cent in case the victim is a child below 18 years of age.

The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the immediate and effective implementation in practice of the 2012 Law against Trafficking in Persons. In this regard, the Committee again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions are carried out against persons engaged in the sale and trafficking of persons under 18 years of age for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation or who use persons under 18 years of age for prostitution, the production of pornography or for pornographic performances, as well as against officials who are accomplices in such acts, and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions are applied in practice. It reiterates its request to the Government to provide detailed information on the number of investigations conducted, prosecutions and convictions applied.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Commercial sexual exploitation and trafficking for that purpose. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the National Plan of Action to Combat Commercial Sexual Exploitation (2006–11), which envisages the establishment of procedures for the identification, referral and provision of assistance to children and young persons who are victims of trafficking, as well as the development of models, programmes and projects for comprehensive assistance to children and young persons who are victims of commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee also noted the activities under the ILO–IPEC subregional project on the commercial sexual exploitation of children which were completed in April 2009 and the development of a Protocol in 2008 for comprehensive assistance to children and young persons who are victims of commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee requested the Government to pursue its efforts and requested it to provide detailed information on the measures adopted and results achieved in the context of the 2008 Protocol and the National Plan of Action (2006–11).

The Committee notes the Government's information that the National Plan of Action to Combat Commercial Sexual Exploitation (2006–11) was elaborated and is being implemented in all relevant institutions. Other measures have included: the implementation of a pilot project on the social rehabilitation of victims of commercial sexual exploitation in the South of the country in June 2011; the effective coordination with different non-governmental organizations to ensure adequate assistance to victims; awareness-raising and capacity-building activities for a large number of justice and civil society workers and various awareness-raising and communication activities. Yet the Committee notes that the Government's report contains no information on the results achieved in terms of the number of children who have, in practice, been removed from trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation, and who have benefited from social integration measures.

Noting that the abovementioned 2012 Law against Trafficking in Persons also contains comprehensive provisions on the protection, assistance and social reintegration measures to be provided to victims of trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to take immediate and effective measures to implement in practice, measures to provide comprehensive assistance to children and young persons who have been victims of commercial sexual exploitation and trafficking for that purpose. In this regard, the Committee hopes that the Government will have the capacity to provide detailed information with its next report on the results achieved, including an indication of the number of children who have, in practice, been removed from trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation, and who have benefited from social integration measures.

Clause (d). Children at special risk. 1. Street children. The Committee previously noted the high number of street children and the results of the Mano Amiga project targeting young persons living in the crematoria of Tegucigalpa and San Pedro Sula. It requested the Government to continue its efforts to protect street children from the worst forms of child labour and to provide information on the results achieved, particularly within the framework of the Mano Amiga project.

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no information on the number of children removed from the streets and who benefited from rehabilitation and social integration measures. The Committee notes from a press release posted on the website of the Organization of Ibero-American States (OEI) of 27 February 2012, and based on the information provided by the Government that the objective of the Mano Amiga project is to capacitate directly 550 and indirectly 2,750 beneficiaries in the main cities of the country. The press release informs that as a result of the project, 241 waste scavengers were removed from the crematorium of the city of San Pedro Sula.

While noting this information, the Committee encourages the Government to continue its efforts to protect street children from the worst forms of child labour and it requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of children removed from the streets and who have benefited from rehabilitation and social integration measures, in particular through the “Mano Amiga” project.

2. Indigenous children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the policy and programmatic measures taken to prevent and remove indigenous girls, boys and young persons from child labour, including in the framework of the ILO–IPEC activities in the country. The Committee requested the Government to intensify its efforts to protect indigenous children that are at risk of being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, and requested it to provide information on the results achieved.

While noting the information concerning the consultation of indigenous groups in the framework of the design and implementation of the Public Policy and National Action Plan on Justice and Human Rights, the Committee notes that the Government’s report contains no information on measures and results achieved to protect indigenous children from the worst forms of child labour. The Committee takes due note of the information contained in the 2012 report on child labour prepared by the Secretary of State in the Offices of Justice and Human Rights, which reports about a direct assistance programme allowed for the withdrawal of 150 children and the prevention of 350 children from child labour in the indigenous community of Opatoro.

Recalling that the children of indigenous peoples are often victims of exploitation, which takes on very diverse forms, and are a population at risk of being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee reiterates its request to the Government to intensify its efforts to protect these children from the worst forms of child labour and to provide information on the results achieved in its next report.

Clause (e). Special situation of girls. Child domestic workers. The Committee previously noted that a large number of children, particularly girls, are engaged in domestic work. It emphasized that children engaged in domestic work, particularly young girls, are often victims of exploitation, which takes on very diverse forms, and that it is difficult to supervise their conditions of employment. The Committee, therefore, requested the Government to take effective measures in that respect.

Noting with regret the absence of information on this point in the Government’s report, the Committee is bound to reiterate its request to the Government to take immediate and effective measures for the protection of children engaged in domestic work against the worst forms of child labour, taking into account the special situation of girls. It again requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the measures adopted and the results achieved in this respect, with an indication of the number of child domestic workers who have, in practice, been removed from the worst forms of child labour and the specific rehabilitation and social integration measures adopted for these children.

Article 8. International and regional cooperation. Commercial sexual exploitation and trafficking for that purpose. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the ILO–IPEC subregional project on the commercial sexual exploitation of children envisaged the strengthening of horizontal collaboration between countries participating in the project. It considered that cooperation between law enforcement agencies, particularly the judicial authorities and police forces, is indispensable to prevent and eliminate commercial sexual exploitation, and particularly the sale and trafficking of children for that purpose, through the collection and exchange of information and through assistance in the detection and prosecution of the individuals involved, and the repatriation of victims. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to promote cooperation with neighbouring countries in this regard and indications as to the number of children repatriated to their countries of origin.

The Committee notes that besides the statement that the Government has exchanged experiences with other countries on trafficking and the commercial sexual exploitation of children in Colombia in December 2010, the Government’s report provides no information on this point. The Committee notes that section 43 of the abovementioned 2012 Law against Trafficking in Persons provides for the repatriation of foreign victims of trafficking abroad or of nationals to Honduras, which should be voluntary and assisted.

In these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to promote cooperation with neighbouring countries and strengthen security measures at common borders with a view to combating the trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation of children. It also requests the Government to provide detailed information on the implementation of the 2012 Law against Trafficking in Persons, with an indication of the number of children repatriated to their countries of origin.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Indonesia

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and the application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted the information in the Indonesia Child Labour Survey (2009) that there were approximately 1.76 million children engaged in prohibited child labour in Indonesia (defined as working children between the ages of 5–12, children aged 13–14 engaged in non-light work activities, and children between 15–18 years engaged in hazardous work). Most were employed in agriculture, including forestry, hunting and fishery (57 per cent of all working children aged 5–17). The Survey further indicated that while most working children still attended school, 20.7 per cent of persons under the age of 18 worked for more than 40 hours a week. The Committee requested information on measures taken to ensure that children under the minimum age were not engaged in child labour.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that it has undertaken activities to prevent children under the age of 15 from engaging in child labour, such as the Child Social Welfare Programme, implemented by the Ministry of Social Affairs, which included providing capital assistance to parents of children at risk and measures to encourage children to return to school. The Government also provides tuition assistance to children who were withdrawn through the Reduction of Child Labour Programme, through the Directorate of Special Education and Services within the Ministry of Education. The Committee further notes the information from ILO–IPEC of September 2011 that the Mid-Term National Development Plan (2010–14) includes strategies and policies to address child labour. Moreover, since 2008, the Government has been implementing a conditional cash transfers programme to improve educational access for children from poor families, with the reduction of child labour as a key indicator of the programme. By the end of 2011, the programme was expected to cover approximately 1.1 million households. While taking due note of the measures taken by the Government, the Committee observes that there remain a significant number of children engaged in child labour in the country and therefore urges the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that, in practice, children under the minimum age of 15 are not engaged in economic activities. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken in this regard, and on the results achieved. It also requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including information from on the labour inspectorate on the number and nature of contravention reported, violations detected and penalties applied.

Article 2(1). Scope of application. 1. Informal economy. The Committee previously noted the indication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that child labour was widespread in Indonesia, taking place mostly in informal, unregulated activities, such as street vending and in the agricultural and domestic sectors. The Committee also noted that Act No. 13 of 2003 (Manpower Act) excluded from its application children who are engaged in self-employment or working without a clear wage relationship. It further noted the information from the Indonesia Child Labour Survey Report 2009, that out of all working children between the ages of 5–12, 12.7 per cent were self-employed, and 82.5 per cent were unpaid family workers. The Survey further indicated that only 4.8 per cent of working children between the ages of 5–12 (and only 12.1 per cent of children aged 13–14) were working as “employees”, and therefore within the scope of application of the Manpower Act. However, the Committee noted that section 75 of the Manpower Act stipulates that the Government is under an obligation to make efforts to overcome problems concerning children who work outside of an employment relationship, and that these efforts should be specified with a government regulation. In this regard, the Committee noted the Government's indication that a draft government regulation, aiming to protect self-employed children pursuant to section 75 of the Manpower Act, had been elaborated and was under discussion in the Ministry of Manpower.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that it is maintaining coordination with the relevant stakeholders in order to finalize the draft Act on the protection of children who work outside of an employment relationship. The Government indicates that, to date, the definition of children working outside of an employment relationship is still to be formulated. The Committee must therefore once again express its concern that the vast majority of children working under the minimum age do not benefit from the protection of the Manpower Act. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the finalization and adoption of the Act on the protection of children who work outside of an employment relationship in the very near future. It requests the Government to provide a copy of this Act, once adopted.

2. Domestic work. The Committee previously noted the ITUC's allegation in its communication that young domestic workers routinely work 14–18 hours a day, seven days a week, without a day off. The ITUC indicated that these girls typically entered domestic work between the ages of 12 and 15, with some beginning even earlier, despite the established minimum age of 15. The ITUC further stated that it appeared that the Government had failed to take meaningful action to protect domestic workers – who numbered at a minimum 688,000 children – from exploitation and abuse. In this regard, the ITUC indicated that national labour laws exclude domestic workers from the minimum protections afforded to workers in the formal sector and that laws enacted to protect children from labour exploitation did not address child domestic labour.

The Committee also noted the information in a report entitled “Recognizing domestic work as work”, published by the ILO Country Office in Jakarta in April 2010 that approximately 25 per cent of domestic workers in Indonesia are under the age of 15, but that these children are expected to perform the same amount of work as adult domestic workers. This report further indicated that 81 per cent of domestic workers work 11 hours or more a day, and quotes a study where 93 per cent of domestic worker respondents had experienced physical violence at work. However, the Committee noted the Government's indication that a draft Act for the protection of domestic workers had been formulated and would be discussed in the Indonesian House of Representatives. The Committee further noted the Government's indication that it had increased its efforts to prevent children under 15 from working as domestic workers, including through the creation of guidelines and collaboration with local governments to prevent children under 15 from engaging in domestic work and through specialized inspections. The Committee expressed its deep concern at the number and situation of children working as domestic workers, and urged the Government to take measures to ensure the adoption of the draft Act for the protection of domestic workers.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the draft Act on the Protection of Domestic Workers has been included in the Register of the National Legislation Programme for 2010–14. The Government indicates that it continues to encourage discussion on this draft Act. The Committee also notes the Government's indication concerning its work with the ILO–IPEC and the NGO Save the Children, to withdraw child labourers, particularly in the domestic sector. The Government also indicates that the Ministry of Home Affairs will conduct activities under a pilot project entitled “Stop Child Domestic Work” in four provinces, and has provided rehabilitation services to child domestic workers through the Temporary House Shelter for Children. Moreover, the Ministry of Education has established several child-friendly pilot schools for former child labourers, including child domestic workers. Recalling that the Government first referred to the draft Act on the Protection of Domestic Workers in 2008, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that this Act is adopted in the near future, and to provide a copy of this legislation once adopted. Taking note of the measures taken by the Government to prevent children under 15 from engaging in domestic work, the Committee urges the Government to pursue and strengthen these efforts, and to provide information on the impact achieved.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (d). Hazardous work. Child domestic workers. The Committee previously noted the allegations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that child domestic workers in Indonesia often suffered sexual, physical or psychological abuse. The Committee also noted the information from the 2010 report entitled Recognizing domestic work as work, published by the ILO country office in Jakarta that approximately 35 per cent of domestic workers are under the age of 18. This report also indicated that 81 per cent of domestic workers work 11 hours or more a day, and that being hidden from public scrutiny made these workers particularly vulnerable to exploitation and abuse. This report further indicated that 68 per cent of domestic worker respondents indicated that they had experienced mental abuse, 93 per cent had experienced physical violence, and 42 per cent had experienced some form of sexual harassment or abuse while at work. However, the Committee noted the Government's statement that a draft Act on domestic workers' protection had been formulated, and would be discussed in the Indonesian House of Representatives. The Government further indicated that it was making serious efforts to provide physical, psychological, economic and legal protection to domestic workers, including through the creation of guidelines and the provision of training to prevent children from entering domestic work.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that it has continued to take measures, in cooperation with non-governmental organizations, to protect domestic workers through activities such as mentoring, training, data collection and the dissemination of information, and that national and local governments have conducted trainings on the subject. The Government indicates that it has made efforts to prevent children from becoming domestic workers, including measures taken by the Ministry of Social Affairs to reduce the vulnerability of children, and the Child Social Welfare Programme, which aims to protect children against all forms of exploitation and abuse (including the prevention of child domestic labour). The Committee also notes the Government's statement that the draft Act on the protection of domestic workers has been included in the Register of the National Legislation Programme for 2010–14. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that sanctions may be imposed on persons who employ children under 18 in hazardous household work under the provisions in the Manpower Act prohibiting the employment of children in hazardous work as well as under the Child Protection Act which provides for the special protection of children against economic exploitation. However, the Committee notes the information from a document from ILO–IPEC concerning the Project of Support to the Indonesian Time-bound Programme on the elimination of the worst forms of child labour of September 2011 that the current legislation on child labour is not effective in tackling the problem of child domestic workers. Therefore, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the draft Act for the protection of domestic workers is adopted as a matter of urgency, to ensure the protection of children under 18 from hazardous domestic work. It requests the Government to continue to take concrete measures to address the situation of child domestic workers, and to provide information on the results achieved, particularly in terms of the prevention and withdrawal of children from domestic work. The Committee encourages the Government to ratify the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), which has key provisions for child protection.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. Police and immigration officers. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that efforts had been made to strengthen the role of the police in combating the trafficking of children, including the establishment of a Women and Children's Service Unit within the Republic of Indonesia National Police. It also noted the information from the International Organization for Migration that there was a great need to sensitize criminal justice agencies across Indonesia with regard to the content of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act of 2007. It noted that many police and prosecutors remained unfamiliar with the anti-trafficking legislation, and were reluctant or unsure of how to effectively use this legislation to punish traffickers, and that corruption continued to hinder anti-trafficking efforts.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act has been consistently applied to persons involved in trafficking. The Government indicates that the police handled cases of trafficking involving 146 adults and 68 children in 2011. The Government indicates that 164 trafficking offenders were identified, and 91 of the cases were successfully prosecuted. The Committee also notes the information in the Government's report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child that it will take measures to strengthen the Task Force for Combating Trafficking in Persons at the national, provincial, and regency/district levels, especially in areas of origin, transit and destination (CRC/C/IDN/3-4, paragraph 93). In this regard, the Committee notes the information from ILO-IPEC of September 2011, that 18 provinces had established a task force to optimize the handling of the trafficking cases. However, the Committee notes the Government's statement in its report to the Human Rights Committee (HRC) for the Universal Periodic Review (UPR) of 7 March 2012 that, in 2010, 28,289 Indonesian citizens were indicated to have been victims of trafficking in persons (A/HRC/WG.6/13/IDN/1, paragraph 117). The Committee, therefore, urges the Government to pursue its efforts to combat trafficking in children by ensuring that perpetrators of human trafficking are investigated and prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken in this respect, and the results achieved, particularly the number of persons investigated, convicted and sentenced for cases of trafficking involving victims under the age of 18.

Article 6. Programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. Trafficking. The Committee previously noted that the Government had developed a National Plan of Action on the Eradication of Trafficking in Persons and Sexual Exploitation of Children 2009–14 (NPA on Trafficking and SEC). It also noted that, in collaboration with ILO-IPEC, several initiatives had been undertaken to provide rehabilitation and reintegration services to child victims of trafficking. Nonetheless, the Committee noted information indicating that efforts to protect victims of trafficking remained uneven and inadequate in comparison with the scope of the country's trafficking problem. The Committee requested information on the concrete steps taken in this regard.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the NPA on Trafficking and SEC 2009–14 was adopted by virtue of Regulation of the Coordinating Minister for People's Welfare No. 25/KEP/MENKO/ KESRA/IX/2009. The Government also indicates that the Child Social Welfare Programme aims to protect children from trafficking, and that implementing partners have been provided with grants for trained social workers and to support the reintegration of children. Moreover, the Government indicates that it is providing services for child victims of trafficking through the child social protection shelters, located in Jakarta and 27 other areas of Indonesia. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's statement in its report to the HRC for the UPR of 7 March 2012 that 234 child victims of trafficking were treated at child social protection shelters in 2010 (A/HRC/WG.6/13/IDN/1, paragraph 120). The Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures, within the framework of the NPA on Trafficking and SEC 2009–14, to prevent the trafficking of children under 18 years of age, and provide for their removal and subsequent rehabilitation. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the results achieved, particularly the number of children reached through these initiatives.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour and assisting the removal of children from these worst forms. 1. Commercial sexual exploitation of children. The Committee previously noted information from UNICEF that approximately 30 per cent of the women in prostitution in Indonesia are below the age of 18, with 40,000–70,000 Indonesian children being victims of sexual exploitation. It noted that child-sex tourism is prevalent in urban areas and tourist destinations.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that, through the NPA on Trafficking and SEC 2009–14, it has taken measures to eliminate the commercial sexual exploitation of children in the tourism sector through the development of child-friendly tourism sites. Regarding Regulation No. PM.30/HK.201/MKP/2010 on Guidelines on the Prevention of Sexual Exploitation of Children in Tourism, the Government indicates that it continues to disseminate prevention material on child sexual exploitation in the tourism sector, in cooperation with both private and public tourism stakeholders. Noting that there remain a significant number of child victims of commercial sexual exploitation, including in child-sex tourism, the Committee urges the Government to redouble its efforts to protect children under 18 years from this worst form of child labour. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of children who have been removed from commercial sexual exploitation and rehabilitated through the measures taken, including through the NPA on Trafficking and SEC 2009–14.

2. Children engaged in the sale, production and trafficking of drugs. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that approximately 15,000 children were involved in the sale, production and trafficking of drugs in Jakarta in 2003. It also noted reports that as many as 20 per cent of drug users were involved in the sale, production or trafficking of drugs, suggesting that between 100,000 and 240,000 young persons might be involved in the drug trade. However, the Committee noted that the Ministry of Social Affairs has engaged in cooperation with various governmental agencies to provide services and rehabilitation to children found to be in violation of the law, and that, through cooperation with ILO-IPEC, many children had been removed from work involving drugs. Nonetheless, the Committee noted information from the Government that there had not been any significant progress made with regard to the prosecution of persons employing children in several of the worst forms of child labour, including drug trafficking, and that some cases were not taken to court. The Committee, therefore, expressed its concern at the lack of progress in prosecuting perpetrators of this worst form of child labour.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Ministry of Manpower and Transmigration is currently coordinating with the national police and the National Narcotics Agency concerning information on the involvement of children in the sale of drugs. The Government also refers to the Act on Child Protection of 2002, section 89 of which provides penalties for persons who involve children in the production, sale and trafficking of drugs. However, the Committee notes an absence of information in the Government's report on the application of these provisions in practice. The Committee, therefore, requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of persons who involve children in the production, sale or trafficking of illicit drugs are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions are imposed in practice. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken, particularly the number of investigations, prosecutions and sanctions imposed.

Clause (d). Identifying and reaching out to children at special risk. Children on fishing platforms. The Committee previously noted that more than 7,000 children were estimated to be engaged in deep-sea fishing in North Sumatra. It also noted several ongoing initiatives being implemented to prevent and remove children from being engaged in this hazardous form of work. The Government also indicated that the North Sumatra government had made efforts to monitor this sector and disseminated information about the dangers of working on fishing platforms. However, the Committee noted information of the report on the National Action Plan on the Worst Forms of Child Labour stages I and II (submitted with the Government's report) that offshore fishing platforms was an area where investigations and prosecutions for persons who employ children needed to be more effective. This report indicated that many cases of violations were closed just after the investigations and never brought to court because of the inadequate capacity of law enforcers.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that it has engaged in various efforts to prevent the engagement of children in work on fishing platforms, including raising community awareness, cooperation with regional governments and collaboration with NGOs. The Government indicates that increased public awareness through education, aimed at preventing the engagement of children on fishing platforms, has been successful, with some fishing platforms no longer engaging children. The Government also indicates that in districts containing fishing platforms, action committees have been established under the action plan for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour, which are in charge of coordinating the elimination of hazardous child labour on these platforms. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that, to date, data on prosecutions and sanctions for those who employ children on fishing platforms is not available, and that its efforts have focused on preventative education efforts. While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee once again reminds the Government that, pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Convention, ratifying countries are required to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, including through the application of appropriate sanctions. The Committee accordingly requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are applied in practice to persons who engage children in hazardous work on fishing platforms. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard in its next report.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Ireland

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 1999)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee previously noted that the Child Trafficking and Pornography Act 1998 defined a child as a person under 17 years of age. In response to the request to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to prohibit the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years of age for the purposes of sexual or labour exploitation, and to prevent the use, procuring or offering of a child under 18 for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances, the Government provided information on the Criminal Law (Trafficking in Persons and Sexual Offences) Bill of 2006, which defined a "child" as a person under 18 years of age and contained provisions punishing the trafficking of persons, including children; the sale of children for purposes of sexual exploitation; and other offences related to the sexual exploitation of children.

The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of the Criminal Law (Human Trafficking) Act 2008, section 1 of which defines a "child" as a person under 18 years of age. The Committee notes the comprehensive provisions in the abovementioned Act prohibiting the sale and trafficking of children for the purposes of sexual (section 3) and labour exploitation (section 2). The Committee further notes the broad definition of sexual exploitation in relation to a child contained in section 3; which includes inter alia the inviting, inducing or coercing of a child to engage in prostitution or the production of child pornography and the prostitution or use of a child for the production of child pornography. By virtue of the Act, a person who traffics a child for labour (section 2(1)) or sexual exploitation (section 3 (a)(1)); sells a child, offers or exposes a child for sale or invites the making of an offer to purchase a child, or purchases or makes an offer to purchase a child (section 2(2)); sexually exploits a child or takes, detains or restricts the personal liberty of a child for the purpose of his or her sexual exploitation (section 3(a)(2)), is to be punished with imprisonment for life or a lesser term and to a fine. The Committee, moreover, duly notes that section 7 of the Law provides for a broad jurisdiction for the Irish courts enabling the prosecution of an offence committed on Irish territory, by an Irish person or person ordinarily resident in Ireland for an offence committed abroad and the prosecution of an offence committed abroad against an Irish person or person ordinarily resident in Ireland.

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs. The Committee previously noted that the Child Care Act protects children from the use of drugs but not from being used, procured or offered for the trafficking of drugs. The Committee notes that the Child Care (Amendment) Act of 2007 contains no provisions prohibiting the use, procuring or offering of a child for the production and trafficking of drugs. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate whether legal provisions exist prohibiting the use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities, including the production and trafficking of drugs. If not, it requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to this end.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Jamaica

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2003)

Article 3(2) of the Convention. Determination of hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that a draft list of types of hazardous employment or work prohibited for persons below 18 years of age had been developed in consultation with the social partners. The Committee noted that this draft list contained 45 types of prohibited work.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that stakeholder consultations on the hazardous work list were undertaken within the framework of the Tackling Child Labour through Education (TACKLE) Project. The Committee also notes the Government's statement in its report submitted under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that the list of hazardous work will be included in the regulations of the new Occupational Safety and Health Act (OSH Act), when adopted. Noting that the Government has been compiling this list since 2006, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the list of types of hazardous work prohibited for persons under 18 years of age is adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide a final copy of the list, once adopted.

Article 7(3). Determination of light work. The Committee previously noted that section 34(1) and (2) of the Child Care and Protection Act permits the employment of a child between 13 and 15 years in an occupation included in a list of prescribed occupations, consisting of light work considered appropriate by the minister, and specifying the number of hours during which and the conditions under which such a child may be so employed. In this regard, the Government indicated that a draft list of occupations constituting light work was being examined by a panel consisting of safety inspectors, workers' and employers' representatives and would be included in the regulations for the new OSH Act. This draft list of light work permitted for children included household chores, hair-braiding, work as a supermarket packer, clerical work and newspaper vending.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the draft List of Light Work Permitted for Children was recently reviewed, for inclusion in the new OSH Act. The Government indicates that the draft OSH Act was recently reviewed in preparation for its submission to Parliament for debate. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the OSH Act, and its regulations containing the List of Light Work Permitted for Children, are adopted in the near future.

Article 9(1) and part III of the report form. Penalties and the labour inspectorate. The Committee previously noted that labour inspections are confined to the formal sector, and that labour inspectors have yet to detect any cases of child labour in the course of inspections. In this regard, the Committee noted the information from ILO-IPEC that the informal sector was one of the main sectors in which child labour occurs. However, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the draft OSH Act would replace the Factories Act and provide an improved framework for labour inspectors with regard to monitoring cases of child labour in sectors where they hitherto had limited powers, including the informal sector. The Government also indicated that the penalties under the draft OSH Act had been reviewed and that fines ranging from 250,000 Jamaican dollars (JMD) to JMD1,000,000 could be imposed under this Act, and a person could also be imprisoned for a period not exceeding three months if in default of such a fine.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the new OSH Act will authorize labour inspectors to enforce the appropriate sanctions where a breach has been committed. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that, within the framework of the TACKLE Project, measures have been taken to sensitize the labour inspectorate on child labour issues, through local workshops and training at the International Training Centre of the ILO. However, the Committee notes the information in the document entitled "Child Labour Legislative Gap Analysis" of March 2012, submitted with the Government's report under Convention No. 182, that labour officers' powers of inspection are limited to commercial buildings and factories, which greatly restricts their capacity to monitor informal sectors of the economy for child labour practices. This report also indicates that while the reporting of cases of child labour has increased, arrests and prosecutions for the child labour offences have not necessarily resulted. Recalling that, by virtue of Article 9(1), of the Convention, all necessary measures shall be taken by the competent authority, including the provision of appropriate penalties, to ensure the effective enforcement of the provisions of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that persons found to be in breach of the provisions giving effect to the Convention are prosecuted and that adequate penalties are imposed. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure the adoption of the provisions of the draft OSH Act which will enable labour inspectors to enforce appropriate sanctions. It further requests the Government to redouble its efforts to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate, including the allocation of additional resources, in preparation for the labour inspectorate's expanded role, pursuant to the draft OSH Act, in monitoring the informal economy.

Article 9(3). Registers of employment. The Committee previously noted that the available texts of legislation did not contain provisions requiring an employer to keep registers and documents of persons employed or working under him/her. However, it noted the Government's statement that the legal framework on this issue was being examined by the Ministry.

Noting an absence of information on this point in the Government's report, the Committee reminds the Government that legislative provisions shall prescribe the registers which shall be kept and made available by the employer and which must contain the names and ages or dates of birth duly certified wherever possible, of persons whom he/she employs or who work for him/her and who are less than 18 years of age, in conformity with Article 9(3) of the Convention. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures in the near future to ensure the adoption of provisions prescribing registers to be kept by employers, in conformity with Article 9(3) of the Convention.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the information from UNICEF that 7 per cent of boys and 5 per cent of girls between the ages of 5 and 14 years worked in the years 1999–2006. The Committee noted the information from ILO–IPEC that the main areas of work for children are in agriculture, fishing and the informal sector (including selling goods and services and domestic work). The Committee also noted that the TACKLE Project was launched in Jamaica in 2009. It further noted the information from ILO–IPEC that reliable data and statistics on the number of child labourers in Jamaica was scarce.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that through the TACKLE Project, and in collaboration with non-governmental organizations, direct support has been provided to over 500 children, in the form of remedial education, skills training, awareness-raising, and help for children and their families in accessing social support mechanisms. The Government also indicates that the Ministry of Labour and Social Security has developed a Child Labour Policy, and that a Child Labour Handbook for Professionals has been developed. The Government further indicates that the social partners have taken measures to address child labour, such as the establishment of a Child Labour Steering Committee and the adoption of a child labour policy by the Jamaica Confederation of Trade Unions, and the development of a draft child labour policy by the Jamaica Employers Federation.

The Committee further notes the Government's statement, in its report submitted under Convention No. 182, that it is expected that a Child Labour Survey will be conducted to assist in assessing the impact of the various initiatives taken. In addition, the Committee notes the information in the document entitled "Child Labour Legislative Gap Analysis" of March 2012, that a Children's Registry has been established to receive, review and refer reports made under the Child Care and Protection Act. This report indicates that in 2008, the Office of the Children's Registry received 17 reports related to child labour, 22 such reports in 2009, 52 reports in 2010 and 38 reports between January and July 2011. The Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to combat child labour, and to continue to provide information on the measures taken in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government to continue its efforts to undertake a child labour survey, to ensure that sufficient up-to-date data on the situation of working children in Jamaica is available, including, for example, data on the number of children and young persons who are engaged in economic activities and statistics relating to the nature, scope and trends of their work.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2003)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution. The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Sexual Offences Act, which addresses sexual offences against children. The Committee observed that the Sexual Offences Act prohibits procuring any person to become a prostitute (section 18 (1)(b)), and prohibits living off the proceeds of prostitution (section 23(1)(a)). However, the Committee observed that the Sexual Offences Act did not appear to prohibit the use of a person under the age of 18 for the purpose of prostitution.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that it is an offence to procure any person for the purpose of prostitution. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that there are two bills currently being debated by Parliament relating to sexual offences, although the Committee observes that these bills do not appear to relate to the prostitution of children, and particularly the use of children under 18 years for prostitution, i.e. by a client. Accordingly, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on whether there are any legislative provisions which prohibit particularly the use of a child for the purpose of prostitution. If no such provisions exist, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of such a prohibition in the near future.

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering a child for illicit activities, particularly the production and trafficking of drugs. The Committee previously observed that the use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs, did not appear to be specifically prohibited by the relevant Jamaican legislation. It also noted that, in practice, children were used in Jamaica as drug couriers and for selling drugs. However, the Committee noted that the draft list of hazardous work prohibited for children did prohibit involving children in illicit activities and the drug industry, as well as more specific provisions prohibiting children from cultivating ganja and guarding ganja fields.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the draft of the list of hazardous work prohibited for children has not yet been adopted. However, the Government indicates that one of the reported cases of human trafficking concerned the use of a child in drug-related activities. The Committee also notes the information from the International Trade Union Confederation in a report entitled "Internationally Recognized Core Labour Standards in Jamaica" of January 2011 that in the country, boys are used as drug couriers and dealers. The Committee, therefore, once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of the provisions (in the list of hazardous work prohibited for children) prohibiting the involvement of children in illicit activities and the drug industry, in the near future. The Committee also requests the Government to take measures to ensure that this offence is punishable with sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties.

Article 4(1). Determination of hazardous work. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that a tripartite workshop was held to identify hazardous types of work, and that a list of types of hazardous work would be contained in the new Occupational Safety and Health Act (OSH Act) or its regulations. The Committee noted that the draft hazardous work list contained 45 types of prohibited work.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the list of hazardous work will be included in the regulations of the new OSH Act, when adopted. The Government indicates that the OSH Act has been reviewed and placed on the Ministry of Labour and Social Security's legislative agenda for 2012–13. Observing that the Government has been developing this list since 2006, the Committee reminds the Government that, in accordance with Article 1 of the Convention, it is under the obligation to take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. It, therefore, once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures, as a matter of urgency, to ensure that the OSH Act, and the regulations containing the list of types of hazardous work prohibited for children, is adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide a final copy of the list, once it has been adopted.

Articles 5 and 7(1) and Part V of the report form. Monitoring mechanisms, penalties and the application of the Convention in practice. Trafficking of children and child prostitution. The Committee previously noted that trafficking of children (particularly for the purpose of forced prostitution) and commercial sexual exploitation of children (especially in tourist areas) are a problem in Jamaica. The Committee also noted that more vigorous investigations of trafficking offences was necessary. In this regard, the Government indicated that the Child Labour Unit collaborated with the Trafficking in Persons Unit in the Jamaica Constabulary Force. However, the Government also indicated that an assessment on the enforcement machinery to combat child labour in Jamaica indicated that much more needed to be done on the ground to facilitate greater cooperation between agencies.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that a Plan of Action to Combat Trafficking in Persons was developed in May 2012, which is to be endorsed by the Cabinet. The Committee also notes the information in the Government's report submitted under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), that the National Task Force Against Trafficking in Persons is responsible for the implementation of the Plan of Action, and that this plan includes an emphasis on the suppression of trafficking in persons and prosecution policies for offenders. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the Trafficking in Persons Act 2009 is to be reviewed to allow for stiffer penalties for offenders, mandatory reporting responsibilities to bring known or suspected cases to the relevant authorities and sentencing guidelines.

The Committee notes the information in the report of the Office of the Children's Registry, submitted with the Government's report, that between 2007 and the first seven months of 2011, this Office had received eight reports concerning the trafficking of children for the purpose of sexual exploitation and 23 reports of the trafficking of children for the purpose of labour exploitation. The Government states that, despite increases in reports related to child labour and child trafficking, this is not reflected in the number of cases brought before courts. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's statement in its report submitted under Convention No. 29 that since 2007, eight suspected cases of human trafficking have been investigated, but police have encountered problems pursuing investigations. The Committee, therefore, observes that the number of reported cases of child trafficking appears to be significantly higher than the total number of cases of trafficking that were investigated. Moreover, the Committee notes that the Human Rights Committee, in its concluding observations of 17 November 2011, expressed concern at the prevalence of trafficking in persons for sexual exploitation and forced labour, particularly with regard to the low level of investigations, prosecutions and convictions in this area (CCPR/C/JAM/CO/3, paragraph 22). The Committee, therefore, urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure, in practice, the protection of children from trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation. It requests the Government to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of perpetrators of the trafficking or commercial sexual exploitation of children are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions are imposed in practice. It asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this respect, including through the Plan of Action to Combat Trafficking in Persons, and the results achieved, particularly the number of persons investigated, convicted and sentenced for cases of trafficking involving victims under the age of 18.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Providing the necessary and appropriate assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Child victims of trafficking and prostitution. The Committee previously noted that child trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation were present in Jamaica. It observed that the Government was taking some measures to provide assistance to child victims of these worst forms of child labour and, in this regard, noted that a shelter for trafficking victims would soon become operational.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that efforts are still being made to have the government shelters become operational, but that this will be included in the new Plan of Action to Combat Trafficking in Persons 2012–15. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that the Trafficking in Persons Act 2009 is to be reviewed to allow for, among others, restitution for victims. The Government further indicates that the Ministry of Justice is launching a Children in Court Programme, which will train staff to address the unique needs of children as they go through the court process, including counselling. Nonetheless, the Committee notes that the Human Rights Committee, in its concluding observations of 17 November 2011, expressed concern at the lack of protection mechanisms for victims of trafficking, including rehabilitation schemes (CCPR/C/JAM/CO/3, paragraph 28). The Committee, therefore, requests the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to ensure the provision of appropriate services, including legal, psychological and medical services, to child victims of trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation, including child sex tourism, to facilitate their rehabilitation and social reintegration. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on measures taken in this regard, including the number of children reached through these initiatives.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (b). 1. Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Penal Code prohibits certain acts associated with the prostitution of women, including those under 18, but does not do so in respect of boys under the age of 18.

The Committee once again notes the Penal Code provisions referenced in the Government's report, but observes that these provisions do not appear to prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a boy under 18 for the purpose of prostitution. The Committee also notes the Government's reference to the Human Trafficking Act of 2009. The Committee notes that section 3(a) of the Human Trafficking Act prohibits leading, transferring, sheltering or receiving any person under the age of 18 years of age for their exploitation, even if that exploitation is not accompanied by the threat of force, or its use, deception, misuse of power or the exploitation of a state of weakness. Section 3(b) specifies that exploitation includes prostitution or any form of sexual exploitation.

Referring to paragraph 506 of its General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work, the Committee recalls the importance of ensuring that both boys and girls are provided protection against commercial sexual exploitation. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the prohibition contained in section 3 of the Human Trafficking Act covers the use, procuring or offering of boys under 18 years for the purpose of prostitution in situations not linked to trafficking, in its next report.

2. Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee previously observed that while the Penal Code prohibited subjecting a boy or girl under 15 to an act that is contrary to morals, as well as prohibiting the utterance of indecent words to them, the legislation did not appear to contain provisions prohibiting the use, procuring or offering of all persons under 18 for the production of pornography.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Human Trafficking Act prohibits the trafficking of persons under 18 years for the purpose of sexual exploitation. However, the Committee notes that these provisions do not appear to specifically address the use of children for the production of pornography. The Committee, therefore, urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to prohibit the use, procuring or offering of all persons under 18 for the production of pornography and pornographic performances, in conformity with Article 3(b) of the Convention.

Article 4(3). Periodic examination of the list of hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that the Order on dangerous, tiring or health endangering tasks for young persons of 1997 provides for a list of types of hazardous work, and that this list was amended in 2004.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that a technical committee was established by the Ministry of Labour to examine the list of types of hazardous work in light of the specific hazards affecting young persons. In this regard, the Committee notes with satisfaction that the list of hazardous, tiring or health jeopardizing tasks for young persons was amended on 16 July 2011, and that this revised list is much more comprehensive than the previous list, particularly as it focuses on the types of hazards rather than jobs. The Committee notes that this revised list is divided into eight categories of work: physical hazards; tasks with psychological and social hazards; tasks with moral hazards; tasks with chemical hazard; tasks with physiological hazards; work with biological hazards; tasks with ergonomic hazards; and other hazards.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Kazakhstan

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2001)

Parts III and V of the report form. Labour inspection and the application of the Convention in practice.

1. General application. The Committee previously noted that, according to the 2006 Multiple Clusters Indicator Survey approximately 3.2 per cent of all children aged 5–14 (approximately 79,515 children) engage in some form of economic activity. The Committee also noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), in its concluding observations of 19 June 2007, expressed concern at the large number of socially vulnerable children engaged in labour (CRC/C/KAZ/CO/3, paragraph 63).

The Committee notes the Government's indication that, as part of a nationwide campaign against child labour, planned and comprehensive investigations of cases of child labour were carried out in various sectors of the economy. The Government indicates that these inspections revealed that child labour was used in car washes (in wet and cold conditions); in city markets (in the transport of goods in handcarts and in unloading goods); in private retail outlets; in agriculture; and as attendants in petrol stations, including at night. The Committee also notes that the Committee on Economic and Social Rights (CESCR), in its concluding observations of 7 June 2010, expressed concern regarding the persistence of child labour in the country (E/C.12/KAZ/CO/1, paragraph 27). Lastly, the Committee notes the information from the ILO–IPEC that Kazakhstan is one of the countries participating in a project to collect national child labour statistics through the ILO–IPEC's Statistical information and monitoring programme on child labour (SIMPOC). Through this project, a child labour survey is planned for the spring of 2013 by the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, the Agency of Statistics and SIMPOC. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to pursue its efforts, in collaboration with the ILO–IPEC, to ensure that sufficient data on the situation of working children in Kazakhstan is made available. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the child labour survey planned for 2013, once completed. The Committee also urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to effectively monitor and combat child labour in the country, and requests the Government to provide information on the number of inspections carried out, violations detected and penalties imposed in this regard.

2. Tobacco and cotton plantations. The Committee previously noted the Government's statement that it is prohibited to employ minors on tobacco and cotton plantations, and that the List of Works in which it is prohibited to employ workers under the age of 18 (of June 2007) includes both work in cotton and tobacco. However, the Committee noted that the CRC, in its concluding observations of 19 June 2007, expressed concern at the large number of children engaged in labour within the tobacco and cotton industries (CRC/C/KAZ/CO/3, paragraph 63).

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that, in the course of inspections carried out within the framework of the national campaign against child labour, child labour was identified in the agriculture sector, particularly in the cultivation of tobacco and cotton. The Committee also notes the information in the Government's report submitted under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that, following the fifth session of the Government's Inter-departmental Commission for Juvenile Affairs and the Protection of Minors' Rights, recommendations were adopted to address the socio-economic problems faced by rural households engaged in cotton growing and the elimination of child labour in South Kazakhstan province. The Government also indicates that the Department on the Protection of Children's Rights in the Almaty province, in cooperation with a private tobacco enterprise, carried out a "Prevention of Child Labour Programme".

The Committee notes, however, that the CESCR, in its concluding observations of 7 June 2010, expressed concern about child labour in Kazakhstan performed by children of migrant workers in tobacco and cotton farms, and that these children did not attend school during farming periods (E/C.12/KAZ/CO/1, paragraph 27). Moreover, the Committee notes that the Human Rights Committee, in its concluding observations of 19 August 2011, expressed regret at the increase in the number of children employed in cotton and tobacco fields (CCPR/C/KAZ/CO/1, paragraph 16). The Committee must therefore, once again, express its concern at reports of a large number of children working in the cotton and tobacco industries, despite legislative prohibitions. The Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure the effective enforcement of the relevant legislation in these sectors, including through the strengthening of labour inspection in cotton and tobacco plantations. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on measures taken in this regard, and on the results achieved.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2003)

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously that noted that studies on child labour in Kazakhstan revealed that children are mostly engaged in the informal and agricultural sectors. In agriculture, child labour was mostly identified in tobacco and cotton harvesting, although this agricultural work is prohibited for persons under 18. In this regard, the Committee also noted the Government's indication that investigations in the Almaty province revealed that children from Kyrgyzstan (aged 6–15) were working in tobacco fields for approximately 75 hours a week, and that Uzbekistani children had been discovered working in cotton fields in the Makhtaaraal district of South Kazakhstan.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that, following the 2011 round table on "Working conditions of persons employed in agricultural work", a resolution was adopted to extend the Programme to Prevent Child Labour in the Almaty province. The Government states that these ongoing efforts aim to eliminate the violations identified in a report entitled "Hellish Work Exploitation of Migrant Tobacco Workers in Kazakhstan". This report outlines that many children of migrant workers engage in tobacco cultivation and that this work is hazardous, posing significant health risks, including musculoskeletal disorders, exposure to high temperatures, exposure to pesticides and fumes from tobacco plants, and is performed under poor sanitary and hygiene conditions, often for long hours. The Committee also notes that the Human Rights Committee, in its concluding observations of 19 August 2011, expressed regret at the increase in the number of children employed in cotton and tobacco fields (CCPR/C/KAZ/CO/1, paragraph 16). Therefore, while noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee expresses its concern at reports of a large number of children working in the cotton and tobacco industries under hazardous conditions, despite legislative provisions prohibiting this practice. The Committee, therefore, urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the prohibition on employing children under 18 in both cotton and tobacco harvesting is strictly enforced in practice, including for the children of migrant workers. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on measures taken in this regard, including measures to strengthen the capacity of the labour inspectorate to protect children from this hazardous work. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of inspections carried out, violations detected and penalties applied, related to work performed by children under 18 in cotton and tobacco harvesting.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Kenya

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1979)

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee had previously noted that according to the ILO–IPEC TACKLE project report, four action programmes had been implemented in Kenya under this project which resulted in the withdrawal of about 1,050 children from child labour who were enrolled back in schools or placed in skills training through apprenticeship, in addition to 351 children who have been prevented from dropping out of school and from entering into child labour. It had also noted from the ILO–IPEC TACKLE project report that following the implementation of the Kenya Education Sector Programme (KESSP), the net enrolment rates at the primary level increased from 83.2 per cent in 2005 to 92.5 per cent in 2008. The Committee had noted, however, that about 20 per cent of all primary school children did not complete the primary school cycle. It further noted from the ILO–IPEC TACKLE project report that according to the 2009 National Census, nearly 4 million children of school-going age were out of school, which implies that the number of children in or at risk of child labour could be higher than the 756,000 reported in the 2008 Child Labour Analytical Report.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that it is making efforts through the county administration to ensure that children are kept in school and that the Ministry of Labour has been provided with extra budget for the purpose of strengthening the County Child Labour Committees (CCLCs) and carrying out child labour inspections. The Committee further notes the Government's information that it is currently being engaged in consultations with ILO–IPEC to undertake a child labour survey in Kenya which is expected to be carried out in October 2012. The Committee notes from the Labour Commissioner's annual report of 2011, (available on the Government website) that through the activities undertaken by the CCLCs, 788 children were found involved in child labour and its worst forms, 176 children were withdrawn from work and sent to school, 290 children were withdrawn from work and placed in youth polytechnics and vocational training centres. Furthermore, 880 children are being provided with school uniforms and school fees to ensure that they do not drop out of school and engage in child labour.

The Committee further notes that according to the information available from the ILO–IPEC (SNAP project report), the net enrolment rate at primary level increased to 96 per cent in 2011 and the transition rate from primary to secondary school reached 72 per cent. It also notes that within the framework of the SNAP project, a total of 1,951 children (893 girls and 1,058 boys) were withdrawn or prevented from child labour through the provision of educational services or training opportunities. In addition, the Committee notes the information from ILO–IPEC that the TACKLE project supported a rapid assessment on child labour in salt mines located in Coast Province. The project also supported the National Council for Children Services to develop a national children database that will help the Government collect data on key child protection indicators which will be used for planning and reporting purposes. While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee must once again express its deep concern at the high number of children who are not attending school and are involved or are at risk of being involved in child labour. It therefore urges the Government to continue its efforts to improve the situation of child labour in the country. It requests the Government to provide information on the findings of the rapid assessment survey on child labour in salt mines in Coast Province. The Committee also encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to undertake a child labour survey, and to provide any up-to-date statistical information obtained in this regard.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee had previously noted that, under section 7(2) of the Children's Act, every child shall be entitled to free basic education which shall be compulsory. It had also noted the Government's statement that in order to address the gap between the minimum age for admission to employment (16 years) and the age of completion of compulsory schooling (14 years), the Government had waived the tuition fees for the first two years in secondary schooling. It had further noted the Government's indication that it has not envisaged adopting any legislation fixing the age of completion of compulsory education. In this regard, the Committee had noted the information provided by the Government representative of Kenya to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2006 concerning the application of Convention No. 138 that it had appointed a committee to review the Education Act with a view to modifying, inter alia, the age of completion of compulsory schooling. Recalling that this Convention had been ratified by Kenya more than 25 years ago, the Conference Committee had urged the Government to ensure that legislation addressing the gap between the age of completion of compulsory schooling and the minimum age for admission to employment or work would be adopted shortly. The Committee had noted with regret that despite the request which it has repeatedly made since 2002, no measures have yet been taken to give effect to the Convention. It had therefore urged the Government to take the necessary measures, without delay, to extend compulsory schooling up to 16 years which is the minimum age for employment in Kenya.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that in the reviewed Education Bill which is currently before the cabinet for approval, it has been proposed that the compulsory schooling be extended to 18 years. In this regard, the Committee must emphasize the desirability of linking the age of completion of compulsory schooling with the minimum age for admission to work, as provided under Paragraph 4 of the Minimum Age Recommendation, 1973 (No. 146). It also recalls that according to Article 2(3) of the Convention the specified minimum age shall not be less than the age of completion of compulsory schooling. If the minimum age for admission to work or employment is lower than the school-leaving age, children may be encouraged to leave school as children required to attend school may also be legally authorized to work (see General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work, paragraph 370). Noting that the Education Bill proposes to extend the compulsory schooling age up to 18 years which is higher than the minimum age for admission to work (16 years), the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the revision of the Education Bill does not fail to take into account the principle laid down under Paragraph 4 of the Minimum Age Recommendation, 1973 (No. 146). The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Education Bill respecting the provisions of Article 2(3) of the Convention will be formulated and adopted in the near future.

Article 3(2). Determination of hazardous work. The Committee had previously noted the Government's statement that the list of types of hazardous work prohibited to children under 18 years had been approved by the National Labour Board and was awaiting to be published in the Gazette by the Ministry of Labour. It had noted that the draft document entitled "Determining Hazardous Child Labour in Kenya: July 2008" prepared by the Ministry of Labour and Human Resources Development in consultation with the Central Organization of Trade Unions and the Federation of Kenya Employers, contained a comprehensive list of 18 types of hazardous occupations/sectors including: work in domestic households; transport; internal conflicts; mining and stone crushing; sand harvesting; miraa picking; herding of animals; brick making; agriculture; work in industrial undertakings; carpet/basket weaving; building construction; tannery; deep lake and sea fishing; glass factory; matches and fireworks factory; urban informal sector; and scavenging with each sector further providing a list of various activities that are prohibited to children.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the List of Hazardous Work, 2008 is currently being reviewed and a consultant has been appointed with the assistance of ILO-IPEC to enable the normal process of adoption. Noting with regret that the Government has been referring to the adoption of this draft regulation on the list of types of hazardous work since 2005, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that this regulation is adopted in the very near future. It requests the Government to supply a copy thereof once it has been adopted.

Article 3(3). Admission to hazardous work as from 16 years of age. The Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that the competent Minister had issued regulations in respect of periods of work and establishments where children aged at least 16 years may work, including hazardous work, referred to in section 10(4) of the Children's Act. It had also noted the Government's statement that the Children's Act was being reviewed and that a copy thereof would be sent after adoption by the Parliament. It had further noted the Government's statement that the regulations under section 10(4) of the Children's Act were adopted, and that a copy would be provided. The Committee had observed that the Government had been stating since 2005 that this regulation under section 10(4) of the Children's Act had been issued by the Minister, and had strongly urged the Government to supply a copy thereof along with its next report.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the matter has been taken up with the relevant department and that it will ensure that information on the progress made in the discussions will be supplied as soon as possible. Observing that Kenya ratified the Convention over 30 years ago and that the question of revision of the Children's Act and the adoption of the regulation under section 10(4) of the Children's Act has been raised for a number of years, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of regulations in respect of periods of work and establishments where children aged at least 16 years may work, including hazardous work, referred to in section 10(4) of the Children's Act.

Article 7(3). Determination of light work. The Committee had previously noted that, according to section 56(3) of the Employment Act, the minister may make rules prescribing light work in which a child of 13 years may be employed and the terms and conditions of that employment. It had noted the Government's statement that the rules and regulations which stipulate the types of light work activities permitted to children of 13 years, and which prescribe the hours and conditions of such employment had not yet been completed.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that the rules prescribing the light work in which a child of 13 years and above may be employed has been developed and discussed by stakeholders and is currently at the Attorney General's Office for adoption. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the regulations determining the light work activities that may be undertaken by children of 13 years of age and above and the number of hours during which and the conditions in which, such work may be undertaken, will be adopted soon. It requests the Government to provide a copy once they have been adopted.

Article 8. Artistic performances. The Committee had previously taken note of section 17 of the Children's Act, which provides that a child shall be entitled to leisure, play and participation in cultural and artistic activities. It had also noted that the national legislation does not provide for permits to be granted to children participating in cultural artistic performances. The Committee had noted with regret that despite its reiterated comments for many years, no measures had yet been taken by the Government to this effect.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the matter to establish the provisions for granting permits for young persons under the age of 16 years has been taken up by the relevant ministries and the outcome of the discussions will be supplied soon. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the provisions allowing for young persons below 16 years of age to take part in artistic activities through permits granted in individual cases and which prescribe the number and hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work is allowed, will be formulated and adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to supply information on any progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 102nd Session and to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Kyrgyzstan

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2004)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee previously noted that section 124(1) of the Criminal Code prohibits the trafficking of persons, and section 124(2) specifies that trafficking in persons under 18 is an aggravated offence. However, the Committee noted the Government's indication to the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) that the victims of trafficking in Kyrgyzstan include women and children who were exploited in the sex industry in Turkey, China and the United Arab Emirates (May 2006, CRC/C/OPSC/KGZ/1, page 10). The Committee further noted that the CRC, in its concluding observations, expressed regret at the lack of statistical data, and the lack of research on the prevalence of national and cross-border trafficking and the sale of children (2 February 2007, CRC/C/OPSC/KGZ/CO/1, paragraph 9).

The Committee notes the information from ILO-IPEC that the Ministry of Foreign Affairs is developing a National Action Plan Against Human Trafficking for 2012–15. The Committee also notes the information from the report of the UN Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences, of 28 May 2010, that trafficking of women and children for sexual exploitation and forced labour continues to be a problem in the country (A/HRC/14/22/Add.2, paragraph 33).

The Committee must once again express its concern at the lack of data on the prevalence of child trafficking in Kyrgyzstan, as well as reports of the prevalence of this phenomenon in the country. The Committee, therefore, requests the Government to pursue its efforts to adopt the National Action Plan Against Human Trafficking, and to provide information on the measures taken within this framework to combat the trafficking of persons under the age of 18, once adopted. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that sufficient data on the sale and trafficking of persons under the age of 18 is made available. In this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the number of infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied for violations of section 124 of the Criminal Code. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by sex and age.

Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of children for prostitution. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 157(1) of the Criminal Code makes it an offence for a person to involve a minor in prostitution, while sections 260 and 261 of the Criminal Code make enticement into prostitution an offence. The Committee also noted the Government's indication that the number of street children and children in risk groups forced into prostitution was rising. Moreover, the Committee noted that the CRC, in its concluding observations, expressed concern that in a number of cases of child prostitution, investigations and prosecutions had not been initiated, and that child victims may be held responsible, tried and placed in detention (CRC/C/OPSC/KGZ/CO/1, paragraphs 17 and 21). The Committee expressed concern that child prostitution continues in part due to the lack of legal oversight, and that children who are the victims of commercial sexual exploitation risk being regarded as criminals.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that prostitution is one of the forms of child labour targeted by the Programme of Action by the Social Partners for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour. However, the Committee also notes the information in the Report of the UN Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences, of 28 May 2010, that adolescent girls in the country are particularly vulnerable to commercial sexual exploitation in urban areas, with the majority of the girls involved coming from rural areas (A/HRC/14/22/Add.2, paragraph 35). Noting the absence of information on the application in practice of the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to child prostitution, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide this information, in particular statistics on the number and nature of infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and sanctions applied. It also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that children who are used, procured or offered for commercial sexual exploitation are treated as victims rather than offenders. Lastly, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate whether the national legislation contains provisions specifically criminalizing the client who uses children under 18 years of age for the purpose of prostitution.

Clause (d). Hazardous work. Children working in agriculture. The Committee previously noted that section 294 of the Labour Code prohibits the employment of persons under the age of 18 years in work with harmful and dangerous conditions (including in the manufacture of tobacco) and that a detailed list of occupations prohibited for persons under 18 years had been approved. Nonetheless, the Committee noted that the use of hazardous child labour in the agricultural sector was widespread, particularly in tobacco, rice and cotton fields, and that in rural areas, regulations prohibiting children from engaging in such work were not strictly enforced. In this regard, the Committee noted the statement in a 2006 report of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (now the International Trade Union Confederation) entitled "Internationally recognized core labour standards in Kyrgyzstan" that some schools require children to participate in the tobacco harvest, and that the income from this goes directly to the schools, not the children or their families. This report also indicated that, in some cases, classes are cancelled and children are sent to the fields to pick cotton. The Committee further noted the information from ILO-IPEC that many of the children working in tobacco, rice and cotton fields in Osh and Jalalabat regions faced work-related risks including injuries resulting from the use of heavy equipment, lack of clean drinking water in the fields, exposure to toxic pesticides, insects and rodent bites, and hazards related to tobacco production (skin irritation and intoxication).

The Committee notes the Government's statement that work in the fields is one of the forms of child labour targeted by the Programme of Action by the Social Partners for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that 19.7 per cent of child labourers in the country are engaged in the agricultural sector. Furthermore, the Committee notes the continued implementation of a project aimed at eradicating child labour in the tobacco industry, developed by a non-governmental organization and carried out by trade union workers in the agro-industrial sector. The Government states that the goal of the project is to devise and introduce a mechanism for eliminating child labour in two pilot districts in the southern region of the country. Through the project, 1,123 families were given microcredit in 2011 and 131 mutual assistance groups were set up. The Government states that this project has enabled the removal of 3,142 children in the two districts from work in the tobacco industry. In addition, the Committee notes the information from ILO-IPEC of July 2012 that, through the project entitled "Combating Child Labour in Central Asia – Commitment becomes Action (PROACT CAR Phase III)", action has been taken to address hazardous child labour in agriculture. For example, through an action programme to support the establishment of a child labour free zone in Chuy region, implemented by the Trade Unions of Education and Science Workers of Kyrgyzstan (TUESWK) during the period June 2011 to August 2012, 140 children (75 boys and 65 girls) were withdrawn from, or prevented from entering, hazardous child labour in agriculture and the urban informal sector. In addition, 15 children (six boys and nine girls) were withdrawn from hazardous child labour in agriculture in the first six months of 2012 through a school-based package of services, including non-formal education, reintegration into formal education, school supplies, monthly food baskets, extra-curricular activities, awareness raising, recreational activities and family counselling. Taking due note of the measures taken by the Government, the Committee urges the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that persons under 18 years of age are protected against hazardous agricultural work, particularly in the cotton, tobacco and rice-growing sectors, and to provide information on the results achieved through the abovementioned initiatives. It also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective enforcement of regulations prohibiting children's involvement in hazardous agricultural work, and to provide information on the steps taken in this regard, in its next report.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Trafficking in children. The Committee previously noted a disparity between the number of trafficking victims identified and the number of victims receiving assistance, and it requested the Government to strengthen its efforts in this regard.

The Committee notes the information from the International Organization for Migration that it is implementing a project entitled "Combating Trafficking in Persons in Central Asia: Prevention, Protection and Capacity Building" in the country from 2009–12, which includes awareness raising and assistance for victims. The Committee also notes the implementation in Kyrgyzstan of the Joint Programme to Combat Human Trafficking in Central Asia of the ILO, the United Nations Development Programme and the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime under the UN Global Initiative to Fight Human Trafficking, which includes support for the development of national referral mechanisms established between law enforcement agencies and civil society organizations. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken, including through these projects, to provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of child victims of trafficking, and for their rehabilitation and social integration. It also requests the Government to supply information on the results achieved, including the number of victims of trafficking under the age of 18 who have benefited from repatriation and rehabilitative assistance.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Lebanon

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2003)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Scope of application. The Committee previously noted that the Labour Code only applies to work performed under an employment relationship (by virtue of sections 1, 3 and 8 of the Code). The Committee reminded the Government that the Convention applies to all branches of economic activity and covers all types of employment or work, whether they are carried out on the basis of an employment relationship or not, and whether they are remunerated or not. It requested the Government to provide information on the manner in which children who are not bound by an employment relationship are covered by the protection provided for in the Convention. The Committee noted the information in the Government's report that Chapter 2, section 15, of the draft amendments to the Labour Code, prepared by a tripartite committee, provides for rules governing "the employment or work of young persons". The Committee noted the Government's statement that the principles in this amendment therefore include all young persons, and not solely those bound by an employment relationship. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption in the near future of the draft amendments to the Labour Code relating to self-employed children or children in the informal economy, and to provide a copy, once adopted.
