Article 2(2). Minimum age for admission to employment or work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, at the time of ratifying the Convention, Lebanon declared 14 years as the minimum age for admission to employment or work and that Act No. 536 of 24 July 1996, amending sections 21, 22 and 23 of the Labour Code, prohibits the employment of young persons before they complete 13 years of age (i.e. beginning of 14 years). The Committee also noted the Government's information that it intended to amend the Labour Code, to prohibit the employment or work of young persons before they complete 14 years (i.e. beginning of 15 years). The Committee noted the information in the Government's report that section 19 of the draft amendment to the Labour Code prohibits the employment or work of persons under the age of 15 years. Noting that the Government specified a minimum age of 14 years at the time of ratification, the Committee drew the Government's attention to the fact that Article 2(2) of the Convention establishes the possibility for a State which decides to raise the initially specified minimum age for admission to employment or work to notify the Director-General of the International Labour Office by means of a further declaration. This enables the age fixed by the national legislation to be aligned to that provided for at international level. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in the adoption of the draft amendments to the Labour Code.

Article 2(3). Compulsory education. The Committee previously noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), in its concluding observations of 2002 (CRC/C/15/Add.169), while noting that basic education was free and compulsory until the age of 12, expressed concern about its implementation in practice. It noted the Government's indication that Act No. 686/1998 relating to free and compulsory education in the primary phase has not so far been applied, due to the economic conditions of the country and the insufficient educational facilities. The Committee also noted that, according to the 2004 ILO–IPEC survey that in Lebanon, 18.9 per cent of children drop out of school at the elementary level (6–11 years), 22.8 per cent at the intermediate level (12–15 years) and 10.6 per cent at the secondary level. According to this survey, dropping out of school was a major contributing factor to the early participation of boys and girls in the labour market.

The Committee noted the information in the Government's report that 250 children (in three schools), who were at risk of dropping out, were assisted and given additional lessons through a programme entitled "Strengthening courses in basic subjects". The Committee also noted the information in the November 2008 report of the Minister of Education and of Higher Education submitted to UNESCO for the 48th International Conference on Education entitled "The Development of Education in Lebanon", that the Government intends to raise the age at which compulsory education ends, from the current 12 years to 15 years of age. The Committee further noted that the CRC, in its concluding observations of 8 June 2006 expressed concern that in primary education, parents are still charged for some costs of education despite the legal guarantee of free education, and that dropout rates have increased at this level while enrolment in secondary education declined (CRC/C/LBN/CO/3, paragraph 63).

The Committee was of the view that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour and it is important to emphasize the necessity of linking the age of admission to employment to the age limit for compulsory education. If the two ages do not coincide, various problems may arise. If compulsory schooling comes to an end before the young persons are legally entitled to work, there may be a period of enforced idleness. However, if young persons are legally entitled to work before the end of completion of compulsory schooling, children from poor families might be tempted to drop out of education and work in order to earn money (see ILO: Minimum Age, General Survey of the reports relating to Convention No. 138 and Recommendation No. 146 concerning minimum age, Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, Report III (Part 4(B)), ILC, 67th Session, Geneva, 1981, paragraph 140). Noting the Government's intention to raise the age of completion of compulsory schooling to 15 years, the Committee reminded the Government that pursuant to Article 2(3) of the Convention the minimum age for admission to employment (currently 14 years) should not be lower than the age of completion of compulsory schooling. Therefore, the Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to provide for compulsory education up until the minimum age for admission to work (which is currently 14 years, and will be 15 years with the adoption of the draft amendments to the Labour Code). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any new developments on this point.

Article 3(1) and (2). Minimum age for admission to, and determination of, hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that section 1 of Decree No. 700 of 1999 prohibits the employment of young persons before they complete 17 years of age (i.e. beginning of 18 years). The Committee also noted that Decree No. 700 of 1999 provides for a detailed list of the types of hazardous work in which it is prohibited to employ young persons. The Committee further noted the information in the Government's report that the National Committee to Combat Child Labour (NCCL) was formulating a statute on the worst forms of child labour which, in accordance with Article 3(1) and (2) of the Convention, prohibits the employment of children under 18 years in work which, by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to jeopardize the health, safety or morals of children.

The Committee noted that section 20 of the draft amendments to the Labour Code prohibits the employment or labour of children before they reach 18 years in work which, by its nature or the conditions in which it is carried out, is likely to expose them to danger. The Committee also noted that the "Draft Decree on the prohibition of employing children before they complete 18 years of age in work which is likely to jeopardize their health, safety or morals" (Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work), was issued by Advisory Opinion No. 239 of the State Council on 26 May 2009 and will be promulgated following approval by the Council of Ministers. The Committee noted the Government's statement that the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work was formulated by the NCCL following the study entitled "Worst Forms of Child Labour – under 18 years old in Lebanon". The Committee further noted that section one of the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work provides for the annulment of Decree No. 700 of 1999, and that section two contains a list of the worst forms of child labour prohibited for children under 18, including work with physical, psychological and moral hazards, and work that would limit the young persons' access to education and training. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption by the Council of Ministers of the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work (as issued by Advisory Opinion No. 239 of the State Council on 26 May 2009).

Article 3(3). Authorization to undertake hazardous work from 16 years. The Committee previously noted that section 23(1) of the Labour Code prohibits the employment of young persons under 15 years of age in industrial projects and activities which are physically demanding or detrimental to their health, as set out in Annexes 1 and 2. The Committee observed that section 23(1) of the Labour Code was not in conformity with Article 3(3) of the Convention, to the extent that it appeared to allow young persons from 15 to 16 years to perform hazardous work. The Committee noted the information in the Government's report that the draft amendment to the Labour Code includes the principles specified in Article 3(3) of the Convention.

The Committee noted the information in the Government's report that, by virtue of an order of the Ministry of Labour, section 20(3) of the draft amendments to the Labour Code authorizes employment or work in hazardous types of employment as of 16 years of age, under certain conditions. The Committee also noted that section 3 of the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work contains a list of activities which may be authorized as of 16 years of age, on the condition that the health, safety and morals of young persons are fully protected and that they have received adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity. The Committee observed that this list prohibits the employment of children under 16 years in work with chemical hazards, physical hazards, intellectual or social hazards, safety hazards (such as heights), some types of agricultural work, work in slaughterhouses, work in construction, work in transport, work in horse races, work in restaurants or hotels, or work in factories with more than 20 employees. The Committee expresses the firm hope that section 3 of the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work, concerning the authorization of some types of hazardous work for persons between the ages of 16 and 18, will be adopted shortly and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Article 4. Exclusion from the application of the Convention of limited categories of employment or work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that section 7 of the Labour Code excludes from its application, and consequently from the scope of application of the Convention, the following categories of work: (a) workers in households in Beirut; (b) agricultural undertakings which are unrelated to trade and industry and which shall have their own legislation; (c) undertakings which only employ family members under the management of the father, mother or guardian; and (d) Government departments and municipal bodies with respect to daily and temporary workers not covered by the regulations governing officials. The Committee also noted the Government's reference to the draft amendments to the Labour Code which would regulate the first three of the abovementioned four excluded categories, by a decree issued by the Council of Ministers.

The Committee noted that section 2(2) of the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work, submitted with the Government's report, prohibits, for persons under the age of 18, work with psychological hazards, including domestic work and work where the young person sleeps outside of the home. The Committee also noted that section 3(2) of the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work, concerning work prohibited for children under the age of 16, prohibits the employment of a young person in agricultural work (including family undertakings) which requires a tractor, work involving sharp equipment, work involving high ladders or trees or the mixing or dispersal of pesticides and fertilizers and the picking or handling of poisonous plants (including tobacco). The Committee observed that, by virtue of these provisions in the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work, effect is given to the Convention with regard to the previously excluded categories of employment. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the provisions of the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work relating to domestic workers and children employed in agricultural work (including family undertakings) will be adopted shortly and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Article 6. Vocational training and apprenticeship. The Committee previously noted the information in the Government's report that section 16 of the draft amendment to the Labour Code provides for the definition of "training contract" and states that the minimum age to receive vocational training under a contract is 14 years, provided that conditions to safeguard the health, safety or morals of the young persons in question are respected. The Committee noted the Government's statement that amendments are still ongoing to the proposed draft amendments. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in adopting section 16 of the draft amendments to the Labour Code, fixing a minimum age of 14 years for entry into an apprenticeship, in conformity with Article 6 of the Convention.

Article 7. Light work. Following its previous comments, the Committee noted the information in the Government's report that section 19 of the draft amendments to the Labour Code provides that employment or work of young persons in light work may be authorized when they complete 13 years of age (except in different types of industrial work in which the employment or work of young persons under the age of 15 years old is not authorized), on the condition that such employment or work, by its nature or the circumstance in which it is carried out, does not jeopardize their development, health, safety or morals. Section 19 further states that this work should not weaken their capacity to benefit from instruction received, nor should it impact on their participation in vocational orientation and training approved by the competent authority. The Committee also noted the Government's statement that light work activities shall be determined by virtue of an Order promulgated by the Ministry of Labour. The Committee further noted that the Ministry of Labour set up a committee, pursuant to Memorandum 58/1 of 20 June 2009, which in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, shall formulate this statute, among other labour standards. In addition, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour, in coordination with ILO-IPEC, is preparing a study on the classification of occupations undertaken by working children, within the framework of the ILO-IPEC programme "Supporting the national strategy for the elimination of child labour in Lebanon, third phase", so as to formulate this statute on light work. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the formulation and adoption of a statute determining light work activities, in conformity with Article 7 of the Convention, following the adoption of the draft amendments to the Labour Code.

The Committee noted the Government's statement that the draft amendments to the Labour Code have reached an advanced stage and will be referred to the competent authority for its adoption in the shortest delay. The Committee also noted the Government's statement that some amendments are still ongoing to the draft amendments, to achieve additional conformity between its provisions and the provisions of Arab and international labour Conventions. Considering that the Government has been referring to the draft amendments to the Labour Code for a number of years, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the amendments are adopted in the near future. Furthermore, the Committee encourages the Government to take into consideration, during the review of the relevant legislation, the Committee's comments on discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention and invites it to consider technical assistance from the ILO.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which reads as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or similar to slavery. Trafficking. The Committee previously noted that the relevant Lebanese legislation does not specifically prohibit the trafficking of women and children. The Committee noted that the cooperation project, the "Anti-trafficking project", had been agreed upon by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) and the Ministry of Justice (MoJ) to ensure the conformity of national legislation with the Protocol against the Smuggling of Migrants by Land, Sea and Air and with the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons especially Women and Children. According to the project document annexed to the Government's report, the existing Lebanese legislation was reviewed to identify gaps and formulate specific recommendations regarding necessary amendments and adoption of specific anti-trafficking legislation. The Committee noted that this legal review was sent to the MoJ for comments and clearance.

The Committee noted the information in the Government's report that the amendments to the Labour Code, prepared by a tripartite committee (which was set up by virtue of Order No. 210/1 of 20 December 2000), include provisions relating to the sale and trafficking of children. The Committee noted the information in the Government's report that section 33(a) of these amendments penalizes any person who participates, encourages or facilitates all forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery, such as the sale and trafficking of children. The Committee observed that it has drawn the Government's attention to the lack of legislation prohibiting the sale and trafficking of children since 2005. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of the draft amendments to the Labour Code relating to the prohibition of the sale and trafficking of all persons under the age of 18, as a matter of urgency.

Clauses (b) and (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances and for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs. The Committee previously noted the Government's information that section 33(b) of the draft amendments to the Labour Code specifies that any person who participates, encourages, facilitates or incites anyone to use, procure or offer a child or young person for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances is liable to punishment under the Penal Code, in addition to the penalties imposed by the Labour Code. Furthermore, the Committee noted the Government's information that section 33(c) of the draft amendments to the Labour Code provides that any person who participates, encourages, facilitates or incites another to use, procure or offer a child or young person for illicit activities, especially for the production and trafficking of drugs, commits a penal crime under the Penal Code.

The Committee noted the Government's statement that the amendments to the Labour Code are in their last stages and they shall be referred to the competent authorities for adoption within the shortest delay. However, the Committee also noted the Government's statement in its report submitted under Convention No. 138 that further revision to the draft amendment to the Labour Code are still necessary. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of the draft amendments to the Labour Code prohibiting the use, procuring or offering of persons under the age of 18 for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances, and the use, procuring or offering of persons under the age of 18 for illicit activities.

Clause (d). Hazardous work. The Committee previously noted the Government's information that Decree No. 700/1999 prohibits the employment of young persons before they complete 17 years of age (i.e. beginning of 18 years) in dangerous activities enumerated according to their nature. The Committee also noted the Government's indication that the National Committee to Combat Child Labour (NCCL) was formulating a statute on the worst forms of child labour to amend Decree No. 700 of 1999 and supplement section 23(1) of the Labour Code.

The Committee noted that section 20 of the draft amendments to the Labour Code prohibits the employment of children under 18 years in work which, by its nature or the conditions in which it is carried out, is likely to expose them to danger. The Committee also noted that the “Draft Decree on the prohibition of employing children before they complete 18 years old in work which is likely to jeopardize their health, safety or morals” (Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work), was approved by Advisory Opinion No. 239 of the shura on 26 May 2009, and will be promulgated following approval by the Council of Ministers. The Committee further noted the Government’s statement that the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work was formulated by the NCCL following the study entitled “Worst Forms of Child Labour under 18 years old in Lebanon”.

The Committee noted that section 1 of the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work provides for the annulment of Decree No. 700/1999, and that section 2 provides a list of the worst forms of child labour prohibited for children under 18, including work with physical, psychological and moral hazards, and work that would limit the young persons’ access to education and training. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption by the Council of Ministers of the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work for children under 18 as a matter of urgency and requests it to provide information on developments in this regard.

Considering that the Government has referred to these draft amendments to the Labour Code for a number of years and, given that Article 1 of the Convention obliges member States to take “immediate” measures to prohibit the worst forms of child labour, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the amendments are adopted as a matter of urgency. Furthermore, the Committee encourages the Government to take into consideration, during the review of the relevant legislation, the Committee’s comments on discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention and invites it to consider technical assistance from the ILO.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Lesotho

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy designed to ensure the effective abolition of child labour. The Committee previously noted that the Programme Advisory Committee on Child Labour had endorsed the Action Plan for the Elimination of Child Labour (APEC) in 2008. The Government indicated that the APEC had been submitted to Cabinet for approval. The Committee also noted that the Children’s Protection and Welfare Bill had yet to be adopted, and had urged the Government to take measures in this regard.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Children’s Protection and Welfare Act was adopted on 8 June 2011. However, the Committee also notes the Government’s indication that the APEC has not yet been submitted to Cabinet. The Government indicates that a review of the APEC is necessary to ensure that the recommendations are still relevant and that a tripartite stakeholder workshop will be convened by September 2011 in this regard. Observing that the APEC has been awaiting Cabinet approval since 2008, the Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the appropriate review, adoption and implementation of the APEC in the near future.

Article 2(1). Scope of application. Self-employment and domestic work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the provisions of the Labour Code excluded self-employment from its application. However, the Committee subsequently noted that the draft revision of the Labour Code contained a provision to apply the Labour Code’s sections on the minimum age and related issues to self-employed children and children working in the domestic sector. While the Government indicated that efforts were being made towards the adoption of the draft revision, the Committee observed that the Government had been referring to the impending adoption of the draft revision to the Labour Code since 2006.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, pursuant to tripartite discussion at the National Advisory Committee on Labour, separate regulations will be promulgated on domestic work, and that this sector will not be regulated through the revised Labour Code. Moreover, the Committee notes that the revised Labour Code has been given to the Government’s legal draftsmen in preparation for submission to Parliament. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that the law does not currently provide for inspections to be carried out in the informal economy, hindering the detection of child labour. Therefore, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the revised Labour Code provides the protection guaranteed in the Convention to children working on a self-employed basis and in the informal economy, and to ensure the adoption of the revised Code without delay. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the regulations developed on domestic work are consistent with the Convention with regard to the minimum age for admission to work, hazardous work and light work.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee previously noted that primary education is not compulsory and that many children do not have adequate access to education. Additionally, the Committee noted the information from UNESCO’s Education for All: Global Monitoring Report of 2010 that there were approximately 101,000 out-of-school children between the ages of 6 and 12. However, the Committee noted that a Bill introducing free and compulsory education (and including sanctions for parents if they did not send their children to school) was before Parliament. Recalling that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of the Bill.

The Committee notes with interest that the Education Act was adopted in 2010. The Committee notes that, pursuant to the Education Act, primary school is free and compulsory. However, the Committee observes that primary school is generally completed at the age of 13 years in Lesotho. Nonetheless, the Government indicates that the issue of linking the age of completion of compulsory schooling with the age of admission to work will be discussed with the Ministry of Education and Training. In this regard, the Committee once again draws the Government’s attention to the importance of linking the age of admission to employment to the age limit for compulsory education; if compulsory schooling comes to an end before young persons are legally entitled to work, there may be a period of enforced inactivity or the early or premature entry into employment or work. The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure compulsory education up to the minimum age of employment (of 15 years), and urges the Government to collaborate with the Ministry of Education and Training in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government to provide a copy of the Education Act, with its next report.

Article 6. Minimum age for admission to apprenticeship. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that, during the revision of the Labour Code, due consideration would be given to bringing the Labour Code into line with the requirements of Article 6 of the Convention. However, the Government also indicated that there was no regularized system of vocational and technical education, that no consultations had been held on this matter and that there was no minimum age for admission to apprenticeships.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that this matter will be taken up with the Ministry of Education and Training. In this regard, the Committee once again reminds the Government that pursuant to Article 6 of the Convention, the minimum age for admission to work in undertakings in the context of vocational training or an apprenticeship programme is 14 years. It therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures, within the context of the draft revision of the Labour Code, to ensure that no child under 14 years of age is permitted to undertake an apprenticeship in an enterprise, in conformity with Article 6 of the Convention.

Article 7. Light work. The Committee previously noted that section 124(2) of the Labour Code permits the employment of children between the ages of 13 and 15 for light work in technical schools and similar institutions, provided that the work has been approved by the Department of Education. Subsequently, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the draft revision of the Labour Code includes a provision (proposed section 124(6)) which defines light work as work which is not likely to be harmful to the health or development of the child and does not affect the child's attendance in, or the child's capacity to benefit from, school.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the proposed section 124(6) of the revised Labour Code will only permit the performance of light work in technical schools and similar institutions. However, observing the significant number of children under the minimum age who are, in practice, engaged in economic activity (36 per cent of children aged 13 years and 38 per cent of children aged 14 years according to the most recent Multiple Indicator Cluster Survey), the Committee encourages the Government to consider regulating light work outside of technical schools to ensure that these children benefit from the protection of the Convention. If the Government decides to permit light work for children between the ages of 13 and 15 outside of technical schools, the Committee draws the Government's attention to Article 7(3) of the Convention, which states that the competent authority shall determine what is light work and shall prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work may be undertaken. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments with regard to the regulation of light work activities, particularly with regard to providing legal protection to children between the ages of 13 and 15 who are, in practice, engaged in light work outside of technical schools.

Parts III and V of the report form. Labour inspectorate and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted that, according to the 2004 Lesotho Child Labour Survey, 23 per cent of the children in Lesotho are child labourers. The survey also indicated that children mainly work in agricultural activities followed by those who work as domestic workers. The Government indicated that the office of the Labour Commissioner carries out inspections in all commercial enterprises but not in the informal economy and private residences, which is where most child labour occurs.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that it is making efforts to conduct a new child labour survey, and that consultations were held with ILO-IPEC in June 2011 regarding technical assistance for this purpose. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that it is facing considerable capacity constraints which makes it difficult to extend inspection services to the informal economy, and that this is exacerbated by the lack of a legal basis to perform inspections in the informal economy. The Government indicates that inspection reports therefore only relate to commercial and industrial undertakings, and do not contain information on the number and nature of violations related to child labour. Noting the Government's indication under Article 2(1) that the adoption of the revised Labour Code is imminent, thereby providing the legal basis for carrying out inspections in the informal economy, the Committee urges the Government to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate to areas in which children work, particularly the informal economy. Furthermore, the Committee urges the Government to pursue its efforts to undertake a child labour survey, and to provide any up-to-date statistical information obtained in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which reads as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee previously urged the Government to take immediate measures to ensure the adoption of legislation prohibiting the sale and trafficking of children.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act was enacted into law on 11 January 2011, and that section 5(1) and (2) of this Act prohibits the trafficking of children. Section 5(2) of this Act provides for a maximum penalty of life imprisonment or a fine of up to 2,000,000 Lesotho malotis (LSL) for this offence (approximately US$253,453). In addition, the Committee notes that section 2 of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act defines a child as a person who is under 18 years of age and defines trafficking to include the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring, sale, supply or receipt of persons, within and across the borders of Lesotho by means of the use of threat, force or other means of coercion, abduction, kidnapping, fraud or deception, the abuse of power, law or legal process or a position of vulnerability or debt bondage or the giving or receiving of payment to obtain the consent of a person having control over another person, for the purpose of exploitation. Moreover, the Committee notes with interest that the Children's Protection and Welfare Act was adopted on 31 March 2011 and that section 67 thereof prohibits the trafficking of children (defined as all person under the age of 18, pursuant to section 3 of the Act).

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that street children were used by adults in illegal activities, such as housebreaking and petty theft. It also noted the Government's indication that there is no legislation that specifically prohibits the use, procuring or offering of a child under the age of 18 for illicit activities. However, it noted that the section 129A(3)(c) of the draft revision of the Labour Code prohibited the worst forms of child labour, including the use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs.

The Committee notes that section 18 of the Children's Protection and Welfare Act states that a child has the right to be protected from, inter alia, being involved in the production, trafficking or distribution of drugs. However, the Committee observes that this provision does not appear to explicitly prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child for other illicit activities, nor does it provide for penalties for adults who engage in this practice. Regarding the draft revision of the Labour Code, the Committee notes the Government's statement that the Code is currently being prepared for presentation to Parliament and that it hopes that the draft revision of the Labour Code will be adopted early next year. Observing that the Government has been referring to the impending adoption of the draft revision of the Labour Code since 2006, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure its adoption in the near future, to prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child under 18 for illicit activities.

Clause (d). Hazardous work. Child domestic work. The Committee previously noted that, according to the 2004 Lesotho Child Labour Survey, girls performing domestic work face verbal, physical and, in some cases, sexual abuse from their employers, and that these children generally do not attend school. This survey also indicated that 17.4 per cent of all working children were paid domestic workers. The Committee further noted the Government's reference to the provision inserted in the draft revision of the Labour Code which provides for the protection of children engaged in domestic work. In addition, the Committee noted the information in the joint document produced by ILO-IPEC and the Ministry of Employment and Labour in 2006 entitled "Implementation Plan of the Programme towards the elimination of the worst forms of child labour in Lesotho" that girls as young as 12 years work as domestic workers, and that these children often work long exhausting days for low pay.

The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report submitted under the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), that, pursuant to tripartite discussions at the National Advisory Committee on Labour, separate regulations will be promulgated on domestic work, instead of regulating domestic work through the Labour Code. The Committee also notes the Government's statement in its report to the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women of 26 August 2010 that domestic work is an unregulated sector and the rights of these workers are open to abuse (CEDAW/C/LSO/1-4, paragraph 68). The Committee accordingly urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that child domestic workers are protected from hazardous work. In this regard, it requests the Government to take measures to ensure that the regulations promulgated on domestic work prohibit hazardous work in this sector to all children under 18 years of age. It further requests the Government to provide a copy of these regulations, once adopted.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee noted the comments of the Commissioner of Labour of 2 March 2008 indicating that child labour continues to be a problem in Lesotho, particularly with regard to under-age domestic workers and herders. The Committee also noted the information in the joint document produced by ILO-IPEC and the Ministry of Employment and Labour of 2006 indicating that the trafficking of children, commercial sexual exploitation, the use of children by adults in illegal activities and hazardous street work are all present in Lesotho. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the nature, extent and trends of the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that a child labour survey needs to be carried out in order to determine the nature, extent and trends of child labour in Lesotho, as the last such survey was carried out in 2004. The Government indicates that meetings were held with ILO-IPEC in June 2011 regarding technical assistance for this purpose. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to undertake a survey on child labour and its worst forms, to ensure that up-to-date statistical information on this subject is made available. It also requests the Government to provide, along with its next report, information on the number and nature of infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed with regard to the worst forms of child labour. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by sex and age.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Madagascar

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Underground Work) Convention, 1965 (No. 124) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the communication of 27 August 2012 from the General Confederation of Workers' Unions of Madagascar (CGSTM).

Article 2(1) of the Convention and Part V of the report form. Medical examination of persons under 21 years of age prior to underground work in mines and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee noted previously that section 82 of Decision No. 58-AR of 8 May 1958 setting forth the safety rules applying to mines and quarries provides that no worker may be assigned to underground work without first undergoing a medical examination finding him to be fit for such employment. The Committee also noted that sections 7, 8 and 9 of Order No. 2806 of 8 July 1968 to organize occupational medical services provide in particular that employers must have regular visits organized for periodic medical examinations and that all workers are required to undergo a medical examination that includes an x-ray film of the lungs prior to taking up employment or in the month following at the latest. Furthermore, the Committee noted with interest that by virtue of section 8 of Decree No. 2003-1162 of 17 December 2003 to organize occupational medicine, every worker, before being hired or at the latest in the month after being hired, "shall undergo a medical examination consisting of at least an x-ray film of the lungs". Pursuant to sections 7 and 9 of the Decree, periodical medical examinations are also compulsory and include "special medical examinations for workers exposed to the risk of occupational diseases".

The Committee notes the CGSTM's assertion that to its knowledge, there are no longer any mining companies in Madagascar's formal sector that carry on underground work and employ young persons within the meaning of the Convention. The problem does arise, however, in family undertakings in the informal sector, for example in the sapphire mines of the Ilakaka region, in which minors work up to 50 meters underground without proper safety precautions or ventilation. The CGSTM reports that the absence of adequate legislation means that these young people undergo neither a pre-employment medical examination to ascertain their fitness nor any regular medical checks. Lastly, the CGSTM states that the Government has not as yet undertaken any action to resolve the problem.

The Committee observes that children working in family undertakings on an informal basis appear not to be covered by the legislation regarding medical examinations. The Committee points out that according to Article 2 of the Convention, a thorough medical examination for fitness for employment and periodic re-examinations at intervals of not more than one year shall be required for the employment or work underground in mines of persons under 21 years of age, regardless of whether the work is performed in the formal sector or the informal economy and whether or not it is based on an employment relationship. The Committee asks the Government to take steps to ensure that all children and young persons under 21 years of age enjoy the protection afforded by the Convention, particularly those who work in family undertakings in mining and quarrying in the informal sector. It asks the Government to provide information on these matters in its next report, and particularly on the effect given in practice to the provisions requiring a pre-employment medical examination and subsequent periodic re-examinations for young persons under 21 years of age working underground in family undertakings in the informal sector.

Article 5(4) and (5). Records pertaining to employees under 21 years of age. In its previous comments the Committee noted that according to the Government, a record must be kept by the employer and must consist of three parts: personal particulars, data concerning the worker's position within the undertaking and a separate section for visas, observations and warnings issued by the labour inspector to the undertaking. The Committee noted that although the sample record provided by the Government in its report clearly indicates the employee's date of birth, it contains no indication of the nature of the work and does not include a certificate attesting fitness for employment, as required by Article 4(4) of the Convention. The Committee nonetheless noted that by virtue of section 6 of Decree No. 2007-563 on child labour, the employer must keep a record showing the full identity, the type of work, the wage, the number of hours of work, the state of health, the schooling and the situation of the parents of each child employee under the age of 18 years.

The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government to the effect that Order No. 129-IGT of 5 August 1957 establishing a standard employer's register, pursuant to section 252 of the Labour Code, is still in force. The Government states that the Order needs revision in order to adapt it to present circumstances and that the Committee's recommendations will be forwarded to the National Labour Council, a body for tripartite consultation. The Committee accordingly observes that it would appear that there is still no requirement for employers' records to contain a certificate of fitness for employment in respect of young persons aged from 18 to 21 years engaged in underground work. The Committee again asks the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that employers are required to keep a record showing the date of birth, duly certified wherever possible, an indication of the nature of the occupation and a certificate attesting fitness for employment, for all persons between 18 and 21 years of age who are employed or work underground, and to make these records available to the workers' representatives at their request. It asks the Government to supply information on progress made in this regard in its next report.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the communication of the General Confederation of Workers' Unions of Madagascar (CGSTM) of 27 August 2012, and the Government's report.

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the National Survey on Child Labour (ENTE) of 2007, conducted by the National Bureau of Statistics in conjunction with ILO/IPEC/SIMPOC, more than one child out of four in Madagascar between 5 and 17 years of age (28 per cent) is economically active, that is 1,870,000 children. The participation rate in economic activity increases with age: while 12 to 15 per cent of children between 5 and 9 years of age are economically active, the rate rises to over 30 per cent in the 10–14 year age group, and to 55 per cent in the case of children between 15 and 17 years. The problem is more acute in rural areas, where 31 per cent of children are engaged in an economic activity, compared with 19 per cent in urban areas. Most economically active children are in the agricultural and fishing sector, where most of them (two out of three) help families. In the case of children between 5 and 14 years of age, 22 per cent are engaged regularly in an economic activity and 70 per cent attend school. The Committee notes the allegations of the CGSTM that many underage children from rural areas are sent to large towns by their parents to work in the domestic sector. These children are exposed to household work, which can be exhausting and they sometimes do not have leave or fixed hours of work. Moreover, these children have not necessarily completed their compulsory schooling.

The Committee noted previously the adoption of the National Plan of Action to Combat Child Labour in Madagascar (PNA), and the six plans of action covering the rural sector, mining and quarrying, manufacturing, domestic work, catering and trade, and miscellaneous activities. It noted the Government's indication that the first phase of the PNA lasted five years and ended in 2009. The PNA was in an extension phase, and a policy plan for the second phase of the PNA had been drawn up. The Government also indicated that before the end of 2011 certain activities would be undertaken to support the implementation and extension of the PNA strategies.

The Committee notes the CGSTM's indication that it reiterates the observations made in its previous communication.

The Committee notes the Government's indications concerning the activities to combat child labour. The Government indicates in particular that the workplan of the National Committee to Combat Child Labour (CNLTE) for 2012–13 has been adopted. The Government also reports several projects that are currently being implemented: the AMAV project against child domestic labour; the workplan against child labour in vanilla plantations in the Sava region; the workplan to combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children; and the plan of action concerning child labour in mines and stone quarries in the Atsimo Andrefana region, implemented in the context of the ILO/IPEC TACKLE project. While taking due note of the measures taken by the Government to combat child labour, the Committee observes that the Government has not provided any information on the impact of the measures adopted on the progressive elimination of child labour. The Committee notes that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 8 March 2012 (CRC/C/MDG/CO/3–4, paragraph 59), while noting that Madagascar has adopted programmes and policies to combat child labour, also notes with concern the lack of information on any investigations and prosecution of persons responsible for child labour. The Committee of Experts is therefore bound once again to express its deep concern at the considerable number of children under the minimum age obliged to work, as well as the conditions under which these children are exploited. The Committee firmly requests the Government to redouble its efforts to combat child labour and urges it to provide information on the results achieved for the implementation of the PNA and other programmes of action in terms of the progressive abolition of child labour.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to a document published by the UNESCO International Bureau of Education, the age of completion of compulsory schooling is lower than the minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee observed that, according to this document, the official age of access to primary education is 6 years and the duration of compulsory schooling is five years, meaning that the age of completion of compulsory schooling is 11. The Committee noted the Government's indications that it is fully aware of the importance of compulsory schooling as a means of combating child labour. The Government indicated that several meetings had been held on this subject with a view to giving the issue of national education the importance that it deserves, but that much remains to be done, particularly in light of the political crisis affecting the country. The Committee noted the CGSTM's allegation that no changes had yet been made by the Government to resolve the problem of the difference between the age of completion of compulsory schooling (11 years) and the minimum age for admission to employment or work (15 years).

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Education is currently pursuing its efforts so as to be able to take measures to resolve the gap between the minimum age for admission to employment or work and the age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee reminds the Government that compulsory schooling is one of the most effective means of combating child labour and emphasizes how necessary it is to link the age for admission to employment or work with the age at which compulsory education ends, as envisaged in Paragraph 4 of the Minimum Age Recommendation, 1973 (No. 146). The Committee observes that if compulsory schooling ends before young persons are legally authorized to work, there may arise a vacuum which regrettably opens the door for the economic exploitation of children (see the General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work, paragraph 371). The Committee therefore once again expresses the firm hope that the Government will take measures to raise the age of completion of compulsory schooling so that it coincides with the age of admission to employment or work in Madagascar. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this respect.

Article 6. Vocational training and apprenticeship. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that a decree determining the conditions of work with respect to vocational training and apprenticeships would be examined by the National Labour Council (CNT), which is a tripartite body. It also noted the Government's indication that the Ministry of Employment and Vocational Training was preparing various regulations on vocational training which were to be examined in 2006. The Committee also noted that the Ministry of Employment and Vocational Training was planning to submit to Parliament a Bill on the national employment policy, in which further vocational training and apprenticeships were a priority objective. The Committee noted the Government's indications that the draft legislative texts on vocational training and apprenticeship had been examined by the CNT, but that, in view of the political crisis and the closure of many enterprises, the CNT was not yet in a position to take final decisions and that several of its members want to re-examine the issue once the crisis is over.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that it recognizes the current blockage in Madagascar since the crisis and that full information on progress relating to the legislation on vocational training and apprenticeship will be provided in due time. The Committee once again firmly encourages the Government to intensify its efforts and to take the necessary measures to ensure that the draft texts on apprenticeship and vocational training are adopted in the very near future. It once again requests the Government to provide copies of these texts once they have been adopted.

The Committee notes the communication of the General Confederation of Workers' Unions of Madagascar (CGSTM) of 27 August 2012, and the Government's report.

Articles 3(a) and (b) and 7(1) of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery, use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution, and sanctions. Sale and trafficking and the sexual exploitation of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 15 of Decree No. 2007-563 of 3 July 2007 concerning child labour (Decree No. 2007-563) prohibits all forms of forced or compulsory labour, including the sale and trafficking of young persons under 18 years of age. The Committee also noted that section 13 of Decree No. 2007-563 categorically prohibits the procuring, use, offering and employment of children of either sex for prostitution. The Committee noted that section 261 of the Labour Code and sections 334, 335 and 354–357 of the Penal Code, to which reference is made in Decree No. 2007-563, establish effective and dissuasive sanctions prohibiting, among other offences, the sale and trafficking of children and the procuring or offering of a child for prostitution.

The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 2007-038 of 14 January 2008 amending and supplementing certain provisions of the Penal Code to combat trafficking in persons and sex tourism. Under the terms of section 5 of the Act, a section 331bis has now been inserted into the Penal Code and prohibits the debauchery, corruption or prostitution of children of either sex. Section 6 of the Act inserts sections 33ter, quarter and quinto, containing detailed provisions prohibiting all forms of trafficking of children under 18 years of age for exploitation, as well as the sale of children for any purpose, including sexual exploitation, forced labour, slavery or practices similar to slavery. Act No. 2007-038 also establishes effective and dissuasive sanctions for the engagement, abduction or deception of a person with a view to their engagement in prostitution, sexual exploitation or sex tourism.

However, the Committee notes that, while recognizing that Madagascar has adopted relevant legislative provisions to prevent and prohibit sexual exploitation, the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), in its concluding observations of 8 March 2012 (CRC/C/MDG/CO/3-4, paragraphs 61–63), notes with serious concern that child prostitution and sex tourism are on the rise in the country, with orphans being particularly vulnerable. Referring to the State party report (CRC/C/MDG/3-4, paragraph 787), the Committee on the Rights of the Child notes that a quarter of children aged 6–17 years who were working in Antsiranana in 2006 were victims of sexual exploitation and expresses concern at the low number of investigations into and prosecutions for child prostitution. The CRC is also greatly concerned at the high level of trafficking in persons, including children, from Madagascar to neighbouring countries and the Middle East for purposes of domestic servitude and sexual exploitation. While noting the adoption of Act No. 2007-038 of 2008, the CRC expresses concern that the law is not sufficiently implemented and, in particular, has not resulted in any convictions to date.

The Committee recalls that, under the terms of Article 7(1) of the Convention, the Government shall take all necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, including the application of sufficiently effective and dissuasive penal sanctions. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the sanctions against persons found guilty of trafficking in children under 18 years of age or their use, procuring or offering for sexual exploitation, are applied in practice. The Committee also requests the Government to provide statistical data on the number and nature of the violations reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and the penal sanctions applied.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Children at special risk. Street children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour and Social Legislation (MTLS) was continuing its programme of school attendance and training for street children in the context of the Public Investment Programme for Social Action (PIP). It noted that the action of the PIP was extended to the regional level, under the direction of the labour and social legislation services in each region, and that the "Manjary Soa" centre, financed by the PIP, supports child victims of labour, and particularly of the worst forms of child labour, and offers them remedial teaching or vocational training. The Committee noted the CGSTM's allegation that the number of street children has increased in recent years. The CGSTM added that the action taken by the Government to help them was still minimal. In reply, the Government indicated that the programmes financed in the context of the PIP aim to remove 40 children a year from the worst forms of child labour, or 120 children over three years.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the political and economic crisis currently faced by Madagascar has resulted in the loss of many jobs and the impoverishment of households, contributing to an increase in the number of children compelled to work. The Government adds that, in the context of the PIP, it is continuing to implement programmes for the social reintegration of victims of the worst forms of child labour, but that the crisis has had a direct effect on the financing of these programmes by the State. The Government, nevertheless, indicates that in 2012 the programme is providing support for 40 children engaged in the worst forms of child labour, such as prostitution, hazardous types of work and domestic work. While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee is bound to express its concern at the fact that the number of street children has recently increased and that the 2009 crisis appears to be affecting the implementation of PIP programmes and it, therefore, requests the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure that street children are protected from the worst forms of child labour, and are provided with support for their rehabilitation and social integration. It once again requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the results achieved in this respect.

Parts IV and V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee noted previously that, according to the National Survey on Child Labour (ENTE) of 2007, conducted by the National Statistical Institute in collaboration with ILO/IPEC/SIMPOC, more than one in four Malagasy children aged between 5 and 17 years (28 per cent) are economically active, or 1,870,000 children. The participation rate of children between the ages of 15 and 17 years in economic activities is 55 per cent, which may partly be explained by the fact that schooling is no longer compulsory for this age group. Furthermore, the majority of economically active children (82 per cent) are engaged in harmful work. In total, nearly 1,534,000 children are engaged in such activities. Among children aged 15 and over, approximately one economically active child out of two (49 per cent), or 328,000 children, are engaged in harmful work, that is in one of the worst forms of child labour. The ENTE also indicates that in Madagascar 23 per cent of economically active children between the ages of 5 and 17 years are engaged in hazardous types of work, or 438,000 children. The agricultural, stock-raising and fishing sectors account for most harmful types of work performed by children, in both rural and urban areas (88 and 72 per cent, respectively). In contrast with rural areas, child labour in urban areas is characterized by the importance of domestic work (11 per cent) and work in commerce and catering (10 per cent). Girls are often engaged in domestic work (17 per cent of girls between the ages of 15 and 17 years, compared with 9 per cent of boys in the same age group), or an activity in the commerce and catering sectors (5 and 7 per cent of girls aged between 10 and 14 and between 15 and 17 years of age, respectively).

The Committee previously noted the CGSTM's allegations that the political and economic crisis in Madagascar resulted in even more under-age children entering labour and employment. With regard to the worst forms of child labour, the most affected sectors are mining, agriculture and manufacturing. The CGSTM indicated that children work in mines (Llakaka) and in stone quarries under precarious and sometimes dangerous conditions. Furthermore, the worst forms of child labour exist in the informal economy and in rural areas, which are not covered by the labour administration.

The Committee notes the CGSTM's recent indication that it reiterates the allegations made in its previous communication.

The Committee notes the Government's indications that the second phase of the National Plan of Action to Combat Child Labour in Madagascar (PNA) is intended, inter alia, to improve legal frameworks, step up awareness-raising campaigns, mobilize funds to extend action against child labour and the worst forms of child labour, and update databases on child labour as the campaign advances to combat child labour. While noting the measures taken by the Government to combat child labour and the worst forms of child labour in the context of the PNA, the Committee is bound to express its concern at the situation and number of children under 18 years of age forced to undertake hazardous work, and it urges the Government to intensify its efforts to eliminate these worst forms of child labour. It requests the Government to continue providing information on any progress achieved in this respect and on the results achieved. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the worst forms of child labour including, for example, studies and inquiries on the subject and information on the nature, extent and trends of the worst forms of child labour, the number of children covered by the measures giving effect to the Convention, the number and nature of infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by age and sex.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Malawi

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and practical application of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, while many measures were being implemented by the Government to combat child labour through the ILO-IPEC project "Support to the National Action Plan to Combat Child Labour in Malawi", the Government was moving slowly in the final adoption of the national policy and National Action Programme (NAP), even though these had been adopted at ministerial level. The Committee also noted that the Malawi Multiple Indicator Cluster Survey of 2006 indicates that approximately 33.6 per cent of all persons between the ages of 5 and 14 (1.4 million children) are involved in economic activity in Malawi.

The Committee takes due note of the Government's information that its National Child Labour Policy was finalized and that it has launched the NAP on Child Labour for Malawi (2010–16), in which the responsibilities of all stakeholders in the fight against child labour are well articulated. The priorities of the NAP include developing and improving the policy and legislative framework; building the capacity of the education sector; creating awareness and bridging the information gap on child labour; and building the institutional and technical capacity of service providers. Considering that the last comprehensive survey on child labour in Malawi was undertaken in 2002 and that no follow-up survey was done, it is also envisaged to conduct a national child labour survey and regularly update national child labour statistics in order to determine their trends and prevalence. Expressing its concern at the considerable number of children under 14 who are engaged in economic activity in Malawi, the Committee once again urges the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure the progressive abolition of child labour and the enforcement of the relevant legislation in the country. The Committee also requests the Government to supply information on the implementation of the NAP on Child Labour, and on the results achieved in terms of the progressive abolition of child labour. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the results of the national child labour survey when they are available.

Article 2(1). Scope of application. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Employment Act is applicable only where there is an employment contract or labour relationship and does not cover self-employment. The Committee therefore drew the Government's attention to possibilities for providing self-employed children the protection of the Convention, including the elaboration of legislation specifically to ensure children's rights or by strengthening the labour inspectorate in sectors where children are often self-employed, such as the commercial agricultural sector. Indeed, the Committee had noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 27 March 2009, expressed concern that many children between 15 and 17 are engaged in work that is considered as hazardous, especially in the tobacco and tea estate sector (which continues to be a major source of child labour) (CRC/C/MWI/CO/2, paragraph 66). In this regard, the Committee had noted that the Tenancy Labour Bill, a Bill which establishes a minimum age for employment in the tobacco sector and provides for frequent inspections of tobacco estates, had been finalized technically and was awaiting Cabinet approval (prior to submission to Parliament). Nonetheless, the Government had indicated that it has a considerable backlog of legislation to deal with.

The Committee observes that, within the framework of the NAP on Child Labour in Malawi, it is envisaged to vigorously promote the Tenancy Labour Bill for enactment. In this regard, the Government indicates that the forthcoming parliamentary sitting will likely discuss the Bill and adopt it, at which point a copy of the Tenancy Labour Act will be forwarded to the Committee. The Committee once again expresses its concern that the Tenancy Labour Bill has yet to be adopted and urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of the Bill at the next parliamentary sitting. It expresses the firm hope that, in adopting the Tenancy Labour Bill, the labour inspection component concerning children working in the commercial agricultural sector on their own account will be strengthened, and requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard along with its next report.

Article 3(1). Minimum age for admission to hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted a discrepancy between article 23 of the Constitution, which provides for protection from dangerous work for children below the age of 16 years, and section 22(1) of the Employment Act, which, in accordance with the Convention, lays down a minimum age of 18 years for work that is likely to be harmful to their health, safety, education, morals or development, or prejudicial to their attendance in school. This issue was discussed at a tripartite meeting in 2005, where it was agreed by all social partners that there was a need to harmonize the provisions of the national laws. Subsequently, this issue was presented to the Malawi Law Commission for consideration, and the Commission recommended that the age stipulated under article 23 of the Constitution be raised to 18 years of age.

The Committee notes that the Government provides no information on that point in its report. Yet, according to the NAP on Child Labour, inconsistencies among various pieces of legislation relating to children, including the Constitution, remain an issue. Observing that the discrepancy between section 22(1) of the Employment Act and article 23 of the Constitution has been under discussion since 2005, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures, within the framework of the NAP on Child Labour or otherwise, to ensure that the recommended amendment to article 23 of the Constitution is adopted in the very near future, in conformity with Article 3(1) of the Convention.

Article 3(2). Determination of types of hazardous work. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's information that a List of Hazardous Work for children has been finalized and that it is currently being processed for gazetting. Observing that the Government has been referring to the List of Hazardous Work since 2006, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the draft list of types of hazardous work is adopted without delay. It requests the Government to provide a copy of this list as soon as it is adopted.

Article 9(3). Keeping of registers by employers. The Committee previously noted that section 23 of the Employment Act stipulates that every employer is required to maintain a register of persons aged below 18 years employed by, or working for, him/her. However, the Committee also noted the indication of the Malawi Trade Unions Congress (MCTU) that some estates did not have registers, particularly in commercial agriculture. The Committee noted the Government's indication that labour inspectors have demanded labour registers when inspecting any workplace and, where no such register exists, the owner is advised to purchase one which is available at the government press or any bookshop. The Government also indicated that the applicable parliamentary Act still did not have a model register, that the registers available at the government press are general and that employers use different formats. Nonetheless, the Government indicated that following discussions with the social partners, it was resolved to develop standard templates for various legislative prescriptions, including a model for a labour register. The Committee noted the Government's information that the draft model register would be finalized before the end of the year, and that this draft will be submitted to the Tripartite Labour Advisory Council for adoption.

The Government indicates that the modern register of employment will be in conformity with Article 9(3) of the Convention and will be submitted to the Committee as soon as it is produced. In this regard, the Committee once again reminds the Government that, pursuant to Article 9(3) of the Convention, the registers kept by employers shall contain the names and ages or dates of birth, duly certified wherever possible, of persons whom they employ, or who work for them, and who are less than 18 years of age. Observing that the Government has been referring to the model register of employment since 2006, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure its elaboration and adoption without delay. It once again requests the Government to supply a copy of the model register as soon as it is adopted.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which reads as follows:

Articles 3 and 7 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour and penalties. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, although various penal provisions relate to the offences of abduction and trafficking, these provisions are not comprehensive. However, the Committee noted that the Child Care, Protection and Justice Bill, which was adopted on 28 June 2010, contains a definition of child trafficking and imposes a penalty of life imprisonment for convicted traffickers, and expressed the firm hope that the adopted version of the Child Care, Protection and Justice Bill prohibits the sale and trafficking (both internal and cross-border) of all persons under 18 years of age for the purposes of labour and sexual exploitation.

The Committee notes that section 179(1) of the Child Care, Protection and Justice Act provides that a person who takes part in any transaction involving child trafficking is liable to life imprisonment. According to section 179(2), child trafficking means the recruitment, transaction, transfer, harbouring or receipt of a child for the purposes of exploitation. The Committee observes, however, that according to section 2(d) of the same Act, a “child” means a person below the age of 16 years. The Committee reminds the Government that by virtue of Article 3(a) of the Convention, Member States are required to prohibit the sale and trafficking of all children under 18 years of age. The Committee accordingly urges the Government to take immediate measures to ensure that the Child Care, Protection and Justice Act is amended to extend the prohibition of sale and trafficking to cover all children under the age of 18, as a matter of urgency. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of this Act, including in particular, statistics on the number and nature of violations reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions imposed.

Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution, for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. In its previous comments, the Committee observed that the use, procuring or offering of young persons under 18 years of age for prostitution, for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances existed in Malawi and that national legislation did not appear to prohibit these worst forms of child labour. The Committee noted the Government’s statement in its report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) of 17 July 2008, that, while there are no data available on the number of children involved in sexual exploitation, including prostitution and pornography, these are recognized problems in the country (CRC/C/MWI/2, paragraph 323). However, the Committee noted the Government’s indication that it endeavoured to include such a prohibition in the ongoing review of labour laws, including the Employment (Amendment) Bill, which was going through a final round of examination prior to submission to the Ministry of Justice.

The Committee notes that the Government’s report contains no new information on the adoption of the Employment (Amendment) Bill. It notes, however, the Government’s statement that the Child Care, Protection and Justice Act prohibits the procuring or offering of boys and girls under the age of 16 years for the purpose of prostitution, for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. In this regard, the Committee observes that section 84(1)(d) only provides that a social welfare officer who has reasonable grounds to believe that a child is being used for the purposes of prostitution or immoral practices may remove and temporarily place the child in a place of safety.

The Committee reminds the Government that Article 3(b) of the Convention requires Member States to prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child under 18 years for prostitution, for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee once again expresses its deep concern at the continued lack of regulation to prohibit the commercial sexual exploitation of children, and once again draws the Government’s attention to its obligation under Article 1 to take immediate measures to prohibit the worst forms of child labour. The Committee accordingly urges the Government to take the necessary measures, as a matter of urgency, to ensure the adoption of national legislation prohibiting the use, procuring or offering of both boys and girls under 18 years of age, for the purpose of prostitution, for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances, and to include sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions in this legislation. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard.

Article 4(1). Determination of types of hazardous work. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government’s information that a list of hazardous work for children is in the process of being finalized. Observing that the Government has been referring to the List of Hazardous Work since 2006, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the draft list of types of hazardous work is adopted as a matter of urgency. It requests the Government to provide a copy of this list as soon as it is adopted.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour and providing assistance for the removal of children from these types of work and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Children engaged in hazardous work in commercial agriculture, particularly tobacco estates. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the summary outline for the ILO–IPEC Action Programme of 2007, entitled “Mzimba Project on Elimination of Child Labour”, there were 734,845 child labourers working in the agricultural sector in Malawi, out of which 288,341 were working in hazardous occupations. It also noted that the CRC, in its concluding observations of 27 March 2009, expressed concern that many children between 15–17 are engaged in work that is considered as hazardous, especially in the tobacco and tea estate sector, which continues to be a major source of child labour (CRC/C/MWI/CO/2, paragraph 66). The Committee noted that ILO–IPEC was implementing several action programmes in the tobacco sector, which sought to withdraw children from hazardous work and reintegrate these children into formal and non-formal educational programmes, as well as to raise awareness about child labour in agriculture.

The Committee notes the Government’s information that labour inspections have been undertaken in the tobacco sector, to help withdraw children from this sector, to rehabilitate and then to send them back to school. It further notes that, within the framework of the National Action Plan (NAP) on Child Labour, it is envisaged to improve awareness of child labour at all levels; prevent and withdraw children from such labour; and provide these children with educational opportunities. In this regard, the NAP on Child Labour indicates that the agricultural sector, including tobacco plantations and family farms, constitutes one of its sectoral priorities, as it accounts for 53 per cent of child labour in the country. The Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to protect children from hazardous work in the tobacco sector through measures taken within the framework of the NAP on Child Labour. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide concrete information on the number of children who have been thus prevented or withdrawn from engaging in this type of hazardous work, and then rehabilitated and socially integrated.

Clause (e). Special situation of girls. The Committee previously noted that, according to the Malawi child labour survey of 2002, all the child victims of commercial sexual exploitation were girls. Half of these girls had lost both of their parents, while 65 per cent of them did not attend school past the second year. The Committee also noted that the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, in its concluding observations of 5 February 2010, expressed concern at the extent to which women and girls are involved in sexual exploitation, including prostitution, and the limited statistical data regarding these issues (CEDAW/C/MWI/CO/6, paragraph 24). It therefore requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken to protect girls under the age of 18 from commercial sexual exploitation.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government provides no information on this point in its report. It therefore urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to prevent girls under the age of 18 from becoming victims of commercial sexual exploitation, and to remove and rehabilitate victims of this worst form of child labour, within the framework of the NAP on Child Labour or otherwise. It once again requests the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken in this regard, as well as information on the impact of these measures. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by age and sex.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Malaysia

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1997)

Article 3(1) and (2) of the Convention. Minimum age for admission to, and determination of, hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with satisfaction that, pursuant to section 2(1) of the Children and Young Persons (Employment) Act of 1966 (CYP Act), after amendment by the Children and Young Persons (Employment) (Amendment) Act of 2010 (CYP Amendment Act), no child or young person (i.e. all persons under 18 years) shall be required or permitted to engage in any hazardous employment. The Committee also noted that the CYP Act has been amended to include section 2(6) which states that, for the purpose of section 2, “hazardous work” means any work that has been classified as hazardous based on the risk assessment conducted by a competent authority on safety and health as determined by the Minister. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken, pursuant to section 2(6) of the CYP Act (as amended), to determine the types of work which constitute hazardous work prohibited to persons under the age of 18.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, taking due note of its request, the Labour Department will further discuss the issue and hold consultations with the relevant authorities, such as the Department of Safety and Health, in order to determine the types of work which constitute hazardous work prohibited to persons under the age of 18. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the hazardous types of work prohibited to children under 18 years of age are determined in the near future, in consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard in its next report.

Article 7(1). Minimum age for admission to light work. The Committee previously noted that section 2(2)(a) of the CYP Act allows children to be employed in light work which is adequate to their capacity, in any undertaking carried on by their family, but observed that no minimum age for admission to light work had been specified. The Committee recalled that Article 7(1) of the Convention provides for the possibility of admitting young persons to light work activities only from the age of 13 years.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that it has taken note of the Committee’s recommendation to establish a minimum age of 13 years for admission to light work, which would be taken into consideration during the current review of the CYP Act. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard in its next report.

Parts III and V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 25 June 2007, expressed concern that the enforcement of Convention No. 138 remained weak (CRC/C/MYS/CO/1, paragraph 90). It also noted that the CRC expressed its regret at the lack of a national data collection system and at the insufficient data on working children. However, the Committee noted the indication of the Government representative at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards that the Malaysia peninsula alone has 300 labour inspectors, with every labour inspector carrying out between 25 and 30 inspections per month. The Government representative also indicated that, out of 30,084 complaints received on various labour issues, none of these cases related to child labour. Nonetheless, the Committee noted that the Worker members at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards indicated that issues remained, particularly with regard to children working on palm oil plantations, in the agricultural sector, and also with regard to children working in towns and cities.

Moreover, the Committee noted the statement in the report of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), for the World Trade Organization General Council on the Trade Policies of Malaysia of 18 and 20 January 2010, entitled “Internationally recognized core labour standards in Malaysia”, that child labour in Malaysia can be found primarily in rural areas in agriculture, where children often work along with their parents without receiving a salary. In urban areas, children work in restaurants, shops and small manufacturing units usually owned by family members. The ITUC further indicated in this report that the Government does not collect statistical data on child labour. The Committee noted the Government’s statement that the Labour Department (under the Ministry of Human Resources) is taking the necessary measures to ensure that data on working children are collected. The Government indicated that it would like to consider engaging the technical assistance of the ILO to facilitate this data collection. Moreover, the Committee noted the Government’s indication in its report submitted under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), that labour departments have been engaged in consultations with the police and the Immigration Department in respect of the employment of child workers, including on awareness raising among employers on child labour and the related legislation.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that data on child employment were previously collected through data entry in the Annual Employment Return/National Employment Return (NER) survey, but that since 2005 the NER survey does not include statistics disaggregated by age. The Government indicates that further discussion regarding data collection on the work of children and young persons will be taken into serious consideration, in line with support from the Institute of Labour Market Information Analysis and from the Information Management Division of the Ministry of Labour. The Government also indicates that it will work on data sharing with other agencies.

Furthermore, the Committee notes the Government's indication that it is in the midst of recruiting more labour officers in order to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate to better monitor children carrying out economic activities in the agricultural sector. In terms of capacity building, the Government indicates that it has an ongoing programme on training officers, in the framework of which more emphasis will be given to labour inspection in the agricultural sector. Taking due note of the efforts deployed by the Government, the Committee encourages it to pursue its efforts to ensure that up-to-date statistical data on the economic activities of children and young persons are collected and made available, including the number of children working under the minimum age of 15, and to provide this information in its next report. To the extent possible, this information should be disaggregated by sex and age. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate to better monitor children carrying out economic activities in the agricultural sector, and to provide information on the results achieved. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the increased number of labour inspectors and on the training they received regarding children carrying out economic activities in the agricultural sector.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee previously requested the Government to take measures to ensure that measures were adopted to prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child under 18 years of age for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the provisions in the Child Act prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child for pornographic performances. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's statement that section 31(1)(b) of the Child Act of 2001 states that any person with the care of a child who sexually abuses the child or causes or permits him to be so abused, commits an offence and shall on conviction be liable to a fine not exceeding 20,000 Malaysian ringgit (MYR) or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years, or to both. In this connection, the Committee notes that section 17(2)(c)(i) of the Child Act specifies that a child has been sexually abused if the child has taken part in any activity which is sexual in nature for the purposes of any pornographic, obscene or indecent material, photograph, recording, film, videotape or performance. The Committee requests the Government to indicate if the prohibitions contained in sections 31(1)(b) and 17(2)(c)(i) of the Child Act also apply to persons not having the care of a child.

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs. The Committee previously noted that section 32 of the Child Act of 2001 punishes anyone who causes or procures or allows any person under 18 years of age to be on any street, premises or place for the purposes of "carrying out illegal hawking, illegal lotteries or gambling, or other illegal activities detrimental to the health or welfare of the child". The Committee also noted the Government's indication that the "other illegal activities detrimental to the health or welfare of the child" included the use, procuring and offering of a child for illicit activities, including the production and trafficking of drugs. The Committee requested information on the application in practice of section 32 of the Child Act.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that, to date, nobody has been charged under section 32 of the Child Act. The Government also refers to the Dangerous Drugs Act, 1952 (Act No. 234), section 39B(1) of which provides that any person, who, on his own behalf or on behalf of another person, traffics, offers to traffic or prepares to traffic a dangerous drugs shall be guilty of an offence and shall be punished upon conviction with death. The Government indicates that both of the offences under the Child Act and the Dangerous Drugs Act can be tried together. The Government indicates that while children have been convicted under section 39B of the Dangerous Drugs Act, no death sentence has been applied to these children. The Committee, therefore, observes that, although children have been convicted of drug trafficking (under the Dangerous Drugs Act), it does not appear that any adult has been charged with the use, procuring or offering of a child for this offence under section 32 of the Child Act. In this regard, the Committee recalls that children used by adults for the production and trafficking of drugs should be treated as victims, rather than offenders, and requests the Government to take measures to ensure that such children receive the services necessary for their rehabilitation and social reintegration. The Committee also requests the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure that the prohibition on involving children in the trafficking of drugs is strictly enforced, and that any adult who uses, procures, or offers a child for this offence is punished with sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties.

Clause (d). Hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the relevant legislation did not contain any provisions prohibiting young people under 18 years of age from being engaged in hazardous types of work. The Committee urged the Government to take immediate measures to ensure that the prohibition of hazardous types of work applied to persons under 18 years of age, in accordance with Article 3(d) of the Convention.

The Committee notes that the Children and Young Persons (Employment) (Amendment) Act of 2010 (CYP Amendment Act) was adopted and has been in force since 1 March 2011. The Committee notes with satisfaction that, pursuant to the CYP Amendment Act, the term "child" is now defined in the CYP Act as a person under 15 years of age and the term “young person” is defined as a person between 15 and 18 years of age (pursuant to section 1A), and that pursuant to section 2(1) of the CYP Act, no child or young person shall be required or permitted to engage in any hazardous employment. Moreover, pursuant to section 2(4), no child or young person may be engaged in work that is dangerous to life, limb, health, safety and morals. The Committee also notes that section 2(5) of the CYP Act has been amended to state that no child or young person may be engaged in work underground, or in any employment contrary to the provisions of the Factories and Machinery Act, the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1994 or the Electricity Supply Act of 1990.

Article 4(1). Determination of types of hazardous work. The Committee previously expressed the hope that the determination of types of hazardous work to be prohibited to persons below 18 years of age would be reviewed and adopted, pursuant to Article 4(1) of the Convention.

The Committee notes that, pursuant to the CYP Amendment Act, the CYP Act has been amended to include section 2(6), which states that for the purpose of section 2, “hazardous work” means any work that has been classified as hazardous based on the risk assessment conducted by a competent authority on safety and health as determined by the minister. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures, pursuant to section 2(6) of the CYP Act (as amended), to determine the types of work which constitute hazardous work prohibited to persons under the age of 18, following consultations with the organizations of employers and workers concerned.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour, and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Child victims of trafficking. The Committee previously noted that Malaysia was considered primarily a destination country for victims of trafficking, and that while most of the victims of trafficking were women over 18 years of age, a number of girls between 14 and 17 years of age were also reported to be victims.

The Committee notes the information in the Government’s report that the Malaysian Council for Anti-Trafficking in Persons and Anti-Smuggling of Migrants has developed an action plan to combat the trafficking of children. The Government further indicates that, as of 22 June 2011, there had been 161 child victims of trafficking rescued under a protection order, and 106 children were placed at the Government Shelter Home. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken within the framework of the action plan to combat trafficking of children to provide for the removal, rehabilitation and social integration of child victims of trafficking. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of child victims of trafficking rescued and placed in the Government Shelter Home, as well as information on the services provided to these children for their rehabilitation and social reintegration, and where appropriate, their repatriation and family reunification.

Article 8. International cooperation and assistance. Regional cooperation. The Committee previously noted the proposal for a Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) between Malaysia and Thailand to monitor trafficking and address the flow of young girls into Malaysia. The Committee also noted the statement in the Government’s report of 19 November 2008 to the Human Rights Council for the Universal Periodic Review that due to Malaysia’s porous borders, the influx of migrants, trafficked victims and refugees is increasing despite pledges by source States that they have taken progressive measures (A/HRC/WG.6/4/MYS/1/Rev.1, paragraph 94).

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that it has not yet finalized the draft of the MoU with Thailand. However, the Government indicates that currently, enforcement agencies exchange information to strengthen security between the two countries. The Committee also notes the information in the Government’s report submitted under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), that one of the main goals of the National Action Plan on Trafficking in Persons (2010–15) is the development of local and international partnerships to combat trafficking in persons. The Committee urges the Government to pursue its efforts, including through the National Action Plan on Trafficking in Persons (2010–15), to cooperate with the neighbouring countries, particularly Indonesia and Thailand, with a view to eliminating child trafficking for labour and commercial sexual exploitation as well as the involvement of child migrants in the worst forms of child labour.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the information in the Government’s report submitted under Convention No. 29 that as of May 2011, 25 persons had been charged with trafficking in children (under section 14 of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act of 2007). The Committee also notes the Government’s statement that between 28 February 2008 to 19 June 2011, 217 cases of sexual exploitation were recorded by the Royal Malaysian Police. The Committee observes that the Government does not indicate how many of these cases involved commercial sexual exploitation, or how many of the victims were under the age of 18. The Committee, therefore, requests the Government to provide information on the number of cases of commercial sexual exploitation involving persons under the age of 18 detected by the Royal Malaysian Police. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of cases of the trafficking of children detected and investigated in Malaysia, as well as statistics on the number of prosecutions, convictions and penalties applied to perpetrators. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by sex and by age.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Mali

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the report of the National Survey on Child Labour (ENTE), conducted in 2005 by the National Directorate of Statistics and Information, in collaboration with the National Directorate of Labour and ILO-IPEC-SIMPOC, around two children out of three between the ages of 5 and 17 years are economically active, or just over 3 million girls and boys throughout the country. Of these, nearly 2.4 million children between the ages of 5 and 14, or 65.4 per cent of children between 5 and 14 years of age, are engaged in work. This phenomenon affects both girls and boys, in rural areas and in towns. The Committee noted that the phenomenon is more widespread in rural areas (68 per cent of 5–14 year olds) than in urban areas (59 per cent of 5–14 year olds). The Committee also noted that in 2006 Mali launched a Time-bound Programme (TBP) on the worst forms of child labour in collaboration with ILO-IPEC. The Committee further noted that, in the framework of the TBP, a programme of action was launched in 2009 for the preparation and design of the National Plan of Action for the Elimination of Child Labour in Mali (PANETEM) with a view to reinforcing the progress achieved over more than a decade of combating child labour and addressing the difficulties encountered.

The Committee takes due note of the technical validation of the PANETEM at the national level in April 2010 and its adoption by the Council of Ministers on 8 June 2011. The PANETEM covers a period of ten years divided into two phases: the first five-year phase (2011–15) focuses on the elimination of the worst forms of child labour (60 per cent of targeted children) and the second five-year phase (2016–20) on the abolition of all forms of unauthorized child labour (40 per cent of the targeted children). However, the Committee notes that, in its report under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), the Government indicates that, in view of the delay in the adoption of the PANETEM, its implementation is envisaged in 2012. Observing with deep concern that a considerable number of children are engaged in work under the minimum age for admission to employment or work, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to intensify its efforts to combat child labour, and requests it to provide information on the implementation of the PANETEM and on the results achieved in terms of the elimination of child labour.

Article 2(1). 1. Scope of application. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the information provided by the Government to the effect that children under 15 years of age working on their own account could be informed by the labour inspector covering their area of the risks involved in their work and the social security measures to be envisaged in the event of employment accidents. The Committee however noted the Government's indication that no specific measures have been adopted in Mali to allow labour inspectors to target more specifically children under 15 years of age engaged in an economic activity on their own account.

The Committee notes that absence of information in the Government's report on this subject. It once again reminds that Government that the Convention applies to all branches of economic activity and that it covers all types of employment or work, whether or not it is based on an employment relationship and whether or not it is paid. The Committee urges the Government to take measures to ensure that children who are not bound by an employment relationship, such as those working on their own account or in the informal economy, benefit from the protection afforded by the Convention. In this respect, it requests the Government to envisage the possibility of taking measures to adapt and strengthen the labour inspection services with a view to ensuring such protection.

2. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that under section 20(b) of the Child Protection Code, all children have the right to be employed as from 15 years of age, in accordance with the minimum age specified when ratifying the Convention. It noted, however, that pursuant to section L.187 of the Labour Code, the minimum age for the admission of children to employment in enterprises, even as apprentices, is 14 years, except with a written waiver issued by the Minister of Labour. The Committee also noted that section D.189-23 of Decree No. 96-178/P-RM of 13 June 1996 issued under the Labour Code lists the loads that children between the ages of 14 and 17 years may not carry, drag or push, depending on the type of transport equipment, the weight of the load and the sex of the child. In this respect, the Committee noted the Government's indication that it undertook to take the necessary measures to amend section L.187 of the Labour Code, which will "lead to the raising of the minimum age for admission to employment".

The Committee notes that the Government has not provided any information on this subject in its report. However, it observes that one of the principal aims of the PANETEM is to reinforce the respective legal framework and regulations in relation to combating child labour. In this context, it is envisaged to organize a national workshop for the revision of the Labour Code and its implementing texts with a view to harmonizing them with the legislative provisions for the protection of children. Expressing the firm hope that the relevant provisions of the Labour Code and of Decree No. 96-178/P-RM of 13 June 1996 will be brought into harmony with the Convention so as to prohibit work by children under 15 years of age, the Committee requests the Government to take measures with a view to finalizing this revision in the very near future. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this respect.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee noted previously that Decree No. 314/PGRM of 26 November 1981 regulates school attendance and that the age of completion of compulsory schooling in Mali is 15 years. It noted the information provided by the Government according to which the implementation of phase II of the Sectoral Investment Programme for the Education Sector (PISE) would increase the number of classes and teachers in the poorest regions and improve the access to schooling for thousands of children, particularly in rural areas. The Committee also noted that Mali is one of 11 countries involved in the implementation of the ILO-IPEC project "Tackle child labour through education in 11 countries" (the TACKLE project), the overall objective of which is to contribute to the reduction of poverty in the least developed countries by providing equitable access to primary education and the development of knowledge amongst the most underprivileged members of society. Moreover, an integrated framework to cover the educational needs of the most vulnerable categories of children was being formulated with a view to the integration of these needs into phase III of the PISE. However, the Committee noted that, according to the Education for All Global Monitoring Report of 2008, published by UNESCO under the title Education for All by 2015: Will we make it?, although there has been substantial progress in the field of education, Mali is still far from achieving the objective of universal primary education by 2015, and will probably not achieve gender parity by 2015, or 2025. The Committee also noted the low school enrolment rate of children between 13 and 15 years of age, which shows that a number of children drop out of school before reaching the minimum age for admission to employment and that they enter the labour market.

The Committee notes that the TACKLE project has been extended up to 2013 and that its objective is to strengthen links between educational policies and measures to combat child labour with a view to giving vulnerable children and victims of child labour the opportunity to benefit from training and education. It also notes the Government's indications that the third phase of PISE (PISE III) takes into account children with special educational needs. The Committee observes that, according to the table of data provided by the Government, the net school attendance rate in primary school rose from 56.6 per cent in 2005–06 to 60.9 per cent in 2007–08 and to 62.7 per cent in 2008–09. In secondary education, these rates are 23.5 per cent, 28.8 per cent and 30.7 per cent, respectively.

The Committee takes due note of the measures adopted by the Government in relation to education. However, it notes that the school attendance rates for primary education remain fairly low and that the low rates of school attendance in secondary education, compared with primary education, show that a significant number of children drop out of school after primary school. Considering that compulsory schooling is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to improve the functioning of the education system in the country, particularly by increasing school attendance rates. In this respect, it requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved, particularly through the implementation of the TACKLE project and of PISE III, and the results obtained.

Article 3(3). Admission to hazardous types of work from the age of 16 years. The Committee noted previously that certain provisions of Decree No. 96-178/P-RM of 13 June 1996 allow children to be employed in hazardous types of work from the age of 16 years. It noted the Government's indication that the authorization of the labour inspector, which is required to employ young persons between 16 and 18 years of age, is a guarantee that these types of hazardous work are performed under healthy, safe and moral conditions. The Government indicated that section D.189-33 of Decree No. 96-178/P-RM establishes the requirement to ascertain that young persons between the ages of 16 and 18 years engaged in hazardous types of work have received adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity, in accordance with Article 3(3) of the Convention. However, the Committee noted that section D.189-33, which refers to the declaration that the employer has to make to the Employment Office for the recruitment of a child, does not make any reference to the instruction or vocational training that has to be followed by a young person over 16 years of age to be able to perform hazardous types of work. Noting the absence of information in the Government's report on this subject, the Committee once again urges the Government to take measures to ensure compliance with the conditions set out in Article 3(3) of the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any developments in this respect.

Article 7. Light work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 189-35 of Decree No. 96-178/P-RM of 13 June 1996 allows exceptions from the minimum age for admission to employment in the case of boys and girls of at least 12 years of age for domestic work and light work of a seasonal nature. It noted the Government's indication that it undertook to raise the minimum age for domestic work and light work of a seasonal nature from 12 to 13 years. It also noted that a draft order was being prepared to determine light work activities and the conditions for their performance.

The Committee notes that the Government has not provided any further information in its report on this subject. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to harmonize the national legislation with the Convention and to regulate the employment of children on light work from the age of 13 years. To this end, it once again hopes that the order respecting light work will be formulated and adopted in the near future.

The Committee also urges the Government to renew its efforts and to take the necessary measures to ensure that the revision of the legislation envisaged in the context of the PANETEM does not fail to take into account the Committee's detailed comments on the divergences existing between the national legislation and the Convention, and that amendments will be made in this respect.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which reads as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, although the Government had taken several measures to combat the sale and trafficking of children for the exploitation of their labour, the trafficking of children still constituted a problem in practice, even though it is prohibited by section 244 of the Penal Code and section 63 of the Child Protection Code. It noted that, in the summary prepared by the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights in accordance with paragraph 15(c) of the Annex to Human Rights Council Resolution 5/1 of 3 April 2008, the International Federation for Human Rights (FIDH) indicated that, even though no statistics are available, Mali is a transit country for the trafficking of women and children, and it therefore recommended that the Malian authorities strictly apply sections 240 et seq. of the Penal Code penalizing the trafficking of children, and that it improve the assistance provided to children who have been victims of trafficking (A/HRC/WG.6/2/MLI/3, paragraphs 13–14). The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the effect given in practice to the provisions respecting the sale and trafficking of children for the exploitation of their labour.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not provided any information on this matter in its report. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take immediate measures to ensure the protection of children under 18 years of age against sale and trafficking and to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of offenders are carried out, and that effective and sufficiently dissuasive penalties are imposed. It once again requests the Government to provide information on the effect given in practice to the provisions respecting the sale and trafficking of children for the exploitation of their labour through the provision of statistics on the number of convictions and the penal sanctions imposed.

2. Forced or compulsory labour. Begging. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the 2006 UNICEF report, talibés children originating from neighbouring countries, including Mali, are found on the streets of Dakar, who have been brought to the city by Koranic teachers (marabouts). These children are kept in conditions of servitude and are obliged to beg daily. The Committee also noted that the 2006 UNICEF report refers to the involvement of marabouts in the trafficking of children for the exploitation of young talibé workers from Burkina Faso in the rice fields of Mali. The Committee noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of May 2007, expressed concern at the vulnerability of children living in the streets or who are engaged in begging, particularly to all forms of violence, sexual abuse and exploitation, as well as economic exploitation (CRC/C/MLI/CO/2, paragraph 62). The Committee noted that section 62 of the Child Protection Code defines begging as a sole or main activity of a dehumanizing nature and an obstacle to the rights of the child. It further noted that section 183 of the Penal Code provides that any person inciting a child to beg shall be liable to a sentence of imprisonment of from three months to one year. However, the Committee noted that, in the report of the Working Group on the Universal Periodic Review of Mali of 13 June 2008, the representative of Mali indicated that begging by children in Koranic schools is an infringement of the law (A/HRC/8/50, paragraph 55).

The Committee notes with regret the absence of information on this matter in the Government's report. The Committee once again observes that, although the legislation is in conformity with the Convention on this point, the phenomenon of child talibés remains a cause for concern in practice. The Committee once again expresses serious concern at the use of these children for purely economic purposes. The Committee once again reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 1 of the Convention, immediate and effective measures shall be taken to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency and, in accordance with Article 7(1) of the Convention, it shall take all necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, including the provision and application of sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of marabouts who make use of children under 18 years of age for purely economic purposes are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions are imposed upon them. In this respect, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to reinforce the capacities of the law enforcement agencies. It also requests the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to prevent children under 18 years of age from becoming victims of forced or compulsory labour, such as begging, and to identify child talibés who are compelled to beg and remove them from these situations, while ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration.

Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 229 of the Penal Code, under which inciting a girl or a woman, even with her consent, to debauchery or forcing her to engage in prostitution are punishable offences, applies only to female children. The Committee noted the Government's indication that it undertook to examine the question of bringing its legislation into conformity with the Convention and protecting boys from sexual exploitation, and particularly prostitution. The Government indicated that the measures taken in this respect consist of the adoption of Act No. 01-081 of 24 August 2001 concerning crimes related to minors and the appointment of magistrates to hear cases involving minors (Act No. 01-081). The Committee observed that not only do these provisions fail to prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution, but they also appear to punish the children concerned, making them criminally liable for their involvement in prostitution or illicit activities. The Committee observed that children who are used, procured or offered for prostitution are consequently not treated as victims and receive neither support nor protection.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not provided any information on this matter in its report. It once again reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 3(b) of the Convention, the use, procuring or offering of a child under 18 years of age for prostitution is considered to be one of the worst forms of child labour and that, by virtue of Article 1 of the Convention, immediate and effective measures have to be taken to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee urges the Government to take immediate measures to ensure that the national legislation prohibits the use, procuring or offering of boys under 18 years of age for prostitution.

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities. The Committee noted previously that Act No. 1986/18 on the punishment of offences involving poisonous substances and narcotics prohibits the cultivation, production, offering and sale of drugs, but not the use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs. The Government indicated that the measures taken in this respect consisted of the adoption of Act No. 01-081. However, the Committee observed that these provisions do not prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not provided any information on this matter in its report. It once again reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 1 of the Convention, immediate and effective measures shall be taken to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee, therefore, urges the Government to take immediate measures to ensure that the national legislation prohibits the use, procurement or offering of children under 18 years of age for illicit activities, in particular for the production, offering and sale of drugs. It requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any progress achieved in this respect.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. 1. Monitoring committees. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that local monitoring committees (CLV) to combat child labour had been established in the circles of Kangala, Bougouni, Kolondiéba and Koutiala, that 344 monitoring committees are now operational in Mali and that their principal role was to identify potential victims of child trafficking, and to indicate cases in which children are the victims of trafficking and collect and disseminate data on the trafficking of children. Noting the absence of information on this subject in the Government's report, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the number of children who are prevented from becoming victims of trafficking or are removed from trafficking for labour exploitation as a result of the activities of monitoring committees.

2. National Committee to follow-up programmes to combat the trafficking of children. The Committee noted previously the Government's indications that the National Committee to follow-up programmes to combat the trafficking of children in Mali (CNS) is responsible for evaluating the action taken in the context of the implementation of programmes to combat the trafficking of children, for following the implementation of cooperation agreements signed by Mali to combat the trafficking of children and for learning from the experience acquired in this field in taking responsibility for child victims of trafficking. However, the Government indicated that, since it was established in 2006, the CNS was not operational, thereby creating a gap in the coordination of action to combat the trafficking of children in Mali. To overcome this problem, three meetings had been planned between September and November 2009, during which the programme and action of the CNS were to be determined and the annual work plan for 2010 adopted.

The Committee notes that the Government has not provided any information on this subject in its report. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the activities carried out by the CNS and their impact on the elimination of the trafficking of children for the exploitation of their labour.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour and assistance for their removal from these worst forms of child labour. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in the summary prepared by the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights in accordance with paragraph 15(c) of the Annex to Human Rights Council Resolution 5/1 of 3 April 2008, the FIDH indicated that there are no institutional facilities available in Mali to shelter, offer guidance to or assist young women who have been the victims of trafficking or sexual exploitation (A/HRC/WG.6/2/MLI/3, paragraphs 13–14). It therefore recommended the authorities of Mali to set up care and guidance facilities and to provide assistance for the return of girls who are victims of trafficking.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that one of the strategic focuses of the National Plan of Action for the Elimination of Child Labour in Mali (PANETEM), adopted in 2010, is the implementation of direct action to combat the worst forms of child labour, including trafficking. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted within the framework of the PANETEM project to prevent children under 18 years of age from becoming victims of sale or trafficking and to remove child victims from this worst form of child labour. It also once again requests the Government to envisage the establishment of care and guidance facilities and the provision of assistance for the return of child victims of trafficking, as recommended by the FIDH, with a view to ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on any progress achieved in this regard.

Article 8. Regional cooperation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Government had signed bilateral cooperation agreements on the cross-border trafficking of children with Burkina Faso, Côte d'Ivoire, Guinea and Senegal. It also noted that, in addition to the Multilateral Cooperation Agreement to Combat Child Trafficking in West Africa, signed in July 2005, Mali had also signed the Abuja Multilateral Cooperation Agreement in 2006. It further noted that, in the context of the ILO–IPEC project to combat the trafficking of children, it was planned to reinforce the application of the bilateral and multilateral treaties signed by Mali. However, the Government indicated that, although the countries which signed agreements with Mali met periodically, they were more dynamic in their activities within the national territory than in terms of mutual international assistance. Indeed, the Committee observed that, in the Report of the Working Group on the Universal Periodic Review of Mali of 13 June 2008, the representative of Mali noted that, with regard to trafficking in children, the main difficulties stemmed from the cross-border nature of the phenomenon (A/HRC/8/50, paragraph 54).

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the National Cell to Combat Child Labour (CNLTE) represented the Ministry of Labour at the follow-up meetings to the Cooperation Agreement to Combat Trans-border Child Trafficking between Mali and Burkina Faso, held in Ouagadougou in March 2009, as well as the meeting between Mali and Guinea, held in Bamako in September 2010. However, it observes that the Government has not provided any information on the number of child victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation or for labour who have been protected through the implementation of the multilateral agreements signed by Mali, or on the arrests that have been made as a result of the concerted action of the national border police. In view of the importance of trans-border trafficking in the country, the Committee urges the Government to take practical and effective measures for the implementation of the multilateral agreements signed in 2005 and 2006, particularly through the establishment of a system for the exchange of information to facilitate the discovery of child trafficking networks and the arrest of persons working in these networks. It also requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of the follow-up meetings held in Ouagadougou in 2009 and Bamako in 2010.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Mauritania

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee takes note of the communication from the General Confederation of Workers of Mauritania (CGTM) dated 22 August 2011, and of the Government's report.

Article 1 and Part V of the Convention. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the indications of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), according to which the Ministry of Labour authorized, without exception, work by 13-year-old children in both the agricultural and non-agricultural sectors. The Committee had noted that, according to the study undertaken by the Government in 2004 in collaboration with UNICEF, entitled "Child labour in Mauritania", around 90,000 children under 14 years of age worked in the country, signifying an increase of around one third over four years. The study showed that poverty was responsible for child labour.

The Committee notes the allegations of the CGTM that, despite this worrying situation, the Government is not conducting any coherent and concerted policy to redress the situation. There is a department specifically dealing with children's matters, but none of the programmes developed in this department tackle the problem of child labour. Furthermore, the trade union organizations are not involved in these programmes.

The Committee expresses its deep concern at the large number of young children working out of personal necessity in Mauritania. The Committee urges the Government to take short or medium-term measures to bring about a gradual improvement in this situation, for instance by adopting a national policy aimed at abolishing child labour once and for all, in cooperation with the employers' and workers' associations concerned, and to provide information in this respect. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the way in which the Convention is applied in practice, by providing, for example, statistical data disaggregated by sex and age group on the nature, extent and trends of child labour and the employment of young persons working below the minimum age specified by the Government at the time of ratification, as well as extracts from the reports of the inspection services.

Article 2(3). Compulsory schooling. The Committee had previously noted the information provided by the Government to the effect that one of the methods to ensure the abolition of child labour was the adoption of Act No. 2001-054 of 19 July 2001, making basic education compulsory for children of both sexes from 6 to 14 years of age, signifying a minimum duration of schooling of six years. It had also noted that the parents were henceforth required, subject to penalties, to send children aged between 6 and 14 years to school.

The Committee notes the allegations of the CGTM that thousands of school drop-outs contribute greatly to the phenomenon of child labour in Mauritania and that children are often forced to leave school because of pressure from their parents.

The Committee notes that, according to the Government, it is sparing no effort to improve the education system. In this respect the Government states that it is planning to organize a general education meeting (états généraux de l'éducation) in the near future. Furthermore, the Government indicates that the capacity of the labour inspections services has been strengthened and that they now have enough human resources to combat child labour effectively. A new labour inspectorate was also set up in 2010, which will help to cut child labour and help children enter economic and social life by providing training and apprenticeship programmes carried out in the formal and informal sectors.

While noting the efforts made by the Government, the Committee notes that, according to 2009 UNICEF statistics, 79 per cent of girls and 74 per cent of boys are in primary school, whereas only 15 per cent of girls and 17 per cent of boys are in secondary school. The Committee expresses once again its concern at the persistence of low school attendance rates, especially at the secondary school level. Considering that compulsory schooling is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee requests the Government to renew its efforts to improve the working of the education system, particularly by increasing the secondary school attendance rate, especially among girls. In this respect, it asks the Government to provide information on the outcome of the general education meeting, as well as on any improvements in the education system it might bring. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of children working under the minimum age who have been identified by the labour inspection services and integrated into the school system or in apprenticeships or vocational training, on condition that the minimum age requirements are respected.

Article 3(3). Authorization to employ children in hazardous work as from the age of 16 years. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 1 of Order No. 239 of 17 September 1954 (Order No. 239), as amended by Order No. 10.300 of 2 June 1965 respecting child labour (the Child Labour Order), unequivocally provides that "it is prohibited to employ children of either sex under 18 years of age on work that exceeds their strength, involves risks of danger or which, by its nature or the conditions in which it is carried out, is likely to harm their morals". The Committee had nevertheless pointed out that this provision had established the general prohibition of employing young persons under 18 years of age on hazardous types of work, whereas other provisions, such as sections 15, 21, 24, 25, 26, 27 and 32 of Order No. 239 and section 1 of Order No. R-030 of 26 May 1992 (R-030), set forth exceptions to this prohibition for young persons between 16 and 18 years of age. The Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that the performance of hazardous types of work by young persons aged between 16 and 18 was only permitted under strict conditions of protection and prior instruction in conformity with the provisions of Article 3(3) of the Convention.

The Committee notes the allegation of the CGTM that children are exploited in dangerous work in large cities, as apprentices, in the bus transport sector, as deliverers of large amounts of goods and as garage workers.

The Committee notes that, according to the Government, labour inspectors and supervisors ensure strict compliance of the provisions of the Orders in question. The Government also states that, if the need exists, measures are taken to guarantee that the performance of hazardous work by young persons between 16 and 18 years of age is only authorized if their health, safety and morals are fully protected and if they have received adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity. While taking account of the Government's information, the Committee notes that the national legislation still does not stipulate that the two conditions provided for under Article 3(3) of the Convention are a prerequisite for allowing young people aged 16 years and over to perform hazardous work, despite the fact that there seems to be a problem in practice in this respect. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that Orders Nos 239 and R-030 are amended so as to provide that hazardous types of work by young persons aged 16 to 18 years is only authorized in accordance with the provisions of Article 3(3) of the Convention.

Article 7(3). Determination of light work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under section 154 of the Labour Code regulating the employment of children between 12 and 14 years of age in light work, no child over 12 but under 14 years of age may be employed without the express permission of the Minister of Labour, and only under certain conditions restricting the hours of this employment. The Committee had reminded the Government that Article 7(3) provided that, in addition to the hours and conditions of work, the competent authority should determine the activities in which light employment might be permitted for children between 12 and 14 years of age. The Committee had noted the Government's indication that it would take the necessary measures to determine the activities in which light work or employment by children might be authorized.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that a copy of the provisions determining the activities in which light employment or work may be permitted for children will be sent to the Office as soon as they have been adopted. Observing that a significant number of children work under the minimum age for admission to employment in Mauritania, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to bring national legislation into line with the Convention and to regulate the employment of children engaged in light work from the age of 12 years. It expresses the firm hope that light work will be determined by the national legislation in the very near future.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the communication of 22 August 2011 from the General Confederation of Workers of Mauritania (CGTM), and the Government's report.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Slavery or practices similar to slavery. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption of Act No. 025/2003 of 17 July 2003 to suppress the trafficking of persons. The Committee also noted that, according to a UNICEF report on trafficking in persons with particular reference to women and children in West and Central Africa, in the streets of Dakar there are boy talibés from neighbouring countries, including Mauritania, who have been brought to the city by their Koranique masters (marabouts). According to the same report, there is also child trafficking inside Mauritania in which talibé children from rural areas beg on the streets of Nouakchott. The Committee observed that Mauritania appeared to be a country of origin for the trafficking of children for the purpose of exploiting their labour.

The Committee notes that in its concluding observations of 17 June 2009, the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) expressed concern at reports of children being sold to work as jockeys in the Middle East (CRC/C/MRT/CO/2, paragraph 77). The CRC was also concerned to note that Mauritania's report contained no information on the extent of the trafficking or the measures taken to prevent such crimes. The Committee notes with regret the lack of information on this subject in the Government's report. The Committee once again expresses concern at the situation of child victims of trafficking, and requests the Government to step up its efforts to ensure that, in practice, children under 18 years of age are protected against the sale and trafficking of children for the purposes of sexual exploitation or exploitation of their labour. The Committee again requests the Government to provide information on the application of Act No. 025/2003 of 17 July 2003 to suppress the trafficking of persons in practice, including statistics on the number and nature of offences reported, investigations held, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied.

2. Forced or compulsory labour. Begging. In its previous comments the Committee noted that section 42(1) of Ordinance No. 2005-015 on the protection of children under penal law provides that the act of causing a child to beg or directly employing a child to beg is punishable by imprisonment of one to six months or a fine of 100,000 ouguiyas. The Committee nonetheless noted that a UNICEF study entitled "Child Labour in Mauritania" indicated that, according to a study of July 2003 by the National Children's Council (CNE), observations in the field suggested that street children tended to be beggars who give a daily account of their begging activities to their marabouts.

The Committee notes that, according to the CGTM, teachers in religious schools force children onto the streets to beg, exposing them to crime and the danger of assault on their integrity.

The Committee notes that in its concluding observations of 17 June 2009, the CRC expressed concern over the lack of protection for talibé children, who are forced by marabouts to beg in slavery-like conditions (CRC/C/MRT/CO/2, paragraph 73). The Committee also notes that in her report of 24 August 2010 to the Human Rights Council, the Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of slavery stated that although she had been informed that the Government was working with religious leaders to put an end to this practice, many did not consider forced begging to be a form of slavery (A/HRC/15/20/Add.2, paragraph 46). The Minister of Families, Children and Social Affairs nonetheless informed the Special Rapporteur of the collaboration between her and the Ministry of the Interior to address the issue of street children, some of whom are talibés in Nouakchott. There appears to be a specialized police force which is trained to work with children, and the services of the Minister of the Interior monitor madrassas to ensure that children are not encouraged to go begging for their religious teachers (paragraph 75).

The Committee nevertheless notes with regret that the Government provides no information on this matter in its report. It again notes with deep concern that children are being used for purely economic purposes, in other words children are being exploited for their labour by certain marabouts. The Committee again points out to the Government that, according to Article 1 of the Convention, immediate and effective measures must be taken as a matter of urgency to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour and that, in conformity with Article 7(1) of the Convention, the Government must take all necessary steps to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, including the provision and application of effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations are carried out and completed and that marabouts who use children under 18 years of age for purely economic purposes are effectively prosecuted and punished by effective and sufficiently dissuasive penalties. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of talibé children identified by the special police unit and the services of the Minister of the Interior, and requests it to take the necessary steps to build the capacity of law enforcement bodies.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour. Forced or compulsory labour. Begging. In its previous comments the Committee noted that, according to information in the second periodic report submitted by Mauritania in July 2008 to the CRC (CRC/C/MRT/2, paragraph 88), a centre for the protection and social integration of children in difficult situations was established which targets street children, children forced to beg or children subject to economic exploitation.

The Committee notes that in her report, the Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of slavery indicates that the Ministry of the Interior informed her that talibé children are offered education or vocational training and provided with shelter (A/HRC/15/20/Add.2, paragraph 75). The Committee nonetheless notes with regret that the Government provides no information on this matter in its report. It also observes that in its concluding observations of 17 June 2009, the CRC likewise expressed concern at the lack of information on the measures adopted by Mauritania to identify and protect children working or living in the street (CRC/C/MRT/CO/2, paragraph 73). The Committee urges the Government to indicate the number of child victims of begging who have been removed from the street and rehabilitated and integrated into society, particularly by the centre for the protection and social integration of children in difficult situations or by the services of the Ministry of the Interior. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate any other effective time-bound measures taken to prevent children under 18 years of age from falling victim to forced or compulsory labour, such as begging, and to identify talibé children who are forced to beg, and to remove them from such situations, ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration.

Clause (e). Special situation of girls. Domestic employees. In its previous comments the Committee noted the Government's statement that most girls engaged in domestic work received little schooling or no schooling at all. Furthermore, according to the results of a survey on girls in Mauritania which was cited in a UNICEF study entitled "Child Labour in Mauritania", girls could be recruited as from 8 years of age, and 32 per cent of the girls questioned during the survey were under 12 years of age. The Committee noted that according to the second periodic report submitted by Mauritania to the CRC in July 2008 (CRC/C/MRT/2, paragraphs 247 and 255), two surveys had been under way for some time on child labour (including girls in domestic service) in Kiffa and Nouakchott "to determine the possibilities of educating and training these young workers and securing their social reintegration". It noted that the "El Mina Centre for Child Protection" in Nouakchott has been carrying out various activities since 2001 (training, literacy, hygiene, etc.) for girl domestic workers. A basic education pilot programme was also carried out in Dar Naim and a unit for "girls in difficult situations" was established.

The Committee notes that according to the CGTM, domestic work amounts to a daily workload of heavy chores for children, who are subjected to abuse from a very young age. Furthermore, the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) indicated in a report it submitted to the General Council of the World Trade Organization for the trade policy reviews of Guinea and Mauritania on 28 and 30 September 2011, many girls are forced into unpaid domestic service and are particularly vulnerable to exploitation. The Committee also notes that in its concluding observations of 17 June 2009, the CRC expressed particular concern at the situation of girls who work as domestic servants in exploitative slavery-like conditions (CRC/C/MRT/CO/2, paragraph 75).

The Committee notes with regret that the Government provides no information on this matter in its report. It again points out that small girls, particularly those employed as domestic servants, are often the victims of exploitation, which can take many different forms, and that it is difficult to supervise their conditions of employment in view of the clandestine nature of their work. It therefore urges the Government to take measures to ensure that children who are victims of exploitation in domestic work, particularly girls, are removed from this worst form of child labour and are rehabilitated and integrated in society, in particular through the activities of the El Mina Centre for the Protection of Children and the Dar Naim pilot project. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on progress made in this regard. Lastly, it urges the Government to provide information on the development and conclusions of the two surveys under way in the country.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes that according to the report of 24 August 2010 of the Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of slavery, children under 13 years of age work in all sectors of activity in Mauritania. In rural areas, enslaved children usually work taking care of the livestock, cultivating subsistence crops and performing domestic work and other significant labour in support of their masters' activities. Children live in slavery-like conditions in urban areas and are often found working in domestic households (A/HRC/15/20/Add.2, paragraphs 42 to 45). The Committee notes, however, that in its concluding observations of 17 June 2009, the CRC expressed particular concern at the lack of comprehensive documentation on the incidence of child labour and effective measures to ensure that children are protected from economic exploitation and the worst forms of child labour and that they can exercise their right to education (CRC/C/MRT/CO/2, paragraph 75). The Committee expresses concern at the situation of children engaged in hazardous work and in slavery-like conditions, and therefore urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure protection in practice for these children against this worst form of child labour. It also requests the Government to provide statistics of the nature, extent and tendencies of worst forms of child labour, particularly as concerns the sale and trafficking of children begging in the streets. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number and nature of the offences reported, investigations and prosecutions, and convictions and the penal sanctions imposed. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by sex and age.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Night Work of Young Persons (Industry) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 90) (ratification: 1956)

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Period during which night work is prohibited. In its previous comments, the Committee repeatedly pointed out that, by defining night work as work performed between 8 p.m. and 6 a.m., i.e. a period of ten hours, section 60 of the Federal Labour Act fails to give effect to Article 2(1) of the Convention, which defines "night" as a period of at least 12 consecutive hours.

The Committee notes the Government's indications that, although national legislation does not contain a prohibition for young persons under 18 years of age to work during the night for 12 consecutive hours, the Government has taken measures to regulate night work of minors and sanction any contravention. The Committee notes the Government's reference in this regard to the Federal Regulation on Safety, Health and the Working Environment, of 21 January 1997. Yet the Committee observes that the Regulation in question does not contain any provision on the night work of minors. The Committee furthermore notes that section 175(2) of the Federal Labour Act prohibits night work for young persons under 18 years of age in industrial undertakings and section 995 provides for aggravated sanctions for the non-respect of any of the provisions relating to the protection of minors. As regards application in practice, the Committee notes the Government's indications that the Federal Attorney's office for Labour Defense has not received any cases relating to the subject matter of the Convention. It also notes that the labour inspectorate between 2008 and May 2012 carried out more than 218,000 inspections of workplaces likely to be concerned by the application of the federal labour legislation governing night work and that they found no minors working at night in these enterprises. The Committee also notes the extracts of collective agreements provided by the Government which contain provisions on the night work of women. Yet, like section 60 of the Federal Labour Act, they establish that "night" is the interval between 8 p.m. and 6 a.m., establishing a period of ten consecutive hours during which work by minors is prohibited.

The Committee points out again that section 60 of the Federal Labour Act is not in conformity with Article 2 of the Convention. In this regard, the Committee reminds the Government that Article 2 of the Convention lays down that night signifies a period of 12 consecutive hours (paragraph 1). For young persons under 16 years of age this period shall include the interval between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m. of the following day (paragraph 2), and for young persons between the ages of 16 and 18 years, the interval of at least seven consecutive hours falling between 10 p.m. and 7 a.m. (paragraph 3). The Committee notes with deep regret that, despite the request which it has repeatedly made since 1972, no measures have been taken to give effect to the Convention. The Committee therefore again urges the Government to finally take the necessary measures to amend the Federal Labour Act in order to ensure conformity with Article 2 of the Convention.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

Articles 3(a) and 7(1) of the Convention. Sale and trafficking of children and penalties. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the National Centre for Planning, Analysis and Information to Combat Crime (CENAPI) attached to the Office of the Attorney General of the Republic had developed the National System to Combat Trafficking in Persons (SINTRA) with a view to collecting information on human trafficking and other related offences. The Committee also noted the statistics of the Special Prosecutor's Office dealing with violence against women and trafficking in persons (FEVIMTRA) concerning the number of investigations, convictions and penalties imposed. Yet, the Committee expressed concern at the small number of convictions secured for trafficking of children under 18 years of age for their commercial sexual exploitation in view of the extent of the practice in the country and at the allegations of complicity in trafficking on the part of public officials.

The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the General Law to Prevent, Punish and Eradicate Crimes relating to Trafficking in Persons and to Protect and Assist the Victims of these Crimes on 14 June 2012, which abrogates the Act of 27 November 2007 concerning the prevention and punishment of trafficking in persons. It notes that the Law criminalizes not only trafficking in children for sexual and labour exploitation, but also the use of children for the production of pornography, begging and in illicit activities. The Committee furthermore notes that section 42(VII) provides that sanctions are increased up to 50 per cent in case the victim is under 18 years of age. The Law also establishes a comprehensive legal and institutional framework to fight against these crimes, which determines the powers, duties and coordination of the various actors involved in the prevention and punishment of such offences and the protection of victims, with specialized care and assistance to victims under 18 years of age.

The Committee notes the statistical information provided by the Government in its report as regards the practical application of the Act concerning the prevention and punishment of trafficking in persons. Between June 2011 and July 2012, only three offences of trafficking of children under 18 years of age were reported in the department of Veracruz. Yet the Committee observes that the information provided by the Government does not specify the number of convictions, how many of these cases concerned the complicity of officials who are complicit in trafficking of minors and the types of sanctions applied.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the implementation of the General Law to Prevent, Punish and Eradicate Crimes relating to Trafficking in Persons and to Protect and Assist the Victims of these Crimes on 14 June 2012 will enable the Government to fight more effectively against the sale and trafficking of children and young persons under 18 years. In the context of the implementation of the new Law, the Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure the elimination in practice of this worst form of child labour by ensuring that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions are carried out, including of state officials suspected of complicity in such acts, and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are applied in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information in its next report on the application of the new Law in practice by the federal states including the number of reported violations, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and criminal penalties imposed.

Article 3(b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution, for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the development of a federal database of information on the number and nature of offences relating to prostitution, sexual exploitation and sex tourism involving persons under 18 years of age and noted the number of investigations and convictions relating to child prostitution and pornography. The Committee also noted the concluding observations of the Committee on the Rights of the Child of 7 April 2011 on the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography, which expressed concern at the high level of child sex tourism, especially in tourist areas (CRC/C/OPSC/MEX/CO/1, paragraph 27).

The Committee notes from the statistics provided by the Government in its report that between June 2011 and July 2012, FEVIMTRA has initiated a total of 14 investigations into cases of pornography involving persons under 18 years of age, which are currently pending. The Committee also notes that, according to the federal database compiling information on the number and nature of offences relating to prostitution, sexual exploitation and sex tourism involving persons under 18 years of age, between June 2011 and July 2012 a total of 11 offences relating to the use of a child for pornography were reported in the states of Chiapas and Chihuahua. The Committee further notes that the Office of the Attorney General of the Republic reports that on 21 February 2012 a conviction was handed down for child pornography imposing a sanction of seven years' imprisonment. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of reported violations, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and criminal penalties imposed for violations involving child prostitution and child pornography.

Articles 3(d) and 4(1). Hazardous work and deterioration of hazardous types of work. In its previous comments the Committee noted that certain provisions of the national legislation set the age of 18 years for admission to certain types of work which, by their nature and the circumstances in which they are carried out, are likely to harm the health, safety or morals of young persons. However, it also noted that, with the exception of those provisions, the general age established for admission to hazardous and unhealthy kinds of work is 16 years. The Committee also noted that the Government in collaboration with ILO-IPEC has drawn up a list of hazardous and unhealthy types of work prohibited for children with a view to adoption as national legislation.

The Committee notes that on 14 November 2012, the Senate and the Congress approved the Decree to reform the Federal Labour Law entitled “Initiative to reform, add and repeal various provisions of the Federal Labour Law”, which includes a detailed list of hazardous child labour for children in sections 175 and 176. The Committee notes that the entry into force of the Decree is still pending and dependent on the signature by the President and the publication of the Decree in the Official Bulletin. While welcoming the list, the Committee notes with concern that only a small number of activities (6) listed in section 176(b) are prohibited for persons under 18 years of age, whereas section 176(a) allows the engagement of children in a series of hazardous activities (27) as of 16 years of age. Hence, with the exception of section 176(b), the general minimum age established for admission to hazardous and unhealthy kinds of work remains unchanged at 16 years. In this regard, the Committee previously noted that no provisions exist in the Mexican legislation which authorize the employment or work of young persons as from the age of 16 under strict conditions of protection and prior training, pursuant to Paragraph 4 of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Recommendation, 1999 (No. 190). The Committee notes that the labour law reform process has not addressed this matter and no such provisions are part of the abovementioned Decree.

In this context, the Committee also points to the results of the “Child labour” module published as part of the 2011 national survey of employment and occupation which reports that in 2011 a total of 28 per cent of all working children and young persons between 5 and 17 years of age were exposed to risks in their work. This percentage is equivalent to 850,000 children, of whom, 79.3 per cent are boys and 20.7 per cent are girls. These risks include exposure to dust, fumes or fire, excessive noise, moisture or extreme temperatures, dangerous tools, heavy machinery, excessive darkness, chemicals, explosives, and electric shock. The Committee notes that many of these risks correspond to the activities listed in section 176(a) of the abovementioned Decree, which are permitted for children as from the age of 16 years.

The Committee, therefore, once again observes that the general minimum age established by the Federal Labour Law, even after approval of the labour law reform process, for admission to hazardous and unhealthy kinds of work is 16 years (section 175(a)), in contravention of Article 3(d) of the Convention. The Committee reminds the Government that, under Article 3(d) of the Convention, work which, by its nature and the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to harm the health, safety and morals of children, constitutes one of the worst forms of child labour and that, by virtue of Article 1 of the Convention, member States are required to take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. It also recalls that Paragraph 4 of Recommendation No. 190 addresses the possibility of authorizing the employment or work of young persons as from the age of 16 under strict conditions that their health and safety be protected and that they receive adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity, as well as the consultation of employers’ and workers’ organizations.

The Committee notes with concern the large number of children between 16 and 18 years of age engaged in hazardous activities in practice. The Committee again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to bring its legislation in conformity with Article 1 of the Convention, read in conjunction with Article 3(d), so as to ensure that hazardous work is prohibited for children under 18 years. However, where such work is performed by young persons between 16 and 18 years, the Committee again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that work is only carried out in accordance with the strict conditions set out in Paragraph 4 of Recommendation No. 190, namely that the health and safety of such young persons be protected and that they receive adequate specific instruction or vocational training in that activity. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard.

Article 6. Programmes of action. Trafficking. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government has adopted a range of measures in the context of the 2011 National Programme for the prevention and suppression of trafficking. In collaboration with the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC), the Government is carrying out a diagnostic study on the national situation of trafficking in persons. In addition, the Committee notes the development of a number of protocols to align procedures for the investigation and prosecution of cases of trafficking, as well as on attention to victims, the development of mechanisms to alert populations vulnerable to trafficking in persons (in particular indigenous peoples and young persons), various information and awareness raising activities, as well as capacity building efforts undertaken for public officials engaged in the prevention and investigation of cases of trafficking in persons. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken in the context of the National Programme for the prevention and suppression of trafficking, in particular as regards the elimination of the sale and trafficking of children.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in, and removing them from, the worst forms of child labour, and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the detailed information on the measures carried out in the context of the National Plan of Action for preventing, combating and eliminating the sexual exploitation of children, in particular as regards awareness-raising activities and the care provided to victims of trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation in specialized centres.

The Committee notes that the Office of the Attorney General of the Republic, in collaboration with the Secretary of Tourism and other stakeholders, has developed a national code of conduct for the protection of children and young persons in the tourism sector, with a view to creating and strengthening the links with the judicial system as regards trafficking in persons and to share indicators and vulnerability factors to identify possible victims of trafficking. The Committee furthermore notes the Government's indications that in September 2011, the Social Office for Care to Victims of Crime (PROVICTIMA) was created which provides the following types of services to victims of trafficking and sexual exploitation: medical assistance; specialized psychological care; legal advice; and social work services. PROVICTIMA also administers a highly secure centre to protect and provide integral care to victims of trafficking and extreme violence.

The Committee urges the Government to continue to take measures to remove children from trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation and ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. It again requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this respect, including under the National Plan of Action for preventing, combating and eliminating the sexual exploitation of children, as well as on the results achieved in terms of the number of children removed from this worst forms of child labour and their subsequent rehabilitation and social integration.

Article 8. International cooperation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that further to the conclusion of Memorandum of Understandings (MOUs) with several Central American countries, a large number of child protection officers had been trained with a view to the creation of a regional protection model and that a bi-national study on trafficking between El Salvador and Mexico was in progress. The Committee notes the Government's indications that in the context of the MOUs signed with El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Nicaragua, specialized capacity building activities were carried out to ensure the safe repatriation of unaccompanied children and young persons who are victims of trafficking. The Government also informs that the bi-national study on trafficking between El Salvador and Mexico is not yet available. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken and the results achieved in the context of the MOUs signed with the Governments of Guatemala, Honduras, El Salvador and Nicaragua. It also requests the Government to provide a copy of the bi-national study on trafficking between El Salvador and Mexico when it is available.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Mongolia

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy designed to ensure the effective abolition of child labour. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that in 2002 the Government approved a National Programme of Action for the Development and Protection of Children for 2002–10 (NPA 2002–10). It noted that particular attention has been given to the issue of child labour in this document and that one of its objectives is to amend national legislation to ensure the protection of children. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on any developments regarding the review and possible amendments to the Labour Code and the Law on the Protection of the Rights of the Child in order to better address the problem of child labour. The Committee noted in the Government's report submitted under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that the Labour Code has recently been amended. It also noted that the NPA 2002–10 is ongoing, as are a number of other projects and programmes, most of them dealing with the worst forms of child labour. The Committee requests the Government to supply a copy of the recently amended Labour Code. The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing information on the NPA 2002–10, or any other such programmes, aimed at ensuring the effective abolition of child labour.

Article 2(1). Scope of application. The Committee previously noted that the Labour Code, according to its section 4, covers relations governed by a labour contract, defined as a mutual agreement on work for pay between an employee and an employer (section 3(1)(3)). The Committee therefore noted that the Labour Code appeared to exclude work performed outside the framework of a labour contract and self-employment from its scope of application. In this regard, the Committee noted the Government's information that, according to the survey conducted by the Mongolian Employers' Federation in 2003, 54.3 per cent of employers involved in the survey had been employing children without a labour contract. In this regard, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the manner in which protection is given to children carrying out an economic activity that is not covered by a labour contract, such as work on their own account.

The Committee noted the information in the Government's report that, following an audit by the ILO on labour inspection in Mongolia, the Parliament approved a review of the Labour Code and state policy on informal employment. The Committee noted that the Government plans to revise the Labour Code to extend its scope of application in 2010. The Committee also noted the Government's statement that child protection is still weak in the informal sector. The Committee further noted the information in the Human Rights and Freedoms in Mongolia Status Report, issued in 2007 by the National Human Rights Commission of Mongolia, that approximately 6,950 children were working in the informal economy in urban areas (page 50). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, within the review of the Labour Code and the state policy on informal employment, protection is given to children carrying out work on their own account or in the informal economy. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on developments in this regard.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory education. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to section 109(2) of the Labour Code, a person aged 15 years may enter into a labour contract with the permission of parents or guardians. It noted however that, according to National Programme for the Prevention and Elimination of Child Labour in Mongolia (Phase II, ILO–IPEC Multi-bilateral Programme of Technical Cooperation of 9 April 2002, page 8), the new Law on Primary and Secondary Education was adopted on 3 May 2002. The Committee also noted that the Government indicated in its report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) that “the Law on Education provides that a child shall be provided a compulsory basic education up to 17 years of age” (CRC/C/65/Add.32 of 15 November 2004, page 19). The Committee observed that the minimum age of 15 years specified by the Government seems to be lower than the age of completion of compulsory schooling.

The Committee noted, in its concluding observations, that the CRC expressed concern “about some contradictory provisions of the domestic laws leaving children without adequate protection, e.g. the compulsory school age is 17, whereas the labour law allows children aged 14 and 15 years old to work 30 hours per week” (CRC/C/15/Add.264, 21 September 2005, paragraph 9). The Committee further noted in the Government’s report submitted under Convention No. 182, that the Law on Education was amended in December 2006, and noted the Government’s statement in its report to the CRC of 9 June 2009 that education is mandatory until the age of 16 (CRC/C/MNG/3-4, paragraph 280).

The Committee recalled that, pursuant to Article 2(3) of the Convention, the minimum age for admission to employment (currently 15 years) should not be lower than the age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee also considered that compulsory schooling is one of the most effective means of combating child labour. If the age of admission to employment and the age limit for compulsory education do not coincide, a number of problems may arise. For example, if the age of completion of compulsory education is higher than the minimum age for admission to work or employment, children who are required to attend school are at the same time legally competent to work and may be tempted to abandon their studies. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the legislative provisions contained in the Law on Primary and Secondary Education, in the Law on Education or in any other legislation, fixing the actual age of completion of compulsory education and to supply a copy of the same. Noting that the minimum age for admission to employment appears to be less than the age of completion of compulsory schooling, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to raise the minimum age for admission to employment in order to link it with the age of completion of compulsory schooling in conformity with Article 2(3) of the Convention.

Providing education for school drop-outs. The Committee noted that, according to the National Programme for the Prevention and Elimination of Child Labour in Mongolia (Phase II, ILO–IPEC Multi-bilateral Programme of Technical Cooperation of 9 April 2002, page 9), since the mid-1990s, school enrolment has been gradually improving and the school drop-out rate has reversed.

The Committee noted in the Government’s report submitted under Convention No. 182 that the National Statistical Office with support from UNICEF carried out the “Random sampling research on groups with mixed indicators” in 2005–06. One finding of this research was that 90.2 per cent of children living in Ulaanbaatar are studying in secondary school versus only 76.1 per cent in the remote rural areas, mostly due to a high drop-out rate for children of herders, who need the assistance of their children in their family’s livestock herding activities. The CRC expressed similar findings (CRC/C/15/Add.264, 21 September 2005, paragraphs 51–52). The Committee noted that the Ministry of Education, Culture and Science, with financial support from UNICEF, is implementing the “Circular for alternative training of primary, basic and complete secondary education” (Circular). This Circular, as well as the newly amended Law on Education both make explicit provisions for providing working children and drop-out children with educational services, including informal education. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the impact of the Circular, and any other measures taken, on providing educational services to both working and drop-out children as well as in increasing school attendance rates, in particular in the remote areas. It also requests the Government to continue providing statistical information on school attendance and school drop-out rates, in particular in rural schools.

Article 7. Light work. The Committee previously noted that, according to a national survey conducted by the National Statistical Office in 2000, quite a number of children under the specified minimum age for admission to employment are economically active in some way or another. The Committee recalled that Article 7(1) of the Convention provides that national laws or regulations may permit persons from the age of 13 to engage in light work, which is: (a) not likely to be harmful to their health or development; and (b) not such as to prejudice their attendance at school, their participation in vocational orientation or training programmes approved by the competent authority or their capacity to benefit from the instruction received. The Committee also recalled that, according to Article 7(3) of the Convention, the competent authority shall determine what is light work and shall prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work may be undertaken. Noting the absence of information in this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in respect of provisions to determine light work activities and the conditions in which such employment or work could be undertaken by young persons of 13 years or more.

Article 8. Artistic performances. The Committee previously noted that section 25(6) of the Law on the Protection of the Rights of the Child provides that individuals and officials using a child in press and commercial advertising without the consent of the child or his/her parents, guardians, caregivers and conducting profit-oriented activities illegally using the name of the child will face a penalty of 20,000–30,000 tughriks with confiscation of their income and profit. The Committee recalled that, according to Article 8 of the Convention, the competent authority may, by permits granted in individual cases, allow exceptions to the prohibition of employment under the general minimum age, for such purposes as participation in artistic performances. Permits so granted shall limit the number of hours during which, and prescribe the conditions in which, employment or work is allowed. It requested the Government to indicate whether in practice children under the age of 15 years participate in artistic performances and, if so, to provide information on provisions of the national legislation which determine conditions of such work. The Committee noted the information in the Government’s report that, pursuant to section 8.1 of the Law on the Protection of the Rights of the Child, a list of plays and performances which may adversely affect a child’s health shall be developed and approved by Governmental officials responsible for health issues. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of this list, once approved.

Article 9(1). Penalties. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to section 141(1)(6) of the Labour Code, if an employer forces minors to do work prohibited to them, or to lift or carry loads exceeding the prescribed limits, or has required employees under 18 years of age to work in a workplace that adversely affects their health and mental development, or in abnormal working conditions, or compels them to work overtime or during public holidays or weekends, the state labour inspector shall impose a fine on that officer of 15,000–30,000 tughriks. It also noted that section 25(5) of the Law on the Protection of the Rights of the Child provides for penalties for engaging a child in hazardous work stating “individuals forcing the child to beg and officials engaging the child in a work harmful for his/her health will face a penalty of 10,000–20,000 tughriks”.

The Committee noted in the Government’s report, submitted under Convention No. 182, that the penalties for breach of provisions found in the Criminal Code (such as human trafficking in children, involvement in pornography, sexual exploitation, drug trafficking) and other laws relating to children’s rights are appropriate. However, the penalties imposed upon employers, parents and other representatives in connection with employment in hazardous work are weak. The Committee further noted the Government's indication that the fine imposed upon someone employing minors in prohibited work is insufficiently small to deter employers from resorting to the labour exploitation of minors. The Government indicated that much still remains to be done in relation to updating the legislation by imposing penalties, by ordering injunctions and ameliorating the penalty mechanism imposed upon parents and family members who allow the employment of children in the worst forms of child labour. The Committee encourages the Government to continue updating the legislation in this regard and requests it to provide information on any developments thereof. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that a person found to be in breach of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, in particular those in respect of hazardous work, is prosecuted and that adequate penalties are imposed. It asks the Government to provide information on the types of violations detected, the number of persons prosecuted and the penalties imposed.

Article 9(3). Registers of employment. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the national legislation does not appear to contain provisions on the obligation of an employer to keep and make available the registers of persons under the age of 18 whom he/she employs. The Committee reminded the Government that, in accordance with Article 9(3) of the Convention, national laws or regulations or the competent authority shall prescribe the registers or other documents which shall be kept and made available by the employer containing the names and ages or dates of birth, duly certified, wherever possible, of persons whom he/she employs or who work for him/her and who are less than 18 years of age. Noting the absence of information in the Government's report, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in which manner it ensures that employers shall keep and make available registers, which contain the names and ages or dates of birth, duly certified whenever possible, of persons under the age of 18 years employed or working for them.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee noted in the Government's report submitted under Convention No. 182 that the National Statistics Office recently conducted the second National Child Labour Survey (2006–07) (NCL Survey). The Committee noted 621,500 children, of which 60.3 per cent were boys and 39.7 per cent girls, were covered in the NCL Survey and that at least 11.5 per cent worked at least one hour a week or were economically active. Though the survey has some shortcomings as it did not include homeless children, as well as those living in correctional labour colonies, orphanages and childcare institutions, it is nevertheless significant in creating the official and objective database. The prevalent sectors of work for children were: 84.6 per cent in agriculture; 5.1 per cent in services; 3.5 per cent in trade and industry; and 5.8 per cent in sweatshops. In relation to the employment relationship, the NCL Survey indicated that 93.1 per cent of working children work in household enterprises and are not paid, 9.2 per cent are self-employed and 1.7 per cent have a contractual relationship.

Another survey, conducted by the Mongolian Employers Federation in 2003, (Employers' Survey), reveals that labour standards in relation to children working in the formal sector are not always adhered to: 59.5 per cent of employers hiring children aged 14–18 years of age did not conclude any contracts and 29.2 per cent were employing the children on a wage or work performance contract. The main motives for not concluding a contract were not wanting to pay the social insurance premiums and other deductions (36 per cent) and the temporary nature of the employment (52 per cent). According to the reports submitted by employers and used in the Employers' Survey, 46 per cent of the children's conditions at the workplace were deemed "normal", 11.7 per cent were too hot, 21 per cent too dusty or with poor air circulation and 10.6 per cent were too noisy.

In addition, the Committee noted that the Population Training and Research Centre of the National University of Mongolia also carried out a survey which focused mostly on children aged 16–18 years of age working in the gold- and coal mining sectors in the Selenge and Tuv aimags (provinces). This survey indicates that most children started mining at an average age of 12, work an average of four hours per day in the winter, and an average of eight to nine and 10–11 continuous hours in the summer for children aged below 16 and 16–18, respectively. A total of 37.7 per cent of the children mining gold used mercury and 66.7 per cent of them work at home. Of these, 22.5 per cent have been involved in an accident in which 92.6 per cent have injured their legs, arms or their organs. Half of all children mining gold experience some form of health problem: 43.3 per cent suffer regularly from respiratory diseases, 41.7 per cent suffer from kidney and urinary disorders, 25 per cent suffer from orthopaedic illnesses and 23.3 per cent suffer from ear, nose and throat diseases.

Finally, the Committee noted that the report "Understanding children's work and youth employment outcomes in Mongolia", issued in June 2009 by the ILO, UNICEF and the World Bank (through the Understanding Children's Work Project), indicates that 13.2 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 14 are engaged in economic activity and that 7.5 per cent of children between the ages 15 and 17 are engaged in hazardous work. The Committee also noted that, in its concluding observations, the CRC expressed concern "at the high rate of working children in Mongolia and the various kinds of negative consequences resulting from the exploitation of child labour, including the school drop outs and negative impacts on health caused by the harmful and hazardous work. The high number of child domestic and rural workers and children working in very harmful conditions in gold and coal mines give cause for serious concerns" (CRC/C/15/Add.264, 21 September 2005, paragraph 59). While noting the efforts made by the Government to combat child labour, the Committee expresses serious concern at the large number of children working under the age of 15, as well as the significant number of children engaged in hazardous occupations, and therefore strongly encourages the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the situation, including through the allocation of additional resources for the implementation of measures aimed at combating child labour. The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing information on the situation of child labour in Mongolia and, in particular, to supply copies or extracts from official documents of inspection services. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the number and nature of the contraventions reported and penalties imposed.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Morocco

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption of a National Action Plan for Children (2006–15) (PANE), a major component of which is devoted to combating child labour. In this regard, the Committee noted that the activities envisaged in the PANE include support for NGOs working to combat child labour and the preparation for 2012 of a study on the working conditions of children. The Committee also noted that the PANE aims to remove children under 15 years of age from work situations at the rate of 10 per cent a year until 2015 and to improve the situation of needy families at the rate of 5 per cent a year. The Committee noted the Government's indications that significant efforts were made during the first phase of the implementation of the PANE between 2006 and 2010. The Committee also observed that a Bill on domestic work had been finalized, with the objective of determining the working conditions and terms and conditions of employment of domestic workers and prohibiting the employment of girls under 15 years of age as domestic workers.

The Committee notes the Government's indications that a process of updating the PANE has been initiated in light of the new sectoral strategies developed in 2007 with a view to introducing new indicators to improve follow-up and evaluation, and that the process was completed with the holding of the national mid-term evaluation workshop of the PANE and the preparation of its second phase in May 2011 in Rabat. The Government adds that a copy of the Bill on domestic workers will be provided once it has been adopted, and that the study on the working conditions of children in the region will be commenced in the near future. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the implementation of the PANE and on the results achieved in terms of the progressive abolition of child labour. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the Act on domestic work, when it has been adopted. It also requests the Government to supply the findings of the national study on working conditions, once it has been completed. In so far as possible, statistical data should be disaggregated by age and sex.

Article 2(1) and (3). Scope of application and compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under section 143 of the Labour Code, minors may not be employed or admitted to enterprises or the premises of employers before the age of 15 years, and it observed that the protection provided by the Labour Code does not apply to persons working on their own account. The Committee noted the Government's indication that the Labour Code does not protect children working on their own account, but that the latter are protected by the Dahir of 13 November 1963 on compulsory education, as amended by Act No. 04.00 of 25 May 2000, under which parents are required to enrol their children in school and which establishes penalties for refusal to do so. The Committee also noted that labour inspectors are only authorized by law to enforce the application of the labour legislation when there is an employment relationship. Consequently, labour inspectors do not carry out any supervision in the informal economy. The Committee however noted that an emergency plan had been adopted for the period 2009–12, consisting of ten projects aimed at giving effect to the requirement to attend school up to the age of 15 years including, in particular, the development of the pre-school level, equality of opportunity with regard to access to compulsory education and measures to reduce the repetition of classes and school drop-out rates.

The Committee notes the Government's indications concerning the measures taken in the context of the emergency programme. The Government indicates that, in order to guarantee a place for each child in school, the Ministry of National Education created 499 new schools, including 205 primary schools, 88 middle schools and 136 high schools, which opened their doors between the 2007–08 and 2010–11 school years. The Ministry also plans the establishment of 290 additional schools, consisting of 141 primary schools, 78 middle schools and 71 high schools. Furthermore, with a view to combating school drop-outs, the Ministry has established educational mechanisms for the personalized follow-up of students at school. In this context, the Government indicates that 4,066,649 children benefited from personalized follow-up measures in 2011. The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that satisfactory results continue to be achieved: primary schooling is almost generalized, as the school enrolment rate recorded in 2011–12 is 97.9 per cent (97 per cent for girls); the rate of the repetition of classes in primary school fell between 2008–09 and 2011–12 from 16 to 8.2 per cent; and the drop-out rate in primary school was 3.2 per cent in 2011–12. Considering that compulsory schooling is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee encourages the Government to continue its efforts to increase the school enrolment and completion rates and to reduce the rate of repeating school years and of school drop-outs, particularly for children under 15 years of age, with a view to preventing them from working on their own account and in the informal economy. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the progress achieved in this respect.

Article 2(1) and Part V of the report form. Minimum age for admission to employment and application of the Convention in practice. 1. Child workers in informal artisanal activities and other sectors. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the information provided by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), according to which child labour was common in informal artisanal activities. It also noted that, according to the report entitled, "Understanding children's work in Morocco" (pp. 19, 20, 22 and 23), some 372,000 children aged between 7 and 14 years, representing 7 per cent of the reference group, were engaged in work, while for the 12 to 14 age group, 18 per cent of children were economically active. According to this study, 87 per cent of working children were in rural areas, where they were working in the agricultural sector. In urban areas, children were engaged in the textile, commercial and repairs sectors. The Committee noted the assessment of the activities undertaken with ILO–IPEC support for the prevention and removal of thousands of children from work. However, it observed that, under the terms of section 4 of the Labour Code, employers in purely traditional sectors, that is those involving manual work, with the assistance of their partners, ascendants and descendants, and with a maximum of five assistants, at home or in another place of work, for the purpose of manufacturing traditional products for commercial sale, are excluded from the scope of application of the Labour Code. The Committee therefore noted that children employed in informal artisanal activities, or formal artisanal activities involving five employees or fewer, do not benefit from the protection of the Labour Code and, consequently, from the application of the minimum age of 15 years. The Committee requested the Government to take measures to ensure that the minimum age of 15 years is duly applied to all children working in artisanal activities.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that a Bill to determine the conditions of work and employment in activities of a purely artisanal nature has been prepared in collaboration with the Department of Artisanal Activities. The Bill includes a section prohibiting work by children under the age of 15 years, in accordance with sections 143 and 153 of the Labour Code. The final version of the Bill has been sent to the General Secretariat of the Government and is in the process of being adopted. The Government adds that the Ministry of Artisanal Activities, in collaboration with ILO-IPEC, is continuing to work on projects to combat child labour in the artisanal sector. Expressing the hope that the Bill to determine the conditions of work and employment in activities of a purely artisanal nature will establish a minimum age of 15 years for all children working in artisanal activities, the Committee requests the Government to take measures to ensure that the Bill is adopted in the near future and to provide a copy to the Office. It requests the Government to continue its efforts to combat child labour and requests it to continue providing information on the implementation of any relevant projects, and on the results achieved with regard to the progressive abolition of child labour, particularly in the artisanal sector.

2. Child domestic workers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the report "Understand children's work in Morocco", children working in urban areas were mainly engaged in domestic work. The Committee also noted that, according to the observations provided previously by the ITUC, some 50,000 children, mainly girls, are employed in domestic work, including 13,000 young girls under the age of 15 who are employed as servants in Casablanca, with 70 per cent of them being under 12 years of age and 25 per cent under 10 years of age. In this respect, the Committee noted that a Bill on domestic work had been formulated in 2007 and was in the process of being validated. The Bill fills the current legislative gap and sets the minimum age for admission for this type of employment at 15 years, lays down conditions of work and establishes supervisory measures and penalties, including imprisonment, for persons employing children under 15 years of age. The Committee noted the Government's indication that the process of adopting the Bill on domestic work had been under way since June 2011.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), according to which, with the entry into office of the new Government, the Bill on domestic work has been withdrawn from Parliament and submitted once again to the Council of the Government on 12 March 2012, which deferred it for in-depth examination. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the Bill which has been under examination for a certain number of years, will be adopted in the very near future. It requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the progress achieved in this respect.

Article 8. Artistic performances. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that Decree No. 2-04-465 of 29 December 2004 prohibits the engagement of any person under 18 years of age as an employed actor or performer in public performances without the written authorization of the official responsible for labour inspection, following consultation with the minor's guardian. The Committee also noted the Government's indication that Decree No. 2-04-465 of 29 December 2004 does not establish the particulars of the authorization by parents and the labour inspector, nor the penalties to be applied in the event of violations, and that the law establishes details concerning working hours and conditions. In this respect, the Committee noted that section 145 of the Labour Code provides that "[n]o minor under 18 years of age may, without the prior individual authorization in writing of the official responsible for labour inspection, for each minor, following consultation with the minor's guardian, be employed as an actor or performer in public performances organized by enterprises, the list of which is determined by regulation. The official responsible for labour inspection may withdraw the authorization granted previously, either at her or his own initiative or at the initiative of any authorized person". The Committee however noted that this provision does not require that permits granted to minors under 18 years of age, under the Decree No. 2-04-465 of 29 December 2004, shall limit the number of hours during which and prescribe the conditions in which such employment or work shall be allowed.

The Committee observes that the Government's report does not contain any further information on this subject. It once again reminds the Government that Article 8 of the Convention requires the permits granted allowing minors under 18 years of age to participate in artistic performances to limit the number of hours during which and to prescribe the conditions in which employment or work is allowed. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the national legislation to bring it into conformity with Article 8 of the Convention, so that permits granted to minors under 18 years of age allowing them to participate in artistic performances explicitly limit the number of hours during which and prescribe the conditions in which employment or work is allowed.

Article 9(1). Penalties. The Committee previously noted that section 151 of the Labour Code provides that the employment of a child under 15 years of age, in breach of section 143 of the Labour Code, shall be punishable by a fine of 25,000–30,000 dirhams (US$3,000–$3,600), and that a repeat offence is subject to a term of imprisonment of six days to three months and/or a fine of 50,000–60,000 dirhams (US$6,000–$7,200). It nevertheless noted that sections 150 and 183 of the Labour Code provide for a fine of between 300 and 500 dirhams (between US$36 and US$60) for breaches of section 147 of the Labour Code (prohibiting the employment of children under 18 years of age in hazardous work) or section 179 (prohibiting the employment of children under 18 years of age in quarries or mines, or in work likely to hamper their growth). The Committee also noted that, before resorting to penalties, labour inspectors have to give advice and information to employers on the dangers to which child workers are exposed. Under the terms of sections 542 and 543 of the Labour Code, a labour inspector who detects a violation of the legislative provisions or regulations respecting safety and healthy, which poses an imminent risk to the health or safety of the workers, shall issue an order requiring the employer to take all the necessary measures immediately. If the employer refuses or fails to comply with the requirements set out in the order, the labour inspector shall immediately refer the matter to the president of the court of first instance, who may give the employer a deadline for taking all the necessary measures to prevent the imminent danger and may order the closure of the establishment and determine, where appropriate, the necessary duration of the closure. The Committee observed that persons who have employed children in breach of the provisions giving effect to the Convention are not generally prosecuted if such employment is brought to an end.

The Committee notes the Government's indications that 383 establishments were inspected in 2011, and that 1,234 reports of violations were drawn up and 63 warnings were issued to employers. In addition, four notifications were referred to the competent courts for decision. The Government indicates that the sectors which mainly employ children under 15 years of age are commerce and mechanical work (40 per cent), carpentry (23 per cent), manufacturing (15 per cent) and textiles and agriculture (5 per cent). The Committee notes that, according to the 2011 report on child labour at the national level provided by the Government with its report, labour inspections revealed that the violations reported by employers in relation to child labour often relate to failure to comply with the minimum age for employment or work. According to the report, in such cases, the employers often respond positively to the observations made by inspectors, particularly in relation to the employment of children below the minimum age of 15 years, and the children are immediately removed from the work in question.

However, the Committee once again observes that the penalties envisaged in sections 150 and 183 of the Labour Code in relation to the employment of children under 18 years of age in hazardous work are still not sufficiently adequate and dissuasive to ensure the application of the provisions of the Convention respecting hazardous work, in accordance with Article 9(1) of the Convention, particularly when compared with the penalties envisaged in section 151 of the Labour Code, which are much more severe. The Committee once again reminds the Government that it is necessary to ensure the application of the Convention through penalties set out in law. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that any person in breach of the provisions prohibiting the employment of children under 18 years of age in hazardous types of work is prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are applied. It once again requests the Government to provide information on the type of violations detected by the labour inspection services, the number of persons prosecuted and the penalties imposed, particularly in relation to the provisions giving effect to the Convention.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clauses (a) and (d). Forced or compulsory labour and hazardous work. Child domestic labour. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the statement by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that child domestic labour, performed under conditions of servitude, is common practice in the country, with parents selling their children, sometimes as young as six years of age, to work as domestic servants. The Committee noted that section 10 of the Labour Code prohibits forced labour and that section 467-2 of the Penal Code prohibits the forced labour of children under 15 years of age. It also noted that a Bill on domestic work had been adopted and was in the process of being validated. The Bill sets the minimum age for admission to this type of employment at 15 years, lays down conditions of work and establishes supervisory measures and penalties, which may include imprisonment for persons employing children under 15 years of age. The Committee further noted that a specific list determining hazardous types of work prohibited in the domestic work sector would be drawn up and adopted in conjunction with the future Bill on the conditions of employment and work of domestic workers. This Bill has been in the process of being adopted since June 2011.

The Committee also noted that an initial qualitative and quantitative survey of girls under 18 years of age engaged in domestic work had been undertaken in 2001 in the Wilaya of Casablanca. According to the results of the statistical survey undertaken in 2001, nearly 23,000 girls under 18 years of age were working in the Greater Casablanca area as domestic workers, 59.2 per cent of whom were under 15 years of age. The Committee noted that the survey revealed that a significant proportion of these girls were uneducated, were subject to penalties or punishment in the course of their work, received beatings and/or were subjected to sexual abuse. The Committee noted that a second survey was planned in the Greater Casablanca area during the second half of 2010, with an extrapolation of the results and data at the national level. The Committee further noted the Government's indications that the figures recorded by the 2001 survey have decreased significantly since then, owing to the efforts made by Morocco in recent years, especially to combat school drop-outs and all other forms of social exclusion. With regard to the second survey to be conducted on girls engaged in domestic work in Casablanca, the Government indicated that the methodological report which determines the target group and planning of the survey had been drawn up and the survey itself was being undertaken.

The Committee notes the Government's indications that, with the entry into office of the new Government, the Bill on domestic work was withdrawn from Parliament and resubmitted to the Council of the Government on 12 March 2012, which deferred it for in-depth examination. With regard to the survey on girls engaged in domestic work in Casablanca, the Government indicates that it commenced during the course of 2012 and that the results will be provided when they have been published. The Committee reminds the Government that young girls engaged in domestic work are often victims of exploitation and that the clandestine nature of such work makes it difficult to monitor their conditions of employment. It also reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 1 of the Convention, each member State shall take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. Observing that the Government has been referring to the adoption of the Bill on domestic work and the specific list of prohibited types of hazardous work in the domestic work sector for several years, the Committee urges it to take the necessary measures to ensure that the Bill and the list are adopted on an urgent basis. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to conclude the survey on the situation of young girls engaged in domestic work in Casablanca in the very near future and to provide a copy of the findings to the Office with its next report.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour and removing them from these worst forms, and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Child prostitution and sex tourism. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed concern at the persistence of child prostitution and sex tourism involving young Moroccans and immigrants, particularly boys, despite the amendment to the Penal Code in 2003 making sex tourism a criminal offence. It noted the Government's indications that the scourge of the sexual exploitation of children remains unseen and unrecognized in Morocco, for which reason the Government is sparing no effort to address it. The Committee also noted that five child protection units (UPEs) had been set up since 2007 in Marrakech, Casablanca, Tangier, Meknès and Essaouira to ensure better medical, psychological and legal assistance for child victims of violence and ill treatment, including child victims of sexual and economic exploitation, and that hundreds of children have benefited. The Committee also noted that, as part of the National Action Plan for Children (PANE) for the decade 2006–15, a preliminary study on the problem of the sexual exploitation of children was carried out in February 2007 with a view to formulating a national strategy to prevent and combat such exploitation.

The Committee notes the lack of information in the Government's report on the activities of the UPEs and on the results achieved through the implementation of the National Strategy to Combat the Sexual Exploitation of Children. The Committee, therefore, urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that the National Strategy to Prevent and Combat the Sexual Exploitation of Children will be implemented in the very near future and to provide information in its next report on the progress achieved in this respect. The Committee also requests the Government to provide updated information on the number of children who are prevented from engaging in or removed from prostitution through the UPEs. Finally, the Committee once again asks the Government to provide a copy of the preliminary study on the problem of the sexual exploitation of children undertaken in February 2007 with a view to the formulation of the national strategy.

Clause (d). Children at special risk. Child domestic labour. The Committee previously noted the adoption of the National Programme to Combat the Use of Young Girls in Domestic Work (INQAD) as part of the PANE. It also noted that, as part of the strategic plan for 2008–12, and following the implementation of the INQAD programme, the Ministry of Social Development, Family Affairs and Solidarity was planning to organize a second nationwide awareness-raising campaign to combat the use of young girls as domestic workers and to prepare regional action plans. It further noted that, as part of the multi-sectoral programme implemented in collaboration with the United Nations Development Programme to combat gender-based violence by empowering women and girls in Morocco, ILO–IPEC launched an action programme to combat the use of young girls in domestic labour in the region of Marrakech Tensift-EI Haouz over the period 1 January 2009 to 31 December 2010.

The Committee notes the Government's indications that in 2011, following the activities undertaken with the cooperation of ILO–IPEC, 12,192 children were removed from their workplaces and offered viable alternatives and 20,993 were prevented from engaging in work. The Committee also notes that, according to information available from ILO–IPEC, an IPEC action project to combat domestic work by girls is being implemented up to 2014 in the context of the project to support the implementation of the ILO Declaration (PAMODEC). The ILO/IPEC/PAMODEC project has three main priorities, namely prevention, removal and protection, and emphasizes education, capacity building and national ownership. Activities have already been carried out in the context of the project, including the training of 50 focal points on the improvement of the system of monitoring and information gathering, with a special component on combating domestic work by children, training courses on domestic work by children for NGO educators and social workers and information sessions for primary and middle school teachers and inspectors in the Fès region, the objective of which is to combat more effectively school drop-outs, particularly among girls. The Committee encourages the Government to intensify its efforts for the identification, removal and reintegration of girls under 18 years of age engaged in domestic work who are victims of economic or sexual exploitation, and requests it to continue providing information on the results achieved, particularly in the context of the ILO/IPEC/PAMODEC project on domestic work by girls. The Committee encourages the Government to ratify the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), which has key provisions for child protection.

Article 5 and Part V of the report form. Monitoring mechanisms and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in the context of the ILO–IPEC project “Combating child labour in Morocco by creating a suitable environment nationwide and providing for direct intervention against the worst forms of child labour in rural areas”, a number of training sessions were organized to strengthen the capacity of the various actors involved in combating child labour, including 330 labour inspectors and 43 controllers designated as focal points. One of the tasks of the focal points is to monitor establishments employing children. The Committee noted previously the Government's indications concerning the activities undertaken by the focal points in the years 2008–10.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the activities carried out by the focal points in 2011. They visited 383 workplaces, in which they detected 119 child workers under the age of 15 years and 397 child workers between the ages of 15 and 18 years. During the visits, 1,234 reports were drawn up, nine offences and violations were recorded and four cases were referred for prosecution. The sectors employing children between 15 and 18 years of age are commerce and mechanical work (31 per cent), wood working (19 per cent), manufacturing (14 per cent), retail (11 per cent) and the textile industry (8 per cent). The Committee notes that, according to the 2011 report on child labour at the national level, provided by the Government with its report, labour inspections found that children are engaged in work likely to harm their health. The dangers include: the effects of radiation and exposure to injury and burns through welding; the use of machinery with cutting edges and the carrying of heavy loads; the use of chemicals and exposure to dust; the use of paints; the use of electricity, and exposure to high temperatures. The report indicates that when children between the ages of 15 and 18 years are identified in such situations, appropriate work is offered to them as an alternative. Expressing its concern at the situation of children under 18 years of age engaged in hazardous types of work and the low number of violations reported and cases referred for prosecution in comparison, the Committee requests the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure that no children under 18 years of age are engaged in the worst forms of child labour, including hazardous types of work. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the application of the Convention in practice, including statistical data and information on the nature, extent and trends of the worst forms of child labour. In so far as possible, all such information should be disaggregated by age and gender.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Mozambique

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2003)

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Scope of application. 1. Children working on their own account and in the informal sector. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that pursuant to sections 1 and 2 of the Labour Law No. 23/2007 (Labour Law), this Law only applies in the context of a labour relationship. It had noted the Government's indication that, in Mozambique, there is no specific regulation governing children who are working outside of an employment relationship, such as those working in the informal economy. In this regard, the Committee had noted the Government's statement in its report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) of 23 May 2009, that informal trade is one of the most common forms of labour in which children are involved in Mozambique (CRC/C/MOZ/2, paragraph 356). The Government had also indicated that the control mechanisms for child labour, such as labour inspection, were more effective in the formal than in the informal sector (CRC/C/MOZ/2, paragraph 359). The Committee had finally noted that the CRC, in its concluding observations of 4 November 2009, expressed concern that there were still no specific regulations governing children who are not covered by an employment relationship (CRC/C/MOZ/CO/2, paragraph 80).

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no information on this matter. Recalling that the Convention applies to all branches of economic activity and covers all types of employment or work, whether or not there is a contractual employment relationship, the Committee encourages the Government to take measures to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate to better monitor children carrying out economic activities without an employment relationship or in the informal economy. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard.

2. Domestic work. The Committee had previously noted section 4(2) of the Regulations on Domestic Work (Decree 40/2008) which prohibits domestic work by children under 15 years, while permitting children of 12 years to be hired for domestic work with the permission of a legal representative. The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that no child under the age of 15 years is permitted to engage in domestic work, except under the specific conditions laid down in Article 7 of the Convention for light work.

The Committee notes that the Government's report does not provide for a response to its previous comments, but states that section 4(2) of the Regulation on Domestic Work prohibits hiring minors under the age of 12 years for domestic work. The Committee once again reminds the Government that pursuant to Article 2(1) of the Convention, no person under the minimum age (of 15 years) may be engaged in economic activity, including in domestic work, with the exception of light work for children of at least 13 years of age that can only be carried out under conditions laid down in Article 7 of the Convention. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that no person under the age of 15 is permitted to engage in domestic work, except under the specific conditions laid down in Article 7 of the Convention for light work.

3. Rural work. The Committee had previously noted the Government's statement that the minimum age for admission to employment established in the Labour Law (of 15 years of age) applies to children working in rural work. It had also noted the Government's indication that pursuant to section 3 of the Labour Law, draft regulations on rural work have been developed and was under discussion. The Committee had noted the information from UNICEF indicating that hazardous labour activities involving children were mostly related to farm work either in the cotton or tobacco industries. It had also noted the statement by the CRC, in its concluding observations of 4 November 2009, that child labour remained a common practice on commercial cotton, tobacco and tea plantations and on family farms where children may, for example, herd livestock (CRC/C/MOZ/CO/2, paragraph 79).

The Committee notes the Government's information that the proposal for the instrument on rural work is still under discussion. The Committee also notes that according to the Multiple Indicators Cluster Survey (MICS) report of 2008, in rural areas, 25 per cent of children are engaged in child labour, compared to 15 per cent in urban areas. Expressing its concern at the situation of children involved in child labour, especially agriculture, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the minimum age of 15 is applied in practice to this sector. It also requests the Government to provide a copy of the regulation on rural work, once it has been adopted.

Article 2(3). Age of compulsory schooling. The Committee had previously noted the Government's statement that compulsory education started at the age of 6 years and was completed at the age of 13 years. It had therefore observed that the age for completion of compulsory schooling was two years below the minimum age for admission to employment or work (15 years). The Committee had also noted that the CRC, in its concluding observations of 4 November 2009, commended the significant efforts deployed by the Government to increase enrolment rates in primary and secondary education (CRC/C/MOZ/CO/2, paragraph 71). However, the CRC expressed concern that, nearly half of primary school aged children drop out of school before they completed grade 5 (ibid.).

With regard to the age of completion of compulsory schooling, the Committee must emphasize the desirability of linking the age of completion of compulsory schooling with the minimum age for admission to work, as provided under Paragraph 4 of the Minimum Age Recommendation, 1973 (No. 146). In cases where these two ages do not coincide, various problems can arise. If the compulsory schooling comes to an end before children are legally entitled to work, there may arise a vacuum which regrettably opens the door for the economic exploitation of children (see General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work, paragraph 371). Accordingly, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to consider raising the age of completion of compulsory education so as to coincide with that of the minimum age of 15 years for admission to employment or work. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard. Furthermore, considering that compulsory education is the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen the functioning of the education system, in particular by increasing the school enrolment, attendance and completion rates of children under the minimum age of employment with special focus on children in rural areas.

Article 3(2). Determination of hazardous types of employment or work. The Committee had previously noted that section 23(2) of the Labour Law prohibited employers from employing children under the age of 18 years in work that is unhealthy, dangerous or which required great physical strength, as defined by the competent authorities, after consultation with trade union and employers' organizations. It had noted the Government's statement that no measures had been adopted to determine types of dangerous work prohibited to persons aged under 18 years. The Committee had further noted that the CRC, in its concluding observations of 4 November 2009, urged the Government to define hazardous work prohibited for persons under 18 years old (CRC/C/MOZ/CO/2, paragraph 81).

The Committee notes the absence of information in the Government's report. The Committee, therefore, once again recalls that, by virtue of Article 3(2) of the Convention, the types of employment or work which, by their nature or the circumstances in which they are carried out are likely to jeopardize the health, safety or morals of young persons, shall be determined by national laws or regulations or by the competent authority, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned. The Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to include in national legislation provisions determining the types of hazardous work prohibited for persons under the age of 18, in accordance with Article 3(2) of the Convention.

Article 6. Vocational training and apprenticeship. The Committee had previously noted that Chapter IV of the Labour Law regulates vocational training and apprenticeship. It had noted that under section 248(3) of the Labour Law, enterprises or establishments may not admit minors under 12 years of age for apprenticeships. Noting the absence of information in the Government's report, the Committee once again reminds the Government that Article 6 of the Convention authorizes work to be carried out by young persons within the context of an apprenticeship programme only from the age of 14 years of age. In this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to take measures to ensure that no minor under 14 years of age is permitted to enter into an apprenticeship programme, in conformity with Article 6 of the Convention.

Article 7(1). Minimum age for admission to light work. The Committee had previously noted that, by virtue of section 21(1) of the Labour Law, an employment contract entered into directly with a minor between 12 and 15 years of age shall only be valid with the written authorization from the minor's legal representative. In this regard, the Committee had recalled that pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Convention, national laws or regulations may only permit the employment or work of persons of 13 and 15 years of age on light work, provided that such work is not likely to harm their health or development, or prejudice their attendance at school, their participation in vocational orientation or training programmes approved by the competent authority or their capacity to benefit from the instruction received. Noting an absence of information on this point in the Government's report, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the Labour Law into conformity with Article 7(1) of the Convention by permitting children only from the age of 13 in light work.

Article 7(3). Determination of light work. The Committee previously noted that under section 26(2) of the Labour Law, the Council of Ministers shall issue a legal diploma establishing the nature and the conditions of work that may be performed, in exceptional circumstances, by minors of between 12 and 15 years of age. It had also noted the Government's statement that children between the ages of 12 and 15 years may not be employed in work that is likely to be harmful to their health. The Committee had further noted the statement in the Government's report that the light work referred to in the Labour Law has not been classified.

Noting the absence of information in the Government's report, the Committee once again reminds the Government, that pursuant to Article 7(3) of the Convention, the competent authority shall determine what constitutes light work and shall prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work may be undertaken. Observing that a significant number of children under the minimum age are engaged in child labour, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to regulate this work by determining the types of light work activities permitted for children between the ages of 13 and 15, including the hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work may be undertaken.

Article 9(3). Keeping of registers by employers. The Committee had previously noted that the Labour Law does not prescribe the registers to be kept by employers. It had reminded the Government that under Article 9(3) of the Convention, national laws or regulations or the competent authority must prescribe the registers concerning employees under the age of 18, which shall be kept and made available by the employer. Noting once again an absence of information in the Government's report on this point, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that national laws or regulations or the competent authority prescribe the registers or other documents which shall be kept and made available by the employer containing the names and ages or dates of birth, duly certified, wherever possible, of persons under the age of 18 years who work for them, in conformity with Article 9(3) of the Convention.

The Committee strongly encourages the Government to take into consideration the Committee's comments on discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention. In this regard, the Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of ILO technical assistance to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution. The Committee previously noted that section 63(1)(b) of the Child Protection Act requires the Government to adopt legislative or administrative measures to protect children against all forms of sexual exploitation, including prostitution. It also noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), in its concluding observations of 4 November 2009, expressed deep concern at the increasing number of child prostitution in Mozambique, especially in the Maputo, Beira and Nacala regions, as well as in some rural areas (CRC/C/MOZ/CO/2, paragraph 84). The Committee, therefore, urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of legislation, pursuant to section 63(1)(b) of the Child Protection Act, prohibiting the use, procuring or offering of a child under the age of 18 for the purpose of prostitution in the very near future.

The Committee once again notes with regret that the Government report does not contain any information on this point. It reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 3(b) of the Convention, the use, procuring and offering of a child under 18 years of age constitutes one of the worst forms of child labour and that, under Article 1 of the Convention, immediate and effective measures must be taken to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee, therefore, requests the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure the adoption of legislation prohibiting the use, procuring and offering of a child under 18 years of age for prostitution, in accordance with Article 3(b) of the Convention, as a matter of urgency. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard with its next report.

Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, although national legislation provided for the protection of children from being exposed to pornography, it did not prohibit the use, procuring or offering of children under 18 years of age for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. It also noted that section 63(1)(c) of the Child Protection Act states that the State must take legislative measures to protect children from all forms of sexual exploitation, including the exploitation of children in pornography or pornographic performances. Noting once again an absence of information on this point in the Government's report, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of legislative measures prohibiting the use, procuring or offering of children under the age of 18 for the production of pornography or pornographic performances, pursuant to section 63 of the Child Protection Act.

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption of the Law on Drugs No. 3/97, which contained provisions relating to the use of minors for the production, transport, distribution and consumption of drugs. The Committee notes that while the Government report states that a copy of the Law on Drugs has been attached, no such attachment has been received along with the report. Considering that the Committee has been requesting a copy of the Law on Drugs No. 3/97 since 2005, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will send a copy of this legislation, along with its next report.

Clause (d). Hazardous work. Children in domestic service. The Committee previously noted that pursuant to section 3 of Act No. 23/2007 of 27 August 2007 (Labour Law), Regulations on Domestic Work (No. 40) were adopted on 26 November 2008, section 4(2) of which prohibits employers from employing a person under 15 years of age in domestic work. The Committee, however, observed that these regulations did not address the issue of hazardous domestic work of children. The Committee recalled that children, particularly young girls, engaged in domestic service are often victims of exploitation, and that it is difficult to supervise their conditions of employment due to the clandestine nature of such work. It further noted the Government's statement in its 23 March 2009 report to the CRC that domestic work is one of the most common types of child labour in Mozambique, and that children are frequently forced to work in this sector (CRC/C/MOZ/2, paragraphs 356 and 358).

The Committee notes the absence of information in the Government's report on this matter. In this regard, the Committee notes the information in a report available on the website of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) that children in Mozambique are engaged in the worst forms of child labour, many of them in dangerous work in domestic work. The report further indicated that child domestic workers, work up to 15 hours a day and are subject to physical abuse, including burns. Noting with concern the situation of children working as domestic workers, the Committee urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to protect these children from hazardous types of work. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard. The Committee also encourages the Government to ratify the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), which has key provisions for child protection.

Article 4(1). Determination of hazardous types of work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, pursuant to section 23(2) of the Labour Law, employers shall not engage persons under 18 years of age in hazardous work, as defined by the competent authorities after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers. It noted with concern the Government's statement that no measures had been adopted to determine the types of dangerous work prohibited to persons under the age of 18 years.

The Committee notes the absence of information in the Government's report on this point. The Committee once again reminds the Government that, by virtue of Article 4(1) of the Convention, the types of hazardous work prohibited to persons under the age of 18 shall be determined by national laws or regulations or by the competent authority, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, taking into consideration relevant international standards, in particular, Paragraph 3 of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Recommendation, 1999 (No. 190). The Committee, therefore, once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that regulations are adopted pursuant to section 23(2) of the Labour Law to determine the hazardous types of work prohibited for children under 18 years of age in the near future. It also requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Reaching out to children at special risk. Orphans and other vulnerable children. The Committee previously noted the information in the Government's report that, between 2005 and 2009, actions were implemented through the National Action Plan for Children (NAPC) to locate, document and reunite the families of orphaned, lost or abandoned children. It noted the Government's statement in its report to the UN Human Rights Council for the Universal Periodic Review of 11 November 2010, that the impact of HIV/AIDS was a contributing factor to the continuation of child labour in the country (A/HRC/WG.6/10/MOZ/1, paragraph 97). The Committee expressed its concern at the increasing number of children orphaned in Mozambique as a result of HIV/AIDS and urged the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure that such children are protected from these worst forms of child labour.

The Committee notes the Government's information that in its efforts to enhance the protection of children, particularly orphaned and vulnerable children, the Government has revised two social assistance programmes, the Basic Social Assistance Programme and the National Basic Social Security Strategy (ENSSB) for the period of 2010–14. According to the Government's report, the Basic Social Assistance Programme aims to provide financial assistance to households who have members who are not fit to work or who have orphaned children. Within the context of the ENSSB, programmes prioritizing orphaned and vulnerable children were initiated with a view to extending the granting of direct social support. Moreover, programmes to reintegrate heads of households fostering orphaned children into working life and productive activities have also been established. The Committee further notes that, according to the 2012 Global AIDS Response Progress Report (GARP) of the National AIDS Council, the Government of Mozambique has taken the following steps towards meeting the needs of most vulnerable children in the country:

- the Action Plan for the Reduction of Absolute Poverty (PARPA II) which includes the goal of providing a minimum of three to six identified basic services (health, nutrition, education, psychological support, legal and financial support) to 30 per cent households with orphans and other vulnerable children was initiated;
- a Multi-sectoral Plan for Orphans and Vulnerable Children (PACOV) which addresses the special needs of this growing population was established, and a Multi-sectoral Technical Group for Vulnerable and Orphaned children was established in all 11 provinces and 54 districts;

- in partnership with Save the Children, the Ministry of Women and Coordination of Social Action (MMAS) developed guidelines for the establishment and functioning of child protection committees. Currently 531 such committees have been established to support orphans and other vulnerable children.

The Committee further notes from the GARP report that: (i) an estimated 66,364 children have benefited through the Pre-school Education Programme carried out by the MMAS; (ii) about 22 per cent of the families with orphans received support through the Government initiated programmes; (iii) 212,096 orphans and other vulnerable children received support from UNICEF assisted programmes, and (iv) 237,200 orphans and other vulnerable children received support from the United States Government, during the year 2010. The Committee notes, however, that according to the GARP report, in Mozambique, 12 per cent of children under the age of 18 years are orphans. In 2011, it was estimated that the number of orphans was 936,000, out of which 424,000 were orphans due to AIDS. While appreciating the measures taken by the Government to protect orphans and other vulnerable children, the Committee expresses its concern at the number of children orphaned in Mozambique as a result of HIV/AIDS. Recalling that orphans and other vulnerable children are at an increased risk of being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure that such children are protected from these worst forms. It requests the Government to provide information on the effective and time-bound measures taken in this regard, and on the results achieved.

The Committee encourages the Government to take into consideration the Committee's comments on discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention. In this regard, the Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of ILO technical assistance to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Namibia

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution or for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee previously observed that the prohibitions related to prostitution contained in national legislation (particularly in the Immorality Act 1988 and the Immoral Practices Act 1980) did not encompass the use, procuring or offering of all persons under the age of 18 for the purpose of prostitution or pornography. It also noted the statement in the Government's report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) of 15 September 2011 that the criminal and sexual exploitation of children occurred in the country both through children being prostituted, and through adults taking advantage of needy children by providing basic necessities in return for sex (CRC/C/NAM/2-3, paragraph 226). However, the Committee noted that the draft Child Care and Protection Bill had been developed, and that section 176(1)(a) of this Bill would prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the draft Child Care and Protection Bill is with the legal drafters at the Ministry of Justice. The Government states that after its finalization, it will be tabled before Parliament. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the draft Child Care and Protection Bill will prohibit the use, procuring and offering of all persons under the age of 18 for prostitution and pornography, and will be adopted without delay. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the Child Care Protection Act, once adopted.

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that national legislation did not appear to prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities. It also noted that the 2007 ILO rapid assessment study entitled "Children used by adults to commit crimes (CUBAC) in Namibia" indicated that approximately one third of children involved in crimes had been used by adults to commit such crimes. However, the Committee noted that section 176(1)(b) of the draft Child Care and Protection Bill prohibits the use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities, including drug production and trafficking.

The Committee notes, as above, the Government's statement that the draft Child Care and Protection Bill is with legal drafters of the Ministry of Justice, and will be presented to Parliament once finalized. Recalling that, by virtue of Article 3(c) of the Convention, the use of children by adults for illicit activities, including to commit crimes, is considered to be one of the worst forms of child labour, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of the draft Child Care and Protection Bill in the near future.

Article 4(1). Determination of types of hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that section 3(3)(d) and section 3(4) of the Labour Act prohibits six types of hazardous work for children between the ages of 14 and 18. In addition, the Committee noted the Government's indication that a list of hazardous work (in terms of Conventions Nos 138 and 182) had been developed by the Project Advisory Committee on Child Labour. This list was subsequently submitted to the Labour Advisory Council for its consideration.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Labour Advisory Council approved the submitted list without any modifications. The Government also indicates that the Labour Advisory Council recommended the list to the Minister of Labour and Social Welfare for approval, and that once this list is approved by the Minister, the supporting regulations for hazardous work will be developed. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the elaboration and adoption of regulations containing a further determination of prohibited types of hazardous work. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the relevant regulations, once adopted.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Nepal

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1997)

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Scope of application. Children working in the informal economy. The Committee previously noted that the Child Labour Act of 2000, which prohibits the employment of children below 14 years as labourers (section 3(1)), does not define the terms “employment” and “labourer”. It also noted the Government’s indication that the Act does not adequately cover the informal sector. The Committee further noted the Government’s indication that although labour inspections showed a negligible incidence of child labour in the formal sector, this phenomenon was more likely to be prevalent in the informal sector.

The Committee once again notes the Government’s statement that it is very difficult to enforce the provisions of the Convention in the informal sector due to limited infrastructure and financial resources. The Committee also notes the information in the Report on the Nepal Labour Force Survey (of 2008), produced by the Central Bureau of Statistics, in conjunction with the ILO and United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), that 82 per cent of working children who are under the minimum age are engaged in agricultural occupations, most of whom perform this work outside of a formal labour relationship and on an unpaid basis (page 139). Moreover, the Committee notes the statement in the report of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), for the World Trade Organization General Council on the Trade Policies of Nepal of 1 and 3 February 2012 entitled “Internationally recognized core labour standards in Nepal” that formal employment agreements account for only 10 per cent of all employment relations, so the Child Labour Act is not enforced for 90 per cent of employment relationships. This report further indicates that working children are mainly found performing informal economic activity in quarries and mines, domestic servitude, agriculture and portering. Recalling that the Convention applies to all branches of economic activity and covers all types of employment or work, the Committee encourages the Government to take measures to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate to better monitor children working in the informal economy. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved.

Article 3(1) and (2). Minimum age for admission to hazardous work and determination of types of hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that sections 2(a) and 3(2) of the Child Labour Act prohibit the employment of persons under 16 years of age in any risky job or enterprise listed in the schedule, and that section 43(2) of the Labour Rules, 1993, also prohibits the employment of persons under 16 years on dangerous machines and in operations which are hazardous to their health. The Committee also noted the Government’s statement that the Child Labour (Prohibition and Regulation) Act, 2000, listed different jobs, occupations and work environments that are hazardous and therefore prohibited to children below 16 years. In this respect, the Committee recalled that Article 3(1) of the Convention provides that the minimum age for admission to any type of employment or work, which by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to jeopardize the health, safety or morals of young persons shall not be less than 18 years.

The Committee notes the Government’s reference to the interim Constitution of 2007, and observes that article 22(5) of the interim Constitution of 2007 prohibits employing a minor in factories, mines or in any other such hazardous work. However, the Committee observes that the term “minor” is not defined in this legislation. In addition, the Committee notes an absence of information in the Government’s report on measures taken to determine the types of hazardous work prohibited to children under the age of 18. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide information on the definition of the term “minor” in article 22(5) of the interim Constitution of 2007. Moreover, recalling that pursuant to Article 3(2) of the Convention, the types of hazardous employment or work shall be determined by national laws or regulations or by the competent authority, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to determine the types of hazardous work which are prohibited for persons under 18 years.

Article 3(3). Admission to types of hazardous work from the age of 16 years. In its previous comments, the Committee reminded the Government that Article 3(3) of the Convention only authorizes the employment or work of young persons between the ages of 16 and 18 years in hazardous work under specific conditions, namely that the health, safety and morals of the young persons concerned are fully protected and that the young persons have received adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity.

The Committee notes that section 32A(1) of the Labour Act (as amended in 2000), states that minors (defined as persons between 16 and 18 pursuant to section 2(i)) shall not be engaged in work without adequate directives about the concerned working areas or vocational training. Section 32A(2) states that provisions shall be as prescribed regarding adequate directives about the concerned working areas or vocational training to be given to minors pursuant to section 32A(1). The Committee requests the Government to indicate if provisions have been adopted concerning the required vocational training or instruction for persons between 16 and 18 as a precondition for work. Moreover, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that persons between 16 and 18 years are only permitted to perform hazardous types of work if their health, safety and morals are fully protected.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's statement that the Department of Labour has been making efforts to enforce the provisions of the Convention. The Government indicates that the Ministry of Local Development has begun a child-friendly local governance programme, which has the elimination of child labour as one of its main components. The Committee also notes that an ILO-IPEC project was launched in the country in 2011 in order to support the implementation of Nepal's National Master Plan on the Elimination of Child Labour of 2011–20. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that due to the awareness programmes implemented by the Government through Radio Nepal, there has been a decrease in child labour, as indicated in the Nepal Labour Force Survey. In this regard, the Committee notes the information in the Report on the Nepal Labour Force Survey that the percentage of children between the ages of 5 and 14 who were economically active has declined from 40.9 per cent in 1998–99 to 33.9 per cent in 2008.

Nonetheless, the Committee notes the information in the Report on the Nepal Labour Force Survey that there remain approximately 2,111,000 children between 5 and 14 who are economically active. This Report further indicates that 13.4 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 9, and 52.7 per cent of children between the ages of 10 and 14, are economically active. In addition, the Committee notes that the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women, in its concluding observations of 11 August 2011, expressed concern about the high rate of child labour in the country, particularly among girls between the ages of 8 and 14 (CEDAW/C/NPL/CO/4-5, paragraph 29). The Committee therefore expresses its deep concern at the significant number of children under the minimum age who are engaged in child labour in Nepal, and urges the Government to pursue its efforts, including within the framework of the National Master Plan on the Elimination of Child Labour and in collaboration with the ILO-IPEC with child friendly, gender sensitive programming, towards the effective reduction and elimination of child labour. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken in this regard, and on the results achieved. It also requests the Government to provide a copy of the National Master Plan on the Elimination of Child Labour, with its next report.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee previously noted that sections 2(a) and 16(1) of the Children's Act, 1992 prohibit the use or involvement of children under 16 years in an "immoral profession". Section 16(2) of the Children's Act prohibits taking, allowing someone to take, distributing or exhibiting a photograph for the purpose of engaging a child under 16 in an immoral profession. The Committee noted the Government's indication that appropriate amendments would be made to the existing legislation, including the Children's Act, after the elected constitutional assembly was formed and a fully fledged parliament started to function. The Committee requested the Government to provide a definition of the term "immoral profession" as used in the Children's Act.

The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) in connection with the optional protocol on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography (OPSC) of April 2008 that section 16 of the Children's Act prohibits the use or involvement of children in pornographic acts (CRC/C/OPSC/NPL/1, paragraph 182). However, the Committee observes that, pursuant to section 2(a) of the Children's Act, this prohibition only applies to children under the age of 16. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the Children's Act is amended to prohibit the use, procuring or offering of all children under 18 years of age for the production of pornography, in the very near future, and to provide information in its next report on developments in this regard.

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities. 1. Production and trafficking of drugs. The Committee previously noted that according to sections 2(a) and 16(4) of the Children's Act, it is prohibited to involve a child under 16 years in the sale, distribution or trafficking of alcohol, narcotics or other drugs. However, the Committee also noted the Government's statement that the Children's Act would be amended in a way consistent with this Convention once a new and fully fledged parliament starts to function. Noting once again the absence of information on this point in the Government's report, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child under 18 years for illicit activities, particularly the production and distribution of drugs, in accordance with Article 3(c) of the Convention.

2. Use of a child for begging. The Committee previously noted that section 3 of the Begging (Prohibition) Act, 1962 makes it an offence to ask or encourage a child under 16 years to beg in a street, junction or any other place. The Committee also noted the Government's indication that the Begging (Prohibition) Act of 1962 would be amended in a way consistent with this Convention once the new and fully fledged parliament starts to function.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report to the CRC in connection with the OPSC of April 2008 that there are instances of cross-border child trafficking for, inter alia, the purpose of begging (CRC/C/OPSC/NPL/1, paragraph 71). In this regard, the Committee recalls that the use, procuring or offering of children for illicit activities, including begging, constitutes one of the worst forms of child labour and should therefore be prohibited for all children under 18 years of age. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures, in the near future, to ensure that the Begging (Prohibition) Act is amended to prohibit the use, procuring or offering of all persons under 18 years of age.

Article 3, clause (d), and Article 4(1). Hazardous work and determination of types of hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that sections 2(a) and 3 of the Child Labour (Prohibition and Regulation) Act prohibit the employment of children under 16 years in hazardous work or enterprises listed in the schedule. In this regard, the Committee noted the Government's statement that the age of a "child" as mentioned in the above legislation needed to be raised to 18 years in order to make it consistent with the provisions of this Convention. It also noted the Government's indication that appropriate amendments would be made to the national legislation after the elected constitutional assembly was formed.

The Committee notes the Government's reference to the interim Constitution of 2007, article 22(5) of which prohibits employing a minor in factories, mines or in any other such hazardous work, but observes that the term "minor" is not defined in this legislation. Moreover, the Committee notes an absence of information in the Government's report on any measures taken to determine the types of hazardous work prohibited to children under the age of 18. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures, in the very near future, to ensure that no person under 18 years of age may be authorized to perform hazardous work, in conformity with Article 3(d) of the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, to include in the national legislation provisions determining the types of hazardous work to be prohibited to persons below 18 years of age in accordance with Article 3(2) of the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard.

Articles 5 and 7. Monitoring mechanisms and penalties. 1. Trafficking. The Committee previously noted that, pursuant to the provisions of the Human Trafficking and Transportation (Control) Act, 2007, any person guilty of the trafficking of children within or outside of the country shall be liable to penalties of fines and imprisonment. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the application of the Human Trafficking and Transportation (Control) Act, 2007 in practice, including the application of penal sanctions.

The Committee notes the statement in the Government's report that, as Nepal is one of the poorest countries in South Asia, and as it has an open border with India, some types of human trafficking have flourished. The Committee also notes that the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, in its concluding observations of 11 August 2011, expressed concern at the lack of effective implementation of the Human Trafficking and Transportation (Control) Act, 2007 (CEDAW/C/NPL/CO/4-5, paragraph 21). Moreover, the Committee notes the Government's statement, in its report to the CRC for the OPSC of April 2008, that despite widely varied data on cross-border and in-country sale and trafficking of children (and women), the magnitude of the problem is high (CRC/C/OPSC/NPL/1, paragraph 68). The Committee therefore urges the Government to take immediate measures to strengthen its efforts to combat the trafficking of children under 18 years of age. It requests the Government to provide information on the number of cases of trafficking in children detected and investigated, as well as statistics on the number of prosecutions, convictions and penalties applied to perpetrators. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by sex and by age.

2. Labour inspectorate. The Committee previously noted the Government's statement that child labour in the organized sector is very rare. It also noted the Government's indication that, according to the data collected by the Central Children Welfare Committee (CCWC) under the Ministry of Women, Children and Social Welfare, a total of 22,981 cases of worst forms of child labour had been registered from 59 districts. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the inspections carried out, including in the informal sector and on the number and nature of violations detected with regard to children under the age of 18 years.

The Committee notes the information contained in a report by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), for the World Trade Organization General Council on the Trade Policies of Nepal of 1 and 3 February 2012 entitled "Internationally recognized core labour standards in Nepal" that child labour and forced child labour are found in brick kilns, quarries and the textile industry. This ITUC report states that children are found performing mainly in informal economic activity in quarries and mines, domestic servitude, agriculture and portering. This ITUC report further indicates that children work in cramped places for long hours, night shifts, deal with chemicals and pesticides, operate dangerous machinery and carry heavy loads.

The Committee also notes the information in the Government's report that 1,200 inspections by factory inspectors were carried out between 2009 and 2011. The Government indicates that no child labour was found in the formal sector through these inspections. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that the practices of the worst forms of child labour in domestic work, in mines, in the carpet industry and in rag picking remain a matter of great concern for the Government. The Committee therefore urges the Government to intensify its efforts, including through strengthening the capacity and expanding the reach of the labour inspectorate, to combat the worst forms of child labour in the informal sector. It also requests the Government to provide any data collected by the CCWC regarding the number of cases registered related to the worst forms of child labour with its next report.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Aruba

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138)

Article 2(1) and (3) of the Convention. 1. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee observed that there was no specified age of completion of compulsory schooling in Aruba. However, the Committee noted that a State Ordinance on Compulsory Education had been developed. The Committee urged the Government to take measures to adopt the State Ordinance on Compulsory Education, and to ensure that this Ordinance was in conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that the State Ordinance on Compulsory Education (AB 2011 No. 82) was signed into law on 23 December 2011. The Committee notes the Government's statement that pursuant to section 2 of the State Ordinance, education is compulsory for children between the ages of 4 and 16. The Government also indicates that, under this Ordinance, parents who do not comply with their obligation to ensure that their children attend school may be fined. The Government further indicates that it is taking measures to establish the Bureau on Compulsory Education, which will be responsible for enforcing this new Ordinance, as well as raising awareness among schools and parents on its provisions. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the State Ordinance on Compulsory Education (AB 2011 No. 82), with its next report.

2. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. Referring to its previous comments, in which it noted that the Labour Ordinance of Aruba establishes a minimum age for admission to work of 14 years (pursuant to sections 4(d) and 15), the Committee draws the Government's attention to Article 2(3) of the Convention, which states that the minimum age specified shall not be lower than the age of completion of compulsory education. Referring to paragraph 370 of its 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work, the Committee recalls that if the minimum age for admission to work or employment is lower than the school-leaving age, children may be encouraged to leave school, as they are legally authorized to work. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take measures to raise the minimum age of for admission to employment from 14 to 16 years of age, in order to link this age with the age of completion of compulsory schooling established in the State Ordinance on Compulsory Education.

Article 3(2). Determination of types of hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 17(1) of the Labour Ordinance provides that it is prohibited to engage juvenile persons (persons between 14 and 18 years of age) in night work or work of a hazardous nature, which is to be described by a State decree. The Committee noted the Government's indication that the Committee for the Modernization of Labour Legislation (CMLL) had proposed to eliminate the need for the formal requirement of a decree to determine the types of hazardous work, and to allow the Director of the Labour Department to determine which types of work would fall under this category through official labour policy, which would then be published in the State Gazette.

In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the proposal to allow the Director of the Labour Department to determine the types of hazardous work is with the Department of Legislation for technical evaluation and revision. The Government indicates that once this proposal approved, the Labour Department will prepare a policy concerning hazardous work. In this connection, the Committee once again recalls that under the terms of Article 3(2) of the Convention, the types of hazardous employment or work shall be determined by national laws or regulations or by the competent authority, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, following the approval of the Department of Legislation, the Director of the Labour Department determines the types of hazardous work at the earliest possible date. It requests the Government to provide information on progress made in this regard, in its next report.

Article 6. Vocational training and apprenticeship. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that the state decree provided for under section 16(a) of the Labour Ordinance allows exemptions for certain tasks which are necessary for the learning of a trade or profession, and can be done by children of 12 years or over who have completed the sixth class of primary school. The Committee also noted the Government's indication that the CMLL had proposed to eliminate the need for the formal requirement of a decree to specify the employment permitted for vocational education or technical training purposes, and to allow the Director of the Labour Department to do so through official labour policy.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that a proposal is under consideration to provide that the specification of the types of employment permitted for technical training is within the competency of the Director of the Labour Department. The Government indicates that once this proposal is approved, the Labour Department will prepare the corresponding policy. The Committee expresses the firm hope that, following the approval from the Department of Legislation, the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the Director of the Labour Department specifies the employment permitted for vocational education or technical training purposes under section 16(a). It requests the Government to continue to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 7. Light work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the state decree provided for under section 16(b) of the Labour Ordinance to specify certain tasks which can be carried out by children of 12 years of age and above, who have completed the sixth class of primary school, had not yet been addressed in the CMLL. The CMLL had, however, proposed to allow the Director of the Labour Department to determine the types of light work through official labour policy, which would then only need to be published officially in the State Gazette.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that once the Department of Legislation approves the proposal to permit the Director of the Labour Department to determine the types of light work through official labour policy, the Labour Department will begin to prepare such a policy. In this regard, the Committee once again recalls that Article 7(3) of the Convention requires that the competent authority determine the activities allowed as light work in which young persons between 13 and 15 years of age may be permitted to participate, and to prescribe the number of hours of work and the conditions of employment or work. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Director of the Labour Department will determine the types of light work permitted to children of 13 years and above, provided for under section 16(b) of the Labour Ordinance in the near future. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on developments in this regard.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that control and enforcement of the labour legislation by the labour inspectors continues to be weak due to regulatory and financial challenges.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that labour inspections did not reveal any infractions related to provisions in national legislation implementing the Convention. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that there is no new information available on the application of the Convention in practice. The Committee encourages the Government to take measures to ensure that sufficient data on the situation of working children in Aruba is made available, such as information on the number of children and young persons working below the minimum age and the nature, scope and trends of their work. It requests the Government to provide this information, when it becomes available.

The Committee encourages the Government to take into consideration the Committee's comments on discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention. It requests the Government to provide any information on progress made in this regard and invites it to consider seeking technical assistance from the ILO.

New Zealand

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also notes the comments made by Business New Zealand, as well as the comments made by the New Zealand Council of Trade Unions (NZCTU) concerning the application of the Minimum Age (Industry) Convention (Revised), 1937 (No. 59), and the Government's reply thereto.

Article 3(d) of the Convention. Hazardous work. Minimum age for admission to hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that, by virtue of section 54(d) of the Health and Safety in Employment Regulations of 1995 (HSE Regulations), hazardous work was prohibited for children under 15 years of age, but was not prohibited for all children under 18 years of age, as specified under Article 3(d) of the Convention. The Committee also noted the allegation of the NZCTU that in 2006, about 300 children under 15 years visited their doctor for a work-related injury, and that accident compensation and rehabilitation assistance was provided to between 1,000–2,000 children between the ages of 15 and 19. In this regard, the Government stated that while it shared the concerns raised by the NZCTU with regard to workplace injuries of children and young persons, which in some cases proved fatal, legislative protections existed to protect young persons. The Government stated that these legislative protections generally ensure that young people are not exposed to hazardous work and that employers have an obligation to ensure a healthy and safe working environment, as well as duties related to training and supervision. The Committee also noted Business New Zealand's statement that the existing legislative framework provides effective age thresholds for entry into work, particularly when read together with the obligation on all employers to provide their employees of whatever age, with a safe and healthy working environment.

However, the Committee noted the information in a Department of Labour (DoL) research paper entitled "School children in Paid Employment – A summary of research findings" of September 2010 (DoL Report of 2010) according to which employers are not effective in raising school children's awareness of hazards, nor their rights, in the workplace as expected under the Health and Safety in Employment Act. The DoL Report of 2010 referenced a study which found that a third of secondary-school students indicated that their employers had not provided them with any information about workplace hazards. Moreover, this DoL Report of 2010 indicated that inadequacies in training and supervision of children in workplaces were also frequently reported. Additionally, the DoL Report of 2010 indicated that injuries are a common and occasionally serious occurrence in school children's workplaces, with one sixth of secondary school students in part-time work reportedly being injured at work in the previous year. The DoL Report of 2010 indicated that children aged 15–16 were more likely to have had an injury than children aged 13–14, and that 20 per cent of working children of 16 years of age had had an employment injury. The Committee further noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 11 April 2011, expressed concern that children between the ages of 15 and 18 are allowed to work in dangerous workplaces (CRC/C/NZL/CO/3-4, paragraph 41).

The Committee notes the statement by Business New Zealand that, in the New Zealand context, it is required that work hazards be eliminated, isolated or minimized, as appropriate. Business New Zealand states that employers must provide training and supervision for anyone engaging in any activity capable of being considered hazardous, as well as protective clothing and equipment, regardless of the age of the employee, but with specific prohibitions applying with respect to young persons under the age of 16. Business New Zealand further states that work for children that is excessively difficult or hazardous is neither condoned nor encouraged in the country.

The Committee notes the statement by the NZCTU, in its comments submitted concerning the application of Convention (Revised) No. 59, that in the country there is little attention given to the nature of work undertaken by children and young people working before or after school, on weekends or during school holidays, nor any direct provisions to ensure that children and young people are not exploited or exposed to unsafe work practices or workplaces. The NZCTU states that while the Government provides some information on the rights of young workers on the website of the Department of Labour, it is up to young people, or their families, to act on this information. The NZCTU also states that accidents records indicated that two 17 year old workers were employed in mines in 2010, and one of the fatalities of a mine disaster in 2010 was a child of 17 years of age. The NZCTU further references a study which found that a quarter of students working in manufacturing report injuries. Moreover, the NZCTU indicates that according to information from the Accident Compensation Corporation, the number of injuries reported by children aged 10–14 in industry was 77 in 2008–09, 72 in 2009–10 and 58 in 2010–11. For the age group 15–19, the number of injuries reported was 4,373 in 2008–09, 2,784 in 2009–10 and 2,548 in 2010–11. However, the NZCTU states that records of injury claims is a poor proxy and that research indicated that young workers were discouraged by employers from reporting their injuries.

The Committee notes the Government's statement, in its reply to the comments of the NZCTU, that the Ministry of Labour is taking a strategic approach to reducing work-related injuries and fatalities under a National Action Agenda, released in March 2011, which highlights the five sectors which have the highest risks of ill health, injury or death. The Government states that each of these five sectors has a three-year Sector Action Plan in place. Under the Manufacturing Action Plan, a priority for action is at-risk groups, which include youth (aged 15–24), who are identified as needing more training and supervision. The Plan aims to deliver effective training and promote safe work practices to youth through targeted programmes. The Government states that it is not aware of a problem that the existing regulatory framework is being ignored, and that it considers the current legislation to be sufficient. Therefore, its action will focus on better training and awareness on safety issues, not non-observance. In this regard, the Committee further notes the Government's statement that it considers that existing policy and legislative frameworks provide effective age thresholds for entry into work to ensure that children only engage in safe work. The Government states that while the specific legal restriction on types of work are only applicable to children under the age of 15, children between the age of 16 and 18 are protected by the general requirements of workplace health and safety legislation, which provides protection to all workers, regardless of age. The Government also states that it considers that the conditions of Paragraph 4 of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Recommendation, 1999 (No. 190), are met by the general duty on employers to ensure a safe working environment and to prevent exposure to hazards and by the duty on employers to ensure that employees have sufficient training and experience so that the work they are employed to do is not likely to cause them harm.

However, the Committee notes the information provided in the Government's report concerning the number of claims for work-related injuries by persons 18 and under, and observes that the number of work-related injuries increased significantly with the age of the children; 724 more children aged 16 years made claims for work-related accidents than those aged 15, and 1,347 more children aged 17 made claims than those aged 16. Additionally the Committee notes the Government's statement that the DoL Report of 2010 on New Zealand school children in paid employment summarizes the current state of knowledge about the risks that children are exposed to in employment. In this regard, the Committee recalls that the DoL Report of 2010 indicated that the current legislative protections, which rely on the employer to protect children under the age of 18 from workplace hazards, do not appear in practice to be fully and effectively protecting children from hazardous work.

Therefore, the Committee must once again express its serious concern that children between 15 and 18 years of age are allowed, in law and in practice, to perform the types of work which are clearly hazardous, as previously acknowledged by the Government and supported by the Department of Labour's research. The Committee must therefore emphasize that, by virtue of Article 3(d), work which, by its nature and the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to harm the health, safety or morals of children under 18, constitutes one of the worst forms of child labour and that, by virtue of Article 1 of the Convention, member States are required to take immediate and effective measures to ensure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee also recalls that Paragraph 4 of Recommendation No. 190 addresses the possibility of authorizing the employment or work of young persons as from the age of 16 under strict conditions that their health and safety be protected and that they receive adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to comply with Article 1 of the Convention, read with Article 3(d), to prohibit children under 18 years of age from engaging in hazardous and dangerous work. However, where such work is performed by young persons between 16 and 18 years of age, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that such work is only carried out in accordance with the strict conditions set out in Paragraph 4 of Recommendation No. 190, namely that the health and safety of such young persons be protected and that they receive adequate specific instruction or vocational training in that activity. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard in its next report.

Article 4(1) and (3). Periodic revision of the types of hazardous activities prohibited to persons under 18 years of age. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that children under 18 years cannot work in any restricted areas of licensed premises, such as bars, licensed restaurants or clubs. However, it also noted the Government's statement that, pursuant to sections 54–58 of the Health and Safety in Employment (HSE) Regulations, only employees under 15 years of age are prohibited from working in a number of high-hazard workplaces, such as in construction, logging and tree-felling operations, in work where goods are being manufactured and prepared for sale, in work with any machinery, lifting heavy loads or performing other tasks likely to be injurious to the employee's health, night work and driving or riding any tractor or heavy vehicles. The Committee also noted the information from the Government's report that research indicated that children represent a significant proportion of farm injuries, with nearly one fifth of all injuries on farms occurring involving children aged 15 and younger. The Government indicated that the majority of child fatalities occurred on farms, most typically with regard to children aged 10–14 years riding in vehicles to shift stock, and that this was being addressed through a safety campaign. The Committee further noted that the DoL Report of 2010 identified the construction, agriculture and hospitality industries as posing the most risk to young workers. The DoL Report of 2010 also identified some types of work which are more dangerous to young persons: by volume, working in shops (including petrol stations and supermarkets) and working in restaurants, takeaway outlets and other eateries. These types of activities were the largest contributors to workplace injuries and accounted for 60 per cent of injuries to schoolchildren in regular part-time work. Noting that the DoL Report of 2010 identified the sectors posing the most risk to young workers (construction, agriculture and hospitality), as well as the types of activities which are most injurious, the Committee reminded the Government that, pursuant to Article 4(1) and (3) of the Convention, the types of work which, by their nature or the circumstances in which they are carried out, are likely to harm the health, safety or morals of children, shall be determined by national laws or regulations, and that this list shall be periodically examined and revised as necessary, in consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that no amendments to the Regulations are currently being considered, but that any proposed change would entail a thorough consultation with a wide range of stakeholders, including employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged to undertake a periodic review of the list of types of hazardous work, as provided for in Article 4(3) of the Convention, including measures to regulate the types of hazardous work identified in the DoL Report of 2010, such as work in the construction, agriculture and hospitality industries.

Article 5 and Parts IV and V of the report form. Monitoring mechanisms and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted the Government's statement that the Department of Labour was continuing to investigate workplace practices relating to persons between 16 and 18 years of age engaged in hazardous work. However, the Committee noted the Government's statement that there had been no prosecutions in respect of the prohibition contained in the HSE Act or Regulations on engaging a young person under the age of 15 in hazardous work, despite the information in the DoL Report of 2010 that 17 per cent of students in part-time work under the age of 15 had reported a work-related injury in the previous year, some of which were serious injuries. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the results of the investigations carried out by the Department of Labour on workplace practices related to persons between 15 and 18 years engaged in hazardous work.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that no information is available in this regard, as the collection of age-related data is not considered to be sufficiently complete to draw reliable conclusions. However, the Committee also notes the information in the Government's report concerning the number of claims for work-related injuries for the year 2009 (the most recent data available). In this regard, the Committee notes that there were 7,391 claims made for work-related injuries by persons 18 and under in 2009, including 992 claims made by children aged 16 and 2,339 claims made by children aged 17. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that further research is being undertaken as a part of the Youth 2000 project. A health and well-being survey of secondary-school students is currently under way across 100 schools in the country (following similar surveys conducted in 2001 and 2007). The Government indicates that this survey will provide updated information on the types of paid work that school-aged children are involved in, and will include new questions to increase the understanding of their working conditions and health and safety outcomes. Noting the significant number of work-related injuries claims made by persons under 18, the Committee requests the Government to provide information regarding subsequent investigations carried out concerning these accidents, violations detected, prosecutions and penalties applied, with its next report. It also requests the Government to provide information from the survey undertaken from the Youth 2000 project concerning work performed by children under 18, particularly with regard to working conditions and health and safety outcomes. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by age and sex.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Nicaragua

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Convention, 1946 (No. 78) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. It notes with interest the adoption of General Act No. 618 on occupational health and safety and Decree No. 96-2007 issuing the regulations thereto, and that both contain provisions on medical examination. It requests the Government to provide information on the following point.

Article 7, paragraph 2(a), of the Convention. Supervision of the application of the system of medical examination for fitness to work to children engaged on their own or their parents' account. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with regret that the national legislation contains no provisions to give effect to Article 7, paragraph 2(a), of the Convention, and asked the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure compliance with the Convention on this point. It notes that the Government's report contains no information on the matter. It again points out that pursuant to this provision of the Convention, national laws and regulations must determine the measures of identification to be adopted for ensuring the application of the system of medical examination for fitness for employment to children and young persons engaged either on their own account or on account of their parents in itinerant trading or in any other occupation carried on in the streets or places to which the public have access. The Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the national legislation provides for the organization of such examinations, in order to give effect to this article of the Convention.

With regard to the other provisions of the Convention, the Government is asked to refer to the Committee's comments under the Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946 (No. 77).

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Niger

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the communication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), of 31 August 2011, and the Government's reply to the ITUC's allegations, received on 14 November 2011.

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Scope of application. The Committee noted previously that the Labour Code does not apply to types of employment or work performed by children outside an enterprise, such as work performed by children on their own account. It noted the Government's indication that the broadening of the scope of application of the labour legislation to children engaged in an economic activity on their own account would require formal collaboration between the Ministries of the Civil Service, Labour, Mines, the Interior, Justice and Child Protection. In that respect, it reminded the Government that the Convention applies to all sectors of economic activity and that it covers all types of employment or work, whether or not a contractual employment relationship exists.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that a national survey of the informal economy will be organized by the National Statistical Institute (INS) in 2012 which will make it possible to measure the extent of the phenomenon of children working on their own account and will enable the labour administration to intervene more effectively in this field. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the INS survey of the informal economy is completed effectively in the very near future and that discussions on this matter are held between the Ministries concerned. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this respect.

Article 2(3). Compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Ten-year Educational Development Programme (PDDE), drawn up in 2002, aimed at achieving an 80 per cent enrolment rate in primary school by 2012 and 84 per cent by 2015, with special emphasis on narrowing the gap between boys and girls.

However, the Committee noted that, in its concluding observations of 18 June 2009 (CRC/C/NER/CO/2, paragraph 66), the Committee on the Rights of the Child, while commending the major efforts made by Niger to expand access to primary education, as well as the increase in the access of girls to education, the building of new educational infrastructures in rural areas and the training programmes for teachers, expressed concern at the poor quality of the education system, the high drop-out rate and weak gender equity in education. The Committee also observed that the low rate of school attendance of children between 7 and 12 years of age shows that a significant number of children drop out of school well before attaining the minimum age for admission to employment and are on the labour market.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that it is continuing its ceaseless efforts in the field of education and that encouraging results have already been obtained in that respect. As a result, according to the Government, the growth in the gross school attendance rate in primary school, which was 57.1 per cent (47.7 per cent for girls and 66.7 per cent for boys) in 2006–07, rose to 67.8 per cent (58.6 per cent for girls and 77 per cent for boys) in 2008–09. However, the Committee notes that, according to the National Survey on Child Labour in Niger (ENTE) of 2009, 43.2 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 11 years and 62.5 per cent of children between the ages of 12 and 13 years in Niger are engaged in types of child labour to be abolished, at an age when they are supposed to be at school, as school attendance is compulsory up to 14 years. According to the ENTE, 22.8 per cent of children between the ages of 7 and 11 years and 23 per cent of children aged 12 and 13 years do not attend school because they consider that education is not useful, while 18.7 per cent of children between the ages of 7 and 11 years and 15 per cent of children aged 12 and 13 do not attend school because they assist with household work. Despite the efforts made by the Government, the Committee expresses its concern at the persistence of the low rates of school attendance. It observes that poverty is one of the primary causes of child labour and, when combined with a defective education system, prevents the development of the child. Considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to improve the functioning of the education system and to take measures to enable children to attend compulsory basic education. It also requests the Government to continue taking measures to increase the school attendance rate and reduce the school drop-out rate, particularly for girls, with a view to preventing children under 14 years of age from working. The Committee further requests the Government to continue providing information on the results achieved.

Article 3(3). Authorization to employ young persons in hazardous work from the age of 16 years. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that Decree No. 67-126/MFP/T of 7 September 1967 authorizes the employment of young persons over 16 years of age in certain types of hazardous work. It also noted that health and safety committees have been established in enterprises and that they are responsible for training and awareness raising on safety. The Committee observed that these committees do not appear to provide adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity. In this respect, the Government indicated that a distinction needs to be made between three categories of young persons: those whose activities are performed in the context of a formal school curriculum, namely students in technical and vocational training schools; those who work in the context of an apprenticeship contract, supervised by one or more professional adults with many years of experience in the trade; and those who are trained under the traditional system for learning a trade and whose superior/trainer has also been trained under this system of transmission of practical knowledge. With regard to the latter category, the Committee asked the Government to provide information on the manner in which the health and safety committees ensure that the work performed by young persons does not jeopardize their health or safety.

Once again noting the absence of information in the Government's report, the Committee once again recalls that, in addition to the requirement of training, Article 3(3) of the Convention allows employment or work by young persons as from the age of 16 years in hazardous types of work only on the condition that their health, safety and morals are fully protected. Observing that this matter has been raised on many occasions, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that enterprise safety and health committees ascertain that the conditions of work of young persons aged between 16 and 18 years do not jeopardize their health and safety. It once again requests the Government to provide information on this subject in its next report.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that studies were being conducted in the country, including the ENTE undertaken by the INS in collaboration with ILO-IPEC and in partnership with a consortium of NGOs, and that the Government would provide the findings of the ENTE when they were published.

The Committee notes the allegations by the ITUC that 46 per cent of children of school age are engaged in work under arduous conditions and perform types of work which exceed their physical capacities. Children also frequently work with their families in rural areas and participate in work in fields, crushing cereals, tending animals, seeking firewood and water.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its reply to the ITUC's allegations that the rate of 46 per cent alleged by the ITUC is only an approximate figure.

However the Committee notes that, according to the findings of the ENTE, children who were economically active in 2009 represented 50.4 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 17 years and that the phenomenon of child labour is more significant in rural than in urban areas. It also shows that in Niger girls are much more engaged in work than boys. Furthermore, 83.4 per cent of the children aged between 5 and 17 years who are economically active, that is 1,604,236 children, are engaged in types of work to be abolished (i.e. all types of work that are prohibited by the Convention). Of these, 1,187,840 children are involved in hazardous types of work. In other words, nearly two out of three children (61.8 per cent) between the ages of 5 and 17 who are economically active perform their work under hazardous conditions, with the rate being 63.6 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 11 years and 57.9 per cent of children aged 12 and 13. The findings of the ENTE also indicate that children engaged in the types of work to be abolished mostly work in domestic service (65.5 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 11 years and 44.5 per cent of children aged 12 and 13), trade (16.7 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 11 years and 21.7 of children aged 12 and 13), agriculture (12.8 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 11 years and 18.3 per cent of children aged 12 and 13) and industry (3.8 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 11 years and 6.2 per cent of children aged 12 and 13). The Committee expresses its deep concern at the high number of children engaged in work in Niger who are below the minimum age for admission to employment and work, and that the significant proportion of these children who work under hazardous conditions. It strongly encourages the Government to intensify its efforts to improve the situation with regard to child labour in the country and requests it to continue providing information in its next report on the application of the Convention in practice, including extracts from the reports of the labour inspection services indicating the number and nature of the contraventions reported and the penalties applied. It requests the Government to provide statistical data in its next report disaggregated by sex and age group, on the nature, extent and trends of child labour and work by young persons under the minimum age specified by the Government when ratifying the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the communication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 31 August 2011, and the Government's reply to the ITUC's allegations received on 14 November 2011.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery and practices similar to slavery. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the comments of the ITUC reporting the existence in the country of the internal trafficking of girls for domestic work, as well as the trafficking of boys for economic exploitation and of girls for sexual exploitation. It also noted that, according to the information obtained by the high-level fact-finding mission (the mission), which visited Niger from 10 to 20 January 2006 at the request of the Conference Committee in June 2005, "Niger is certainly a transit country since its geographical location makes it a hub for trade between North Africa and sub-Saharan Africa," and that "Niger is both a country of origin and a country of destination for human trafficking, including the trafficking of children." The Committee noted that, when examining the second periodic report submitted by Niger on 20 November 2008 (CRC/C/NER/2, paragraphs 433–437), the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) observed that the national survey on trafficking in persons showed that, of the 1,540 households surveyed, 5.8 per cent answered that a member of the household had been a victim of trafficking and 29.4 per cent answered affirmatively that there had been human trafficking in their locality/village/neighbourhood. The Committee noted the Government's indication that a National Plan to Combat Child Trafficking had been drawn up and approved. It also noted that a Bill for the prevention, repression and punishment of trafficking in Niger had been drafted by the Niger Association for the Defence of Human Rights, but that the Bill on trafficking had still not been adopted by Parliament, and that accordingly the legal void persisted in that respect.

The Committee notes that, according to a report on trafficking of persons of 2011 (the 2011 trafficking report), available on the website of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the Government appears to have adopted Ordinance No. 2010-86 to combat the trafficking of persons in December 2010, which consists of comprehensive legislation prohibiting all forms of sale and trafficking and establishing sentences of imprisonment of between ten and 30 years in cases where the victim is a child. However, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the National Plan of Action to Combat Child Trafficking has still not been adopted. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application of Ordinance No. 2010-86 to combat trafficking of persons in practice, including statistics on the number and nature of the violations reported, investigations conducted, prosecutions and convictions obtained, and the penal sanctions applied. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of this Ordinance with its next report. The Committee also urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of the National Plan of Action to Combat Child Trafficking as soon as possible.

2. Forced or compulsory labour. Begging. The Committee noted previously the indication by the ITUC that children are forced to beg in West Africa, including Niger. For economic or religious reasons, many families entrust their children from the age of 5 or 6 years to a spiritual guide (marabout), with whom they live until they are 15 or 16 years of age. During this period, they are entirely under the responsibility of the marabout, who teaches them religion and, in return, requires them to carry out certain tasks, including begging. The Committee noted that the existence of begging for purely economic ends had been acknowledged by those interviewed by the mission, including the Government, and that, in this form of begging, children are especially vulnerable since their parents, even though they are concerned for the children's religious education, are unable to provide for their subsistence. The children are, therefore, left entirely dependent on the marabouts. The Committee expressed serious concern at the use of children for purely economic ends by certain marabouts, particularly since, according to the information gathered by the mission, this form of begging seemed to be very much on the increase.

The Committee noted previously that a National Observatory to Combat Begging had been set up. It also noted with interest that Circular No. 006/MJ/DAJ/S/AJS of 27 March 2006 of the Minister of Justice of Niger, addressed to the various judicial authorities, calls for sections 179, 181 and 182 of the Penal Code, which punish begging and any person, including the parents of minors under 18 years of age, who habitually engage in begging, who cause others to beg or who knowingly make a profit from begging, to be strictly applied through the prosecution, without leniency, of any persons engaging in begging or using children for begging for purely economic ends. In this respect, the Committee noted the Government's indications that there had been some cases of the arrest of marabouts presumed to use children for purely economic ends. However, the Government indicated that in general they are released for lack of legal proof of their guilt.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that Niger has undertaken awareness-raising campaigns with a view to changing attitudes with the support of NGOs and development partners, including UNICEF. However, the Committee notes with concern the Government's indication once again in its report that marabouts who have been arrested for using children for purely economic ends have been released for lack of legal proof of their guilt. The Committee, therefore, once again notes with regret that, even though the legislation is in conformity with the Convention on this matter, the phenomenon of child talibés remains a cause of serious concern in practice. The Committee once again reminds the Government that, under Article 1 of the Convention, immediate and effective measures have to be taken as a matter of urgency to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour, and that under Article 7(1) of the Convention, it is under the obligation to take all the necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, including the provision and application of sufficiently effective and dissuasive penal sanctions. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of marabouts who use children under 18 years of age for purely economic ends are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions are applied to them. In this respect, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to reinforce the capacities of law enforcement agencies. The Committee also requests the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to prevent children under 18 years of age from becoming victims of forced or compulsory labour, such as begging, and to identify child talibés who are compelled to engage in begging, remove them from such situations and ensure their rehabilitation and social integration.

Clause (d). Hazardous types of work. Children working in mines and quarries. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 152 of Decree No. 67-126/MFP/T of 7 September 1967 prohibits the employment of children in underground work in mines. However, it noted that, according to the information gathered by the mission, work by children in hazardous types of work, particularly in mines and quarries, existed in informal locations, that young children accompany their parents to informal sites and that they "become involved in the chain of production, whether in gypsum mines or salt quarries, sometimes performing small tasks to facilitate their parents' work or, in some cases, tasks that are physically hazardous for more than eight hours a day, every day of the week, running the risk of accident or disease". The Committee noted with interest that the Minister of the Interior had issued a circular strictly prohibiting the employment of children in mines and quarries in the areas concerned, namely Tillabéri, Tahoua and Agadez, and that the Minister for Mining had received directives to take this prohibition into account in drawing up mining agreements. However, the Committee noted the Government's indication that no conviction had yet been handed down in this respect. It further noted that the review and modification of the list of hazardous types of work were carried out at a workshop held in Ayorou on 2 and 3 July 2009. In this respect, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the list of hazardous types of work was drawn up under the responsibility of the Ministry of Labour, in collaboration with the technical ministries and the employers' and workers' organizations concerned.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the list of hazardous types of work has been reviewed and improved by the Ministry of Labour, in collaboration with the technical ministries and employers' and workers' organizations. The Government adds that it will provide the Office with a copy of this list when it has been adopted. Expressing the hope that the list of hazardous types of work will extend the protection afforded by the Convention to children working in mines in the informal sector who are obliged to engage in hazardous types of work, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures for the adoption of this list in the very near future. It therefore requests the Government to provide a copy of the amended list of hazardous types of work with its next report. It also urges the Government to take immediate measures to ensure the effective application of the national legislation for the protection of children against underground work in mines.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. Labour inspection. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the indication by the mission in its report that "the labour inspectorate, which plays a key role in combating child labour and forced labour, is severely lacking in both the human and material resources needed to perform its duties". The mission recommended that a labour inspection audit be carried out to ascertain the exact nature and extent of the needs of the labour inspectorate in Niger. The Committee noted the Government's indication that it was making every effort to ensure that the audit was carried out in the near future.

The Committee notes the allegations of the ITUC that the inadequacy of resources means that the labour inspection services are very ineffective and that no inspections on child labour were carried out in 2010.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in reply to the ITUC's allegations that the labour inspection services have lacked resources for a long time, but that the Government has made significant efforts in 2011 to provide them with sufficient resources, and that these efforts will continue so that they are able to discharge effectively the duties entrusted to them.

The Committee notes that, in its report provided to the Office under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Government once again agrees to the audit being carried out. However, it notes with concern that the audit has still not been undertaken. The Committee, therefore, urges the Government to take the necessary measures to reinforce and adapt the capacities of the labour inspection services so as to ensure better supervision of children under 18 years of age who are engaged in the worst forms of child labour, including the implementation of the mission's recommendation. It once again requests the Government to provide information in this respect in its next report.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. 1. Access to free basic education. In its previous comments, the Committee noted from the mission report that "parents hesitate to send their children to school when they see that such education affords no guarantee of a job, whereas the Muslim religious schools at least train children to be good Muslims or even teachers of the Koran, which explains why such schools are on the increase in Niger". The Committee noted the mission's recommendation that the operation "of the education system needs to be improved to ensure access for all to high-standard education". With regard to Koranic schools, the Committee noted that, in the context of the Franco-Arab education support project, measures had been taken for the restructuring of these schools. The Committee also noted that the Ten-year Educational Development Programme (PDDE), drawn up in 2002, aims to achieve an 80 per cent enrolment rate in primary school by 2012 and 84 per cent by 2015, with special emphasis on narrowing the gap between girls and boys. The Committee however noted that, in its concluding observations of 18 June 2009, the CRC expressed concern at the poor quality of the education system, the high drop-out rate and the weak gender equity in education (CRC/C/NER/CO/2, paragraph 66).

The Committee notes the Government's indication that several actions have been taken to prevent the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, including their school attendance. In this respect, the Government indicates that programmes of action have resulted, among other outcomes, in the enrolment in school of 922 children, including 440 girls in Komabangou, with a view to preventing them from becoming engaged in the worst forms of child labour. It also notes the school enrolment of 1,273 children in M'Banga; the support for the recruitment of teachers for primary schools in M'Banga, Komabangou and 16 satellite villages; and the implementation of the support project for the school enrolment of children and young school drop-outs in the rural community of Makalondi.

However, the Committee notes that, according to the National Survey of Child Labour in Niger of 2009 (ENTE), only 39 per cent of girls between the ages of 7 and 17 years engaged in a type of work that is to be abolished attend school, compared with 47 per cent of boys. Furthermore, the proportion of boys between the ages of 7 and 11 years who attend school is 56 per cent, compared with 48 per cent for boys aged 12 and 13 years, and 24 per cent for the 14–17-year age group. Among girls, these proportions are respectively 46.4 per cent, 28 per cent and 13 per cent. The ENTE also indicates that, among children engaged in forms of work that are to be abolished, 57.2 per cent do not attend school. The failure to attend school is of greater concern among children between the ages of 14 and 17 years who are engaged in hazardous types of work, 80.9 per cent of whom do not attend school. With regard to school drop-outs, 21.4 per cent of children between the ages of 7 and 17 years engaged in types of work that are to be abolished have dropped out of school, out of which 36.5 per cent of children between the ages of 14 and 17 years are engaged in hazardous types of work. The Committee therefore expresses its deep concern at the school attendance rates and the school drop-out rates of children who are compelled to work. Accordingly, considering that education contributes to preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to improve the operation of the educational system, taking into account the special situation of girls. In this respect, it also requests the Government to ensure an increase in school enrolment rates and a reduction in school drop-out rates, and to adopt other measures for the integration of Koranic schools into the national educational system. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the results achieved.

2. Raising awareness and educating the public about the problems of child labour and forced labour. The Committee noted previously the recommendation made by the mission in its report that specific measures should be taken "to raise awareness among Koranic teachers and parents to prevent the 'instrumentalization' of begging by certain marabouts". The Committee noted the information provided by the Government concerning the awareness-raising and training activities undertaken among those involved in combating child labour, and particularly its worst forms, including political decision-makers, employers, community leaders and traditional chiefs, police officers, magistrates, current or potential working children, parents, teachers, students and the public in general with regard to the problem of child labour.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the awareness-raising campaigns have succeeded in raising the awareness of the actors concerned with regard to the danger represented by this phenomenon. The Government adds that it is continuing awareness-raising activities, including for the population in general, with a view to changing attitudes. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide detailed information on the awareness-raising activities undertaken for traditional chiefs, civil society and elected local officials, and on their impact in terms of the number of children who have been prevented from begging for purely economic ends by certain marabouts.

Clause (b). Necessary direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the results of the implementation of the ILO-IPEC project for the prevention and elimination of child labour in artisanal gold mining in West Africa. It also noted that the measures for the social integration of victims of the worst forms of child labour removed from gold mines are provided free of charge by national associations and NGOs, with the support of technical ministries and partners, such as UNICEF.

The Committee notes the ITUC's allegations that the use of children in gold, salt and gypsum mines and other forms of extraction persists. The ITUC indicates that these children have to work under deplorable conditions, with inadequate ventilation, the risk of rock falls and a lack of light, and that they are exposed to the consumption of alcohol and drugs.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the ILO-IPEC project has come to an end in Niger. The Government adds that, despite this, the schools built in the context of the project continue to enrol a significant number of students. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of children who are, in practice, removed from artisanal gold mines and then rehabilitated and socially integrated, particularly in schools built for that purpose. Furthermore, noting that the ILO-IPEC project has come to an end, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue taking measures to remove children under 18 years of age from these mines and for their rehabilitation and social integration. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this respect.

Article 8. Regional cooperation. The Committee noted previously that, in addition to the multilateral cooperation agreement to combat child trafficking in West Africa, signed in July 2005, Niger also signed the Abuja Multilateral Cooperation Agreement in 2006 and a bilateral agreement for the establishment of a mixed frontier control brigade between Niger and Nigeria. Following the implementation of these various cooperation agreements to combat trafficking in children, Niger has established 30 vigilance committees and widespread joint mobile brigades on all national frontiers. The Government added that child victims of trafficking have been intercepted in frontier areas. However, the Committee noted with deep concern the Government's indication that those presumed guilty had been released by the police for lack of legal proof.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that no new cases of trafficking of children have been recorded since 2009. However, according to the 2011 trafficking report, the Government assisted in the repatriation of 89 child victims of trafficking to Mali, Nigeria, Burkina Faso, Benin, Cameroon and Liberia, and the return to their villages from Niger. Recalling that under Article 7(1) of the Convention, the Government is under the obligation to take all the necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that persons involved in the trafficking of children are prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions are imposed upon them, in the context of the agreements concluded with other signatory countries.

Parts IV and V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the ENTE had already been undertaken by the National Institute of Statistics and that the findings would be provided to the Office when they were published.

The Committee notes that, according to the findings of the ENTE, 83.4 per cent of economically active children between the ages of 5 and 17 years, or 1,604,236 children, are engaged in types of work that are to be abolished. Of these, 1,187,840 children are involved in hazardous types of work and, as a result, 74 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 17 years engaged in types of work that are to be abolished do so under hazardous conditions. The gender distribution of children engaged in hazardous types of work shows that girls (31.2 per cent) and boys (31.1 per cent) are involved almost in the same proportions. The Committee also observes that children in rural areas (36.6 per cent) are more exposed than those living in urban centres (18.2 per cent) and in Niamey (7.5 per cent). Expressing its deep concern at the situation of children under 18 years of age engaged in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee urges the Government to renew its efforts to ensure the protection of children from these forms of labour in practice, and particularly from hazardous types of work. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the progress achieved in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Nigeria

Minimum Age (Underground Work) Convention, 1965 (No. 123) (ratification: 1974)

Article 4(5) of the Convention. Employer's obligation to make available to the workers' representatives, at their request, the list of persons employed in work underground. The Committee had noted that under section 62 of the Labour Act, every employer is required to keep a register of all young persons in his or her employment with particulars of their ages, the date of employment and the conditions and nature of their employment and to produce the register for inspection when required by an authorized labour officer. It had further noted that under section 91(1) of the same Act, "young person" means a person under the age of 18 years and "industrial undertaking" includes mines, quarries and other works for the extraction of minerals from the earth.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the various state offices of the Federal Ministry of Labour and Productivity have been directed to inform the employers to release, on demand, the register of all young persons in their employment (kept pursuant to section 62 of the Labour Act) to the trade union, in compliance with section 5(6) of the Labour Act, Cap L1, LFN 2004. The Committee notes, however, that section 5(6) of the Labour Act, Cap L1, LFN 2004 relates to the list of employees from whom deductions for overpayment of wages were made, which shall be made available by employers when making payment to a trade union. The Committee observes that for a number of years, it had been requesting the Government to indicate the measures taken to give effect to the Convention (Article 4(5)), under which the employer shall make available to the workers' representatives, at their request, lists of the persons who are employed in work underground and who are less than two years older than the minimum age specified by the Government which is 16 years. The lists should contain the dates of birth as well as dates at which they were employed or worked underground in the undertaking for the first time. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to bring the national legislation into conformity with the provisions of Article 4(5) of the Convention.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2002)

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Scope of application. 1. Self-employed children. The Committee had previously noted that by virtue of section 91 of the Labour Act, a worker is a person who has entered into an oral or written contract with an employer. The term “worker” does not include the following persons: (i) persons who are not employed for the purposes of the employer’s business; (ii) members of the employer’s family; (iii) sales representatives in so far as their work is performed outside the permanent workplace of the employer’s business; and (iv) persons to whom materials or articles are given to be cleaned, ornamented, repaired or adapted in order to be sold outside of their premises. The Committee had reminded the Government that the Convention applies not only to work performed under an employment contract but to all types of work or employment regardless of the existence of a contractual relationship, such as self-employment. Noting the absence of information in the Government’s report, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that all children, including self-employed children, benefit from the protection laid down in the Labour Act. In this respect, it requests the Government to envisage the possibility of amending section 91 of the Labour Act as well as taking measures to adapt and strengthen the labour inspection services with a view to ensuring such protection.

2. Minimum age for admission to work. The Committee had noted that by virtue of section 59(2) of the Labour Act of 1990, a person under 15 years of age shall not be employed or work in industrial undertakings. However, it noted that, according to section 59(1) of the Labour Act, read in conjunction with section 91 of the same Act, “no child under 12 shall be employed or work in any capacity except where he/she is employed by a member of his/her family to perform light work of an agricultural, horticultural or domestic character”. The Committee had also noted that, according to sections 28(1)(b) and 277 of the Child Rights Act of 2003, a child under 18 years shall not be “employed to work in any capacity except where he/she is employed by a member of his/her family to perform light work of an agricultural, horticultural or domestic character”. Moreover, the Committee had observed that section 7(1) of the draft Labour Standards Bill of 2004 follows the same wording as that of section 59(1) of the Labour Act of 1990, in other words, fixing a general minimum age of admission to work or employment of 12 years and did not appear to modify the Labour Act of 1990 in light of the relevant provisions of the Child Rights Act of 2003. In this regard, the Committee had noted with concern that the national legislation provided for a wide variety of minimum ages, and that many of these minimum ages were too low.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that the Legal Departments of the Federal Ministry of Labour and Productivity and the Federal Ministry of Women’s Affairs and Social Development have been required to provide legal advice on this matter. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures, without delay, to harmonize its legislation and to provide for a general minimum age for admission to employment or work of 15 years. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

3. Children working in agriculture and domestic services. The Committee notes that the Labour Act permits the employment of children under the age of 12 years in agriculture, horticulture and domestic services. Section 65 of the Labour Act further provides that the Minister may make regulations concerning the employment of women and young persons as domestic servants. The Committee notes that, according to the UNICEF Information Sheet on Child Labour in Nigeria, 2006, an estimated 15 million children under the age of 14 years work in Nigeria, mostly in the semi-formal and informal economy with hundreds of thousands of young domestic workers working for prosperous urban families. It also notes the information from a report available on the website of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) that children in Nigeria are engaged in dangerous activities in agriculture and domestic service. Children engaged in work in cocoa plantations are often exposed to pesticides and chemical fertilizers. The Committee expresses its serious concern at the situation and number of children below the minimum age who work as domestic workers and in the agricultural sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that children under 15 years are not admitted to work in agriculture or in domestic work, except for light work as laid down under Article 7(1) of the Convention. It also asks the Government to indicate whether a regulation on domestic service was adopted pursuant to section 65 of the Labour Act.

Article 3(2). Determination of hazardous work. The Committee had previously noted that neither the Labour Act nor the Child Rights Act provide for a comprehensive list of types of hazardous work, especially regarding occupations that are likely to harm the morals of children. It had therefore requested the Government to take the necessary measures to determine in detail the types of work, which, by their nature or the circumstances in which they are carried out, are likely to jeopardize the health, safety or morals of children under 18 years of age.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the Occupational Safety and Health Bill, which is currently before the National Assembly for approval, contains the list of types of hazardous work prohibited to young persons under the age of 18 years. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the Occupational Safety and Health Bill, which contains a list of types of hazardous work prohibited to young persons under the age of 18 years, will be adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to supply a copy, once it has been adopted.

Article 6. Apprenticeship. The Committee had previously noted that, according to section 49(1) of the Labour Act, a person aged 12–16 years of age may undertake an apprenticeship for a maximum period of five years. Section 52(a) of the Labour Act states that the Minister may make regulations to determine the terms and conditions upon which the contract of apprenticeship may be lawfully entered into as well as the duties and obligations of the apprentices and their masters. The Minister may also regulate the conditions governing the entry of persons aged 12–16 years into apprenticeship (section 52(e) of the Labour Act). The Committee had also noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) expressed its concern at the exploitation and abuse that commonly take place in apprenticeships (CRC/C/15/Add.257, 28 January 2005, paragraph 73). The Committee had reminded the Government that Article 6 of the Convention permits work done by persons of at least 14 years of age in undertakings, where such work is carried out in accordance with conditions prescribed by the competent authority, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers, and is an integral part of: (a) a course of education or training for which a school or training institution is primarily responsible; (b) a programme of training mainly or entirely in an undertaking; or (c) a programme of guidance or orientation designed to facilitate the choice of an occupation or of a line of training. Noting that the Government's report does not contain a reply to its previous comment, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that children under 14 years of age do not undertake apprenticeships. It also asks the Government to indicate whether regulations were adopted, pursuant to section 52(a) and (e) of the Labour Act, to regulate apprenticeships.

Article 7(1). Minimum age for admission to light work. The Committee had previously observed that neither the provisions under section 59(1) of the Labour Act, nor section 28(1)(b) of the Child Rights Act provide for a minimum age for admission to light work.

The Committee notes the Government's information that in practice children under 12 years of age do not perform light work. The Committee notes, however, that according to the Multiple Indicator Cluster Survey Report of 2007 (UNICEF/National Bureau of Statistics, Nigeria), 29 per cent of children aged between 5 and 14 years are engaged in child labour. The Committee once again reminds the Government that, according to Article 7(1) of the Convention, national laws or regulations may permit the employment or work of children aged 13–15 years in light work which is: (a) not likely to be harmful to their health or development; and (b) not such as to prejudice their attendance at school, their participation in vocational orientation or training programmes approved by the competent authority, or their capacity to benefit from the instruction received. In this regard, the Committee draws the Government's attention to paragraph 393 of the General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work, on the requirement to establish a minimum age for admission to light work, in conformity with the Convention. The Committee accordingly requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that only children aged 13–15 years may perform light work.

Article 7(3). Determination of light work. In its previous comments, the Committee observed that the conditions in which light work activities may be undertaken were not clearly defined in the Labour Act or in the Child Rights Act.

The Committee notes the Government's reference to section 59(3) and (8) of the Labour Act. According to section 59(3), young persons under the age of 14 years may be employed only on a daily wage, on a day-to-day basis and as long as they return to their place of residence each night. Section 59(8) further states that no young persons under the age of 16 years shall be required to work for a longer period than four consecutive hours or permitted to work for more than eight working hours in any day. The Committee observes that section 59(3) does not prescribe the number of hours during which light work may be permitted to young persons under the age of 14 years. It further observes that the maximum working hours of eight hours a day prescribed under section 59(8) may prejudice the attendance of young persons below the age of 15 years at school or vocational orientation or training programmes as laid down under Article 7(1)(b) of the Convention. The Committee therefore once again draws the Government's attention to Paragraph 13(b) of the Minimum Age Recommendation, 1973 (No. 146), which states that, in giving effect to Article 7(3) of the Convention, special attention should be given to the strict limitation of the hours spent at work in a day and in a week, and the prohibition of overtime, so as to allow enough time for education and training, for rest during the day and for leisure activities. The Committee accordingly requests the Government to take the necessary measures to regulate the employment of persons between 13 and 15 years of age in light work, by determining the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, light work in the agricultural, horticultural and domestic sectors may be undertaken as well as the types of activities that constitute light work. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard.

Part III of the report form. Labour inspectorate. The Committee notes from the Government's report of 2009 under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), that the labour inspectorate has not been very effective for the following reasons: (i) inadequate manpower and working materials; (ii) inadequate funding and capacity building; and (iii) obsolete laws (to the extent that the labour laws are reviewed but are pending at the National Assembly for approval). The Government's report under Convention No. 81 further indicated that the Government has established child labour units in all the 36 states and the Federal Capital Territory with the responsibility of coordinating child labour inspection. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the functioning of the child labour units with regard to the child labour inspections carried out and on the number and nature of violations detected. It also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen the functioning of the labour inspectorate, by increasing the number of labour inspectors as well as by providing them with additional means and resources, in order to ensure the effective supervision of the provisions giving effect to the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved, including on the number of inspections carried out and violations detected with regard to children.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes from the concluding observations of the CRC of June 2010 that, in Nigeria, public awareness campaigns to combat the economic exploitation of children were carried out, child labour units were established in all states and a survey was conducted in 2008 to identify the prevalence and nature of child labour. The CRC, however, remained seriously concerned at the very high number of children engaged in child labour, in particular in its worst forms (CRC/C/NGA/CO/3-4, paragraph 82). The Committee further notes the information from a report available on the website of the UNHCR that in May 2011 the Ministry of Labour and Productivity (MOLP) reportedly collected data from state governments on the prevalence of child labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the data collected on the situation of working children in Nigeria during the 2008 survey and by the MOLP in 2011. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including, for example, statistical data on the employment of children under 15 years, extracts from the reports of inspection services, and information on the number and nature of contraventions reported.

The Committee encourages the Government to take into consideration the Committee's comments on discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention. In this regard, the Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of ILO technical assistance to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a direct request addressed directly to the Government.

Paraguay

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946 (No. 77) (ratification: 1966)

Article 4(1) and (2) of the Convention. Medical re-examination of fitness for employment until the age of 21 years. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the legislation into conformity with Article 4 of the Convention, under which provision has to be made for a medical examination of fitness for employment and for periodical re-examination until at least the age of 21 years, in the case of occupations involving high health risks. It also stressed the need to define the occupations or categories of occupations for which such an examination is required.

In its report, the Government provides a considerable amount of information on the measures taken to strengthen the protection of children who work, especially by adopting the National Strategy for the Prevention and Elimination of Child Labour and Protection of the Work of Young People (2010–15) and by consolidating institutional coordination for handling complaints and recording abuse with respect to work carried out by children under 18 years of age. While noting this information, the Committee observes that the Government does not provide information on any measures it might have taken to bring the legislation in conformity with the Convention. It recalls that section 121(b) of the Labour Code subjects the employment of minors under 18 years to a number of conditions, including the obligation to present a yearly physical and mental fitness certificate established by the competent authority. The Committee therefore requests the Government once again to take the necessary measures to supplement its legislation to ensure, in respect of occupations involving high health risks, the compulsory nature of the examination for fitness for employment and for re-examination until at least the age of 21 years. It also requests the Government to define the occupations or categories of occupations for which such an examination is required.

Article 6(1). Measures for vocational guidance and physical and vocational rehabilitation of children and young persons declared unable to work. Noting the absence of information in the Government's report, the Committee again requests it to take the necessary measures to provide for the physical and vocational rehabilitation of children and young persons found by medical examination to be unsuited to certain types of work or to have physical handicaps or limitations, and to supply information in this respect.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. Given that under section 55 of the Children's and Young Persons' Code, the Municipal Council for the Rights of Children and Young Persons (CODENI) is bound to establish a specific register of young workers, the Committee hopes that the Government will be in a position to supply, in its next report, statistical data on the number of children and young persons working in the industrial sector, the number of those who have undergone the medical examinations provided for under the Convention, information on the infringements reported by the Labour Inspectorate in this area and the penalties imposed, as well as any other information concerning the application of the Convention in practice.

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Convention, 1946 (No. 78) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee requests the Government to refer to its comments on the application of the Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946 (No. 77).

Night Work of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Convention, 1946 (No. 79) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Period during which it is forbidden to work at night. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with satisfaction that under section 2 of Decree No. 4951 of 22 March 2005, night work between 7 p.m. and 7 a.m., i.e. a period of 12 hours, is classified as dangerous and that, pursuant to section 3 of the Decree, it is prohibited for children under 18 years of age. It nonetheless noted that section 58 of the Children's and Young Persons' Code prohibits night work for children aged 14 to 18 years for a period of ten hours including the interval between 8 p.m. and 6 a.m. In order to avoid any ambiguity in the law, the Committee deemed it advisable to align section 58 with the Children's and Young Persons' Code with Decree No. 4951 of 22 March 2005 and the Convention, by introducing an amendment to increase to 12 hours the period during which young persons must not work at night.

While noting the information from the Government that the exceptions allowed by this provision of the Convention have not been used, the Committee again expresses the view that it would be advisable to align section 58 of the Children's and Young Persons' Code with Decree No. 4951 of 22 March 2005, the Convention and practice. It requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 58 of the Children's and Young Persons Code and to establish that the period during which children may not work at night must be 12 hours.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Philippines

Night Work of Young Persons (Industry) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 90) (ratification: 1953)

Article 2 of the Convention. Period during which night work is prohibited. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the regulation issued by Directive No. 23 of 30 May 1977, which prohibited night work for young persons under 16 years between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m. was not in conformity with the provisions of the Convention, under the terms of which the prohibition should cover a period of at least 12 consecutive hours, including the interval between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m. Recalling that according to Article 2 of the Convention, the term night signifies a period of 12 consecutive hours (paragraph 1), which for young persons under 16 years of age, this period shall include the interval between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m. of the following day (paragraph 2), and for young persons between the ages of 16 and 18 years, the interval of at least seven consecutive hours falling between 10 p.m. and 7 a.m. (paragraph 3), the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures in order to bring the national legislation into conformity with Article 2 of the Convention.

The Committee notes that according to subsections (1) and (2) of section 12-A of the Republic Act No. 9231 of 2003, a child below 15 years shall not be allowed to work for more than four hours a day and a child between 15 and 18 years of age shall not be allowed to work for more than eight hours a day. It also notes that subsection (3) of section 12A of Act No. 9231 further prescribes that no child under 15 years of age shall be allowed to work between 8 p.m. and 6 a.m. of the following day and no child between 15 and 18 years shall be allowed to work between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m. of the following day. The Committee, therefore, observes with satisfaction that subsections (1), (2) and (3) of section 12-A when read together, lead to a prohibition to work during the night as required by Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee further notes that section 5(a) and (b) of Republic Act No. 679 of 1952, which prohibits night work by children under 18 years of age also states that children employed at night shall be granted a rest period of at least 13 consecutive hours between two working periods.

Portugal

Night Work of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 6) (ratification: 1932)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also takes note of the observations sent by the General Workers' Union (UGT) and the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers (CGTP).

Article 2(2) of the Convention. Exceptions to the prohibition of night work by young persons. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted section 65 of Act No. 99/2003 approving the Labour Code (Labour Code of 2003) which regulates the night work of young persons. It had noted that according to section 65(3) of the Labour Code of 2003, a collective agreement may provide that a young person aged 16 or over may work at night in specific sectors of activity, except during the period between midnight and 5 a.m. Moreover, it had noted section 65(4) of the Labour Code of 2003 which stated that a young person aged 16 or over may work at night, in cultural, artistic, sporting or advertising activities, where there are objective grounds for doing so and on condition that he/she is granted a compensatory period of rest equal to the number of hours worked.

The Committee had noted the observations made by the CGTP that the national legislation authorizes the night work of young persons aged 16 and over in particular sectors of activity without specifying the sectors themselves.

The Committee once again notes the allegations made by the CGTP reiterating its previous comments that the national legislation does not expressly state the sectors of activity in which night work is authorized for young persons over 16 years of age. The CGTP further alleges that this task is being left to collective bargaining which would lead to a generalization or widespread habit in practice not permitted by the Convention. The Committee also notes the UGT's statement that since this Convention dates from 1919 and was ratified by Portugal in 1932, it is natural that some of its provisions may have become obsolete.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Labour Code of 2003 has been revised and the night work of young persons under 18 years of age is now covered by section 76 of the Legislative Decree No. 7/2009 (Labour Code of 2009) which retains the provisions previously contained in section 65 of the Labour Code of 2003. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government continues to consider that some provisions of the Convention which might have been justified at the time of its adoption in 1919, have lost any relevance with the passage of 93 years, and does not reflect the world of work today. The Government, once again recalling the decision taken by the Governing Body, considers that the Convention should be revised as soon as possible, and that it is looking forward for that.

The Committee reminds the Government that as long as the Convention has not been revised and has not been denounced by a ratifying country as per Article 13 of the Convention, it remains in force and is binding upon those countries that have ratified the Convention. Such a country is under an obligation to comply with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee once again recalls that according to Article 2(1) of the Convention, young persons under 18 years of age shall not be employed during the night in any industrial undertaking, other than an undertaking in which only members of the same family are employed and in the cases listed in Article 2(2) of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to specify the activities in which night work may be authorized for children over 16 years of age as per section 76(3)(a) of the Labour Code of 2009, so as to be in conformity with Article 2(1) and (2) of the Convention.

Article 3(1). Employment of children in industrial undertakings. Noting that the provisions laid down under section 65 of the Labour Code of 2003 did not completely comply with the provisions of the Convention, the Committee had reminded the Government that according to Article 3(1) of the Convention, the term "night" signifies a period of at least 11 consecutive hours, including the interval between 10 p.m. and 5 a.m. It had therefore requested the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention on this point.

The Committee notes the allegations made by the CGTP that national legislation fails to conform to Article 3(1) of the Convention in terms of the definition of "night work".

The Committee notes that according to section 76(1) of the Labour Code of 2009, it is prohibited to employ a young person under 16 years of age between 8 p.m. and 7 a.m. It also notes section 76(2) of the Labour Code of 2009 which states that a young person aged 16 and over cannot work between 10 p.m. and 7 a.m. In this regard, the Committee notes that according to section 73(1) of the Labour Code of 2009, the working hours of a young person (between the ages of 16 and of 18 years) shall not exceed eight hours a day or 40 hours per week. The Committee, therefore, observes with satisfaction that sections 73(1) and 76(2) of the Labour Code of 2009, when read together, lead to a prohibition to work during the night as required by Article 3(1) of the Convention. The Committee further notes that by virtue of section 73(2) of the Labour Code of 2009 a collective agreement on employment may further reduce or limit the maximum working hours of young persons.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the Government's information that in the course of the inspections carried out by the Working Conditions Authority during the period from June 2008 to May 2012, four infringements of the provisions governing the prohibition of night work by minors were detected and were the subject of prosecutions.

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946 (No. 77) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It takes note of the observations sent by the General Workers' Union (UGT) and the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers (CGTP).

The Committee notes the allegations made by the CGTP referring to the lack of provisions in the national legislation to give effect to the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's reference to the newly adopted Act No. 102/2009 of 10 September approving the legal framework for the promotion of safety and health at work (which incorporates most of the provisions of Act No. 34/2004) and Act No. 98/2009 of 4 September regulating the system of compensation for accidents at work and occupational diseases, including rehabilitation and reintegration. Accordingly, the Committee notes with interest that the above Acts guarantee compliance with the following provisions of the Convention.

Article 4 of the Convention. Medical examination until the age of 21 years for occupations involving high health risks. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that neither the Labour Code nor Act No. 35/2004 contained provisions requiring a medical examination for fitness for employment and periodical re-examinations for persons until the age of 21 years for occupations which involve high health risks. It had therefore requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to this end.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that according to section 108(3)(a) of Act No. 102/2009, all workers working in occupations involving high health risks are required to undergo a medical examination prior to their employment. Moreover, while minors (under the age of 18 years) and employees above 50 years are required to undergo a periodic medical examination every year, all other workers (including workers between the age group of 18 and 21 years) are required to undergo a periodic medical examination once in two years (section 108(3)8B). Section 108(4) of the Act further states that based on the worker's state of health and the results of the occupational risk assessment in the workplace, the medical officer, may increase the intervals between the medical examinations of the worker.

Article 5. Medical examination to be free of charge. The Committee had previously requested the Government to indicate whether the medical examinations prescribed by the legislation are free of charge. The Committee notes with interest that according to section 15(12) of Act No. 102/2009, the employer bears the expense of medical examinations, evaluation of cases of exposure, medical tests or any other activities related to occupational risks and health monitoring, without imposing any financial charges on the workers.

Article 6(2). Physical and vocational rehabilitation of children and young persons found to be unsuited or to have physical handicaps or limitations. The Committee had previously reminded the Government that as per Article 6(2) of the Convention the nature and extent of the measures taken for vocational guidance and physical and vocational rehabilitation of workers found unsuited for work, shall be determined by the competent authority, and for this purpose cooperation shall be established between the labour, health, educational and social services concerned, and effective liaison shall be maintained between these services in order to carry out such measures. It had requested the measures taken in this regard.

The Committee notes section 110(2) of Act No. 102/2009 which provides that where the medical examination indicates a worker's unsuitability for certain types of work, the workplace medical officer shall indicate in such cases, other types of work suitable for such worker. Moreover, according to section 155(1) and (2) of Act No. 98/2009, workers who have been the victims of an accident or contracted an occupational disease resulting in temporary, partial or permanent incapacity are assured vocational training, adaptation of the workplace or part-time work by the employer. The Committee further notes with satisfaction that, according to section 155(3) of Act No. 98/2009, the Government must create vocational rehabilitation, reintegration and placement services in coordination with the existing services. The Committee also notes that in connection with worker's rehabilitation and reintegration, sections 162–166 of Act No. 98/2009 envisages the possibility of collaboration between public services responsible for employment and vocational training, as well as services responsible for protection against occupational risks and other services.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the observations made by the CGTP that in addition to the lack of legislative provisions, the enforcement of legal obligations relating to monitoring the health of minors is inadequate which is aggravated by the shortcomings of the actions of the Working Conditions Authority (ACT).

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government regarding the violations detected relating to medical examinations of minors during the inspection activities carried out by the ACT. Accordingly, nine violations each were detected in 2007–08; four violations were detected in 2009; six violations were detected in 2010; and two violations were detected in 2011.

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Convention, 1946 (No. 78) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also takes note of the observations sent by the General Workers' Union (UGT) and the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers (CGTP).

With regard to Articles 4, 5 and 6(2) of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to refer to its comments under the Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946 (No. 77).

Article 7(2)(a) of the Convention. Supervision for the enforcement of the system of medical examination for fitness for employment of children engaged either on their own account or on account of their parents. The Committee had previously noted the comments made by the UGT and the CGTP that undue use of child labour still persisted in rural areas. The CGTP further stated that the labour inspection services did not yet react to this state of affairs. The Committee had reminded the Government to adopt measures of identification for ensuring the application of the system of medical examination for fitness for employment to children and young persons engaged, either on their own account or on account of their parents in itinerant trading or in any other occupation carried out in the streets, or in places to which the public have access (for example, a requirement for the child or young person to be in possession of a document attesting to a medical examination for fitness).

The Committee notes the Government's information that children and young persons engaged, either on their own account or on account of their parents in itinerant trading or in any other occupation carried out in the streets, or in places to which the public have access are covered by Act No. 102/2009 on the system of protection of safety and health at work which is applicable to all sectors of activity including self-employed workers. It notes that according to section 108(3) of Act No. 102/2009, all workers, including minors, are required to undergo a medical examination prior to their employment and to further undergo periodic annual examination. The Committee notes with satisfaction that as per section 3 of Act No. 102/2009, the provisions of this Act apply to family undertakings, domestic work, agricultural and fishing sector as well as self-employment. The Committee further notes the Government's information that according to the provisions of Law Decree No. 399/91 which adapted the regulations on street vending, under Law Decree No. 122/79, children under the age of 18 years are required to undergo a free medical examination which certifies their physical fitness to perform the occupation, before they are issued a permit to work as an itinerant trader.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. Concerning the observations made by the UGT and the CGTP on the inadequate enforcement of the legal provisions on medical examination, the Committee notes the Government's statement that children under 16 years of age are entitled to perform light work according to section 68(4) of the Labour Code. In Portugal, children work in farms and small-scale family businesses which are widely scattered in the country and where it is difficult to distinguish an employment relationship in the true sense. The Committee notes the Government's information that the Working Conditions Authority (ACT) has given priority to the eradication of the illegal employment of children and inspection action plans had always focused on conditions of employment of children. It further notes from the Government's report that with regard to inspection activities, 202 inspections were carried out in 2010 to monitor the employment and working conditions of minors during which 20 violations were detected and penalties ranging between €33,150 and €73,713 were imposed. Most of the violations detected were with regard to the failure to provide medical examinations, violation of the minimum requirements for admission of minors to employment (without compulsory schooling or vocational qualification) and failure to inform the ACT about the employment of minors. In this regard, the Committee also notes the Government's indication in its report of 2011 under the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), that the labour inspectors have not detected any cases of illegal work in the domestic sector, though six cases of illegal work by minors in other sectors were detected in 2009 and 2010.

Russian Federation

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Scope of application. Children working in the informal economy. The Committee previously noted that section 63(1) of the Labour Code prohibited children under 16 years of age from signing an employment contract. The Committee also noted the Government's statement that the illegal employment of minors and the violation of their labour rights are frequent occurrences in the informal economy. This involves minors who wash cars, engage in trading and perform auxiliary work. The Committee subsequently noted the Government's information regarding measures taken to prevent children from signing employment contracts in breach of the national labour legislation, but observed an absence of information regarding any measures taken to ensure that children who work without an employment contract enjoyed the protection afforded by the Convention.

The Committee once again notes an absence of information in the Government's report regarding measures taken to address children working outside the scope of an employment contract or in the informal economy. However, the Committee notes the Government's statement, in its report submitted under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that one of the most common violations detected by the state labour inspectorate involving persons under the age of 18 was the failure to conclude employment contracts in written form. The Committee also notes that the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, in its concluding observations of 1 June 2011, expressed concern regarding the large number of children who live and work on the streets, in particular in the informal sector where they are vulnerable to abuse to such an extent that regular school attendance is severely restricted (E/C.12/RUS/CO/5, paragraph 24). Recalling that the Convention applies to all branches of economic activity and covers all types of employment or work, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate to better monitor children working in the informal economy. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the specific measures taken in this respect in its next report.

Parts IV and V of the report form. Labour inspectorate and the application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted the information from a 2009 study carried out by the ILO-IPEC, within the framework of a project on street children in the region of St. Petersburg, that children, some as young as 8 and 9 years old, were engaged in economic activities such as collecting empty bottles and recycling paper, transporting goods, cleaning workplaces, looking after property, street trading and cleaning cars.

The Committee notes the statement in the Government's report that the Federal Labour and Employment Service (Rostrud) and its local departments (the state labour inspectorates) ensure the protection of the labour rights of minors in employment through their inspection activities. In this regard, the Committee notes the information in the Government's report submitted under Convention No. 182 that 1,267 inspections were carried out in the first six months of 2010 to verify compliance with legislation relating to children under 18 and 564 such inspections were carried out in the first six months of 2011. The Government also indicates that in the first six months of 2010, 1,865 violations were detected relating to persons under 18, and 1,461 such violations were detected over the same period in 2011. Consequently, labour inspectors imposed fines amounting to 1,200,000 Russian roubles (RUB) in the first six months of 2010, and fines of RUB756,000 over the same period in 2011. The Committee therefore observes that significantly fewer inspections were carried out to verify compliance with legislation relating to children under 18 in the first six months of 2011 (564 such inspections detecting 1,461 violations) compared to the first six months of 2010 (1,267 inspections detecting 1,865 violations). The Committee accordingly urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to effectively address and eliminate child labour, including in the informal economy. Moreover, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that sufficient data on the situation of working children in the Russian Federation is made available, including information on the number of children below the minimum age engaged in economic activity, and the nature, scope and trends of their work. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by sex and by age.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that while child trafficking is prohibited in law (pursuant to section 127.1 of the Criminal Code), it remains a source of serious concern in practice. In this regard, the Committee noted that, according to the International Trade Union Confederation, thousands of persons are trafficked from the Russian Federation to other countries, including Canada, China, Germany, Israel, Italy, Japan, Spain, Thailand and the United States. Internal trafficking within the Russian Federation is also reportedly taking place and cases have been confirmed of children being trafficked for sexual exploitation. The Committee also noted that, according to the report of 24 January 2007 of the UN Special Rapporteur on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography in Ukraine (A/HRC/4/31/Add.2, paragraphs 48–49), the Russian Federation is also a destination country for boys and girls between 13 and 18 years of age trafficked from Ukraine, for exploitation in street vending, domestic labour, agriculture, dancing, employment as waiters/waitresses or for the provision of sexual services. The Committee further noted the Government's indication that in 2008 the courts examined the cases of five persons involved in three instances of the trafficking of minors. In this respect, the Committee observed that the number of cases involving the trafficking of children reported by the authorities remained low.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report submitted under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) that, in 2009, 66 offences were recorded of the trafficking of minors (section 127.1(2)(b) of the Criminal Code), and 67 persons were found to have committed these offences. It also notes that the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), in its concluding observations of 10 August 2010, expressed concern at the high prevalence of trafficking in the country, which had increased more than sixfold during the reporting period. The CEDAW also noted with concern that the Russian Federation is a source, transit and destination country for trafficking and expressed regret regarding the lack of disaggregated data on the number of victims of trafficking, including minors (CEDAW/C/USR/CO/7, paragraph 26). Moreover, the Committee notes that the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, in its concluding observations of 1 June 2011, expressed concern about continued reports of trafficking in women and children for sexual exploitation and abuse (E/C.12/RUS/CO/5, paragraph 23). The Committee expresses its deep concern that the trafficking of children for economic or sexual exploitation remains a serious problem in practice. It therefore urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to combat and eliminate the trafficking of children under 18 years of age, without delay. In this respect, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that perpetrators of child trafficking are investigated and prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of reported violations, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed related to the sale and trafficking of children. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by sex and by age.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee previously noted that a draft Law on combating human trafficking, which aimed to establish appropriate measures to ensure the legal protection and social rehabilitation for victims, was under discussion in the Duma Commission on Family Issues for Women and Children. However, the Committee also noted the indication by the Worker members of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session (June 2009) of the International Labour Conference that the draft Law on combating human trafficking appears to be suspended since 2006. The Committee further noted that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards called on the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of the draft Law on combating human trafficking. The Committee requested information on the number of child victims of trafficking who had benefited from appropriate services for their rehabilitation.

The Committee notes an absence of information on this point in the Government's report. However, the Committee notes that the Human Rights Committee, in its concluding observations of 24 November 2009, expressed concern about the notable lack of recognition of the rights and interests of trafficking victims in the counter-trafficking efforts of the Government (CCPR/C/RUS/CO/6, paragraph 18). Therefore, the Committee requests the Government to strengthen its efforts to provide for the removal, rehabilitation and social reintegration of child victims of trafficking. It requests the Government to provide information on the effective and time-bound measures taken in this regard in its next report, and on the number of children who have benefited from the appropriate services provided. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to take immediate steps to ensure that the draft Law on combating human trafficking is adopted in the very near future to ensure the provision of rehabilitation and social integration services to child victims of trafficking.

Article 8. International cooperation and assistance. The Committee previously noted that the Ministry of the Interior had drafted a cooperation agreement between the Ministries of the Interior (police) of the member countries of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) to combat the trafficking of persons. It requested information on the international cooperation measures taken to eliminate the cross-border trafficking of children.

While noting the absence of information from the Government on this point, the Committee notes that the Human Rights Committee, in its concluding observations of 24 February 2009, welcomed the international cooperation measures undertaken by the Government to combat trafficking (CCPR/C/RUS/CO/6, paragraph 18). In this regard, the Committee notes the information from the International Organization on Migration that it is carrying out several projects in the country, including one entitled “Preventing and counteracting trafficking in human beings in the Russian Federation”. The Committee also notes that in December 2010, the President signed the CIS Programme to Combat Human Trafficking for 2011–13, which outlines commitments to form a national anti-trafficking structure and fund NGOs to provide victim protection. Considering that the sale and trafficking of children continues to be a matter of serious concern in the country, the Committee urges the Government to pursue its international cooperation efforts to combat and eliminate the trafficking of children. It requests the Government to provide information on specific measures taken in this regard, and on the results achieved.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Rwanda

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1981)

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy on the effective abolition of child labour and the application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted that a draft National Five-Year Action Plan for the Elimination of Child Labour (NAP) was first developed in 2007, but had not been adopted. It also noted that, according to the National Child Labour Survey (NCLS) of 2008, approximately 6.1 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 14 in the country (approximately 142,570 children) were involved in economic activity. The NCLS also indicated that the majority of these working children (4.9 per cent of children in the age group) combined both school and economic activity. The NCLS further indicated that the overwhelming majority of working children (85 per cent) were in the agricultural sector.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that the revision of the NAP is in the final process of consultation. The Committee also notes the information from ILO–IPEC of April 2012 that the revised NAP should include recent data on child labour and, in this regard, an ILO technical team travelled to Kigali in the spring of 2012. The Committee further notes that Rwanda is one of several countries participating in the ILO–IPEC project entitled “Project Development, Awareness Raising and Support for the Implementation of the Global Action Plan on the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour by 2016”. Information from ILO–IPEC indicates that implementation of the Project in Rwanda was extended until June 2013. Noting that the NAP was first developed in 2007, the Committee urges the Government to ensure the elaboration, adoption and implementation of the NAP in the near future. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on progress made in this regard, and on the results achieved.

Article 2(2). Raising the initially specified minimum age for admission to work. The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Law Regulating Labour (2009), which prohibits employing a child even as apprentice, before the age of 16. Observing that, upon ratification the Government specified the minimum age of 14 years, the Committee draws the Government’s attention to the fact that Article 2(2) of the Convention provides that any Member having ratified the Convention may subsequently notify the Director-General of the International Labour Office, by a new declaration, that it has raised the minimum age from that which it had initially specified. To allow the age fixed by national legislation (of 16 years) to be harmonized with that provided for at the international level, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would consider the possibility of sending a declaration of this nature to the Office.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee previously noted the Government’s indication that it intended to progressively increase the number of years of compulsory schooling from six to nine years, thereby raising the age of completion of compulsory schooling to 16 years of age. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on whether the extension of the duration of compulsory education from six to nine years was contained in national legislation.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that the progressive extension of compulsory education from six to nine years is contained in the Education Sector Policy of July 2003. Moreover, the Committee notes the Government’s statement in its report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child of 1 March 2012 that, since the 2009 school year, Rwanda has introduced a cycle of nine years so that children normally complete school at 16 years (CRC/C/RWA/3-4, paragraph 95). The Committee notes with interest that this age of completion of schooling of 16 years is in line with the new minimum age for admission to work specified in the Law Regulating Labour (2009).

Article 3(2). Determination of hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that a draft ministerial order on the worst forms of child labour had been developed. It requested the Government to provide a copy of the order, once adopted.

The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of Ministerial Order No. 06 of 13 July 2010 determining the list of the worst forms of child labour, their nature and categories of institutions that may not employ children. This Order contains an extensive list of hazardous types of work, including: underground work; work in mining; work at high heights; work in the drainage of marshlands; work in unhygienic places; work with high temperatures, noises and vibrations; work related to demolition; work carried out using machines or other dangerous materials; work involving the lifting of heavy loads; fishing on boats; domestic work outside of the family; construction work; and the driving of heavy machines. The Ministerial Order also contains a list of categories of institutions that are not permitted to employ children, such as enterprises that carry out the slaughtering of animals, mining and quarry enterprises, enterprises that manufacture toxic gases, construction enterprises, enterprises that produce and sell alcoholic beverages, and enterprises that manufacture bricks and tiles.

Article 9(3). Registers of employment. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 165 of the Law Regulating Labour (2009) states that employers must keep a register of workers, and that section 166 states that the Minister shall determine the nature of this register. The Committee noted that a draft ministerial order had been developed in this regard.

The Committee notes the adoption of Ministerial Order No. 10 of 28 July 2010 regarding the declaration of an enterprise and the nature of employer's registers. The Committee notes with interest that section 6 of this Ministerial Order states that every employer shall have a register of employment, and that this register shall be kept at the place of work. Annex II of the Ministerial Order contains a model for the employer's register, which includes the employee's name, date of birth and the date of their work contract. The Committee further notes that section 7 of the Ministerial Order provides that the employer's register shall be available to labour inspectors when requested.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Senegal

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the communication from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 31 August 2012.

Articles 3(a) and 7(1) of the Convention. Sale and trafficking of children for economic exploitation; forced labour and penalties. Begging. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations in October 2006 (CRC/C/SEN/CO/2, paragraphs 60 and 61), expressed concern at the practices in Koranic schools run by marabouts who use talibé children on a large scale for economic gain by sending them to agricultural fields or to the streets for begging and other illicit work to earn money, thereby preventing them from having access to health, education and good living conditions.

The Committee previously noted with concern that, although section 3 of Act No. 2005–06 prohibits the organization, for economic gain, of begging by others or the employment, procuring or deceiving of anyone with a view to causing that person to beg, or the exertion of pressure on a person to beg or to continue begging, section 245 of the Penal Code provides that “the act of seeking alms on days, in places and under conditions established by religious traditions does not constitute the act of begging”. It accordingly observed that, from a joint reading of these two provisions, it would appear that the act of organizing begging by talibé children cannot be criminalized as it does not constitute an act of begging under section 245 of the Penal Code. The Committee further noted that the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography, in her report of 28 December 2010 submitted to the Human Rights Council following her mission to Senegal (A/HRC/16/57/Add.3), noted the inconsistency between section 3 of Act No. 2005–06 and section 245 of the Penal Code (paragraph 31). The Committee also noted that the Committee on the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers and Members of their Families, in its concluding observations of 3 December 2010 (CMW/C/SEN/CO/1, paragraph 26), noted with concern that more than half of the children who are forced to beg in the Dakar region come from neighbouring countries and that the Government of Senegal has not taken any practical steps to end regional trafficking in children for the purpose of begging.

The Committee further noted the comments of the ITUC indicating that the number of talibé children compelled to beg, consisting mainly of boys between the ages of 4 and 12 years, was estimated at 50,000 in 2010. The ITUC observed that most of these children live in isolated rural areas of Senegal or are victims of trafficking from neighbouring countries, including Mali and Guinea-Bissau. It emphasized that these children in practice receive very little education and are extremely vulnerable, because they depend totally on their Koranic teacher or marabout. They live in unhealthy conditions and in poverty, and are the victims of physical and psychological abuse if they do not succeed in earning their financial quota through begging. With regard to the causes of the phenomenon, the ITUC explains that poverty alone cannot explain this form of exploitation, as the evidence tends to show that certain marabouts earn more through children begging than the income necessary to maintain their daaras (Koranic schools). The ITUC added that there are no records of arrests, prosecutions or convictions of marabouts for compelling talibés to beg up to August 2010, when the Prime Minister announced the adoption of a Decree prohibiting begging in public places. Following this measure, seven Koranic teachers were arrested and convicted to prison sentences under Act No. 2005–06 of 29 April 2005 to combat the trafficking of persons and similar practices and to protect victims. However, these sentences were never imposed. Indeed, the ITUC indicated that branch associations of Koranic teachers were reported to have condemned the application of Act No. 2005-06 and threatened to withdraw their support from the President in the elections in February 2012. In October 2010, the President, therefore, reversed the Government's decision.

The Committee notes the fresh allegations made by the ITUC that Senegal has been very lax in terms of the enforcement of the law and repression of the exploitation of talibés and the ill-treatment inflicted on these children. The ITUC reports that, since the conviction and release of the marabouts arrested in 2010, no marabout has been prosecuted or, in particular, convicted. Furthermore, the ITUC indicates that it would be useful to amend the Penal Code so as to remove any doubt as to whether compelling a child to beg is prohibited in all places and under all circumstances, including in daaras, so as to bring the legislation into full conformity with the commitments made by Senegal in relation to the Convention.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report concerning begging by children. The Government indicates, in particular, that in its view there is no ambiguity between the provisions of section 245 of the Penal Code and section 3 of Act 2005-06. According to the Government, by specifying that the fact of seeking alms under the conditions established by religious traditions does not constitute begging, section 3 of Act 2005-06 is merely making a distinction between forms of begging that are prohibited and those that are tolerated. The Government adds that continuous begging in the streets of the city is a penal offence under Senegalese law, while asking for alms, for example on Fridays in mosques or on mass days in churches, is tolerated in light of socio-cultural beliefs.

The Committee notes that the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, in its examination of the reports submitted by Senegal on 31 August 2012, notes with concern the persistence and extent of the phenomenon of talibé children (CERD/C/SEN/CO/16-18, paragraph 14). The Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination also expresses regret that the inconsistency between section 3 of Act No. 2005-06 and section 245 of the Penal Code persists despite the recommendations of the Special Rapporteur on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography (paragraph 14). In this respect, although the Committee of Experts notes the Government's indications concerning the prosecutions initiated and the convictions handed down for trafficking between 2008 and 2010, it is bound to note that the Government has not provided any information on the investigation, arrest or conviction of marabouts for the exploitation of begging by child talibés.

With reference to the General Survey on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work of 2012 (paragraph 483), the Committee reminds the Government that, while the issue of seeking alms as an educational tool falls outside the scope of the Committee's mandate, it is clear that the use of children for begging for purely economic ends cannot be accepted under the Convention. This situation constitutes a deviation from the legitimate purposes of this traditional educational system and its methods. Often kept in conditions of servitude, talibé children are obliged to work daily, generally in street begging, in order to give the money received to their marabouts.

The Committee is, therefore, bound once again to express its deep concern at the large number of talibé children used for purely economic ends and the failure to give effect to Act No. 2005-06 in respect of Koranic teachers who make use of begging by talibé children for exclusively economic purposes. The Committee reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 1 of the Convention, immediate and effective measures shall be taken as a matter of urgency to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour and that, in accordance with Article 7(1) of the Convention, all necessary measures shall be taken to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, including the provision and application of sufficiently effective and dissuasive penal sanctions. The Committee, therefore, once again urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures, in law and practice, to ensure that persons engaged in the sale and trafficking of talibé children under 18 years of age for the purposes of economic exploitation, or who make use of these children for begging for purely economic purposes, are prosecuted effectively and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions are applied to them. In this respect, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to harmonize the national legislation so as to guarantee that the use of begging by talibé children for economic exploitation can be criminalized under section 245 of the Penal Code and under Act No. 2005-06. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted in this respect and on the number of investigations conducted, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions imposed on such persons.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Children at special risk. Talibé children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that a partnership for the removal and reintegration of street children (PARRER) had been established in February 2007 and is made up of members of the Senegalese administration, NGOs, the private sector, development partners, religious organizations, civil society and the media. The Committee noted the ITUC's comments indicating that the Government had adopted measures to promote a programme of modern daaras administered or regulated by the State. It noted that the Government established the inspectorate for daaras in 2008 to implement the programme for the modernization of daaras and the integration of modern daaras into the public education system. It further noted that the Ministry of Education signed an agreement with PARRER for the development of a harmonized school programme for Koranic schools, launched in January 2011. In its reply to the ITUC's comments, the Government indicated that it was engaged in improving the management and framework of the system of teaching in daaras. A number of actions were also envisaged in its strategy for the prevention of begging by children, such as the implementation of social protection measures in the areas of origin of migrant children, the establishment of programmes of conditional transfers for vulnerable families, support for the creation of income-generating activities for marabouts and the broadening of the teaching curriculum in Koranic schools with a view to facilitating the integration of young talibés into active life. The Committee also noted that, according to the information contained in the report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur of 28 December 2010, the Care, Information and Counselling Centre for Children in Difficulties (the GINDDI Centre), under the Ministry of Education, has been responsible since 2003 for taking children off the streets and reintegrating them, and for providing psychological support and social assistance to girl and boy victims of trafficking (paragraph 68).

The Committee notes that, according to the ITUC, the harmonized school programme for Koranic schools of the PARRER is currently being implemented as a pilot measure in 20 daaras in four regions of Senegal (Dakar, Thiès, Fatick and Kaolack). The pilot programme is planned for three years (2011–14) and is to be progressively extended throughout the nation as from 2012–13. Children in the daaras concerned will not be compelled to engage in begging. The ITUC also reports that, while the former Government failed to enforce the laws in force, the new President elected in April 2012 has affirmed his commitment to modernizing daaras and should adopt the programme, making it a priority and accelerating its implementation at the national level, particularly in rural areas, from which most child talibés originate.

The Committee notes the Government's indications concerning the measures adopted for the protection or removal of vulnerable children or those who are victims of trafficking and exploitation. The Committee notes that these measures include the "Education and Family Life (EVF)" project in daaras, which envisages a number of activities, including training for Koranic masters and talibé children on the rights of the child and their protection, and the improvement of the living conditions and education of child talibés in daaras. The Committee also notes that, with a view to preventing the movement of children in the Kolda region (a border area), thought to be the biggest area of origin of child beggars, a pilot project has been established to provide financial allowances to families.

The Government adds that, in the context of the PARRER, a number of activities have been undertaken, including advocacy visits to major religious leaders and Koranic masters, measures of prevention and to remove children from the streets, and the development of broad awareness-raising campaigns. These various activities have led to a number of results being achieved, including the identification of 1,129 families at risk in the regions of Ziguinchor, Kolda and Kaolack, the establishment of 146 committees for the protection of child talibés, and the formulation and dissemination of Islamic arguments against child begging. However, the Committee observes that the Government has not provided recent statistics on the number of child talibés who have benefitted from the protection provided by the GINDDI centre. The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts for the protection of child talibés under 18 years of age from forced or compulsory labour, including begging. It requests it to continue providing information on the measures adopted, particularly in the framework of the programme financed by the PARRER, and the results achieved, with an indication of the number of talibé children who have been removed from the worst forms of child labour and who have benefitted from rehabilitation and social integration measures in the GINDDI centre. It also requests the Government to continue providing information on the measures adopted or envisaged in the context of the process of the modernization of the daaras system, and the progress achieved in the context of the harmonized school programme for Koranic schools.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Thailand

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee previously requested a copy of section 287 of the Penal Code. In this regard, the Committee noted that section 287 of the Penal Code prohibits, inter alia, producing or making any document, drawing, print, picture, photograph, film or tape which is "obscene". However, the Committee noted the information in a document entitled "UNICEF urges quick government action on child pornography" of 11 October 2010, available on the UNICEF website, that reports indicate the open display and sale in the country of graphic sexual videos involving children. In this document, UNICEF urged the Thai authorities to bring to bear "the full force of the law" on those found to be producing, distributing or selling videos or any other material related to the sexual exploitation of children, and urged the Government to investigate where and how such videos are produced. Therefore, while noting that the production of child pornography appears to be prohibited in law, the Committee noted with concern that this worst form of child labour continues to be a problem in practice. The Committee accordingly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions are carried out in practice for persons who use, procure or offer persons under 18 years of age for the production of pornography or pornographic performances. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on whether the involvement of children in non-recorded pornographic performances (such as live performances) is prohibited in law.

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities, in particular, for the production and trafficking of drugs. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that while the production, importation, exportation, possession or consumption of narcotics is prohibited under the Narcotics Act of 1979, the use procuring or offering of a child under 18 years of age for this purpose did not appear to be prohibited. It also observed that, according to a rapid assessment conducted by ILO–

IPEC in 2002, children as young as 10 years of age participate in drug trafficking, and the majority of these are children are between 12 and 16 years and are used to buy or sell drugs.

The Committee noted the Government's statement that, on this point, it was in the process of collecting information from relevant agencies. The Committee reminded the Government that pursuant to Article 3(c) of the Convention, the involvement of a person under 18 in illicit activities constitutes one of the worst forms of child labour, and that pursuant to Article 1 of the Convention member States are required to take "immediate" measures to prohibit these worst forms as a matter of urgency. Observing that Thailand ratified the Convention in 2001, and that the use of children in the production and trafficking of drugs appears to be a problem in practice, the Committee urges the Government to take immediate measures to explicitly prohibit the use of children in the illicit activities in legislation as a matter of urgency.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. Trafficking. The Committee previously noted that the Royal Thai Police was in the process of establishing a specific unit responsible for combating trafficking of children and women (Division on the Suppression of Offences against Children, Youth and Women), and it requested information on the measures taken by this Division with regard to combating the trafficking of children.

The Committee noted the information in the Government's report that the Division on the Suppression of Offences against Children, Youth and Women has formed teams for the investigation of particular persons and locations suspected to be linked to human trafficking and the use of child labour. It has assigned police officers (at deputy commander or commander levels) to monitor and accelerate the investigation of human trafficking cases, while coordinating with other relevant agencies. The Government indicated that the Division on the Suppression of Offences against Children, Youth and Women has formed campaign teams to sensitize communities, villages and factories and has launched a campaign against human trafficking, in conjunction with other government agencies and private sector organizations. The Committee also noted the information in the Government's report that it had engaged in capacity building for officials to improve their understanding of the phenomenon and to ensure the efficiency of their anti-trafficking efforts. The Committee further noted the information in the ILO-IPEC Technical Progress Report on the second phase of the ILO-IPEC "Project to combat trafficking in children and women in the Mekong subregion" (TICW II Project) of 30 January 2008 (TICW II TPR) that "Operational Guidelines on identification of victims of trafficking in labour cases" had been developed, as a collaboration between the Ministry of Social Development and Human Security (MSDHS) and the Ministry of Labour as a coordinated response to cases of trafficking for the purpose of labour exploitation. The ILO-IPEC Technical Progress Report for the project "Support for national action to combat child labour and its worst forms in Thailand" of 10 September 2010 (ILO-IPEC TPR 2010) indicated that training was provided to labour inspectors and other key stakeholders on these Operational Guidelines in 2009. Nonetheless, the Committee noted the information in the UNODC report entitled "Global Report on Trafficking in Persons" of 2009 (UNODC Report) that the vast majority of foreign victims of trafficking identified between October 2006 and December 2007 were minors (76 per cent of trafficking victims) and that Thailand remained a source country of trafficking victims. The Committee therefore strongly urges the Government to redouble its efforts to strengthen the capacity of law enforcement officials responsible for the monitoring of trafficking in children, including those in the Division on the Suppression of Offences against Children, Youth and Women and border control officials, to ensure the effective implementation of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on measures taken in this regard.

Article 6. Programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. 1. The ILO-IPEC TICW project and the National Plan on Prevention and Resolution of Domestic and Cross-border Trafficking in Children and Women (NPA on Trafficking in Children and Women 2003-07). The Committee previously noted the launching of the TICW Project in 2000 and noted that within the TICW II Project (2003-08), the National Committee on Combating Trafficking in Children and Women launched the NPA on Trafficking in Children and Women 2003-07. It requested information on the concrete impact of measures taken through these initiatives.

The Committee noted the information in the Government's report that the implementation of the TICW II Project resulted in interventions in Phayao, Chiang Mai, Chiang Rai, Mukdaharn, and Bangkok. The Government indicated that the Chiang Mai Coordination Centre for the Protection of Children's and Women's Rights (Chiang Mai Coordination Centre) (under the MSDHS), developed a database on persons at risk for trafficking, as well as the destination sites of vulnerable persons, and that this information was used by partnering agencies in the implementation of initiatives. The Government indicated that 306 community watchdog volunteers were trained in 124 villages in the Phayao Province, and efforts were made to include awareness raising on trafficking in a secondary school curricula. In this regard, the Committee noted the information from ILO-IPEC that within the context of the TICW II Project, the action programmes implemented included "Integrated hill tribe community development project for the prevention of trafficking in children and women (phase II)", "Programme for the prevention of trafficking in children and women in Chiang Rai province", "Strengthening the capacity of Ban Mae Chan School to launch a prevention programme on trafficking", and "Trafficking in children and women for forced labour and sexual exploitation in Chiang Mai". The Committee further noted the information in the Government's report that combating the trafficking in persons was a top priority for the Government, and specific policies announced in this regard included capacity building, intelligence exchange between countries and awareness-raising campaigns. Observing that the NPA on Trafficking in Children and Women 2003-07 ended in 2007, and the TICW II Project concluded in 2008, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that comprehensive national efforts are undertaken to combat the sale and trafficking of persons under the age of 18. It requests the Government to provide information on any ongoing or envisaged national plans of action addressing this phenomenon, and on the implementation of these programmes.

2. Child commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee previously noted that the Office of the National Commission on Women's Affairs estimated that there were between 22,500 and 40,000 children under 18 years of age in prostitution (representing approximately 15-20 per cent of the overall number of prostitutes) in the country, and that these estimates did not include foreign children in prostitution. The Committee further noted that the National Plan of Action on the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour (2004-09) included initiatives to address child prostitution, and requested information on the concrete measures taken in this regard.

The Committee noted the Government's statement that it was in the process of collecting information from relevant agencies on this point. It also noted the information in the Government's report that a National Plan for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour (2009-14) was adopted in 2008. The Committee observed that although the commercial sexual exploitation of persons under 18 is prohibited by law, it remained an issue of serious concern in practice. The Committee accordingly urges the Government to take comprehensive measures, including within the framework of the National Plan for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour (2009-14), to combat this worst form of child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on the concrete results achieved in combating the commercial sexual exploitation of children.

Article 7(1) of the Convention and Part V of the report form. Penalties and the application of the Convention in practice.

1. Trafficking. The Committee noted the information in the Government's report that the Division on the Suppression of Offences against Children, Youth and Women undertook the collection and management of basic data. The Committee also noted the information in the Government's report that interviews conducted by the police to determine whether foreign children were victims of trafficking revealed 112 suspected child victims of this worst form of child labour. However, the Committee observed that the trafficking of children remained a much broader phenomenon, noting the information in the UNODC Report that between October 2006 and December 2007, 416 child victims of trafficking were detected. Moreover, the Committee noted an absence of information on the number of persons investigated and prosecuted as a result of the identification of child victims of trafficking. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of persons who traffic in children for the purpose of labour or sexual exploitation are carried out. It requests the Government to provide information on the number of infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied in this regard, as well as any additional information from the Division on the Suppression of Offences against Children, Youth and Women on the prevalence of the trafficking of children. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by sex and age.

2. Commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee noted the information in the Government's report from the Division on the Suppression of Offences against Children, Youth and Women that in 2006 two child victims of commercial sexual exploitation were reported, in addition to two offenders. The Government also indicated that there were no reported victims or offenders in 2007, and that in 2008, 23 child victims and 16 offenders were recorded. The Committee observed an absence of information on the penalties applied to these offenders, and observed that these figures appear to represent only a fraction of the number of children engaged in prostitution (with previous Government estimates indicating that tens of thousands of persons under 18 are victims of this worst form of child labour). In this regard, the Committee noted the information in the ILO-IPEC TPR 2010 that, within the framework of the ILO Project "Support for national action to combat child labour and its worst forms in Thailand", a study had been conducted (by the Khon Kaen University) on the commercial sexual exploitation of children in three provinces in the Northeast of Thailand including Nong Khai, Udon Thani and Khon Kaen (which are major source areas for girls and women in prostitution within Thailand). The Committee requests the Government to provide information from the study conducted on the commercial sexual exploitation of children in Nong Khai, Udon Thani and Khon Kaen, with its next report. It also strongly urges the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that persons who engage in the use, procuring or offering of persons under 18 for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation are prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are applied in practice. In this respect, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied with regard to the commercial sexual exploitation of persons under 18 years.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Providing the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour, and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Child victims of trafficking. 1. Services for child victims of trafficking. The Committee previously noted the various measures adopted by the MSDHS to assist child victims of trafficking, and noted that 3,062 foreign trafficking victims had been protected in Thai shelters and repatriated to their home countries.

The Committee noted the information in the Government's report that the specific policies to combat trafficking announced include measures to protect victims, such as the provision of assistance to those at risk of trafficking, the establishment of a fund to assist victims of trafficking and campaigns to eliminate discriminatory attitudes against victims of trafficking to facilitate their reintegration into communities. The Committee also noted the Government's statement that the Baan Kred Trakarn Protection and Occupational Development Centre was established, and a learning centre was developed as part of its holistic assistance to victims of trafficking. Services provided to trafficked women and children through these centres included the provision of basic necessities, education, vocational training and assistance with psychological recovery. The Government also indicated that the four Protection and Development Centres in Ranong, Pratumthani, Songkhla and Chaing Rai provide assistance, protection and rehabilitation services to victims. The Government further indicated that the Division on the Suppression of Offences against Children, Youth and Women coordinated with agencies involved in the rehabilitation and repatriation of trafficking victims. Lastly, the Committee noted the information in the Government's report that the National Policy and Plan for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour (2009–14) included measures to integrate children back into society by preparing their families and communities for their return, to repatriate children in a manner consistent with their needs and safety, and to follow-up on their reintegration, following rehabilitation. The Committee takes due note of the measures implemented by the Government, and requests it to pursue its efforts to provide direct assistance to child victims of trafficking, with a view to ensuring that victims of trafficking under the age of 18 receive appropriate services for their rehabilitation and social reintegration with child participation.

2. Measures aimed at securing compensation for victims of trafficking. The Committee previously noted that the Government had taken a number of measures aimed at securing justice and compensation for victims of trafficking, including children. It noted that the Prevention and Suppression of Human Trafficking Act provides for the possibility for victims of trafficking to claim compensation from the offenders and the provision of funds amounting to 500 million baht for their rehabilitation, occupational training and development. The Government also indicated that the Accused Act, BE 2544 (2001) states that children who are deceived into trafficking, prostitution, or forced labour, shall receive compensation.

The Committee noted the Government's statement that it was in the process of collecting information from relevant agencies on this point. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the number of former child victims of trafficking who have received compensation either from the offenders or through funds set up by the Government under the Accused Act BE 2544 (2001) or the Prevention and Suppression of Human Trafficking Act.

Article 8. International cooperation and assistance. Regional cooperation and bilateral agreements. The Committee previously noted several measures taken by the Government to combat trafficking at the regional level, including meetings of the Coordinated Mekong Ministerial Initiative against Trafficking (COMMIT). The Committee requested information on measures taken in this regard and on the concrete measures adopted under bilateral MOUs for the elimination of the interstate trafficking of children.

The Committee noted the statement in the Government's report that, pursuant to the MOU of the COMMIT signed in 2004, and following the review of the first Subregional Plan of Action (2005–07), member countries endorsed the Subregional Plan of Action for 2008–10. This subregional action plan focused on several particular areas, including training and capacity building, multi-sectoral and bilateral partnerships, re-enforcing legal frameworks, law enforcement, victim identification, protection and reintegration and cooperation with the tourism sector. The Committee also noted the information in the Government's report that the Government had signed an agreement with the Government of Viet Nam on bilateral cooperation for eliminating trafficking in persons on 24 March 2008, and that pursuant to this agreement, the two Governments had developed an Action Plan for 2008–09. The Committee further noted that, pursuant to MOUs to combat human trafficking with the governments of Cambodia (signed in 2003) and Laos (signed in 2005), cooperation projects had been formulated and some measures implemented, including a workshop on human trafficking for Laos–Thai border officials. The Government also indicated that it was in the process of initiating similar bilateral MOUs with the Governments of Myanmar, China and Japan. The Government further indicated that within the framework of the TICW II Project, technical assistance and support was provided for combating trafficking efforts related to the MOUs between Thailand and its neighbouring countries. Noting that cross-border trafficking remains an issue of concern in practice, the Committee urges the Government to pursue its international cooperation efforts with regard to combating the trafficking of persons under 18. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the concrete measures implemented in this regard, and on the results achieved.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Togo

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1984)

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Government is currently participating in a project to combat child labour through education implemented with the support of ILO–IPEC (the ILO–IPEC–CECLET project). It noted that various action programmes have been adopted in the context of this project.

The Committee notes that, in the context of the ILO–IPEC–CECLET project, a national survey on child labour in Togo (ENTE) was carried out and completed in 2010. The results of this study reveal that around six out of ten children (58.1 per cent) aged between 5 and 17 years, or approximately 1,177,341 children, are economically active at the national level. The ENTE also indicates that the incidence of children aged 5 to 14 years engaged in work that is to be abolished – meaning the performance by a child of prohibited work and, more generally, of types of work that should be eliminated as they are considered socially and morally undesirable by national law, including the provisions giving effect to the Convention – is 54.9 per cent, or approximately 894,360 children out of the 1,629,072 children aged 5 to 14 years in Togo. The results show that children aged 5 to 14 years generally work more in sectors such as agriculture (52.2 per cent) and domestic work (26.3 per cent) and others.

In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the ILO–IPEC–CECLET project resulted in 12,279 children aged 8–15 years being prevented from entering or being removed from the worst forms of child labour particularly in the informal economy and the agricultural sector. The Committee also notes that, in the context of this project, a national action plan (PAN) against child labour is being developed, the key strategies of which will be awareness raising; the strengthening of educational alternatives; the enforcement of the legislation; increasing knowledge about child labour; the development of direct action programmes for prevention and rehabilitation; and the improvement and coordination of action, monitoring and supervision.

The Committee takes due note of the efforts made by the Government to combat child labour in Togo. The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to combat child labour, affording particular attention to children engaged in agriculture and the informal economy. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of children between the ages of 5–14 years who are prevented from prematurely entering the labour market and on the number of children removed from work in the context of the ILO–IPEC–CECLET project. Lastly, it requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in the development of the PAN and to provide a copy when it has been approved.

Article 2(1). Scope of application. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 150 of the Labour Code of 2006 provides that children under 15 years cannot be employed in any enterprise or perform any type of work, even on their own account. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to strengthen the capacities of the labour inspection services with a view to ensuring that children who work on their own account or in the informal economy benefit from the protection of the Labour Code of 2006.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that labour inspectors often benefit from training with a view to strengthening their capacities. The Committee therefore notes with interest that, to strengthen the action of the labour inspection services, particularly in relation to the supervision of the working conditions of children of working age, a number of measures have been adopted: (i) progressively increasing the number of inspectors through an active training policy in the National School of Administration; (ii) strengthening the network of areas covered, particularly by creating a regional labour directorate in each economic region and ten prefectural inspection services in densely populated areas, as well as creating new inspection areas in Lomé; and (iii) progressively allocating high-quality human resources to the inspection services. The Government also indicates that it envisages establishing, with the technical and financial support of the ILO, an information system on the activities of the labour inspection services to raise the visibility of the actions to be carried out to ensure compliance with the law. The Committee also notes that, according to information available to ILO–IPEC, actions have been carried out in the context of the ILO/IPEC/CECLET project with a view to strengthening labour inspection. These include 24 observation and monitoring missions led by 12 inspectors between 1 October 2001 and 31 March 2012 in the agricultural sector, the informal urban economy, restaurants and sand carriers, during which 293 children (121 girls and 172 boys) were detected. Taking due note of the efforts made by the Government, the Committee requests it to continue providing information on the measures taken to strengthen the capacities of the labour inspection services to ensure that all children under 15 years of age, including those who work on their own account or in the informal economy, benefit from the protection afforded by the Convention, and on the results achieved.

Article 3(3). Admission to hazardous work from the age of 16 years. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that certain provisions of Order No. 1464/MTEFP/DGTLS of 12 November 2007 authorize the employment of children from the age of 16 years on work likely to harm their health, safety or morals. The Committee also noted that section 12 authorizes children over 15 years of age to carry, drag or push loads of a weight of up to 140 kilograms for boys of 15 years of age employed in transport by wheelbarrow. The Committee also observed that there was no protection measure relating to the performance of these types of work. The Committee reminded the Government that under Article 3(3) of the Convention, national laws or regulations may, after consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, authorize the performance of hazardous types of work by adolescents from 16 years of age, on condition that their health, safety and morals are fully protected and that they have received adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that it takes into account its concern and undertakes to take the necessary measures to review Order No. 1464 to bring it into conformity with the provisions of the Convention, in consultation with the social partners in the near future. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in reviewing Order No. 1464 with a view to bringing it into conformity with the requirements of Article 3(3) of the Convention. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the Order, once it has been revised.

Article 6. Apprenticeships. The Committee notes that, within the context of the ILO-IPEC-CECLET project, a draft code on apprenticeship has been prepared, which sets out in detail the conditions which must be respected by an apprenticeship contract and under which such a contract cannot start before the completion of compulsory schooling and, in any case, not before 15 years of age. Hoping that the draft code on apprenticeship will be adopted in the near future, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in that respect.

Article 8. Artistic performances. The Committee previously noted that, under section 150 of the Labour Code of 2006, the minimum age for admission to employment or work is set at 15 years, unless derogations are envisaged by order of the minister responsible for labour. It noted the Government's indication that, in accordance with section 150 of the Labour Code, an order derogating from the minimum age for admission to employment has been prepared and is awaiting approval by the National Council for Labour and Labour Laws, the members of which include employers' and workers' organizations.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that a draft order has been submitted for approval by the National Council for Labour and Labour Laws. The draft order provides that, outside school hours and in the interest of art, science or education, the labour inspector may grant individual permits to children under 15 years of age to allow them to appear in public performances and to participate as actors or extras in films. The Government indicates that these derogations will be granted after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned and will specify the number of hours of work authorized, and the working conditions. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in the adoption of this draft order and to provide a copy of it, once it has been adopted. It also requests the Government to provide information on the granting of such individual permits in practice, once the draft order has been adopted.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee noted the communication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 24 August 2010 and the Government's report. It also noted the adoption of Act No. 2006-010 of 13 December 2006, issuing the Labour Code (the Labour Code of 2006), which repeals the Labour Code of 8 May 1974, and the adoption of Act No. 2007-017 of 6 July 2007 issuing the Children's Code (the Children's Code of 2007).

Article 3 of the Convention. The worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that there was no provision in the current legislation prohibiting this worst form of child labour. It noted that Togo had prepared on 23 January 2003 a preliminary draft of a Bill to define the trafficking of children, which was awaiting adoption by the Council of Ministers, and that a draft Children's Code had been forwarded to Parliament in 2002.

The Committee noted with satisfaction the adoption of Act No. 2005-009 on the trafficking of children of 3 August 2005 (the Act on the trafficking of children). It observed that, by virtue of section 3 of this Act, the term "trafficking" is defined as the process by which any child is recruited or abducted, transported, accommodated or hosted, both within and outside the national territory, by one or more persons, for the purposes of her or his exploitation. Under the terms of section 2, the term "child" is defined as any person under the age of 18 years. The Committee also noted that those who engage in or are accomplices to the trafficking of children are liable to a sentence of imprisonment of five years (section 10) and that the penalty is doubled in cases where acts of the trafficking of children result in the death or disappearance of the victim (section 11). Section 11 also envisages the existence of aggravating circumstances which may result in the person committing the offence serving a penal sentence of ten years of imprisonment. This is the case, among others, where the victim of the trafficking is under 15 years of age at the time of the offence or where the child has been subjected to the worst forms of child labour. The Committee also noted that, under the terms of section 264(a) of the Children's Code of 2007, the sale and trafficking of children are considered to be one of the worst forms of child labour.

However, the Committee noted the allegations made by the ITUC to the effect that internal and international trafficking of children for domestic work exists in Togo. The internal trafficking affects children from poor and rural communities who are directed towards domestic work in towns, and particularly Lomé, or in fertile agricultural regions. Trans-border trafficking takes place, both from and towards Togo, from Nigeria, Gabon, Côte d'Ivoire, Burkina Faso, Niger, Benin and Ghana.

The Committee further noted the findings of the qualitative survey of the worst forms of child labour undertaken in 2009-10 by the General Directorate of Statistics and Accounting among 2,500 households in four economic regions of the country (Maritime, Plateau, Centrale and Lomé), which are appended to the Government's report. It observed that, according to the report of the discussion by the central region group, girls who are victims of trafficking are used for prostitution and domestic work, while boys are used as manual workers in plantations and quarries. The Committee noted the information provided in the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) Global Report on Trafficking in Persons of February 2009, indicating that, according to the Ministry of Labour of Togo, 1,758 victims of trafficking were identified in 2003 and 1,301 in 2004, most of whom were children. It noted that, according to the report, the number of investigations for trafficking in persons fell from 21 in 2005 (the year of the adoption of the Act on the trafficking of children) to nine in 2007. It observed that, of the nine persons investigated in 2007, six men were convicted of trafficking in persons, one for trafficking for sexual exploitation and the five others for trafficking for the purpose of slavery. The sentences received by these persons did not however exceed one year of imprisonment. The Committee also observed that, according to the indications contained in the report entitled "Trafficking in Persons Report 2010 – Togo" published on the website of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, certain traffickers appear to obtain their release through the corruption of state officials. While taking due note of the measures adopted by the Government to combat the trafficking of children, the Committee expressed concern at the fall in the number of investigations conducted following the adoption of the Act on child trafficking, and with regard to the allegations of corruption from which certain traffickers benefit to evade justice. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of persons engaged in the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years of age are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice. It requests the Government to provide information on the number of investigations conducted, prosecutions carried out and convictions obtained under Act No. 2005-009 on the trafficking of children.

Clauses (a) and (d). Forced or compulsory labour and hazardous types of work. Child domestic work. The Committee noted the ITUC's communication reporting conditions of work which are hazardous and/or similar to forced labour encountered by many children engaged as domestic workers. According to the ITUC's allegations, there are thousands of child domestic workers in Togo, the large majority of whom are girls from poor and rural areas of the country, and who perform various potentially hazardous household tasks in private homes and may also be called upon to sell products in the street or in markets on behalf of their employers. These children work very long days (ten hours or more), frequently have no rest days and receive no or very little remuneration. They live in the house of their employers, are dependent upon the latter, and are isolated from their families, which makes them vulnerable to abuse and forced labour. Child domestic workers are also regularly subjected to verbal and physical violence and to sexual abuse, and are often deprived of education opportunities. The ITUC's communication also refers to a survey carried out in Togo between 2007 and 2008 of 61 girl domestic workers, which shows that the average age at which they enter into domestic service is nine.

The Committee noted that section 151(1) of the 2006 Labour Code prohibits forced labour, which is defined as one of the worst forms of child labour. It further noted that, in accordance with Order No. 1464/MTEFP/DGTLIS of 12 November 2007 (Order No. 1464) determining the types of work prohibited for children, domestic work is considered to be a hazardous type of work prohibited for children under 18 years of age.

The Committee observed that, although the national legislation is in conformity with the Convention on this point, child domestic work performed under conditions similar to forced labour or under hazardous conditions remains a concern in practice. It reminded the Government that, under the terms of Article 3(a) and (d) of the Convention, work or employment of children under 18 years of age under conditions similar to slavery or under hazardous conditions are some of the worst forms of child labour and that, by virtue of Article 1 of the Convention, immediate and effective measures shall be taken to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that children under 18 years of age engaged in domestic work under conditions similar to slavery or under hazardous conditions benefit from the protection afforded by the national legislation. In this respect, it requests the Government to provide information on the application of the provisions respecting this worst form of child labour, including statistics on the number and nature of the violations reported, investigations conducted, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by sex and age.

Article 6. Programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. Trafficking of children and child domestic work. The Committee noted the conclusions of the ITUC which recommends, inter alia, the implementation of measures to assist children engaged in domestic work to leave their work and to facilitate their rehabilitation. The Committee noted the information provided in the Government's report indicating that, in the context of the ILO-IPEC project to combat child labour through education, two workshops were organized in June 2009 with a view to the preparation of a plan of action on the trafficking of children and a plan of action to combat domestic work. According to the technical progress report of the project of September 2010, these sectoral action plans would have been adopted in December 2009. The Committee also noted that, in the context of this ILO-IPEC project, 126 children were prevented from entering domestic work and 22 were removed from this worst form of child labour between March and August 2010. All of them benefited from rehabilitation measures through education services. The Committee further noted that between June and September 2010, workshops were conducted for the training of labour inspectors on the issue of child domestic work. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken and the results achieved in the context of the plan of action on the trafficking of children and the plan of action to combat domestic work in terms of the identification, removal and reintegration of children under 18 years of age. It requests the Government to provide copies of these plans of action.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Removing children from the worst forms of child labour and providing for their rehabilitation and social integration. Sale and trafficking of children. 1. National Commission for the Shelter and Social Reintegration of Child Victims of Trafficking. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indications that a National Commission for the Shelter and Social Reintegration of Child Victims of Trafficking (CNARSEVT) was established in April 2002. The responsibilities of the CNARSEVT include: (i) organizing the repatriation to Togo of child victims of trafficking identified at the borders and in the various destination countries; (ii) coordinating the shelter and care (accommodation and health care) of repatriated child victims of trafficking; (iii) supervising the family and social reintegration of repatriated child victims of trafficking; (iv) centralizing information and statistical data on child victims of trafficking, sheltered and reintegrated at the national level; and (v) mobilizing the necessary resources for the repatriation, shelter and social reintegration of child victims of trafficking. The CNARSEVT has regional committees to discharge its functions. The Committee requests the Government to provide additional information on the activities of the CNARSEVT, including extracts of reports or documents, as well as the results achieved in terms of the number of child victims of trafficking who are repatriated, cared for and reintegrated.

2. Measures adopted in the context of various ILO-IPEC projects. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indications that, in the context of the implementation of the ILO-IPEC-LUTRENA project, the direct action taken for children and their families between 2001 and 2007 resulted in the removal of 4,038 children from trafficking and the reintegration in the school system of 173 children removed from this worst form of child labour. The Committee also noted the information contained in the Government's report indicating that four transitional shelter centres for children removed from trafficking have been established, that a system to shelter and refer children removed from trafficking has been created and that 165 vigilance committees have become operational in village communities. Furthermore, according to the technical progress report of September 2010 of the ILO-IPEC project to combat child labour through education, a total of 87 children, including 63 girls and 24 boys, were removed from trafficking between March and August 2010 and have benefited from educational services and training opportunities. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue to take immediate and effective measures to remove child victims of sale and trafficking and requests it to continue providing information on the number of children who are, in practice, removed from this worst form of child labour and placed in transitory shelter centres.

Article 8. International cooperation and assistance. Regional cooperation in relation to the sale and trafficking of children. Further to its previous comments, the Committee noted the information provided by the Government in its report indicating that several multilateral agreements have been concluded with neighbouring countries in the context of the measures to combat the trafficking of children. The Committee noted that Togo signed the Cooperation Agreement between Member States' Police Forces on Investigation in Criminal Matters adopted in Accra in 2003 by the Member States of ECOWAS, the Multinational Cooperation Agreement to Combat Child Trafficking of Abidjan (2005) and the Abuja Multilateral Cooperation Agreement to Combat Trafficking in Persons, especially Women and Children (2006). It also noted that Togo has concluded a quadrilateral agreement with Benin, Ghana and Nigeria on border crime. It further noted the Government's indication that discussions are under way with Nigeria for the signature of a bilateral agreement to combat the trafficking of children. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts and to take measures to cooperate with countries that are signatories to the multilateral cooperation agreements referred to above, thereby strengthening security measures on frontiers, with a view to detecting and intercepting child victims of trafficking and apprehending and arresting persons involved in networks engaged in the trafficking of children. It also requests the Government to continue providing information on the progress made in the discussions for the adoption of a bilateral agreement with Nigeria.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Trinidad and Tobago

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2003)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee previously urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that legislation prohibiting the sale and trafficking of children under 18 was adopted.

The Committee notes that the Trafficking in Persons Act was adopted on 9 June 2011. The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 18 of the Trafficking in Persons Act prohibits the trafficking of children, specifically the recruiting, transporting, transferring or receiving of a child into Trinidad and Tobago or the harbouring of a child within the country for the purpose of exploitation. Section 18 of the Act also specifies that this offence carries a penalty of not less than 20 years imprisonment and a fine of US$1 million. Lastly, the Committee notes that section 3 of the Trafficking in Persons Act defines a child as a person below the age of 18 years.

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering a child for illicit activities. The Committee previously noted that section 46 of the draft Children Bill would prohibit the using, or causing a child to be used or to act as a courier to buy, sell, purvey or deliver drugs, and that section 47 of this Bill would prohibit these acts specifically in relation to the trafficking of drugs. Nonetheless, the Committee noted that the Children Bill was no longer under discussion by Parliament.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Children Bill is currently being reviewed. The Committee, therefore, urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the Children Bill is reviewed and subsequently adopted, to prohibit the use procuring or offering of children under 18 years of age for the production and trafficking of drugs. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the Children Bill, once adopted.

Articles 3(d) and 4(1). Determination of hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that the Factory Inspectorate Unit of the Ministry of Labour and Small and Micro Enterprise Development was developing a list of occupations deemed hazardous to children, based on guidelines provided by a National Seminar on Hazardous Occupations and Children, held in 2004.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that, while a list of hazardous occupations is not yet available, work has begun to create such a list. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that a governmental delegation attended the ILO Subregional Workshop on the Elimination of Hazardous Child Labour for Select Caribbean Countries in October 2011. It notes the Government's statement in its report submitted under the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), that the report of this delegation will contain recommendations to assist in the development of a list of occupations deemed hazardous. Recalling that, pursuant to Article 1 of the Convention, each Member that ratifies the Convention shall take immediate measures to secure the prohibition of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency, and noting that work on the list of occupations deemed hazardous to children has been ongoing since 2004, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of this list in the very near future, following consultation with the social partners. It requests the Government to provide a copy of this list once it has been adopted.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Uganda

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee took note of the report of the Technical Advisory Mission (the Mission) on Child Labour Issues that was carried out in Uganda in July 2009.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. 1. Abductions and the exaction of forced labour. The Committee had previously noted that article 25:1 of the Constitution of Uganda stipulates that no person shall be held in slavery or servitude and that section 25:2 states that no person shall be required to perform forced labour. It had noted that the Penal Code punishes as offences abduction (section 126); detention with sexual intent (section 134); and abduction for the purpose of reducing to slavery (section 245). Moreover, section 5 of the Employment Act of 2006 states that anyone who uses or assists any other person in using forced or compulsory labour commits an offence. Finally, section 252 of the Penal Code provides that any person who unlawfully compels any other to labour against their will commits a misdemeanour.

However, in its previous comments under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), the Committee had noted that the armed group Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) abducted children of both sexes, forcing them to provide work and services as concubines, these alleged activities being associated with the killings, beatings and rape of these children. The Committee had noted that, according to the report of the United Nations Secretary-General on children and armed conflict in Uganda of 7 May 2007 (Secretary-General's report of 2007) (S/2007/260, paragraph 10), the figures from 2005 suggested that as many as 25,000 children may have been abducted since the onset of the conflict in northern Uganda in Kitgum and Gulu districts. However, the total number of abductions had significantly reduced since its peak in 2004. The total number of abductions in January 2005 was estimated to be approximately 1,500, significantly reducing to 222 over the first six months of 2006. Since September 2006, there had been no confirmed reports on the abduction of children in Uganda by the LRA. Moreover, the peace talks between the Government of Uganda and the LRA had officially opened on 14 July 2006 and the parties had signed a formal cessation of hostilities agreement in August 2006, which was extended until 30 June 2007. It was initially expected that the prospects of the signing of a peace agreement would mean a potentially significant increase in the number of children released by the LRA. However, despite repeated pleas by various stakeholders, the LRA had not released children from its ranks.

The Committee noted that, in its concluding observations for the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the involvement of children in armed conflict of 17 October 2008, the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed concern over continued abductions of children living in border regions by the LRA, to be used as child soldiers, sex slaves, spies and to carry goods and weapons (CRC/C/OPAC/UGA/CO/1, paragraph 24). The Committee on the Rights of the Child was further concerned over the inhuman and degrading treatment of the abducted children. Moreover, the Committee noted that, according to the report of the Secretary-General on children and armed conflict in Uganda of 15 September 2009 (Secretary-General's report of 2009), the LRA has not knowingly operated in Ugandan territory since the cessation of hostilities in August 2006. Over the past four years, however, the LRA, including a substantial but unknown number of Ugandan children associated with its forces, has increasingly moved into neighbouring countries to establish additional bases; and children and their communities in the Sudan, the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Central African Republic have been the victims of attacks that have claimed hundreds of lives and resulted in the disappearance of hundreds of children. In the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 233 abductions of children by the LRA were documented by child protection partners between 1 December 2008 and 30 June 2009. The Secretary-General further indicates that efforts to sign a Comprehensive Peace Agreement with the LRA failed and, as a result, the LRA has increasingly become a regional actor. Since December 2008, LRA elements, operating in small groups, reportedly conducted attacks against several localities in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, killing civilians, burning houses and abducting children and adults. In total, it is estimated that more than 1,000 civilians have been killed and several hundred abducted by the LRA since it increased its violent activities in 2008.

The Committee therefore once again expressed its deep concern at the situation of children abducted by the LRA and forced to provide work and services as informants, porters, hostages, as well as becoming victims of sexual exploitation and violence. It observed that, although national legislation appears to prohibit abductions and the exaction of forced labour, this remains a serious issue of concern in practice, in particular in the context of renewed violence and conflict. In this regard, the Committee once again recalled that, by virtue of Article 3(a) of the Convention, the exaction of forced labour from children is considered as one of the worst forms of child labour and that, by virtue of Article 1 of the Convention, member States are required to take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee strongly urges the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to eradicate abductions and the exaction of forced labour from children under 18 years, as a matter of urgency. In this regard, it requests the Government to take immediate measures to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of offenders are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions are imposed in practice. It also urges the Government to take measures to cooperate with the neighbouring countries and accordingly reinforce security measures, particularly on the common borders with the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Central African Republic and Sudan, with a view to bringing an end to this worst form of child labour.

2. Compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. The Committee had previously noted that, according to the Secretary-General's report of 2007 (paragraph 5), Uganda is among the countries where parties to armed conflicts – the Ugandan People Defence Force (UPDF), the local defence units and the LRA – recruited or used children and were responsible for other grave violations. According to this report, it was estimated that, notwithstanding various peace agreements, up to 2,000 women and children may still have been held by the LRA within its ranks and had not been released. Regarding children recruited by the national military forces, the Secretary-General's report of 2007 indicated that the UPDF recruited young boys to serve in its armed forces, especially within the local defence units, which are UPDF auxiliary forces. The report of 2007 also indicated that during recruitment, age verification was rarely carried out. After training, many of these children were said to be fighting alongside the UPDF. Although the Government of Uganda incorporated, in 2005, in the Uganda People's Defence Forces Act, a provision prohibiting the recruitment and use of child soldiers, the lack of effective monitoring at the local level led to children continuing to join some elements of the armed forces. However, according to the Secretary-General's report of 2007, the Government had committed itself to strengthening the implementation of the existing legal and policy frameworks on the recruitment and use of children in armed conflict. Moreover, in December 2006, the UPDF agreed to undertake inspection and monitoring, including to verify age during the recruitment process. Furthermore, the Uganda Task Force on Monitoring and Reporting (UTF) had committed itself to working with the UPDF and the local defence units to ensure immediate and appropriate follow-up to remove any person under 18 years of age found within the UPDF and local defence units, including through referral to appropriate child protection agencies.

The Committee noted that, according to the Secretary-General's report of 2009 (paragraphs 3–7), on 16 January 2009, the Government of Uganda and the UTF signed an action plan regarding children associated with armed forces in Uganda, which obligates the Government to prevent and end the association of children under the age of 18 with armed auxiliary forces; appoint focal points at the highest level of the Government on the implementation of the action plan; provide access on a regular and ad hoc basis to the UPDF and auxiliary facilities to the UTF to monitor and verify compliance; and promptly investigate allegations of recruitment and use of children and ensure the prosecution of perpetrators. Furthermore, the action plan identifies time-bound activities relating to children associated with the armed forces in Uganda. Among others, the measures include verification visits to all UPDF facilities and regular access to all relevant UPDF units by the UTF. In compliance with the action plan, the Government of Uganda and the UTF agreed upon a series of visits by the UTF to UPDF facilities in northern Uganda in early 2009, with a view to verifying that no persons under the age of 18 were present within, or recruited into, its ranks.

The Committee noted with satisfaction that no case of recruitment or use of children by the UPDF or its auxiliary forces has come to the attention of the UTF. Throughout its visits, the UPDF extended excellent cooperation to the verification team. Furthermore, the UTF observed the UPDF recruitment process in the northern districts of Uganda from 12 to 14 February 2009. It was noted that age requirements for recruitment into the UPDF, as set forth in existing laws and regulations, were strictly observed and followed by UPDF officers in compliance with the UPDF internal circular of February 2009 containing instructions on recruitment criteria. The Committee noted that, according to the Secretary-General's report of 2009, the UTF will nevertheless continue to monitor compliance of the UPDF within the action plan framework to ensure that continuous efforts are made to prevent the recruitment and use of children and that the implementation of the action plan continues.

However, the Committee noted that the LRA, whose leadership originates in Uganda and a significant number of whose forces are also from Uganda, remains listed on the Secretary-General's annexes to his reports on children and armed conflict because of the continued practice of recruitment of children within its ranks. Although LRA violations against children were originally reported solely under Uganda country situation reporting, the geostrategic situation of that group, which is expanding its armed activities to the wider region, has prompted the request of a strategy for increased regional joint capability to monitor and report on cross-border recruitment and use of children by the LRA. The UTF has therefore been engaged in consultations with the Resident Coordinator of the United Nations Country Team in Uganda, the United Nations Children's Fund headquarters and regional offices, the Department of Peacekeeping Operations missions in Sudan and the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict, on appropriate steps to establish a subregional strategy to monitor and report on grave child rights violations committed by the LRA in the region.

The Committee welcomed the measures taken by the Government and the positive results it has registered with regard to the UPDF. However, it expressed its concern at the situation of children who continue to be recruited for armed conflict by the LRA. The Committee refers to the Secretary-General's call upon the Government of Uganda to prioritize the protection of children in its military actions against LRA elements, either on Ugandan territory or in joint operations in neighbouring countries (S/2009/462, 15 September 2009, paragraph 28). The Committee therefore urges the Government to intensify its efforts to improve the situation and to take, as a matter of urgency, immediate and effective measures to put a stop in practice to the forced recruitment of children under 18 years of age by the LRA. In this regard, it urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that a strategy for increased regional joint capability to monitor and report on cross-border recruitment and use of children by the LRA is adopted as soon as possible. It also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that persons who forcibly recruit children under 18 years for use in armed conflict are prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Providing the necessary and appropriate assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Children who have been affected by armed conflict. The Committee had previously noted that the orphans and vulnerable children policy includes interventions to mitigate the impact of the conflict on vulnerable children, especially by providing them with psychological support and with health-care services. It had also noted that a number of measures had been taken in order to rehabilitate children affected by conflict: (a) the psychological support programme for the care of children in conflict areas; (b) the creation of the National Core Group for Psychological Support, responsible for advocacy against abduction and conflict-related child abuse; and (c) the project implemented by Save the Children from Denmark and Sweden, in collaboration with the UPDF and Gulu Support Children Organization (GUSCO) with the aim of training officers in the UPDF's Child Protection Unit and promoting the observance of rights of children affected by armed conflict. Moreover, according to the Secretary-General's report of 2007 (paragraph 62), interim care centres, known as reception centres, were established in the north of Uganda in order to receive formerly abducted children, including those referred by the UPDF Child Protection Unit.

The Committee noted that, according to the mission report, the Ministry of Education and Sports (MoES) made interventions for child victims of armed conflict, as well as abducted children, and specialized schools have been built in the north of the country to give support and rehabilitate these children. Indeed, the Committee noted that, according to the report on Education Needs Assessment for Northern Uganda of February 2008 (ENA report) prepared by the Education Planning Department, the MoES has, among other things, provided psychosocial back-up support by training 50 trainers in psychosocial training, helped with the demobilization of 53 child soldiers, supported eight reception centres for former child abductees. The MoES has also constructed 27 learning centres with 114 classrooms in Kitgum, Pader and Lira for 6,000 displaced primary school children, as well as a primary boarding school at Laroo in Gulu with a capacity for 1,000 pupils. Furthermore, the ENA report indicates that many education provider organizations have contributed to the interventions of the MoES with a view to provide an interim response to the needs of northern Uganda in terms of education. The Committee also noted that, according to the Secretary-General's report of 2009, the action plan regarding children associated with armed forces in Uganda signed by the Government of Uganda and the UTF on 16 January 2009 covers different areas of activities, including preventing the recruitment of children under 18 years for use in armed conflict and releasing and reintegrating underage recruits. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts and take effective and time-bound measures to remove children from armed conflict and ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide information on the number of children under 18 years of age who have been rehabilitated and reintegrated into their communities through these measures, in particular through the action of the MoES and through the activities undertaken under the action programme regarding children associated with armed forces in Uganda.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

United Arab Emirates

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1998)

Article 3(1) and (2) of the Convention. Minimum age for admission to, and determination of, hazardous work.

The Committee previously requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the promulgation of a ministerial order to determine the types of hazardous work prohibited for persons under 18 years of age.

The Committee notes the Government's information regarding the promulgation of Ministerial Order No. 803 of 2012, which amends Ministerial Order No. 1189 of 2010 relating to the rules and conditions governing the granting of work permits to young persons. The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 3 of this Order prohibits employers from engaging young persons under the age of 18 years in 31 types of hazardous work, including mineral extraction in mines and quarries, work in nightclubs and bars, work with explosives or dangerous machinery, welding of lead or silver and the slaughter of animals.

Article 6. Minimum age for admission to apprenticeship. The Committee previously observed that, according to section 42 of the Labour Code, the minimum age to enter into an apprenticeship contract (defined as the contract whereby the employer undertakes to provide the employee full vocational training) was 12 years. It also noted the Government's statement that the draft amended text of section 42 of the Labour Code provided 15 years as the minimum age for being accepted in training or vocational education, and observed that this text was going through the constitutional channels in the State.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the draft amendment to section 42 of the Labour Code is still under examination and awaiting approval by Parliament. The Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the draft amended section 42 is adopted in the very near future. It once again requests the Government to keep it informed of any progress in this regard, and to provide a text of the amended provision as soon as it has been adopted.

Articles 3 and 7(1) of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour and penalties. Clause (a). Slavery and practices similar to slavery. Sale and trafficking of children for commercial sexual exploitation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that section 346 of the Penal Code prohibits the trafficking of children, and section 363 prohibits abetting, enticing or inducing a male or a female to commit prostitution. By virtue of Federal Act No. 51 of 2006, anyone who traffics a boy or girl under 18 years of age is liable to life imprisonment, and section 1 of this Act prohibits human trafficking for the purpose of exploitation, and defines exploitation to include all forms of sexual exploitation and prostitution. However, the Committee noted that, in its concluding observations of 5 February 2010, the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women expressed its serious concern at the persistence of trafficking in women and girls into the UAE for the purposes of labour and sexual exploitation (CEDAW/C/ARE/CO/1, paragraph 28).

The Committee notes the Government's information that, according to the annual report of the National Committee to Combat Human Trafficking in the UAE (NCCHT) of 2012, 17 cases of human trafficking and 51 victims were reported. The Committee notes with interest that 111 perpetrators were convicted. Moreover, the Government indicates that four of the 17 cases of human trafficking involved six child victims in total, all of them between 14 and 17 years of age. In these cases, the perpetrators received sentences of imprisonment ranging from three to ten years, as well as deportation. The Committee therefore encourages the Government to continue its efforts to strengthen the capacity of law enforcement agencies in order to ensure that persons who traffic in children for the purpose of sexual exploitation are in practice prosecuted, and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of infringements reported, investigations, prosecution, convictions and penal sanctions applied for violations of the legal prohibition on the sale and trafficking of children for commercial sexual exploitation.

Articles 3(d) and 4(1). Hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the promulgation of a Ministerial Order to determine the types of hazardous work prohibited for persons under 18.

The Committee notes the Government's information regarding the promulgation of Ministerial Order No. 803 of 2012, which amends Ministerial Order No. 1189 of 2010 relating to the rules and conditions governing the granting of work permits to young persons. The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 3 of this Order prohibits employers from engaging young persons under the age of 18 years in 31 types of hazardous work, including mineral extraction in mines and quarries, work in nightclubs and bars, work with explosives or dangerous machinery, welding of lead or silver, and the slaughter of animals.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. National Committee to Combat Human Trafficking (NCCHT). In its previous comments, the Committee noted the indication in the Government's report that, following the adoption of Federal Law No. 15 of 2005, the Minister of Interior established the NCCHT. It noted that the NCCHT was presided over by the Under-Secretary of the Ministry of Justice, and included representatives of the Ministries of Interior, Foreign Affairs, Labour, Social Affairs, and the General Director of the Dubai Police, Zayed Corporation for Charity, and the Red Crescent. The Committee noted that the NCCHT meets frequently, and that during 2008–09 and 2010–11, it took numerous measures to address the problem of trafficking.

The Committee notes the Government's detailed information pertaining to the various measures that were adopted in 2011–12. Among these measures, the Committee notes the adoption of Ministerial Order No. 34 of 2011 relating to the organizational structure of the police directorates of El Sharqaa, Ras el Kheimah, 'Ajman, Om El Quwain, and El Fujairah, in which units to combat human trafficking crimes were created. Moreover, with a view to raising national awareness on crimes, the NCCHT has adopted a national strategy which envisages the convening of a number of awareness-raising events. In April 2011, for example, the first Gulf meeting to combat human trafficking crimes took place, in collaboration with the NCCHT, the Ministry of Justice, and the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, among others, and the participation of the representatives of the Gulf Cooperation Council. This meeting aimed at identifying perspectives for cooperation, exchanging experiences, and finding the best means of reducing the phenomenon, and showcased the national strategies of law enforcement bodies to combat human trafficking. In December 2011, a regional training workshop was held in Abu Dhabi, reviewing the modern forms of human trafficking and child sexual exploitation, in collaboration with the UN Training and Certification Centre in the area of human rights for South-West Asia and the Middle East. During this workshop, several issues relating to child trafficking and child exploitation and their use in the sex industry were discussed. While encouraging the Government to pursue its efforts to strengthen the capacity of law enforcement officials responsible for the monitoring of child trafficking, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the measures taken by the NCCHT and other institutions on the elimination of the trafficking of children under 18 years for labour or sexual exploitation.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour, and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Child victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation. The Committee previously noted the allegation of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that the authorities of the United Arab Emirates (UAE) made no distinction between prostitutes and victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation, all of whom bear equal criminal responsibility for involvement in prostitution. The ITUC pointed out that trafficked persons were consequently not treated as victims and were not supported or protected. The Committee noted the Government's statement in reply to the ITUC's allegations that it considers persons who are exposed to sexual exploitation as victims who need protection and support through guidance and rehabilitation programmes. Nonetheless, the Committee noted that, in her statement of 18 October 2009 following her visit to the UAE, the UN Special Rapporteur on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography noted that the age of criminal responsibility of 7 years of age was too low, and encouraged the Government to ensure that all persons who are sexually exploited be treated as victims and not as delinquents. The Committee noted the Government's information that, with respect to the criminal responsibility of minors, the penalties provided for by the Penal Code do not, in fact, apply to children aged 7 to 18 years. In their case, the penalties which are applicable are prescribed by Federal Act No. 9 of 1976 relating to delinquents and vagrants. Section 63 of this Act provides that "Any young person who has completed the age of seven years and not completed the age of sixteen years shall be prescribed the provisions contained in the Child Act." In this regard, the Government referred to the sentence handed down by the Upper Federal Court, No. 64/15 of 29 January 1994, which stated that if a young person between 7 and 16 years of age commits a crime as prescribed in the Penal Code or other penal laws, he/she shall be subject to one or more of the measures specified in section 15 of the Child Act. These measures include reprimands; mandatory vocational training; or placement in a place of treatment, rehabilitation centre, or a place of education or reformation. Moreover, the Committee noted the Government's statement that it had adopted a policy to handle the persons involved in trafficking crimes and to treat them as victims by providing them with all means of support and family, health and psychological care. Observing that section 63 of Federal Act No. 9 of 1976 only applies to children between 7 and 16 years of age, the Committee urged the Government to ensure that children between 16 and 18 years of age trafficked to the UAE for sexual exploitation are treated as victims rather than offenders.

The Committee notes the Government's information that a draft Child Protection Law is in the process of review and finalization. This draft law specifies that the State shall take the necessary measures to protect children's rights against sexual exploitation (including child pornography), their exploitation in organized crime, their economic exploitation, and their exposure to begging. The Government also indicates that the draft Child Protection Law introduces several amendments to the measures provided for by Federal Act No. 9 of 1976. The draft law specifies that the penalties which may be imposed by a court on a delinquent child – defined as a person who has not completed his or her 18th year of age – are reprimands, the handing of the child to the authorities, judicial testing, the obligation to perform specific duties, working in the public interest, or consigning to one of the care or rehabilitation institutions appropriate to the case. The draft Child Protection Law provides that child victims of trafficking shall be placed in care institutions.

In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's detailed information regarding the role of the sheltering centre set up to welcome and care for victims of trafficking and sexual exploitation, the main functions of which are rescue, care, rehabilitation, follow-up and prevention. Child victims, therefore, benefit from such services as psychological care, educational skills and leisure courses, and the eventual transfer to similar institutions in the victim's country of origin. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of all child victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation under 18 years of age, and to provide information on the results attained. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in adopting the draft Child Protection Law, and to provide detailed information on the application of its provisions to child victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation, once adopted.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted that the statement of the UN Special Rapporteur on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography had indicated that there was a lack of an information system for gathering data on the sale and trafficking of children and the commercial sexual exploitation of children, in addition to a lack of analysis, recording, sharing of information, and reporting in this regard. The Special Rapporteur noted that the Government recognized the need for such a system and that it was in the process of establishing one.

The Committee notes that, following her visit to the UAE in April 2012, the UN Special Rapporteur on trafficking in persons, especially women and children, drew attention, in her end-of-mission statement, to the lack of comprehensive statistical information on the prevalence rate, forms, trends and manifestation of human trafficking in the UAE. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's information that the Statistics and Security Analysis Centre has been established within the Federal Security Information Department of the Ministry of Interior, which is entrusted with the collection of all the information related to human trafficking crimes in the country, the follow-up on the development of crime detection, and the publication of security and statistical reports. The Committee once again urges the Government to pursue its efforts to establish a system to record and collect data on the number of children engaged in the worst forms of child labour and to report on child victims of crimes. It also once again requests the Government to provide any other information on the nature, extent and trends of the worst forms of child labour, in particular the sale and trafficking of children, studies and inquiries and statistical data on the number of children covered by the measures giving effect to the Convention. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by sex and age.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

United States

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 1999)

Articles 3(d) and 4(1) of the Convention. Hazardous work and determination of types of hazardous work. Hazardous work in agriculture from 16 years of age. The Committee previously noted that, as an exemption from section 213 of the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA), in agriculture, 16 is the minimum age under section 213(c)(1) and (2) of the FLSA for employment in occupations (outside family farms) that the Secretary of Labor finds and declares to be "particularly hazardous for the employment of children". The Committee therefore observed that section 213 of the FLSA authorizes children aged 16 and above to undertake, in the agricultural sector, occupations declared to be hazardous or detrimental to their health or well-being by the Secretary of Labor. In this regard, the Committee noted the Government's statement that the FLSA, which was developed through a process open to the participation of employers' and workers' representatives, does not authorize the Secretary of Labor to restrict young persons of 16 years and older from working in agriculture. The Government, referring to Paragraph 4 of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Recommendation, 1999 (No. 190), which allows ratifying countries to permit 16 and 17 year olds to engage in types of work referred to by Article 3(d) on the condition that the health, safety and morals of the children are fully protected, stated that Congress considered it is safe and appropriate for children from the age of 16 to perform work in the agricultural sector.

However, the Committee noted the allegation of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO) that a significant number of children under 18 years were employed in agriculture under dangerous conditions, including long hours and exposure to pesticides, with risk of serious injury. Nonetheless, the Committee observed that the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH) had issued recommendations for changing the existing Hazardous Orders (HOs) regarding child labour, and noted the Government's indication that it was evaluating an appropriate course of action regarding the NIOSH recommendations on agricultural HOs for youth employment.

The Committee takes due note that, based on the recommendations of the NIOSH, the Wage and Hour Division (WHD) of the Department of Labor (DOL) published a Final Rule on child labour provisions on 20 May 2010, which revised existing HOs to prohibit children under 18 from performing certain types of work, including: (i) working in poultry slaughtering and pressing plants; (ii) forestry services and timber tract management; (iii) operating balers and compacters designed for non-paper products; and (iv) operating wood chippers.

The Committee also notes the statement in the report of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), for the World Trade Organization General Council on the Trade Policies of the United States of 29 September and 1 October 2010, entitled “Internationally recognized core labour standards in the United States of America” that health and safety standards for child farm workers are severely lacking, and that from 2005 to 2008, at least 43 children died in work-related accidents in farms. In this regard, the Committee notes the statement in the document available on the website of the DOL entitled “Notice of proposed rulemaking to amend the child labor in agricultural regulations – Frequently asked questions” that “[c]hildren employed in agriculture are some of the most vulnerable workers in America. The fatality rate for young agricultural workers is four times greater than that of their peers employed in non-agricultural workplaces. Furthermore, the injuries suffered by young farm workers tend to be more severe than those suffered by non-agricultural workers. The current federal agricultural child labor rules were issued over 40 years ago and have never been updated or even revised”.

The Committee further notes the Government’s statement that it remains acutely aware of the need to fully protect young agricultural workers, including those between 16 and 18 years of age, and that it remains fully committed to continuing to ensure full compliance with the Convention, as informed by Recommendation No. 190. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that the outreach programmes on hazardous work of the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) prioritize employee education and awareness, focusing upon less experienced workers, such as 16 and 17 years old employees in agriculture.

The Committee notes the information in the Government’s report that the DOL had issued a Notice of Proposed Rulemaking in September 2011, containing proposals to revise the child labour agricultural HOs, as well as some non-agricultural HOs. The Government indicates that the proposal, if finalized, would adopt the remaining specific NIOSH recommendations on existing agricultural HOs, to increase the parity between agricultural and non-agricultural child labour prohibitions. This proposal would create an HO to prohibit the employment of persons under the age of 18 in occupations in farm product and raw materials wholesale trade industries such as work in country grain elevators, grain bins, silos, feed lots, feed yards, stockyards, livestock exchanges and livestock auctions. Additionally, this proposal includes several revisions to existing agricultural HOs, such as prohibiting hired farm workers under 16 years of age from: the planting, cultivating, topping, harvesting, baling, barning, and curing of tobacco; any work that falls within the Environmental Protection Agency classification of pesticide handler; occupations involving working inside a manure pit; work in the agricultural sector such as construction, wrecking and demolition and excavation; certain tasks involving working with or around animals; and operating all power-driven machines.

However, the Committee notes with serious concern that this proposed rule was subsequently withdrawn in April 2012. The Committee, therefore, strongly urges the Government to reconsider the withdrawal of the proposals contained in the Notice of Proposed Rulemaking of 2 September 2011, which would have increased the parity between agricultural and non-agricultural child labour prohibitions by prohibiting some tasks associated with agricultural work to children under 18 and strengthening the protection provided to children under 16 years working in agriculture. In this regard, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that young persons between 16 and 18 years of age working in agriculture are only permitted to perform work in accordance with the strict conditions set out in Paragraph 4 of Recommendation No. 190, namely that their health and safety is protected and that they receive adequate specific instruction or vocational training. It requests the Government to provide information on progress achieved in this respect, in its next report.

Article 4(3). Examination and periodical revision of the types of hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that the HOs determining the types of work prohibited to children under 18 were originally adopted in 1939 and 1960 for non-agricultural occupations and in 1970 for agricultural occupations. The Committee also noted that, pursuant to an inter-agency agreement between the WHD and the NIOSH, the NIOSH had issued several recommendations regarding revising the existing HOs to better protect children from particularly hazardous work. The Committee requested the Government to take immediate measures to ensure that the NIOSH’s recommendations for revising the existing HOs were pursued and that the amendments to the HOs were adopted pursuant to these recommendations.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Final Rule on child labour provisions published by the WHD in May 2010, based on the recommendations of the NIOSH, revised seven existing non-agricultural HOs to prohibit children under 18 from performing additional types of work, including: the tending, riding upon, working from, repairing, servicing, or disassembling an elevator, crane, derrick, manlift (including of truck- or equipment-mounted aerial platforms known as scissor lifts, boom-type mobile elevating work platforms, work assist vehicles, cherry pickers, basket hoists, and bucket trucks), hoist, or high-lift truck (including backhoes, front-end loaders, skid loaders, skid-steer loaders, bobcat loaders, and stacking trucks); cleaning power-driven meat processing equipment; operating power-driven hoists; and operating reciprocating saw and abrasive cutting disks.

Articles 5 and 7. Monitoring mechanisms and penalties. Hazardous work in agriculture. The Committee previously noted the AFL–CIO’s indication that an estimated 100,000 children suffer from agriculture-related injuries annually in the United States and that very few inspections take place in agriculture. The Committee also expressed its concern at the decreasing number of child labour investigations conducted in the agricultural sector. However, the Committee noted the Government’s indication that the WHD intended to hire additional wage and hour inspectors. The Committee urged the Government to take measures to ensure that the necessary monitoring mechanisms are in place so that all farms are inspected and monitored and provide information on the inspections carried out in this regard.

The Committee notes the information in the Government’s report that the WHD has hired more than 300 new investigators since the summer of 2009. The Government states that more than half of the WHD’s 1,000 investigators speak a language in addition to English, improving the Division’s capacity to reach some of the more vulnerable workers in the workforce with limited English proficiency. The Government indicates that with these added resources, WHD investigators have been able to conduct agricultural investigations on evenings and weekends, when children are most likely to be working in the fields. The Committee also notes the Government’s statement that the WHD is now able to issue steeper fines for child labour violations that cause the death or serious injury of any employee under 18 years of age. In this regard, the Committee notes with interest that the Final Rule on child labour provisions of 2010 amended the child labour civil money penalty to provide for up to US$50,000 for each violation that causes the death or serious injury of an employee under 18 years of age (which can be doubled if the violation is repeated or wilful). Prior to the 2008 amendment, the maximum civil money penalty that could be assessed for any child labour violation was US$11,000.

The Committee further notes the detailed information in the Government’s report regarding concluded cases in which child labour violations were found. The Government indicates that there were 887 such cases in 2009, 684 cases in 2010 and 720 cases in 2011. The total child labour civil monetary penalties assessed were US$4,031,564 in 2009, US$2,120,472 in 2010 and US$2,159,699 in 2011. Moreover, the Government indicates that the total number of minors found working in these cases (in violation of the FLSA) was 3,448 in 2009 (including 109 in the agricultural industry), 3,333 in 2010 (including 49 minors in the agricultural industry) and 1,873 in 2011 (including 29 minors in the agricultural industry). The Government states that although the number of minors found employed in agriculture in violation of the FLSA declined between 2009 and 2011 (from 109 minors in 2009 to 29 minors in 2011), the WHD’s enforcement hours in agriculture increased by approximately 8 per cent from 2009 to 2010 and by approximately 1.3 per cent from 2010 to 2011.

In addition, the Committee notes the Government’s statement that the WHD is engaging local communities, social service agencies and state migrant education consultants to provide an alternative to work for children whose parents are in the fields and to provide education on child safety. For example, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that, as a result of the extensive child labour law violations found during the 2009 blueberry harvest season, the WHD implemented the 2010 Blueberry Harvest Initiative. This Initiative constituted an enforcement programme which received considerable media coverage and contributed to employers taking steps to ensure that children were not working in the fields. Moreover, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that protecting children at work, including 16 and 17 years olds employed in agriculture, is an important aspect of OSHA’s mission, and that OSHA continues to target its enforcement efforts in areas where injuries and accidents are most serious, many of which involve young agricultural workers. The Government’s report indicates that OSHA participated in more than 300 outreach events in the first half of 2011 which focused on children under 18 years. The Government indicates that OSHA’s Heat Illness Prevention campaign (directed towards agricultural and construction workers) includes a special focus on outreach to new workers, like young agricultural employees, and that the Grain Handling Initiative, implemented by OSHA since 2008, significantly increased enforcement and inspection activities within this industry, to reduce accidents and fatalities, including for workers under 18 years of age. Taking due note of the measures taken, the Committee urges the Government to pursue its efforts to strengthen the capacity of the institutions responsible for the monitoring of child labour in agriculture, to protect child agricultural workers from hazardous work. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on measures taken in this regard, and on the results achieved.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Uzbekistan

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2008)

The Committee notes the Government’s reports dated 17 April, 4 June and 20 November 2012. The Committee also notes the communication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 31 August 2012, as well as the Government’s reply thereto dated 24 October 2012, and the communication of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) dated 22 October 2012. The Committee further notes the communication from the Council of the Federation of Trade Unions, dated 11 October 2012, as well as the communication of the Chamber of Commerce of Uzbekistan, dated 17 October 2012. In addition, the Committee takes note of the report of the ILO technical advisory mission that took place in Tashkent, Uzbekistan, from 2 to 5 May 2012.

Article 3(a) and (d) of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Forced or compulsory labour in cotton production and hazardous work. The Committee previously noted the various legal provisions in Uzbekistan which prohibit forced labour, including article 37 of the Constitution, section 7 of the Labour Code, and section 138 of the Criminal Code. It also noted that section 241 of the Labour Code prohibits the employment of persons under 18 years in hazardous work, and that the “list of occupations with unfavourable working conditions in which it is forbidden to employ persons under 18 years of age” prohibited children from watering and gathering cotton by hand. The Committee further noted the Government’s statement that the participation of children below 18 years of age in activities on a family farm is not an infringement of the Convention. The Government further indicated that the Association of Farmers of Uzbekistan, the Council of the Federation of Trade Unions and the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection had adopted, in May 2011, the “Joint Statement concerning the inadmissibility of using forced child labour in agricultural works”, which asserted that virtually all cotton was harvested by farm owners who had no interest in making extensive use of children for the harvesting of cotton.

However, the Committee also noted the assertion of the IOE that, despite the legislative framework against forced labour, school children (estimates ranging from half a million to 1.5 million school children) are forced by the Government to work in the national cotton harvest for up to three months each year. The Committee also noted the ITUC’s allegations that State-sponsored forced child labour continued to underpin Uzbekistan’s cotton industry. The ITUC stated that despite the Government’s claim that almost all of the cotton in Uzbekistan is produced on private farms, the reality is rigid state control of all aspects of the cotton industry, whereby the forced mobilization of children is organized and enforced by authorities. The ITUC referred to a 2010 study which found that the mobilization of children during the cotton harvest by the central Government was systematic, utilized the school system, and left little room for choice on the part of children, their parents, school authorities and even farmers. The ITUC further stated that approximately half of all cotton picked in Uzbekistan is the result of forced child labour, and that it is estimated that hundreds of thousands of children are forced out of school each year to pick cotton during school hours. The ITUC alleged that these children are required to work every day, even on weekends, and that the work involved is hazardous, involving carrying heavy loads, the application of pesticides and harsh weather conditions, with accidents reportedly resulting in injuries and deaths.

The Committee further noted the conclusions from several United Nations bodies regarding the practice of mobilizing school children for work in the cotton harvest. In this regard, it noted that the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights expressed its concern at the situation of school-age children obliged to participate in the cotton harvest instead of attending school during this period (24 January 2006, E/C.12/UZB/CO/1, paragraph 20), and that the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed concern at the serious health problems experienced by many school children as a result of this participation (2 June 2006, CRC/C/UZB/CO/2, paragraphs 64–65). Moreover, the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women expressed its concern regarding the educational consequences of girls and boys working during the cotton harvest season (26 January 2010, CEDAW/C/UZB/CO/4, paragraphs 30–31) and the UN Human Rights Committee stated that it remained concerned about reports that children are still employed and subjected to harsh working conditions, in particular for cotton harvesting (7 April 2010, CCPR/C/UZB/CO/3, paragraph 23).

In addition, the Committee noted the information from UNICEF concerning the cotton harvest of autumn 2011. UNICEF completed observation visits in 12 regions, finding that: (i) children aged 11–17 years old had been observed working full time in the cotton fields across the country; (ii) the mobilization of children had been organized by way of instructions passed through Khokimyats (local administration), whereby farmers are given quotas to meet and children are mobilized by means of the education system in order to help meet these quotas; (iii) in some instances, farmers had also made a private arrangement with schools to pick their cotton often in return for material resources or financial incentives for the school; (iv) children were predominantly supervised in the fields by teachers; (v) in over a third of the fields visited, children stated that they were not receiving the money themselves; (vi) quotas for the amount of cotton children were expected to pick generally ranged between 20 to 50 kilos per day; (vii) the overwhelming majority of children observed were working a full day in the field and as a result, were missing their regular classes; (viii) children worked long hours in extremely hot weather; (ix) pesticides were used on the cotton crop that children spent hours hand picking; (x) some children reported that they had not been allowed to seek medical attention even though they were sick; and (xi) that the only noticeable progress towards the eventual elimination of the use of children in cotton picking was observed in the Fergana region.

Additionally, the Committee noted that the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference (Conference Committee), in June 2011, echoed the deep concern expressed by United Nations bodies, the representative organizations of workers and employers and non-governmental organizations, about the systematic and persistent recourse to forced child labour in cotton production, involving an estimated 1 million children. The Conference Committee emphasized the seriousness of such violations of the Convention and urged the Government to take the necessary measures, as a matter of urgency, to ensure the effective implementation of national legislation prohibiting compulsory labour and hazardous work for children below the age of 18.

The Committee notes the statement of the IOE in its most recent comment that the Government is ignoring the issue of forced child labour in the country. The IOE states that the information and data available from national media and other organizations at the national and international levels indicate that the cotton harvest of 2012 does not differ, or slightly differs, from the previous one. The IOE states that, although the Uzbek Prime Minister issued an annual order in early August 2012 to ban the use of both forced and voluntary child labour during the 2012 cotton harvest, and despite the wide diffusion of the order in schools in the country, the extensive use of labour of teenagers and young persons was registered in all regions of the country following the disposition to formally commence the national cotton harvest.

The Committee also notes the comments of the ITUC that the forced mobilization of children by the State to pick cotton during the harvest is serious, systematic and continuous, and that this practice takes place year after year, despite the Government's denials. The ITUC indicates that during the autumn 2011 cotton harvest, children were forced to pick cotton by hand during term time, under threat of punishment, such as expulsion from school, in order to meet quotas set for each region by the central Government. The ITUC also states that independent monitors assessing the 2011 cotton harvest reported that in some more densely populated areas, such as Andijan, some schools took children out of school to pick cotton for 15 to 20 days, while others sent children to pick cotton after classes. However, the ITUC alleges that the situation was reported to be much worse in less densely populated regions, where children had to work for long hours. The ITUC reiterates that the participation of children in the annual cotton harvest is not a result of poverty or family need, but that this participation is organized and enforced by the authorities, channelled through local administration and directly benefits the Government. The ITUC reasserts that during the harvest, cotton quotas are set for each region, and that regional governors (Hokims) are appointed to ensure the delivery of these quotas. Such quotas are subdivided down through the hierarchy of state institutions, and the regional governor assigns schools quotas for harvesting cotton. Directors of schools and colleges face dismissal if their institution's cotton quota is not met, and parents have little choice but to allow their children to participate in the harvest. In addition, the ITUC indicates that conditions appear to be worse for students above the age of 16 who attend colleges, and that these children may be sent to work on remote farms for up to two and half months in extremely poor conditions.

The Committee notes the statement of the Chamber of Commerce of Uzbekistan that it does not consider the issue of forced child labour, or the practice of employing children for cotton picking, to be an issue in the country. The Committee also notes the statement of the Council of the Federation of Trade Unions in Uzbekistan that the Government's report is a genuine reflection of the measures taken by the Government to implement the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that a distinction should be made between legitimate child work and activities prohibited as one of the worst forms of child labour. The Government also indicates that the increased politicization of the alleged large-scale exploitation of the forced labour of children in the cotton harvest is a method of unfair competition in the global cotton market. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that the Government Order No. 82 of 26 March 2012 approved the Plan of additional measures for the implementation of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), and the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), 2012–13 (Plan on additional measures). Noting the copy of this Plan on additional measures submitted with the Government's report, the Committee observes that this Plan includes measures to maintain effective monitoring for the prevention of forcing children to work, measures to strengthen the monitoring of the attendance of pupils and steps to establish personal responsibility of heads of educational institutions concerning the full attendance and safety of pupils. The Government also states that pursuant to Letter No. 01-523 of the Ministry of Education dated 8 September 2012, the Ministry of Education of the Autonomous Republic of Karakalpakstan and the central education boards of Uzbek provinces and Tashkent were warned not to allow pupils in general education schools to be employed as cotton pickers. The Government also refers to the report of a non-governmental organization, wherein a person interviewed stated that the cotton harvest in the region of Khorzem this year was different from previous years, as children were not picking cotton but continued to attend school. The Government states that this difference was due to the ban on children picking cotton. However, the Committee observes that this report also contains several statements that children continue to be mobilized to work in the cotton harvest in other regions, particularly students in lyceum and colleges.

The Committee, therefore, observes that while several sources indicate that there may have been a decline in the number of children under the minimum age for admission to work who are compelled to work in the cotton harvest, children between 16 and 18 years of age who attend colleges continue to be forced to work during this period, instead of attending school. In this regard, the Committee recalls that the prohibition on the worst forms of child labour, including forced labour and hazardous work, applies to all children under the age of 18. Therefore, in light of the broad consensus among the United Nations bodies, the representative organizations of workers and employers and non-governmental organizations with respect to the continued practice of mobilizing school children for work in the cotton harvest, often under hazardous conditions, the Committee must express its serious concern regarding the Government's continued insistence that children are not involved in the cotton harvest in Uzbekistan. The Committee urges the Government to take immediate and effective time-bound measures to eradicate the forced labour of, or hazardous work by, children under 18 years in cotton production, as a matter of urgency. It requests the Government to provide information on progress made in this regard in its next report.

Articles 5 and 6. Monitoring mechanisms and programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that a programme had been approved for on-the-ground monitoring to prevent the use of forced labour by school children during the cotton harvest. The Government also indicated that the supervision of labour legislation and regulations (including the prohibition on employing children in adverse working conditions) was carried out through specifically authorized legal and technical inspections of the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection and trade union officials. The Government indicated that the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection, in collaboration with the social partners, had implemented workshops to raise awareness among farmers on the inadmissibility of the use of child labour in agricultural works, and that the State Labour Inspection continued to carry out monitoring in farms.

The Committee also noted the IOE's indication that it remained uncertain as to whether the implementation of the measures adopted would be sufficient to address the deeply rooted practice of forced child labour in the cotton fields. It also noted the ITUC's statement that the monitoring of forced child labour needed to be completely independent. In addition, the Committee observed that the Conference Committee expressed regret that, despite the Government's indication that concrete measures had been undertaken by the labour inspectorate regarding violations of labour legislation, no information was provided on the number of persons prosecuted for the mobilization of children in the cotton harvest.

The ITUC states that evidence indicates that the legislative and policy measures in place have had little effect in eradicating the ongoing and systematic mass mobilization of forced child labourers for the cotton harvest. The ITUC indicates that there is a vast disparity between the legal and policy situation and the continued practice of state-sponsored forced labour. It alleges that Government has not implemented its own national laws and policies.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that, as part of the Plan on additional measures, the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection, the Ministry of Internal Affairs, with the Council of Ministers of the Autonomous Republic of Karakalpakstan, and the administration of the regions and Tashkent, will establish systematic monitoring to provide effective control to prevent enterprises, establishments and organisations from forcing children to work, and to ensure that the legislation on the working conditions of minors is respected. In this regard, the Government states that the Council of the Federation of Trade Unions of Uzbekistan has designed a structure to ensure the effective monitoring of the prohibition to compel children to work, and to ensure compliance with the relevant legislation concerning working conditions for minors and the Convention. This structure is composed of working groups established by the chairpersons of local trade union associations. The Government states that these working groups examined companies and organizations in Uzbekistan to assess compliance with the minimum age for employment and the prohibition of the worst forms of child labour, but that no evidence was found of the use of the worst forms of child labour. The Government further indicates that on 27 June 2012, the Association of Private Farmers, the Committee of the Women of Uzbekistan and the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection adopted a joint decision to conduct local outreach campaigns among farmers and that seminars for private farmers on the ILO Conventions were held in August 2012 in every region in the country. Moreover, the Government indicates that at a meeting of the special national working group for organizing nationwide awareness-raising campaigns to prevent the recruitment of students for cotton-picking, special local units of this working group were formed in August 2012. In addition, the Committee notes the Government's statement that the State Labour Inspectorate of the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection performs regular check of compliance with labour legislation governing minors. The Government indicates that in its 2012 inspections, the State Labour Inspectorate identified 37,818 cases of labour law violations, issued 1,273 instructions and initiated 1,221 administrative proceedings. However, the Committee once again notes with concern an absence of information as to whether any of the violations detected during these inspections pertained specifically to the worst forms of child labour, particularly the forced labour of, or hazardous work by, children under 18 years of age engaged in the cotton harvest.

The Committee once again observes that the Government has taken significant awareness-raising and preventive measures regarding the mobilization of children during the cotton harvest. In the Committee's view, this would appear to amount to an implicit and tacit admission that such child labour occurs within the country. The Committee must, therefore, once again note with regret the absence of information from the Government on the concrete impact, if any, of the monitoring activities undertaken pursuant to the Plan on additional measures, by the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection and the social partners. The Committee accordingly requests the Government to provide information on the concrete impact of the measures taken to monitor the prohibition of the use of forced and hazardous child labour in the agricultural sector. It also requests the Government to provide specific information on the number and nature of violations detected specifically with regard to the mobilization of children under 18 to work in the cotton harvest. Where possible, the information should be disaggregated by sex and age.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. Forced or compulsory labour in cotton production and hazardous work. The Committee previously noted the Government's assertion that children are not involved in the cotton harvest. The Committee considered it essential that independent monitors be granted unrestricted access to document the situation during the cotton harvest. The Committee also noted the statements in 2010 from the ITUC, the European Trade Union Confederation (ETUC), the European Trade Union Federation – Textiles, Clothing and Leather (ETUF–TCL), the International Union of Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers' Association (IUF) and the European Federation of Food, Agriculture and Tourism Trade Unions (EFFAT), as well as the joint communication of 2010 from the European Apparel and Textile Confederation (EURATEX) and the ETUF–TCL indicating that a mission must be carried out as soon as possible in order to address the practice of child labour in the cotton sector and to initiate steps towards its eradication. The Committee further noted that the Conference Committee expressed its serious concern regarding the insufficient political will and the lack of transparency of the Government to address the issue of forced child labour in cotton harvesting. It urged the Government to accept a high-level ILO tripartite observer mission that would have full freedom of movement and timely access to all situations and relevant parties, including in the cotton fields, in order to assess the implementation of Convention No. 182. The Conference Committee also strongly urged the Government to receive this ILO high-level tripartite observer mission in time to report back to this Committee, and strongly encouraged the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance, and to commit to working with ILO-IPEC. In this regard, the Committee noted the statement of the Government indicating that technical assistance or alternative cooperation with ILO-IPEC could not be reduced only to the issues of forced labour of children in cotton harvesting. In addition, the Committee noted the statement of UNICEF that its findings following the visits undertaken in 12 regions of the country were only snapshots that could not replace substantive and independent monitoring under the auspices of the ILO, which UNICEF continued to advocate for.

The Committee notes the statement by the IOE that the Government has not shown any will to accept the tripartite observer mission recommended by the tripartite Conference Committee. The Committee also notes that the ITUC, in its communication, urges the Government to invite an ILO high-level tripartite observer mission to visit the country, and also to accept ILO technical assistance to eradicate forced child labour in the cotton industry, including through work with ILO-IPEC. The ITUC further states that once again during the 2011 harvest, the cotton fields were strictly patrolled by police and security personnel, in an attempt to prevent independent monitoring, and that persons seeking to monitor the harvest experienced harassment and intimidation.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that it has made every effort to eliminate the worst forms of child in the country, and that for this reason, there are no grounds for inviting an ILO high-level mission to the country to examine the use of child labour. The Government states that this should not be seen as refusal to cooperate with the ILO, and that the examination of the application of the Convention should address all of the worst forms, not only cotton-picking. The Government further indicates that a seminar entitled "Implementation of ILO Conventions ratified by Uzbekistan" was held in May 2012. The Government states that this seminar was organized by the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection, and included participation of ILO officials from both Headquarters and the Moscow Bureau, during which participants had an opportunity to discuss various issues related to the fulfilment by Uzbekistan of its commitments within the ratified ILO Conventions. In this regard, the Committee notes the statement in the mission report of the Technical Advisory Mission that the ILO delegation attending the seminar underlined that the Technical Advisory mission should not be seen as replacing the high-level mission which had been requested by the supervisory bodies. This mission report also indicates that the ILO delegation indicated to the Government that the Office was prepared to pursue technical assistance, and that the delegation highlighted that high-level tripartite missions were not sanctions, but instead an important way forward in helping to verify facts and resolve implementation gaps.

Therefore, the Committee must once again note with serious concern that the Government has yet to respond positively to the recommendation to accept a high-level tripartite observation mission. The Committee's concerns are reinforced by the evident contradiction between the Government's position that children are not removed from school for work in the cotton harvest, and the views expressed by numerous UN bodies and social partners that this worst form of child labour remains a serious problem in the country. It, therefore, considers an ILO mission to be both necessary and appropriate, to fully assess the situation of children's engagement in the cotton sector. The Committee, therefore, urges the Government to accept a high-level ILO tripartite observer mission, and expresses the firm hope that such an ILO mission can take place in the very near future. It also strongly encourages the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance in respect of the situation in question.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 102nd Session and to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Night Work of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 6) (ratification: 1933)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. It also notes the comments by the Independent Trade Union Alliance (ASI) of 14 August 2012.

Article 2 of the Convention. Exceptions to the prohibition regarding night work by young persons in industrial undertakings. In its previous comments, the Committee noted section 257 of the Basic Labour Act of 1997, which provides that the working day for young persons under 18 years of age must fall between 6 a.m. and 7 p.m. Section 257 also allows exceptions on special grounds to the prohibition of night work by young persons, when deemed appropriate, in cooperation with the labour inspector, by the bodies responsible for the supervision of minors. The Committee asked the Government to provide information on the special grounds for such exceptions and the conditions in which such permission may be granted.

The Committee notes the promulgation of the Basic Labour and Workers Act (Gaceta Oficial, 20 May 2012, No. 6076). The Committee notes the Government's indication that section 32 establishes a general prohibition of child labour for children under 14 years of age, except for artistic and cultural performances authorized by the authority responsible for the protection of minors. Section 32 furthermore provides that the protection of minors at work is regulated by the Act concerning the protection of children and young persons of 1998. However, the Committee notes with concern that the new Basic Labour and Workers Act of 2012 no longer contains a provision prohibiting night work for young persons, unlike the Basic Labour Act of 1997. Moreover, the Committee had previously observed that the Act concerning the protection of children and young persons of 1998 did not contain any provision on the night work of young persons.

In these circumstances, the Committee is bound to recall again that Article 2(1) of the Convention states that young persons under 18 years of age shall not be employed during the night in any industrial undertaking, other than an undertaking in which only members of the same family are employed and in the cases listed in Article 2(2). The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that national legislation is brought into compliance with the Convention by reinserting a provision prohibiting the night work of young persons under 18 years of age. In case such a provision were to include special grounds on which exceptions to the prohibition of night work by young persons may be granted, as previously provided for by section 257 of the Basic Labour Act of 1997, the Committee requests the Government to supply information on these special grounds and the conditions in which such permission may be given, indicating in particular, the age of the young persons and the types of work they are authorized to perform.

Yemen

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy designed to ensure the effective abolition of child labour and practical application of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the work of the Child Labour Unit (CLU) attached to the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour (MoSAL) and referred to a child labour survey on working children the Government was commencing in collaboration with the ILO.

The Committee notes the findings of the first national Child Labour Survey carried out in 2010 by the Central Statistical Organization (CSO) in collaboration with ILO–IPEC which were released in July 2012. The Committee notes that 21 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 17 are employed. While 11 per cent of 5–11 year-olds are employed, this figure increases to 28.5 per cent among 12–14 year-olds and further to 39.1 per cent among 15–17-year-olds. The employment rate of male children at 21.7 per cent is slightly higher than the employment rate of female children at 20.1 per cent. The two leading sectors that employ children are agriculture (56.1 per cent) and private households (29 per cent). A smaller proportion of children are in wholesale and retail trade (7.9 per cent). The majority of working children are unpaid family workers (58.2 per cent). Expressing its concern at the large number of working children in the country, especially in rural areas, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to pursue its efforts towards the effective reduction and elimination of child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on national policy measures designed to ensure the effective elimination of child labour, and on the results achieved. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including extracts from the reports of inspection services and information on the number of inspections aimed, in whole or in part, at addressing child labour as well as on the number and nature of violations detected involving children.

Article 2(1). Scope of application. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, pursuant to sections 3(2) and 53 of the Labour Code, several categories of workers are excluded from the scope of application of the Labour Code, such as self-employed workers, casual workers, household servants and some agricultural workers, in addition to young persons working with their family under the supervision of the head of the family. The Committee further noted that section 5 of Ministerial Order No. 56 of 2004 (Ministerial Order No. 56) states that the minimum age of entering employment shall not be less than the age of completion of compulsory education, which is 15 years. The Committee also noted the Government's indication that the current exemptions in the Labour Code would be addressed in forthcoming amendments to the Labour Code. The Committee reiterates its hope that the amendments to the Labour Code will soon be adopted and requests the Government to provide information on any new developments in this regard, in particular concerning the categories of workers excluded from the scope of application of the Labour Code by virtue of sections 3(2) and 53.

Article 2(1) and (2). Minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee previously noted that section 5 of Ministerial Order No. 56 states that the minimum age of entering employment shall not be less than the age of completion of compulsory education, which is 15 years, while section 133 of the Yemeni Child Rights Law of 2002 establishes the general minimum age for admission to work at 14 years. The Committee also noted the Government's indication that an amendment modifying the minimum age for working children addressing this contradiction is being prepared. Noting that the Government specified a minimum age for admission to employment or work of 14 years at the time of ratification, the Committee draws the attention of the Government towards the possibility of raising the minimum age by notifying the Director-General of the ILO in virtue of Article 2(2) of the Convention. The Committee once again expresses the hope that the draft amendment which modifies the general minimum age in the relevant Acts will be adopted in the very near future, and requests the Government to provide a copy of this legislation once adopted.

Article 2(3). Compulsory education. The Committee previously noted the Government's basic education development strategy (BEDS), as well as the basic education development project by the World Bank, which aims to assist Yemen in expanding the provision of quality basic education to all (grades 1–9), with special attention to gender equity.

The Committee notes from the findings of the 2010 Child Labour Survey referred to above that the school attendance rate for children 6–14 years old (ages for compulsory schooling) stands at 73.6 per cent. Female and rural children are particularly affected by low school attendance rates. While among 6–17 year-olds, the attendance rate among girls is 63.4 per cent, this rate is 77.2 per cent among boys. The lowest school attendance rate is estimated for rural females at 57.5 per cent as compared to 82.9 per cent for urban boys.

The Committee also notes the information from the UNESCO Education for All Monitoring Report 2011, that in 2008, Yemen had the most children out of school in the region, more than 1 million (regional overview: Arab States, page 3). The Committee furthermore notes the Secretary-General report on children and armed conflict, which, in 2011 recorded 211 attacks on schools and the disruption of schooling of some 200,000 children (A/66/782-S/2012/261, paragraph 168). The Committee also notes that the basic education development project by the World Bank had to be suspended in June 2011 due to the much deteriorated political and security situation. Yet the suspension of activities was lifted in January 2012 and the project was extended to the end of 2012 (World Bank document, Report No. 69061-YE, 29 June 2012, paragraphs 4–5, 23).

The Committee expresses serious concern at the number of children who do not attend school and the significant gap in the gross enrolment rate for basic education for girls and boys. Considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to improve the functioning of the education system as soon as possible, within the framework of the basic education development strategy. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on measures taken in this respect, and on the impact of these measures, particularly with regard to the enrolment, attendance and completion rates of girls and children in rural areas.

Article 3(1). Minimum age for admission to hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that section 49(4) of the Labour Code states that it is prohibited to employ a young person under 15 years of age in hazardous work. The Committee also noted the Government's information that, while section 4 of Ministerial Order No. 56 specifies that no person under 18 years may be accepted for any type of employment or work which, by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to harm the health, safety or morals of children, this section did not repeal the relevant provisions in the Labour Code. The Committee further noted the Government's indication that the forthcoming amendments to the Labour Code would take into account the Committee's observation on the contradictory provisions in the Labour Code and Ministerial Order No. 56 concerning the age of admission to hazardous work.

The Committee notes from the findings of the 2010 Child Labour Survey referred to above that 50.7 per cent of child labourers are engaged in hazardous work. Considering these circumstances, the Committee again urges the Government to ensure that the relevant amendments to the Labour Code are adopted in the near future to prohibit the employment of children under 18 years in hazardous work. It requests the Government to provide information on developments in this regard.

Article 6. Minimum age for admission to apprenticeship. The Committee previously noted that the Labour Code does not contain a minimum age for apprenticeships, and recalled that by virtue of Article 6 of the Convention, a young person must be at least 14 years of age to undertake an apprenticeship. The Committee noted the Government's statement that it would take into account the Committee's comments on this issue when amending the Labour Code. The Committee reiterates its requests to the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the amendments to the Labour Code will be in conformity with Article 6 of the Convention. It asks the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard in its next report.

Article 7. Light work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 6 of Ministerial Order No. 56 states that the exemption of employment or work of persons between 13 and 15 years may only be authorized if the work is light work, that shall not be harmful to their health, moral or physical development and will not prevent them from attending school, or participate in guidance programmes or vocational training, nor weaken their capacity to benefit from education. The Committee noted the Government's statement that the Order requires redrafting, to identify the activities that constitute light work, as well as to prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, the employment of children between the ages of 13 and 15 is allowed. In this regard, the Committee noted the Government's indication that it would take the Committee's comments and Paragraph 13(1)(b) of the Minimum Age Recommendation, 1973 (No. 146), into consideration in identifying what is light work, in conformity with Article 7(3) of the Convention. The Committee again expresses the hope that the Government will soon adopt regulations determining light work activities in accordance with the Convention and requests the Government to provide information on the developments in this regard in its next report.

Article 9(1). Penalties. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's information that the regulations on penalties for persons who violate the provisions of the Labour Code were promulgated and that sections 28–41 thereof specify the penalties to which employers are liable upon violation of the provisions relating to child labour. The Committee again requests the Government to provide a copy of the abovementioned regulations concerning violations of the Labour Code. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide information on the enforcement of the penalties for the violation of these provisions in practice.

Article 9(3). Registers of employment. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted that section 139 of the regulations putting into effect the Child Rights Act No. 45 of 2002 (Child Rights Act) states that an employer shall prepare a register which indicates the name of a working child, the child's guardian, the date on which he/she started work, place of residence and any other data required by the Ministry. Nonetheless, the Committee noted that these provisions did not specify that the employer must indicate the age or date of birth of the workers employed under the age of 18. The Committee recalled that Article 9(3) of the Convention requires national laws or regulations or the competent authority to prescribe the registers or other documents which shall be kept and made available by the employer, and that such registers shall contain the names and ages or dates of birth, duly certified wherever possible, of persons whom he/she employs or who work for him/her and who are under 18 years of age. The Committee again requests the Government to ensure that the registers kept pursuant to section 139 of the regulations putting into effect the Child Rights Act contain the ages or birth dates of persons who are less than 18 years of age, in conformity with Article 9(3) of the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to supply a copy of the regulations putting into effect the Child Rights Act No. 45 of 2002.

The Committee encourages the Government to take into consideration, during its review of the Labour Code, the Committee's comments on discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention. In this regard, the Committee invites it to consider technical assistance from the ILO to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 5 (Saint Lucia); Convention No. 6 (Burkina Faso, Myanmar); Convention No. 59 (Lebanon, New Zealand, Paraguay, United Republic of Tanzania, Yemen); Convention No. 77 (Algeria, Bulgaria, Comoros, Dominican Republic, Kyrgyzstan, Lebanon, Nicaragua, Peru, Spain, Tajikistan, Turkey, Ukraine); Convention No. 78 (Algeria, Kyrgyzstan, Lebanon, Peru, Spain, Tajikistan, Ukraine); Convention No. 79 (Kyrgyzstan, Russian Federation, Tajikistan); Convention No. 90 (Croatia, Guinea, Lebanon, Netherlands, Paraguay, Saudi Arabia, Serbia, Swaziland, Tajikistan); Convention No. 123 (Ecuador, Mongolia, Rwanda, Turkey, Uganda); Convention No. 124 (Kyrgyzstan, Uganda, Ukraine, United Kingdom, Viet Nam); Convention No. 138 (Burkina Faso, Burundi, Chad, Comoros, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Gambia, Georgia, Germany, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Indonesia, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Jordan, Kazakhstan, Kenya, Kuwait, Kyrgyzstan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Mauritania, Republic of Moldova, Montenegro, Mozambique, Namibia, Nepal, Netherlands, Nigeria, Rwanda, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Thailand, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia); Convention No. 182 (Bahamas, Burkina Faso, Chad, Comoros, Congo, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Gambia, Georgia, Germany, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, Indonesia, Islamic Republic of Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kazakhstan, Kenya, Kuwait, Kyrgyzstan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Latvia, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Lithuania, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Mali, Mauritania, Mexico, Republic of Moldova, Mongolia, Montenegro, Morocco, Mozambique, Namibia, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Russian Federation, Rwanda, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Senegal, Seychelles, Slovakia, Slovenia, Thailand, Timor-Leste, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Uganda, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom: St Helena, United States, Uzbekistan, Yemen).

The Committee noted the information supplied by the following States in answer to a direct request with regard to: Convention No. 5 (Denmark: Greenland, United Kingdom: Guernsey); Convention No. 6 (Latvia, Madagascar, Viet Nam); Convention No. 10 (Senegal); Convention No. 59 (Peru, United Kingdom: Gibraltar); Convention No. 77 (Hungary, Slovakia); Convention No. 78 (Bulgaria, Hungary, Slovakia); Convention No. 79 (Ukraine); Convention No. 123 (Swaziland); Convention No. 124 (Slovakia); Convention No. 138 (Hungary, Iceland, Republic of Korea, Latvia, Lithuania); Convention No. 182 (Republic of Korea).

Equality of opportunity and treatment

Afghanistan

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes the Government's indication that a tripartite consultative group met to discuss labour law reform, with a view to making working conditions better for all, including women, and that draft Regulations have been finalized and sent to the Ministry of Justice. The Committee notes, however, that the report provides no information regarding whether the tripartite consultative group addressed specifically the issue of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. The Committee therefore asks the Government, once again, to provide information on the activities and recommendations of the tripartite consultative group with respect to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and on reducing the wage gap.

The Committee notes, however, that the Government's report is substantially the same as its previous report, and has not replied to the following points in its previous observation:

Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee notes the Government's indication that Afghanistan's Decent Work Country Programme covers the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value. However, the Government does not give any specific information on measures taken or envisaged to include provisions in the Labour Law which would reflect the concept of equal remuneration for "work of equal value". The Committee recalls the importance of providing for the right of men and women to receive equal remuneration for "work of equal value" in order to allow a broad comparison between jobs performed by men and women that may be different but nonetheless of equal value, and that legislative provisions that do not give expression to the concept of "work of equal value" hinder progress in eradicating gender-based pay discrimination. The Committee also recalls that the definition of remuneration should include not only the ordinary, basic or minimum wage or salary but also any additional emoluments whatsoever, payable in cash or in kind, as stipulated in Article 1(a) of the Convention. The Committee therefore asks the Government to take steps to adopt specific legislative provisions explicitly providing for equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value and to provide information on the progress made in this regard.

Public service. The Committee notes the Government's indication that a salary scale has been established in Annex I of the Civil Servants Law, taking into consideration the social situation as well as the national economic development, and the financial situation of the Government. The Committee draws the Government's attention to the fact that the method used to set salary scales must be free from gender bias and that it is important to ensure that there is no direct or indirect discrimination in the selection of factors for comparison, the weighing of such factors and the actual comparison carried out. In order to better assess the method used to establish the salary scales in the public service, the Committee asks the Government to provide detailed information concerning the method and factors used to determine salary scales for public service employees, and to forward the latest version of the Civil Servants Act as well as its annexes.

Raising awareness of the principle of the Convention. The Committee welcomes the Government's efforts to continue raising awareness of the principle of the Convention through various measures including organizing training programmes for government officials, workers, employers, judges and civil society, disseminating material on equal remuneration for women and men and organizing workshops for the gender units of ministries on women workers' rights under the Labour Law. The Committee asks the Government to continue providing information on awareness raising activities carried out to promote the principle of the Convention, including information on the impact of such activities on reducing the gender pay gap. Please also provide information on the content of the training offered to government officials, workers, employers, judges and civil society.

Statistics. The Committee asks the Government to provide statistics on the earnings of men and women by sector and occupation, and any statistics or analysis on the gender pay gap.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1969)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Legislation. In its previous comments, recalling that the prohibition of discrimination in section 9 of the Labour Law is very general, the Committee urged the Government to take the opportunity of the labour law reform process, including in the context of the Decent Work Country Programme, to amend the law to prohibit direct and indirect discrimination covering all the grounds listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, namely race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin, as well as any other grounds determined in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, in accordance with Article 1(1)(b) of the Convention. The Committee recalls that the pillar on economic and social development of the National Action Plan for Women of Afghanistan (NAPWA) 2007–17 contains the strategy to improve women's economic status, and the strategy to increase the quality of education for women; in this context, the NAPWA also aims at reviewing the labour law to meet international standards. The Committee also recalls that the ILO project "Strengthening Labour Law Governance in Afghanistan" is under way. The Committee asks the Government to ensure that in the process of labour law reform, direct and indirect discrimination is expressly defined and prohibited, covering all the grounds listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, as well as any other grounds determined in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, in accordance with Article 1(1)(b) of the Convention, covering all aspects of employment and occupation. Please provide information on concrete steps taken in this regard, and specific information on the role of the social partners in the labour law reform process.

Civil service. The Committee recalls section 10(2) of the Civil Servants Law of 2008, prohibiting discrimination in recruitment based on the grounds of sex, ethnicity, religion, disability and physical deformity. The Committee recalls that, where legal provisions are adopted to give effect to the principle of the Convention, they should include at least all the grounds of discrimination specified in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention (General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 853). It also recalls that, under Article 1(3) of the Convention, “employment” and “occupation” also include access to vocational training and terms and conditions of employment. The Committee asks the Government to indicate any measures taken or envisaged to provide protection against discrimination for civil servants based on at least all the grounds enumerated in the Convention and in all aspects of employment and occupation. Recalling section 5 of the Labour Law providing for the scope of application, and noting that the Government’s report does not contain information in this regard, the Committee again asks the Government to clarify whether the provisions of the Labour Law are applicable to civil servants covered under the Civil Servants Law and, if so, to specify the interrelationship between section 9 of the Labour Law and section 10(2) of the Civil Servants Law.

Article 5(1). Special measures of protection. Work prohibited for women. The Committee recalls the Government’s previous indication that the list of physically arduous or harmful work prohibited for women to be established under section 120 of the Labour Law was still under preparation. The Committee recalls that protective measures applicable to women’s employment, which are based on stereotypes regarding women’s professional abilities and role in society, violate the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women in employment and occupation. Provisions relating to the protection of persons working under hazardous or difficult conditions should be aimed at protecting the health and safety of both men and women at work, while taking account of gender differences with regard to specific risks to their health (General Survey, 2012, paragraph 840). The Committee again urges the Government to ensure that, in the process of the labour law reform, any restrictions on the work that can be done by women are strictly limited to maternity protection.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Albania

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1997)

Article 1 of the Convention. Discrimination on the basis of political opinion. The Committee previously expressed concern regarding the potentially discriminatory effect of a “lustration” law, (screening act), Law No. 8043 of 30 November 1995, which may have amounted to discrimination based on political opinion, but most of the provisions of which expired on 31 December 2001. The Committee notes the adoption of a new “lustration” law, Law No. 10034, which entered into force on 30 January 2009, and provides for the exclusion of persons who had certain duties under the previous regime from serving in a broad range of public functions. On 16 February 2009, the Constitutional Court of Albania suspended the application of the Law pending a decision of its constitutionality. On 20 February 2009, the Court asked the Venice Commission of the Council of Europe to give an amicus curiae opinion on the Law. The Venice Commission found that there were several aspects of the Law that could interfere disproportionately with the right to stand for election, the right to work and the right to access to the public administration (Opinion No. 524/2009, paragraph 161). The Venice Commission also noted the fact that the objective and personal scope of application of this Law was very broad and imprecise, while it left little or no room for consideration of each case individually (paragraph 152). The Committee asks the Government to indicate the current status of Law No. 10034 of 2009, and to indicate how it is ensured that there is protection against discrimination in employment and occupation based on political opinion. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the practical application of this Law, if it is currently in force, including the following:

- (i) the extent to which individual consideration is given in the process of verifying incompatibility of functions when a candidate assumed duties listed under section 4 of the Law;
- (ii) the number of persons who have been dismissed, or excluded from being a candidate for, or employed in, the posts and professions listed under section 3 of the Law; and
- (iii) any judicial decisions given concerning the application of the Law, including by the Constitutional Court.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Algeria

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1962)

Gender pay gap. Private sector. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on average wages for 2009 (by sex and age category) established on the basis of a survey of the annual wage declarations submitted to the National Social Security Fund, covering all skill levels and sectors. These partial data show that, depending on the age category, the average pay gap between men and women is between 3.3 per cent (46–50 years) and 52.8 per cent (60 years) to the detriment of women and that for all age categories taken together, the average wage gap between men and women is around 15 per cent. Recalling that it is particularly important to have available full and reliable statistical data on the remuneration of men and women as a basis for drawing up, implementing and then evaluating the measures taken to eliminate pay gaps, the Committee asks the Government to intensify its efforts to gather and analyse such data in the various economic sectors, including the public sector, and for the different occupational categories, and to provide such data with its next report. The Committee also asks the Government to take the necessary measures to eradicate pay gaps between men and women, including through awareness-raising measures on the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value among employers, workers and their organizations and to provide information on any action taken in this respect and on any obstacles encountered.

Public service. The Committee notes the Government's view, in reply to its previous comment, that it is not necessary to include in the general public service regulations (Ordinance No. 06-03 of 15 July 2006) a provision requiring equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value since all the laws and regulations governing the personnel of public institutions and administrations apply to all public employees irrespective of sex. The Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the fact that the adoption and application of wage scales without sex distinction in the public service is not sufficient to exclude any gender discrimination in relation to remuneration. Indeed, such discrimination may have its roots in the criteria used for the classification of jobs, under-evaluation of the work performed mainly by women, or inequalities resulting from the provision of certain accessory benefits (bonuses, indemnities, allowances, etc.) to which men and women do not have access on an equal footing by law or in practice. In the light of the above, the Committee once again asks the Government to indicate the manner in which it ensures the application of the principle of equal remuneration (basic wages and additional emoluments) between men and women for work of equal value, with an indication of whether objective job evaluations have already been undertaken or are envisaged in the public service.

Objective job evaluation. Collective agreements. In its previous observation, the Committee noted that the framework collective agreement for the private sector concluded on 30 September 2006 between the General Union of Algerian Workers (UGTA) and five employers' organizations contains provisions relating to the classification of jobs on the basis of job descriptions and the analysis, evaluation and rating of their content, leading to their classification according to the results of the evaluation. It also noted that the collective agreement sets out evaluation criteria (qualifications, responsibility, physical or intellectual effort, working conditions, and any particular constraints or requirements), but that it does not specifically envisage the application of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. The Committee notes that the Government confines itself in its report to referring once again to the framework collective agreement, without providing the information requested on its application in practice, particularly with regard to job evaluation and classification. The Committee therefore asks the Government to indicate how jobs in the private sector are classified in practice, in accordance with the framework collective agreement, and to indicate whether such classification has recently been reviewed in the various occupational branches. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the clauses in recently concluded branch collective agreements reflecting the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and providing for the evaluation of jobs on the basis of the work to be performed, and on the implementation of these clauses.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1969)

Legislation. Grounds of discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee emphasized that Act No. 90-11 on labour relations prohibits any provision in an agreement, collective agreement or employment contract which gives rise to discrimination in employment, remuneration or working conditions on grounds of age, sex, social or marital situation, family relations, political convictions and membership or not of a trade union and that the general conditions of service of the public service prohibit any discrimination among public employees on the grounds of their opinions, sex, origin and any other personal or social condition. The Committee recalls that where effect is given to the Convention by the national legislation, it has to cover at least all the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Noting that the draft Labour Code is still being prepared, the Committee once again urges the Government to take this opportunity to ensure that the provisions of the new Labour Code respecting prohibited grounds of discrimination also include race, colour, religion and national extraction and that they cover all stages of employment and occupation. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in the revision of the labour legislation and on any measures adopted or envisaged for the amendment of the general conditions of service of the public service to ensure that the prohibition of discrimination explicitly covers as a minimum all the grounds enumerated in the Convention.

Article 1 of the Convention. Sexual harassment. In its previous comments the Committee noted that section 341bis of the Penal Code only appears to cover quid pro quo sexual harassment. The Committee notes the Government's indications that the draft Labour Code will contain provisions defining sexual harassment and measures to prevent and combat it. Drawing the Government's attention once again to its 2002 general observation, the Committee hopes that the new Labour Code will ensure complete protection against sexual harassment by prohibiting those quid pro quo sexual harassment and harassment due to a hostile working environment, and it requests the Government to provide information on this subject. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in practice to prevent and combat sexual harassment in employment and occupation, including information on any education and awareness-raising campaigns and on the organization of activities in collaboration with employers' and workers' organizations.

Articles 2 and 3. National policy. Discrimination based on sex and the promotion of equality between men and women. The Committee recalls that for several years it has been expressing deep concern at the low participation rate of women in employment and at the persistence of strongly stereotyped attitudes with respect to the roles and responsibilities of women and men in society and in the family, and has been emphasizing the negative impact of these attitudes on the access of women to employment and training. The Committee notes that, according to the information provided by the Government on the application of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), that women represented 15.1 per cent of the employed population in the fourth quarter of 2010 (16.09 per cent in 2006). It further notes the Government's reference in its report on the application of the Convention to article 31bis of the Constitution, adopted in the context of the constitutional reform in 2008, under the terms of which "the State shall take measures to promote the political rights of women by increasing their opportunities of gaining access to representative functions in elected assemblies". While noting these constitutional provisions, the Committee recalls that the Convention requires the application of a national policy designed to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment and occupation, which includes the adoption and implementation of legislative and administrative measures, public policies, proactive measures to overcome inequalities in practice and of practical programmes and awareness-raising activities to combat stereotypes and prejudices with a view to eliminating discrimination in all aspects of employment and occupation. Recalling that the participation of women in the labour market remains very low, the Committee urges the Government to take practical measures to promote and ensure equality of opportunity and treatment for women in all aspects of employment and occupation, including measures intended to combat sexist attitudes and prejudices, as well as proactive measures, particularly in relation to education and vocational training, with a view to overcoming inequalities in practice that affect women and to increasing their opportunities of gaining access to quality jobs. It requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken in this respect and up-to-date statistical data on the situation of men and women in employment in the public and private sectors, where possible by sector or occupational category.

Promoting equality and combating discrimination based on criteria other than sex set out in Article 1(1)(a). For many years the Committee has been requesting the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation in law and practice without any distinction based on the criteria enumerated by the Convention other than sex. The Committee once again notes that the Government's report does not contain any information on this subject. Recalling that Act No. 90-11 on labour relations does not prohibit discrimination based on race, colour, religion or national extraction, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the manner in which workers are protected against any discrimination based on these grounds in practice. It urges the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to combat discrimination and promote equality in employment and occupation without distinction on the grounds of race, colour, national extraction, religion, political opinion or social origin, in collaboration with employers' and workers' organizations.

Article 5. Special protection measures. For a number of years the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the importance of reviewing the provisions prohibiting night work for women, as well as those respecting the assignment of women to work that is hazardous, unhealthy or harmful to their health. It also recalled that, when reviewing these provisions, a distinction should be made between special measures to protect maternity, as envisaged in Article 5, and measures based on stereotyped perceptions of the capacity and role of women in society, which are contrary to the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment. The Committee notes the Government's indication that its comments will be taken into account when drawing up the new Labour Code. Recalling that the objective is to repeal discriminatory measures applicable to the employment of women, the Committee considers that it would undoubtedly be necessary to examine which other measures, such as to improve the health protection of all workers, safety and adequate transport, the availability of social services to improve the sharing of family responsibilities which would be necessary to enable women to benefit from the same opportunities of men in terms of access to employment. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that, in the context of the review of the labour legislation, occupational safety and health provisions take into account the need to provide a safe and healthy environment for both men and women workers, while taking into account the differences which mean that they are exposed to specific risks in terms of health, and to ensure that they are not an obstacle to the access of women to employment and to the various occupations. It also requests the Government to ensure that the measures for the protection of women are limited to what is strictly necessary to protect maternity and requests it to provide information on any measures adopted to amend the legislation along these lines.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Angola

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes with regret that for a number of years, the Government's reports have failed to respond to the points raised in the Committee's comments. The Committee once again emphasizes that this prevents it from assessing the progress made with regard to the practical application of the Convention. The Committee urges the Government to take all necessary steps to ensure that its next report contains information in reply to all the issues raised by the Committee.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report is identical to that of last year and does not reply to the issues raised. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee recalls that in previous observations it referred to the comments submitted by the National Union of Angolan Workers (UNTA) related to cases of age discrimination. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in this respect that the maximum age for eligibility to work in the public service is 35 years and that enterprises shall submit requests to employment centres for the workers they need. With respect to the maximum age requirement of 35 years, the Committee considers that such a requirement is likely to be indirectly discriminatory against women as it may particularly affect women wishing to enter or re-enter the labour market following an absence for maternity and child rearing. In this respect, the Committee encourages the Government, in collaboration with workers' and employers' organizations, to take measures to ensure that women are not indirectly discriminated against in access to employment due to the maximum age requirement. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that some resolutions were adopted in order to ensure women's participation in the management of private and public entities and that a Gender Project is being implemented with the assistance of the ILO. The Government further indicates that in 2009 there were 319,003 employees in the public sector, of which 107,164 were women, and that there are no statistics concerning the informal economy. The Committee requests the Government to continue to supply statistical information and hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures to improve the collection of such data so as to include information on the representation of men and women in the different industries and occupations, as well as indications as to the representation of women in decision-making positions and the share of men and women considered to work in the informal economy.

The Committee further notes that the Government's report contains no reply to certain points raised in its previous comments. The Committee is therefore bound to repeat its previous observation, which read in relevant parts, as follows:

Discrimination in practice. The Committee notes that, although the Government has put in place legal provisions concerning discrimination in employment and occupation, including sections 3 and 268 of the General Labour Act No. 2/00, discrimination continues to occur in practice. In its report the Government states that violations of the non-discrimination provisions occur particularly in the private sector where imbalances in the participation in decision-making positions and a tendency to exclude women during and after maternity can be observed. The Government previously reported that gender-based discrimination also exists in the informal economy. As noted by the Committee previously, there is also a significant gender imbalance in the judiciary and as regards management positions in the civil service.

In its report, the Government states that it was difficult to measure the incidence of gender-based discrimination as women do not file petitions or complaints due to shortcomings in the "legal culture". The Government also states that it has made efforts to raise awareness of legal matters, particularly among women, by expanding information and education programmes on women's rights, using different national languages and various forms of communication. Efforts were also being made to address discriminatory cultural and traditional practices still prevailing in the country, which, for instance, lead to unequal access of girls to education. The Government, in a very general manner, also refers to the National Strategy and Strategic Framework to Promote Gender Equality and the Rural Growth and Development Programme which includes a programme for the economic empowerment of women. The report refers to the preparation and use of gender-disaggregated data, although such data has not been provided.

- (ii) The Committee encourages the Government to continue and intensify its efforts to raise awareness and understanding of the principle of non-discrimination and the related legislation among men and women, and requests the Government to indicate the specific activities carried out to this end. Given the reports of discrimination based on sex and pregnancy in the private sector, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to enhance the capacity of the labour inspectorate and other competent authorities to identify and address discrimination in employment and occupation. Please also provide information regarding whether the competent authorities have addressed any such cases, and if so, the results thereof.
 - (iii) The Committee considers that the Government should take specific and proactive measures to promote and ensure equality of opportunity and treatment of women in the civil service, including the judiciary, and it asks the Government to indicate any measures taken or envisaged in this regard, including measures to ensure that women have access to management positions on an equal footing with men.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Antigua and Barbuda

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1983)

National extraction and social origin. The Committee recalls that section C4(1) of the Labour Code does not prohibit discrimination on the basis of national extraction or social origin. It also recalls that where legal provisions are adopted to give effect to the principle of the Convention, they should include at least all the grounds of discrimination specified in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, namely race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin (General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 853). The Committee notes the Government's statement that when the new Labour Code is published, national extraction and social origin will be included to give effect to the Convention. However, no indication is given as to when the drafting of a new Labour Code would be undertaken. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the concrete steps taken to draft and adopt a new Labour Code, and urges the Government to ensure that in this process specific provisions are included defining and prohibiting direct and indirect discrimination, in all aspects of employment and occupation, covering at least all the grounds of discrimination enumerated in the Convention, namely race, sex, colour, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Argentina

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the observations from the Confederation of Workers of Argentina (CTA), received on 31 August 2012, reporting significant occupational segregation, both vertical and horizontal, reflected in a sizable pay gap (25 per cent in 2010), a lack of up-to-date statistics regarding women and men in the labour market and the inefficiency of the measures adopted so far by the Tripartite Committee on Equality of Treatment and Opportunity (CTIO) and the Coordinating Unit for Gender Equity and Equal Opportunities (CEGIOT). The Committee also notes the CTA's observations of 7 September 2012 and the comments of the General Confederation of Labour (CGT) received on 21 September 2012. The Committee asks the Government to send its observations on these comments.

Gender pay gap. The Committee also notes the Government's communication of 31 May 2012 replying to the CGT's observations of 31 August 2011 reporting the persistence of high rates of inequality between men and women, apparent in the disparities in the quality of the jobs undertaken by men and women, respectively, and particularly in levels of responsibility, which all affect levels of remuneration. According to the CGT, informal work also contributes to these disparities, particularly in domestic work and the agricultural sector. The Committee notes that the Government refers in this connection to Act No. 26485 on media violence against women and Act No. 26522 on audiovisual media, which prohibit the use of stereotyped images of women, promote the reinforcement of women's education and of training for women in use of the media. The Government also refers to other initiatives such as non-sexist writing competitions for children, television programmes advocating women's rights, the monitoring of women's integration in the armed forces and the "State consensus against gender discrimination and towards real equality between women and men". Regarding informal work, the Government indicates that a significant increase has been achieved in the number of registered workers due to simplified procedures for regularizing workers. The Committee also notes the awareness-raising and training activities that the CEGIOT conducted for workers' and employers' organizations, which included handbooks on negotiation with a gender perspective and workshops on gender equality. It notes that these activities were carried out in 2010. While noting the measures taken by the Government to secure gender equality and eradicate stereotyped images of women, the Committee notes that there is no mention of specific measures taken to reduce or eliminate the gender pay gap. The Committee recalls that the continued persistence of significant gender pay gaps requires that governments, along with employers' and workers' organizations, take more proactive measures to raise awareness, make assessments, and promote and enforce the application of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. Collecting, analysing and disseminating this information is important in identifying and addressing inequality in remuneration (see General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 669). The Committee asks the Government to provide statistical information on the participation of men and women in the labour market, including information on remuneration levels, and disaggregated by occupation and economic sectors. It also asks the Government to indicate the specific measures taken to address the gender pay gap and the measures to address occupational segregation in the labour market as a factor contributing to pay differentials. Please indicate the measures taken or envisaged to promote objective job evaluation with a view to ensuring the right of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, established in the Convention. The Committee also asks the Government to send up-to-date information on the measures taken since 2010 to promote the incorporation in collective agreements of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value, and on the effects these measures have had on collective agreements concluded.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1968)

The Committee notes the Government's communications of 13 March and 11 and 25 June 2012 replying to comments made on 31 August 2011 by the Confederation of Workers of Argentina (CTA) and the General Confederation of Labour (CGT), which the Committee noted in its previous observation. The Committee further notes the CTA's comments received on 31 August and 7 September 2012 and those of the CGT received on 21 September 2012, and asks the Government to send its observations thereon.

Equality between men and women. The Committee notes that in its observations, the CTA refers to delay in the adoption of specific legislation to address discrimination in access to employment. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the National Institute Against Discrimination, Xenophobia and Racism (INADI) is implementing the programme "State consensus against gender discrimination" in various provinces and municipalities, and as part of the programme participatory assemblies are held and a pilot action plan is to be developed for the coordination of local policies in order to eliminate discrimination against women in a number of fields, including at work, in four provinces. The Government also refers to activities conducted by the Tripartite Committee on Equality of Opportunities and Treatment (CTIO) and the Coordinator of Gender Equity and Equal Opportunities at Work (CEGIOT), whose activities include training for women in non-traditional jobs within the framework of the "Programme on New Skills for Women", promoting the participation of women in negotiating bodies and the balancing of family responsibilities and work. The CTIO also participates in the Internal Commission of the Minister of Labour and Social Security to discuss the labour contracts law and the amendments concerning the issue of reconciling work and family responsibilities. The Government also states that a CTIO scheme is to be established in provinces and municipalities. The Government attaches an INADI report giving an account of the activities and programmes under way, such as the Programme for Parity at Work, the Enterprise Network Programme and the Programme on Good Practices in Public Employment. Pointing out that access to information on the practical effects of the measures taken by the Government at national, provincial and municipal level is important because such data allow an evaluation of the extent to which the measures contribute to equality between men and women in access to work and career development, the Committee requests the Government to send statistical information on the participation of men and of women in the labour market by sector of activity and level of remuneration. It also asks the Government to continue to provide information on the Ministry of Labour and Social Security's Coordinator of Gender Equity and Equal Opportunities at Work (CEGIOT), the Committee for Work with Equal Opportunities (CTIO) and the National Institute against Discrimination, Xenophobia and Racism (INADI), and in particular the programme "State consensus against gender discrimination".

National equality policy. The Committee recalls that in its comments, the CGT referred to the lack of any national policy on equality of opportunity and treatment in employment with respect to grounds other than sex. The Committee notes that according to the comments submitted by the CTA, the activities carried out by INADI and the CTIO are not sufficient to secure the mainstreaming of gender equality issues in public policies. The CTA adds that it is important to set up mechanisms to ensure full compliance with standards. The Committee notes that in its report, INADI refers to complaints received for discrimination in employment on various grounds, including social status, disability, HIV status, religion and political opinion. The Committee notes the confirmation of a working group within the Directorate for the Promotion and Development of Non-discriminatory Practices to promote the rights of the groups that have been, historically, most vulnerable. The Committee requests the Government to report on INADI's treatment of the complaints of discrimination in employment. It also asks the Government to indicate whether there is a national equality policy that covers all the grounds of discrimination set out at Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, and to send information on any other measures adopted to address discrimination on these grounds.

Domestic workers. The Committee notes that in its observations, the CTA reiterates that most domestic workers are not registered and under the legislation in force have less protection than other workers in terms of hours of work, leave, holidays, etc. The Committee also notes that there is a Bill on workers in private houses. It notes that according to the Government, the Bill is currently under examination by the Senate. A draft law regarding the ratification of the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), has also been presented in Congress. The Government also refers to Resolution No. 876/2006, the aim of which is to improve the employability of domestic workers by promoting professionalization of their job and providing them with skills to improve their access to the labour market. With this in mind, agreements are being concluded with educational institutions that provide training for domestic workers. In the period 2007–10, training was provided for 7,150 persons. The CTIO has carried out a study on domestic work with the aim of analysing problems faced by the sector and improving the conditions of the workers. The Committee recalls its previous comments noting that the majority of the domestic workers, both national and foreign, are women. The Committee requests the Government to continue to report on the passage through Parliament of the Bill on workers in private houses drafted by the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, and on the implementation of Resolution No. 876/2006 and on any other measures that seek to protect domestic workers and improve their training so as to increase and diversify their job opportunities.

Workers with disabilities. The Committee notes that according to the Government, Act No. 25689 of 2003 provides for a number of possible mechanisms to ensure the inclusion of persons with disabilities in the public sector. Furthermore, section 8 of Act No. 22431 to amend Act No. 25689, establishes an obligation to incorporate persons with disabilities in the three powers of the State and in decentralized public bodies in a proportion of not less than 4 per cent. Under Decree No. 312 of 2 March 2010, various measures were taken in order to register the positions covered by persons with disabilities. The decree also lays down an obligation to set up a register of applicants' profiles and provides for monitoring in institutions in order to guard against discrimination in public bodies. Furthermore, posts are to be set aside for occupation solely by persons with disabilities. The Committee requests the Government to send information on the number of persons with disabilities actually employed in the public sector, specifying the bodies in which they work. Please also provide information on the measures taken to promote the employment of persons with disabilities in the private sector together with statistical information on the number of such persons actually employed in this sector.

Unregistered workers. The Committee notes that according to the CTA, there is no real monitoring of the situation of unregistered workers as a group that is more vulnerable, inter alia in terms of social protection and equal remuneration. The Committee points out that in its previous comments it asked the Government to provide information on the effects of Act No. 26476 of 2008 and the Employment Regularization Plan and similar measures adopted by the Government to promote the regularization of unregistered workers with a view to reducing their vulnerability and improving their conditions of work. The Committee notes the information from the Government to the effect that the ratio of unregistered workers was 49.9 per cent in 2003 and fell to 36 per cent in 2010. Unregistered work among women posted a drop of 18 per cent. The Government further provides information on the launching of "Digital Work Registration" which should allow a better control of unregistered workers. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken to regularize unregistered workers and on the impact of these measures on their working conditions.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1994)

Article 1 of the Convention. Legislation. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it pointed out that different terms, such as "wage", "remuneration", "pay" and "salary" were used throughout section 178 of the Labour Code concerning wages. The Committee notes that section 178(3) provides that "wage" shall comprise the basic salary and all additional payments paid by the employer to the employee in any way for the work performed", and that it appears to be in line with the definition of "remuneration" provided in Article 1(a) of the Convention. The Committee understands from the Government's indication that "additional payments", such as bonuses and incentives, are paid for work in particular working conditions or depend on the professional qualifications of the worker. The Committee recalls however that section 178(2) of the Labour Code, which provides for "equal pay for the same or equivalent work" between men and women, does not reflect fully the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. It recalls that, due to stereotypical attitudes regarding women's aspirations, preferences and capabilities, certain jobs are held predominantly or exclusively by women and others by men. The concept of "work of equal value" is fundamental to tackling this occupational sex segregation in the labour market because it permits a broad scope of comparison, going beyond the "same" or "equivalent" work, and also encompassing jobs that are of an entirely different nature, but which are nevertheless of equal value (see General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraphs 672–675). The Committee asks the Government to confirm that section 178(2) of the Labour Code which provides for "equal pay for the same or equivalent work" applies to both basic salary and additional payments, as defined by section 178(3). Moreover, noting that section 178(2) of the Labour Code contains provisions that are narrower than the principle laid down by the Convention, the Committee asks the Government to take steps to amend this section in order to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, so as to address situations where men and women perform different work that is nevertheless of equal value. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the steps taken in this regard.

The Committee is also raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Austria

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1953)

The Committee notes the observations of the Federal Chamber of Labour, which were attached to the Government's report.

The gender wage gap. Further to its previous observation in which it noted with concern the wide gender wage gap (25.5 per cent in 2007), the Committee notes that, according to Eurostat data, the unadjusted gender wage gap remained at 25.5 per cent in 2010. Recalling that, in its previous report, the Government had indicated a range of causes of this large gender wage gap, the Committee notes with interest the adoption, in June 2010, of the "Gender Equality in the Labour Market" National Action Plan which addresses a number of these issues. Under the National Action Plan, an array of targeted measures will be progressively implemented, including, inter alia, further training programmes for educationally underprivileged women, career counselling and coaching for part-timers, women workers in low-paid sectors and women reintegrating into the labour market after a long career break, and an action programme to provide high-quality childcare support. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the status of implementation of the National Action Plan and on the impact of such measures in narrowing the gender wage gap.

Wage transparency. The Committee notes that two key measures aimed at enhancing pay transparency in undertakings, have been introduced pursuant to the amendments to the Equal Treatment Act of 15 February 2011. Section 9 of this Act provides that vacancy announcements must contain information on the minimum wage applicable to the job position advertised and on the employer's willingness to pay any additional emoluments, under penalty for non-compliance of a fine of up to €360. Under section 11 of the Act, companies with more than 1,000 employees must prepare and submit to their work councils or, in their absence, to their employees, a biennial wage report providing anonymous data on the average annual income of their women and men workers. The Committee also notes that companies employing 150 workers or more will be included in this measure gradually up until 2014 and that public services are subject to the same reporting obligation. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that pursuant to an amendment to the Vienna Equal Treatment Act (Provincial Law Gazette for Vienna No. 16/2012), the executive municipal councillor for staff members shall present an annual report analysing the income earned by the permanent employees of the municipality of Vienna. Noting that the first wage reports were due on 31 July 2011, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on the implementation of the amendments to the Equal Treatment Act, including statistical data on the level of compliance with this statutory requirement, information on sanctions imposed in case of non-compliance, and any actions taken to address gender wage gaps revealed, and the impact thereof. The Committee also asks the Government to provide statistical information on the number of undertakings of 150 employees or less in the country and, if available, on the employment rate in these undertakings disaggregated by sex and by size of undertaking.

Furthermore, the Committee notes the "equal = fair" campaign launched by the Federal Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Consumer Protection, with a view to raising awareness of the large gender income gap and to promoting wage transparency. It also notes that, with regard to the dissemination of information on sectoral and local wage levels applicable, a wage calculator was commissioned by the Government and has been available online since October 2011. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the implementation of these measures and on their impact on the reduction of the gender wage gap.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Azerbaijan

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1992)

Article 1 of the Convention. Work of equal value. The Committee recalls that the general provisions of sections 16, 154, and 158 of the Labour Code of 1999 do not address the principle of the Convention, and that section 9 of Act No. 150-IIIQ of 10 October 2006 on Gender Equality (Act on Gender Equality) does not fully reflect the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. Section 9 of the Act on Gender Equality is limited to equal wages for men and women who perform work under equal conditions, in the same enterprise and with the same skills. The Committee recalls that the concept of "work of equal value" lies at the heart of the fundamental right of equal remuneration for work of equal value, and the promotion of equality, and that it not only encompasses the same work performed under equal conditions and with the same skills, but also allows for a comparison between jobs that are of an entirely different nature, but which are nevertheless of equal value (see General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraphs 673 and 677). With respect to average wages, according to the statistics for 2011 provided by the Government, women were earning significantly less than men in many sectors of the economy: 38.4 per cent less in oil and gas production; 35.1 per cent less in health care and social services; and 30.8 per cent less in chemical industries. The Committee also recalls the existence of significant horizontal and vertical occupational gender segregation within the labour market, and refers to its comments under Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). In this connection, the Committee recalls that as effective application of the principle is required, where women are more heavily concentrated in certain sectors or occupations, there is a risk that the possibilities for comparison at the enterprise or establishment level will be insufficient, (see General Survey, 2012, paragraph 698). The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and to ensure that measures are taken to implement this principle in practice, including through collective agreements, and to address effectively the wide gender remuneration gap.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1992)

Legislative developments. The Committee welcomes the Government's indication that the Labour Code has been amended and now provides, in addition to other grounds of discrimination, that "no person shall be refused admission to employment or promotion, or be dismissed on account of infection with the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV), with the exception of types of work and occupations in which it is prohibited to employ persons living with HIV" (section 16(1)). It also notes that following the adoption of Law No. 424-IIIQD of 1 October 2007, which provides that “advertisement of the competition only for the representative of one gender is prohibited except for cases provided for in legislation”, section 50(2) of the Labour Code was amended on 17 May 2009 to include the same prohibition, according to the Government, both in line with section 10 of Act No. 150-IIIQ of 10 October 2006 on Gender Equality. The Committee further notes the Government’s indication that the Constitution was amended on 18 March 2009 to include a provision which provides that “a person shall not be subject to harm, nor granted or denied benefits or privileges” on specified grounds (section 25(4)), namely, race, ethnicity, religion, language, sex, origin, property, employment status, convictions and affiliation to political parties, trade unions and other voluntary associations. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the types of work and occupations which fall under the exception as “types of work and occupations in which it is prohibited to employ persons living with the HIV” under section 16(1) of the Labour Code. It also asks the Government to provide information on the practical application of sections 16(1) and 50(2) of the Labour Code, as well as section 25(4) of the Constitution. Please also provide copies of the amendments referred to in the Government’s report.

Exclusion of women from certain occupations. The Committee has raised concerns over a number of years regarding the exclusion of women from certain occupations pursuant to Decision No. 170 of 20 October 1999, made under section 241 of the Labour Code. It notes the Government’s indication that efforts are being made to repeal or abrogate the list under Decision No. 170 of 1999. The Committee again recalls that protective measures applicable to women’s employment which are based on stereotypes regarding women’s professional abilities and role in society, violate the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women in employment and occupation. Provisions relating to the protection of persons working under hazardous or difficult conditions should be aimed at protecting the health and safety of both men and women at work, while taking account of gender differences with regard to specific risks to their health (General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 840). The Committee urges the Government to repeal the list under Decision No. 170 of 1999 and to ensure that any measures limiting women’s employment are strictly limited to maternity protection. Please provide specific information on the progress made in this regard.

Gender equality in employment and occupation. The Committee recalls the adoption of the “State programme on implementation of the Employment Strategy for 2007–10” setting out the strategy to address issues regarding the employment of women and provide gender equality in employment. It notes that in accordance with the ILO Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP), which aims at including enhancing self-employment opportunities for women and involving them in entrepreneurship activities, the “Development of gender equality and women entrepreneurship” programme has been implemented. The Committee asks the Government to provide specific information on progress made regarding the following:

- (i) the measures taken to promote gender equality under the Programme on implementation of the Employment Strategy for 2007–10 and their impact; and
- (ii) the measures taken to promote gender equality within the framework of the DWCP, and its impact, including under the “Development of gender equality and women entrepreneurship” programme.

The Committee also recalls the significant horizontal and vertical gender segregation in the labour market, and the Government’s explanation that management roles were not assumed by women due to their family responsibilities. It notes the statistical information provided by the Government on the situation of women in the labour market. In 2011, women were concentrated in sectors such as information and communications (women constituted 80.3 per cent); health and social services (72.7 per cent); and education (67.2 per cent). According to a report “Evaluation of the situation for development of woman entrepreneurship” published by the National Centre for Productivity and Competitiveness and the ILO in 2009, for example, in state institutions of higher education, men consisted of 89.2 per cent of faculty deans, 83.3 per cent of department directors, and 82.3 per cent of professors. This report recommended that the Government take measures for increasing the representation of women in public administration and decision-making, and to take concrete measures for the creation of specialized training programmes, information and training centres providing business education and professional training to women who want to start a business, especially in regions. The Committee notes the Government’s indication in this connection that in 2011, the State Employment Service enabled 4,299 persons, including 2,039 women, to undertake vocational training. The Committee asks the Government to take concrete action to address the horizontal and vertical gender segregation in the labour market and to adopt concrete measures to improve the participation rates of women in those economic sectors and occupations in which they are under-represented, including through their participation in a wider range of vocational training courses leading to employment with opportunities for advancement and promotion. It also asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to address the stereotypes and assumptions regarding women’s aspirations and capabilities, as well as regarding their suitability for certain jobs, and to promote equal sharing of family responsibilities.

Equal opportunity and treatment of ethnic minorities. For a number of years, the Committee has raised concerns regarding discrimination faced by members of ethnic minorities in employment and education. While noting the statistical information based on the 2009 census concerning the population and ethnic composition, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that its employment policy prohibits discrimination on the grounds of religion and ethnicity, therefore, there are no statistics on employment disaggregated by religion or ethnicity. The Committee recalls that a national policy to promote equality of opportunity and treatment, as envisaged in Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention, should include measures to promote equality of opportunity and treatment of members of all ethnic groups with respect to access to vocational training and guidance, placement services, employment and particular occupations, and terms and conditions of employment (General Survey, 2012, paragraph 765). The Committee asks the Government to provide detailed information on concrete measures taken or envisaged to promote equality of opportunity and treatment of members of different ethnic minorities in education, training and employment, including under the Employment Strategy (2006–15), as well as statistical information, disaggregated by sex, on the economic activities of the different ethnic groups.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Bahrain

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the complaint concerning the non-observance by Bahrain of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), made by delegates to the 100th Session (June 2011) of the International Labour Conference under article 26 of the ILO Constitution. The status of the complaint remains under review by the ILO Governing Body; therefore, the issues raised therein regarding specific allegations of discrimination based on political opinion and religion will not be examined by this Committee at this time. The Committee also notes the reports received from the Government of 12 September 2011 and 30 August 2012.

Legislative developments. The Committee notes the adoption of the Labour Law in the Private Sector, Law No. 36 of 2012 (“Labour Law”), which entered into force on 2 September 2012. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the new law includes modern principles, which take into account international labour standards, thus addressing several gaps in the previous law. The Committee notes that pursuant to section 39, “Discrimination in wages based on sex, origin, language, religion or ideology shall be prohibited”. Section 104 provides that the termination of an employment contract is deemed to be arbitrary dismissal if the termination is due to “sex, colour, religion, ideology, marital status, family responsibilities, or the female worker’s pregnancy, delivery of a child or breastfeeding; ... complaint or formal notice or instigates an action against the employer, unless the complaint, formal notice or action are of a vexatious nature”, and that reinstatement is to be ordered by the Court where dismissal was due to one of the enumerated grounds. In addition, section 29 provides that women shall be subject to all the provisions governing the employment of men “without discrimination in similar situations”, and section 33 prohibits employers from dismissing women on the grounds of marriage or during maternity leave.

The Committee recalls its previous comments urging the Government to take steps to ensure that the new Labour Law included provisions explicitly defining and prohibiting direct and indirect discrimination, on all the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, with respect to all aspects of employment and occupation, and covering all workers, including domestic workers, casual workers and agricultural workers. The Committee notes, however, that the Labour Law does not define discrimination and does not appear to prohibit indirect discrimination. The Committee also notes that, while discrimination in wages and discriminatory dismissals is prohibited, not all the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention have been included. In particular, section 39 does not prohibit discrimination based on race, colour, political opinion, national extraction or social origin; and race, political opinion, national extraction and social origin are absent from the list of prohibited grounds in section 104. The Committee notes that protection against discrimination in “access to vocational training, access to employment and to particular occupations, and terms and conditions of employment”, as set out in Article 1(3) of the Convention, is not covered by the Labour Law, with the exception of wages and dismissal. The Committee also notes that pursuant to section 2, the Labour Law does not apply to civil servants and public legal entities or “domestic servants and persons regarded as such, including agricultural workers, security house-guards, nannies, drivers and cooks” performing work for the employer or the employer’s family members, except for certain specified provisions, which do not include those relating to discrimination. The Committee recalls that legal provisions adopted to give effect to the Convention should include at least all the grounds of discrimination specified in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, and should apply to all aspects of employment and occupation (General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraphs 749 and 856). The Committee further recalls that the purpose of the Convention is to protect all persons against discrimination, and no provision in the Convention limits its scope with respect to individuals or branches of activity (see General Survey, 2012, paragraph 733). Noting the Government’s reference to the adoption of Legislative Decree No. 48 of 2010 regarding the civil service, the Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the Decree and indicate the specific provisions of relevance to the implementation of the Convention. The Committee also asks the Government to provide detailed information on the steps taken to ensure that all workers, including those excluded from the scope of the non-discrimination provisions in the Labour Law, are protected against both direct and indirect discrimination, with respect to all aspects of employment and occupation, including access to employment, vocational training and terms and conditions of employment, based on all the grounds enumerated in the Convention. The Committee also asks the Government to consider further revising the Labour Law with a view to giving full legislative expression to the principle of the Convention, and to provide information on any steps taken in this regard.

Discrimination based on sex. The Committee had been raising concerns regarding the provisions of the previous Labour Code which foresaw an Order being made prescribing the occupations and jobs that could be offered to women as alternative employment in the event of marriage. The Committee urged the Government to ensure that such a provision was not included in the new legislation and expressed the hope that any restrictions on women's employment would be strictly limited to maternity protection. The Committee notes, however, that while the new Labour Law does not replicate this provision, it provides for a potentially much broader prohibition on the employment of women, as section 31 provides that the Minister shall issue a decision determining the work in which the employment of women is prohibited. The Committee recalls that protective measures for women may be broadly categorized into those aimed at protecting maternity in the strict sense, which come within the scope of Article 5 of the Convention. Those aimed at protecting women generally because of their sex or gender, based on stereotypical perceptions about their capabilities and appropriate role in society, which are contrary to the Convention and constitute obstacles to the recruitment and employment of women (see General Survey, 2012, paragraph 839). The Committee urges the Government to take steps to ensure that protective measures applicable to women are limited to maternity protection in the strict sense, and that any provisions otherwise constituting an obstacle to the recruitment and employment of women are repealed and any such measures withdrawn. Please provide information of the specific measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

Sexual harassment. The Committee notes that the opportunity was not taken in the course of the revision of the Labour Code to include a provision expressly defining and prohibiting sexual harassment in employment and occupation. The Committee notes that the Government again asserts that the provisions of the Penal Code are sufficient, and that in addition a complainant could submit a complaint of discrimination to the Ministry of Labour. The Committee recalls that the Penal Code addresses rape and other forms of sexual assault, but does not address the full range of behaviour that constitutes sexual harassment in employment and occupation. The Committee considers that addressing sexual harassment through criminal proceedings is not sufficient due to the sensitivity of the issue, the higher burden of proof, and the limited range of behaviour addressed. The Committee also considers that the non-discrimination provisions in the Labour Law are not sufficient, as they cover only wages and termination of employment and do not expressly define and prohibit all forms of sexual harassment. The Committee recalls that sexual harassment is a serious manifestation of sex discrimination and a violation of human rights, and requires effective measures to prevent and prohibit it, which should address both quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment (General Survey, 2012, paragraph 789). The Committee once again urges the Government to take steps to define and prohibit expressly sexual harassment in employment and occupation, encompassing both quid pro quo and hostile environment harassment. The Committee also asks the Government to take practical measures to prevent and address sexual harassment, and to provide detailed information in this regard.

Migrant workers. The Committee notes, as indicated above, that the Labour Law excludes from coverage of the non-discrimination provisions groups that will be comprised largely of migrant workers, namely "domestic servants and persons regarded as such, including agricultural workers, security house-guards, nannies, drivers and cooks". The Committee recalls that it has been raising concerns regarding the particular vulnerability of migrant workers to discrimination, in particular migrant domestic workers. The Committee also recalls the adoption of Order No. 79 of 16 April 2009, section 2 of which provides that "a foreign worker shall have the right to transfer to work with another employer without violating the rights of the employer by virtue of the provisions of the law or the text of the labour contract concluded between the parties". The request to change employers must be approved by the Labour Market Regulatory Authority (section 5). The Government indicates that between 1 August 2009 and 31 March 2011, out of 18,340 foreign workers who changed employer, only 215 did so without the employer's approval (1.17 per cent). The Government indicates that a tripartite committee has been discussing the impact of the Order on the labour market, and has decided that a company has the right to specify in the labour contract the prohibition of a worker's transfer to a competitive company for a defined period. The Government also indicates that an employer generally has the right to include in the employment contract a requirement limiting the approval of a transfer to another employer for a specified period. If the worker does not adhere to the terms of the contract, the employer can claim compensation from the court. The Committee considers that permitting an employer to stipulate limitations on the transfer to another employer in the employment contract could undermine the objective of Order No. 79 because, due to unequal bargaining power, migrant workers may be pressured to agree to such provisions, once again placing them in a position of increased dependency, and seriously affecting their enjoyment of labour rights and exposing them to discriminatory practices. The Committee asks the Government:

- (i) to ensure effective protection of all migrant workers against discrimination on the grounds of race, sex, colour, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin, and to ensure that they have access to appropriate procedures and remedies, and to provide information on concrete steps taken in this regard;
- (ii) to ensure that any rules adopted to regulate the right of migrant workers to change employers do not impose conditions or limitations that could increase the dependency of migrant workers on their employers, and thus increase their vulnerability to abuse and discriminatory practices;
- (iii) to provide information on the number of migrant workers, disaggregated by sex, occupation and country of origin, that have changed employers pursuant to Order No. 79 (with employer's approval, without employer's approval, and after the end of the work permit);

- (iv) to provide information on the nature and number of requests received by the Labour Market Regulatory Authority for a transfer of employer without the employer's approval, disaggregated by sex, occupation and country of origin, and how many were refused and on what basis; and
- (v) to continue to provide information on the results of the examination by the committee to determine the impact of applying the Order and any follow-up thereto.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Bangladesh

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee notes the observations of the Bangladesh Employers' Federation (BEF) which are incorporated in the Government's report.

Assessment of the gender pay gap. The Committee recalls the 2008 ILO study "The gender wage gap in Bangladesh" and the findings of the 2007 wage survey carried out by the Bangladesh Bureau of Statistics, both of which show a wide and persistent gender pay gap. The Committee notes that the Government once again asserts that there is no gender pay gap in the formal sector, without providing any statistics or other information on the earnings of men and women in the public and private sectors. The Government does, however, acknowledge that pay gaps exist in the informal sector and in unorganized small enterprises, with nearly 80 per cent of the country's employment being in the informal economy, and informal employment having increased sharply for women. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that it faces difficulties in looking into the wage gap in small enterprises, which are spread over the countryside. The Bangladesh Employers' Federation states that it will be very difficult to minimize the wage gaps in the unorganized informal economy until the economic condition of the country improves. The Committee asks the Government to take steps to collect and analyse information, including statistical data disaggregated at least by sex, branch of activity, and occupation or occupational group, on the nature and extent of the gender pay gap in the formal and informal economies. Please also indicate the concrete steps taken to address and reduce the gender pay gap.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that section 345 of the Labour Act of 2006 provides that in determining wages or fixing minimum rates of wages the principle of equal wages for male and female workers for work of "equal nature or equal value" shall be followed. The Committee has been asking the Government for information on the measures taken to ensure the effective application of section 345, and notes in that context that the Government indicates generally that the principle is applied in the public and private sectors, and cites section 307 of the Labour Act, which provides penalties for violations of the provisions of the Labour Act. The Government also states generally that various ministries take measures to train inspectors, public officials, entrepreneurs, and middle managers of enterprises, and that seminars and workshops are organized for lawyers, judges and high-level officials. The Government also indicates that technical assistance could be useful to strengthen the capacity of responsible authorities in implementing the relevant provisions of the Act. The Committee asks the Government to provide specific information on measures taken with a view to the effective implementation of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, including detailed information on the contents of the training and awareness-raising activities to which the Government refers, as well as on any relevant judicial or administrative decisions. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on steps taken to secure ILO technical assistance, with a view to ensuring the effective implementation of section 345 of the Labour Act.

Article 1(a). Definition of remuneration. The Committee recalls section 2(xlv) of the Labour Act, which excludes particular aspects of remuneration from the definition of "wages". The Committee notes the Government's indication that depending on the nature of jobs, employers provide, for example, accommodation, which is a facility attached to the job and cannot be included in the definition of wages. The Committee recalls that the Convention sets out a broad definition of remuneration, which includes not only "the ordinary, basic or minimum wage or salary" but also "any additional emoluments whatsoever ... whether in cash or in kind" (Article 1(a)). The use of "any additional emoluments whatsoever" requires that all elements that a worker may receive for his or her work, including accommodation, are taken into account in the comparison of remuneration. Such additional components are often of considerable value and need to be included in the calculation. Otherwise much of what can be given a monetary value arising out of the job would not be captured (see General Survey on fundamental Conventions 2012, paragraphs 686–687, 690–691). The Committee asks the Government to take steps to broaden the scope of application of section 345 of the Labour Act to include all aspects of remuneration, and to provide specific information in this regard. In the meantime, the Committee again asks the Government to examine the extent to which the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is being applied in practice in relation to those aspects of remuneration which are excluded from the definition of "wages" under section 2(xlv) of the Labour Act, and to provide information on the steps taken in this regard.

Article 2(2)(b). Minimum wages. The Committee previously noted that wages were very low in the ready-made garments industry (RMG), in which 90 per cent of employees are women. The Committee notes that, pursuant to the wage order of 31 October 2010, the minimum wage for the RMG sector has increased from 1,650 Bangladeshi taka (BDT) to BDT3,000. The Committee notes, however, that in defining different functions in the wage order, sex-specific terminology remains in use, such as "pressing men" or "pressing women". Such terminology should be avoided so as not to reinforce stereotypical attitudes regarding whether certain jobs should be carried out by men or women. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that 45 sectors are now covered by the minimum wage scheme, including jute industries, tailoring, oil mills and vegetable products. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the developments with respect to the coverage and rates of minimum wages. The Committee again asks the Government to indicate how in practice it is ensured that in determining minimum wage rates for sectors or occupations in which women are predominantly employed, the work being undertaken is not being undervalued, including whether any specific method is used to objectively determine the value of the various jobs. The Committee also asks the Government to take steps to ensure that gender-neutral terminology is used in defining the various jobs and occupations in the wage orders, and to provide specific information in this regard.

Article 4. Cooperation with workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the representatives of employers' and workers' organizations are members of the Minimum Wage Board, and are included in the wage commissions when the Government forms such commissions. The Committee asks the Government to provide more detailed information on the role of the social partners on the Minimum Wage Board and the wage commissions with respect to promoting and ensuring the application of the principle of the Convention. The Committee also once again asks the Government to indicate the specific measures taken to seek actively the cooperation of workers' and employers' organizations to give effect to the provisions of the Convention, including any training and awareness-raising activities on the principle of the Convention and the related provisions of the Labour Act.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1972)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Prohibition of discrimination. For a number of years, the Committee has been raising concerns regarding the absence of legislative provisions prohibiting discrimination in employment and occupation based on all the grounds listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, with respect to all aspects of employment and occupation as defined in Article 1(3) of the Convention, and covering all workers. The Committee notes that the Government cites sections 19(1), 27 and 28 of the Constitution, which provide respectively that the State shall endeavour to ensure equality of opportunity to all citizens (section 19(1)); all citizens are equal before the law (section 27); the State shall not discriminate against citizens on the grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex or place of birth (section 28(1)); and women shall have equal rights with men in all spheres of State and public life (section 28(2)). The Committee recalls that general equality and non-discrimination provisions in the Constitution, although important, have generally not proven to be sufficient to address specific cases of discrimination in employment and occupation (General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 851). The Committee notes in particular that the main non-discrimination provision of the Constitution is aimed at ensuring that the State does not discriminate, and does not address the situation of the private sector nor does it prohibit all the grounds of discrimination enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. The Government provides no information on the outcome of the tripartite review of the Labour Act, which was scheduled to take place in 2009 and 2010, referred to in its previous reports. The Committee asks the Government to take concrete steps to amend the Labour Act of 2006, so as to include a prohibition of direct and indirect discrimination, on at least all the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, with respect to all aspects of employment, and covering all categories of workers, including domestic workers, and to report on the progress made in this regard. The Committee reiterates its request to the Government to indicate how the protection of men and women against discrimination in employment and occupation is ensured in practice, including for those categories of workers excluded from the scope of the Labour Act.

Gender equality. The Committee welcomes the adoption of the National Women's Development Policy 2011 and the National Education Policy 2010. The main goals of the National Women's Development Policy include ensuring full and equal participation of women in the mainstream activities of socio-economic development, building women's capacities through education and skills development, and eliminating all forms of discrimination against women and girls. Pursuant to the National Education Policy, the main objectives for women's education include encouraging and enhancing the efficiency of women to participate in decision-making processes, and ensuring women's participation in socio-economic development by engaging in different economic activities or self-employment. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that 62.28 per cent of the total allocation by the Rural Development and Cooperative Division is estimated to benefit women and girls; the Government also provides credit support to women for agricultural activities, as well as microcredit support to women for small-scale agricultural businesses. While welcoming these measures, the Committee observes that there remains significant gender segregation in the labour market. For example, the participation rate of women in the nursing college is 100 per cent, and in the directorate of nursing it is 92.5 per cent. The employment of women in the primary education sector is also high, and in non-registered private schools 95.2 per cent of the total number of teachers are women. In addition, a total of six Women's Technical Training Centres have been established, targeted at women who migrate as domestic workers to Middle-Eastern countries. The Committee also notes that the Bangladesh Computer Council has introduced a training course on information and communications technology specifically for women, benefiting 70 women in 2010–11. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken to promote gender equality in employment and occupation, and the results achieved. The Committee also asks the Government to provide further information on the content of the training provided by the Women's Technical Training Centres, and to indicate how it is ensured that access to education and vocational training for women is not limited in practice due to stereotyped assumptions regarding women's roles and capabilities. Recalling its previous comments, the Committee again urges the Government to take immediate steps to ensure that women have access, on an equal footing with men, to jobs in the public sector, and to provide full statistical information on the situation of men and women in the labour market, and in education and training.

Sexual harassment. The Committee recalls section 332 of the Labour Act prohibiting conduct towards female workers that is indecent or repugnant to their modesty or honour, and the guidelines on sexual harassment issued by the High Court judgment in 2009. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that in the context of the ILO technical assistance project "Promoting gender equality and preventing violence against women at the workplace" from 2010 to 2012, awareness-raising activities to reduce sexual and non-sexual harassment of women at the workplace, targeting government officials, managers, trade union leaders and workers, were scheduled to be undertaken. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that, in cooperation with workers' and employers' organizations, it has enacted appropriate laws, and adopted policies and mechanisms concerning sexual harassment. However, the Government does not provide any details in this regard, nor is information provided regarding the consideration of this issue in the context of the review of the Labour Act, as previously indicated by the Government. The Committee asks the Government to provide specific information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure the implementation of the High Court's guidelines on sexual harassment in the private and public sectors. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the progress made in enacting specific legislation on sexual harassment and in amending section 332 of the Labour Act. The Government is also requested to take measures to raise the awareness of workers, employers and their organizations regarding the rights, obligations and procedures with respect to sexual harassment in employment and occupation, and to provide specific information on progress made in this regard.

Article 5. Special measures of protection. The Committee recalls that it has previously raised concerns regarding sections 39, 40 and 42, read with section 87 of the Labour Act 2006, which it considers to be gender biased with respect to women's capabilities and aspirations. The Committee recalls that pursuant to section 87, restrictions set out in sections 39, 40 and 42, which relate specifically to adolescent workers, including regarding working with machinery, are applied to women. The Committee notes the Government's indication that 90 per cent of women are Muslims, and wear a sari, therefore, they cannot work safely with dangerous or moving machines. While noting the Government's explanation, the Committee remains concerned that such limitations are based on stereotyped assumptions, equating women with adolescents in need of heightened protection, and are likely to impact negatively on women's employment opportunities. The Committee recalls that provisions relating to the protection of persons working under hazardous or difficult conditions should be aimed at protecting the health and safety of both men and women at work, and that it may be necessary to examine what other measures are necessary to ensure that women can access these types of jobs on an equal footing with men (General Survey, 2012, paragraph 840). The Committee notes that the Government again provides no information regarding the legislative review which was expected to address these provisions. The Committee asks the Government to take steps to review and amend sections 39, 40, 42 and 87 of the Labour Act, with a view to ensuring that women are able to access employment on an equal footing with men, and that any limitations or restriction applying to women are strictly limited to maternity protection.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Barbados

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1974)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Legislative developments. The Committee notes the observations by the Barbados Workers' Union (BWU), dated 31 August 2011, expressing disappointment at the time it has taken to enact legislation with respect to sexual harassment and employment rights. The BWU also indicates that the Employment Rights Bill will address discrimination in employment and occupation based on union status, HIV/AIDS status, disability, military and civic obligations imposed by law, pregnancy, race, colour, gender, marital status, religion, age, political opinion, national extraction, social origin or indigenous origin, or where the employee is responsible for the care and welfare of a child or a dependent family member. The Committee notes that it has been commenting for many years that the existing legislation does not provide full legislative protection against discrimination as defined under the Convention and that, in this context, the Government has been referring to the Employment Rights Bill since 2004. The Committee asks the Government to take steps without further delay to ensure full legislative protection against direct and indirect discrimination in all aspects of employment and occupation, for all workers, on all the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, namely race, sex, colour, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin. The Committee welcomes the additional grounds of discrimination, as foreseen in Article 1(1)(b) of the Convention, that appear to be included in the Employment Rights Bill, and asks the Government for information on the status of the process for the adoption of the Bill.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Belgium

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1952)

Measures to address the gender wage gap. New legislation. The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the Act of 22 April 2012, the aim of which is to tackle the wage gap between men and women. The Act provides for the following: an obligation for enterprises with more than three employees to disaggregate by gender the data to be included in the social balance sheet; an obligation to negotiate measures to tackle the wage gap at inter-occupational and sectoral levels; and the organization of mandatory consultation in enterprises with 50 employees or more with a view to producing a “gender-neutral remuneration policy”. This requires a detailed analysis every two years of the structure of remuneration in the enterprise so as to establish, if the staff representatives deem it necessary, an action plan setting out specific objectives indicating the areas they are to cover and the instruments for obtaining them, a deadline for implementation and a system for monitoring it. The Act also provides for the possibility in enterprises with 50 employees or more of appointing a mediator to assist the employer and the workers in applying the measures to tackle the wage gap and to hear workers’ grievances concerning wage inequality. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the application of the Act of 22 April 2012 in practice, at sectoral and enterprise level, including any implementing texts and provide details on the appointment of mediators and the outcomes achieved, and on any difficulties encountered in giving effect to the Act.

Articles 2(2) and 3 of the Convention. Collective agreements. Job evaluation. With regard to the implementation of collective agreement No. 25ter of 9 July 2008, which provides that all sectors and enterprises must review and adapt their job classification systems, the Committee notes the information from the Government that certain joint committees have reviewed their job classifications. The Committee notes in this connection that according to the Act of 22 April 2012, the social partners’ inter-occupational agreement and sectoral collective agreements must contain measures to tackle the gender wage gap, in particular by making job classification systems gender neutral. Furthermore, the job appraisal classification systems developed in joint committees must be submitted to the General Directorate of Collective Labour Relations of the Federal Public Service Employment, Labour and Social Dialogue for scrutiny of the gender neutrality of the systems. This is particularly so in the light of collective agreement No. 25 of 15 October 1975 on equal remuneration for men and women workers, and the checklist “Gender neutrality in job classification and evaluation”, produced by the Institute for the Equality of Women and Men (IEFH). If this scrutiny brings to light any elements that are not gender neutral, the joint committee concerned draws up a plan of action to remove them within two years. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the following points:

- (i) the conclusion of collective agreements and the content of the inter-occupational agreement to tackle the wage gap between men and women;
- (ii) details of the monitoring of job classifications by joint committees and the adoption of gender-neutral job classifications, and the number and content of any action plans produced by joint committees;
- (iii) the dissemination and the use made in practice of the tools developed for enterprises and the social partners, such as the job classification guide and the checklist “Gender neutrality in job classification and evaluation” produced by the IEFH, and the measures taken to provide training for the persons concerned.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Plurinational State of Bolivia

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1973)

Principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government’s indication that the preliminary draft amendment to the General Labour Act provided that “the State, through the Ministry of Labour, shall promote the inclusion of women at work and shall guarantee the same remuneration as for men for work of equal value”. In this respect, the Committee notes that, according to the Government, work on this draft has come to a standstill because the Bolivian Central of Workers (COB), which is involved in its drafting, has requested that the health and municipal sectors participate in the work on the Labour Act. The Committee also notes that, according to a communication sent by the Government from the Vice-Ministry of Justice and Fundamental Rights, the National Plan of Action for Human Rights 2009–2013 refers, in its Chapter 6 on women’s rights, to the formulation and implementation of a cultural campaign for “equal work, equal wages, equal opportunities and equal rights” and that the body responsible for implementing this chapter is the Ministry of Labour. Recalling that article 48 of the Constitution refers to the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value, the Committee hopes that the General Labour Act will be adopted in the near future and that it will give full effect to the principle of the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to send information on any developments in this respect. The Committee also asks the Government to send specific information on the measures adopted by the Ministry of Labour, in the context of the implementation of Chapter 6 on women’s rights of the National Plan of Action for Human Rights, for which it is responsible.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1977)

Legislation. National Constitution. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption of the new National Constitution, of February 2009, which stipulates that the State's basic aims and functions are to establish a fair and harmonious society, without discrimination, with full social justice, with a view to consolidating plurinational identities while ensuring equal conditions between men and women. The Committee also notes that on 8 October 2010, Act No. 45 against racism and any form of discrimination was adopted, the objective of which is to establish mechanisms and procedures to prevent and punish racist behaviour and any form of discrimination through the establishment of public policies to provide protection against, and prevent, racist crimes and any form of discrimination. The Act applies to both the public and private sectors and to all Bolivian citizens and naturalized persons, as well as those living on the national territory. The Committee also notes that similar to the definition contained in the National Constitution, section 5(a) of the Act defines discrimination as all forms of discrimination, exclusion, restriction or preference based on a series of grounds; these include those listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, as well as additional grounds as foreseen in Article 1(1)(b): sex, colour, age, sexual orientation or gender identity, origin, culture, nationality, citizenship, language, religious belief, ideology, political or philosophical convictions, civil status, economic, social or health situation, profession, occupation or trade, level of education, different abilities and/or physical, mental or sensory disabilities, pregnancy, background, physical appearance, clothing, name or any other criteria that could nullify or impair the equal recognition of human rights and fundamental freedoms enshrined in the National Constitution and international law. Section 5(a) also stipulates that affirmative action measures shall not be considered discrimination. Section 5(b) establishes similar protection in the case of racial discrimination, considered to be any distinction, exclusion or preference based on grounds of race, colour, descent, or national or ethnic origin. Similarly, section 5(e) defines gender equality as being the recognition and valuing of the physical and biological differences of men and women, with a view to achieving social justice and equal opportunities, which guarantees that persons benefit fully from their rights irrespective of their gender in all areas of social, economic, political, cultural and family life. The Committee also notes Supreme Decree No. 0213 of July 2009, which establishes the mechanisms and procedures ensuring the right of every person not to be discriminated against in any selection and recruitment procedures in the public and private sectors. The Committee requests the Government to provide specific information on the implementation in practice of the National Constitution, of Act No. 45 against racism and any form of discrimination and Supreme Decree No. 213. The Government is also asked, in particular, to indicate the particular problems and difficulties of application that have been encountered in practice, and the way in which it is envisaged to deal with these. It is also asked to provide information on complaints submitted to the administrative or judicial authorities that might have been lodged in this respect. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the status of the preliminary draft General Labour Act and firmly hopes that this Act will be in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Bosnia and Herzegovina

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1993)

Follow-up to representation pursuant to article 24 of the ILO Constitution. The Committee recalls the communication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions of Bosnia and Herzegovina (SSS BiH), dated 20 August 2009, referring to the conclusions of the Governing Body of November 1999, regarding workers who had been dismissed from two undertakings on the ground of national extraction or religious belief. The conclusions had been made in the context of the representation made pursuant to article 24 of the ILO Constitution by the Union of Autonomous Trade Unions of Bosnia and Herzegovina (USIBH) and the Union of Metalworkers (SM). In its communication, ITUC and SSS BiH state that the situation has not been resolved and, in addition, indicates generally that there have been more and more cases of open violations of the Convention, noting specifically discriminatory job advertisements. Noting that the Government's report does not contain any information in this regard, the Committee urges the Government to provide specific information on the progress of implementation of the recommendations of the Governing Body, and with respect to the measures taken or envisaged to address discriminatory job advertisements.

Article 1 of the Convention. Legislative developments. The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the Prohibition of Discrimination Act of Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH) (No. 59/09, entry into force 5 August 2009). The Act defines and prohibits direct and indirect discrimination, including in employment, entrepreneurship, education and training, on a range of grounds, whether real or assumed, namely race, skin colour, language, religion, ethnic affiliation, national or social origin, connection to a national minority, political or any other persuasion, property, membership in trade union or other association, education, social status and sex, sexual expression or sexual orientation (sections 2, 3 and 6). The Act also includes harassment, sexual harassment, mobbing, assistance and incitement to discriminate as forms of discrimination (section 4). The Committee notes that "employment" under the Act includes work and working conditions, including access to employment, occupation and self-employment, working conditions, remuneration, promotions and dismissals; “training” includes all types and all levels of professional training, additional qualifications and requalifications, including gaining practical working experience (section 6). The mandate of the Ombud for Human Rights includes receiving individual and group complaints related to discrimination, collecting and analysing statistical data on discrimination cases, conducting surveys on discrimination, raising awareness of issues related to racism and racial discrimination in society, and improving policies and practices aimed at ensuring equal treatment (section 7). A claim can also be brought before the courts (sections 11 and 12). The Ministry for Human Rights and Refugees is to keep a database of discrimination cases (section 8). The Act also provides for the shifting of the burden of proof and protection against retaliation (sections 15 and 18). The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the practical application of the Prohibition of Discrimination Act, including the number and nature of complaints brought before the courts, the administrative bodies and the Ombud for Human Rights and the outcome thereof, including the remedies provided and sanctions imposed, as well as details regarding the other activities of the Ombud foreseen under the Act. Noting the Government’s statement that the Rulebook on the method of collecting data on cases of discrimination and the obligations arising from the adoption of the Act was being finalized, the Committee requests the Government to provide a summary of the Rulebook once it has been finalized.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Botswana

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1997)

Article 1 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. Legislation. For a number of years, the Committee has been asking the Government to ensure that, in the process of amending the Employment Act, full legislative expression is given to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. The Government has been indicating that the comments of the Committee would be taken into account and appropriate action would be taken to amend the law. The Committee notes, however, that the Government indicates that the Employment Act was amended in 2010 and merely reiterates its statement that the comments of the Committee will be considered in a future review of the Employment Act. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that although the principle of the Convention is not reflected in the legislation, the definitions of “wage”, “basic salary” and “contract of employment” do not make a distinction between men and women and that wages and salaries are not based on the employee’s sex. The Committee points out that this is not sufficient to ensure that men and women are paid the same remuneration (basic salary and additional emoluments) for work of equal value, and that the concept of “work of equal value” is essential to address and eliminate pay discrimination based on gender. The Committee recalls that due to stereotypical attitudes regarding women’s aspirations, preferences and capabilities, certain jobs are held predominantly or exclusively by women (such as in caring professions) and others by men (such as in construction) and that often “female jobs” are undervalued in comparison with work of equal value performed predominantly by men when determining wage rates. The concept of “work of equal value” is fundamental to tackling occupational sex segregation in the labour market, which exists in almost every country, as it permits a broad scope of comparison, going beyond equal remuneration for “equal”, “the same” or “similar” work, and also encompassing jobs that are of an entirely different nature, but which are nevertheless of equal value. The Committee therefore considers that it is essential to be able to compare the relative value of jobs in occupations which may involve different types of skills, responsibilities or working conditions, but which are nevertheless of equal value overall (see General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraphs 673–675). In light of the above and with a view to ensuring that men and women have a legal basis for asserting their right to equal remuneration with their employers and before competent authorities, the Committee asks the Government to take the necessary measures to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and to provide information on any measures taken in this regard.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1997)

Article 1 of the Convention. Legal protection from discrimination. Grounds of discrimination. Covering all aspects of employment. The Committee notes that section 23 of the Employment Act (restricting the grounds on which employers may terminate contracts of employment) was amended in 2010, so as to explicitly include in the list of prohibited grounds for termination of employment, “sexual orientation”, “health status” and “disability”, and at the same time removing from this list “national extraction” and “political opinions” (section 23(d)), and to insert a general provision (new section 23(e)). The Committee notes therefore that under the Employment Act as amended, termination of employment is now prohibited on the basis of: (i) “the employee’s membership of a registered trade union or participation in any activities connected with a registered trade union outside working hours or, with the consent of the employer, within working hours” (section 23(a)); (ii) “the employee’s race, tribe, place of origin, social origin, marital status, gender, sexual orientation, colour, creed, health status or disability” (section 23(d) as amended); or (iii) “any other reason which does not affect the employee’s ability to perform that employee’s duties under the contract of employment” (new section 23(e)). The Committee also notes that in accordance with the Code of Good Practice: Employment Discrimination, which was approved on 23 August 2002, discrimination is prohibited on the basis of “but not limited to” race, tribe, place of origin, national extraction, social origin, marital status, political opinions, sex, colour or creed (section 3.2). The Code of Good Practice further indicates that there may be other grounds such as religion, HIV status, family responsibility, language, etc. While noting the general prohibition of discrimination added to the Employment Act, the Committee recalls that where legal provisions are adopted to give effect to the principle of the Convention, they should specify at least all the grounds of discrimination set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention and cover all aspects of employment and occupation, including training, recruitment and selection and all terms and conditions of employment. Given that there are grounds specifically enumerated in the Employment Act, and the grounds of “national extraction” and “political opinion” have been expressly removed from this list, the Committee notes that it is of particular importance that all the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention are specifically addressed in the Act. The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 23(d) of the Employment Act in order to prohibit explicitly discrimination based on at least the grounds of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin, and to cover all aspects of employment and occupation, including recruitment and terms and conditions of employment. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this respect. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the application in practice of section 23(e) of the Employment Act, including any interpretation by the administrative or judicial authorities. The Government is also asked to provide information on any steps taken to foster knowledge among workers and employers and their organizations of the code of good practice on employment discrimination.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Brazil

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1965)

Legislative developments. The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 12288 issuing the Charter for Racial Equality, which is intended to guarantee for the black population equality of opportunity, the defence of their rights and action to combat discrimination. The Committee notes that the Act envisages the adoption of vocational training, employment and school attendance policies and programmes, the granting of incentives for the adoption of equality measures in the private sector, access to credit for small-scale production and awareness-raising campaigns against the marginalization of black women. The Committee also notes that the Secretariat for Women’s Policies has established a Working Group on Equality in the World of Work with a view to examining the Bill on equality and the elimination of discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the implementation and impact in practice of Act No. 12288 issuing the Charter for Racial Equality, as well as information on the progress in the adoption of the Bill on equality and the elimination of discrimination.

Article 2 of the Convention. Equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of race and colour. The Committee notes the statistical information disaggregated by race, colour (whites, blacks and mixed race) and sex provided by the Government. The data show that in 2010 the employment rate of mixed-race workers increased by 11.23 per cent, that of whites by 5.5 per cent and that of blacks by 7.89 per cent. The employment rate of indigenous workers rose by 5.1 per cent. The Committee further notes that the participation rate of black workers in the labour market remained at 5.5 per cent while that of mixed-race workers rose to 28.98 per cent in 2010. The data provided by the Government also show an increase in the educational level of black and mixed-race workers, although a disparity in productivity persists in relation to white workers which is due, according to the Government, to differences in educational levels. The Government adds that the participation rate of women in the labour market is 20 per cent lower than that of men, with that of white women being higher than that of women of African origin (59.4 and 55.7 per cent, respectively). The unemployment rate also shows the existence of differences on grounds of sex and race. While the unemployment rate of black women was 12 per cent, that of white women was 9.5 per cent, the rate for black men was 6.8 per cent and for white men it was 5.5 per cent. In relation to wages, the Government indicates that white workers receive a wage that is 46.40 per cent higher than that of black workers and 41.78 per cent higher than that of mixed-race workers, but emphasizes that the wage gap has been reduced since 2009. The Government emphasizes the need to provide greater training to people of African origin with a view to reducing the wage gap and enabling them to gain access to better quality jobs. The Government adds that the PlanSeQ for people of African origin has this objective and provides information on the numerous training activities undertaken in the context of the Plan. The Government also provides extensive information on the measures and activities taken in the context of the ethnic development solidarity project for Quilombola communities. While noting the statistics and the information supplied by the Government, which portray the persistent difficulty of black, mixed-race and indigenous workers in gaining access to employment and education, the Committee notes that the information provided does not enable it to fully assess the results and progress achieved over time as a result of the measures adopted. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing statistical data disaggregated by sex, race and colour as a basis for determining the distribution of workers in the various occupations, jobs and economic sectors. It also asks the Government to make further efforts to guarantee full equality of treatment and opportunities for all workers, irrespective of their gender, race, colour or ethnicity. In particular, the Committee requests the Government to continue supplying information on the measures adopted in practice in the context of these programmes and their impact on the eradication of discrimination. The Committee especially asks the Government to provide information on the impact of the National Plan for Racial Equality for communities of African origin, indigenous and gypsy communities and the solidarity project for the ethnic development of Quilombola communities.

Discrimination on the ground of political opinion. Observing that the Government has not provided specific information on this subject, the Committee requests it to indicate the measures adopted with a view to ensuring that workers do not suffer discrimination on the basis of political opinion, including information on any complaints brought for this reason and their outcome.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1969)

Article 1 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. In its previous comments, the Committee pointed out that the 2004 Labour Code did not clearly reflect the principle of the Convention. Even though it expressly established the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, it also provided for equal wages for workers regardless of their sex “given equal conditions of work, vocational qualifications and output” (section 175). In its previous observation the Committee also noted that section 182 of Act No. 028-2008/AN of 13 May 2008 issuing the Labour Code reproduces the provisions of the former Code with regard to equal remuneration for men and women. It pointed out that the coexistence of these provisions may lead to confusion or conflict when it comes to applying the principle of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the Government’s explanation that these criteria must be read together and not separately. The Government adds that work of equal value is work that demands of employees a comparable set of occupational skills or capacities. The Government also states that in the interests of a more harmonious interpretation of certain provisions, it has organized training sessions for labour inspectors and controllers, employers’ and workers’ organizations, judges, assessors and arbitrators. While noting the Government’s efforts to disseminate the concept of “work of equal value” among the various stakeholders, the Committee nonetheless points out that two jobs may overall be of equal value yet may not be performed in equal conditions of work nor by persons whose qualifications or output are equal. The concept of “work of equal value” has to do with the nature of the work, in other words the tasks to be performed, and requires an evaluation of tasks based on objective criteria that are free from gender bias, such as skills and qualifications, physical and mental effort, responsibilities and working conditions. To limit work of equal value to work performed in equal conditions of work, requiring equal qualifications and output is to narrow the possibilities for job comparison, thus hindering full application of the principle of the Convention (see General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraphs 672–679). The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary steps to bring section 182 of the 2008 Labour Code into full conformity with the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value laid down in the Convention and to provide information on measures taken in this regard. It furthermore encourages the Government to continue to provide training for persons responsible for enforcing equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value in practice.

The Committee is raising others points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Burundi

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. The Committee recalls that both article 57 of the Constitution and section 73 of the Labour Code provide for equal remuneration for equal work, which falls short of fully reflecting the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value as set out in Article 1 of the Convention. In its report, the Government states that there is no obstacle to reflecting the principle of the Convention in the national legislation. Noting the Government’s willingness to bring article 57 of the Constitution and section 73 of the Labour Code into conformity with the Convention, the Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures as soon as possible and to indicate in its next report the progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1993)

In its 2008 observation, the Committee noted the observations dated 30 August 2008 from the Trade Union Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU) on the application of the Convention, and noted that the Government had not replied to them. The Committee notes a new communication dated 31 August 2012 from COSYBU containing observations on the application of the Convention. COSYBU again highlights the existence of discriminatory recruitment practices in the public service, based on membership of the political party in power. According to the confederation, such practices are starting to become widespread in non-governmental organizations and foreign companies. The Committee requests the Government to send any comments that it may wish to make in reply to the observations from COSYBU.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the comments on the application of the Convention made by the Trade Union Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU) dated 30 August 2008, to which the Government has not as yet replied. It requests the Government to provide its comments regarding the issues raised by COSYBU.

Discrimination based on race, colour or national extraction. In its previous comments the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken to address discrimination in employment between different ethnic groups. In reply, the Government once again refers to the 2005 Constitution, and to the Arusha Agreement. As previously noted by the Committee, article 122 of the Constitution prohibits discrimination based, inter alia, on an individual's origin, race, ethnicity, sex, colour and language. The Committee also notes that, pursuant to article 129(1) of the Constitution, 60 per cent and 40 per cent of the seats in Parliament are reserved for Hutus and Tutsis, respectively. Similar provisions also exist for government positions. In its report, the Government also asserts that ethnic discrimination in employment and occupation no longer exists. As the elimination of discrimination and the promotion of equality is a continual process, and cannot be achieved solely through legislation, the Committee finds it difficult to accept statements to the effect that discrimination is inexistent in a given country. It stresses the need for the Government to take continuing action with a view to promoting and ensuring non-discrimination and equality in employment and occupation. The Committee therefore reiterates its request for information on any specific measures taken to promote and ensure equality of opportunity and treatment, irrespective of ethnic origin, in respect of employment in the private and public sectors, including awareness-raising activities and measures to promote respect and tolerance between the different groups. It also reiterates its request for information on the activities of the newly established public service recruitment commission with a view to promoting equal access to public service employment of different ethnic groups.

The Committee notes that, despite the provisions of article 7 of Protocol I to the Arusha Agreement which provides for the promotion of disadvantaged groups, notably the Batwa, the Working Group of Expats on Indigenous Populations/Communities of the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights (Report of the Research and Information Visit to the Republic of Burundi, March–April 2005, page 31) reports that this particular group continues to suffer from strong negative stereotypes and racial harassment by other segments of the population. While taking note of the Government's very general statement that measures have been taken in the field of education, the Committee observes that, according to the African Commission's Working Group, the Batwa's access to education is well below the national average. The illiteracy rate among the Batwa is estimated to be over 78 per cent. The Committee urges the Government to take all measures necessary to ensure equal access of the Batwa to education, vocational training and employment, including through reviewing and strengthening relevant national laws and policies and ensuring their full implementation. The Committee also requests the Government to take measures to combat stereotypes and prejudice against this group. The Government is requested to provide detailed information with regard to these matters in its next report.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Cambodia

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1999)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Definition of remuneration. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the definition of "wage" set out in section 103 of the Labour Law of 1997 excludes health care, legal family allowance, travel expenses and benefits granted exclusively to help the worker do his or her job, and thus is narrower than the definition of remuneration under the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that Notification No. 230/2012 of the Ministry of Labour and Vocational Training provides for more benefits for workers in garment and footwear industries, including transportation and accommodation allowances. The Government states that it is not considering amending the Labour Law. The Committee recalls that the purpose of the broad definition of "remuneration", in particular the reference to "any additional emoluments whatsoever", enshrined in Article 1(a) of the Convention is to capture all elements that a worker may receive for his or her work including additional allowance paid in kind (see General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraphs 686, 690–691). The Committee encourages the Government to take steps to amend the Labour Law in order to bring it in line with Article 1(a) of the Convention.

Article 1(b). Work of equal value. The Committee recalls that section 106 of the Labour Law provides for equal wages for workers for "work of equal conditions, professional skill and output ... regardless of their origin, sex or age", which is narrower than the principle set out in the Convention. It also recalls that the concept of "work of equal value" under the Convention not only encompasses equal remuneration for workers who work under equal conditions, professional skill and output, but also allows for the comparison of jobs that are of an entirely different nature, but which are nevertheless of equal value (see General Survey, 2012, paragraph 677). The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain information in this respect. Recalling the importance of giving full legislative expression to the concept of "work of equal value", in order to address effectively direct or indirect pay discrimination that results from the undervaluing of work performed predominantly or exclusively by women, the Committee again urges the Government to take steps to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. It hopes that progress will be made in the near future, and asks the Government to provide specific information on the concrete steps taken in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Cameroon

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1970)

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Work of equal value. Legislation. For several years the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the fact that section 61(2) of the Labour Code makes payment of an equal wage to all workers, regardless of their origin, sex, age, status and religious belief, contingent on there being "equal conditions of work and skill", so that it does not give full effect to the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value. The Committee recalls that the concept of "work of equal value" lies at the heart of the fundamental right of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and of the promotion of equality. Due to stereotypical attitudes regarding women's aspirations, preferences and capabilities, certain jobs are held predominantly or exclusively by women and others by men. When wage rates are determined, "female jobs" are often undervalued in comparison with work of equal value performed by men. The concept of "work of equal value" is therefore fundamental to tackling occupational sex segregation, because it permits a broad scope of comparison, including equal remuneration for "equal", "the same" or "similar" work, but also encompassing equal remuneration for jobs that are of an entirely different nature but which are nevertheless of equal value (see General Survey on fundamental Conventions of 2012, paragraph 673). The Committee again notes that the Government refers to the Bill to revise the current Labour Code and states that the version of the draft examined by the Advisory Labour Committee amends section 61(2) of the Labour Code to align it with the Convention. Noting that the Bill is currently under examination by the Prime Minister's Office, the Committee trusts that the Government will be able to confirm its adoption in the near future and that the new text will contain provisions that fully reflect the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value laid down in the Convention. The Government is asked to continue to provide information on progress made in the revision of the Labour Code and to provide copies of the Act to amend it as soon as it has been adopted.

Article 2(2)(c). Collective agreements. For several years the Committee has been pointing out that section 70 of the CAMRAIL collective agreement is discriminatory in that it grants travel allowances only to the wife and children of a worker and not to the husband of a female employee. It has asked the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the provisions of the CAMRAIL collective agreement comply with the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. The Committee notes that the Government again states that it is in the process of taking the necessary steps to ensure that the clauses of the CAMRAIL collective agreement observe the principle established in the Convention. It also indicates that the forthcoming revision of the collective agreement will enable the Joint Committee to examine the discriminatory provision. The Committee notes that in a communication of 20 October 2011 the Cameroon Trade Union Congress (CTUC) indicates that in violation of the Convention, the employers refuse to apply the principle of equal remuneration in collective agreements, and there is no pressure on them to do so. In view of the Government's commitments, the Committee trusts that it will shortly be in a position to report that the discriminatory clauses on additional emoluments in the CAMRAIL collective agreement have been revised, and asks the Government to provide information in this regard. Furthermore, in the absence of a reply on the matter, it again asks the Government to state more generally the action taken to encourage the social partners to examine collective agreements in the light of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and to revise any discriminatory clauses identified. Please also provide copies of relevant extracts of collective agreements.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1988)

The Committee notes that the report submitted by the Government in 2012 is identical to the one which it sent in 2011. The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will supply information in reply to the questions raised in its previous observation, which dealt with the points raised below. The Committee notes the observations made by the General Union of Cameroon Workers (UGTC) in a communication dated 29 October 2012, and invites the Government to send any comments in reply to these observations.

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Legislation. The Committee notes that the Government merely reaffirms that it is in the process of completely revising the Labour Code and its implementing regulations and that this revision will incorporate provisions defining and prohibiting direct and indirect discrimination based on each of the grounds listed in the Convention. Noting that the Bill revising the Labour Code has been examined by the Labour Advisory Committee and that it is being examined by the Prime Minister's office, the Committee trusts that the Government will be in a position to report on the adoption of this text in the near future and that it will contain provisions defining and explicitly prohibiting direct or indirect discrimination based on at least all the grounds listed in the Convention, in all aspects of employment and occupation, including access to vocational training. The Government is also requested to continue to supply information on progress made on the revision of the Labour Code and to forward a copy of the Act revising the Labour Code, once it has been adopted.

Discrimination based on sex. For a number of years the Committee has been urging the Government to take specific steps as soon as possible to implement the process of legislative reform in order to remove from the national legislation the provisions that have the effect of destroying or impairing equality of opportunity or treatment for women in employment and occupation, especially the provisions of the Penal Code and the Civil Code and also Decree No. 81-02 of 1981, which gives the husband the right to object to his wife working by invoking the interests of the household and the children. The Committee notes that the Government merely indicates that these provisions will be removed. Furthermore, as regards the progress of the Bill concerning the prevention and suppression of violence against women, the Government indicates that this is being examined by the Ministry for Women and the Family. The Committee is therefore bound to repeat its request and urges the Government to adopt without delay: the necessary measures to ensure that provisions that have the effect of discriminating against women in employment and occupation are removed from the legislation; and specific measures to combat stereotyping and prejudice regarding the respective roles of women and men in society so as to remove obstacles to the employment of women. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to report on the adoption of the Act concerning the prevention and suppression of violence against women and discrimination based on sex, and requests the Government to provide a copy of this text, once it has been adopted.

Article 2. National equality policy. The Committee recalls that the primary obligation of ratifying States is to declare and pursue a national policy designed to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment and occupation, with a view to eliminating any discrimination in respect thereof, and that specific, targeted measures need to be adopted to achieve this objective. These measures should make an effective contribution to the elimination of direct and indirect discrimination and the promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment for all categories of workers, in all aspects of employment and occupation, and in respect of all the grounds of discrimination covered by the Convention (see General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraphs 841–847). Recalling that no society is completely free from discrimination, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures as soon as possible to formulate and implement a national equality policy including programmes of action and specific measures to promote equality of opportunity and treatment without any distinction as to race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction or social origin and to take steps to address discriminatory practices in employment and occupation. The Government is requested to provide information on progress made in the formulation and implementation of this policy and on the results achieved.

The Committee further notes that the report does not contain any reply to its previous comments, which read as follows:

Discriminatory job offers. The Committee notes the communication of 9 September 2011, in which the General Union of Workers of Cameroon (UGTC) alleges that some companies continue to advertise gender-based job vacancies. The Committee points out that job vacancies addressed solely to men or to women are discriminatory unless the requirement for a man or a woman is inherent in the job (Article 1(2)), and that such exceptions must be interpreted narrowly to avoid restricting the protection afforded by the Convention unduly. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in reply to the UGTC's allegations, specifying in particular whether labour inspectors have dealt with instances of discriminatory employment vacancies addressed solely to men or to women, indicating any action they may have taken in such instances, for example, the penalties imposed.

Discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction. The Committee recalls the comments made by the General Confederation of Labour-Liberty (CGT-Liberté) concerning the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), alleging that certain enterprises apply wage differentials on the basis of ethnic origin. The Government indicates in its report that the Labour Code prohibits wage discrimination and that it is up to victims and trade unions to take legal action. In this respect, the Committee notes from the PAMODEC survey that the provisions in force regarding the system of the burden of proof with respect to discrimination make it very difficult for workers to prove that they are the victims of pay discrimination. This document adds that this is one of the reasons why, despite the fact that discrimination is felt to be widespread, legal action against discrimination is rarely seen. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on all the measures taken to guarantee the effective application of the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment without any distinction on the basis of race, colour or national extraction, including the measures taken in law and in practice to help workers to prove the existence of discrimination.

Article 5. Special measures of protection for women. The Committee notes the observations of 20 September 2010 by the UGTC alleging that some jobs and occupations are reserved for one or the other sex, a case in point being the firefighters of the firm ASECNA, which recruits only men. The Committee refers to its previous comments on the need to revise the list of jobs prohibited for women set forth in Order No. 16/MLTS of 27 May 1969, and notes the Government's statement that the revision of the Labour Code now under way will provide an opportunity to revise the list of jobs prohibited for women. Recalling that measures of protection for women must be restricted to maternity protection and must not be based on stereotypes regarding women's professional abilities and their role in society, which confine women to certain jobs, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the list of jobs prohibited for women in the light of these principles and to take measures to eliminate the obstacles to women's employment in practice. Please provide information on the measures taken to this end and send a copy of the Order as soon as it has been revised.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary measures in the near future.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2014.]

Canada

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee notes the observations provided by the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC) referred to in the Government's report as well as the Government's reply thereto.

Legislative developments. Federal. The Committee recalls that the Public Sector Equitable Compensation Act (PSECA), adopted in 2009, was expected to come into force once regulations were enacted. The Committee notes that consultations with stakeholders on the development of the regulations have begun and are scheduled to end in 2012. The Government indicates that the PSECA was enacted with a view to ensuring equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and the Government considers that the Act fully complies with the obligations under the Convention. The Committee recalls that the PSECA provides for an equitable compensation assessment of female dominated job groups (to be defined by regulations) or job classes (defined as classes composed of at least 70 per cent female employees) to assess the value of the work performed, without gender bias, which assessment is to lead to a plan to address any equitable compensation matters. The Committee also notes that "job class" is defined in section 2 to mean "two or more positions in the same job group that have similar duties and responsibilities, require similar qualifications, are part of the same compensation plan and are within the same range of salary rates". The Committee recalls that pursuant to the Convention, comparisons should be able to be made not only between jobs that have similar duties and responsibilities, require similar qualifications, are part of the same compensation plan or are within the same salary rate, but also between jobs that are entirely different in nature. It is not clear whether such comparison is provided for in the Act.

The Committee notes the continuing concerns expressed by the CLC which recommends that the Act be repealed and replaced by a proactive federal pay equity law, as initially recommended by the Pay Equity Task Force. The concerns raised by the CLC, which are similar to the concerns previously raised by the Parliamentary Standing Committee on the Status of Women in its June 2009 report, include the application of "market forces" as a standard to assess the value of work, the high threshold for defining a "female dominated group", the difficulty for individual women in bringing a complaint, and the move from a rights-based approach to pay equity, as set out by the Canadian Human Rights Act, to equal remuneration being a matter for negotiation. The Committee recalls that although the criteria to assess the value of work performed are linked to skill, effort, responsibility and conditions of work under the Human Rights Act, the assessment under the PSECA can be limited by factors such as market forces which may be inherently gender-biased and may not adequately ensure a non-discriminatory assessment.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that in the process of developing regulations to the PSECA, consultations are being undertaken with bargaining agents, employers, employees and others, and that the Government will be mindful of the impact of the regulations in implementing the policy goals of the legislation. The Government also indicates that under the PSECA, new positive obligations are established on employers and bargaining agents, including proactively examining compensation on a regular basis to determine whether there are any issues of equal remuneration that need to be addressed, as well as preparing reports and making them available to employees setting out how any identified equitable compensation matters are being resolved. The Committee notes that claims of non-compliance can be brought by employees to the Public Service Labour Relations Board, and that unionized employees continue to have access to other dispute resolution mechanisms such as arbitration and conciliation. The Committee also notes that employers and bargaining agents must refrain from "engaging in any conduct that may encourage or assist any employee in filing or proceeding with a complaint" under the Act (section 36); which is considered to be an offence and renders the offender liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding 50,000 Canadian dollars (CAD) (section 41). The Committee further notes the Government's indication that a periodic review of compensation based on the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value is included in the PSECA; occurring on a regular basis for unionized employees and required by employers under the Act for non-unionized employees in time frames that will be established in the forthcoming regulations.

The Committee asks the Government to provide information regarding the PSECA on the following:

- (i) the result of the consultations undertaken in the development of the regulations accompanying the PSECA, including any concerns raised and how such concerns have been addressed;
- (ii) the status of the adoption of the regulations and the bringing into force of the Act;
- (iii) how the equitable compensation on assessments are undertaken in practice, and how the right to equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is ensured in situations where the jobs being undertaken are of an entirely different nature, but are nevertheless of equal value;
- (iv) how it is ensured that assessments made under the PSECA are not gender biased, particularly given that factors such as market forces may be inherently gender biased;
- (v) any steps taken or envisaged to assist individual women in bringing complaints under the PSECA or to extend the procedures to permit collective claims;
- (vi) any steps taken or envisaged to ensure that the right to equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value has not been diminished through the redefinition of the female dominated group or class.

Noting that assistance given to employees in filing or proceeding with a complaint is considered to be an offence under the PSECA, the Committee asks the Government to consider repealing this prohibition as it may hinder the application of the right to equal remuneration for work of equal value in practice.

Legislative developments. Provincial. The Committee notes that, under the New Brunswick Pay Equity Act, which came into force on 1 April 2010, employers and bargaining groups have begun working on job evaluations using non-discriminatory job evaluation systems and were required to submit their reports by 31 May 2012 and start making pay adjustments on 1 April 2012. The Committee also notes that in Quebec, the Regulation respecting the report on pay equity (R.R.Q., c. E-12.001, r. 1) came into force on 1 March 2011, following the amendments brought to the Pay Equity Act in 2009, and indicates which employers are subject to the reporting obligation on pay equity and what information should be submitted by employers in their reports to determine whether they are effectively monitoring pay equity in their enterprise. The Government indicates that data would be compiled by autumn of 2012. The Committee also notes that Newfoundland and Labrador enacted the Human Rights Act in June 2010, which includes equal pay for work of equal value provisions similar to those found in earlier legislation. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the implementation of the job evaluations conducted in New Brunswick, including regarding the reports submitted and any consequent pay adjustments. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the application of the revised Quebec Pay Equity Act and the Regulation respecting the report on pay equity, including on the number of employers that have reported and the data collected.

Work of equal value. In its previous observations, the Committee has been noting that in a number of Canadian jurisdictions, full legislative expression had not been given to the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value, because the legislation limited comparisons to jobs involving the same work, similar work or substantially similar work. The Committee notes that the Government does not provide information on any changes in this regard. The Committee recalls that the legislation in Alberta, British Columbia, Newfoundland and Labrador, Saskatchewan, the North Territories and the Yukon does not give full legislative effect to the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value; and that in jurisdictions with pay equity legislation applicable in the public sector, notably, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, there does not appear to be any progress in adopting similar legislation for the private sector. The CLC considers that the current state of Canada's pay equity legislation remains inconsistent and in provinces that do not have any pay equity legislation, there are only inadequate provisions in provincial human rights legislation to rely upon. The Committee must once again urge the Government to take steps to ensure that the legislation in all the jurisdictions gives full expression to the concept of "work of equal value", so that the principle of the Convention is applied in both the public and private sectors. The Committee asks the Government to provide detailed information on any steps taken in this regard, including regarding any consultations undertaken with workers' and employers' representatives and representatives of the provinces and the territories concerned.

Enforcement. The Committee notes with interest the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of Public Service Alliance of Canada v. Canada Post Corp, delivered 17 November 2011, reinstating a decision of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal, finding that clerical work, performed mostly by women, was of equal value to the higher paying sorting and delivery work (postal operations) which was performed mainly by men. The Committee notes that the decision concerns jobs of a different nature but which were determined through the Hay method of job evaluation to be of equal value. The Committee notes with concern however, that the initial pay equity claim was filed pursuant to section 11 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, before the Canadian Human Rights Commission in 1983 with a final decision being rendered 28 years later. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on whether any steps are being taken or envisaged to ensure that remedies for equal remuneration are accessible, and available within a reasonable time.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Cape Verde

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1979)

Article 1 of the Convention. Work of equal value. The Committee recalls that article 61 of the Constitution provides for the principle of equal remuneration for equal work and that section 16 of the Labour Code provides that all workers have the right to fair remuneration according to the nature, quantity and quality of work. According to this section, all differences in remuneration for men and women based on objective criteria (merit, productivity and performance) are not considered discriminatory. In this regard, the Committee recalls that in their communications, the Commercial, Industrial and Agricultural Association of Barlovento (ACIAB), the National Union of Workers of Cape Verde–Trade Union Confederation (UNTC–CS) and the Cape Verde Confederation of Free Trade Unions (CCSL) have referred to the need to promote a better understanding among the social partners of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value provided for in the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government merely reiterates the information provided in its previous report. The Committee recalls once again that the provisions in the Constitution and in the Labour Code are insufficient to ensure the full application of the principle of the Convention because they do not encompass the concept of "equal value", and may therefore hinder progress in eliminating gender-based pay discrimination. Moreover, while criteria such as quality and quantity of work may be used to determine the level of earnings, the use of only these criteria is likely to have the effect of impeding an objective evaluation of the work performed by men and women on the basis of a wider range of criteria which are free from gender bias. The Committee asks the Government to take steps to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and recalls that such provisions should not only cover situations where men and women are performing the same or similar work but also situations where they carry out work that is of an entirely different nature but is nevertheless of equal value. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on any development thereon as well as on any awareness-raising campaigns or activities carried out with respect to the implementation of the principle of the Convention. Noting that section 15(1)(b) of the Labour Code provides that equity at work includes the right to receive special compensation; a compensation which is not allocated to all workers, but which is based, among other grounds, on sex, the Committee asks the Government to indicate the manner in which this provision is implemented in practice.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Central African Republic

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Application in law of the principle of equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value. The Committee refers to its previous observation in which it noted with regret that the new Labour Code (Act No. 09.004), because it limited equal wages to jobs involving "equal working conditions, skills and output", did not give full effect to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. It had therefore asked the Government to amend the relevant provisions of the Labour Code. Noting that the Government's report does not contain any information on measures envisaged or taken in this respect, the Committee asks the Government once again to take the necessary steps to amend sections 10 and 222 of Act No. 09.004 issuing the Labour Code so as to provide explicitly for equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value, and to provide information on any measures taken to this end.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Chad

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Grounds of discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to amend the national legislation in order to ensure that it at least covers discrimination on the basis of all the grounds listed in the Convention, including a prohibition on any discrimination based on race or colour. While noting the Government's statement that it faces difficulties which prevent it from revising the Constitution accordingly, the Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the fact that these grounds could be included in the provisions of the Labour Code concerning discrimination (sections 6 and 7), which in their current wording cover sex, age, nationality, membership or non-membership of a trade union, trade union activity, and the origin and opinions (particularly religious and political) of the worker, or that regulations implementing the Labour Code could be adopted to also cover race and colour before any revision of the Constitution is undertaken. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary steps to adopt legislation, or revise existing legislation or expand the provisions of the Labour Code so that at least all the grounds on which discrimination is based, which are prohibited under the terms of Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, are expressly covered by the national legislation, and to supply information on the measures adopted in this respect.

Discrimination on the basis of sex. For a number of years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the incompatibility of section 9 of Ordinance No. 006/PR/84 of April 1984 issuing regulations on trading with the provisions of the Convention and has asked the Government to take the necessary steps to repeal this provision. In view of the lack of any reply from the Government on this point, the Committee requests the Government to state whether the 1984 Ordinance is still in force and, consequently, to clarify whether a husband still has the right to object to the commercial activities of his spouse. If so, it urges the Government once again to repeal section of the Ordinance because of their discriminatory nature with regard to women.

Sexual harassment. In view of the lack of information on the measures taken or contemplated to combat sexual harassment in the workplace, the Committee is bound to repeat its request in this respect, referring once again to its general observation of 2002, in which it emphasizes that sexual harassment undermines equality at work by jeopardizing the integrity, dignity and well-being of workers and is harmful to enterprises by weakening the foundations of the employment relationship and reducing productivity.

Article 1(1)(b). Additional grounds of discrimination. The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 019/PR/2007 of 15 November 2007, protecting the rights of persons living with HIV and AIDS. This Act contains provisions which define the denial of access to employment for HIV-positive persons as a discriminatory act (section 22), prohibit screening for HIV in relation to obtaining employment, promotion, training or benefits (section 36), guarantee employment to any employee who is living with HIV as long as he or she is capable of working, and guarantees the offer of acceptable replacement work (section 36), and prohibit any penalty or dismissal on the basis of the worker's HIV status (section 38). The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the implementing decrees provided for in section 64 of the Act No. 019/PR/2007 have been adopted, particularly as regards the abovementioned provisions relating to the right to work (sections 32–41) and, if so, to provide a copy of the decrees. The Government is also requested to provide information on any measure taken or contemplated to ensure the effective implementation of these legislative provisions against discrimination towards, and stigmatization of, persons living with HIV and AIDS, for example awareness-raising campaigns on equality at work intended for workers' and employers' organizations, labour inspectors, magistrates and the general public.

Also noting, according to the information contained in the report drawn up by the Ministry of Education in October 2008 on the development of education, that an Act on the protection of disabled persons has been adopted, the Committee requests the Government to send a copy of it to the Office and indicate the steps taken to ensure in practice the equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment and occupation for disabled persons.

Article 2. National policy to promote equality. Access to education and vocational training. As regards education and training, on which actual possibilities of access to employment and occupation in both the public and private sectors depend, the Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 016/PR/06 of 13 March 2006 issuing guidelines for the Chadian education system, which focuses on combating the exclusion from education of groups considered the most vulnerable, namely girls living in rural areas, nomadic and lake-dwelling groups, street children, physically disabled persons, refugees and displaced persons, child domestic workers, child herders and child soldiers. The objectives of this Act include “ensuring equitable access to high-quality education for all Chadian children” and “promoting schooling for girls by removing stereotypes and other socio-economic and cultural obstacles to the full development of girls and women in terms of the education process”.

The Committee also notes, according to the abovementioned report on education, that incentives aimed at making school attendance more attractive to girls are provided for in the “National plan of action for education for all” and that experimental action has been taken in four pilot areas to promote schooling for girls, such as awareness raising on a large scale with regard to gender issues, grants to communities to undertake income-generating activities, waiving school fees and no age limits on school enrolment for girls, etc.

Welcoming the efforts made and the desire shown by the Government to achieve greater equality in the area of education and training, the Committee hopes that the planned measures to promote equal access to education will be implemented in the near future and that the abovementioned experimental measures can be extended throughout the country in order to rectify the inequalities which exist in practice. It requests the Government to supply information on the results achieved, in the context of the various mechanisms established, with respect to schooling and access to vocational training for girls and women, particularly those living in rural areas. Please also provide information on any measure taken or contemplated to combat discrimination on grounds other than sex in education and vocational training, including the results achieved.

Article 3(d). Employment in the public sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide as detailed information as possible on the measures taken or contemplated to promote and guarantee equality of opportunity and treatment in the public sector, including the results achieved by these measures in terms of employment, promotion and training of women within the public service. The Government is also requested to supply all available statistical information on the numbers of men and women employed at different levels in public service and, more generally, in the public sector.

Part V of the report form. Practical application and statistics. The Committee notes that in reply to its request for statistics the Government indicates that it will soon give labour inspectors the means to gather information relating to the situation of workers on the ground. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the steps taken to equip labour inspectors with the appropriate resources and to supply the statistical information thus obtained on employment in the private and public sectors, disaggregated by sex, and also any statistical information available on employment in the informal economy, in order to enable an evaluation of the effect given to the Convention in practice.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Chile

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the observations of the National Association of Public Employees (ANEF), the Association of Employees of the Women's National Service (SERNAM), the College of Teachers of Chile AG, the National Confederation of Trade and Services and the Confederation of Unions in the Banking and Financial System of Chile, dated 15 September 2011, which the Committee is addressing in its examination of the application of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). The Committee also notes the observations of 14 June 2012 of the Federation of CODELCO Chile Supervisors and Professionals (FESUC), stating that CODELCO workers hired since 2010, more of whom are women than previously, do not receive the same remuneration or have the same working conditions as those hired prior to 2010. The Committee asks the Government to send its comments on this matter.

Work of equal value. In its previous comments the Committee referred to Act No. 20348 of 2 June 2009, inserting section 62bis into the Labour Code establishing that employers must observe the principle of equal remuneration for men and women who carry on the same work, and asked the Government to revise this provision in order to bring it into conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government refers to a document entitled Temas Laborales núm. 27, on the “right to earn the same”, produced by the Labour Directorate, which highlights the difficulties in applying Act No. 20348 and the discrepancy between the principle established in the Act and that established in the Convention and recognizes that the Act is restrictive in that it refers to the same work rather than work of equal value thus weakening protection of women's wages. The Committee observes that the Government does not state whether any measures have been taken to amend this provision. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to revise section 62bis of the Labour Code in order to ensure equal remuneration for men and women not only in situations in which they perform equal or similar work but also in situations in which they carry out jobs which are different but which are nevertheless of equal value.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee notes the observations made by the National Association of Public Employees (ANEF), the Association of Employees of the National Women's Service (SERNAM), the College of Teachers of Chile AG, the National Confederation of Trade and Services and the Confederation of Unions in the Banking and Financial System, dated 15 September 2011. The Committee notes that, according to the trade union organizations, the current private pensions system, which is based on a fully funded scheme, is discriminatory in relation to women due to the use of differentiated mortality scales for men and women. As a result of the use of these scales, a man and a woman worker with equal accumulated funding who take retirement at the same age would receive annuities of differing amounts solely based on sex. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its reply that the use of differentiated scales is due to the life expectancy of women being higher and that the pensions of those affiliated to the private system are financed by their contributions. The Government adds that if the system of unisex scales were to be applied, women's pensions would increase, but would be exhausted more rapidly. The Government adds that the Presidential Advisory Council for Pensions Reform assessed whether unisex mortality tables should be introduced and found that it was not to be recommended for various reasons, including the following: the risk that may exist that the reserves constituted by insurance companies are not adequate; the implication of a cross subsidy between men and women; and the lack of experience of the application of unisex tables in other countries with individually funded pension systems. Noting that the use of differentiated mortality scales has the consequence that women receive lower pensions than men due to their longer life expectancy, which could be discriminatory, the Committee requests the Government to assess the real impact of differentiated scales based on their implementation at present on the amounts of the pensions actually received by pensioners and to provide information in this regard.

Article 1 of the Convention. Legislation. The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 20609 of July 2012 establishing measures to combat discrimination. The Committee notes that the Act is of broad application, covering all persons, and that its objective is to introduce judicial machinery to address cases of discrimination against any person. The Act lays down the following grounds of discrimination: race or ethnic origin, nationality, socio-economic situation, language, ideology or political opinion, religion or belief, trade union membership or participation in industry organizations or non-membership or participation, sex, sexual orientation, gender identity, civil status, age, family rank, personal appearance and illness or disability. While noting the inclusion of new criteria of discrimination, the Committee observes that the criteria of colour, national extraction and origin are not included in the list set out in the Act, even though they are included in section 2 of the Labour Code. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the Labour Code and Act No. 20609 are applied in practice and their interrelation in terms of the criteria established and the remedies available to victims. Please also provide information on the implementation of the Act in practice in relation to employment and occupation.

The Committee also notes the observations of the Trade Union Federation of the Category "A" of Supervisors and Professionals of CODELCO Chile (FESUC) of 14 June 2012 indicating that the workers in CODELCO recruited since 2010, who include more women than those recruited previously, do not receive the same remuneration or have the same conditions of work as those recruited prior to 2010. The FESUC adds that the Code of Conduct adopted by the enterprise in 2011 contains the following phrase: "I am aware that the reputation of CODELCO may be prejudiced if I participate in political activities while I am a worker in the enterprise, even if I do so outside working hours". The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this connection.

Discrimination based on sex. The Committee has been observing for several years that, with a view to granting spouses equal rights, it is necessary to amend section 349 of the Code of Commerce, which provides that married women who at the time of their marriage did not decide to make an agreement with their husband choosing the separate property regime may only enter into a commercial partnership agreement with the special permission of their husbands. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that on 5 April 2011 the President of the Republic forwarded to the Chamber of Deputies a Bill to amend the Civil Code and other legislation to regulate the property regime for marriage, which was based on two earlier bills. The new Bill, which is currently in the first stage of the constitutional procedure before the Chamber of Deputies, provides for equality before the law for husbands and wives, the full capacity of both spouses and the economic protection of the spouse who has cared for the children or the household, and has accordingly worked less. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the progress of the Bill to modify the property regime established in the Civil Code and to indicate whether it envisages the amendment of section 349 of the Code of Commerce so that women can enter into commercial partnership agreements without special permission from their husbands.

Bill on discrimination. The Committee notes the recent approval by the Senate of a Bill to combat discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress of the Bill before Parliament and to provide a copy of the text as soon as it has been enacted.

Persons of African descent. The Committee noted previously, in the context of its examination of the application of the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), the Government's indication of the existence of a Bill recognizing the ethnic group of persons of African descent. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the stage of the parliamentary process with regard to this Bill and to provide a copy of it once it has been adopted.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

China

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1990)

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee recalls that section 46 of the Labour Law of 1994 and section 11 of the Labour Contract Law of 2007 refer to "equal pay for equal work", which is narrower than the principle of the Convention, because it does not encompass the concept of "work of equal value". The Committee notes the Government's indication that wage regulations, which are not yet in force, will specify equal pay for equal work. The Committee draws the Government's attention to the importance of the concept of "work of equal value", which lies at the heart of the fundamental right of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and the promotion of equality, and which should apply to all workers. The concept of "work of equal value" is fundamental to tackling occupational gender segregation in the labour market, with women concentrated in certain sectors, and at specific levels of the occupational hierarchy, because it permits a broad scope of comparison, going beyond equal remuneration for equal work. The concept of "equal value" requires some method of measuring and comparing the relative value of different jobs undertaken on the basis of entirely objective and non-discriminatory criteria, and allows for comparisons between jobs that are of an entirely different nature, but are nevertheless of equal value (see General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraphs 658, 673 and 695). The Committee asks the Government to take concrete steps to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, so that it covers not only situations where men and women perform the same work but also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature, which is nevertheless of equal value and to provide information in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Colombia

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC) and the Association of Officials of the Medellín Municipality (ADEM) of 29 October 2011, and the Government's reply. The Committee also notes the observations of 31 August 2012 from the Single Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CUT), and those of 5 September 2012 from the General Confederation of Labour (CGT). The Committee further notes the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) received on 8 September 2012. The Committee asks the Government to send its observations on the above comments.

Article 1 of the Convention. Work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee notes that the Government reports on the adoption of Act No. 1496 of 29 December 2011, which guarantees equality of pay and remuneration between men and women. The Government states that the Act establishes wage assessment factors such as the nature of the work to be performed, the conditions for admission to the job and conditions of work. The Act provides that enterprises, both public and private, shall keep a register recording profile tasks assigned and remuneration by sex. The Ministry of Labour shall carry out audits for the purpose of assessing the enterprise's equal wage practices and procedures are established to apply sanctions for breach of wage equality. The Government indicates that there are not as yet any implementing regulations. The Committee notes that the CUT refers to the Act indicating that it was not the subject of consultation with the trade unions and that there is no mechanism for an objective evaluation of jobs. The Committee notes in this connection that although section 7 of Act No. 1496, which amends section 143 of the Labour Code, is entitled "Equal pay for work of equal value", it provides (first paragraph) that "there shall be equal pay for equal work performed in equal posts with equal hours of work and equal conditions of efficiency ...". The Committee notes that this is narrower than the principle of the Convention because it does not capture the concept of "work of equal value": "equal value" goes beyond equal remuneration for "equal", "the same" or "similar" work and encompasses in addition jobs that are of an entirely different nature but which are nevertheless of equal value. The Committee considers that insistence on factors such as "equal conditions of work, skill and output" can be used as a pretext for paying women lower wages than men (see General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraphs 673 and 677). The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the principle enshrined in the Convention, namely equal remuneration for work of equal value, is fully reflected in the legislation, and asks it to take the principle into account when the regulations to implement Act No. 1496 are being drafted. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard. While noting that according to section 4 of the Act, the Ministry of Labour and the Standing Committee for consultation on wage and labour policies are to determine by agreement the criteria for applying the wage assessment factors to be used by employers in determining remuneration, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on the effect given to section 4 of the Act and on the manner in which this provision promotes objective job evaluation, as envisaged in Article 3 of the Convention.

Remuneration. The Committee notes the Government's statement that according to section 127 of the Substantive Labour Code, as amended by Act No. 50 of 1990, "wages shall consist not only of ordinary remuneration, whether fixed or variable, but of everything the worker receives in cash or kind in direct exchange for service ... allowances, premiums, ordinary bonuses, ... overtime ...". The Government adds that this definition was confirmed by the Constitutional Court in Decision No. C-892 of 2009. The Committee notes that according to the relevant paragraph of that decision, transcribed by the Government, the term "wages" does not cover remuneration for the worker during compulsory rest (holidays and non-work days) or any cash or goods the worker receives in order to perform his or her duties properly such as for travel. While noting this information, the Committee asks the Government to ensure that remuneration during compulsory rest and any money or goods workers receive in order to perform their duties properly which, according to the Constitutional Court, do not constitute wages, are provided to workers without distinction as to sex, in accordance with the principle of the Convention.

Article 2. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, Decree No. 4463 of 25 November 2011 was adopted to regulate Act No. 1257 setting out rules on awareness raising, prevention and punishment relating to forms of violence and discrimination against women. An objective of the Decree is to define the actions needed to promote social and economic recognition of the work of women and establish mechanisms to make equal remuneration for men and women effective. The Committee notes that according to the CUT, there are no reports on the results of the implementation of these provisions. The Government reports on the drafting of the Ministry of Labour's national plan for employment equity with a differential gender focus for women, which provides for the development of preventive measures and the reduction of unemployment and informal employment among women, and the design of a monitoring system. The plan also provides for strategies to eliminate the pay gap between men and women which include the redistribution of social roles, recognition of the care economy and the incorporation of women in sectors of economic activity which are predominantly male. Furthermore, pursuant to Resolution No. 404 of 22 March 2012, internal working groups were set up in the various territorial departments of the Ministry of Labour to develop strategies for the dissemination of women's rights at work and for the preventive inspection of workplaces with a view to avoiding all violations of equal remuneration. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the practical results obtained through the implementation of the national plan for employment equity with a differential gender focus for women in terms of the effect given to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, laid down in the Convention, and its impact in terms of reducing the gender pay gap. Please provide information on the establishment of the monitoring system envisaged in the plan and on the preventive inspection visits to workplaces carried out with a view to ensuring equal remuneration.

Community mothers. The Committee notes the CUT's observations to the effect that community mothers, whose job is to provide childcare for infants, are not recognized as workers and earn less than the minimum wage. The Committee asks the Government to send its comments on this subject.

Articles 3 and 4. The Government states that in accordance with section 6 of Act No. 1496, work has been undertaken jointly with the Standing Committee for consultation on wage and labour policies to draft a decree regulating the Act. Work is also under way in conjunction with the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) to develop an equity seal for the certification of private companies and public institutions that undertake systemic changes and adopt new attitudes with a view to incorporating gender equity. The Committee notes that in its observations the CUT states that the Act was not submitted for consultation and that the Standing Committee met only once – unsuccessfully – to draft the regulatory decree and determine criteria for applying the assessment factors provided for in section 4 of the Act. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the implementation of these measures and on the measures adopted under the Agenda for Equality at Work and the Inter-Union Gender Committee, to which the Government referred in its previous report.

Statistical information. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government to the effect that, out of a total of 7,785,503 workers in the public and private sectors, 3,148,805 are women (40 per cent). In the public sector, women account for 51 per cent of the workforce. These statistics show that occupational segregation persists, since women are still poorly represented in sectors where men predominate traditionally, such as construction, electricity, agriculture and mining. The Committee notes that with the implementation of the recently adopted Act No. 1496, the Government plans to develop training programmes for women in the construction sector as a way of combating occupational segregation. The Committee observes, however, that the Government provides no information on the remuneration rates of men and women. It notes that according to the CUT, there was a 17.7 per cent wage gap between men and women in 2011, which rose to 20.2 per cent in the first quarter of 2012. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the implementation of the women's training programme in the construction sector, indicating whether it is to be extended to other sectors, and to continue to provide statistical information on the status of men and women in the labour market and on their distribution in the various occupations, jobs and economic sectors. Please also provide statistical information on the remuneration rates of men and women in the public and private sectors disaggregated by occupation and on measures taken to address the gender pay gap.

Enforcement. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government to the effect that four investigations are under way in connection with non-compliance with equal wages under Act No. 1496. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the status of these and any other investigations and on any complaints addressed by the labour inspectorate or the judicial authority relevant to the application of the principle of the Convention.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes the observations of 29 October 2011 of the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC) and the Association of Officials of the Medellín Municipality (ADEM), and the Government's reply thereto. The Committee also notes the observations dated 31 August 2012 of the Single Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CUT) and those of 5 September 2012 from the General Confederation of Labour (CGT). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these comments.

Discrimination on the basis of race, colour and social origin. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to provide specific information on various measures to promote fundamental rights and to prevent discrimination based on race, colour and social origin, such as the strategy "Towards a national decent work policy in the framework of fundamental rights" and the "Strategy to promote dignified and decent work, from a corporate social responsibility perspective, for vulnerable population groups in Colombia". The Committee notes that the Government indicates that under the Directorate of Fundamental Rights at Work two sub-directorates have been established, one for the protection of labour rights and the other to promote social organization, with a view to intensifying measures to prevent discrimination against Afro-Colombians and indigenous peoples. Two forums have also been held for the benefit of these two groups in order to ascertain the work-related problems they face and to establish the policy guidelines to be followed by the Ministry of Labour. The Government states that it knows of no complaints of discrimination based on social origin. The Committee observes that the Government provides no specific information on the results of the strategies it referred to previously, nor any particulars regarding the new measures or decisions taken to eliminate or prevent discrimination based on race, colour and social origin. While noting the importance of adopting long-term measures to combat discrimination, the Committee asks the Government to provide specific information on the impact of the measures adopted and the results achieved with a view to addressing discrimination based on race, colour and social origin.

In its previous observation, the Committee took note of a report produced by the National Council for Economic and Social Policy (CONPES, No. 3660) on the policy to promote equality of opportunity for the black, Afro-Colombian, Raizal and Palenquero communities (2010–14). The Committee notes that according to the CUT, Afro-Colombians have the highest poverty rate (82.12 per cent), have less access to formal employment and are generally concentrated in low-ranking jobs, earning 71 per cent of the pay of a mestizo. The Committee notes that according to the Government, a new CONPES report is being produced with information from all the national entities. The Government refers to a programme set up by the Office of the President to design strategies and action for the development of the Afro-Colombian people, which is divided into five strategic axes: addressing the institutional lag, the creation of human capital, economic development, institutional reinforcement and the Millennium Development Goals. The Committee notes that in the context of these strategies a number of practical measures have already been adopted including the award of collective land titles, measures to set up a Pacific university system, assistance to basic and higher education, improvement of the educational availability, arrangements with employers to conclude agreements with the communities and measures to include these peoples in formal employment. With regard to the specific measures for the education and training of indigenous peoples, the Government states that under the 2010–14 National Development Plan, several measures have been taken, ensuring their autonomy, for the establishment of an indigenous education system, policy guidelines for higher education have been laid down and an intercultural public universities project has been developed. The Committee also notes the measures adopted, including training, to integrate women belonging to these groups in the labour market. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken in the context of CONPES No. 3660, the programme for Afro-Colombians set up by the President's Office and the National Development Plan for Indigenous Peoples 2010–14. It also asks the Government to provide information on the impact of each of the measures adopted in terms of improving access of Afro-Colombians and indigenous peoples to the education system and the labour market, and ensuring their traditional occupations. The Government is also asked to provide information on the measures aimed specifically at women belonging to these groups and the impact of such measures. Please also provide relevant statistical information disaggregated by sex.

Discrimination based on sex. The Committee notes that in its observations the CUT refers in general terms to the persistence of discrimination against women in the labour market, as reported in its previous comments. The Committee notes that the Government refers to the adoption of Act No. 1496 of 2011 to guarantee equality of wages and remuneration for men and women and to establish mechanisms for the elimination of all forms of discrimination. According to the Government, the purpose of the law is to establish mechanisms to bring about real and effective equality in both the public and the private sectors. The Act supplements and amends the Equality Opportunities Act, No. 823, and provides for the development of women's training programmes that are free from stereotyping, for technological and organizational support for small and medium-sized enterprises managed by women or employing a majority of women, and for rural women's access to landownership or tenure. The Government indicates that consultations are under way on draft implementing regulations for the Act. Furthermore, Ministry of Labour Resolution No. 162 of 2012 establishes a Gender Equity Group with responsibility for ensuring gender mainstreaming in the Ministry. Work is also under way on an equity seal to be used as a means of certifying private companies and public institutions that apply gender equality measures. The Government further indicates that in accordance with the recent regulations on teleworking, enterprises will be encouraged to adopt teleworking contracts for women prior to their maternity leave and during the period of breastfeeding. The Government has also developed a programme for rural women under which measures have been adopted in the areas of production and public and social policy with a view to improving the living conditions of rural women. While noting all these measures, the Committee notes that the Government provides no information on the impact of the measures and programmes it referred to in its previous observation. The Committee stresses the importance of continuity in the activities undertaken and of reporting on their effects and outcomes with a view to determining the extent to which they contribute to the achievement of gender equality, as foreseen in Article 3(f) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact and outcome of the programmes and measures referred to in the present report and previously, including those adopted under Act No. 1496 of 2011 and the programme for rural women. Please provide information on the measures taken to improve women's education and training with a view to improved access to employment and occupation.

Sexual harassment. The Committee notes that according to the Government, Ministry of Labour Resolution No. 2646 of July 2008 requires public and private enterprises to establish a committee on coexistence in the workplace, with responsibility for establishing a confidential internal conciliation procedure to prevent harassment at work. These committees are to be established before 20 October 2012. The Government states that complaints of quid pro quo sexual harassment are filed not with the Ministry of Labour but with the criminal courts, as a mechanism for protecting women against violence. The Government states, however, that a system to follow up cases of sexual harassment at the workplace has been developed consisting of a compendium of information and complaints, which will enable labour inspectors to intervene, together with a protocol for receiving sexual harassment complaints for the purpose of providing legal advice and informing labour inspectors and public prosecutors. The Committee recalls that addressing sexual harassment only through criminal proceedings is not sufficient due to the sensitivity of the issue, the higher burden of proof which is harder to meet and the fact that criminal law does not address the wide spectrum of behaviours constituting sexual harassment in employment and occupation. The Committee, therefore, requests the Government to provide further information on sexual harassment measures taken by the labour inspectorate and the Ministry of Labour, and on the number of complaints filed and the outcome thereof. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the application of section 3 of Act No. 1010 of 2006 on harassment at work (which provides for compensatory measures), and the manner in which adequate protection is secured for victims of harassment. Please indicate whether the abovementioned Act applies to associated work cooperatives.

Comoros

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1978)

In its previous comments the Committee took note of observations of the Workers' Confederation of Comoros (CTC) received on 1 September 2011, in which the organization reported that the principle of equal remuneration between women and men in the private and parastatal sectors is not being respected because there is no wage scale or indicator to which employers might refer. The Committee invited the Government to send its comments on the matter. The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received but that a new Labour Code was adopted on 28 June 2012.

Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. In its earlier comments the Committee noted that section 97 of the Labour Code providing for equal wages regardless of the worker's origin, sex, age or status "under equal working conditions, professional qualifications and output" did not give full effect to the Convention. The Committee notes with interest that according to section 104 of the new Labour Code "all employers shall provide equal remuneration for the same work or for work of equal value". It further notes that this provision contains a definition of "remuneration" that reflects that of Article 1(a) of the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the application of section 104 of the Labour Code in practice. It encourages the Government to publicize the new provisions of the Labour Code and to consider the organization of training to raise awareness among workers and employers and their organizations, labour inspectors, judges and others involved in enforcing the Labour Code concerning the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value.

Collective agreements. The Committee notes that section 92(7) of the new Labour Code provides that "collective agreements [which may be extended] must include provisions on the ways and means of applying the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value". The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the effect given in practice to section 92(7) of the new Labour Code. It also asks the Government to indicate the measures taken to encourage the social partners to include in collective agreements the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and the ways and means of applying it, and to provide extracts of relevant collective agreements.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 2004)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received but that the new Labour Code was adopted on 28 June 2012.

Article 1(1)(a) and (b) of the Convention. Definition of discrimination. Additional grounds of discrimination. The Committee welcomes the fact that section 2 of the Labour Code contains a definition of discrimination in the same terms as Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. The Committee notes with interest that section 2 of the new Labour Code adds to the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination set forth in the previous Code, a new ground of discrimination, namely real or perceived state of health, including HIV/AIDS status. The Committee also notes that the new Labour Code contains a chapter on workers living with HIV or AIDS, and in particular, that section 71 prohibits any stigmatization or discrimination on the ground of a worker's real or perceived HIV status on the part of colleagues, trade unions, customers of the enterprise or the employer. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on steps taken to publicize the provisions of the Labour Code that ban discrimination based on real or perceived state of health, including HIV status, and to raise awareness of this matter among workers and employers and their organizations, labour inspectors, judges and other officials dealing with work-related matters. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the application in practice of section 2 of the new Labour Code prohibiting discrimination based on real or perceived state of health including HIV status, and section 71 prohibiting all discrimination based on real or perceived HIV status in practice, indicating any action taken by labour inspectors or any court decisions handed down on such matters.

Sexual harassment. The Committee notes with interest that the new Labour Code contains provisions (section 2.2 and 2.3) prohibiting sexual harassment and defining it as "any conduct of a sexual nature the effect of which is to create a working environment that is intimidating, hostile or humiliating for a person" or "any form of verbal, non-verbal or bodily conduct of a sexual nature, through which the perpetrator impairs the dignity of workers at the workplace". The Committee notes that employers are required to adopt measures to prevent sexual harassment and that any discrimination, dismissal or penalties against workers who have suffered or witnessed sexual harassment are prohibited. It also notes that while it is for the persons who deem themselves victims of sexual harassment to establish facts allowing a presumption of such discrimination, it is for the defendant to prove that their decisions were justified by submitting evidence that the decision was free of all harassment. The Committee requests the Government to take measures to publicize the new provisions of the Labour Code prohibiting sexual harassment, among workers and employers and their organizations, labour inspectors and judges, and to provide information on any measures taken to this end. It asks the Government to provide information on any instances of sexual harassment addressed by the competent authorities, including any relevant administrative or judicial decisions. It also asks the Government to indicate the measures taken by employers, pursuant to section 2.2 of the Labour Code, to prevent any acts of sexual harassment at the workplace. Furthermore, in order to facilitate application of the provisions prohibiting sexual harassment in practice, and in particular the identification of instances of quid pro quo harassment, the Committee requests the Government to envisage the possibility of supplementing the definition of sexual harassment so as to specify that there is harassment when the worker's rejection of the behaviour concerned or the worker's submission to such behaviour, is used explicitly or implicitly to take a decision affecting his or her work.

Furthermore, since the Government's report has not been received, the Committee is bound to repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 2 of the Convention. National policy. Equality of opportunity and treatment of men and women. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption in June 2008 of the National Policy on Gender Equity and Equality (PNEEG) to ensure equality in employment and occupation. It also noted that the Employers' Organization of Comoros (OPACO), in a communication received on 1 September 2009, indicated that it had not been informed of the elaboration of such a policy and regretted that no measures had been taken to prevent the exclusion of women from certain jobs and occupations. The Committee takes note of the Government's brief comments to the effect that an action plan has been drawn up to introduce measures implementing the PNEEG. The Government also states, in reply to OPOCO's observations, that equality in employment is guaranteed in enterprises and that the promotion of social dialogue is part of the Government's action plan for 2011–15 to ensure effective collaboration with the social partners with a view to achieving perfect social concentration and cohesion. In this respect, workshops designed to strengthen the capacity of employers' and workers' organizations have been held throughout the country. Taking note of this information, the Committee requests the Government to provide specific information on the awareness-raising and training activities carried out or planned with the social partners, within the framework of the implementation of the PNEEG. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the action plan implementing the PNEEG and, more specifically, on the measures taken or envisaged to promote equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women in respect of access to education, vocational training, wage and non-wage employment and working conditions (including remuneration, promotion, and security of tenure). The Government is asked to forward a copy of the PNEEG and the action plan.

Equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of race, colour, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain any reply to its previous comments in this regard. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to elaborate and apply a national policy to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation, irrespective of race, colour, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Congo

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1999)

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against discrimination. Legislation. For many years the Committee has been emphasizing the gaps in the Labour Code and the General Public Service Regulations as regards protection of workers against discrimination, since these texts cover only some of the grounds of discrimination listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention and only certain aspects of employment, such as wages and dismissal. The Committee notes the Government's indications that the preliminary draft of a new Act amending and completing certain provisions of the Labour Code, which is currently being prepared, prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction or social origin, at all stages of employment and occupation. It further notes that the preliminary draft has been sent to the social partners in order to receive their comments before the meeting of the National Labour Advisory Committee. Recalling that, where legal provisions are adopted to give effect to the principle of the Convention, these should cover at least all the grounds of discrimination listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention and be concerned with access to vocational training, access to employment and particular occupations, and also conditions of employment (Article 1(3)), the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure the adoption of the preliminary draft of the new Act amending and completing the Labour Code and the amendment of the General Public Service Regulations in order to ensure full protection against discrimination for workers in the public and private sectors, to supply information on the status of the legislative process to this end and to send a copy of the legislative texts once they have been adopted. The Committee also requests the Government to consider the possibility of requesting technical comments from the ILO on the draft legislation before it is adopted.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Costa Rica

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the observations sent by the Confederation of Workers Rerum Novarum (CTRN) on 2 September 2012. The Committee asks the Government to provide its comments in response.

Article 1 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. For a number of years the Committee has been referring to article 57 of the National Constitution, which establishes that wages "shall always be equal for equal work under identical conditions of efficiency", and to section 167 of the Labour Code, which provides that "quantity and quality shall be taken into account when determining the level of wages for each type of work. Equal wages shall be paid for equal work performed in the same job and under equal conditions of efficiency and working time ...". The Committee notes that the Government refers to occupational profiles and indicates that these respect the principle of the Convention since they were drawn up on the basis of objective criteria. The profiles are used to determine minimum wages. The Committee recalls that where the issue of wages is the subject of legislation, the principle established in the Convention must be given full legislative expression. The Committee also recalls that the principle of "work of equal value" includes comparisons between jobs which are of a completely different nature, including work performed under different conditions of efficiency and different working time, but which are nevertheless jobs of equal value. The Committee again asks the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and to provide information on any progress made in this respect.

Occupational gender segregation. The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government in relation to the measures taken in the context of the National Policy on Gender Equality and Equity (PIEG) 2007–17, and in particular the corresponding Plan of Action 2012–14, in relation to the development of enterprises and business ventures for rural women and also technical training in fields where women are under-represented. The Government also emphasizes the high rate of participation of women in occupations that require vocational training and formal education. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that the abovementioned occupational profiles involve grouping various occupations of different types into 23 occupational categories, which are then subdivided into categories of unskilled, semi-skilled and skilled workers, according to their level of training. The profiles constitute a technical tool enabling equal value to be attached to occupations which, despite possessing different features, are similar enough in nature to be grouped into the same occupational category. These are not based on a list of tasks but on the complexity of the work to be done, the experience required, the consequences of error, and on studies and other requirements needed to perform the job. The Government points out that all occupations are open to men and women workers, who receive the same pay, and that any differences in wages relate to different levels of training and education, as well as different levels of responsibility, experience and risks. The Government adds that the officials of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security have the power to define the scope of coverage and to place private sector workers in various wage categories on the basis of labour inspection visits. The Committee observes that the Government refers to statistics which were not attached to its report. The Committee reiterates that the system described by the Government does not appear to take account of the existence of occupational gender segregation, as a result of which certain types of jobs are performed largely or exclusively by women and others by men as a result of tradition or historical and stereotypical attitudes. Occupational segregation tends to result in “female jobs” being undervalued in comparison with work performed predominantly by men. The concept of work of equal value is therefore essential in tackling such segregation since it provides for a broader scope of comparison between different jobs. The Committee therefore asks the Government:

- (i) to specify what criteria are used to place each occupation in a specific occupational profile;
- (ii) to indicate the distribution of men and women in various occupations within each occupational profile, and indicate the manner in which it is ensured that occupations where women predominate are not undervalued;
- (iii) to provide examples of cases in which the Ministry of Labour and Social Security has defined coverage and has placed private sector workers in various wage categories.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Côte d'Ivoire

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1961)

Equality of opportunity and treatment. Legislation. For many years the Committee has been asking the Government to take the necessary steps to bring into conformity with the Convention section 14(2) of Act No. 92-570 of 11 September 1992 issuing the general public service regulations, which provide that “specific arrangements may be made, on account of physical fitness requirements or constraints inherent in certain functions ... to reserve access [to the public service] for candidates of one or other sex”. The Committee also recalls that section 14(1) of the Act only prohibits any distinction being made between men and women during recruitment. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government’s undertaking to repeal section 14(2) during the review of the general public service regulations. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that a general reform of the public service is under way and that a review of the general regulations is planned in this framework. The Committee also notes the information published on the website of the Ministry of the Public Service and Administrative Reform according to which a workshop was held in October 2012 specifically to review the Act issuing the general public service regulations with a view to identifying “the shortcomings, discrepancies and injustices contained in the current regulations” and “to propose corrective measures”. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to repeal section 14(2) of Act No. 92-570 of 11 September 1992 issuing the general public service regulations and trusts that it will take the opportunity provided by the review of the regulations to consider the possibility of including provisions defining and prohibiting any direct or indirect discrimination made on the basis of at least race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction or social origin, at all stages of employment. The Committee asks the Government to ensure that equality of opportunity and treatment without any distinction on the basis of the aforementioned reasons is one of the specific objectives of the public service reform. The Government is requested to provide information on the progress of the work on the review of the general public service regulations and to forward a copy of the new regulations as soon as they have been adopted.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Croatia

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1991)

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Gender equality in employment and occupation. The Committee recalls section 11 of the Gender Equality Act concerning the adoption of action plans for promoting and ensuring gender equality. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that guidelines for the application of section 11 were sent to all the parties concerned, and that until mid-2010, all ministries, central state offices and many legal entities predominantly owned by the Government had produced their respective action plan proposals.

With regard to women’s entrepreneurship, the Committee notes that strengthening women’s entrepreneurship has been set as one of the key activities and measures in the newly adopted National Policy for Gender Equality 2011–15. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that the Ministry of Economy, Labour and Entrepreneurship has been conducting a project entitled “Women Entrepreneurship”, and that a total of 1,001 grants were approved amounting to Croatian kuna (HRK) 10,540,000 (approximately US$1,734,928) in 2010. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that the measures defined in the National Policy for Gender Equality aim at promoting the employment of women in the information and communications technology sector, which according to the Government will contribute to the elimination of occupational segregation in the area. The Committee further notes the Government’s indication that the National Employment Promotion Plan 2011–12 has as key priorities increasing the level of employability and the rate of labour market participation of women with low or inadequate education, and women belonging to national minority groups. As regards education, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that the rate of girls enrolling in the industrial and artisan school programmes increased in comparison to 2007 and reached 36.3 per cent. The number of female students in 2009 who enrolled in public colleges and who completed their university education also increased to 56.3 per cent, and 58.6 per cent, respectively. The “Implementation Activities Plan of the Economic Recovery Programme” of the Government also aims at increasing interest of the students in math and natural sciences which have traditionally been considered “male fields”. As regards the public sector, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that a total of 22,980 women and 29,862 men were employed in the Government in 2009, and the share of women rose to 43.49 per cent in 2009; the rate of women in state administration’s managerial positions increased to 3.2 per cent in 2009. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the practical application of section 11 of the Gender Equality Act, as well as on the measures taken to promote women’s access to a wider range of jobs, including posts of responsibility and management positions, both in the private and the public sectors, and to provide them with a wider choice of educational and vocational opportunities, and their impact. The Committee also asks the Government to provide more specific information on the number and proportion of female civil servants and civil service employees in posts of responsibility.

Equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation of the Roma. The Committee notes the measures taken in 2009 and 2010, pursuant to the National Programme for the Roma and the Action Plan for the Decade of Roma Inclusion, 2005–15, relating to the employment and training of persons belonging to the Roma national minority. The Committee recalls the Government’s indication that the main obstacle for the members of the Roma to access employment is their low level of education. The Committee notes the Government’s indication in this respect that 824 Roma children engaged in pre-school education in the years 2009–10, and 4,435 Roma children were engaged in primary education at the beginning of the school year 2010–11, both of which showed an increasing trend compared to previous years. A database on the integration of members of the Roma national minority in the education system has also been developed. In addition, the Ministry of Science, Education and Sport has encouraged the involvement of Roma children into pre-school education, including through sharing of costs paid by parents. The Government also indicates that the adoption of the National Curriculum for Pre-School Education and General Mandatory and Secondary Education in July 2010, in combination with the external evaluation of Roma educational results, would make it possible to adequately assess problems and improve the education of the Roma. With regard to Roma women, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that a research study entitled “The lives of Roma women in Croatia with focus on the approach to education” was conducted, which aimed at raising awareness in the Roma community and in society as a whole concerning the problems Roma women were facing with regard to access to education.

With regard to the employment service, the Government indicates that 4,553 members of the Roma community were registered in 2010, although the Government also indicates that due to a tendency of the Roma not to disclose their Roma identities, and due to the fact that the employment service does not collect unemployment rates disaggregated by ethnicity, there is a problem in establishing a database of unemployed Roma. The Government further indicates that the Roma have been provided with assistance in drafting their job profiles and developing individual plans on job search, and that the employment of the Roma for a period of 24 months is subsidized. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken to ensure equal access to education, including pre-school education, for Roma children, without discrimination. The Committee also asks the Government to strengthen its efforts to promote employment opportunities and to ensure equal treatment of the Roma in employment and occupation, including by adopting specific measures concerning the employment of Roma women. Please also provide specific information on the impact of the assistance concerning job search provided for the Roma by the employment service.

Article 3(d). Access of minorities to employment under the control of a national authority. The Committee notes the adoption of the Action Plan for the Implementation of the Constitutional Law on the Rights of National Minorities for the period from 2011–13, which includes the adoption of a long-term civil service employment plan with the goal of 5.5 per cent share of persons belonging to national minorities in the total number of civil servants. The Government has adopted the Civil Servants Employment Plan for persons belonging to national minorities for the period from 2011–14. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that persons belonging to national minorities are given priority in employment in state administration. In regional and local self-government units, only municipalities and cities where the rate of national minorities exceeds 15 per cent of the total population, and counties where the rate of national minorities exceeds 5 per cent, are obliged by law to adopt civil service recruitment plans. The Committee further notes the Government’s indication that a study on the share of national minorities in the public sector was conducted in the year 2011, which showed that no under-representation of national minorities was observed in five counties covered by the study, namely, Osijek-Baranja, Vukovar-Srijem, Bjelovar-Bilogora, Sisak-Moslavina and Istria. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the following:

- (i) the efforts made by the Government to promote and ensure access by members of national minorities to public employment in the framework of the Civil Service Employment Plan;
- (ii) the progress made in achieving recruitment targets concerning minorities; and
- (iii) the current ethnic and gender composition of the civil service.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156) (ratification: 1991)

Article 3 of the Convention. National policy. The Committee recalls the National Policy for the Promotion of Gender Equality (2006–10). The Committee notes with interest the legislative measures to give effect to the provisions of the Convention, in particular the adoption of the Anti-discrimination Act, 2008 (Official Gazette No. 85/08), and the Maternity and Parental Benefits Act, 2008, as last amended in 2011 (Official Gazette Nos 85/08, 10/08 and 34/11), as well as the establishment of the Maternity and Parental Benefits Act Implementation Monitoring Commission. The Committee notes that section 1(1) of the Anti-discrimination Act provides for protection against discrimination on various grounds, including gender and marital or family status. The Office of the Ombudperson has been a central equality body since 2009 and according to its report, three cases concerned marital or family status among a total of 172 cases of alleged discrimination filed with the Office. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the practical application of the Maternity and Parental Benefits Act, 2008 and the results achieved under the National Policy for the Promotion of Gender Equality (2006–10), in order to promote equality of treatment and opportunity of workers with family responsibilities. Please also provide information on the functions of the Maternity and Parental Benefits Act Implementation Monitoring Commission. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on any cases of discrimination related to family responsibilities dealt with by the Office of the Ombudperson or the courts.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Cuba

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1954)

Article 1 of the Convention. Work of equal value. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to the fact that section 99 of the 1984 Labour Code provides that workers shall receive equal pay for equal work without distinction whatsoever, including on the basis of sex, and that it is narrower than the principle established in the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government repeats that the established criteria are still in force, that the legislation covers gender equality and that the provisions of the Convention are applied in practice. The Government also states that in order to promote the principle of the Convention there are education and training programmes for judges, lawyers and law enforcement personnel. Furthermore, the National Union of Jurists of Cuba and the Federation of Cuban Women signed a joint work agreement for the provision of courses for legal practitioners and members of multidisciplinary teams; for the approval of a postgraduate course on gender and the law and for the inclusion of a module on the subject in the Gender Studies Master's Degree of the Women's Chair of the University of Havana. While noting this information, the Committee nevertheless points out in this connection that the concept of "work of equal value" is at the core of the fundamental right of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and the promotion of gender equality. Legislation that contains narrower provisions hinders progress in eradicating gender-based pay discrimination (see General Survey on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work, 2012, paragraphs 673 and 679). The Committee asks the Government to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value so that it covers not only situations where men and women perform the same work but also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature, which is nevertheless of equal value. Please continue to provide information on the measures adopted to raise awareness of the principle of the Convention.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes the observations by the Coalition of Independent Trade Unions of Cuba (CSIC), received on 10 September 2012, and the Government's response.

Discrimination on the basis of political opinion. The Committee has been referring for a number of years to the need to guarantee protection for individuals in the context of employment and occupation against discrimination on the basis of political opinion and has been asking the Government to provide information on any cases involving individuals detained, prosecuted or accused of other offences who may have claimed to be journalists. In its most recent comments the Committee asked the Government to provide information on the situation and conditions of work of independent journalists, and particularly on the manner in which it is ensured that journalists and all other workers who express political opinions contrary to the Government enjoy protection from discrimination on this basis. The Committee notes the Government's denial that any citizens have been detained or prosecuted for working as journalists, and states that the persons referred to by the Committee are continuing to destroy the constitutional order and have no employment relationship in journalism in the country and cannot be recognized as journalists. For this reason the Government indicates that it is unable to supply information on the situation and conditions of work of these persons. It also points out that nobody has been penalized for exercising freedom of expression and opinion and that the exercise of a profession does not constitute an offence which can incur criminal penalties. The Committee notes that the Government does not indicate whether the persons referred to in its report have been detained, prosecuted or accused of other offences, nor does it state whether these persons have claimed to be journalists. The Committee recalls that the protection of individuals in the context of employment and occupation against discrimination on the basis of political opinion implies recognition of this protection in relation to activities expressing or demonstrating opposition to the established political principles, even if certain doctrines are aimed at fundamental changes in the institutions of the State (see General Survey on equality in employment and occupation, 1988, paragraph 57, and the General Survey on Fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 805). The Committee therefore requests the Government once again to clarify whether there are persons who have been detained, prosecuted or accused of other offences who have claimed to be journalists and, if so, to indicate the numbers concerned, the charges laid, the current situation as regards any legal proceedings, and how many have been released. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that independent journalists, and all other workers who express political opinions contrary to the Government enjoy protection against discrimination on this basis.

The Committee notes that the observations of the CSIC concern discrimination on the basis of religion and political opinion which affects workers and those seeking admission to universities and technical training institutes in the context of a labour market monopolized by the State by means of government job placement agencies. Such discrimination is effected by means of detailed employment files which are held for life and contain political and religious information on workers and their families. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in this regard that in Cuba the State is not the employer and that pursuant to section 7 of the Labour Code the following entities provide employment: the agencies of the Central State Administration, state bodies and their administrative offices; public enterprises and the entities dependent on political, social and mass organizations; farming cooperatives; and private sector enterprises and businesses with respect to private employees. The Government affirms that no one is being discriminated against on the basis of political opinion and refers to the constitutional and legal provisions establishing fundamental rights, prohibiting discrimination and providing for the right to education. The Government also states that an employee's employment file is not being used for discriminatory purposes and does not contain information on the political opinion or the religious convictions of the worker and the members of his or her family. The file is used only for purposes of registration and consultation concerning employment, promotion, training and performance evaluation. Referring to the preceding paragraph, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that workers, university students and vocational training students are not being discriminated against on the basis of their political opinion or religion and that no information regarding the political opinion or the religion of the workers is registered in the employment file for purposes of using it against them.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1993)

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 99th Session, June 2010)

In its previous comments, the Committee noted the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2010 and the resulting conclusions of the Conference Committee, which addressed the following issues: (1) the anti-discrimination legislation; (2) the outstanding issues with regard to the follow-up to the representations under article 24 of the ILO Constitution (November 1991 and June 1994) regarding Act No. 451 of 1991 (the Screening Act); and (3) the situation of the Roma in employment and occupation. The Committee also noted that an ILO mission has taken place from 26–29 April 2011 and recommended inter alia that the tripartite constituents consider taking advantage of the envisaged revision of the Labour Code to include the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination currently in the Employment Act so as to ensure legal clarity and certainty concerning protection against discrimination in all areas of employment and occupation. The Committee also notes the observations from the Czech-Moravian Confederation of Trade Unions (CM KOS) attached to the Government's report.

The anti-discrimination legislation. The Committee recalls that the Labour Code of 2006 (Act No. 262/2006) prohibits all forms of discrimination in labour relations but does not specify any prohibited grounds, unlike the previous Labour Code which prohibited discrimination on the basis of sex, sexual orientation, racial or ethnic origin, nationality, citizenship, social background, family background, language, health condition, age, religion or confession, property, marital or family status, family responsibilities, political or other conviction, membership of or activity in political parties or movements, trade union or employers' organizations. However, the Anti-Discrimination Act (No. 198/2009 Coll.) prohibits direct and indirect discrimination based on race, ethnic origin, nationality, sex, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, belief or worldview. In addition, the Employment Act (No. 435/2004) prohibited any form of direct or indirect discrimination of persons exercising their right to employment on the same grounds as the former Labour Code, before its amendment by Act No. 367/2011. In this respect, the Committee notes that, according to the Government, this amendment replaced the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination by an explicit reference to the Anti-Discrimination Act. It also notes the Government's indication that section 16 of the Labour Code was amended by Act No. 365/2011 Coll. which supplemented the provisions on equal treatment and prohibition of discrimination also with an explicit reference to the Anti-Discrimination Act. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates its position that the Anti-Discrimination Act has to be read in conjunction with the Charter of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms and international agreements which are directly applicable in the country according to the Constitution. It also notes the Government's indication that the grounds of family responsibilities, marital status, pregnancy and parenthood may be covered by the ground of sex in the Anti-Discrimination Act, and that employees' representatives are protected against discrimination by section 276 of the Labour Code. The Committee notes that as a result of the new legislative framework, workers are explicitly protected against discrimination only on the basis of race, ethnic origin, nationality, sex, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, belief or opinions, as provided by the Anti-Discrimination Act to which both the Labour Code of 2006 and the Employment Act now refer, thereby omitting the grounds of political conviction and membership or activity in political parties, trade unions or employers' organizations which were previously expressly covered by the former Labour Code and the Employment Act. The Committee notes that the CM KOS indicates that it maintains its long standing observations regarding the limitation of the protection of workers against discrimination. The CM KOS indicates that this protection was further limited due to the amendment of the Employment Act in 2011 that removed the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination from its provisions and therefore the organization considers that the current legislation and practice are not in compliance with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the State Labour Inspection Office issued leaflets for the public dedicated to the issue of discrimination. It notes however that these leaflets only mention the grounds of race, ethnic origin, nationality, sex, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, belief or worldview. The Committee notes the Government's indication that further to the recommendations of the ILO mission, discussions are currently being held between the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, the Government Commissioner for Human Rights and the Ombudsperson to determine the appropriate means to ensure the enforceability and legal clarity and certainty concerning the right to non-discrimination, including with regard to legal procedures available to workers.

Noting the recent legislative developments, the Committee asks the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the protection of workers against discrimination in training, recruitment, terms and conditions of employment, on the basis of all the grounds that were previously covered by the labour legislation. It also asks the Government to monitor closely the application of the Anti-Discrimination Act and the Charter of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms specifically in the field of employment and occupation as well as the application of the Labour Code and the Employment Act in practice, particularly with regard to the possibility for workers to assert their right to non-discrimination and to obtain compensation, and to ensure that they provide adequate protection against discrimination based on at least all the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the material designed to foster awareness of the legal provisions on discrimination among workers, employers and their organizations, as well as labour inspectors, judges and other public officials dealing with non-discrimination and equality, indicates clearly the grounds of discrimination that are prohibited under the legislation, including those covered by the Charter of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms, and provide details on the procedure to follow. In this regard please also provide information on the number and nature of any administrative or judicial decisions applying and interpreting the legal provisions on discrimination in the field of employment and occupation, including the remedies provided and the sanctions imposed.

Discrimination on the basis of political opinion. The Screening Act. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Conference Committee has strongly urged the Government to amend or repeal the Screening Act without further delay in so far as it violated the principle of non-discrimination on the basis of political opinion. The Committee also noted that detailed information was provided to the ILO mission to clarify the scope of application of the Screening Act, according to which the Act applies to limited categories of persons occupying managerial positions in the public service and state enterprises, and that work was under way to adopt a new Act on Civil Service. The Committee understands from the Government's report that in the draft Act on Civil Service which is still under preparation, there remains a reference to the current provisions of the Screening Act as one of the "additional prerequisites" for a management position in the civil service, a high level position or a position of head of office of a regional self-government unit. The Government indicates that the Screening Act will not apply to "other employees", as defined by the draft Act on Civil Service and excluded from its scope, performing auxiliary or manual work at public authorities or to employees supervising these workers. Further to the adoption of the Act on Civil Service, the list of persons subject to the Screening Act will be amended, using the same terminology. Recalling that political opinion may be taken into account as inherent requirements only for certain posts involving special responsibilities directly concerned with developing government policy, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to clearly specify and define the functions in respect of which screening would be required in the Act on Civil Service and provide a copy of this Act once it has been adopted as well as a copy of the Screening Act once it has been amended. Noting the information provided in the Government's report in this respect, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application of the Screening Act, indicating specifically the positions for which a screening certificate was requested and issued, and the responsibilities directly concerned with developing government policy. Please provide statistical information on the number of certificates issued and the appeals lodged against a positive certificate.

The situation of the Roma in employment and occupation. The Committee noted in its previous comments that the Conference Committee remained concerned that the measures taken aimed at the social inclusion of the Roma had not yet led to verifiable improvements and urged the Government to take measures to develop improved means to monitor the situation of the Roma, including through the collection and analysis of appropriate data. The Committee welcomes the detailed statistics provided by the Government on the estimated numbers of members of the Roma community, disaggregated by region and sex. The Committee also notes the results of the 2011 national census according to which only 5,199 persons declared themselves as Roma whereas in 2010 the number of people in the Roma community was estimated at 183,000. The Committee notes that according to the statistics provided the estimated number of people from the Roma community registered by the Labour Office is quite low in comparison to the total Roma population (38,456 including 18,146 women). The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government regarding numerous projects and programmes of the Active Employment Policy and the reform of public employment services. The Committee notes with interest the approval of a comprehensive Strategy for Combating social exclusion for the period 2011–15 in September 2011, to support the social inclusion of people in “socially excluded localities” in which mainly members of the Roma community live. According to the strategy, approximately 80,000 persons are concerned by social exclusion in the country, 70,000 of which are from the Roma community. This Plan of Action which was prepared by the Agency for Social Inclusion, includes 77 measures in the fields of education, employment, housing, social services, family policy, healthcare, security and regional development, and will be implemented by the Government Commissioner for Human Rights. With regard to education, the Committee notes that the measures envisaged, including financial measures, aim at reforming the current educational system to end segregation and transform the system of schools established for pupils with mild mental disabilities. They also include measures to end discriminatory criteria for admission of children into public kindergartens which reduced the availability of such facilities for children from socially disadvantaged families, and measures to support inclusive education. The Committee also notes that 65 per cent of the persons from socially excluded localities receive social benefits and 75 per cent of them are non-active or unemployed and 11 per cent have occasional employment. The employment measures encompass the development of specific mechanisms to find employment, the implementation of a gradual employment scheme from the public service to the free labour market, the development of local employment networks and the implementation of tools for flexible employment and incentives for employers. Welcoming the numerous measures envisaged in the Comprehensive Strategy for Combating Social Exclusion (2011–15) to address comprehensively social exclusion and school segregation, which affects disproportionately the members of the Roma community, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on its implementation of the measures with regard to education, training, employment and occupation, in particular with regard to Roma girls and women, and the results thereof. In this regard, it requests the Government to continue to assess the impact of the measures taken and to ensure that any progress made in the education and employment situation of the Roma population is not reversed by the economic downturn or the lack of appropriate funding, including with respect to the activities of the Government Commissioner for Human Rights and the Agency for Social Inclusion. The Committee requests the Government to take appropriate measures to address stereotypes and prejudices regarding the capabilities and preferences of the Roma and to promote respect and tolerance between all sections of the population. Please also provide information on the implementation and results of the “Ethnic Friendly Employer” scheme.

The Committee is also raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value and application of the principle to all aspects of remuneration. The Committee recalls that section 86 of the Labour Code, which provides that with equal conditions of work, vocational qualifications and output, the salary is equal for all workers, irrespective of origin, sex or age, is not in conformity with the Convention, which requires measures to promote and ensure equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. It recalls its previous concerns that the Labour Code currently provides for equality only in respect of the salary (section 86) and accommodation and accommodation allowances (section 138), and that the term “remuneration” as defined in section 7(h) includes additional payments, such as commissions, payments in kind, bonuses, etc., whereas it is provided that transport allowances, family allowances, accommodation and accommodation allowances and health care are not considered part of the remuneration. In this context, the Committee had drawn the Government’s attention to the Government’s obligation under the Convention to ensure that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is applied to all aspects of remuneration, as broadly defined in Article 1(a), and that women and men should have the right to equal remuneration not only where they have the same working conditions, vocational qualifications and output, but also where they have different vocational qualifications and when they work in different working conditions, so long as the work performed is of equal value. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that it has taken due note of the Committee’s comments and will take them into consideration in the context of a future revision of the Labour Code. The Government also envisages defining a wage policy which takes account of all the elements of remuneration. Recalling its 2006 observation which calls on States which have not yet done so to ensure that their legislation fully reflects the principle of the Convention, the Committee once again asks the Government to take the necessary steps to bring the legislation into line with the Convention with a view to ensuring that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women is fully reflected in the legislation and that it applies to all the elements of remuneration, as defined in Article 1(a) of the Convention. It hopes that this will be done in the very near future. The Committee also asks the Government to provide further details of the wage policy, which it hopes will cover all elements of remuneration.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes from the third joint report of seven United Nations experts on the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (A/HRC/16/68, 9 March 2011) that the human rights situation in the country remains of serious concern, especially in the east of the country. The Committee notes particularly the concerns expressed with respect to sexual violence against women, including systematic and mass rape, and related impunity, as highlighted in the most recent report submitted by the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (A/HRC/16/27, 10 January 2011). The Committee notes that the recommendations to the Government in the report include repealing all provisions of law that discriminate against women, denouncing publically and unequivocally all forms of violence against women, and ensuring that the judicial system brings the perpetrators of such violations to justice promptly and impartially. The Committee notes that according to the report, sexual violence remains widespread despite the Government's efforts to stop it and the phenomenon is rampant throughout the country and affects thousands of women. The recent mass rapes committed in Walikale territory exemplify this scourge. The Committee further notes that the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights considers that the situation of women will remain precarious as long as the State fails to tackle in earnest the social roots of sexual violence, i.e. women's inferior social, economic and political status in Congolese society. The Committee recalls that the objective of the Convention, notably equality of opportunity between men and women in employment and occupation cannot be achieved in a general context of serious human rights violations and inequality in society. Considering the serious concerns raised regarding the human rights situation and its particular effects on women due to their inferior economic and social status in society, the Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary measures to address the inferior position of women in society reflected in sexual violence against women and discriminatory laws, which it considers has a serious impact on the application of the principles of the Convention. In this context, the Committee also urges the Government to create all the necessary conditions to give effect to the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's very brief report in reply to its previous observation, in which it raised issues relating to the legislative prohibition of discrimination in employment and occupation, discrimination based on sex, and discrimination based on race or ethnic origin.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Prohibition of discrimination in employment and occupation. The Committee recalls that, although section 1 provides that the Labour Code applies to all employers and all workers, with the exception of state public services, regardless of race, sex, civil status, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin, the Labour Code contains no provisions prohibiting and defining discrimination in employment and occupation. Act No. 81/003 of 17 July 1981 on the conditions of service of career members of the state public service also lacks anti-discrimination provisions. The Committee notes that the Government repeats its statement that it will include provisions prohibiting and defining indirect and direct discrimination in employment and occupation, including in respect of recruitment, once it has been determined when the revision of the Labour Code will take place. The Committee urges the Government to make progress in this regard and asks the Government to indicate all steps with a view to including provisions in the Labour Code and Act No. 81/003 defining and prohibiting direct and indirect discrimination, in all aspects of employment and occupation, on at least all the grounds enumerated in the Convention.

Discrimination based on sex. The Committee previously noted that certain provisions of the Family Code, of Act No. 81/003 of 17 July 1981, on the conditions of service of career members of the state public services, and of the Legislative Ordinance No. 88-056 of 29 September 1988, respecting the activities of magistrates, constituted discrimination on grounds of sex in employment and occupation contrary to the Convention. The Committee recalls that sections 448 and 497 of Act No. 87/010 of 1 August 1987, enacting the Family Code, appear to indicate that, in certain cases, a woman has to obtain the authorization of her husband to take up salaried employment, whereas no such obligation is imposed upon the husband. In relation to jobs in the public service, section 8 of Act No. 81/003 of 17 July 1981 and section 1(7) of Legislative Ordinance No. 88-056 of 29 September 1988 provide that a married woman must have obtained the permission of her spouse to be recruited as a career member of the public service or appointed as a magistrate. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Statute of magistrates will be communicated in its next report and that the Statute of the public administration has not yet been promulgated. The Committee having previously noted that the modification of the abovementioned texts was under way, requests the Government to make progress in bringing the abovementioned provisions, including those in the Family Code, into conformity with the Convention and to provide the amended texts, as soon as possible.

Discrimination based on race or ethnic origin. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not reply to the Committee's previous comments regarding the socio-economic situation of the Batwa, and discrimination faced by the Batwa in employment and occupation. The Committee had noted in this context the concluding observations of the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, of 17 August 2007, expressing concern that "pygmies" (Bambuti, Batwa and Bacwa) are subjected to marginalization and discrimination with regard to the enjoyment of their economic, social and cultural rights, in particular their access to education, health and the labour market. CERD also expressed concern that the rights of these groups to own, exploit, control and use their lands, their resources and communal territories – which are the basis for the exercise of their traditional occupations and livelihood activities – are not guaranteed (CERD/C/COD/CO/15, 17 August 2007, paragraphs 18 and 19). The Committee urges the Government once again to take measures with a view to ensuring equality of opportunity and treatment of the Bambuti, Batwa and Bacwa in employment and occupation, and to indicate the steps taken in this regard. The Government is also requested to indicate the measures taken to ensure that these indigenous groups enjoy their right to equality in their traditional occupations and livelihoods without discrimination.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Djibouti

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Legislative developments. ... The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the implementation and enforcement of section 137 of the Labour Code, including information on the measures taken or envisaged to raise awareness of these provisions among workers and employers and their representatives and public officials responsible for the enforcement of the labour legislation. In this regard, the Committee also asks the Government to provide information on whether any cases concerning section 137 have been dealt with by the responsible authorities and the manner in which they have been resolved, including any remedies provided or sanctions imposed.

Article 2(2)(c). Collective bargaining. The Committee notes from the Government's report that salaries in the private sector are determined by way of collective agreements. Section 258 of the Labour Code provides that collective agreements may determine the salary applicable to each occupational category. Section 259(4) provides that collective agreements cannot change the modalities of the application of the principle of "equal salary for equal work", irrespective of the origin, sex or age of the worker. The Committee notes that section 259 is not in conformity with the Convention as it refers to equal salary for equal work rather than to equal salary for work of equal value, and is also at variance with section 137 of the Labour Code. The Committee asks the Government to take the steps necessary to amend section 259(4) to bring it into alignment with the provisions of section 137 and to bring it into conformity with the Convention. The Committee also asks the Government to provide examples of collective agreements, as well as indications as to how the agreements implement the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Dominican Republic

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1953)

The Committee notes the observations of the National Confederation of Trade Union Unity (CNUS), the Autonomous Confederation of Workers' Unions (CASC) and the National Confederation of Dominican Workers (CNTD), received on 8 October 2012. The Committee asks the Government to send its comments in this respect.

Article 1 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. In its previous comments the Committee referred to the need to amend section 194 of the Labour Code and section 3(4) of Act No. 41-08 of 2008, which provide for "equal wages for equal work, in terms of capacity, performance and seniority, irrespective of the person performing the work". It also noted that article 62(9) in fine of the new Constitution – adopted on 26 January 2010 – lays down that "payment of equal wages for work of equal value is guaranteed, without discrimination based on sex or other grounds and under identical conditions of capacity, effectiveness or seniority". The Committee notes the Government's statement that in the context of the discussions on the amendment of the Labour Code it is proposed to amend section 194 to align it with the principle of the Convention. As regards Act No. 41-08, the Ministry of Public Administration will convey the Committee's observations to the legislators with a view to including a provision towards this end in the Bill issuing wage regulations which is before the Justice Commission of the Chamber of Deputies. The Committee recalls that the concept of "work of equal value" lies at the heart of the fundamental right of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and the promotion of equality. This concept includes equal remuneration for "equal", "the same" or "similar" work, but it also encompasses jobs which are of an entirely different nature but which are nevertheless of equal value (see General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 673). The Committee also considers that defining the concept of "work of equal value" in terms of "identical conditions of capacity, performance or seniority" restricts the concept laid down in the Convention, since it is also necessary to compare jobs which are performed under different conditions but which are nevertheless of equal value. The Committee asks the Government to continue to take the necessary steps to ensure that the amendment to section 194 fully reflects the principle of the Convention and is adopted as soon as possible by the National Congress. The Committee asks the Government to send a copy of the amended legislation once it has been adopted. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken with a view to fully harmonizing section 3(4) of Act No. 41-08 with the Convention and to indicate whether the Act issuing wage regulations has been adopted.

Gender pay gap and occupational segregation. In its previous observation the Committee noted the observations made by the CNUS, CASC and CNTD dated 31 August 2011, according to which the pay differential between men and women in 2011 was 16.6 per cent despite the fact that the percentage of women with higher education qualifications is greater than that of men. The Committee notes the Government's indication that on 12 January 2012 the Act confirming the National Development Strategy 2010–30 was adopted, establishing that all public plans, programmes, projects and policies must incorporate gender mainstreaming in the various spheres of action, in order to identify situations of gender discrimination and to adopt actions contributing to gender equity. As regards specific aspects of the remuneration gap, the Government indicates that the current progressive legal framework has made it possible to reduce differences in rates of pay. The Government adds that although the National Labour Survey (ENFT) indicates that there is a greater proportion of men participating in the labour market and that a greater proportion of wages are therefore paid to men, the difference in participation and remuneration between men and women has been reduced in recent years, and in the public sector technical studies are being conducted to determine what it would cost to reduce the current pay gap. The Committee also notes the Government's indication in its report on the application of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), that the implementation of the electronic system for the registration of enterprises and workers, designed to obtain information on pay disaggregated by sex and occupation, will enable public policies to be formulated with the objective of eliminating and preventing any gender pay differentials. The Committee also notes that the National Plan on Gender Equity 2006–16 (PLANEG 2006–16) recognizes the existence of a gender pay gap and the need to draw up legislation to tackle the issue. The Committee also observes that, according to the statistics supplied by the Government, there is marked occupational segregation, with women significantly outnumbered by men in traditionally “male” jobs (agriculture and stockbreeding, mining, construction and transport), whereas the unemployment rate for women is twice as high as the rate for men. The Committee recalls that pay differentials remain one of the most persistent forms of inequality between women and men. The continued persistence of significant gender pay gaps requires that governments, along with employers' and workers' organizations, take more proactive measures to raise awareness, make assessments and promote and enforce the application of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. Collecting, analysing and disseminating this information is important in identifying and addressing inequality in remuneration (see General Survey, 2012, paragraphs 668 and 669). The Committee asks the Government to take specific measures to tackle the pronounced gender pay gap and to send information in this regard, including on the measures taken in the context of PLANEG 2006–16 and the National Development Strategy 2010–30. The Government is also requested to indicate whether the electronic system for the registration of enterprises and workers has been implemented. Further, recalling that inequalities in wages can originate from the segregation of men and women in certain sectors and occupations, the Committee asks the Government to send information on the measures taken or contemplated to improve women's access to a greater variety of employment opportunities at all levels.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes the observations of the Autonomous Confederation of Workers' Unions (CASC) and the Employers' Confederation of the Dominican Republic (COPARDOM), which were attached to the Government's report and refer to matters pending. The Committee also notes the new observations submitted by the CASC, the National Trade Union Confederation (CNUS) and the National Confederation of Dominican Workers (CNTD), and requests the Government to send its observations thereon.

Discrimination based on colour, race and national extraction. The Committee has for a number of years been referring to discrimination against Haitians and dark-skinned Dominicans and recalls that in 2008, the Conference Committee called on the Government to address the intersection between migration and discrimination with a view to ensuring that migration laws and policies did not result in discrimination based on race, colour or national extraction. The Committee also recalls that in its previous observation it took note of observations by the CNUS, the CASC and the CNTD, asserting that foreign workers, mainly Haitians, were paid lower wages than national workers in the construction sector. The Committee notes with interest the adoption on 19 October 2011 of Regulation No. 631-11 to the General Migration Act, section 32 of which establishes that the same fundamental rights applying to nationals are guaranteed to resident foreigners. Section 35(III) provides that the Ministry of Labour must ensure that the equality guaranteed in the Constitution is applied to the conditions of work of immigrants and that the labour law is enforced. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that as a result of the application of the Regulation, unregistered immigrants will be given legal status and be issued with documents, and will be authorized to work and to avail themselves of the national social security system on an equal footing with Dominican workers. The Government adds that the Legal Assistance Department will also afford help to foreign workers. The Committee further notes that, according to the Government, the Dominican Labour Observatory (OMLAD) submitted a study in February 2012 on the participation of Haitian immigrants in the Dominican labour market, specifically in the construction and banana sectors. The Committee notes that the study highlights a marked wage gap between immigrant and Dominican workers in these sectors and the need to ensure that the fundamental rights of immigrant workers are respected, that the supervisory mechanisms are reinforced and that access to justice is guaranteed. Furthermore, a labour migration unit has been established in the Ministry of Labour (Resolution No. 14/2012), the aim of which is to oversee compliance with the labour regulations applying to foreigners, disseminate information on the rights of foreigners and ensure respect for migrants' rights through inspection procedures. The Committee also notes that a committee has been established to promote equal opportunities and prevent discrimination at work within the Ministry of Labour. While taking due note of all the measures adopted by the Government to address the issue of discrimination against Haitians and dark-skinned Dominicans, the Committee recalls that it has been dealing with these concerns for a number of years and highlights the need to complement the measures adopted with practical implementation. The Committee accordingly asks the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the Regulation to the General Migration Act, No. 631-11 of 2011, is fully implemented to ensure there is no discrimination against migrant workers based on any of the grounds enumerated in the Convention and to provide specific information in this regard. Furthermore, it hopes that the measures adopted by the labour migration unit and the committee to promote equal opportunities and prevent discrimination at work will enable the Convention to be fully applied and will ensure that workers of Haitian origin and dark-skinned Dominicans will not suffer discrimination based on race, colour or national extraction, including irregular workers, and asks the Government to provide information in this regard, and on the following:

- (i) the specific measures adopted pursuant to the OMLAD study on the participation of Haitian immigrants in the construction and banana sectors;*
- (ii) complaints filed with the administrative and judicial authorities for discrimination based on race, colour or national extraction, and on the processing of these complaints; and*
- (iii) whether a tripartite committee has been established to follow up the recommendations of the Special Rapporteur and the independent expert referred to in earlier observations; and on progress made in implementing those recommendations.*

Discrimination based on sex. The Committee has for a number of years been raising concerns about the persistence of instances of discrimination based on sex, particularly mandatory pregnancy testing, sexual harassment and the failure to apply the legislation in force effectively, especially in export processing zones. The Government states that judges and labour inspectors receive ongoing training on all forms of discrimination, including discrimination based on sex. It lists the measures taken to provide training and awareness raising for workers, employers and public servants about sexual harassment and pregnancy testing. The Committee notes, however, that the Government provides no information on progress made in adopting the amendments to the Labour Code that concern sexual harassment and pregnancy testing, or on the measures to support and protect victims of sexual harassment and mandatory pregnancy testing to which the Committee referred in its previous observation. It notes that the Government provides no information on the scope of section 47(9) of the Labour Code, which prohibits employers from “carrying out any action against a worker which may be regarded as sexual harassment, or supporting or failing to intervene in any such action on the part of the employer representatives”. The Government indicates that the Penal Code punishes sexual harassment by a one-year prison term and a fine ranging from 5,000 to 10,000 pesos. The Committee recalls that sexual harassment at work and pregnancy testing as a requirement for entering and remaining in employment constitute serious violations of the Convention and must be adequately and effectively addressed in legislation and practice with a view to their elimination and prevention. Furthermore, the Committee recalls that addressing sexual harassment only through criminal proceedings is not sufficient due to the sensitivity of the issue, the higher burden of proof, which is harder to meet, especially if there are no witnesses (which is often the case), and the fact that criminal law generally focuses on sexual assault or “immoral acts” and not the full range of behaviour that constitutes sexual harassment in employment and occupation (see General Survey on Fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 792). The Committee again urges the Government to take specific measures, including through the Committee to promote equal opportunities and prevent such discrimination at work, to ensure that the legislation in force is effectively applied, and to take proactive measures to prevent, investigate and punish sexual harassment and pregnancy testing as a requirement for obtaining and keeping a job, and to provide adequate protection for the victims. The Committee also requests the Government as follows:

- (i) to take the necessary measures to increase the penalties for such acts and to ensure that the mechanisms for settling disputes regarding discrimination in employment and occupation are efficient and available in practice to all workers, including those in export processing zones;*
- (ii) to provide information on the scope of section 47(9) of the Labour Code and on the status of the proposed amendments to the Labour Code dealing with sexual harassment and pregnancy testing, and expresses the firm hope that the amendments will include a provision expressly prohibiting both quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment and will establish appropriate penalties; and*
- (iii) to provide detailed information on training for judges, labour inspectors and the social partners on sexual harassment and pregnancy testing, including representative samples of the training material used.*

Real or perceived HIV status. With regard to mandatory testing to establish HIV status, the Committee notes with interest the adoption of Act No. 135-11 of 7 June 2011, section 6 of which prohibits HIV testing as a requirement for obtaining or keeping a job or obtaining a promotion. Furthermore, under sections 8 and 9, any dismissal on the ground of HIV status is automatically null and void. Under the Act, mandatory testing is subject to a fine ranging from 25 to 50 times the minimum wage in the private sector, and in the public sector gives rise to civil liability. The Committee also notes that, according to the Government, the Technical Unit for Comprehensive Care (UTELAIN) has carried out a number of training projects that include training on the HIV and AIDS Recommendation, 2010 (No. 200) for labour inspectors, lawyers and the social partners. Furthermore, an agreement has been signed for inter-institutional cooperation between the Ministry of Labour, the National Council on HIV and AIDS (CONAVIHSIDA), the National Council for Export Processing Zones and the Dominican Association of Export Processing Zones, with a view to devising policies and establishing certification for enterprises in export processing zones. The UTELAIN has signed 169 agreements with enterprises on the implementation of anti-discriminatory policies relating to HIV and AIDS. The Committee requests the Government to continue to send information on the measures adopted to prevent and eradicate discrimination based on HIV and AIDS. It requests the Government to provide information on the number and nature of complaints filed with the administrative and judicial authorities for discrimination based on HIV and AIDS, including for mandatory HIV and AIDS testing, and on the decisions handed down.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Ecuador

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the adoption of the new Constitution in September 2008 following its approval by referendum. The Committee notes with interest that article 11(2) of the Constitution includes new grounds on which discrimination is prohibited, including migration and being HIV positive. It also notes that article 43 provides that the State shall guarantee that pregnant women are not discriminated against on grounds of pregnancy in the educational, social and labour fields. The Committee further notes that article 47(5) of the Constitution recognizes the right of persons with disabilities to work under conditions of equality of opportunity with a view to developing their capacities and potential, through policies for their integration into public and private entities. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to give effect to these provisions.

Article 2 of the Convention. National equality policy. The Committee notes that Executive Decree No. 1733 (Official Bulletin No. 601 of 29 May 2009) abolished the National Women's Council (CONAMU) and established the Transition Commission to determine the public institutions that will guarantee equality between women and men, and which is entrusted with responsibility to prepare draft legislative reforms for the establishment of the National Gender Equality Council. The Committee notes that, in addition to the CONAMU, changes have also been made to the Council for the Development of the Peoples and Nationalities of Ecuador (CODENPE), the Afro-Ecuadorian Development Corporation (CODAE), the Council for the Development of the Coastal Montubio People (CODEPMOC), the Council for Children and Young Persons (CNA) and the National Disability Council (CONADIS). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of this process of transition and on the institutions established in accordance with articles 156 and 157 of the new Constitution which are entrusted with responsibilities related to guaranteeing equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation.

National policy on gender equality. The Committee notes the concern expressed by the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women in its concluding observations of November 2008 about the high rates of women's underemployment and unemployment, especially in rural areas, and cases of gender discrimination in the workplace, including dismissals relating to maternity, and discriminatory labour practices against women, especially indigenous and migrant women and those of African descent (CEDAW/D/ECU/CO/7, 7 November 2008, paragraphs 34–36). The Committee once again requests information on the results achieved in the prevention and eradication of work by women under conditions of exploitation which, as noted by the Committee in its previous comments, was one of the objectives of the Equal Opportunities Plan 2005–09 (PIO). The Committee also requests the Government to provide detailed information on the policies and programmes intended to ensure equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation for women, especially indigenous women, migrant women and women of African descent, and their impact.

Promoting the access of women to public sector employment. With reference to its previous observation, in which it noted with interest the conclusion of a Framework Inter-institutional Cooperation Agreement with a view to ensuring that effect is given to the principles of equality and equity between men and women in the processes of institutional modernization and the re-evaluation of work in public institutions in Ecuador, the Committee notes that, according to the Government's report, in the context of the above Agreement, gender was included in the Integrated Human Resources Information System (SIIRH) developed by the National Technical Secretariat for the Development of Human Resources and Remuneration in the Public Sector (SENRES) and the study "Public employment in Ecuador: A gender view" was published. It notes that the Transition Committee has also worked to introduce gender as a cross-cutting issue in the law and standards issued by the SENRES with the objective of promoting the access of women to public employment. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the introduction of gender as a cross-cutting issue in the standards issued by the SENRES with the objective of women gaining access to public employment and the impact of this measure. Noting that the Framework Inter-institutional Cooperation Agreement expires in December 2009, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures envisaged to continue ensuring the application of the principle of the Convention in the public sector. The Committee also refers to its comments on the application of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100).

Legislation. The Committee notes that, according to the information provided by the Government, the draft amendment of the Cooperatives Act is before the National Assembly. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee urges the Government to take this opportunity to repeal section 17(b) of the Regulations of the Cooperatives Act, under which married women require the authorization of their husbands to be members of agricultural housing and family garden cooperatives. The Committee hopes that the Government will be in a position to provide information on the progress achieved in this respect in its next report.

Sexual harassment. The Committee notes that the Gender and Youth Unit of the Ministry of Labour is preparing a compendium on sexual harassment in the fields of education, labour, politics and domestic work which includes basic definitions, practical cases, national and international legislation and the contact details of support bodies and organizations. The Committee also notes the draft constitutional proposal of February 2008 to discourage situations of harassment, which involves the termination of officials who commit repeated offences of sexual and psychological harassment and abuse of authority. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact that this compendium has had in terms of preventing sexual harassment in the working environment and to provide information on other measures that are being adopted to raise awareness of the harmful effects of harassment at the workplace. The Committee invites the Government once again to take appropriate legislative measures to prohibit sexual harassment in employment and occupation which include both quid pro quo and hostile work environment harassment.

Afro-Ecuadorian peoples. The Committee notes that the National Development Plan 2007–10 contains a component with the objective of combating historical disparities which hinder the human development of Afro-Ecuadorian persons. It notes that according to the statistics contained in the Plan, the racial prejudice index against Afro-Ecuadorian persons is 75.9 per cent. It also notes that, according to the living conditions survey of 2006, while a white person can obtain average monthly income from employment of US$316.60, an Afro-Ecuadorian person only obtains US$210.80. With regard to the urban unemployment rate, the Committee notes that it is 11 per cent for Afro-Ecuadorian persons, compared with a national average of 7.9 per cent, and 17.5 per cent for Afro-Ecuadorian women. It further notes that 92.8 per cent of Afro-Ecuadorian persons do not reach university level. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the results and impact of the various types of action envisaged in the plan referred to above, including the application of affirmative action measures, the development of the “Work without discrimination” programme and the action taken to promote and increase the access of young Afro-Ecuadorian persons to university. The Committee also requests information on the measures promoted, as envisaged in the Plan, to monitor and punish any act of racial discrimination against Afro-Ecuadorian persons on the labour market.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the future.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1960)

Article 1 of the Convention. Work of equal value. Legislation. In its previous observation, the Committee emphasized once again that the equal remuneration provisions of Labour Law No. 12 of 2003 did not fully reflect the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value as laid down in the Convention. The Committee therefore urged the Government to take appropriate measures to amend the provisions of the Labour Law so as to provide not only for equal remuneration for men and women for equal, the same or similar work but also to address situations where men and women perform different jobs, using different skills and involving different working conditions, but which are nevertheless jobs of equal value. In its reply, the Government reiterates its position that sections 35 and 88 of the Labour Law give full effect to the Convention. The Committee recalls that section 35 prohibits discrimination in wages based on, among other grounds, sex. While such a prohibition is a complementary aspect of equal remuneration for work of equal value, it is not in itself sufficient to give effect to the Convention, as it does not give effect to the principle of “work of equal value” (General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 676). The Committee notes further that section 88 is a general non-discrimination clause applying specifically to women workers where their working conditions are similar (or analogous). Neither section 35 nor section 88 refer specifically to “work of equal value”. The Government considers that the phrase “work that is similar” is equivalent to the phrase “work of equal value”. However, the Committee recalls that “work of equal value”, while including comparisons between jobs involving similar or analogous work, also encompasses comparisons between jobs that are entirely different in nature, but which are nevertheless of equal value.

The Committee notes, however, that pursuant to Ministerial Order No. 60 of 2011, a committee has been established to review the provisions of Labour Law No. 12 of 2003 and its amendments with a view to bringing the labour legislation into line with international labour standards. The Committee also notes that preliminary steps have been taken with a view to the adoption of an Act specifically addressing gender equality. The Committee urges the Government to take the opportunity presented by this review of the Labour Law and by the drafting of an Act on gender equality to ensure that full legislative expression is given to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the status of the work of the committee reviewing the Labour Law and regarding the drafting and adoption of an Act on gender equality.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

El Salvador

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1995)

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Discrimination on grounds of sex. Enforcement. For a number of years the Committee has been referring to cases where women are obliged to provide pregnancy tests in order to apply for or remain in employment and to the dismissal of women with disabilities, particularly in the maquila (export processing zones) and in the industrial, trade and services sectors. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that between June 2009 and July 2012 the Special Unit on Gender and the Prevention of Discriminatory Labour Practices carried out 701 inspections in export processing zones, 186 of which gave rise to procedures for the imposition of fines. The Committee notes that inspections were also carried out at the request of the interested parties following the dismissal of pregnant women. In 2009, six out of 41 such inspections gave rise to fines, and the remainder of the cases were shelved; in 2010, nine complaints on the same issues were shelved; and between July 2011 and June 2012, fines were imposed in 15 cases out of 46 complaints. The Unit also undertook activities to disseminate Ministerial Circular No. 001/05 prohibiting employers from requiring HIV or pregnancy tests from women. The Committee observes that the Government has not provided any information on the dismissal of women with disabilities or on the programme for the full development of working women in the maquila, to which it referred in previous comments. The Committee recalls that the discriminatory nature of distinctions based on pregnancy and related medical conditions is demonstrated from the fact that they only affect women. The Committee also emphasizes the importance of governments, in collaboration with the social partners, adopting specific measures to combat this kind of discrimination effectively (see the General Survey on equality in employment and occupation, 1988, paragraph 41, and the General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 784). The Committee also notes that women can suffer multiple discrimination based on sex and disability (see General Survey, 2012, paragraph 748). The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the inspections carried out by the Special Unit on Gender and the Prevention of Discriminatory Labour Practices of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare in the maquila, industrial, trade and services sectors and on the penalties imposed, as well as on judicial proceedings in this respect. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the implementation and impact of the programme for the full development of working women in the maquila, and other measures to promote awareness of this type of discrimination among employers and workers in all productive sectors.

Article 1(1)(b). Real or perceived HIV status. The Committee notes the Government's indication that work is continuing on the amendment of the regulations to guarantee protection against all forms of discrimination on the ground of HIV status, to which it referred in its previous observations. Several governmental and civil society bodies are engaged in the revision process. It is planned to submit a draft of the amended text shortly for discussion in the appropriate committees of the Legislative Assembly. The Committee draws the Government's attention in this connection to the HIV and AIDS Recommendation, 2010 (No. 200). The Government adds that between June 2009 and June 2011, the Special Unit on Gender and the Prevention of Discriminatory Labour Practices conducted awareness-raising campaigns on relevant national and international provisions, and particularly on Ministerial Circular No. 001/05 prohibiting employers from requiring women to provide HIV and pregnancy tests. The Committee hopes that the future legislation will guarantee public sector workers effective protection against discrimination based on real or perceived HIV status and requests the Government to continue providing information on any developments in the adoption of the relevant legislation and its implementation in the private sector, and on any other measures to combat discrimination on grounds of the real or perceived HIV status of workers.

Article 2. Equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women. The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the Act on equality, equity and the elimination of discrimination against women (Decree No. 645 of 4 April 2011). The Committee notes that the Act is of general application and adopts a transversal approach to the elimination of both direct and indirect discrimination in law and practice. The Act also provides that the Office of the Public Prosecutor shall be responsible for defending, guaranteeing and promoting equality and non-discrimination against women, and will accordingly establish an appropriate department as part of its structure and organization. The Government adds that its gender equality policy is being implemented through its Five-Year Development Plan 2009–14, (which includes the national policy for women), updated and adopted by the El Salvador Institute for Women's Development (ISDEMU). The Government also refers to the incorporation of the gender perspective in municipal planning, so as to create the necessary conditions for women to participate in all spheres of the development process. Local governments are implementing policies and action to promote gender equality in vocational training and local development and have adopted specific institutional capacity-building measures to foster gender equality (the creation of women's units at the municipal level, the formulation of municipal gender equality policies). The Committee notes, however, that the statistics supplied by the Government show that a serious gap exists in the participation of men and women in management positions in both the public and the private sectors and in both urban and rural areas. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the implementation in practice of the Act on equality, equity and the elimination of discrimination against women, especially on the creation of the department responsible for defending, guaranteeing and promoting gender equality and non-discrimination against women. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate what impact the adoption of the Act has had, particularly with respect to the participation of women in the labour market and in management positions. Further, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the implementation of the gender equality policy and of the national policy for women adopted under the new Act on equality, equity and the elimination of discrimination against women, its impact in practice and the relationship between them.

Indigenous peoples. The Committee notes the Government's indication that a number of measures have been taken to facilitate the identification of indigenous peoples and their members. The Committee notes especially the cooperation agreement signed by the Directorate for Indigenous Peoples with the Office of the Public Prosecutor, the National Registry of Natural Persons and the Corporation of Municipalities of El Salvador. The Government states that the measures adopted are intended to eradicate discrimination against indigenous peoples and to offer them access to national services, such as labour inspection and employment services. Measures have also been adopted to improve the productive capacity of women in craftwork. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the measures adopted on improving access of indigenous peoples to the labour market and their access to education and vocational training. The Committee also requests the Government to provide statistical data disaggregated by sex in this regard.

Sexual harassment. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to consider adopting specific provisions guaranteeing protection against sexual harassment at work. The Committee notes the adoption of the Special Comprehensive Act on a life free from violence for women (Decree No. 520 of 25 November 2010), which covers harassment at work and physical, sexual, psychological, emotional and work-related violence where there exists a relationship of power or trust. The Committee notes that the ISDEMU is the body responsible for implementing the Act, preparing a framework policy and ensuring its enforcement. The Act stipulates that the offences it covers are subject to criminal action and lays down procedural guarantees for women who are the victims of acts of violence, together with specific penalties for the various offences. The Committee also notes that the ISDEMU, along with other institutions, has adopted a strategy for preventing sexual harassment which involves public awareness and information measures and the modification of institutional regulations. The Committee notes, however, that the Act does not define sexual harassment at work clearly, in terms of including both quid pro quo and hostile working environment sexual harassment. It is also unclear whether the Act covers harassment by colleagues at work (see the general observation of 2002 on sexual harassment). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the implementation in practice of the Special Comprehensive Act on a life free from violence for women in relation to the lodging of complaints of sexual harassment at work and how adequate protection is ensured both against quid pro quo and hostile working environment harassment, whether in the context of hierarchical relationships or between co-workers. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the operation of the procedure established for examining complaints of sexual harassment at work, and specifically on the provisions dealing with the burden of proof and the possibility for victims to obtain reinstatement and compensation. The Committee also requests the Government to provide statistics on the number of complaints lodged and their outcome, and to provide information on any awareness and information measures on sexual harassment in general and on the Act in particular. Further, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the applicable provisions in cases of sexual harassment against men.

The Committee is also raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Ethiopia

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1966)

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Legislation. Grounds of discrimination. The Committee recalls the absence of legislative protection against discrimination on the grounds of social origin and national extraction, particularly with respect to the Labour Proclamation No. 377/2003 and the Federal Civil Service Proclamation No. 515/2007. It notes the Government's indication that the grounds of social origin and national extraction are substantially covered by the term "any other" grounds in the legislation (section 14(1)(f) of the Labour Proclamation, and section 13(1) of the Federal Civil Service Proclamation). The Committee recalls, however, that where legal provisions are adopted, they should specify at least all the grounds of discrimination specified in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention (General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 853). The Committee asks the Government to take concrete steps to amend the Federal Civil Servants Proclamation No. 515/2007 and the Labour Proclamation No. 377/2003, with a view to specifying social origin and national extraction as prohibited grounds of discrimination, and to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Scope of application. The Committee recalls the importance of amending the Labour Proclamation with a view to explicitly providing that workers and candidates for employment, including citizens and non-citizens, are protected against discrimination. The Committee welcomes the Government's acknowledgement that continuous action is required to address discrimination, including the review and revision of laws, and notes the Government's assurance that the necessary efforts will be made to review the existing legislation to fulfil the principles and standards under the Convention. The Committee trusts that the Government will take steps to ensure that workers and candidates for employment, including non-citizens, are protected against discrimination in all aspects of employment and occupation, and asks the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 1(1)(b). Additional grounds of discrimination. The Committee recalls the Proclamation No. 568/2008, to provide for the right to employment of persons with disability and section 13(1) of the Federal Civil Servants Proclamation, which prohibits discrimination against jobseekers or civil servants including on the grounds of disability and HIV status or AIDS. The Committee notes the Government's commitment to take the necessary steps to ensure that all workers and jobseekers are protected against discrimination in all aspects of employment and occupation. The Committee again asks the Government to provide information on the practical application of Proclamation No. 568/2008, including any affirmative action measures taken, and any cases of discrimination brought before the courts. Please also indicate whether a body has yet been established to implement this Proclamation. The Committee also again asks the Government to provide any information on the application of section 13(1) of the Federal Civil Servants Proclamation, in particular with respect to cases alleging discrimination based on disability or HIV status or AIDS and the results thereof.

Article 2. Equality of opportunity and treatment between women and men. Education and training. The Committee notes the statistical information provided by the Government that the gross enrolment rate for general education has reached 90.15 per cent for girls and 96.6 per cent for boys, and among the total of 371,347 participants in technical and vocational education and training in 2009–10, 171,548 were women. It also notes the Government's indication that there have been significant achievements in expanding education and training at different levels in the country. The Committee recalls that access to education and to a wide range of vocational training courses is a key factor in determining the actual possibilities of gaining access to a wide range of paid occupations and employment, especially those with opportunities for advancement and promotion (General Survey, 2012, paragraph 750). The Committee asks the Government to provide information on any policies, or studies and surveys conducted to address unequal access of women to training and education at all levels, including statistical data on the participation of men and women in the various courses. It also asks the Government to provide information on the results achieved through such measures, including the number of men and women, respectively, who have secured employment after completing the training courses.

Equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of race and colour. Indigenous communities. The Committee notes the Government's indication in general terms that it has given due consideration to the development of pastoral regions in its development policies, strategies and programmes, including its five-year Growth and Transformation Plan. The Government also indicates that programmes undertaken to develop pastoralist communities include (i) a water centred development programme aiming at food security; (ii) a sustainable land management programme targeting land degradation; (iii) a land administration programme aiming at securing land tenure. The Committee asks the Government to indicate to what extent consideration is given to the land-based pastoralists' livelihood and way of life in establishing and implementing the national policy and planning frameworks, including in the context of the programmes undertaken to develop pastoralist communities, with a view to tailoring them to pastoralists' specific needs. It also asks the Government to indicate how the traditional land rights of pastoralist communities are safeguarded under the national policy, particularly in the context of private land ownership and large-scale industrial farming projects that could be or are being implemented in rural areas. Please also provide any information on the role of the pastoralist communities in the process of the development and implementation of the national policy and planning frameworks.

Follow-up to the recommendations made by the Tripartite Committee (representation made under article 24 of the ILO Constitution). The Committee recalls that the final award for damages claims was rendered on 17 August 2009. The Committee notes the Government's indication that since Eritrea has not yet settled the payment to Ethiopian workers, the final award has not been enforced, and that the Government is not in a position to provide information on the actual remedies granted to Ethiopian displaced workers. Recalling that the Claims Commission, in its decision of 27 July 2007, recognized that each State party had full authority to determine the use and distribution of any damages awarded to it, the Committee asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to grant actual relief or remedies to the workers displaced following the outbreak of the 1998 border conflict.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Fiji

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 2002)

Article 1 of the Convention. Work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee recalls its previous observation in which it noted that section 78 of the Employment Relations Promulgation (ERP), 2007, does not give full legislative expression to the principle of the Convention because it restricts the comparison of remuneration to men and women holding the "same or substantially similar qualifications" employed in the "same or substantially similar circumstances". The Committee recalls that such legislation should not only provide for equal remuneration for equal, the same or similar work, but should also address situations where men and women perform different work, requiring different qualifications and involving different circumstances, that is nevertheless work of equal value (see General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 673). The Committee noted previously the Government's reply that this issue would be referred to the Employment Relations Advisory Board for consideration. The Committee notes with regret, however, that the Government's present report contains no information on this point. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 78 of the ERP so as to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and to provide information on the progress made in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 2002)

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 100th Session, June 2011). In its previous observation and in the absence of a report, the Committee recalled that a discussion has taken place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2011. In the resulting conclusions, the Conference Committee urged the Government to ensure that the principles contained in the People's Charter for Change, Peace and Progress adopted in 2008 were translated into concrete action, and called upon the Government: (i) to amend or repeal all racially discriminatory laws and regulations, including the Education (Establishment and Registration of Schools) Regulations, 1966; (ii) to effectively address discriminatory practices; and (iii) to ensure equality in employment, training and education for all persons of all ethnic groups. The Conference Committee also addressed the right of government employees to non-discrimination and equality in employment, as well as the low labour force participation of women, and asked that measures be taken. The Conference Committee also noted concerns regarding the difficulty in exercising the right to freedom of association in the country, and called on the Government to establish the conditions necessary for genuine tripartite dialogue, with a view to addressing the issues related to the implementation of the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government has not replied to the latter point and asks the Government to provide specific and detailed information in this regard.

Article 1(1) of the Convention. Protection against discrimination. Public service. Legislation. The Committee recalls that the Employment Relations Promulgation of 2007 (ERP) explicitly prohibits direct and indirect discrimination in employment and occupation and covers all the prohibited grounds listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, as well as a number of additional grounds, as envisaged under Article 1(1)(b). It also recalls that further to the adoption of the Employment Relations (Amendment) Decree 2011 (Decree No. 21 of 2011) on 13 May 2011, government employees, including teachers, were excluded from the scope of the ERP and thus from its non-discrimination provisions. As regards employees excluded, and in general persons employed in the public service, the Committee welcomes the adoption of the Public Service (Amendment) Decree 2011 (Decree No. 36 of 2011) on 29 July 2011, which inserts in the Public Service Act 1999 new Parts 2A and 2B respectively on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work and Equal Employment Opportunities. The Committee notes that section 10B(2) prohibits, in all aspects of employment, discrimination based on ethnicity, colour, gender, religion, national extraction and social origin, omitting however, political opinion which is listed in section 6(2) of the ERP. It also includes the additional grounds of sexual orientation, age, marital status, pregnancy, family responsibilities, state of health including real or perceived HIV status and AIDS, trade union membership and disability. The Committee also notes that section 10C on prohibited grounds of discrimination, whether direct or indirect, refers to “actual or supposed personal characteristics or circumstances, including: ethnic origin, colour, place of origin, gender, sexual orientation, birth, primary language, economic status, age, disability, HIV/AIDS status, social class, marital status (including living in a relationship in the nature of a marriage), employment status, family status, religion or belief”, omitting “opinion” which is listed in section 75 of the ERP. While welcoming the recent legislative measures, particularly with respect to the additional grounds of discrimination, the Committee recalls that where legal provisions are adopted to give effect to the principle of the Convention, they should include at least all the grounds of discrimination specified in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to include political opinion among the prohibited grounds of discrimination listed in the Public Service Act 1999. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate how public service employees and applicants to public service employment are protected against discrimination based on political opinion in practice.

The Committee recalls that the Conference Committee noted that further to section 3 of Decree No. 21 of 2011, prohibits any action, proceeding, claim or grievance “which purports to or purported to challenge or involves the Government ..., any Minister or the Public Service Commission ... which has been brought by virtue of or under the [Employment Relations Promulgation]” and that it urged the Government to ensure that government employees had access to competent judicial bodies to claim their rights and to adequate remedies. While noting the Government’s indication regarding the jurisdiction of the High Court to hear any application for judicial review of the decisions of the Public Service Commission concerning termination of government employees, the Committee asks the Government to provide detailed information on the procedure and means of redress available to workers excluded from the scope of the ERP, alleging discrimination in employment or occupation which purport to challenge or involve public authorities. The Government is requested to provide information on the number of complaints submitted, the grounds invoked, the remedies granted and the sanctions imposed.

Article 1. Equal access to education and vocational training. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the education system was to undergo an extensive reform and requested the Government to indicate whether the Education (Establishment and Registration of Schools) Regulations, 1966, which provide that in the admission process preference may be given to pupils of a particular race or creed, was still in force. According to the Government’s report, a draft Education Decree that will repeal the Education Act and all its subordinate legislation, including the 1966 Regulations, is being prepared. The draft Decree has been vetted by the Attorney-General and sent back to the Ministry of Education for amendment. The Committee notes that section 26(3) of the draft Education Decree provides that “no child shall be denied admission solely on grounds of race, age, disabilities or religion”. The Committee recalls in this regard that access to education and to a wide range of vocational training courses is of paramount importance to achieving equality in the labour market (General Survey on Fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 750). The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure the equal access of boys and girls, men and women from all ethnic groups to education and vocational training, and asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken to implement the reform of the educational system, including the adoption of the new Education Decree, and the results achieved. It requests the Government to clarify whether under section 26(3) of the draft Education Decree, the grounds of race, age, disability or religion can still be invoked, possibly in combination with other grounds, as one of the reasons to deny admission to school and to specify the grounds, if any, on the basis of which admission may be denied. The Committee reiterates its previous request for statistical information on the number of schools still applying race or creed as an admission requirement as well as the number of pupils enrolled in these schools.

Article 2. National policy to promote equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of race, colour and national extraction. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption on 15 December 2008 by the National Council for Building a Better Fiji (NCBBF) of the Peoples’ Charter for Change, Peace and Progress, which aims to build a society based on equality of opportunity for all Fiji citizens and on peace. It further noted that the Charter also contains specific measures concerning indigenous peoples and their institutions and that a number of recommendations were made by the NCBBF, such as the need to promulgate legislation prohibiting discrimination based on race, religion and sexual orientation, as well as legislation protecting the rights of ethnic minority groups (Indians, Pacific Islanders, Chinese, European and landless Fijians), especially with a view to improving access to land. As far as implementation is concerned, the Committee notes from the Government's report that racial and inappropriate categorization and profiling in government records are being removed, the education system is being reformed and the name "Fijian" is to be applied to all citizens of Fiji while the name "i-Taukei" is used to designate indigenous Fijians who represent around 60 per cent of the population of Fiji. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the concrete measures taken to implement the Peoples' Charter for Change, Peace and Progress with a view to prohibiting and eliminating discrimination, in particular racial discrimination, and to promote equal opportunities for all, including minority groups, in relation to access to education, vocational training, employment and various occupations. The Government is requested to provide information on any action or programmes undertaken by the Ministry for i-Taukei Affairs to promote equality in employment and occupation, including awareness-raising campaigns promoting tolerance between all components of the population.

Affirmative action. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it has decided to replace the old affirmative action scheme in favour of indigenous peoples by a new "action scheme across all the races based on a means test" as part of the reform undertaken to develop and implement inclusive, non-discriminatory and non-race based policies towards the goal of common citizenry. It further notes that scholarship schemes that used to be race-based have been discontinued. The Committee wishes to recall that when adequately designed, affirmative action measures are aimed at ensuring equality of opportunity in practice, taking into account the diversity of situations of the persons concerned, so as to halt discrimination, redress the effects of past discriminatory practices and restore a balance, and that they are part of a broader effort to eliminate all inequalities and an important component of the national equality policy, referred to in Article 2 of the Convention. Such measures must genuinely pursue the objective of equality of opportunity, be proportional to the nature and scope of the protection or assistance needed or of the existing discrimination, and be examined periodically in order to ascertain whether they are still needed and remain effective. Affirmative action grounded on the prior consultation and consent of the stakeholders, including workers' and employers' organizations, helps to ensure that the measures taken are broadly accepted, effective and in line with the principle of non-discrimination (General Survey, 2012, paragraphs 862–864). In the light of the above, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the new action scheme envisaged and its implementation in the fields of education, vocational training, employment and occupation, indicating how it intends to remedy de facto inequalities, redress the effects of past discriminatory practices and promote equal opportunities for all. Please specify if the new scheme provides for monitoring and assessment mechanisms.

Gender equality. The Committee notes that the Government's report contains information on the general strategies adopted to promote gender equality and promote the creation of enterprises by women, but does not provide any information on concrete measures taken for that purpose nor on the results achieved through, for instance the implementation of the Women's Plan of Action 1999–2008 to which the Committee referred in its previous comments. The Committee notes the statistics regarding the participation rate of women on a number of bodies, such as the Employment Relations Advisory Board (29 per cent), the National Occupational Safety and Health Advisory Board (13 per cent) and the Wages Councils (20 per cent). The Government states that it aims to reach a participation rate of 30 per cent of women on employment and industrial relations bodies. The Committee further notes that the statistical data on the labour force provided by the Government are not disaggregated by sex and therefore do not give sufficient information on the participation of women and men in the labour market. The Committee notes that, in its concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), while welcoming the new Women's Plan of Action (2010–19), again expressed concern at the persistence of practices and traditions, as well as strong patriarchal attitudes and deep-rooted stereotypes, regarding the roles, responsibilities and identities of women and men in all spheres of life. Such practices and customs perpetuate discrimination against women and girls and may constitute obstacles to their education. The Committee notes CEDAW's concerns about the insufficient financial and human resources allocated to the national machinery for the advancement of women, as well as regarding the high number of women in the informal economy with no social security or other benefits and the unequal de facto situation of rural women in terms of access to land and credit (CEDAW/C/FJI/CO/4, 30 July 2010, paragraphs. 6, 16, 17, 20, 21, 28, and 30). The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the concrete measures taken to promote effectively gender equality in employment and occupation, in the framework of the former and the new Women's Plan of Action or otherwise, including measures taken to address gender stereotypes and improve the access of women to occupations traditionally held by men, through education and training, as well as measures taken to improve the access of women to land and credit. It also requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to increase the participation of women on employment and industrial relations bodies, and the results achieved.

Article 3(d). Promoting equality in employment under the control of a public authority. The Committee notes that the statistics provided by the Government on the number of men and women employed in the public sector, disaggregated by status (permanent, under a contract or temporary) show a balance between men and women. The Committee notes however that in its most recent concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) drew the Government's attention to the under-representation of minorities in public services and to the need to assess the reasons for this phenomenon and address it effectively (CERD/C/FJI/CO/18-20, 31 August 2012, paragraph 12). While noting the Government's general statement that all ministries are implementing the Equal Employment Opportunity Policy, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on concrete measures taken to ensure equality of opportunity and treatment of men and women from all ethnic groups in employment in the public service. Please also provide up-to-date statistics on the representation of men and women, from all ethnic groups, in the different categories, levels and grades in the public service.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Finland

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes the observations by the Central Organisation of Finnish Trade Unions (SAK), the Confederation of Unions for Professionals and Managerial Staff in Finland (AKAVA), the Finnish Confederation of Professionals (STTK), and the Confederation of Finnish Industries (EK) attached to the Government's reports.

Gender pay gap. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the difference in pay between men and women was 17.9 per cent in 2011, and that according to the Government the gender pay gap has decreased, even if it has not reached the tripartite equal pay programme's target of narrowing the gender pay gap to 15 per cent by the year 2015. Payment by results (bonuses) has had an influence on the gender pay gap especially during the recent recession, and the Parliament's Employment and Equality Committee is of the view that the Equality Act (Act on Equality between Men and Women (609/1986)) should state more clearly that the definition of remuneration includes various additional forms of payment. SAK, STTK and AKAVA indicate that only 11 per cent of female AKAVA members received a performance bonus in 2010, while 27 per cent of male members received such a bonus. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that labour market segregation remains the main reason for the gender pay gap, and in this context the Committee notes the information provided in the Government's report under the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). In this connection, the Committee notes the observation of the STTK that the objective under the equal pay programme to increase the number of people employed in "gender-equal job positions" (where the share of women and men is between 40–59 per cent) to one fifth in 2012, is unlikely to be achieved. The Committee asks the Government to refer to the comments made under Convention No. 111 on the issue of occupational gender segregation. It also asks the Government to indicate any measures taken in the context of the economic recession to implement the equal pay programme, and the impact of such measures at national, sectoral and workplace level. Please provide information on any other measures aimed at decreasing the gender pay gap, as well as the fullest possible statistical data on differences in men's and women's earnings with a view to assessing progress made. Please also provide information regarding any steps taken to amend the Equality Act to clarify that "remuneration" includes various forms of additional payments.

Equality plans and equal pay surveys. The Committee recalls its previous comments concerning the implementation gaps of equality pay surveys under the Equality Act. It notes the Government's indication that according to a governmental survey in 2008–09, compliance with the obligation to draft equality plans in the workplace remains insufficient, and the quality of plans and pay survey requires improvement. In this connection, a series of articles drafted by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Health on equality planning in the workplace were effectively distributed through organizational publications and professional journals; in 2010, the Ministry and employers' and workers' organizations jointly produced an extensive set of training materials on equality planning for the workplace. The Committee notes that SAK, STTK and AKAVA consider that the employer's obligation to analyse pay surveys should be included in the legislation. In this connection, the Government indicates that a tripartite working group appointed by the Government to examine the functionality and development needs of pay surveys completed its work in June 2012, and proposed updating the training on equality plans and pay surveys. It also notes the Government's indication that Parliament placed an emphasis on securing employee representatives' right to access to information in connection with pay reviews. It further notes the summary provided by the Government of the report on the functionality of the Equality Act, which includes the description of the obligations related to equality plans, as well as issues concerning the implementation of the Act and access to pay data. The Committee asks the Government to provide specific information on the content of the training on equality planning for the workplace, as well as the results achieved. It also asks the Government to indicate how the participation of employees and their organizations is ensured in the development of equality plans and implementation of pay survey. The Committee also asks the Government to provide further information on the actual impact of the pay survey on reducing gender pay differentials in the private and public sectors, including relevant statistical data, and information on the number of equal pay surveys that have resulted in specific follow-up action, including corrective action where pay discrimination was found.

Indirect discrimination with respect to remuneration. The Committee recalls the concerns expressed by AKAVA that young educated women are employed more often than men on a fixed-term basis particularly in the public sector, and that career progress for highly educated women employed on a fixed-term basis is as much as ten years behind that of men with corresponding levels of education. The Committee notes from the statistical information on the central Government fixed-term employment provided by the Government that, while the proportion of women is 52.6 per cent, the difference in pay between men and women was 8.7 per cent in 2009, which is one percentage point decrease from the previous year. The Committee asks the Government to indicate how the issue of female concentration in fixed-term employment is addressed in the context of indirect discrimination with respect to remuneration, and to identify any gaps in the legislation on equal remuneration in this respect. It also asks the Government to continue to provide statistical data, disaggregated by sex and age, on the employment of men and women on fixed-term contracts in the public sector, and their corresponding levels of remuneration.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1970)

Access to employment and occupation of the Roma. The Committee notes with interest the National Policy on Roma, finalized in 2009, which contains six key objectives including the following: (i) enhancing education for Roma children and youth; (ii) enhancing education of adults and promoting their access to the labour market; and (iii) promoting equal treatment and preventing discrimination. Measures to be taken under the Policy include determining the educational needs for the allocation and development of vocational education and training for the Roma, enhancing the integration of Roma into the labour market through more efficient public employment services and multi-professional cooperation, raising the awareness of the Roma population of their right to non-discrimination, starting a national media campaign aimed at the elimination of prejudices, and ensuring the inclusion of the Roma issues in equality planning. A group for implementing and monitoring the measures under the Policy was also appointed in March 2012. The Committee also notes that the three-year TEMPO project started in 2008, which provides support for employment Offices and the employment process for Roma and immigrants, including counselling services for poorly educated long-term unemployed persons in gaining access to education, vocational training or the labour market. The Government has also appointed a working group in 2010 to prepare a Roma strategy which should have an impact internationally through enhancing policy coordination on Roma both at the national level and the level of the European Union. The Committee welcomes such initiatives and asks the Government to provide information on follow-up actions being taken, in cooperation with the social partners, to the National Policy on Roma, and results achieved. Please also provide further specific information on the access of the Roma to education at all levels, as well as to employment and particular occupations.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes the observations of the Central Organisation of Finnish Trade Unions (SAK), the Confederation of Unions for Professionals and Managerial Staff in Finland (AKAVA), and the Commission for Local Authority Employers (KT), attached to the Government's report.

Articles 3 and 4(b) of the Convention. National policy and leave entitlements. The Committee recalls that promoting men's engagement in parenting and caring for children is an integral aspect of the Finnish gender equality policy. It notes the Government's first report on gender equality 2011, which outlines the Government's views on the future gender equality policy until the year 2020. The Committee also notes that one of the long-standing gender equality policy goals set out in the report, is a more equal distribution of family leave between parents, and that measures to achieve the goal of reconciliation of work and family life include the following: (i) extension of the right to leave for taking care of family members other than dependent children; (ii) increasing the use of family leave by fathers; (iii) improving compensation for costs incurred by employers due to parenthood; and (iv) addressing the needs of diverse types of families. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Social Affairs and Health carried out a family leave campaign in 2007 and 2008, and that in 2009, 73 per cent of the fathers used their paternity leave, 18 days at the most, and that the take-up of the extended paternity leave increased 13.5 per cent in 2010 from the previous year; however, fathers used only 7.1 per cent of all permitted parental allowance days in 2010. The Government further indicates that in order to encourage fathers to increase their use of parental leave, in March 2011, a parental leave work group appointed by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Health, submitted to the Government a memorandum on possible legislative amendments concerning the parental leave system. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the progress of any legislative amendments with regard to the parental leave system. It also asks the Government to clarify whether the family leave campaign is continuing, and to provide information on the impact of such activities, including statistical information on the extent to which men take family leave. Please also provide information on other measures taken to promote an equitable sharing of family responsibilities between men and women, as well as a copy of the interim report on gender equality, due in 2016.

Articles 7 and 8. Return to work following family leave and protection from dismissal. The Committee recalls that section 9 of Chapter 7 of the Employment Contract Act appears to be primarily concerned with dismissal during a family leave period, rather than dismissals upon return. It also notes that SAK and AKAVA reiterate their previous concerns regarding the risk that employers may rearrange work and hire new employees so that there is no longer work available for the person returning from family leave, thus making his or her dismissal possible. In its reply, the Government refers to the "presumption provision" in the Employment Contract Act, which shifts the burden of proof for a reason of termination on to the employer, and the Government indicates that no cases have been presented to the Supreme Court or the Supreme Administrative Court during the reporting period. In this context, the Committee notes that the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination against Women, in its concluding observations urged the Government to prevent the practice of illegal dismissal of women in cases of pregnancy and childbirth (CEDAW/C/FIN/CO/6, 15 July 2008, paragraphs 183 and 184). The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the practical application and effects of the provisions concerned with the ability of workers returning from family leave to remain integrated in the labour force. In this regard, the Committee again asks the Government to continue to provide information on any relevant court decisions.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

France

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1981)

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Discrimination on the basis of race, colour or national extraction. In its previous comments, the Committee emphasized that, despite certain initiatives, the various measures and schemes did not appear to be producing sufficient results in terms of combating effectively discrimination in employment on the basis of race or national extraction, particularly with regard to the access to employment of young French nationals of foreign origin, and it requested the Government to strengthen its action and to promote equality actively in this field. The Committee also noted the action programme and recommendations drawn up in 2009 by the Commissioner for Diversity and Equal Opportunities, which contained a list of measures to be taken to promote equality of opportunity, particularly in education and employment. It further noted that in its concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) noted the draft national plan to combat racism (CERD/C/FRA/CO/17-19, 27 August 2010, paragraph 9).

In this respect, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government in the report to the CERD on the follow-up to its recommendations, according to which the National Plan of Action against Racism and Anti-Semitism, including a component on the “promotion of equal opportunities, particularly in professional matters”, is in the process of being completed (CERD/C/FRA/CO/17-19/Add.1, 6 October 2011, paragraph 7). The Committee also notes that, according to the annual report (2011) of the Office of the Rights Ombud, the institution into which the High Authority to Combat Discrimination and Promote Equality (HALDE) was integrated in 2011, “origin”, which is understood as “national extraction” within the meaning of Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, remains the ground of discrimination most frequently referred to in complaints relating to employment (23.5 per cent of all complaints registered), and employment remains the field in which the largest number of complaints are received (48.3 per cent of the total number of complaints). The Committee also notes the publication in February 2010 of a report by the Committee for the Measurement of Diversity and the Evaluation of Discrimination (COMEDD), entitled “Inequality and discrimination: Towards a critical and responsible use of statistics”, to which the Government refers in its report. The report of the COMEDD calls for the establishment of a regular statistical information system on discrimination and diversity; the creation of a discrimination observatory; and the introduction in enterprises with over 250 employees of a comparative report on the situation regarding differences of treatment related to origin that employers would be required to complete each year concerning recruitment, promotion, type of contract, access to training, level of remuneration, etc., along the lines of the measures taken to measure gaps between men and women in enterprises with more than 50 employees. The report adds that the comparative situation report could be forwarded to staff representatives with a view to defining programmes to combat discrimination in the context of the national inter-occupational agreement on diversity in the enterprise, concluded in 2006 and made compulsory in 2008. With regard to the implementation of this agreement, the Government indicates in reply to the Committee’s request for information, that it would appear to be practically impossible to assess the number of specific enterprise agreements that cover diversity in whole or in part. The Committee notes however that the inter-occupational agreement envisaged the establishment of a joint monitoring commission to assess the implementation of its provisions in the various branches, enterprises and territories.

With reference to its previous observation and noting that progress does not appear to have been made in relation to equality in employment and occupation without distinction as to race, colour or national extraction, the Committee requests the Government to take measures without further delay, in collaboration with workers’ and employers’ organizations, with a view to combating effectively the problem of discrimination on the above grounds and addressing the underlying causes, including measures to combat prejudices and stereotypes against certain groups of the population and to promote tolerance. It requests the Government to provide information on any measures adopted in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government to provide further information on the following points:

- (i) the content and implementation of the National Plan of Action to Combat Racism and Anti-Semitism in education, vocational training and employment;
- (ii) any action taken as a result of the programme of action and recommendations made by the Commissioner for Diversity and Equal Opportunities and the recommendations of the COMEDD in relation to employment, including the comparative situation report and the role of the social partners.

The Government is also requested to provide detailed information on the implementation of the national inter-occupational agreement on diversity in the enterprise and to provide the findings of any assessment of the action taken to promote equality of opportunity and treatment at the branch and enterprise level.

Discrimination on the basis of religion. In its previous comments, the Committee urged the Government to provide information on the application of Act No. 65 of 17 March 2004 and its implementing circular of 18 May 2004 concerning the prohibition on wearing any conspicuous religious signs or apparel in public schools under penalty of disciplinary measures, including expulsion. The Committee notes that the Government's report still does not contain any information on this subject and it once again requests the Government to provide information on the following points:

- (i) any court ruling or administrative decision concerning the application of the above legislation;*
- (ii) the numbers of students who have been expelled from school on the basis of the Act, disaggregated by sex and age, and the nature of the religious sign or apparel at issue; and*
- (iii) the measures taken to ensure that the pupils who have been expelled nonetheless have access to education and training.*

The Committee also requests the Government to ensure that the application of this Act does not have the effect of reducing the opportunities for women to find employment in future, and asks the Government to provide specific information on the impact respectively on men and women's employment opportunities.

In its previous comment, the Committee noted the adoption of Act No. 2010-1192 of 11 October 2010 prohibiting the concealment of the face in public places and it requested the Government to provide information on its application in practice. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain any information on this subject. In view of the discriminatory effect that this Act may have, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of Act No. 2010-1192 in relation to employment and occupation. It requests the Government to indicate what steps are being taken to ensure that the implementation of this Act does not have the effect of preventing women of Muslim religion wearing a full veil to find and exercise employment, and to indicate whether any measures are envisaged to evaluate the impact of this text.

Equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women in the public service. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain any information on this subject. However, the Committee notes the information contained in a report on "occupational equality for men and women in the public service", submitted by a member of Parliament to the President of the Republic in January 2011, which provides a detailed description of the inequalities which persist to the detriment of women, including horizontal and vertical occupational segregation, pay gaps and career progression (including part-time work), and makes numerous recommendations to resolve them. In this respect, the Committee notes with interest the adoption of Act No. 2012-347 of 12 March 2012 respecting access to titular employment and the improvement of the terms and conditions of employment of contractual agents in the public service, action to combat discrimination and various provisions respecting the public service, and the adoption of Decree No. 2012-601 of 30 April 2012 respecting arrangements for balanced recruitment at the higher levels of the public service, determining the posts concerned. The Act sets numerical and progressive objectives for the appointment of women to higher managerial posts (section 56: 20 per cent in 2013-15, 30 per cent in 2015-17 and 40 per cent as from 2018) and quotas for the representation of women on the executive boards of public establishments and other bodies (section 52-55), and contains provisions on parental leave. It also provides that an annual report shall be issued on occupational equality, including in relation to recruitment, training, working time, promotion, conditions of work, remuneration and the reconciliation of working and private life (section 51). The Committee asks the Government to continue adopting measures, in collaboration with the social partners, to promote equality for men and women in the public service and encourage the internal professional development of women, and to provide information on the implementation of occupational equality measures, including the numerical objectives and quotas for recruitment envisaged in the Act, and the results obtained. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any action taken on the other proposals contained in the report on occupational equality for men and women in the public service of 2011.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

New Caledonia

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Prohibited grounds of discrimination. Legislation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section Lp.112-1 of the Labour Code provides that it is prohibited to take into account, in an offer of employment, recruitment or in the labour relationship, a person's origin, sex, pregnancy, family situation, actual or presumed membership or non-membership of an ethnic group, nation or race, political opinion, trade union activities, disability or religious convictions. It consequently requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to include colour among the prohibited grounds of discrimination set out in the Labour Code, and to indicate whether the notions of "social origin" and "national extraction" are covered by one of the grounds set out in this section. The Committee notes the Government's statement that no measure has been adopted or envisaged to include colour among the prohibited grounds of discrimination set out in section Lp.112-1 of the Labour Code, and that this section does not explicitly cover the notions of “social origin” and “national extraction”. Recalling that, where effect is given to the Convention by national legislation, it should cover as a minimum all the prohibited grounds of discrimination set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that any discrimination in employment and occupation based on colour, national extraction or social origin is explicitly prohibited and to provide information on any measure taken in this respect. In the absence of legislation on this matter, the Committee also requests the Government to indicate the manner in which workers are protected in practice against discrimination on the grounds of colour, national extraction or social origin.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Ghana

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1968)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. In its previous comments, the Committee had asked the Government to provide information on the progress made with a view to amending section 68 of the Labour Act 2003, which provides only for equal pay for equal work, so as to ensure full conformity with the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value set out in the Convention. Section 10(b) of the Labour Act is expressed in the same terms. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that due to a change of government, the Committee’s comments in this respect are still being examined by the new Minister responsible for Labour. With reference to its previous comments and recalling its 2006 general observation on the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value, the Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures in the near future with a view to amending sections 10(b) and 68 of the Labour Act 2003 in order to give full legislative expression to the principle of the Convention.

Remuneration in the public sector. The Committee notes that the job evaluation exercise undertaken to determine the value of all public sector jobs, one of the objectives of which is to ensure that jobs within the same job value range are paid within the same pay range, was completed in April 2009. As a result, a single spine pay structure was adopted. The Committee also notes that the ultimate goal for the National Job Analysis and Evaluation Exercise, as set out in the briefing notes on the public sector pay policy attached to the Government’s report, “was to enable government to reward its employees in accordance with the principle of “equal pay for equal worth” consistent with article 24(1) of the 1992 Constitution of Ghana and section 10(b) of the Labour Act”. Both the Constitution and the Labour Act refer however to “equal pay for equal work”. The evaluation has been made on the basis of four main job factors (knowledge and skill, responsibility, working conditions and effort) which were subdivided into 13 sub-factors and it has used the point factor method. The Committee notes that during the consultative workshop held in May 2009 on the single spine pay policy, the Ministry of Employment and Social Affairs and the Ghana Trade Union Congress agreed that the policy should be implemented, as of 1 January 2010, while efforts are being made to address concerns and challenges that may arise from its implementation. It also notes that the unions and associations were to submit outstanding issues or concerns to the Fair Wages and Salaries Commission. The Committee asks the Government to ensure that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value will be duly taken into account and recognized as an explicit objective in the implementation of the public sector pay policy. It also asks the Government to provide information on the implementation process of this policy, including on the issues dealt with by the Fair Wages and Salaries Commission and the steps taken by this Commission to ensure full application of the principle of the Convention in the public service. The Government is requested to provide a copy of the single spine pay policy and of the single spine pay structure adopted.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Greece

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1975)

The Committee notes the Government’s reports received on 23 February and 31 August 2012.

The Committee recalls the discussion that took place in the Committee on the Application of Standards during the 100th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2011) with regard to the application by Greece of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). It recalls the report of the high-level mission of the ILO which visited the country from 19 to 23 September 2011 and held further meetings with the European Commission and the International Monetary Fund in Brussels and Washington, DC, in October 2011, on the basis of the request made by the Conference Committee.

Impact of the measures on the application of the Convention. The Committee recalls that section 4(1) of Act No. 3896/2010 on the implementation of the principle of equal opportunities and equal treatment of men and women in matters of employment and occupation provides that men and women shall be entitled to equal pay for the same work or for work of equal value. The Committee also recalls the observations made by the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE) dated 29 July 2010 and 28 July 2011 that: (i) the measures implemented under structural reforms in the framework of the support mechanism in the area of wages and the related system of collective bargaining, social security and security of employment had an impact on the application of the Convention; (ii) the combined effect of the financial crisis, the growing informal economy and the implementation of structural reform measures adversely affected the negotiating power of women, and would lead to their over-representation in precarious low-paid jobs; and (iii) the minimum protection level, including wages of some workers, including domestic workers and workers in agricultural undertakings, excluded from the scope of the labour law protection, is being significantly weakened. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the measures adopted for the reduction of undeclared work and social security reform do not affect equal pay for men and women, as the measures are adopted within the institutional framework of collective bargaining. The Government also indicates that a compulsory use of a payment format leads to wage protection, and the inclusion in the social security system of domestic workers and agricultural workers. In this connection, the Committee recalls the deep concern expressed by the high-level mission of the ILO particularly on the provisions of Act No. 4024/2011, empowering associations of persons to conclude collective agreements at enterprise level. The Committee refers to its comments under Convention No. 98, observing with deep concern that the changes, aimed at permitting deviations from higher level agreements through "negotiations" with non-unionized structures, are likely to have a significant – and potentially devastating – impact on the industrial relations system in the country, and deeply regretting that such far-reaching changes were made without full and thorough discussions with all the social partners concerned. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the impact of the structural reform measures taken in the framework of the support mechanism on the practical application of section 4(1) of Act No. 3896/2010, including how collective agreements give institutional guarantee to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value.

Impact on the gender pay gap in the public sector. The Committee recalls the information in the report of the high-level mission that Act No. 3986/2011 and Act No. 4024/2011 introduced and further defined the system of "labour reserve" in the core and wider public sector, which was likely to have an impact on female unemployment. The Committee notes the Government's indication that Act No. 4024/2011 introduced a new pay-scale and a grading system, which according to the report of the high-level mission resulted in wage cuts of up to 50 per cent in certain cases. The Committee notes the Government's indication that 783 civil servants had been put on pre-retirement suspension from work, and 445 public employees had been put in labour reserve, but no more detailed data disaggregated by sex is available. With a view to assessing the impact of the measures taken in the framework of structural reforms on the application of the Convention in the public sector, the Committee again asks the Government to collect and analyse statistical information, disaggregated by sex, on the distribution of men and women in the various occupations of the core and the wider public sector and the corresponding levels of remuneration, allowing an assessment of the evolution of the gender pay gap since 2009, as well as statistics for the number of male and female employees who have respectively been dismissed or who have been put in the "labour reserve". The Committee also asks the Government to provide detailed information on the new public service statute, new job classification and wage scales and on the specific method that has been used for the evaluation of the different jobs with a view to ensuring the application of the principle of the Convention. Please collect and provide information on the distribution of female and male employees in the new job classification and wage scales of the public service.

Gender pay gap in the private sector. The Committee recalls that Act No. 3846/2010 on financial management and responsibility had institutionalized a range of flexible forms of employment including telework, part-time work, subcontracting by temporary employment agencies, rotation work, suspension of work, etc. The Committee also recalls its concern at the reportedly disproportionate impact of the legislative measures regarding flexible forms of employment on women's levels of pay. The Committee notes the statistical information provided by the Government that, in 2011, 47.7 per cent of male workers earned €1,000–€1,599 (compared to 38.7 per cent of female workers), while 48.3 per cent of female workers earned €500–€999 (compared to 38.5 per cent of male workers), and 59.1 per cent of female part-time workers earned up to €499 (compared to 47.3 per cent of male part-time workers). The Committee also notes the Government's indication that the rate of part-time employment increased from 5.6 per cent in 2008 to 6.8 per cent in 2011 (30.65 per cent of the new contracts concluded in 2011 were part-time contracts), and that part-time employment is more widespread among women. The rate of women in part-time employment was 10.2 per cent in 2011, which was higher than the rate of men in part-time employment (4.5 per cent in 2011). The Government also indicates that 84,419 rotation work contracts and 300,230 part-time contracts were signed in 2011. According to the Annual Report 2011 of the Office of the Ombudperson, in 2011, part-time work had increased by 73.25 per cent, rotation work in agreement with parties had increased by 193.06 per cent, while rotation work introduced unilaterally by employers had increased by 631.89 per cent compared to the year 2010. There were 32,420 cases of conversions from full-time to part-time contracts, and 26,542 cases of conversions (among which 7,414 cases of unilateral conversions by employers) from full-time to rotation work contracts in 2011. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that, given the small or very small size of the majority of enterprises, a job classification system pursuant to section 4(2) of Act No. 3896/2010 cannot be applied or can only be applied in a limited manner. The Committee again asks the Government to take the necessary measures to monitor the evolution and impact of the austerity measures on the remuneration of men and women in the private sector with a view to determining the most appropriate measures to avoid a widening of the gender pay gap and address existing wage differentials between men and women. To this end, the Committee also asks the Government to collect and provide comprehensive information on the following:

- (i) statistics disaggregated by sex, showing an evolution of the levels of remuneration of men and women in full-time and part-time employment, in the various economic sectors, industries and occupations, with an indication of the economic sectors and industries most affected;

- (ii) the number of men and women, including working mothers returning from maternity leave, who have suffered from pay reductions due to a change in their working arrangements (forms of employment, i.e. part-time work, suspension of work, rotation work or subcontracting by temporary employment agencies) with an indication of the number of workers upon whom the employer has unilaterally imposed the conversion of full-time employment to rotation work or part-time work with lower pay; and
- (iii) information, disaggregated by sex, showing the level and evolution of wages of domestic workers and workers in agricultural undertakings.

Articles 2(2)(c) and 4. Collective agreements and cooperation with social partners. The Committee recalls section 29 of Act No. 3896/2010, which provides that the Government is obliged to encourage social dialogue concerning promotion of equality between men and women. It also recalls that, according to the report of the high-level mission, the basic reference wage in Greece is based on the national general collective agreement in force, and no other minimum wage setting mechanism exists. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, pursuant to section 26 of Act No. 3896/2010, trade unions have to inform their members of the legislative and other measures taken to ensure compliance with the principle of equal pay and equal treatment between men and women, while employers have to assist trade unions in this process. Recalling that collective agreements have been a principal source of determining rates of remuneration, the Committee refers to its comments on Convention No. 98 and calls upon the Government to bear in mind that collective bargaining is an important means of addressing equal pay issues in a proactive manner, including unequal pay that arises from indirect discrimination on the ground of sex. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on any cooperation with social partners in applying the principle of the Convention, including any activities to raise awareness of the principle of the Convention among workers, employers and their representatives, and the results thereof.

Enforcement. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the authority of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security concerning the principle of equal pay for work of equal value is limited to detecting any violations in the minimum wage setting of the collective agreements, and that no violation has been detected in the collective agreements. The Committee recalls that the labour inspectorate is entrusted with supervision of the legislation on equality between men and women (section 2(2)(g) of Act No. 3996/2011), and notes the Government's indication that there have been no complaints raised concerning equal pay for men and women, or detected by the labour inspectorate. The Committee also recalls that Act No. 3896/2010 strengthens the competencies of the Office of the Ombudperson to address gender equality, including equal pay, and to collaborate with the labour inspectorate, including during mediation, joint inspections and provision of advice. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the labour inspectorate has to inform the Office of the Ombudperson of every complaint filed with it and the findings of the investigation conducted by it, pursuant to section 13(8) of Act No. 3896/2010. It also notes the Government's indication that, pursuant to section 25(7) of Act No. 3896/2010, the Office of the Ombudperson may deal with cases pending before the courts until the first hearing, thereby encouraging victims of discrimination to lodge complaints before the Greek Ombudperson. The Committee refers in this regard to the comments made on the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and recalls the importance of adequate training programmes for labour inspectors to increase their capacity to prevent, detect and remedy instances of unequal remuneration between men and women. The Committee asks the Government to collect and provide information on the number and nature of cases regarding unequal remuneration addressed by the Office of the Ombudperson, including with the cooperation of the labour inspectorate, as well as information on instances of unequal remuneration between men and women detected and remedied by the labour inspectorate or addressed by the courts, and the results thereof.

The Committee notes the Government's reports received on 23 February and 31 August 2012.

The Committee recalls the discussion that took place in the Committee on the Application of Standards during the 100th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2011) with regard to the application by Greece of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), concerning the reform of the collective bargaining legal framework in the context of the economic crisis and the impact of austerity measures. It recalls the report of the high-level mission of the ILO which visited the country from 19 to 23 September 2011 and held further meetings with the European Commission and the International Monetary Fund in Brussels and Washington, DC, in October 2011, on the basis of the request made by the Conference Committee.

Impact of the measures on the application of the Convention. Further to its observations on the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), the Committee recalls the observations made by the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE) dated 29 July 2010 and 28 July 2011 that: (i) the measures implemented under structural reforms prior to and within the framework of the support mechanism have a direct impact on the application of the Convention; (ii) the reforms are likely to lead to an increase in multiple discrimination on the grounds of gender, ethnic or racial origin, age, family responsibilities or disability; and (iii) the minimum protection level, including wages of some workers such as working women, workers with family responsibilities, workers in flexible forms of employment, and workers not protected by labour law, including domestic workers and workers in agricultural undertakings, is being significantly weakened. The Committee also recalls that Act No. 3846/2010 on financial management and responsibility, as amended by Act No. 3899/2010, institutionalizes a range of flexible forms of employment. Noting the significant increase in flexible forms of employment, the Office of the Ombudsperson, in its Annual Report 2011, states that it confirms the assumption that, due to or under the pretext of the crisis, many enterprises replaced stable work with precarious work; the percentage of women who took such flexible work as newly recruited or already in employment increased, thereby making gender-based discrimination observed by the Office of the Ombudsperson more visible.

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Equality between men and women in the public sector. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the system of “labour reserve” as a form of retrenchment in the public sector overall, pursuant to Act No. 3986/2011 and Act No. 4024/2011, was likely to have an impact on female unemployment, in particular public sector employees with family responsibilities. The Committee also notes that, while the Government indicates that the percentage of women in posts of responsibility increased since 1996 and reached about 50 per cent in 2009, no updated information has been provided in this regard. The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary measures, in cooperation with the social partners and the Office of the Ombudsperson, to monitor closely the impact of the measures taken in the framework of the support mechanism on the employment of men and women in the public sector, so as to address any direct or indirect discrimination based on sex. To this end, the Committee also asks the Government to provide information, disaggregated by sex, on employment in the various occupations of the public sector overall, with an indication of the number of male and female workers who have been placed in the labour reserve, the number of dismissals and the sectors most affected.

Equality between men and women in the private sector. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the sectors most affected by the economic crisis are the construction and manufacturing sectors, in which men are highly concentrated (in 2011, 95.9 per cent of workers in the construction sector and 75.6 per cent of workers in the manufacturing sector were men). The total number of workers fell by 36.8 per cent in the construction sector and by 22.8 per cent in the manufacturing sector. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that the rate of part-time employment increased from 5.6 per cent in 2008 to 6.8 per cent in 2011 (30.65 per cent of the new contracts concluded in 2011 were part-time contracts), and that part-time employment is more widespread among women. The rate of women in part-time employment was 10.2 per cent in 2011, which was higher than the rate of men in part-time employment (4.5 per cent in 2011). It also notes the Government’s indication that 84,419 work rotation contracts and 300,230 part-time contracts were signed in 2011. There were 32,420 cases of conversions from full-time to part-time contracts, and 26,542 cases of conversions (among which 7,414 cases of unilateral conversions by employers) from full-time to work rotation contracts in 2011. According to the Annual Report 2011 of the Office of the Ombudsperson, part-time work had increased by 73.25 per cent, work rotation contracts introduced in agreement with the parties had increased by 193.06 per cent, while work rotation introduced unilaterally by the employer had increased by 631.89 per cent compared to the year 2010. Approximately 300 complaints were lodged with the Office of the Ombudsperson concerning discrimination against female workers in the private sector, and the Office of the Ombudsperson observes that women were exposed to indecent conditions of work, especially during pregnancy and after childbirth. In 2011, discrimination related to pregnancy and childcare leave was recorded as the most prominent form of discrimination (about 42.46 per cent and 21.79 per cent, respectively, of total complaints concerning discrimination). The Committee further notes that the strategic objectives of the National Programme for Substantive Gender Equality 2010–13 include the support of women’s employment and economic autonomy. The Government indicates that, under the operational programme “Human Resources Development” 2007–13, a project aims at the promotion of employment for unemployed women with an emphasis on the reduction of occupational segregation, targeting 7,000 unemployed women. In July 2012, overall unemployment was 25.1 per cent, with 29 per cent female unemployment (Eurostat data). However, the Committee recalls the information received from the Office of the Ombudsperson during the high-level mission that a large number of women had joined the ranks of the “discouraged” workers who are not accounted for in the statistics. The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary measures, in cooperation with the social partners and the Office of the Ombudsperson, to monitor the evolution and impact of the austerity measures on equality of opportunity and treatment in private sector employment with a view to determining the most appropriate measures to address any direct or indirect discrimination based on sex with respect to access to employment and occupation, terms and conditions of work, and security of employment. To this end, the Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the following:

- (i) statistical data, disaggregated by sex, on the number of workers employed in full-time and part-time employment and on the number of workers who have had their working arrangements changed (into part-time work, rotation work, etc.). Please indicate in this regard the number of workers whose full-time contracts have been unilaterally converted by the employer into contracts for reduced-term rotation work; and
- (ii) statistical data, disaggregated by sex, showing an evolution of employment in the various economic sectors, industries and occupations, with an indication of the economic sectors and industries most affected.

Impact of the measures with respect to other grounds of discrimination. The Committee recalls Act No. 3304/2005 on the “Implementation of the principle of equal treatment regardless of racial or ethnic origin, religious or other beliefs, disability, age or sexual orientation”, protecting against discrimination on these grounds in employment and occupation. The Committee also recalls the Integrated Action Plan for the social integration of vulnerable groups (Roma and Greek Muslims), and the Integrated Action Plan for the integration of third-country nationals legally residing in the Hellenic territory (2007–13). The Committee notes the Government's indication that the objectives of the National Strategy on Roma Integration 2012–20 include developing a supportive network of social intervention in areas including employment and education, and developing social dialogue and consensus through social empowerment and participation of the Roma themselves. According to the Government, the objectives specify that (i) the number of Roma children who register at schools and attend compulsory education should be increased by 2020; and (ii) undeclared work should be reduced, accessibility to the labour market increased and entrepreneurship especially for young Roma strengthened by 2020. In addition, a few actions have been planned under the operational programme "Human Resources Development" targeting the Roma. The Government further indicates that the Ministry of the Interior has prepared a draft national programme for the social integration of the Roma. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that the programmes under "Complete integration of all human resources in a society of equal opportunities" aim at creating jobs for almost 20,000 unemployed persons who belong to vulnerable social groups, including immigrants, repatriates, refugees and individuals with religious and cultural particularities. The Government indicates that in 2010 Greek language learning programmes in certified vocational training centres were implemented, targeting the unemployed, including immigrants and refugees. The Committee further notes that the Annual Report of the Office of the Ombudsperson 2010 points out that the issue of "irregular immigrants" and asylum seekers dominated with increasing intensity; vulnerable groups, such as immigrants or Roma, are affected both directly (by decreasing possibilities or opportunities for survival) and indirectly, as the rest of the population feels insecure and is looking for scapegoats, and as the administration rearranges its priorities according to purely logistical considerations. The Office of the Ombudsperson proposed that immediate steps be taken for recognition of special residence status of the "undocumented" immigrants, as well as for registration and secured employment. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the impact of the austerity measures on the employment situation of ethnic and religious minorities such as Roma and Greek Muslims as well as migrant workers who are particularly vulnerable to the impact of the economic crisis, and to indicate the specific measures taken and the progress achieved in this respect. Please also provide information on the impact of the programmes under "Complete integration of all human resources in a society of equal opportunities" on ensuring equal opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation, and any other specific measures taken or envisaged, including those in cooperation with the social partners and the Office of the Ombudsperson, to address discrimination against certain minorities, including Roma and Greek Muslims, as well as migrant workers, on the grounds of the Convention.

Enforcement. The Committee recalls that Act No. 3896/2010 on the implementation of the principle of equal opportunities and equal treatment of men and women in matters of employment and occupation: (i) defines direct and indirect discrimination, and sexual harassment at the workplace; and (ii) mandates the Office of the Ombudsperson to monitor and promote the implementation of the principle of equal opportunities and treatment between men and women in employment and occupation in the public and private sectors, including with the collaboration of the labour inspectorate and the social partners. The Committee notes the statistical data in 2010 provided by the Government on violations of Act No. 3488/2006 and Act No. 1483/1984, including the number of complaints and labour disputes, as well as the outcome of the cases. There were two complaints and two labour disputes for discrimination on the ground of sex, and six complaints and six labour disputes concerning sexual harassment. In this connection, the Committee refers to its comments under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), concerning the priority to be given to non-discrimination in the context of the labour inspection. The disproportionate impact of the crisis on women is reportedly exacerbated by the inability of the labour inspectorate to effectively address equality cases; delays in the administration of justice also discourage workers from having recourse to the courts. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, in the context of "awareness and training schemes for the entire public administration and local government in gender equality issues", the Government provides training concerning gender equality issues targeting 453 labour inspectors in the country. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the progress made as well as the obstacles encountered in monitoring and enforcing effectively the application of the non-discrimination and equality legislation. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the impact of the activities of the Office of the Ombudsperson, including those in collaboration with the labour inspectorate and the social partners, in promoting and ensuring the application of the Convention. The Committee also asks the Government to provide detailed statistics on the nature and number of violations of the non-discrimination and equality legislation detected by the labour inspectorate based on the grounds of the Convention, as well as complaints handled by the Office of the Ombudsperson and the courts. Please continue to provide information on the training provided for law enforcement officials and the labour inspectorate, and its impact on monitoring and enforcing effectively the principle of the Convention.

Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156) (ratification: 1988)

The Committee notes the Government's reports received on 23 February and 31 August 2012.

The Committee recalls the discussion that took place in the Committee on the Application of Standards during the 100th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2011) with regard to the application by Greece of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). It recalls the report of the high-level mission of the ILO which visited the country from 19 to 23 September 2011 and held further meetings with the European Commission and the International Monetary Fund in Brussels and Washington, DC, in October 2011, on the basis of the request made by the Conference Committee.

Impact of the measures on the application of the Convention. The Committee notes that the majority of measures in the framework of structural reforms that impact on gender equality, including workers with family responsibilities, have been addressed under the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), and it refers to its comments on these Conventions for a more detailed analysis. The Committee recalls the observations made by the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE) dated 29 July 2010 and 28 July 2011 that due to the austerity measures, the burden of family responsibilities on women increased due to gender stereotypes and as a result of uneven sharing between men and women of child and family care responsibilities; and the risk of abusive practices against workers with family responsibilities may also have increased. The Committee notes from the Annual Report 2010, of the Office of the Ombudsperson that the main problems identified in the complaints lodged in 2010 concerning workers with family responsibilities include the following: (i) legislation and collective agreements reflect an obsolete perception of gender roles in family and work with respect to parental leave; (ii) the financial crisis has highlighted and exacerbated an evident setback in protecting women's labour rights; and (iii) in the context of the financial crisis, the public administration tends to interpret the law which governs maternity benefits narrowly.

Article 4 of the Convention. Leave entitlements. The Committee recalls that the national general collective agreement and certain sectoral agreements contained provisions aimed at safeguarding the rights of workers with family responsibilities. With respect to the impact of the measures taken in the framework of the support mechanism on industrial relations and collective bargaining, the Committee refers to its comments on Convention No. 98. It notes the Government's indication that section 6 of the National General Collective Labour Agreement 2008–9 provides that all provisions concerning the protection of workers with family responsibilities shall also apply to foster parents, in addition to biological or adoptive parents. The Committee also recalls that section 53(3) of the Civil Servants Code (Act No. 3528/2007) limits the use of the right to childcare leave (reduced working hours or a nine-month period of paid leave) by male civil servants whose spouse is not working, to cases in which the spouse is not capable of caring for children due to serious illness or other disabilities. The Committee notes the Government's indication concerning section 53(2) of Act No. 3528/2007 that when both parents are civil servants, they should state which will use the right to childcare leave. It also notes the Government's indication that pursuant to section 18 of Act No. 3801/2009, maternity leave is extended for multiple pregnancies, and a two-day childbirth leave is provided for fathers, and that pursuant to section 37(4) of Act No. 3986/2011, when both parents are civil servants, both parents are entitled to leave without pay up to a total of five years for raising a child up to the age of 6. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that pursuant to sections 48–54 of Act No. 4075/2012, both working fathers and mothers, as well as adoptive parents, are now entitled to four-months' unpaid leave until the child reaches the age of 6, and biological, adoptive and foster parents are granted unpaid parental leave for nursing their children due to their illness or accident. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the practical application of the provisions concerning leave entitlements for workers with family responsibilities under Act No. 3528/2007, Act No. 3986/2011, and Act No. 4075/2012, including statistical information on the extent to which men and women workers, respectively, make use of family-related leave entitlements both in the private and public sectors.

Article 5. Childcare and family services and facilities. With respect to Act No. 3863/2010 on the “New social security system and relevant provisions”, which increased the pensionable ages for mothers and widowed fathers, the Committee previously asked the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure adequate, affordable and accessible childcare services and facilities, as means to assist male and female workers to reconcile work and family responsibilities and to remain in the labour market. The Committee notes the Government's indication that family responsibilities put pressure on women in relation to their working hours, which creates obstacles to their access to employment and their participation in the labour market on equal terms with men, and that the Government intends to provide childcare services and facilities to tackle this issue. Since July 2008, female workers receive a voucher which provides care services for babies, children and persons with disabilities. In the school year 2010–11, 23,013 children were placed in approximately 770 facilities, such as baby-care centres, kindergartens, and centres for children with disabilities. The Government also indicates that in addition to public facilities, there are baby-care centres and kindergartens operated by 36 charity organizations, churches and non-profit organizations, as well as 1,100 private baby-care centres. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken and the results achieved in providing sufficient, accessible and affordable childcare services and facilities, for both male and female workers, and parents wishing to enter or re-enter the labour force, as well as statistical information on the number of existing childcare facilities (private and public) and their capacity. The Committee also asks the Government to consider providing vouchers for care services to men and women workers with family responsibilities on an equal footing.

Articles 6, 7 and 8. Measures to enable re-entry and remaining in the labour market, educational programmes, and termination of employment. The Committee recalls that Act No. 3896/2010 (section 20) and Act No. 3996/2011 provide specific protection against unfair dismissal and extend to 18 months the period of time during which working mothers cannot be dismissed after their return from maternity leave. It also recalls the information provided by the Office of the Ombudsperson, during the high-level mission, that in particular working mothers returning from maternity leave have been offered part-time and rotation work. The Committee notes the statistical information provided by the Government on the number and rate of workers with children in full-time and part-time employment both in the private and public sectors in 2011. In part-time employment, women constituted 61 per cent of workers with children up to 5 years of age, and 76 per cent of workers with children older than 5 years of age. The Committee also notes the information provided in the Annual Report 2010 of the Office of the Ombudsperson that it has investigated more than 70 complaints by public officials concerning failure to grant nine-months' parental leave to male workers, whose spouse is either self-employed or unemployed. The Committee also notes the information in the Annual Report 2010 that in the public sector, discrimination due to parental leave constituted 21.81 per cent of all discrimination cases, and were mainly regarding the right to parental leave taken by fathers; in the private sector, discrimination due to pregnancy and maternity leave constituted 16 per cent of all discrimination cases. The rate of direct discrimination was 39.5 per cent, which according to the Annual Report 2010 reflected the rapid increase in the number of complaints relating to the dismissal of pregnant women. The Committee asks the Government to make every effort to ensure that the progress achieved by previous action taken to address the needs of workers with family responsibilities in respect of access to free choice of employment, vocational training, terms and conditions of work and social security, as well as childcare and family services, will not be adversely affected by the financial crisis and the measures taken to address it. The Committee also asks the Government to intensify its efforts to promote a broader understanding of the principle of gender equality and awareness of the rights and needs of workers with family responsibilities, to address gender stereotypes regarding the role of men and women with respect to family responsibilities, and to provide information on any progress made in this respect. The Committee further asks the Government to continue to provide information, disaggregated by sex, on the number of workers with family responsibilities affected by rotation work and part-time work, including working mothers returning from maternity leave whose contracts have been converted into part-time contracts and on whom the employer has unilaterally imposed rotation work or part-time work. Please provide information on cases of direct or indirect discrimination, including termination of employment, concerning family responsibilities that have been addressed by the Office of the Ombudsperson, the labour inspectorate services and the courts.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1994)

Discriminatory minimum wage order. The Committee recalls its previous observations raising concerns regarding the Minimum Wage Order SRO 11 (2002) which specified different minimum wages for female and male agricultural workers, and urging the Government to take steps to ensure that it was revised so as not to establish discriminatory wages. The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Minimum Wage Order SRO (2002) has been replaced by the Minimum Wage Order SRO 30 (2011), which came into force on 1 January 2011, and provides a uniform minimum wage for agricultural workers. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on any changes in the minimum wage orders, and to provide copies thereof, as well as information on their implementation in practice.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1960)

Article 1 of the Convention. Prohibited grounds of discrimination. Public service. The Committee recalls the comments which it has been making for more than 20 years, in which it underlines the need to amend section 20 of Ordinance No. 017/PRG/SGG of 23 February 1987 concerning the general principles of the public service, which prohibit discrimination only on the basis of philosophical or religious views and on the basis of sex, so as to ensure that officials enjoy protection against discrimination on the basis of at least all the criteria set forth in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's reference in its report to section 11 of Act No. L/2001/028/AN of 31 December 2001 establishing general regulations for public officials, which states that no distinction may be made among officials on account of their political, trade union, philosophical or religious opinions, or on the basis of their sex or ethnic origin. The Government adds that it considers that section 11 of the general regulations for public officials takes account of Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. However, the Committee notes the Government's indication that it has also duly noted the Committee's observations concerning section 20 of Ordinance No. 017/PRG/SGG and that it will take the necessary steps to amend this section.

The Committee recalls that, even though discrimination against an ethnic group indeed constitutes racial discrimination within the meaning of the Convention, it nevertheless wishes to emphasize that discrimination on the basis of ethnic origin does not cover all aspects of discrimination on the basis of race, colour, or national extraction and, even less so, of discrimination on the basis of social origin. The Committee recalls that the concept of national extraction covers distinctions made on the basis of a person's place of birth, ancestry or foreign origin, and that social origin refers to an individual's membership of a social class, socio-occupational category or a caste, such membership being likely to determine his or her occupational future. In order to ensure that officials and candidates for employment in the public service are afforded protection against all direct or indirect discrimination on the basis of at least all the grounds of discrimination referred to in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, namely race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the provisions of section 11 of Act No. L/2001/028/AN establishing the general regulations for public officials and section 20 of Ordinance No. 017/PRG/SGG establishing the general principles for the public service, and to supply information on any measures taken towards this end. Pending these amendments and in the absence of legislative provisions to this effect, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the manner in which officials and candidates for employment in the public service are protected against discrimination on the basis of race, colour, national extraction or social origin, indicating in particular whether, and how, cases of discrimination on the basis of the aforementioned grounds have already been dealt with by the competent authorities.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Guyana

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1975)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Legislation. The Committee recalls that section 9 of the Prevention of Discrimination Act No. 26 of 1997 imposes the obligation on every employer to pay equal remuneration to men and women performing work of equal value, while section 2(3) of Equal Rights Act No. 19 of 1990 provides for "equal remuneration for the same work or work of the same nature", which is a narrower concept than that required by the Convention. Further, the Committee recalls that section 28 of the 1997 Act stipulates that the Act shall not derogate from the provisions of the Equal Rights Act of 1990 but that the Government previously stated that the 1997 Act takes precedence over the 1990 Act. In light of the fact that section 2(3) of the 1990 Act falls short of the requirements of the Convention, the Committee remains concerned about the inconsistency between the above provisions concerning equal remuneration. Noting that no progress has been made concerning this matter for a number of years, the Committee asks the Government once again to amend the legislation in question with a view to ensuring that it is in accordance with the Convention and to avoid any uncertainties as to the interpretation of the provisions concerned, for instance, through expressly providing that the 1997 Act, in case of conflict, takes precedence over the 1990 Act. The Committee asks the Government to indicate any measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Application in practice. The Committee recalls its previous comments asking the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to promote and supervise the application of the equal remuneration provisions of the Prevention of Discrimination Act. The Committee also recalls the communication received from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC)), of 30 October 2003 which was forwarded to the Government on 13 January 2004 and again on 1 June 2006, and to which the Government has not yet replied. The ICFTU raises concerns regarding the promotion and effective enforcement of equal pay legislation. In this context, the Committee notes the Government's statement that there were no cases of male and female workers receiving different pay for the same work and that it was a long established fact that men and women received equal remuneration both in the public and private sectors. The Committee draws to the Government's attention the fact that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value does not merely require equal pay for the same or equal work but also equal pay for different work that is nevertheless of equal value, as established on the basis of an objective evaluation of the content of the work performed. The absence of differential wage rates for men and women, while necessary in order to apply the Convention, is not sufficient to ensure its full application. Concerned that the Government's report indicates misunderstandings as to the scope and meaning of the Convention's principle, the Committee considers that training concerning the principle of equal remuneration for labour inspectors and judges, as well as workers' and employers' representatives is essential to effectively ensure the application of the Convention. It asks the Government to indicate in its next report any measures envisaged or taken to ensure the application of the equal pay legislation and the Convention through training and awareness raising and to indicate any steps taken to seek the cooperation of workers' and employers' organizations in this regard. Further, the Committee reiterates its request to the Government to provide information on any judicial or administrative decisions relating to the equal pay provisions of the Equal Rights Act No. 19 of 1990 and the Prevention of Discrimination Act of 1997.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1975)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee recalls its previous observation in which it noted the communication from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC)) pointing to the low representation of women in traditionally male-dominated areas of work, the weak labour force participation of Amerindian women, and the lack of effective procedures dealing with complaints of discrimination. The Committee notes the Government's reply that more and more women are undergoing training and are entering areas of work that had previously been dominated by men. Women are now engaged in technical fields including working as electricians, mechanics and masons, and they make up a large percentage of employees of security firms. Women also represent the largest portion of graduates of the University of Guyana. The Government refers in this regard to statistics showing the number of women in areas of study that were traditionally male. However, these statistics were not attached to the Government's report. The Government concludes that persons are free to choose whatever field of occupation they desire and that the various branches of education are accessible to all.

The Committee notes the developments on women's employment and training mentioned by the Government but wishes to point out that without reliable statistics disaggregated by sex or any other information on the participation of women, as compared to men, in a wide range of occupations and vocational training courses, it is difficult for the Committee to assess whether progress has been made in achieving the objectives of the Convention. The Committee recalls that while some women may in theory be free to choose the occupations or training courses they desire, discrimination often flows from social stereotypes that deem certain types of work as suitable for men or for women. As a result, persons may apply for jobs based on work deemed to be suitable for them, rather than on actual ability and interest. Such stereotypes channel women and men into different education and training and subsequently into different jobs and career tracks which may not be in keeping with their ability or interest. Lastly, the Committee recalls the importance of effective complaints procedures to enforce legislation on non-discrimination and equality in employment and occupation. The Committee, therefore, requests the Government to provide in its next report information on the following points:

- (i) statistical data disaggregated by sex on the participation of men and women, including Amerindian women, in the various occupations and sectors of the economy as well as their participation in vocational training courses;
- (ii) the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that policies and plans under its control are not reinforcing stereotypes on the roles of men and women in employment and occupation;
- (iii) the measures taken or envisaged, including in the area of vocational training and education, to encourage women to consider a wider choice of trades and occupations; and
- (iv) the measures taken to ensure that the existing complaints procedures allow for effective implementation of the legislation prohibiting discrimination in employment, including on the measures taken or envisaged to prevent delays in litigating complaints. Please also indicate whether any cases alleging discrimination on the grounds set out in the Convention have been brought to the courts, and the outcome thereof.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

India

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1958)

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 99th Session, June 2010). The Committee notes the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2010 and the resulting conclusions of the Conference Committee, as well as the Government's report. The Conference Committee noted the various measures taken by the Government aimed at women's empowerment, the meeting with the provincial labour ministers in January 2010 to discuss the implementation of the Equal Remuneration Act, 1976, (ERA) and the compilation of data that was being prepared on trends in earnings of men and women in selected sectors. The Conference Committee asked the Government to take measures in several areas, including research on the gender remuneration gap, awareness raising and enforcement of the ERA and the Equal Remuneration Regulations, and objective job evaluation with a view to effectively applying the principle of the Convention. The Conference Committee also called on the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance in order to bring its law and practice into full conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes that a tripartite national workshop on strengthening the implementation of the ERA was organized in New Delhi in February 2012, with the assistance of the Office. The main objective was to identify action to be taken by the labour institutions and other relevant stakeholders towards strengthening the effectiveness of the ERA, in line with the principles of the Convention. At the conclusion of the workshop, recommendations were proposed in the areas of research and data collection, proactive measures and legislation, which were to be presented to the Inter-ministerial Task Force for Gender Equality for follow-up. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the follow-up given to the recommendations proposed by the tripartite workshop on the ERA.

Article 1 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. In its General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions, the Committee has called on countries that retain legal provisions that are narrower than the principle laid down in the Convention, to amend their legislation. It has done so because narrower provisions that do not give expression to the concept of "work of equal value" hinder progress in eradicating gender-based pay discrimination (see General Survey, 2012, paragraph 679). The Committee recalls that section 39(d) of the Constitution of India only provides for equal pay for equal work for men and women and that section 4 of the ERA requires employers to pay equal remuneration to men and women for the same work or work of a similar nature; section 2(h) of the ERA defines "same work or work of a similar nature" to mean "work in respect of which the skill, effort and responsibility required are the same, when performed under similar conditions, by a man and a woman and the differences, if any, between the skill, effort and responsibility required of a man and those required of a woman are not of practical importance in relation to the terms and conditions of employment". In its previous comments, the Committee noted that these provisions were more restrictive than is required to give effect to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, as set out in the Convention, and that limiting the scope of the legislation to "work of a similar nature" unduly restricts the scope of comparison of remuneration received by men and women.

The Committee recalls that the Government had previously taken the view that amending the ERA was not necessary and that the legal provisions had to be read in conjunction with judicial interpretations. The Committee notes the three decisions of the Supreme Court of India on the application of article 39(d) of the Constitution and the ERA, which, however, continue to define the principle of equal pay in a restrictive manner that does not give full expression to the principle of the Convention. The Committee urges the Government to take concrete measures to ensure that the legislation clearly establishes the right to equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and asks the Government to provide detailed information on the measures taken and progress achieved in this regard.

Assessment of the gender pay gap. The Committee recalls the significant earnings differentials between men and women, even where they are engaged in the same occupations or where they have the same level of skills or education. The Committee notes from the most recent statistical data provided by the Government that significant differentials remain with respect to the average daily earnings between men and women in the manufacturing sector, the mining sector, the plantation sector, and the service sector (Labour Bureau Occupational Wage Survey). The Committee notes that the Conference Committee had asked the Government to ensure that research undertaken by the Centre for Gender and Labour of the National Labour Institute encompassed an in-depth study into the reasons for the wide gender remuneration gap and the effectiveness and implementation of the ERA with respect to promoting the principle of the Convention. The Government was urged to follow up actively on such research, with the cooperation of employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Centre for Gender and Labour has been entrusted with the responsibility of undertaking research regarding the effectiveness and implementation of the ERA. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the progress made with respect to research undertaken by the Centre for Gender and Labour into the reasons for the wide gender pay gap, the effectiveness and implementation of the legislation and the impact of the minimum wage legislation on equal remuneration for men and women, as well as the compilation of statistics on wage differentials in the public and private sectors, and in the unorganized sector, and to provide the results of such research. Please also indicate how workers' and employers' organizations are being involved in any such research. The Committee also asks the Government to continue to provide detailed statistical information on the earnings of men and women in the public and the private sectors, and the unorganized sector.

Enforcement. The Committee notes that the Conference Committee shared its concern that only very few violations of the ERA have been detected at the level of state governments, particularly when compared to violations detected in the context of inspections undertaken by the central authorities. The Conference Committee had asked the Government to reinforce awareness raising among workers, employers and their organizations and enforcement authorities throughout the country in respect of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value in compliance with the provisions of the Convention, the relevant legal provisions and the avenues of dispute resolution. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the number of inspections undertaken by the authorities at the central level decreased from 3,224 in 2007–08 to 2,779 in 2008–09. In the large majority of cases, violations were identified (2,715), and in 600 cases prosecutions were launched, leading to 320 convictions. It also notes the Government's indication that during 2009–10, 68,700 women benefited from awareness-raising activities on the ERA through the scheme providing "grant-in aid" to voluntary organizations and that the Central Board for Workers' Education under the Ministry for Labour and Employment also organizes training programmes for informal economy workers, particularly rural workers and women workers, with a view to developing awareness on labour protection available under the labour laws. The Committee further notes that the Central Advisory Committee on the ERA was reconstituted in December 2010 and that the first meeting was held in February 2011. Noting the Government's statement that strengthening the enforcement of the equal remuneration legislation at the state level will be taken up with the state government and union territory administrations, the Committee urges the Government to take swift action in this respect, and to report on the progress made. The Committee also asks the Government to take more vigorous steps, in cooperation with the workers' and employers' organizations, to disseminate information widely and raise awareness among workers and employers at the central and state levels, including in the unorganized sector, on the relevant national legislation and the avenues for dispute resolution, through the "grant-in aid" scheme for voluntary organizations, the Central Board for Workers' Education, or otherwise. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the following:

- (i) the steps taken or envisaged to undertake an in-depth analysis of the violations detected and research regarding the obstacles encountered and ways and means of improving enforcement by the state authorities of the equal remuneration legislation, including in the unorganized sector;
- (ii) detailed information on the extent to which the institutions competent to bring complaints under section 12 of the ERA have made use of this possibility, and the outcome of such complaints; and
- (iii) the activities of the Central Advisory Committee to improve the effective implementation of the ERA.

Article 3. Objective job evaluation. The Committee notes that the Conference Committee urged the Government, in cooperation with workers' and employers' organizations, to take the necessary measures to promote, develop and implement practical approaches and methods for the objective evaluation of jobs with a view to effectively applying the principle of the Convention in the public and private sectors. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the issue was to be discussed during the tripartite workshop on the ERA. The Committee notes that the importance of objective job evaluation to the implementation of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value was reaffirmed at the tripartite workshop, including the need to develop technical tools for undertaking objective job evaluation and implementing the principle of equal remuneration for men and women work of equal value. The Committee trusts that the Government will take the measures necessary to give effect to Article 3 of the Convention, in the public and private sectors, with a view to promoting the use of objective job evaluation methods as a means of ensuring full application of the principle of the Convention in practice, and to provide information on any further developments in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1960)

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Discrimination based on social origin. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government regarding the implementation of the quota system for employment by the central and state governments of persons considered to belong to “scheduled castes, scheduled tribes and other backward classes”. The Committee notes from the figures provided by the Government that as of 1 January 2008, persons considered to belong to the scheduled castes (constituting 16.23 per cent of the Indian population according to the 11th Five-Year Plan (2007–12) (“11th Plan”), were represented in central government services as follows: 12.5 per cent in group A; 14.9 per cent in group B; 15.7 per cent in group C; and 19.4 per cent in group D. Total representation of scheduled castes was 16.51 per cent as of 1 January 2008. The Committee recalls that in November 2008, a special recruitment campaign was launched to fill the backlog of reserved vacancies, and notes that no recent statistics have been provided on the representation of scheduled castes for the whole of the reporting period. No new information is at the Committee’s disposal regarding the achievements of the reservation system in state government employment. The Committee understands that the Supreme Court is presently studying the legal implications of denying quota rights regarding jobs in government and educational institutions for Christian and Muslim Dalits, who have so far been excluded from the reservation system. The Committee further notes the information provided by the Government on the implementation during 2009–10 of the various schemes and programmes aimed at educational, economic and social empowerment of the scheduled castes, including a new Centrally-sponsored Scheme “Pradhan Mantri Adrash Gram Yojana (PMAGY)” initiated during 2009–10 on a pilot basis in 1,000 villages having more than 50 per cent of the population belonging to scheduled castes. However, from the information provided it appears that for some of these programmes and schemes the level of expenditure or the number of participants or beneficiaries covered has decreased. The Committee regrets, however, the absence in the Government’s report of information regarding steps taken to complement protective legislation with “promotive legislation which covers the rights of scheduled castes with respect to education, vocational training, higher education and employment”, or any affirmative action measures, in particular for the private sector as foreseen under the 11th Plan, or regarding any awareness-raising campaigns on the prohibition or unacceptability of caste-based discrimination in employment and occupation. Recalling that discrimination in employment and occupation against men and women due to real or perceived belonging to a certain caste is unacceptable under the Convention, and that continuing measures are required to end any such discrimination, the Committee urges the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken to launch and intensify awareness-raising campaigns on the prohibition and unacceptability of caste-based discrimination in employment and occupation, including on the steps taken to seek the cooperation of the workers’ and employers’ organizations in this regard. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the adoption and implementation of any new measures, including any legislative measures referred to under the 11th Plan or any affirmative action measures, and to provide comprehensive and up-to-date information on the results achieved and the impact of the various existing schemes and programmes with respect to equality of opportunity and treatment of persons belonging to the scheduled castes, including the reservation system for the public service at the central and state levels. Further, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of the Supreme Court decision with respect to the denial of quota rights of Dalit Muslims and Dalit Christians under the reservation system, and any follow-up thereto.

With regard to the enforcement of protective legislation, the Committee notes the information in the Government’s report regarding the cases handled by the police and the special courts regarding the application of the Protection and Civil Rights Act, 1955 (PCR Act), and the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act, 1989 (POA Act), which provide for the punishment of the practice of untouchability. According to the statistical information provided by the Government on the cases handled by the police and the courts during 2008, the total number of court cases regarding scheduled castes under the PCR Act was 1,876, only 55 of which resulted in a conviction (compared to 2,613 cases and 63 convictions in 2007). With respect to the POA Act, the Government’s report indicates that there were 104,898 cases before the courts in 2008, out of which 6,688 resulted in a conviction (compared to 104,003 cases and 6,505 convictions in 2007). Statistics however continue to suggest that under both Acts large numbers of cases remain pending before the courts. The Committee further notes that the “Committee for effective coordination and ways and means to curb offences of untouchability and atrocities against scheduled castes and scheduled tribes and effective implementation of both Acts” has so far held nine meetings (the last one in February 2010), and reviewed 25 states and four Union Territories. Noting the large number of pending cases and the decreasing number of convictions, the Committee requests the Government to take additional steps to ensure the strict enforcement of the Protection of Civil Rights Act, 1955, and the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act, 1989, by the special police and special courts, including measures mentioned in the 11th Plan such as capacity building and awareness raising of the judiciary, public prosecutors and police to reduce the backlog and delays in the administration of cases in courts and to speed up the issuing of judgments. The Committee also requests the Government to make every effort to collect and provide more up-to-date statistics on the number and outcome of the cases handled by the competent authorities. Recalling that the State and District Level Vigilance and Monitoring Committees review the implementation of the POA Act and PCR Act, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the specific activities of these Committees.

Manual scavengers. For many years, the Committee has been conducting a dialogue with the Government regarding the practice of manual scavenging and the fact that Dalits, and very often Dalit women, are usually engaged in this practice due to their social origin, in contravention of the Convention. The Committee recalls that the 11th Plan referred to 342,000 remaining manual scavengers, while the Government previously reported that a total of 138,464 manual scavengers were still to be liberated under the Integrated Low Cost Sanitation (ILCS) Scheme as of 31 March 2009. The Committee had expressed serious concern that, despite the efforts taken by the Government, thousands of Dalit men and women still found themselves trapped in this inhumane and degrading practice. The Committee has been particularly concerned at the apparent weak enforcement of the Employment and Manual Scavengers and Construction of Dry Latrines (Prohibition) Act 1993 and at the fact that the practice even continued in employment under the Government's authority contrary to Article 3(d) of the Convention. The Committee notes that, according to the Government's report, the 1993 Act so far has been adopted by 23 states and all union territories. Two states report that they do not have dry latrines and that they are scavenger free; two states have adopted their own legislation on the subject. With regard to enforcement of the Act, the information in the Government's report indicates that only the State of Uttar Pradesh has reported that 32,314 cases of prosecutions have been filed in the Judicial Magistrate's Court since 10 April 2010 and that a fine has been imposed in 5,206 cases. Other states merely report that the State is either scavenger-free, that no cases have been reported or that the issue is not applicable in that State.

The Committee notes the ILO Project on the Promotion of Equality at Work in India which aims to support the central and state governments, workers' organizations and civil society organizations in their efforts to eradicate manual scavenging and promote equality in employment for caste-based excluded communities like the Valmikis. It notes in this context that research and consultative meetings have been carried out at regional and national level with a view to supporting efforts by the Government to eradicate manual scavenging by the end of 2012, as foreseen in the 11th Plan. The Committee notes that the National Advisory Council (NAC) was reconstituted in March 2010 to provide policy advice and legislative suggestions to the Government with a special focus on social policy and the rights of excluded groups (Order 631/2/1/2004.Cab of 31 May 2004 and Order 1/3/2/2010.Cab of 29 March 2010). In a Resolution on Manual Scavenging of 23 October 2010, the NAC expressed concern at the persistence of manual scavenging in India, the poor implementation of the legislation and rehabilitation schemes, in particular the Self-Employment Scheme for the Rehabilitation of Manual Scavengers, and urged the various relevant departments of central government, including Railways, to abolish the practice by the end of the 11th Plan period. The Committee also notes that the NAC made proposals regarding further follow-up steps to be taken by the Government, including the adoption of new legislation, a new nationwide survey involving government officials and civil society to collect accurate data on remaining dry latrines and manual scavengers, the demolition of all dry latrines, improved access requirements to rehabilitation schemes of manual scavengers, especially women, and their families, and a specific programme for the education of children of families presently or previously engaged in manual scavenging. The Committee also understands that the Supreme Court of India has issued orders condemning certain practices faced by government contract workers, in particular members of the Valmiki community.

In addition, the Committee notes that in June 2010 the Ministry of Labour and Employment established a Task Force on Sanitation and Leather Workers which was to develop a social security scheme and propose new legislation covering all forms of manual scavenging. The Task Force drafted a new bill for sanitation workers entitled "Sanitation Workers (Regulation of Employment and Conditions of Service) Bill". The Committee also notes that the Government again expressed its commitment to eliminating the practice of manual scavenging in the Approach Paper to the 12th Five-Year Plan (2012–17) "Faster, Sustainable and More Inclusive Growth" of the Planning Commission (October 2011), and has proposed the Prohibition of the Employment as Manual Scavengers and their Rehabilitation Bill, 2012 to strengthen accountability mechanisms and widen the definition of manual scavenging. The Committee understands that the Ministry of Social Justice and Empowerment constituted in April 2012 a Committee for recommending modalities for conducting a Survey of Manual Scavengers and their dependents, taking in consideration the data available from the 2011 Census and the Socio-Economic Caste Census (Order No. 190/12/2011-SDC-IV). While taking due note of the Government's expression of commitment to ending the practice of manual scavenging, the Committee requests the Government to take vigorous and comprehensive measures to combat caste-based discrimination and end the degrading and inhumane practice of manual scavenging by the set target date. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information as follows:

- (i) the results of the 2011 Census and the Socio-Economic Caste Census with respect to the existence of dry latrines and manual scavengers;
- (ii) the concrete follow-up given to the proposals made by the National Advisory Council, in particular the Survey on Manual Scavenging and measures to address the gaps and to improve the effectiveness of the rehabilitation schemes, particularly for women beneficiaries, and the education programme for children of manual scavengers;
- (iii) any developments regarding the adoption of the Prohibition of the Employment as Manual Scavengers and their Rehabilitation Bill, 2012 and the Sanitation Workers (Regulation of Employment and Conditions of Service) Bill;
- (iv) any relevant orders or decisions by the Supreme Court relating to caste-based discrimination involving manual scavengers, including the Supreme Court Order regarding government contract workers; and

- (v) any other measures taken in the context of a multifaceted approach designed to promote equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of social origin and address caste-based discrimination, including awareness raising for manual scavengers of their rights, avenues for redress, rehabilitation schemes and programmes providing alternative livelihoods; educational programmes addressing the general public and local government bodies and law enforcement officials on caste-based discrimination.

Equality of opportunity and treatment of women and men. The Committee notes from the information provided in the Government's report that the implementation of the Mahatma Ghandi National Rural Employment Guarantee Act, 2005 (MGNREGA), which provides for employment guarantee schemes and an unemployment allowance, covers the entire country and that employment guarantee schemes are operational in 618 districts. Women's participation in the schemes has been steadily rising from 41 per cent in 2006–07 to 48 per cent during 2008–09. By the end of 2010, the overall participation of women was 49 per cent although significant differences in participation rates exist between states (ranging from less than 20 per cent to over 80 per cent participation of women). With regard to training, the Committee notes the general information provided by the Government on the trades and skills offered to women by the network of National and Regional Vocational Training Institutes (NVTI and RVTIs), many of which have a tendency to lead to jobs and occupations traditionally considered "suitable" for women. The Planning Commission is also considering a proposal for setting up twelve more institutes exclusively targeting vocational training requirements of women in the country. The Committee draws the Government's attention to the fact that gender stereotypes regarding women's aspirations, preferences and capabilities with respect to certain trades and skills continue to be an underlying issue affecting the application of the Convention. Providing vocational guidance and taking active measures to promote access to education and training, free from considerations based on stereotypes or prejudices, is therefore essential in broadening the range of occupations from which men and women are able to choose, and in achieving gender equality in the labour market (General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 750). The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the implementation of MGNREGA, including information on the percentage of women participating in the schemes who have been provided with work, or with an unemployment allowance, including women of scheduled castes and tribes, "other backward classes" and minorities. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information, disaggregated by sex, on participation rates in the various vocational training courses offered by the NVTI and the RVTIs, and on the measures taken to ensure that the vocational training courses offered to women are free from considerations based on stereotypes or prejudices.

The Committee had previously noted from the 11th Plan (paragraphs 4.41–4.46) that the labour force participation of women remained much lower than that of men and that in urban areas unemployment was much higher for young women than for men in the corresponding age group in both the unorganized and the private sectors. The Committee notes that the Government in a very general manner refers to the objectives of the 11th Plan, without providing information on the concrete measures taken to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation in the public and private sectors, as requested by the Committee. The statistical data provided by the Government on literacy rates, attendance in educational institutions, and employment, relate to the period of 2005–06. Noting that the 12th Five Year Plan (2012–17) is being developed, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the specific measures foreseen under the Plan to promote and ensure equality of opportunity in employment and occupation between men and women, in rural and urban areas, as well as the private, public and unorganized sectors. The Committee requests the Government to provide all relevant information on the results achieved under the 11th Plan with respect to action taken to promote women's equal access to employment in the organized and public sectors, as well as government services. The Committee also requests the Government to make the necessary efforts to collect and provide more recent and relevant statistical information on the participation of men and women in employment, according to sector and employment status, if possible, allowing an assessment of the progress made over time.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Islamic Republic of Iran

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1964)

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 99th Session, June 2010). The Committee refers to the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2010 and the resulting conclusions. The Committee recalls that the Conference Committee had urged the Government to amend the discriminatory laws and regulations, and to bring the practice into line with the Convention, including regarding the role of female judges, the obligatory dress code, the application of social security regulations, hiring women over 40, and women's access to the labour market. It also called on the Government to expressly repeal section 1117 of the Civil Code, to promote public awareness of the right of women to pursue freely any job or profession, the inclusion of women in the labour market and decent work for women. It also urged the Government to take decisive action to combat discrimination against ethnic minorities and unrecognized religious minorities, in particular the Baha'i. The Conference Committee also expressed concern that in the context of the lack of freedom of workers' organizations, meaningful social dialogue on the implementation of the Convention would not be possible.

Discrimination based on sex. Discriminatory laws and regulations. For a number of years the Committee, as well as the Conference Committee, have been raising concerns regarding laws and regulations that discriminate against women, urging the Government to amend or repeal them. The Committee notes with deep regret that no concrete results in this regard have been achieved. The Committee notes that the committee established in April 2010 to which the Government referred previously, with the aim of reviewing the laws and regulations that could be in conflict with the Convention, does not seem to have had any impact in bringing about the necessary changes, as the Government again refers only generally to the mandate of this committee. The Committee also notes that the Government refers generally to proposals for amendments to the Labour Law by the Centre for Women and Family Affairs with a view to addressing legal obstacles to women in different areas. The Committee notes the Government's indication that section 1117 of the Civil Code, which provides that a husband can prevent his wife from taking up a job or profession, has still not been repealed. The Government previously referred to proposals made for its repeal in 2006 and 2008, and the Government indicates that another proposal was made in 2010, which also does not appear to have been successful. With regard to the discriminatory provisions in social security regulations that favour the husband over the wife for pension and child benefits, the Committee notes that no specific information is provided.

While welcoming the Government's indication that the number of female judges has increased, the Committee also notes that the Government does not address the issue of giving women access to all positions in the judiciary, including those qualified to hand down judgments, and no steps appear to have been taken to address these limitations in the 1982 Law on the selection of judges and Decree No. 5080 of 1979. Regarding the obligatory dress code, the Committee notes the Government's acknowledgement that observance of the Islamic code of dress is established in the Constitution. The Committee notes the concerns raised by the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Islamic Republic of Iran that "strict implementation of the morality code concerning dress and attempts to criminalize improper veils have limited women's participation in public and social arenas." (A/66/374, 23 September 2011, paragraph 56). The Committee remains concerned that such a restriction could have a negative impact on the employment of non-Islamic women and to their access to education (see General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 800).

The Committee recalls that the primary obligation of ratifying States is to declare and pursue a national policy designed to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment and occupation, with a view to eliminating all discrimination in respect thereof (Article 2 of the Convention). Some concrete measures are immediately required under the Convention, including repealing any statutory provisions and modifying any administrative instructions or practices that are discriminatory or inconsistent with promoting equality in employment and occupation (see General Survey, 2012, paragraphs 841–844). Given that the Committee has for many years urged the Government to repeal or amend the discriminatory laws and regulations, and given that this is an immediate obligation under the Convention, the Committee strongly urges the Government to take concrete and immediate steps to ensure the repeal, effective amendment or modification of all laws, regulations, instructions or practices that hinder women's equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation, including with respect to section 1117 of the Civil Code, the social security regulations, the role of female judges, and the obligatory dress code. Noting the Government's reference to the Bill for early retirement of householder women, the Committee asks the Government to review the Bill to ensure that it does not exert a negative impact on women's career paths or access to higher level positions, or result in women receiving a lower pension than men, and to provide specific information in this regard.

Discriminatory practices. With respect to the limitations on employing women over 40, the Government indicates that the maximum age for employment for both men and women is 40, though an extension of five years can be granted. The Committee recalls that there appear to be obstacles in practice to women being hired after the age of 30. In response to the Committee's concerns regarding the prevalence of discriminatory job advertisements, the Committee notes the Government's indication that such advertisements, published by the Government and the private sector, are motivated by professional needs and qualifications, and that the Government cannot interfere in this regard. The Committee recalls that limiting applications to only men or only women for a particular job is discriminatory, unless being a man or a woman is an inherent requirement of the particular job, in the strict sense of the term, as provided in Article 1(2) of the Convention. The Committee recalls that there will be very few instances where distinctions based on sex may be required, for example jobs in the performing arts or those involving physical intimacy (General Survey, 2012, paragraphs 827–830). The Committee urges the Government to take measures to prohibit discriminatory job advertisements, and to ensure such prohibition is enforced. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the actual age profile of the workforce, in the public and private sector, disaggregated by sex, and asks the Government to take measures to ensure that there are no obstacles in practice to women being employed after the age of 30.

Discrimination based on religion and ethnicity. Noting the general information provided by the Government regarding measures taken to benefit certain ethnic and religious groups, the Committee notes with deep concern that the Government does not address the very serious concerns that have been raised for many years regarding discrimination against unrecognized religious minorities, in particular the Baha'i and the urgent need to take decisive action to combat such discrimination. The Committee recalls the concerns raised by Education International (EI) regarding religious-based discrimination against the Baha'i in access to education, universities and to particular occupations in the public sector. The Committee notes that the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Islamic Republic of Iran acknowledges that “Baha’is are subjected to severe socio-economic pressure ... in some cases, they have been deprived of property, employment and education”. He also refers to the establishment of an office to counteract Baha’i publications, the denial of positions of influence to Baha’i and prohibiting them from carrying out certain trades. He also states that ethnic minorities “continue to be subjected to intense socio-economic discrimination and pressures, including land and property confiscation, denial of employment and restrictions on social, cultural and linguistic rights” (A/HRC/19/66, 6 March 2012, paragraphs 61–62). The Committee notes further that the Special Rapporteur states that the practice of gozinesh, a selection procedure requiring state officials and employees to demonstrate allegiance to the state religion, has further alienated ethnic minorities (ibid., paragraph 65). The Committee must once again urge the Government to take decisive action to combat discrimination and stereotypical attitudes against religious minorities, in particular the Baha’i, through actively promoting respect and tolerance for religious minorities, to repeal all discriminatory legal provisions, including regarding the practice of gozinesh, and withdraw all circulars and other government communications discriminating against religious minorities. The Committee also calls on the Government to ensure that religious minorities, including unrecognized religious minorities, in particular the Baha’i, as well as ethnic minorities, are protected against discrimination, and have equal access and opportunities, in education, employment and occupation, in law and practice. The Committee asks the Government to take concrete measures to this end, and to provide detailed information of the measures taken and the results achieved. The Committee also asks the Government to provide further information on the progress made in developing an index of ethnic justice to which the Government refers, the indicators established, and any conclusions or findings arising from the index.

Discrimination based on political opinion. The Committee recalls the observations of EI raising concerns of persecution and prosecution of teachers, students and trade unionists advocating for social justice, for equal rights to education and employment and for women’s rights. The Committee notes that the Government in its brief reply to this allegation states that the activities of the association of teachers to which EI had referred, had a political nature. The Committee recalls that the protection against discrimination on the basis of political opinion under the Convention implies protection in respect of the activities of expressing or demonstrating opposition to established political principles and opinions and also covers discrimination based on political affiliation. The protection of political opinion applies to opinions which are either expressed or demonstrated, but does not apply where violent methods are used (General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 805). The Committee also recalls that the protection of freedom of expression is aimed not merely at the individual’s intellectual satisfaction at being able to speak his or her mind, but rather – and especially as regards the expression of political opinions – at giving him or her an opportunity to influence decisions in the political, economic and social life of the society; for political views to have an impact, the individual generally acts in conjunction with others (General Survey on equality in employment and occupation, 1988, paragraph 57). The Committee requests the Government to take measures to ensure that teachers, students and their representatives enjoy protection against discrimination based on political opinion and requests the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken in this respect.

Legislative and policy framework for equality and non-discrimination. The Committee previously noted that the Bill on Non-discrimination in Employment and Education had been submitted to the Commission of Social Affairs of the Cabinet of Ministers. The Committee had noted with concern that the Bill did not provide effective and comprehensive legal protection for all workers against discrimination in employment and occupation on all the grounds enumerated in the Convention, and urged that steps be taken to bring it into line with the Convention. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the Bill remains with the Commission of Social Affairs, and will be forwarded once it has been approved. On the issue of providing legislative protection against sexual harassment in employment and occupation, the Committee notes that the Government considers that individuals respect social norms proportional to the “necessities of the society and regular behaviour”, and indicates that no case of sexual harassment in the workplace has been reported. With respect to the concerns raised regarding the increasing number of women working in temporary jobs and under contract employment, thus being excluded from legal entitlements and facilities, including maternity protection, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that all gaps regarding the protection of mothers will be considered in the process of the amendment of the Labour Law. The Committee once again urges the Government to ensure that effective and comprehensive legal protection for all workers, whether nationals or non-nationals, against direct and indirect discrimination, on at least all the grounds enumerated in the Convention, namely race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin, with respect to all aspects of employment and occupation. The Committee asks the Government to review the procedures that would be available to bring a claim for a violation of the provisions concerning discrimination, to ensure they provide effective and accessible avenues for redress. The Committee urges the Government to take effective measures, in law and in practice, to prevent and prohibit both quid pro quo and hostile environment harassment in employment and occupation. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the progress of amending the Labour Law with a view to ensuring that women in temporary and contract employment benefit from all entitlements and facilities.

The Committee notes the adoption of the Act of the Fifth Economic, Social and Cultural Development Plan (2011-15) of 20 January 2011 (Act of the 5th Development Plan), and the National Plan of Decent Work, 2010, which were attached to the Government’s report. The Committee notes that the Act of the 5th Development Plan does not appear to address equality and non-discrimination in employment and occupation. With respect to the National Plan of Decent

Work, the Committee notes that the objectives of the Plan include fundamental labour rights, including prohibition of discrimination in employment and occupation; “equalizing opportunities” for men and women, and enabling women to take advantage of suitable job opportunities; and reforming laws and regulations to comply with international conventions. The Committee notes that the Plan is very general in nature, and no specific measures are set out to address the objectives listed. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken in the context of the National Plan of Decent Work, or otherwise, in line with Article 2 of the Convention, to declare and pursue a national policy designed to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation, with a view to eliminating any discrimination based on all the grounds enumerated in the Convention, and the impact of such measures.

Equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the labour force participation of women increased from 12.6 per cent in the fourth quarter of 2009 to 16 per cent in the first quarter of 2010. According to the statistics provided by the Government, women’s labour force participation rates from 2007 to 2010 fluctuated regularly within a band of 12.3 per cent to 16.7 per cent. The Committee also notes the increase in women’s unemployment in 2010 to 25 per cent, from 16.8 per cent in 2009. The Committee notes the range of measures reported by the Government with a view to improving women’s access to education and training, as well as the Government’s acknowledgement that this education and training is not translating into the same labour market access for women as for men. The Government states that the difference in access to the labour market is due to social and cultural reasons, mainly based on traditional interpretations, which the Government considers are justified. The Committee notes the continuing efforts made to promote women’s entrepreneurship, including the establishment of the Foundation of Cooperative and Development of Women’s Entrepreneurship. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that it will submit updated information on the measures adopted by the Cultural and Social Council of Women in the near future, and looks forward to receiving such information once it is available. The Committee asks the Government to take concrete steps to ensure that women’s education and training opportunities translate into jobs, including those with a career path and higher pay. In this context, the Committee urges the Government to address stereotyped assumptions regarding women’s aspirations, preferences and capabilities regarding employment. The Committee also asks the Government to continue to provide information on activities to promote women’s empowerment and women’s entrepreneurship, and the impact of such measures. Please also provide more detailed information on the contents and progress of the adoption of the Bill on home-based work and the Family Protection Bill, including a summary of the provisions of relevance to the Convention. The Committee again asks the Government to provide information on the quota system in universities and how this is applied in practice. Please also continue to provide information on the participation of women and men respectively in education, vocational training, and provide information on the distribution of men and women in the various sectors and occupations of employment.

Enforcement. The Committee notes that the Government provides information on the number of cases of alleged violations of citizenry rights, including discrimination against religious and ethnic minorities, that were heard in different provinces (a total of 5,926 cases). However, it is not clear during what period or in which court or other proceedings these complaints were heard, whether they related to discrimination in employment and occupation, or what was the outcome of the cases. The Government also refers to the General Inspection Organization, which monitors, inspects, and deals with complaints. The Government also refers to the establishment of tripartite reconciliation councils, which settled 30 per cent of complaints in 2011. It is not clear if any complaints of discrimination have been addressed in this context or by the General Inspection Organization. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that no cases of discrimination in employment against women have been reported. The Committee recalls that the absence of complaints of discrimination is likely to indicate a lack of an appropriate legal framework, lack of awareness of rights, lack of confidence in or absence of practical access to procedures, or fear of reprisals (General Survey, 2012, paragraph 870). The Committee asks the Government to provide further information on the number and nature of complaints addressed relating to the principle of the Convention, by the labour inspectorate, the courts, and any administrative bodies, and the remedies provided and sanctions imposed. Noting that the Government refers to the establishment of special courts for religious minorities to issue verdicts according to their religious rights, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on the number and nature of complaints of discrimination addressed by these courts and the outcome thereof. The Committee also asks the Government to take concrete measures to increase awareness of workers, employers and their organizations of the principle of the Convention and the complaints procedures available for discrimination. The Committee also calls on the Government to take steps to train all those involved in monitoring and enforcement to increase their capacity to identify and address cases of discrimination in employment and occupation.

Social dialogue. While noting the Government’s general reference to measures taken to promote social dialogue, the Committee remains concerned that national-level social dialogue regarding the implementation of the Convention remains impeded, including in the absence of an appropriate legal framework for freedom of association and social dialogue. The Committee notes that the Government refers to the ongoing process of amending the Labour Law in this context. However, the amendments have not yet been adopted. The Committee notes that the Government requests ILO technical assistance in this regard. The Committee once again urges the Government to make every effort to establish constructive dialogue with the social partners to address the continuing gaps in law and practice in the implementation of the Convention, and to provide detailed information of steps taken in this regard. The Committee also asks the Government to take the necessary steps to secure ILO technical assistance, including forwarding a copy of all relevant draft legislation and amendments to the Office for comments and advice.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 102nd Session and to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Ireland

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1999)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women. The Committee recalls that article 41.2 of the Constitution provides that “the State recognizes that by her life within the home, woman gives to the State a support without which the common good cannot be achieved” and that “the State shall, therefore, endeavour to ensure that mothers shall not be obliged by economic necessity to engage in labour to the neglect of their duties in the home”. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed concern that these provisions might encourage stereotypical treatment of women in the context of employment, contrary to the Convention, and it requested the Government to consider reviewing them. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the Programme for the Government of National Recovery 2011–16 includes a commitment to establishing a Constitutional Convention to consider comprehensive constitutional reform, with a mandate to consider, among others, amending “the clause on women in the home” and encouraging greater participation of women in public life. According to the Programme, a report is to be established within 12 months on this issue, among others. The Committee hopes that the Government will be able to report progress in the near future concerning the revision of article 41.2 of the Constitution with a view to eliminating any tension between this provision and the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women in employment and occupation, and asks the Government to provide information on any developments in this respect. Please provide detailed information on the establishment of the Constitutional Convention, and provide any report or recommendations adopted on the revision of article 41.2 of the Constitution and any follow-up thereto.

Article 1(2). Inherent requirements of the job. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled that section 2 of the Employment Equality Act excludes from the scope of the Act with respect to access to employment “persons employed in another person’s home for the provision of personal services for persons residing in that home where the services affect the private or family life of such persons”. Under section 2, the term “personal services” includes “but is not limited to services that are in the nature of services in loco parentis or involve caring for those residing in the home”. The Committee pointed out that the definition of personal services affecting private or family life appears to be broad and non-exhaustive, and open to extensive interpretation. It noted that these provisions, in practice, would appear to have the effect of allowing employers of domestic workers to make recruitment decisions on the basis of the discriminatory grounds listed in section 6(2) of the Act – gender, marital status, family status, sexual orientation, age, disability, race, membership of the Traveller community – without such decisions being considered discriminatory. The Committee notes that in its report the Government refers once again to the need to balance the competing rights to respect private and family life and to equal treatment and that it reaffirms that the exclusion only applies to the access of domestic workers to employment. According to the Government, there is the possibility for a tribunal or a court to construe and apply the relevant provisions in a manner consistent with the human rights of the employer, employee and recipient of such personal services. The Committee recalls that the Convention is intended to promote and protect the fundamental right to non-discrimination and equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation of all workers and that it only allows for exceptions to the principle of equal treatment in so far as they are based on the inherent requirements of a particular job. The Committee recalls that there are very few instances where the grounds listed in the Convention actually constitute inherent requirements of a job and exceptions relating to inherent requirements should be interpreted restrictively and on a case-by-case basis. Overly broad exceptions in equality legislation excluding domestic workers from the protection of discrimination in respect of access to employment may lead to discriminatory practices by employers against these workers, contrary to the Convention (see General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraphs 827–831). The Committee therefore requests the Government to take steps to amend the relevant parts of section 2 of the Employment Equality Act to ensure that decisions concerning the recruitment of all domestic workers cannot be based on any of the grounds contained in section 6(2) of the Act, except where this is justified on the basis of the inherent requirements of the job, as strictly defined.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Israel

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes the communication, received 25 July 2011, from the International Union of Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers’ Associations (IUF) on behalf of the Philippines National Union of Workers in Hotel, Restaurant and Allied Industries (NUWHRAIN) and the Government’s reply thereto received 12 September 2011.

Application of the principle to caregivers. The Committee refers to its previous observation on the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97), in which it had noted IUF's concerns regarding the possible discriminatory impact of the decision of the High Court of Justice in Yolanda Gloten v. the National Labour Court (HCJ 1678/07) of 29 November 2009, excluding the application of the Hours of Work and Rest Law 1951, including provisions on overtime pay, to a foreign women worker providing care on a live-in basis. In this observation, the Committee also noted the Hours of Work and Rest Law 1951 (sections 30(A)(5) and (6)) as well as the Government's reply that the exceptions set out in the Hours of Work and Rest Law on which the High Court of Justice was relying, apply to all caregivers, whether local or foreign workers. It had also noted that 54,000 foreign workers were employed in care giving, eighty per cent of whom were women, and that few Israeli workers were willing to provide care on a live-in basis. The Committee notes from the Government's most recent report on Convention No. 97 that there are more female Israeli care workers than foreign care workers in the long-term nursing sector (63,000), but these are mostly employed in part-time jobs through nursing care companies. The Government further indicates that following the High Court's acknowledgement of the need for an appropriate clear legislative framework guaranteeing adequate pay and favourable working conditions, a governmental staff committee was set up to submit recommendations to the relevant ministers within the coming months; a further hearing would then take place in the High Court of Justice. The Committee recalls that the Convention applies to all workers, whether nationals or migrant workers, and that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value applies to the basic wage or salary as well as any additional emoluments, including overtime pay. The Committee asks the Government to provide full information on how female caregivers, foreign and national, are able to enjoy equal remuneration for work of equal value with male workers, national or foreign, in law and in practice. Noting that a governmental staff committee will submit recommendations, the Committee asks the Government to expedite this process and ensure that caregivers, whether working part-time or on a live-in basis, are not discriminated against on the basis of sex and that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is fully applied to them, including with respect to overtime pay. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the specific recommendations made, as well as on the outcome of the further hearing in the High Court of Justice. Please include information on any complaints submitted by female foreign and national caregivers with the different authorities, indicating the nature of the complaint and the outcome thereof.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes the communication from the International Union of Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers' Associations (IUF) on behalf of the Philippines National Union of Workers in Hotel, Restaurant and Allied Industries (NUWHRAIN) and the Government's reply thereto. The Committee refers in this regard to its comments on the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), and the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97).

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of race, national extraction or religion. The Committee notes from the Government's report, that in 2009, unemployment rates of the Arab Israeli population (representing 20 per cent of the population) while decreasing, reached 8.5 per cent (compared to 7.6 per cent for the Jewish population in 2009 and 6.8 per cent in 2007). The unemployment rate of Arab women remained at 10.1 per cent and labour force participation of Arab women continues to be very low (21 per cent). Ethiopian and Ultra-Orthodox communities also remain underrepresented in more senior and better paid jobs. The Equal Employment Opportunities Commission (EEOC) reported that according to a 2010 survey of the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labour (MOITAL), overall, 27 per cent of the employees felt discriminated against at work, rising to 39 per cent in the case of Arab employees. Nonetheless, as was noted previously, only a limited percentage of the 643 inquiries received by the EEOC during 2010 related to discrimination on the grounds of nationality (2 per cent) or descent (2 per cent). A 2011 MOITAL survey on private sector managers indicated that between 35 to 40 per cent of the managers found that Arabs, Ethiopians and mothers of young children were discriminated against in the labour market.

The Committee notes the continued efforts by the Government to improve the situation of the Arab, Druze and Circassian population, with particular emphasis on the employment of Arab women. The Government indicates that most of these initiatives are long-term focusing on development of communities and industrial zones, and that the cultural and social characteristics of each group have to be taken into account. The Committee notes the draft by-laws on the integration of minorities in the high-tech industries aiming at increasing the participation rate of Arab, Druze and Circassian graduates of technological subjects in the knowledge-rich industry, and the initiative under the EEOC strategy and implementation plan 2012–13 to enhance employment equality for Arab men and women in the private sector. It also notes the information on the activities of the Authority for Advancement of the Status of Women and the Authority for the Economic Development of the Arab, Druze and Circassian sectors. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the results achieved including related statistical information, through the implementation of the specific measures taken to promote equal access to employment of Arab Israelis, particularly women, and to promote their access to a wider range of occupations and industries. Please continue to provide in this context up-to-date information, disaggregated by sex, on labour force participation, unemployment and employment rates of Druze, Circassians and Arab Israelis and the corresponding rates for other Israelis. The Committee reiterates its request to the Government to provide information on specific measures taken to prevent and address instances of direct and indirect discrimination in employment and occupation against Druze, Circassians, and Arab Israelis, including awareness-raising campaigns, complaints procedures, as well as information on any cases of such discrimination addressed by the courts or the labour inspection service.

Civil service. The Committee notes from the information provided by the Civil Service Commission that in 2010, the percentage of Arabs and Druze who entered the civil service was 11.09 per cent. Among newly recruited women, 7.35 per cent were Arab or Druze, compared to a rate of 16.64 per cent for Arab or Druze men. In the Government ministries and agencies, Arab and Druze represented 7.07 per cent of the total number of workers accepted, and 17.21 per cent of the total workers accepted in the Government health system. However, despite the increasing number of entrants, overall, Arabs and Druze constituted only 7.52 per cent of total civil servants (compared to 6.17 per cent in 2007) in 2010. The Committee notes the flagship initiative to enhance equality, diversity and non-discrimination in public sector recruitment under the EEOC strategy and implementation plan 2012–13. Recalling the target previously set by the Government that by 2012 at least 10 per cent of all civil servants would come from the Arab, Druze and Circassian population groups, the Committee requests the Government to intensify its efforts to promote and ensure equal access of the Arab, Druze and Circassian population to employment in the civil service, and to provide information on the progress made. Please include, statistical information, disaggregated by sex, and the outcomes of the employment-related projects under the responsibility of the Authority for the Economic Development of the Arab, Druze and the Circassian sectors, and the EEOC strategy and implementation plan 2012–13.

Foreign caregivers. The Committee refers to its comments under Convention Nos 97 and 100 regarding concerns expressed by the IUF with respect to the decision of the High Court of Justice in Yolanda Gloten v. the National Labour Court (HCJ 1678/07) of 29 November 2009 excluding the application of the Hours of Work and Rest Law 1951 to female foreign workers providing care on a live-in basis. According to the IUF, the Gloten judgment facilitates the application of a discriminatory legal regime to the work of women migrants and labour market segregation on the basis of gender and national origin. The IUF indicates that migrant workers are primarily from South and South-East Asia and employed in the construction, agriculture and caregiving sectors. Women represent the overwhelming majority, comprising 80 per cent of the workers in the caregiving sector, which is the largest sector for the employment of migrant workers. The Committee previously noted in its observation on Convention No. 97, that 54,000 foreign workers were employed in caregiving. The Committee notes the Government's reply in its most recent report on Convention No. 97 that more female Israeli care workers than foreign care workers are employed in the long-term nursing sector (63,000), but that they are mostly employed in part-time jobs, through nursing care companies. The Committee recalls that the Convention covers both nationals and migrant workers and draws the Government's attention to the need to ensure that all care workers, including foreign caregivers, are effectively protected against discrimination in employment and occupation on the grounds set out in the Convention, including with respect to their conditions of work. Noting that a governmental staff committee will submit recommendations regarding an appropriate legislative framework guaranteeing adequate pay and favourable working conditions for caregivers, after which a hearing will take place in the High Court of Justice, the Committee asks the Government to expedite this process and make every effort to ensure that female foreign workers are not being directly or indirectly discriminated against on the basis of sex, race, colour or national extraction. Please provide information on the recommendations made by the governmental staff committee and on the outcome of any new hearing by the High Court of Justice. The Committee also asks the Government to include information on complaints submitted by female foreign and national caregivers with the EEOC, the courts or other competent authorities, and their outcome, regarding non-respect of the discrimination principle set out in the national legislation and the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Italy

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes the observations of the Italian General Confederation of Labour (CGIL) received on 30 September 2011 and of the Italian Union of Labour (UIL) received on 5 October 2011, as well as the Government's reply to these communications received on 7 November 2011.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Discrimination on the basis of sex. Pregnancy and maternity. The Committee notes the observations made by the CGIL that with the repeal of Act No. 188 of 17 October 2007 by Act No. 112 of 25 June 2008, workers are no longer offered protection against resignations without cause (licenziamento in bianco), that is the practice of having the worker sign an undated letter of resignation at the time of hiring for future use by the employer at his or her convenience. According to the CGIL, such practice affects more specifically pregnant women who are de facto dismissed due to their pregnancy. The Committee also notes the UIL's observations that discrimination against women on the basis of pregnancy and maternity is still widespread. In its reply, the Government indicates that Act No. 188/2007, which provided for the compulsory use of a resignation form approved by the administration, proved incomplete and difficult to implement. It also points out that a study group composed of labour inspectors and equality counsellors was set up by Directorial Decree No. 241 of 12 January 2009 to develop more appropriate procedures for the resignation of working mothers and that pursuant to the Ministerial Circular of 26 February 2009, a procedure for such resignations was finalized where labour inspectors are required to verify the reality of the intention to resign in order to validate the resignation, and to collect relevant data, to be included in an annual report for statistical purposes. The Government adds that in 2010, the labour inspectorate validated 19,017 resignations for maternity reasons (17,676 in 2009) and rejected 30 (29 in 2009). Infringements of the legal provisions protecting working mothers rose from 306 in 2009 to 1,280 in 2010 (an increase of 215 per cent). The Government also indicates that motives for resignation refer mostly to the impossibility to reconcile family responsibilities and working obligations due to the lack of available childcare or parental support. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on any further action taken to assess and address the issue of resignations without cause of pregnant women and working mothers. Considering the significant increase in infringements of the legislation on the protection of pregnancy and maternity at the workplace, the Committee asks the Government to examine whether there is a need for further action to prevent and eliminate such types of discrimination.

Equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women in access to employment and occupation. Family responsibilities. Further to the above, the Committee recalls that measures assisting workers with family responsibilities are essential to promote gender equality in employment and occupation. The Committee notes from the Government's report the various measures taken to address work-life balance issues and strengthen childcare services, including the "National Strategic Framework for the Supplementary Regional Policy 2007-13", the "Programme of Action for the inclusion of women in the labour market - Italia 2020" and the "Third Plan of Action and Intervention to safeguard the rights and development of children", approved by the Presidential Decree of 21 January 2011. It also notes the Mutual Agreement on actions to support work-life balance policies, concluded on 7 March 2011 by the Ministry of Labour and Social Policies and the social partners, which contains a commitment of the social partners to address work-life conciliation issues in collective bargaining at regional and national level. The Committee, however, notes the observations of the UIL concerning the wide regional disparities in the development of childcare facilities and the high fees for child day care, forcing women to quit their jobs to take care of their child or children. The CGIL also questions the impact of the results achieved under some of the programmes. While acknowledging the marked differences between North and South in childcare coverage, the Government indicates that there has been some impact under the Third Plan and that results will be assessed in full in the next few years. Recalling that in 2009, the employment rate of women stood at 46.3 per cent overall and 30.7 per cent in the southern part of the country, and noting the measures to facilitate the reconciliation of work and family life, such as the plan "Italia 2020", the Committee requests the Government to monitor the impact of these measures on the number of women that are resigning from work or face obstacles in accessing employment due to difficulties in combining work and family responsibilities, and provide information on the results achieved. The Government is also requested to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged, and results achieved, with a view to addressing more specifically the sustainable integration of women in the labour market, including measures to promote a more equal balancing of family responsibilities between men and women workers as well as a greater awareness of the subject at enterprise level.

Non-discrimination and equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of race, colour or national extraction. The Committee previously noted a number of measures taken by the Government to address racial and ethnic discrimination, including against foreign workers, and had requested information on the specific impact of these measures, as well as any results achieved to promote a diverse workplace free from discrimination. The Committee notes that assistance and support service to victims of racial discrimination of the Office for the Promotion of Equality of Treatment and Elimination of Discrimination based on Race and Ethnic Origin (UNAR) has been fundamentally restructured through the launching of an online access point and that activities to provide advice, training and technical assistance to persons involved in combating discrimination, including local networks organized by regional administrations, have continued. The Government indicates that the number of cases of discrimination reported increased from 243 in 2009 to 540 in 2010, of which 11.3 per cent concerned workplace discrimination (16.6 per cent in 2009); the large majority of the complaints registered were lodged by foreigners (63.4 per cent). In this regard, the Committee notes that the UIL, while acknowledging the initiatives by UNAR, draws attention to the fact that immigrants very often continue to be victims of discrimination with respect to access to employment and in the workplace, which they rarely report. Those most affected are persons of African and Asian origin, ethnic minorities and especially women belonging to these categories returning to work. The UIL, while acknowledging that the situation in Italy is complex, considers that effective intervention increasingly requires regulatory and enforcement measures, institutions equipped with sufficient resources and greater awareness of the problem, especially in times of economic recession during which a tendency may exist to attach lower priority to policies aimed at combating discrimination and promoting greater awareness of workers' rights. With regard to other observations made by the CGIL and the UIL regarding the situation of migrant workers, the Committee will address these issues in the context of the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97), and the Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975 (No. 143). The Committee asks the Government to provide specific information on the concrete impact of all measures taken to promote equality irrespective of race, colour and national extraction, and to promote a diverse workplace free from racial and ethnic discrimination, as well as to provide information, including statistics, concerning the activities of UNAR. The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to ensure that the action taken and progress achieved to address racial and ethnic discrimination against certain minorities, including migrant workers, will not be adversely affected, and asks the Government to monitor carefully the impact of the austerity measures on the employment situation of these groups who are particularly vulnerable to the impact of the economic crisis, and to indicate the specific measures taken in this regard.

Roma, Sinti and Travellers. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government that UNAR has pursued its activities aimed at eliminating stereotypes against the Roma, Sinti and Travellers' communities, at promoting their cultural heritage and at fostering mutual understanding, including through the further implementation of the Dosta Campaign. A project for the "Promotion of the governance of policies and tools for social inclusion and fight against discrimination of Roma, Sinti and Travellers' communities" is also envisaged under the European Social Fund, and particularly aims at supporting southern region authorities in this area. Furthermore, the Third Biennial Plan of Action and Interventions for the Protection of Rights and Development of Children aims at preventing educational segregation of minors, including Roma, Sinti and Travellers' children, through specialized courses and vocational training, sensitizing the teaching profession to intercultural and equality issues and strengthening the role of descendants as cultural mediators. The Committee notes in this regard that the CGIL and the UIL, while acknowledging the action taken by the Government to raise awareness of Roma culture and address stereotyping and prejudice against Roma, consider that stereotypes and xenophobic and racist prejudices vis-à-vis the Roma and Sinti populations still prevail, and that further action is needed. The UIL, referring to the "Final report of the survey of conditions of Roma, Sinti and Travellers in Italy" by the Special Commission for the protection and promotion of human rights of the Senate of the Republic (9 February 2011), also draws attention to the difficulties in implementing plans to support education and employment for these populations due to the lack of accurate data on their numbers. The Committee further notes that the High Commissioner for Human Rights of the Council of Europe once again reiterated its call for the adoption and implementation of a national strategy for the integration of Roma and Sinti, focusing much more on social inclusion, non-discrimination and combating "anti-gypsyism" and less on coercive measures, that would provide coherence with and support efforts at regional and local level (CommDH (2011) 26, paragraphs 40–43, 7 September 2011). Furthermore, the Committee notes that, in its concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW), expressed concern about the high dropout rates of Roma and Sinti girls from school and women and girls being subject to multiple forms of discrimination with respect to accessing education, health and employment (CEDAW/C/ITA/CO/6, 2 August 2011, paragraphs 24 and 52). The Committee requests the Government to intensify its action towards addressing discrimination and promoting social inclusion of Roma, Sinti and Travellers' communities, with a view to improving their access to employment and occupation, and their participation in education and training programmes, and to consider adopting an appropriate legal and policy framework addressing fully the obstacles to the integration of such minorities. The Committee also asks the Government to take the necessary steps to collect and analyse accurate data, disaggregated by sex, on the employment and education situation of the Roma, Sinti and Travellers' communities in the country, and report on the results achieved.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Japan

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes the observations of the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC-RENGO), dated 29 August 2011 which were annexed to the Government's report received on 17 October 2011.

Follow-up to the recommendations of the tripartite committee (representation made under article 24 of the ILO Constitution). The Committee notes the report adopted on 11 November 2011 of the tripartite committee established by the Governing Body set up to examine the representation submitted by the Zensekiyu Showa-Shell Labour Union (GB.312/INS/15/3). The tripartite committee noted that the representation raised two main issues: (i) whether section 4 of the Labour Standards Law No. 49 of 1947 and the Equal Employment Opportunities Law (EEOL) No. 45 of 1985 gave effect to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value; and (ii) whether the Labour Standards Law and the EEOL had been implemented in practice so as to give effect to this principle (paragraph 43). The tripartite committee concluded that further measures were needed, in cooperation with workers' and employers' organizations, to promote and ensure equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, in law and practice, in accordance with Article 2 of the Convention, and to strengthen the implementation and monitoring of the existing legislation and measures, including measures to determine the relative value of jobs (paragraph 57). The tripartite committee entrusted this Committee with following up the matters raised in the report (paragraph 58).

Work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee had previously noted that section 4 of the Labour Standards Law did not reflect fully the principle of the Convention. The Committee recalls that section 4 provides that "an employer shall not engage in discriminatory treatment of a woman, as compared to a man with respect to wages, by reason of the worker being a woman", and it asked the Government to take steps to amend the legislation to provide for the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. The Committee notes that the Governing Body tripartite committee concluded that the EEOL, while addressing aspects that might affect wage determination, did not directly deal with equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value. With respect to section 4 of the Labour Standards Law, the tripartite committee concluded that it did not on its face encompass the concept of “work of equal value” (paragraph 47), and that it did not appear that section 4 was being applied in practice to different job categories, types of jobs, and between employment management categories (paragraph 52). With respect to the interpretation by the courts of the Labour Standards Law, it was found that section 4 had been applied to different tasks and occupations in only a limited number of cases, namely two district court decisions (paragraph 50). The Committee also notes that the JTUC–RENGO calls for the inclusion of a clause prohibiting wage discrimination based on sex in the EEOL, and for “sex” to be added as a ground of discrimination in section 3 of the Labour Standards Law, which prohibits discrimination in wages, working hours and other working conditions by reason of nationality, faith or social status.

The Committee draws the Government’s attention to its General Survey on the Fundamental Conventions, 2012, noting that only prohibiting sex-based wage discrimination generally will not normally be sufficient to give effect to the Convention, because such a prohibition does not capture the concept of “work of equal value” (see General Survey, 2012, paragraph 676). In the General Survey, the Committee also called on countries that retain legal provisions that are narrower than the principle laid down in the Convention, in that they do not give expression to the concept of “work of equal value”, to amend their legislation, noting that more narrowly expressed provisions hinder progress in eradicating gender-based pay discrimination (see General Survey, 2012 paragraph 679). The Committee also recalls the high and persistent gender pay gap in Japan, which, based on the most recent information provided by the Government, is 29.4 per cent. The Committee considers that an important component in addressing such a significant gender pay gap will be the development of a clear legislative framework specifically providing for equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and for accessible procedures and remedies. The Committee urges the Government to take concrete measures to ensure that there is a legislative framework clearly establishing the right to equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and accessible procedures and remedies. The Committee asks the Government to provide detailed information on the measures taken and progress achieved in this regard.

Assessment of the gender pay gap. The Committee notes the statistical information provided by the Government concerning the evolution between 2008 and 2010 of the disparity in hourly scheduled cash earnings between male and female workers, and concerning the same disparity by industry and by occupational group. The results of the Basic Survey on Wage Structure of 2011 show that, as of 2011, the average scheduled cash earnings (regular salary) of female “general workers” were 70.6 per cent of that of male workers (a pay gap of 29.4 per cent), and that considerable differences remain between industries and occupational groups (a pay gap of 45.5 per cent in the finance and insurance sector, and a pay gap of 36.3 per cent in the manufacturing sector). The Committee also notes that the Government does not provide statistical information concerning the public sector. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide statistical information on the earnings of men and women and the evolution of the gender pay gap, and to include such information for both the public sector, including local government, and the private sector.

Practical measures. The Committee recalls that Guidelines for reducing the gender pay gap: measures to be taken by workers and employers, were issued by the Ministry of Health, Labour and Welfare (MHLW) in August 2010 (the Guidelines). According to the Guidelines, while sex discrimination is not part of the design of the institutional framework, the employment management system in practice contributes to the gender difference in recruitment and assignment. The Guidelines propose the following measures: (i) review of the wage and employment management system; (ii) review of the operation of the wage and employment management system; and (iii) promotion of positive action. The Committee also notes the “Supporting tools for increasing visibility of the gender pay gap” attached to the Guidelines. The Committee also notes that under the Third basic plan for gender equality adopted in December 2010, securing equal opportunity and equal treatment between men and women in employment constitutes one of the priority areas. In particular, the Third basic plan set out, as one of its main objectives, the promotion of measures to secure equal opportunity and equal treatment in employment between men and women, including measures to resolve the gender pay gap in line with the Convention. Other objectives include facilitating employment for non-regular workers and promoting positive action. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that under the Third basic plan a target is set for increasing the number of enterprises that implement positive action to reach over 40 per cent by 2014, and for increasing the number of women in managerial positions (section chief or higher) in the private sector, which stood at 6.5 per cent in 2009, to approximately 10 per cent by 2015. The Government also refers to other measures being taken to support work–life balance, such as reviewing the current working patterns, including those of men, as well as encouraging men to take part in childcare and family chores. In this connection, the Committee notes the observation of JTUC–RENGO that awareness-raising activities by the Government concerning the Guidelines have not been sufficient. With regard to equal treatment between fixed-term workers and regular workers, the Committee recalls the MHLW’s Guidelines concerning the improvement of the employment management for fixed-term employees of 29 July 2008. The Committee notes from the MHLW Survey on fixed-term contracts that in 2009, female workers constituted 66.8 per cent of all fixed-term workers. The Committee also notes that the Report of the study group on fixed-term employment contracts published in September 2010 proposes measures to ensure stable employment and equal treatment for fixed-term workers, including considering a requirement for employers to establish systems allowing conversion of fixed-term status to regular status. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the following:

- (i) specific measures taken to implement the proposals set out in the Guidelines for reducing the gender pay gap, including the promotion of positive action, and the results achieved;
- (ii) concrete steps taken to increase awareness and understanding of the Guidelines;
- (iii) progress made in achieving the targets under the Third basic plan on gender equality;
- (iv) action taken to follow-up on the recommendations of the report of the study group on fixed-term employment contracts, and the results achieved; and
- (v) any other measures taken to reduce the gender pay gap.

Part-time work. The Committee notes from the Labour Force Survey in 2010 of the Ministry of Internal Affairs and Communication that the rate of part-time workers (those who work less than 35 hours per week) among all the workers was 26.6 per cent. The rate of male part-time workers was 14.6 per cent among male workers, while it was 43 per cent for female workers. Female workers constituted 68.3 per cent of all the part-time workers. The Committee recalls section 8 of the Part-time Workers Law, which prohibits discriminatory treatment concerning the determination of wages only in the case of part-time workers who meet specific criteria: their job descriptions and the level of responsibilities are equal to those of regular workers; they have concluded an employment contract for an indefinite period; and during the contract period, any change in their job description or assignment corresponds to what a regular worker could also expect. The Committee notes that JTUC–RENGO cites statistics indicating that the protection against discriminatory treatment under section 8 of the Part-time Workers Law was applicable to only 0.1 per cent of all part-time workers in 2010, and reiterates the need for an amendment of this Law to extend the protection against discrimination to all part-time workers. The Committee also notes that a report of the Working Group on Employment Equality of the MHLW Council of Labour Policy, dated 21 June 2012, proposes possible amendments to section 8 of the Part-time Workers Law. The Committee recalls the Basic Policy on Measures for Part-time Workers 2008–12 (Public Notice of the MHLW No. 280 of 14 April 2008), which makes reference to promoting conversions to full-time jobs (section 2(3)(3) of the Basic Policy). The Government indicates that 48.6 per cent of business enterprises which employ part-time workers were taking measures to promote conversion of part-time status to regular status according to section 12 of the Part-time Workers Law, and that 39.9 per cent of the enterprises had actually applied such measures from 2007–10. In this connection, JTUC–RENGO indicates that less than 25 per cent of all business enterprises are employing workers who actually converted their status to that of regular workers. The Government also indicates that “balanced treatment and conversion to regular workers promotion planners” have been assigned to equal employment offices, and that in the fiscal year 2010, the planners visited 10,840 workplaces and provided advice regarding this matter. In the same year, the equal employment offices provided administrative guidance concerning conversion of status to regular workers in 7,193 cases, among which corrections or improvements were made in 6,748 cases. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the implementation of the Part-time Workers Law, including statistical information on the proportion of male and female part-time workers. The Committee also asks the Government to indicate the impact of the Part-time Workers Law in narrowing the gender pay gap, and to indicate any progress made in revising section 8 of the Law to extend its coverage. It also asks the Government to provide information on the results achieved in promoting conversions from part-time status to regular status.

With respect to temporary and part-time officials in local governments, the Committee recalls the high proportion of female temporary and part-time workers, particularly among medical and caretaking staff. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that extending the protection provided to private sector part-time workers to part-time workers in local governments would be difficult because the working conditions of the part-time workers in local governments are determined through a different structure of laws and ordinances, etc. The Government also indicates that in order to implement the notification of the Secretary General of the National Personnel Authority (NPA) (No. 1064 of 26 August 2008) concerning wages of part-time staff, regulated under section 22(2) of the Act on Wages of the General Service Staff, the NPA examined in 2009 the measures taken by respective ministries and agencies. The NPA found that all the ministries and agencies had established provisions on the wages of part-time employees and that the basic wages of part-time employees had reached the level provided in the notification in most of the ministries and agencies. The Committee also notes the Report of the Ministry of Internal Affairs and Communication of 23 January 2009 of the study group on short-time service of local public servants. This Report points out that while wages and reimbursement of expenses are provided for part-time officials, allowances or temporary grants should not be provided for part-time officials without any clear basis in the ordinances, etc. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the number of temporary and part-time officials in the local authorities, disaggregated by sex, as well as on any follow-up measures to the 2009 Report of the study group on short-time service of local public servants including the results of the studies conducted. It also asks the Government to indicate the complaint mechanism for temporary and part-time officials in the local authorities, as well as the details of such complaints, concerning wages and reimbursement of expenses with a view to ensuring equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value.

Indirect discrimination. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government concerning the number of queries and complaints made in relation to section 7 of the EEOL providing for measures to be identified that are considered to be indirect discrimination, and relevant court decisions. The Committee recalls that the review of the Enforcement Regulations under the EEOL was to take place in 2012, and notes the Government’s indication that a tripartite advisory council is reviewing the necessity for the revision of the EEOL. The Committee notes the observation by JTUC–RENGO that the requirement of being a “head of a household” in order to qualify for social security benefits should fall under discrimination to be prohibited. In response, the Government indicates that companies adopt wage systems based on the idea that companies guarantee the livelihood of workers. The Committee hopes that the Enforcement Regulations under the EEOL will be reviewed at the earliest opportunity, in consultation with the workers’ and employers’ organizations, with a view to ensuring that there is effective protection against all forms of indirect discrimination regarding remuneration, and it requests information on progress made in this regard. Please also continue to provide information on the application of section 7 of the EEOL and section 2 of its Enforcement Regulations, including any complaints received and relevant court decisions, including those addressing measures beyond the three determined to be indirect discrimination in the Enforcement Regulations. It further asks the Government to indicate whether any consideration is being given to prohibiting indirect discrimination with respect to social security benefits.

Career-tracking systems. The Committee recalls once again the impact of the career-tracking system on the continuing wage disparity between women and men, due to the low representation of women in the main career track. According to the survey by the MHLW, in 2008, the rate of women among those newly recruited for the “main decisive jobs with the possibility of relocation” track was 16.9 per cent, while the rate of women among the recruited for the “routine work without the possibility of relocation” track was 92.8 per cent. The Committee also recalls the “Guidelines on ways for employers to take appropriate measures with regard to items stipulated in the provisions concerning the prohibition of discrimination against workers on the basis of sex, etc.” (Public Notice No. 614 of MHLW of 2006) (EEO Guidelines), which only prohibits discrimination based on sex within each employment category. In this regard, JTUC–RENGO continues to propose that the limitation on the prohibition of discrimination within each employment category under the EEO Guidelines should be abolished. In response, the Government states that under the lifelong employment practice in the country, human resource development and treatment is determined using categories set by job type and employment status rather than job duties at a specific time; the Government asserts that, therefore, it is reasonable to compare the treatment of workers within the same employment category. The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that it encourages enterprises to adopt positive action to increase the proportion of women in the main career track, and that the Equal Employment Offices provided advice to 104 enterprises in the fiscal year 2007 concerning employment management, including advice on conversion of workers to another career track. Given the persistently low representation of women in the main career track, and the consequent impact on the wage disparity between men and women, the Committee urges the Government to step up its efforts to increase the number of women in the main career track, and to provide information in this regard. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the type of positive action taken to increase the proportion of women in the main career track, and the results achieved. The Committee reiterates its request for information on the general content of the administrative guidance provided to enterprises utilizing the career-tracking systems and on whether such guidance has resulted in an increase of women in the main career track. Please also provide any information on complaints or cases in this regard, and the outcome thereof, and updated and detailed statistical information on the distribution of men and women in different career tracks.

Objective job evaluation. The Committee notes that the Governing Body tripartite committee concluded that the information provided by the Government had not indicated how the relative value of jobs was determined with a view to determining if jobs were of equal value (paragraph 54). The Committee also notes that the MHLW has developed a manual on implementing job analysis and job evaluation, which states that it contributes to the following: (i) identifying whether a job undertaken by part-time workers and regular workers is the same; (ii) clarifying whether the treatment is based on the job undertaken, and whether there is a balance in treatment between part-time workers and regular workers; and (iii) enhancing understanding of part-time workers by convincing them of the difference between the jobs of part-time workers and regular workers. The Committee notes that according to the manual, the comparison permitted is limited to the same jobs or “substantially the same” jobs. This is more restrictive than the principle of the Convention, and the only factor compared is “level of responsibility” which could disadvantage part-time workers. The Committee also notes that the report of the study group on future measures for part-time work was published in September 2011. This points out that despite the difficulty in adopting job analysis and job evaluation as an obligation of employers, including of small and medium-sized enterprises, discussions concerning equal treatment between part-time workers and regular workers could be promoted by introducing a job evaluation system and sharing the process and results of such a system among workers and employers. The Committee asks the Government to provide detailed information on the practical application of the manual on implementing job analysis and job evaluation, including any follow-up studies or research conducted, with a view to expanding the comparison beyond the same or substantially the same jobs, and increasing the range of factors for the comparison. Please provide information on any other measures taken to promote objective job evaluation methods, and the progress made in applying the objective job evaluation methods in enterprises including any awareness-raising activities. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on specific steps taken to ensure the use of objective job evaluation in the public sector.

Enforcement. The tripartite committee noted the low number of cases covered by workplace inspections in which the Labour Standards Inspection Authority had provided guidance regarding violation of section 4 of the Labour Standards Law, and the lack of particulars as to the nature of the violations. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that the Labour Standards Inspection Authority conducted 100,535 regular inspections, six of which were identified as cases of violation of section 4 of the Labour Standards Law. It also notes the information provided concerning nine such cases in 2007, including the nature of the violations and the content of guidance provided. In all nine cases, correctional action was ordered by labour standards inspectors. The Committee further notes the information provided by the Government on the court decisions concerning section 4 of the Labour Standards Law. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide detailed information on the nature of the violations, the content of the guidance provided and the correctional action ordered by labour standards inspectors in cases of violation of section 4 of the Labour Standards Law. It also asks the Government to provide information on the labour inspection, especially the concrete methodologies and the guidance provided to labour standards inspectors to enable them to identify instances of wage discrimination where men and women are engaged in jobs which are of a different nature, but which are nonetheless of equal value. The Committee also asks the Government to continue to provide information on court decisions with regard to section 4 of the Labour Standards Law.

Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156) (ratification: 1995)

The Committee recalls the communication of the All Japan Construction, Traffic and Transportation Workers' Union Tokyo dated 13 October 2009, and notes the communication from the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC-RENGO) dated 29 August 2011, which was attached to the Government's report. It also notes the Government's reply to both of these communications.

Article 3 of the Convention. Legislative developments. The Committee notes with interest the legislative measures to give effect to the provisions of the Convention, in particular the amendments made by Law No. 65 of 1 July 2009 to the Childcare and Family Care Leave Law. The new provisions: (i) require employers to establish a short working hour system or other alternative measures for workers raising children up to the age of 3 (section 23), and to offer exemption from overtime work when requested by a worker raising children up to the age of 3, provided that it does not prevent the normal course of business (section 16-8); (ii) allow a worker to take up to ten days of leave per year to take care of a sick or injured child, if the worker has two or more children of pre-school age (sections 16-2 and 16-3); (iii) extend the period during which one-year childcare leave may be taken until the child turns 1 year and two months old, if both a father and a mother take childcare leave; (iv) establish family care leave (five days per year for one family member, and ten days per year for two or more family members) (sections 16-5 and 16-6); and (v) establish the dispute resolution assistance system by the "Work-Life Balance Conciliation Conference", if the Director of the prefectural Labour Bureau finds it necessary (sections 52-4 and 52-5). In addition, the legislation concerning childcare leave and family care leave for national public employees and local public employees was amended (last amended in December 2010) to provide as follows: (i) an employee whose spouse is taking childcare leave shall also be entitled to childcare leave, and an employee whose spouse can take care of their child shall also be entitled to early/late shift work and overtime work exemption; (ii) an employee who is taking care of a child under 3 years of age shall be entitled to an exemption from overtime work, unless it is extremely difficult to take measures to replace the worker; (iii) part-time employees shall be entitled to take childcare leave, if they meet certain requirements concerning working days; (iv) for national public employees, leave for taking care of a sick child is extended to ten days per year, if the employee has two or more children; and (v) part-time employees shall be entitled to take family care leave if they meet certain requirements concerning working days. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the practical application of the revised Childcare and Family Care Leave Law, as well as the legislation concerning childcare and family care leave for national and local public employees. Please include relevant statistics disaggregated by sex on the number of workers with family responsibilities making use of the entitlements related to working time and leave.

Article 2. Application to all branches of economic activity and all categories of workers. The Committee recalls that sections 5 and 11 of the Childcare and Family Care Leave Law enable fixed-term workers to take childcare leave and family care leave if they meet certain requirements. The Committee notes the guidelines concerning measures to be taken by employers to facilitate the conciliation of work and family life of workers who care for children or other family members (Guidelines No. 509 of 2009) issued by the Ministry of Health, Labour and Welfare, which, inter alia, provide guidance as to who could fulfil the requirements under sections 5 and 11 of the Childcare and Family Care Leave Law, as well as who could be considered to be a "substantially non-fixed-term" worker, and therefore entitled to childcare and family care leave regardless of the requirements under these sections. As to the probability of continuing to be employed after the child turns 1 year of age, which is required under section 5 of the Law, the Committee notes the Government's indication that an employee could show this probability when an indication is made in writing or orally upon the acceptance of the request for childcare or family care leave. In cases where there is no clear indication as to the probability of renewing the employment contracts, it will be determined based on actual situations, including the words and actions of employers about the prospect of continuous employment, the situation of other workers in a similar position, and the history of renewals of the worker's previous labour contracts. While noting the Guidelines No. 509 of 2009 and the Government's explanation regarding the probability of renewing employment contracts, the Committee still considers that fixed-term workers are in a vulnerable position in claiming entitlements pursuant to sections 5 and 11 of the Childcare and Family Care Leave Law. In this context, the Committee notes that the JTUC-RENGO reiterates its observation that requirements to be met by fixed-term workers for the benefits under the Childcare and Family Care Leave Law should be relaxed. It also recalls the JTUC-RENGO's previous observation that the childcare and family care leave system should be extended to fixed-term workers in the public sector, and notes that the Government has not provided any updated information in relation to this matter. The Committee further notes that, while the Government has published a leaflet on “Promoting the taking of childcare leave by fixed-term employees”, according to research studies conducted in the fiscal year 2009–10 on the use of such leave by fixed-term workers, 40 per cent of them were not aware of the availability of the leave system. The Committee asks the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the application of the Convention to fixed-term and part-time workers, including in the public sector, as well as to increase awareness of the availability of childcare and family care leave for fixed-term workers. It also asks the Government to provide information on any obstacles encountered by fixed-term workers in order to show the probability of continuing to be employed, and the measures taken to remove such obstacles. Please provide up-to-date statistical information, disaggregated by sex, on the number of requests for childcare and family care leave by fixed-term workers, and the number of cases where these entitlements have actually been granted to them.

Article 4. Transfer to remote workplaces. The Committee recalls that section 26 of the Childcare and Family Care Leave Law requires taking into account family responsibilities when reassigning workers to such workplaces which would make it difficult for the worker to assume his or her family responsibilities. The Committee notes that the Guidelines No. 509 of 2009 provide that considerations under section 26 of the Childcare and Family Care Leave Law include: (i) identifying the worker’s situation of childcare or care for family members; (ii) taking into consideration the intentions of the worker concerned; and (iii) confirming the availability of any alternative means to care for a child or a family member in case the reassignment involves a change in his or her place of work (Part II, paragraph 14). The “Guidelines concerning Enlargement of Recruitment and Promotion of Female National Public Service Employees”, adopted in January 2011, also refers to the consideration to be given in making transfer orders for employees who are taking care of their children or family members. The Committee further notes the Government’s indication that in the fiscal year 2010, 13 applications for resolution of disputes filed with the Directors of the prefectural Labour Bureau, and one application filed at the Work–Life Balance Conciliation Conference, related to transfer. The Government indicates that, according to the Employment Status Survey in the fiscal year 2007, 1.2 per cent of workers who left work did so due to transfer, transfer of family members, or relocation of offices, but no further information has been provided concerning the impact of transfer practices. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken to monitor effectively and review transfer practices, including information on the measures taken to supervise the application of section 26 of the Childcare and Family Care Leave Law, and on any specific instances where guidance has been given by the competent authorities to resolve related difficulties. Please also provide statistics on the impact of transfer practices, disaggregated by sex, as well as the results of any survey undertaken in this regard both in the public and private sectors.

Reduction of working hours. The Committee previously noted the importance of the overall reduction of working hours in order to enable men and women with family responsibilities to enter and remain in the labour market, and recalls that paragraph 18 of the Workers with Family Responsibilities Recommendation, 1981 (No. 165), emphasizes the importance of the progressive reduction of daily hours of work and the reduction of overtime. The Committee also recalls the observations of the All Japan Construction, Traffic and Transportation Workers’ Union Tokyo, drawing attention to the excessive working hours of bus drivers which impact on family responsibilities. With regard to the measures taken to promote the reduction of working hours, the Committee notes that the Guidelines concerning improvement of setting working hours (No. 108 of 2008) refer to reconciliation of work and family life. It also notes the Government’s indication that the amendment made to the Labour Standards Law, which became effective on 1 April 2010, and which raised the overtime wage rate, aims at reducing long working hours and realizing a society in which work and family responsibilities are balanced. The legislation concerning working hours of the national and local public employees was also amended effective on 1 April 2010, to raise the overtime wage rate. With regard to the private sector, the Government indicates that the average annual working hours have remained below 1,800 hours since the year 2008 and show a decreasing trend, although the average annual working hours for workers other than part-time workers have remained around 2,000 hours and have not yet been reduced. With regard to the working hours of bus drivers, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that in addition to the “Standards for Improvement of Working hours, etc. for Drivers of Automobiles” which set the limit of working hours, the Labour Standards Inspection Offices have been securing full compliance with working conditions of drivers of automobiles as a major issue, and have been actively identifying problematic bus companies. Judicial action, including possible prosecution of the employers, has been taken in serious or malicious cases of long working hours. The Committee asks the Government to step up its effort to reduce annual working hours, and to provide information on the practical application of the Labour Standards Law and the legislation concerning public employees, with a view to reducing effectively the annual working hours and overtime work of both female and male workers with family responsibilities, including those who engage in the transportation sector. It also asks the Government to provide detailed information on the impact of the Law on Special Measures for the Improvement of Working-Time Arrangements, and the Guidelines No. 108 of 2008 on reconciling work and family responsibilities. Please continue to provide information on the trends in the average number of hours worked by men and women, disaggregated by contractual status, and full-time and part-time workers.

Article 8. Termination of employment. The Committee recalls the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards that the Government should examine whether the current legislation provides an appropriate basis for the prevention of and protection against discrimination on the ground of family responsibilities. The Committee notes that the protection against dismissal or other disadvantageous treatment has been expanded to cover leave for caring for a sick or injured child, family care leave, and persons benefitting from a restriction on overtime work or night work, and from a short working time (sections 16-4, 16-7, 16-9, 18-2, 20-2 and 23-2) and that the Guidelines No. 509 of 2009 further clarify the manner in which these sections of the Childcare and Family Care Leave Law should be interpreted (Part II, paragraph 11). The Committee also notes the observation of the JTUC-RENGO citing the statistics of the Ministry of Health, Labour and Welfare that the number of consultations received by the Ministry concerning dismissals and other disadvantageous treatment for reasons of taking childcare leave was 1,657 in the fiscal year 2009 and 1,543 in the fiscal year 2010. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the practical application of the relevant sections of the Childcare and Family Care Leave Law prohibiting dismissal or otherwise disadvantaged treatment, including information on administrative consultations and judicial decisions relating to these provisions, and their outcome. It also asks the Government to indicate any other measures taken to ensure that the guarantees of Article 8 of the Convention are fully applied in law and practice.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 2001)

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Legislative framework. Work of equal value. The Committee recalls that the Labour Code of 2007 contains provisions that are narrower than the principle of the Convention. The Committee recalls that section 7(1) prohibits sex discrimination in the exercise of labour rights and section 22(15) provides that the employee shall have the right to “equal payment for equal labour without any discrimination”. The Committee notes that the Government replies that there is no discrimination on any grounds, including sex, in the determination of the amount of a worker’s wage, and it considers that the legislation is in compliance with the Convention. The Committee recalls that prohibiting sex discrimination in labour rights, including wages, is not sufficient to give effect to the Convention, as it does not capture the concept of “work of equal value” (General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 676). The Committee notes further that “equal payments for equal labour without discrimination”, is also insufficient, as it also does not capture the concept of work of equal value. The Committee recalls that the concept of “work of equal value” lies at the heart of the fundamental right of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and the promotion of equality. Due to stereotypical attitudes regarding women’s aspirations, preferences and capabilities, certain jobs are held predominantly or exclusively by women and others by men, and often “female” jobs are undervalued in comparison with work of equal value performed by men (General Survey, 2012, paragraph 673). The Committee urges the Government to take concrete steps to amend the Labour Code to give full legislative effect to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, allowing for comparisons not only of similar jobs, but of jobs which are of an entirely different nature. Please provide information in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1999)

Article 1 of the Convention. Prohibition of discrimination. The Committee recalls that section 7(2) of the Labour Code of 2007 covers all prohibited grounds listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, except the ground of colour. It also recalls that section 7(2) includes a number of additional grounds, as envisaged in Article 1(1)(b) of the Convention (such as age, physical disability, tribe and membership in a public association). The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the implementation of section 7(2) of the Labour Code, including information on any activities undertaken to make the legislation known and information on the number, nature and outcome of discrimination cases dealt with by the courts or the labour inspectorate. The Committee again recommends that the prohibited ground of colour is added to section 7(2) of the Labour Code.

Article 2. Exclusion of women from certain occupations. The Committee recalls that the list of jobs for which it is prohibited to engage women and the maximum weights for women to lift and move manually pursuant to section 186(1) and (2) of the Labour Code shall be determined by the state labour authority in agreement with the health authorities. The Committee recalls that protective measures applicable to women’s employment which are based on stereotypes regarding women’s professional abilities and role in society, violate the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women in employment and occupation. Provisions relating to the protection of persons working under hazardous or difficult conditions should be aimed at protecting the health and safety of both men and women at work, while taking account of gender differences with regard to specific risks to their health (General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 840). The Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the list referred to in section 186 of the Labour Code for examination by the Committee, and to indicate how it is ensured that any measures limiting women’s employment are strictly limited to maternity protection.

Equality of men and women in employment and occupation. The Committee recalls that the Law of 2009 on State Guarantees on Equal Rights and Equal Opportunities of Men and Women provide for gender equality in labour relations and in education and training, among others. It also recalls that the objectives of the Strategy for Gender Equality 2006–16 include: (i) achieving equal representation of men and women in the executive and legislative bodies and in decision-making positions; and (ii) developing women's entrepreneurship, and increasing women's competitiveness in the labour market. The Committee again asks the Government to provide full information on the practical application of the Law of 2009 on State Guarantees on Equal Rights and Equal Opportunities of Men and Women, as well as on all the measures taken to implement the Strategy for Gender Equality 2006–16, and on the results achieved, including statistical information disaggregated by sex.

The Committee also recalls that sections 194 and 195 of the Labour Code grant paid leave to adoptive parents and unpaid childcare leave to parents until the child reaches the age of 3, which are available for women and men on an equal footing. However, the Committee also recalls that section 187 of the Labour Code requires written consent of women with children under the age of 7 years and other persons bringing up children under the age of 7 years without a mother in cases of night work, overtime work, business trips or rotation work. Under sections 188 and 189, fathers have the right to child-feeding breaks and to part-time work only in respect of children without a mother. The Committee recalls that when legislation reflects the assumption that the main responsibility for family care lies with women or excludes men from certain rights and benefits, it reinforces and prolongs stereotypes regarding the roles of women and men in the family and in society. The Committee considers that, in order to achieve the objective of the Convention, measures to assist workers with family responsibilities should be available to men and women on an equal footing (General Survey, 2012, paragraph 786). The Committee asks the Government to amend sections 187–189 of the Labour Code, so as to grant the entitlements on an equal footing for women and men. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the extent to which the entitlements under sections 194 and 195 of the Labour Code are being used by men and women.

Practical application. The Committee notes that the Government has adopted the Employment Programme 2020, which seeks to foster employment opportunities and to provide subsidized trainings to self-employed, unemployed and poorer people, as well as to facilitate entrepreneurship in rural areas. It also notes the Government's indication that in order to tackle the financial crisis, it has adopted a package of measures to stimulate the economy, including the regional employment and managerial training strategy. As a result of financing US$2.3 billion to this strategy in 2009 and 2010, 258,600 jobs in 2009 and 132,000 jobs in 2010 were created. In addition, 200,000 persons from targeted groups were placed in temporary, state-subsidized jobs and 150,000 persons received training for new jobs. The Government also indicates that the unemployment rate fell from 6.6 per cent in 2008 to 5.4 per cent in 2011. The Committee further notes that the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD), in its concluding observation of 6 April 2010, noted that, while ethnic groups represented about 36.4 per cent of the population in 2010, more than 84 per cent of public servants as a whole and more than 92 per cent in central government bodies were ethnic Kazakhs; the CERD recommended that the Government takes effective measures with a view to improving the representation of minority groups in state bodies and public services and preventing and combating all forms of discrimination in the selection and recruitment process in the central and local administration (CERD/C/KAZ/CO/4-5, 6 April 2010, paragraph 12). With regard to enforcement, the Committee notes the Government's indication that it has set up a monitoring and social protection committee in the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection and local monitoring and social protection departments in all regions. The Committee asks the Government to provide the following:

- (i) detailed information on the specific measures taken to promote and ensure equality of opportunity and treatment for women and men in employment and occupation, including measures to promote women's access to occupations and employment in areas where they are currently under-represented, including within the civil service;
- (ii) the impact of the measures taken to tackle the financial crisis, including statistical information on the participation of men and women, disaggregated by sex, in the labour market (private and public sectors), branch of economic activity, occupational group and status of employment;
- (iii) information indicating how the principle of gender equality has been integrated into the programmes and measures to promote employment, including in the context of the Employment Programme 2020, including statistical information on the number of women who have benefited from employment promotion measures;
- (iv) statistical information on the position in the labour market of men and women belonging to ethnic or religious minorities, including information on their participation in employment in the civil service, as well as the measures taken to increase the representation of ethnic or religious minorities in the civil service;
- (v) information on the measures taken to plan and implement activities to raise awareness of the principle of equality, in cooperation with workers' and employers' organizations, as envisaged under Article 3(a) and (b) of the Convention; and
- (vi) information on the training provided for law enforcement officials concerning the principle of the Convention.

Republic of Korea

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee notes the Government's report in reply to the request made by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2011. The Committee notes the observations of the Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU) and the observations of the Korea Employers' Federation (KEF), attached to the Government's report, the communication from the Korean Confederation of Trade Unions (KCTU), dated 31 August 2012, and the communication of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) and the KEF, dated 31 August 2012, as well as the Government's replies thereto. The Committee also notes the observations made by Education International (EI) and the Korean Teachers and Education Workers' Union (KTU), dated 31 August 2012, and the Government's reply thereto of 23 October 2012.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Migrant workers. The Committee recalls that the Conference Committee concluded in 2009 that the issue of protecting migrant workers from discrimination and abuse required the Government's continued attention and requested the Government to pursue, and where necessary, to intensify efforts in this regard. It had also called on the Government to review the functioning of the current arrangements for workplace changes, in consultation with workers' and employers' organizations, with a view to determining how best to achieve the objective of reducing migrant workers' vulnerability with regard to abuse and violations of their labour rights.

The Committee notes from the Government's report that changes were made recently to the Act on employment, etc. of foreign workers and the Employment Permit System (EPS). With respect to the possibility for a migrant worker to change workplace, section 25(1) of the Act was amended in 2012, so as to allow such a change in "cases publicly announced by the Minister of Employment and Labour, where it is deemed difficult to work in the workplace considering social norms, due to a reason not attributable to the worker, such as temporary shutdown, business closure, cancellation of the employment permit, restrictions on employment and violations of working conditions or unfair treatment by the employer" (new section 25(1)(2)). The Committee recalls that under the EPS, a worker is permitted to change workplaces a maximum of three times, unless the change is due to "a reason not attributable to the foreign worker". Pursuant to the amendment to section 25, a change of workplace due to "unfair treatment by the employer" is now considered as a change for "a reason not attributable to the worker" and therefore is not included as one of the three permitted changes under the EPS. In addition, the Ministry of Employment and Labour issued a Notification (No. 2012-52) according to which "unfair treatment" covers "unreasonable discrimination by the employer, etc. on the grounds of his/her nationality, religion, gender, physical disability, and so on".

The Committee notes that, according to the IOE, which reflects the position of the KEF, the right of the foreign worker to stay in Korea arises from the labour contract signed between the worker and his or her employer and in principle he or she should continue to work in the workplace where permission for employment was first obtained. The IOE considers, therefore, that the limitation on the number of workplace changes is not a violation of foreign workers' rights. According to the IOE, foreign workers should receive pre-employment training in the sending country and should be made aware of the Korean labour legislation and the system of grievances. The Committee notes from the observations of the KCTU that despite the amendment to section 25(1), it is very difficult for migrant workers to apply for a change of workplace in practice when they face unfair treatment, discrimination or even serious violations of their human and labour rights for a number of reasons: the burden of proof on the worker; language difficulties and the absence of legal support; the lack of appropriate criteria when the request for change is examined by the job centre; and the obligation for the worker to continue to work at the same workplace during the period of the investigation (up to one month). The Government indicates that a foreign worker can file a complaint with a labour inspector or the police and request a change of workplace on the basis of the results of the investigation. In addition, when it is "objectively recognized" that a foreign worker suffers discrimination, he or she may request immediately a change of workplace and therefore does not have to continue to work in the workplace while awaiting the results of the investigation. The Government also states that the Ministry of Employment and Labour provides interpreters and has set up 60 job centres, 34 support centres for foreign workers and one call centre to provide counselling and support with regard to grievances and labour law issues.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that 94.7 per cent of foreign workers who applied for a change of workplace succeeded in transferring to another workplace within the three-month permitted period in 2011 (compared to 96.7 per cent in 2010), that the main reason for a change of workplace was termination of or refusal to renew the labour contract (85.6 per cent), and that violation of the employment contract was invoked only in 0.13 per cent of the cases during the period 2010–11. The Committee notes that the KCTU considers that these statistics are not reliable, because workers must obtain permission from their employer to request a change of workplace, and they are forced, or sometimes advised by the Ministry, to change the reason invoked in the middle of the procedure for fear of rejection of their case. The Committee notes the Government's explanation that a confirmation from the employer is only required when the reason invoked is termination of employment. The Committee notes from the KCTU's observations that in August 2012 a new government policy entitled "Measures for Improvement in Foreign Workers' Change of Workplace and Prevention of Broker Intervention" ended the practice of providing migrant workers with a list of companies offering jobs, and introduced a system operated by job centres, whereby employers are provided with a list of migrant workers seeking employment, thereby limiting their ability to choose their employer.

With respect to the possibility of being re-employed, the Committee recalls that migrant workers who have entered Korea under the EPS can be employed up to four years and ten months and then should go back to their country. The Committee notes the Government's indication that since July 2012, foreign workers in small businesses (50 workers or less) in the agricultural, livestock and fisheries industries and manufacturing businesses, who have worked "faithfully in the same workplace for four years and ten months without transferring to another workplace" are entitled to re-enter and be re-employed in Korea after a period of three months outside of the country. The Government also indicates that foreign workers who have transferred to another workplace during their employment period may re-enter and work again in Korea after a period of six months outside of the country "through the special Korean language test system". The Committee notes that the KCTU points out that, given that most migrant workers want to work in Korea longer, in practice, this system prevents them from requesting a change of workplace and escaping poor working conditions in order to be able to return to Korea.

The Committee notes from the Government's report the high number of violations found in the 2,241 workplaces employing foreign workers that were inspected in 2011 (7,994 violations, of which 1,768 concerned wages and other working conditions, including gender discrimination). It further notes that fines were imposed in only 74 cases and only six cases resulted in prosecutions. With respect to complaints lodged by migrant workers, the Committee notes that, according to the information provided by the Government, most of the complaints relating to discrimination brought before the National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) were rejected or dismissed.

While noting the changes in the legislation regarding the EPS, the Committee asks the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that in practice the EPS, including the "re-entry and re-employment system", allows for appropriate flexibility for migrant workers to change their workplaces so as to avoid situations in which they become vulnerable to abuse and discrimination on the grounds set out in the Convention, and to report on the measures taken. The Committee also asks the Government to ensure that measures are taken to provide migrant workers with adequate access to procedures and remedies in case of discrimination and to ensure that appropriate sanctions are applied. In this respect, the Committee requests the Government to provide clarification on the following points:

- (i) the definition of the expression "unreasonable discrimination" used in Notification No. 2012-52 as well as the grounds of discrimination covered; and
- (ii) how, and by which authority, is it "objectively recognized" that a foreign worker suffers discrimination and therefore does not have to wait for the outcome of the investigation on his or her request for a change of workplace to leave to employer.

The Committee also asks the Government to take measures to raise awareness among workers and employers of the new provisions in the Act on employment, etc. of foreign workers, in particular the new rules concerning changes of workplace, as well as of the anti-discrimination legal provisions in force and the relevant procedures available, including with respect to sexual harassment. Please continue to provide information on the inspection of workplaces employing migrant workers (number of enterprises inspected and workers covered, number and nature of violations detected, and remedies provided), as well as the number, content and outcome of complaints brought by migrant workers before labour inspectors, the police, the courts and the NHRC.

Discrimination on the basis of sex and employment status. The Committee recalls that the Conference Committee requested information concerning the difficulties encountered with the enforcement of the Act on the protection, etc. of fixed-term and part-time employees, which prohibits discriminatory treatment of these workers based on their employment status. The Conference Committee also requested information on whether trade unions were authorized to bring complaints on behalf of victims of such discrimination, and called on the Government, in consultation with the workers' and employers' organizations, to improve the legislative protection against discrimination based on employment status, which disproportionately affected women. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, as of March 2012, there were 5,809,000 non-regular workers (contingent, part-time and atypical workers), representing 33.3 per cent of all wage earners (47.8 per cent according to the KCTU which alleges that a large number of persons in "special types of employment" are excluded from the Government's statistics) of which 53.7 per cent are women. The Committee further notes from the statistics provided by the Government that the hourly gross wage of female non-regular workers (i.e. the majority of female workers) represents only 42 per cent of the hourly gross wage of male regular workers. According to the KCTU, which continues to express concern regarding the discrepancies between regular and non-regular workers, there is no indication of any improvement of the situation of non-regular workers. The KCTU is also of the view that fixed term contract workers are excessively used, and that the recruitment of such workers should only be permitted in certain cases. The Committee also notes the observations made by the FKTU according to which, despite legislative protection, in practice women on fixed-term contracts often face disadvantages and even dismissal, due to pregnancy, childbirth, and childcare. The FKTU points to the high concentration of women workers in precarious employment and reports an increase in cases of sexual harassment as well as cases of verbal abuse and disrespect against "indirectly employed" workers. According to the IOE, after the introduction of the Act on the Protection, etc. of Fixed-term and Part-time Employees in 2007, a significant improvement of the situation with regard to discrimination was reported by many companies. In addition, the IOE states that there have been many criticisms regarding the scope of the protection against discrimination. The IOE considers that prohibiting discrimination related to wages and working conditions is appropriate, but not other aspects such as welfare and other advantages and, in the case of subcontracting, it is not reasonable to apply the same conditions of work to workers hired by different companies.

The Government indicates that a set of measures was adopted in 2011 with a view to “removing irrational discrimination against non-regular workers and reinforcing the social safety net for vulnerable workers”. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that it took measures aimed at converting non-regular employment into regular employment by expanding vocational training, converting public sector non-regular workers into workers with open-ended contracts, and obliging the employer to directly and immediately employ dispatched workers in case of illegal dispatch.

The Committee notes that as pointed out by the KCTU, the number of cases of discrimination brought before the Labour Relations Commission significantly decreased in 2011 (46 compared to 194 in 2010) and half of them were dismissed, rejected or withdrawn. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that the new measures also include an increase of the time limit for filing a complaint to seek redress from discrimination from three to six months as well as new advisory and supervision powers granted to labour inspectors to address discrimination against fixed-term, part-time and dispatched workers. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that trade unions cannot be given the right to file complaints on behalf of workers because they are neither a party whose rights are infringed as a result of discriminatory treatment nor a party who gains benefit from redressing discrimination. The Government however points out that according to section 36 of the Labour Relations Commission Regulations, a trade union may act on behalf of others with the approval of the chairperson of the Commission. The Committee notes that, according to the KCTU, under this procedure, the burden of filing a complaint remaining on the worker still requires the worker to first file a complaint and then an assignment is made to the trade union. The Committee recalls the importance of allowing trade unions to bring complaints as it reduces the risk of reprisals and is also likely to serve as a deterrent to discriminatory action, particularly in the context of non-regular employment.

The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary measures, including through the qualitative and quantitative strengthening of enforcement, to protect fixed-term, part-time and dispatched workers against discrimination, particularly women, and to provide information on the impact on precarious employment of the set of measures taken in 2011, including measures with a view to converting non-regular employment into regular employment and measures for the protection of subcontracted workers. Please indicate specifically the results of such measures on the employment of women as regular workers. Considering the particular vulnerability of non-regular workers to discrimination, the Committee asks once again the Government to consider taking steps to allow trade union representation with respect to complaints on behalf of fixed-term, part-time and dispatched workers under the existing anti-discrimination legislation, and to provide detailed information on whether and to what extent the procedure under section 36 of the Labour Relations Commission Regulations has been successfully used for trade union representation. It also asks the Government to provide information on the effect of the measures taken to increase time limits for filing a discrimination complaint on the number of complaints brought before the Labour Relations Commission and the results thereof. The Committee asks the Government to provide specific information on the advisory and supervisory activities of labour inspectors concerning discrimination against non-regular workers, including the number of workplaces inspected and male and female workers covered, the number and nature of the violations identified and the remedies provided and sanctions imposed.

Equality of opportunity and treatment of women and men. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Conference Committee had called on the Government to step up its efforts and to seek cooperation with the employers’ and workers’ organizations, to increase the low level of women’s participation in the labour market and reduce the gender pay gap. The Committee notes the detailed statistical information provided by the Government on the situation of men and women in workplaces subject to the affirmative action scheme (i.e. private enterprises with 500 employees or more and public institutions with 50 employees or more), which shows a very slow increase in the percentage of women workers and women managers employed in both the private and the public sectors from 2009 and 2011 (respectively 34.87 per cent in 2011 compared to 34 per cent in 2009 and 16.09 per cent in 2011 compared to 14.13 per cent in 2009). The participation of women in the labour force has been stable, around 54 per cent, in the past years. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the low rate of women’s participation in the labour market is mainly attributable to their unsuccessful return to work after a career break. In August 2012, measures were taken with a view to reconciling work and family life, such as reduced working hours for childcare and a family care leave system, through the amendment of the Act on Equal Employment and Support for Work-Family Reconciliation. The Committee notes that the IOE expressed concern at the potential negative effect of measures to promote the employment of women, such as the family care leave, on the recruitment of women workers. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that support would be provided to small enterprises to assist them with the replacement of workers.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that honorary equal employment inspectors appointed by and in enterprises ensure that these enterprises voluntarily address gender discrimination and sexual harassment issues. Local and employment offices provide the honorary equal employment inspectors with training, have set up local consultative bodies to this end and have created a pool of instructors to provide training on measures to prevent sexual harassment in workplaces. In 2012, the Government developed administrative guidelines on the cooperation between local employment and labour offices and equal employment counselling centres regarding remedies to be provided to women who are victims of gender discrimination. The Committee also notes the FKTU's indication that unions and women's organizations have conducted counselling services on discrimination, sexual harassment at work and reconciliation of work and family responsibilities. The organization also states that expertise in gender discrimination and gender sensitivity of labour inspectors has significantly decreased and this has made it difficult to collaborate on these issues. As far as collaboration is concerned, the Government further indicates that it holds regularly a women employment policy forum, in which workers' and employers' organizations and experts on women's policy participate, and that an expert advisory council in which workers' and employers' organizations and experts also participate, examines the functioning of the affirmative action scheme in order to improve it. The Committee notes from the observations of the FKTU that a significant number of workplaces have not implemented the affirmative action scheme, due to the low level of awareness among employers, and that the scheme should be provided with adequate budget and expertise. The Committee asks the Government to continue to take steps, in consultation with workers' and employers' organizations, to promote the access of women to employment both in the public and the private sector, in particular to a wide range of jobs and to take measures to address the underlying causes of gender discrimination, such as gender stereotypes on the role and the aspirations of women in employment and in society. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the results achieved in terms of employment of women through the implementation of the affirmative action scheme and the improvements thereof. It also asks the Government to provide information on the concrete activities conducted by honorary equal employment inspectors in enterprises and equal employment counselling centres in the field on gender equality and non-discrimination. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the reduction of working hours for childcare and the family leave care, indicating the proportion of men and women who have used this possibility, as well as information on any assessment made or envisaged of its impact on equality of opportunities between men and women in employment and occupation. Please provide a copy of the Act on Equal Employment and Support for Work-Family Reconciliation, as amended.

Discrimination based on political opinion. The Committee notes that EI and the KTU allege discrimination based on political opinion against pre-school, primary and secondary teachers. The KTU states that in May 2010, the Government announced that it would dismiss 183 teachers because they had made donations to the Democratic Labour Party (DLP) and therefore had joined the DLP illicitly, in violation of their obligation of political neutrality under the Korean Civil Servants Law. The KTU indicates that as of August 2012, eight teachers were dismissed, 21 were suspended and many were fined, and legal proceedings are still ongoing. The organization points out that only those teachers in primary and secondary schools are banned from joining a political party, participating in any political activities, and donating money to a political party under Korean Law. The Committee also notes that the KTU indicates that in June 2009, 17,147 teachers signed a statement requesting the withdrawal of education policies designed to create fierce competition among students at the expense of quality education for all. The KTU issued in July 2009 a second statement entitled "Teachers' statement for the freedom of expression and protection of democracy" which was endorsed by 28,637 teachers. The Government filed a complaint against 89 KTU activists and initiated disciplinary procedures against them, and dismissed 15 KTU chapter heads and suspended 45 union staff members. The KTU indicates that the dismissed teachers have been reinstated by the courts' decisions but that they took the case to the Supreme Court. In a ruling dated 19 April 2012, the Supreme Court decided that the teachers' petition campaign was illegal since public servants should maintain political neutrality and that the political expression of teachers was against the public good and in violation of the Public Servant Act.

In its reply, the Government indicates that teachers, who are state public officials, are prohibited from engaging in political activities by law (State Public Officials Act) and that as an exception, university teachers are allowed to engage in political activities as party members. The Committee notes the explanations from the Government that this is due to a difference between the duties of elementary, middle and high school teachers and the duties of university teachers, the former being responsible for educating students as prescribed by law and the latter combining academic research and activities of teaching. The Government indicates that the Constitutional Court took a similar position. It further states that the Constitution and the law impose a duty of political impartiality on teachers, as state public officials, ban their involvement in political activities, and prohibit them from taking collective action for matters that are not their official duties. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that, in the Court's ruling on the case relating to the KTU's statements, the issuance of statements and the gathering of signatures on such statements was an act of clearly manifesting a political bias or partisan views therefore incurring the direct risk of infringing political impartiality of teachers who are public officials.

The Committee recalls that the protection against discrimination on the basis of political opinion implies protection in respect of the activities of expressing or demonstrating opposition to established political principles and opinions and also covers discrimination based on political affiliation. The protection of political opinion applies to opinions which are either expressed or demonstrated, but does not apply where violent methods are used (General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 805). The Committee also recalls that the protection of freedom of expression is aimed not merely at the individual's intellectual satisfaction at being able to speak his or her mind, but rather – and especially as regards the expression of political opinions – at giving him or her an opportunity to influence decisions in the political, economic and social life of the society. For political views to have an impact, the individual generally acts in conjunction with others (General Survey on Equality in Employment and Occupation of 1988, paragraph 57). The Committee also considers that political opinion may in certain circumstances constitute a bona fide qualification for certain senior posts which are directly concerned with developing government policy; however this is not the case when conditions of a political nature are laid down for public employment in general, or for certain other professions. In order to come within the scope of the exception provided for in Article 1(2) of the Convention, the criteria used must correspond in a concrete and objective way to the inherent requirements of a particular job (General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 831). The Committee requests the Government to take measures to ensure that elementary, primary and secondary school teachers enjoy protection against discrimination based on political opinion and requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this respect.

Mexico

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes the observations of 30 August 2011 of the National Union of Workers (UNT) and those of 16 September 2011 from the Revolutionary Confederation of Workers and Agricultural Labourers (CROC) and the “Vanguardia Obrera” Federation of Workers (FTVO).

With regard to the UNT’s comments, the Committee notes that they refer to the difficult working conditions faced by women in domestic work which is characterized by excessively long working hours, the absence of contracts, the lack of social security coverage, pay lower than the statutory minimum, and moral and sexual harassment. The UNT stresses the need for these women to be covered by the Federal Labour Act and the Social Security Act. The Committee notes that the Government has not sent comments on these matters. The Committee notes that, based on the UNT’s comments, it appears that most of the workers affected are women, and recalls that all workers, without discrimination based on sex, must enjoy equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation. The Committee also draws the Government’s attention to the recently adopted Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure adequate protection against discrimination of women domestic workers.

With regard to the observations of the CROC and the FTVO, the Committee notes that they refer to the application of the Convention in general and report a lack of any clear policy to combat discrimination, the absence of any training programmes for women about their fundamental rights and the lack of appropriate sanctions for acts of discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on these observations, and it will examine these issues and the other pending issues together with the next report due from the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1969)

Article 1 of the Convention. Legislative developments. The Committee recalls the adoption on 2 February 2011 of the Law on the Promotion of Gender Equality. The Committee notes with interest a range of provisions relevant to the Convention. The Law defines and prohibits direct and indirect gender discrimination (section 4.1), including in employment and labour relations (section 11.1), in being employed in civil service (section 10.1), and in education and professional training (section 12.1). The Law also provides for equal access of men and women on equal terms to land and other immovable and movable properties, budget allocations, financial assets, credit, other economic wealth and resources (section 9.2). An employer is obliged to prevent gender discrimination in employment policies and labour relations and to ensure gender equality at the workplace, including through implementing activities based on a plan, refraining from listing preferences of one sex in job vacancies, and providing professional training opportunities for employees returning from absence due to childbirth and childcare (section 11.3). The Committee also notes that the Law establishes the National Committee on Gender (section 18), which has a broad mandate, including to coordinate and organize activities on the formulation, implementation and monitoring of gender policies, programmes and special measures; to review and to issue recommendations on the implementation of legislation, policies, programmes and recommendations made by the international organizations concerning the promotion of gender equality; and to coordinate the establishment of a gender database and an integrated information network. In addition, the Government is obliged to ensure the availability and accessibility of sex disaggregated statistical data (section 5.1.5). Complaints of violations of the Law can be brought before the National Human Rights Commission by persons who consider that they have been discriminated against, as well as trade unions and non-governmental organizations (sections 23.1 and 23.2), and if the ground of complaint is established as related to labour contracts or collective agreements, the case shall be resolved under the labour dispute resolution process (section 24.2). The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the practical application of the Law on the Promotion of Gender Equality, including the activities carried out by the National Committee on Gender and the number and nature of complaints examined and the outcome thereof, as well as details regarding any proceedings brought before the National Human Rights Commission and the labour dispute resolution process. The Committee also asks the Government to indicate any practical impact of section 11.3 of the Law on preventing discriminatory job advertisements.

Exclusion of women from certain occupations. The Committee recalls its previous comments concerning the exclusion of women from a wide range of occupations under section 101.1 of the Labour Law of 1999 and Order No. A/204 of 1999. The Committee notes the Government's indication that section 8(b) of the list under the Order of 1999, which prohibits women from driving a vehicle weighing more than 2.5 tons, is being restated because the State Professional Inspection Agency affirmed that a modern heavy load truck is not harmful for women's health. The Committee once again recalls that protective measures applicable to women's employment which are based on stereotypes regarding women's professional abilities and role in society, violate the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women in employment and occupation (General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 840). The Committee urges the Government to ensure that protective measures are strictly limited to protecting maternity and that those measures aimed at protecting women because of their sex or gender based on stereotyped assumptions, in accordance with section 101.1 of the Labour law and Order No. A/204 of 1999 are repealed. Please provide information on the steps taken in this regard, including the status of section 8(b) of the list under the Order No. A/204 of 1999.

Inherent requirements. The Committee notes that section 6.5.6 of the Law on the Promotion of Gender Equality allows recruitment of a person of particular sex in accordance with section 101 of the Labour Law, or "based on a specific nature of some workplaces such as in preschool education institutions". It also notes that sections 6.5.1 and 6.5.2 of the Law allows provisions of separate educational services or workplace facilities for men and women, whose scope seems to be too broad as constituting exceptions to gender discrimination. Recalling that the concept of inherent requirements of a particular job must be interpreted restrictively so as to avoid undue limitation of the protection provided by the Convention, the Committee asks the Government to take steps to review and revise section 6.5.6 of the Law on the Promotion of Gender Equality. It also asks the Government to indicate how it is ensured that provisions of separate educational services or workplace facilities for men and women under sections 6.5.1 and 6.5.2 of the Law do not in practice deprive men and women of equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of their employment.

Workers with family responsibilities. The Committee recalls section 100 of the Labour Law, which limits protection against dismissal on grounds of care for a child under 3 years of age only to mothers and single fathers. The Committee notes that the Law on the Promotion of Gender Equality prohibits preferential treatment in employment or dismissal based on sex, pregnancy, child caretaking roles or family status (section 11.1), and that incorporation in collective agreements of provisions on the creation of conditions and opportunities for men and women to combine their work and family responsibilities is required (section 11.2). The Committee asks the Government to provide information on whether any steps have been taken or envisaged to amend section 100 of the Labour Law, with a view to aligning it with the provisions of the Law on the Promotion of Gender Equality. It also asks the Government to provide information on the practical application of sections 11.1 and 11.2 of the Law on the Promotion of Gender Equality, including the number and nature of discrimination cases handled by the courts or the National Human Rights Commission, on grounds of family responsibilities. Please further provide any examples of collective agreements incorporating provisions aimed at the creation of conditions and opportunities for men and women to combine their work and family responsibilities.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1967)

Article 2 of the Convention. Application of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value. In its previous comments the Committee took note of observations of the Trade Union Unification Confederation (CUS) according to which the Ministry of Labour does not monitor compliance with the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value and, further, in the health sector women doctors are paid less than their male colleagues. The Committee notes that in its reply, the Government states that the Ministry of Labour fulfils its obligation to oversee women's rights in accordance with the provision of the law that "men and women shall receive equal remuneration for equal work when their conditions of work are the same". The Government refers to Wage Regulation Decree No. 19-2007, which regulates the remuneration of public servants of both sexes, on the basis of job complexity, and Act No. 648 on Equal Rights and Opportunities, which lays down the principle of equal pay for equal work in keeping with work experience, academic qualification, level of responsibility and responsibility of the position. The Committee nonetheless points out that in its previous comments it noted that the Regulation to the Act on Equal Rights and Opportunities (Decree No. 29-2010 of 28 June 2010), which applies to the public and the private sectors, refers to the principle of equal pay for work of equal value (section 2) and to equal pay for work of equal value and equality of conditions (section 18). In those comments the Committee asked the Government to provide information on the manner in which the principle was applied in practice. The Committee points out in this connection that the concept of "work of equal value" lies at the heart of the fundamental right of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and the promotion of equality. The principle of the Convention goes beyond equal remuneration for equal work or work done in the same conditions since it also encompasses jobs that are of an entirely different nature, but that are nevertheless of equal value (see General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 673). The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the principle of the Convention is applied fully in practice, and to provide information on the implementation and practical effects of the Regulation to the Act on Equal Rights and Opportunities, particularly sections 2 and 18. The Committee will examine this matter and the other issues raised in its previous direct request together with the Government's regular report due in 2014.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1967)

Discrimination on political grounds. The Committee took note in its previous comments of an observation of the Trade Union Unification Confederation (CUS) reporting that 21,000 public sector workers had been dismissed because they were not members or did not share the ideology of the present Government and that 128 trade unions had ceased to exist. The Committee notes in this connection that according to the Government, the organization has not backed up its assertions with information such as the number of persons dismissed, the state institutions from which they were dismissed or the names of the trade unions disbanded. The Committee observes that these allegations are serious and warrant the Government's full attention. In view of the seriousness of the allegations, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to initiate an investigation to examine these allegations, and to take steps to overcome any discrimination. It also asks the Government to report any developments in this regard. The Committee also asks the CUS to provide the Government with further details about the reported dismissals, including the names of the workers dismissed and the state institutions concerned, to enable the Government to conduct its investigation promptly.

Nigeria

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 2002)

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Discrimination based on sex with regard to employment in the police force. The Committee previously noted that sections 118–128 of the Nigeria Police Regulations, which provide special recruitment requirements and conditions of service applying to women, are discriminatory on the basis of sex and thus incompatible with the Convention. Accordingly, the Committee urged the Government to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee had noted that the criteria and provisions relating to pregnancy and marital status contained in sections 118, 124 and 127 constitute direct discrimination, and sections 121, 122 and 123 are likely to go beyond what is permitted under Article 1(2) of the Convention. The Committee also noted that legal provisions establishing common height for admission to the police are likely to constitute indirect discrimination against women. The Committee recalls that women should have the right to pursue freely any job or profession and the Committee points out that exclusions or preferences in respect of a particular job in the context of Article 1(2) of the Convention, should be determined objectively without reliance on stereotypes and negative prejudices about men's and women's roles (General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 788). Recalling that each Member for which this Convention is in force, in accordance with Article 3(c), is under the obligation to repeal any statutory provisions which are contrary to equality of opportunity and treatment, the Committee once again urges the Government to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention, and to indicate the measures taken to this end. The Committee trusts that the Government, in collaboration with workers' and employers' organizations, will take the necessary measures to ensure equality of opportunity and treatment of women in the police force.

Panama

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1958)

Article 1 of the Convention. Work of equal value. In its previous comments the Committee referred to the need to amend section 10 of the Labour Code, which is limited to the payment of equal wages "for equal work in the service of the same employer, performed in the same job, working day, conditions of efficiency and seniority", so as to give legislative expression to the principle established by the Convention of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. The Committee takes note of the Government's statement that it is considering the possibility of setting up a tripartite Higher Labour Council to regulate social dialogue and of creating an institutional forum for the promotion of consensus. The Government states that it may consider amending the Labour Code along those lines. The Committee asks the Government to continue providing information on the creation of a Higher Labour Council and on any decision the Council might take on amending the Labour Code so as to give legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, as well as on any other progress in this area. The Committee also asks the Government to take steps to promote a better understanding of the principle embodied in the Convention among the authorities and among employers, workers and their organizations.

Equal remuneration. In its previous observation the Committee took note of the observations of the National Federation of Public Employees and Public Service Enterprise Workers (FENASEP) on the violation of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value in the public sector and the fact that no wage rates had been fixed without discrimination based on sex. The Committee notes the Government's indication that all public servants earning the minimum wage, without distinction, have been granted a wage increase and that steps are under way to introduce a system for assessing effort and performance. It also states that the National Vocational and Development Training Institute (INAMU), established under Act No. 71 of 23 December 2009, is working on a public equal opportunities policy that will contain guidelines for incorporating women in development and equalizing the remuneration of men and women. The Committee notes the Government's statement regarding the steps taken by the National Vocational and Human Development Training Institute (INADEH) to train women in non-traditional activities. The Government attaches detailed statistics on the remuneration of men and women in the public and private sectors. The Committee observes, however, that it is not possible to assess the evolution of the gender pay gap from the statistics provided by the Government. The Committee notes that there is still extensive occupational segregation (55,167 men and 15,484 women in the manufacturing sector, 100,180 men and 3,802 women in construction, 23,865 men and 52,404 women in teaching) and that most women are employed in lower paid jobs and in a lower wage range. As to the wage gap, 0.5 per cent of men and 1 per cent of women in the teaching sector earn less than 100 balboas, while 2.9 per cent of men and 0.7 per cent of women earn 3,000 balboas or more. The Committee asks the Government to continue taking concrete steps with regard to education and vocational training so as to broaden women's employment opportunities, reduce the marked occupational segregation in the labour market and reduce the gender pay gap. The Committee specifically asks the Government to provide information on the measures adopted by INAMU and INADEH on the subject. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on any developments in this area, as well as up-to-date statistics disaggregated by sex showing the evolution of the gender pay gap in the public and private sectors.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1966)

Discrimination based on political opinion. Administrative careers. In its previous comments the Committee noted the observations of the National Federation of Public Employees and Public Service Enterprise Workers (FENASEP) concerning the risk of the dismissal of public servants on the ground of their political opinions. The Committee also asked the Government to provide information on the interpretation and application in practice of the requirement of "loyalty" which has to be demonstrated by public employees covered by administrative careers to enjoy stability, as envisaged in section 136 of Act No. 9 of 1994 (as amended by Acts Nos 24 of July 2007 and 14 of 2008) and in section 5 of Executive Decree No. 44 of 11 April 2008. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that no public servant has been dismissed on the ground of their political opinions. The Committee observes however that the Government has not provided the specific information that it requested in its previous observation. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which it is ensured that public servants are not subject to discrimination on the ground of their political opinions, especially in election periods, the manner in which the requirement of "loyalty" of public servants envisaged in sections 136 of Act No. 9 of 1994 and 5 of Executive Decree No. 44 is interpreted, and on whether there have been any court decisions on this subject. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the percentage of public servants who have been integrated into the administrative career system through the special entry procedure set out in section 67 of Act No. 9 of 1994.

Discrimination based on sex. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged in the context of its equality policy to ensure that pregnant women or women on maternity leave who work on temporary contracts are not subject to discrimination. The Committee notes the Government's repeated indication that the protection against dismissal of pregnant women and those on maternity leave covers women with contracts without limit of time, but that it has not provided information on the protection afforded in the case of temporary contracts. The Committee recalls that the Convention applies to all women workers, irrespective of the type of contract and their status as being pregnant or mothers, and it draws the Government's attention to paragraph 784 of its General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that women are not subject to discrimination based on pregnancy or maternity, particularly with regard to their access to and security of employment. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged in the context of its equality policy to ensure that women with temporary contracts do not find themselves in situations in which they are more vulnerable to discrimination based on pregnancy or maternity.

Access to education of women from groups vulnerable to discrimination. The Committee notes the concluding observations of the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW), which refer to the large number of girls who drop out of school due to early pregnancies, despite Act No. 29 of 2002, which provides for the continuation of education in such cases, and the high level of illiteracy found among women from rural areas and indigenous women (CEDAW/C/PAN/CO/7 of 5 February 2010, paragraphs 34–37). The Committee emphasizes the importance of providing vocational guidance and taking active measures to promote access to education and training, free from considerations based on stereotypes or prejudices, with a view to broadening the range of occupations from which men and women are able to choose (General Survey, 2012, paragraph 750). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to guarantee the access to education of women from groups vulnerable to discrimination, and particularly women in rural areas, indigenous women and pregnant girls. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Peru

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1970)

The Committee notes the observations received on 3 October 2011 of the Confederation of Workers of Peru (CTP), the Single Confederation of Workers of Peru (CUT), the National Federation of Municipal Workers of Peru (FENAOMP), the Regional Federation of Health Workers – Lima Callao and Lima Provinces Region (FERSALUD), the Federation of Education Sector Administrative Workers of Peru (FETRASEP), the National Federation of Hotel and Allied Workers of Peru (FNTHRSP), the Union of Ministry of Agriculture Employees (SITAMA), the Single Union of Employees of the National Institute for Children (SUTINSN), the Single Union of the Ministry of Health Central Administration (SUTAC MINSA), the Single Union of Administrative Employees of Education Institutions (SUTAIE UGEL 05), the Single Union of Telefónica del Perú Workers (SUTTP), the National Union of Public Employees of the Airforce of Peru (SINEPFAP), the Union of Pueblo Libre Municipal Workers (SINDOBREMUN) and the Single Union of Rímac Municipal Workers (SUTRAOM Rímac). The Committee notes that these organizations state that according to a report by the labour inspectorate most of the complaints that were filed by women in 2009 and gave rise to workplace visits by the labour inspectorate are obstructed by employers. They further indicate that the labour inspectorate does not publish in sufficient detail the results of measures to combat discrimination since the information is not disaggregated by sex, and does not indicate whether the inspection visits were scheduled or conducted further to complaints. The observations also refer to complaints filed with the Ombudsman's office in connection with disciplinary investigations and the exclusion of pregnant women from the federal police and armed forces training institutes, and limitations on access to employment on the basis of age. The organizations further object that there is no body responsible for monitoring compliance with labour standards in the public sector, asserting that the labour inspectorate has jurisdiction only in the private sector, that there are no policies on the prevention of sexual harassment and that it is unclear where authority lies for hearing sexual harassment complaints. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these comments. It asks it to indicate in particular:

- (i) what measures are taken against employers who obstruct labour inspectors in their work;*
- (ii) which authority has competence for addressing complaints of discrimination filed by public sector employees;*
- (iii) what specific measures have been adopted for the prevention of sexual harassment in the workplace; and*
- (iv) which authority has competence to address complaints of sexual harassment.*

In its previous observation the Committee also referred to the need to provide information on the practical application and the effects of the Act to promote the competitiveness, formalization and development of micro and small enterprises and access to decent work (Legislative Decree No. 1086); the Act to approve standards for the promotion of the agricultural sector (Act No. 27360); the Act to establish the new administrative services contract (Legislative Decree No. 1057) and the Domestic Workers Act (No. 27986). The Committee also asked the Government: (i) to provide information on the implementation and results of the system to follow up and monitor the National Equal Opportunities Plan, on gender-based indicators and on reports produced by the Ministry of the Interior's Observatory for Equal Opportunities between Woman and Men; (ii) to report on the implementation of the national and regional equal opportunities plans and their practical effects on the public sector and the private sector; (iii) to reply to the comments of the Lima Chamber of Commerce (CCL); and (iv) to continue to take the necessary steps to increase women's participation in employment in the public sector and the private sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its regular report on the issues raised in the observation and direct request of 2010.

Russian Federation

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1961)

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 99th Session, June 2010). The Committee recalls the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2010. In its conclusions, the Conference Committee raised concerns regarding Resolution No. 162 of 25 February 2000, which excludes women from being employed in 456 occupations and 38 branches of industry, and section 253 of the Labour Code, which provides that the employment of women in arduous work and work in harmful or dangerous conditions shall be limited. The Conference Committee urged the Government to take steps to revise section 253 of the Labour Code and Resolution No. 162 to ensure that any limitations on the work that can be undertaken by women are not based on stereotyped perceptions regarding their capacity and role in society and are strictly limited to measures to protect maternity, and asked the Government to take measures to address the legal and practical barriers to women's access to the broadest possible range of sectors and industries, as well as at all levels of responsibility. It also urged the Government to take measures, through tripartite consultation, to ensure non-discrimination and promote equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation for all groups protected under the Convention, including ethnic minorities. It specified that such measures should include strengthening the legal framework, including ensuring that the legal framework addresses direct and indirect discrimination, the burden of proof, provides for effective remedies, and that there are mechanisms to promote, analyse and monitor equality of opportunity and treatment.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Legislative framework. Noting that the Government provides no information on strengthening the legislative framework, the Committee asks the Government to provide specific information on any measures taken or envisaged to ensure protection against both direct and indirect discrimination, effective remedies, to address the burden of proof, and to strengthen or establish mechanisms for promotion, analysis and monitoring of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation for all groups covered under the Convention, including ethnic minorities. Recalling the Government's previous indication that a draft federal law on state guarantees of equal rights and freedoms and equal opportunities for men and women had been adopted by the State Duma in a first reading, the Committee asks the Government to provide updated information on the status of the process of adoption of the law.

Articles 2 and 5. Gender equality and special measures of protection. The Committee welcomes the Government's indication that, as a result of the consultations among the Ministry of Health and Social Development and the social partners, it was decided that Resolution No. 162 would be amended. It also notes that the Government repeats that employers may assign to women work that is included in the list, provided the employer creates safe working conditions, which are certified as safe by the competent state authorities. The Government also indicates that 456 occupations and 38 branches of industry constitute only 2 per cent of all types of economic activities; therefore, according to the Government, the list cannot be considered discriminatory. The Government adds that work is under way to introduce a system of occupational risk management, with the cooperation of the social partners, at each workplace. The Committee again reminds the Government that protective measures applicable to women's employment, which are based on stereotypes regarding women's professional abilities and role in society, violate the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women in employment and occupation. Provisions regarding the protection of persons working under hazardous or difficult conditions should be aimed at protecting the health and safety of both men and women at work, while taking account of gender differences with regard to specific risks to their health (General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 840). It also recalls that the Conference Committee asked the Government to ensure that the planned review of the system of health and safety protection addressed the needs of both men and women, and would not lead to measures hindering women's participation in the labour market. The Committee asks the Government to ensure that Resolution No. 162 of 2000 is amended without further delay, as well as section 253 of the Labour Code, and that any measures limiting women's employment are strictly limited to maternity protection. Please provide specific information on the progress made in this regard, including with respect to the consultations with workers' and employers' organizations and the results of such consultations.

Articles 2 and 3. Equality of opportunity and treatment of men and women. The Committee notes the Government's indication that in March 2010, the rate of economically active women (between 15 and 72 years of age) was 56.7 per cent, compared to 66.4 per cent for men. The Committee notes from the statistical information provided by the Government under the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), that women constituted 81.2 per cent in education, 79.7 per cent in health care and social services, and 77.6 per cent in hotel and restaurant services in 2009, and observes that the labour market remains highly gender segregated. The Committee asks the Government to take measures to promote equal opportunities of men and women in employment and occupation, including information on the specific steps taken to ensure that men and women have equal access to employment in the broadest possible range of sectors and industries, as well as at all levels of responsibility. Please continue to provide updated detailed statistical information on the distribution of men and women in the different sectors and industries, as well as levels of responsibility.

Sexual harassment. The Committee recalls the absence of specific legal provisions on sexual harassment in the workplace. It notes the Government's indication that sexual harassment is covered by section 133 of the Criminal Code, which provides that it is a criminal offence to force a person to perform acts of a sexual nature, including sexual intercourse, sodomy, lesbianism, or other acts of a sexual nature using blackmail, threats of destroying, damaging or taking away property, or by exploiting the victim's financial or any other form of dependence. The Committee recalls that addressing sexual harassment only through criminal proceedings is normally not sufficient, due to the sensitivity of the issue, the higher burden of proof, and the fact that criminal law does not cover the full range of behaviour that constitutes sexual harassment in employment and occupation. Given the gravity and serious repercussions of sexual harassment, as a serious manifestation of sex discrimination and a violation of human rights, it is important to take effective measures to prevent and prohibit sexual harassment at work, both quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment (General Survey, 2012, paragraphs 789 and 792). The Committee asks the Government to take steps to include in legislation a clear definition and prohibition of both quid pro quo and hostile work environment sexual harassment in employment and occupation. It also asks the Government to indicate any measures taken in practice to prevent and address sexual harassment, and to raise awareness of employers, workers and their representatives regarding sexual harassment.

Equality of opportunity and treatment of ethnic minorities and indigenous peoples. The Committee recalls the Government's acknowledgement that there is a need for measures promoting non-discrimination in employment and occupation based on ethnic or national origin and to promote tolerance between the various ethnic groups in the country, including ethnic associations created under the Federal Law on National and Cultural Autonomy, 1996. The Committee recalls that where labour market inequalities along ethnic lines exist, a national policy to promote equality of opportunity and treatment, as envisaged in Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention, should include measures to promote equality of opportunity and treatment of members of all ethnic groups with respect to access to vocational training and guidance, placement services, employment and particular occupations, and terms and conditions of employment (General Survey, 2012, paragraph 765). The Committee asks the Government to take specific measures to strengthen the enforcement of the Labour Code's provision on non-discrimination, with particular emphasis on discrimination on racial or ethnic grounds, including through promotional measures as well as effective enforcement of the legislation. It reiterates its request to the Government to provide information with regard to equal opportunities and treatment in employment and occupation of indigenous peoples.

Parts III and IV of the report form. Monitoring and enforcement. The Committee recalls that since the 2006 amendments to the Labour Code, persons considering themselves to be discriminated against in the sphere of labour can no longer petition the labour inspectorate. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the labour inspectorate provides advice to workers and explains in detail the procedure for lodging claims based on discrimination before the courts. It also notes the Government's indication that in 2009 efforts were made to identify and eliminate violations of labour rights of women pursuant to a plan of the Federal Labour and Employment Service, and that 3,818 inspections were carried out, during which 13,578 violations of the Labour Code were identified and resolved. According to the Government, over 2,100 instructions were issued, over 1,600 fines were imposed, and over 500 dismissals were revoked, following requests by the labour inspectorate. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the number of cases concerning discrimination in employment and occupation brought before the courts under the Labour Code, and on the outcome of such cases, as well as the impact of limiting the avenues of seeking redress only to the courts. It also asks the Government to provide information on the results of labour inspections, as well as on how the advice provided by the labour inspectorate assists workers and employers in lodging claims based on discrimination before the courts. The Committee further asks the Government to provide information on any measures taken to strengthen the capacity of labour inspectors to provide such advice. As requested by the Conference Committee, please provide specific information on steps taken to strengthen or establish mechanisms for the promotion, analysis and monitoring of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation for all groups covered under the Convention, including ethnic minorities.

Rwanda

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1980)

Article 1 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. In its previous comments the Committee emphasized that the definition of the expression "work of equal value" which appears in section 1.9 of Law regulating Labour No. 13/2009 of 27 May 2009 refers only to "similar work" and is therefore too narrow. It also noted that this Law does not contain any substantial provisions prescribing equality of remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. The Committee notes that the Government refers again in its report to article 37 of the Constitution, which states that "every person having equal competence and capacity shall have the right, without any discrimination, to equal wage for equal work". It further notes the Government's indication that, in practice, there is no discrimination between men and women with regard to remuneration, and also its commitment that, on a legislative level, full effect will be given to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value when Law No. 13/2009 is revised. The Committee recalls that because of stereotypical attitudes regarding women's aspirations, preferences and capabilities, certain jobs are held predominantly or exclusively by women and others by men and "female jobs" are often undervalued in comparison with those of equal value performed by men when determining wage rates. The concept of "work of equal value" is essential for addressing such occupational segregation because it permits a broad scope of comparison which not only covers "equal", the "same" or "similar" work but also jobs of an entirely different nature which are nevertheless of equal value (see General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraphs 672–679). The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary steps to amend Law No. 13/2009 of 27 May 2009 establishing the labour regulations, so as to give full effect to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1981)

Article 1 of the Convention. Legislation. In its previous comment the Committee asked the Government to provide further information concerning the scope of section 12 (prohibiting discrimination) of Law No. 13/2009 of 27 May 2009 regulating labour in Rwanda in view of discrepancies between the different linguistic versions of this Law. The Committee notes the Government's explanation that the prohibition of all direct or indirect discrimination covers all stages of employment, including recruitment, and an act need not be intentional to constitute discrimination within the meaning of this section. It further notes that no legal proceedings have been instituted on the basis of any of the prohibited grounds of discrimination, nor has any penalty been imposed under section 169 of Law No. 13/2009. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to align the different linguistic versions of section 12, so that they explicitly prohibit any direct or indirect discrimination in employment and occupation in accordance with Article 1(3) of the Convention, namely as regards access to vocational training, access to employment and to particular occupations, and terms and conditions of employment. It also requests the Government to provide information on the application of section 12 of the Law by the courts, stating the grounds of discrimination invoked, the penalties imposed and remedies provided.

Sexual harassment. In its previous comments the Committee welcomed the adoption of Law No. 59/2008 of 10 September 2008 concerning the prevention and suppression of gender-based violence, and the inclusion in Law No. 13/2009 of provisions prohibiting “gender-based violence” in employment, and direct or indirect moral harassment at work. While noting that the combination of these legislative provisions covered the two essential elements of sexual harassment at work as set out in its 2002 general observation, the Committee asked the Government to consider taking the necessary steps to adopt a clear and precise definition of sexual harassment in the workplace, ensuring that this definition covered both quid pro quo and hostile working environment sexual harassment. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that a provision specifically concerning sexual harassment and covering quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment will be included in Law No. 13/2009 establishing the labour regulations, when it is revised. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on progress made in the process of the revision of Law No. 13/2009 and on any other provisions adopted on sexual harassment in employment and occupation. The Committee repeats its request for information concerning any measure taken to prevent and eliminate sexual harassment in the workplace (educational programmes, awareness-raising campaigns relating to appeal mechanisms, etc.).

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Sao Tome and Principe

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1982)

The Committee notes with regret that for the fifth consecutive year the Government’s report has not been received. It hopes that a report will be supplied for examination by the Committee at its next session and that it will contain full information on the matters raised in its previous direct request, which read as follows:

Legislation. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that a draft General Labour Act has been prepared and submitted to the National Assembly. However, due to a change of Government, it was unlikely that the legislation would be adopted very soon. The Committee recalls its previous comments in which it noted that the provisions of the Constitution do not fully reflect the Convention’s principle as they refer to equal wages for “equal work” rather than “work of equal value”. Hence, the need to take further legislative action to ensure full compliance with the Convention. The Committee recalls its 2006 general observation, stressing the importance of giving full legislative expression to the principle of the Convention, providing not only for equal remuneration for equal, the same or similar work, but also prohibiting pay discrimination that occurs in situations where men and women perform different work that is nevertheless of equal value (paragraph 6). The Committee, therefore, urges the Government to ensure that the future General Labour Act explicitly provides for the right of men and women to receive equal remuneration for work of equal value, in accordance with the Convention, and to indicate any progress made in this regard. The Committee also reminds the Government that ILO technical assistance is available and asks the Government to consider forwarding a copy of the draft legislation to the Office for its review.

Cooperation with workers’ and employers’ organizations. The Committee recalls the important role of workers’ and employers’ organizations with respect to giving effect to the provisions of the Convention. It, therefore, asks the Government to seek the cooperation of these organizations with regard to the establishment of an appropriate legislative framework to apply the Convention, as indicated above, as well as with regard to practical measures to ensure equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. Please keep the Committee informed of progress made in this regard.

Statistical information. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the National Institute of Statistics was currently carrying out a survey which also covered the issue of remuneration of men and women. The Committee asks the Government to communicate the results of the ongoing survey as soon as they become available.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1982)

The Committee notes with regret that for the fifth consecutive year the Government’s report has not been received. It hopes that a report will be supplied for examination by the Committee at its next session and that it will contain full information on the matters raised in its previous direct request, which read as follows:

Legislation. The Committee notes from the Government’s report on the application of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), that a draft General Labour Act has been prepared. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that the legislation will include a prohibition of direct and indirect discrimination at all stages of the employment process and on all the grounds listed in Article 1 of the Convention. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to this end.

Policies and institutions. Equality of opportunity and treatment of men and women in employment and occupation. The Committee notes that the Government has adopted a National Strategy for Gender Equality and Equity, which also deals with issues relating to women's equality in the world of work. Further, the Government indicates that participation of women in education and vocational training are a priority of the Government. With a view to strengthening the promotion of women, a new Institute for Women is being established under the Ministry of Labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide the following:

- (a) a copy of the National Strategy for Gender Equality and Equity;
- (b) information on the establishment and activities of the Institute for Women, on the specific measures taken to promote women's equal access to vocational training and employment in the private and public sectors, and the results obtained by such action; and
- (c) statistical information on the participation of men and women in vocational training and the labour market, indicating their levels of participation in the different sectors and occupations.

Awareness raising. The Committee recalls the importance of educational programmes to raise awareness of the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any action taken or envisaged to promote understanding and awareness of the principle of equality among workers and employers as well as society at large, including through cooperation with workers' and employers' organizations.

Saudi Arabia

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes the Government's report in reply to the request made by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2012.

National equality policy. The Committee recalls its previous observations, calling on the Government to take measures to declare and pursue a national equality policy as required under Article 2 of the Convention, addressing at least all the grounds set out in Article (1)(1)(a) of the Convention. Terms of reference had been provided by an ILO high-level mission on the development of a national equality policy, including regarding the establishment and mandate of a multi-stakeholder task force. The Committee notes the Government's general indication that it considers that the different laws and regulations, including the Labour Code, ministerial decisions and regulations, and decisions of the Consultative Council reinforce that the official policy is based on combating all forms of discrimination, segregation or exclusion on the grounds of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction or social origin. It states further that the official policies, educational systems and programmes, administrative instructions and practices are in conformity with the Government's approach to the elimination of any discrimination or segregation. The Government also states that there is no declared or hidden discriminatory policy against non-Saudis, as evidenced by the approximately 10 million non-Saudis living in stability and security in the country. In response to the previous requests and concerns of the Committee with respect to discrimination based on religion, the Committee also notes the Government's general indication that no cases have been brought before the courts alleging such discrimination. The Committee draws the Government's attention to its 2012 General Survey on fundamental Conventions, highlighting that it is essential to acknowledge that no society is free from discrimination, and that continuous action is required to address it. The Convention requires the national equality policy to be effective: it should therefore be clearly stated, which implies not only that all discriminatory laws and administrative practices are repealed or modified, but also that programmes are set up, stereotyped behaviours and prejudicial attitudes are addressed and a climate of tolerance promoted, and monitoring is put in place. Noting the very general indications of the Government, the Committee recalls that measures to address discrimination in law and in practice should be concrete and specific (see General Survey, 2012, paragraphs 844–845). Recalling that the Government had previously indicated that steps were being taken to examine the establishment of a working group responsible for the preparation of a national equality policy, the Committee notes that the Government provides no information in this regard. The Committee urges the Government to take steps to establish the multi-stakeholder task force, with a view to taking concrete measures, without further delay, to develop and implement a national policy designed to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation, with a view to the elimination of any discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction or social origin, and asks the Government to provide specific information in this regard, including with respect to measures taken to encourage and promote a climate of tolerance among all the sections of the population. The Committee again asks the Government to provide information on the steps taken to secure ILO technical assistance in this regard to which the Government previously referred. The Committee also asks the Government to undertake the national survey on the situation in the country with regard to discrimination on all the grounds set out in the Convention, and the establishment of an action plan, which was foreseen in the terms of reference for the multi-stakeholder task force.

Legislation. The Committee recalls that the Labour Code, 2006, contains no specific provisions defining and prohibiting discrimination in employment and occupation. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the regulations in force are based on the prohibition of discrimination between citizens or between citizens and foreign workers. The Committee notes, however, that the Government does not refer to any specific legislation in this regard. The Committee urges the Government to take concrete steps to include as part of its national equality policy, legislation specifically prohibiting discrimination, both direct and indirect, in the public and private sectors, on at least all the grounds set out in the Convention, covering all workers and all aspects of employment, and ensuring effective means of redress. Please provide specific information on the concrete steps taken in this regard.

Domestic workers and agricultural workers. With respect to the Committee's previous requests for information on how various groups of workers were protected against discrimination in practice, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour considers the formulation of special labour regulations on agricultural and rural workers to be a priority. Regarding domestic workers, the Government indicates that the Consultative Council has adopted a special regulation for domestic workers, which is currently before the high authorities for decision. The Government also states that the Ministry of Labour, in collaboration with the private sector, has formulated an insurance document aimed at providing protection to domestic workers with respect to unpaid wages, as well as providing medical coverage, occupational disability coverage, legal services, etc. The Committee asks the Government to provide specific information on the regulations foreseen for agricultural and rural workers, and domestic workers, and whether it is envisaged that they will address specifically the issue of protection against discrimination for such workers with respect to the grounds enumerated in the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the status of the adoption of such regulations, and to provide a copy of them once they are adopted.

Discrimination against migrant workers. The Committee recalls that it has been raising concerns, along with the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, regarding discrimination against migrant workers, in particular the risk of exploitation and abuse of migrant workers due to the sponsorship system. The Committee welcomes the Government's acknowledgement that sponsorship provisions can lead to exploitation and abuse, and its commitment to abolishing the sponsorship system. The Government indicates further that the Ministry of Labour has taken several measures to provide more protection for migrant workers, including establishing a Department for the Welfare of Expatriate Workers, and adopting a regulation on recruitment companies, aimed at regulating migrant labour and protecting the rights of workers and employers. The Government also indicates that it has formulated a bilateral agreement to regulate the relationship between domestic workers and their employers, to safeguard the rights of both parties. The Council of Ministers has authorized the Minister of Labour to negotiate and sign such bilateral agreements with countries of origin. The Government considers that such measures will lead to the end of the sponsorship system in practice, before it is envisaged formally and legally. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the steps taken to bring an end to the sponsorship system, both in law and in practice, as well as on the impact of such measures. The Committee also requests information on the mandate of the Department for the Welfare of Expatriate Workers, including any role in inspection or dispute resolution, as well as on the conclusion of any bilateral agreements, and the contents of such agreements. The Committee also asks the Government to indicate whether any steps have been taken, as previously urged by the Committee, to follow up in a concerted manner on the issues relating to discrimination of migrant workers, including examining the occupations in which migrant workers are employed, their conditions of employment, and the particular situation of female domestic workers, and to make addressing discrimination against migrant workers an important component of the national equality policy.

Equal opportunity and treatment of men and women. The Committee notes that in reply to the concerns raised previously regarding the significant occupational gender segregation, with women being concentrated in a narrow range of sectors, the Government provides very general information, including that women have excelled in education, that they have assumed some high-level posts, and are being trained in computer and information technology and other specialties. The Government also refers to a ministerial decision that was issued on the special requirement of women's employment in factories, and another on promoting home work for women. The Committee recalls that the objectives of the Ninth Development Plan (2010–14), include: “[increasing] the overall participation rate, particularly that of females, in an effort to enhance economic empowerment of women”; “promoting participation of women in economic activity, and providing the facilities required to increase their participation”; and “consolidating and enhancing qualitative progress in education of Saudi girls at all stages of education”. The Committee again asks the Government to provide specific information on the concrete measures taken pursuant to the Ninth Development Plan and the National Employment Strategy, to which the Government previously referred, to increase the labour market participation of women, including the training and facilities provided, as well as the measures taken to improve education for girls to expand their future employment opportunities, and the impact of such measures. The Committee also again asks the Government to take concrete measures to address occupational gender segregation, with a view to providing opportunities for women in a wider range of sectors and occupations, including higher level and decision-making positions, and in those areas that have been traditionally dominated by men, and to provide information on the results achieved. Please also provide information on the concrete measures taken to ensure that workers, employers and their organizations are aware that the law no longer prohibits women and men from working together, and the specific steps taken to address de facto workplace segregation. The Committee also requests information on the establishment, mandate and activities of the Higher National Committee for Women's Affairs, to which the Government previously referred.

Sexual harassment. Recalling the concerns raised regarding the absence of legislation addressing sexual harassment, and the particular vulnerability of domestic workers to such harassment, the Committee notes the Government's acknowledgement that sexual harassment occurs in the work environment where both men and women work together, though the Government considers that such cases are limited due to prevailing customs and traditions. The Government also states that the prohibition of sexual harassment is being considered, and that the Ministry of Labour, through the Advisory Council for Women's Work, has been studying the issue of the rules “governing the morals of treatment among employees for the protection of men and women employees at work against immoral transgressions Such transgressions, breaches, mechanisms for complaints, as well as the penalties are currently being defined.” The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the specific recommendations of the Advisory Council for Women's Work with respect to defining and prohibiting sexual harassment, and the specific follow-up given to such recommendations. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to report progress in explicitly defining and prohibiting both quid pro quo and hostile work environment harassment in employment and occupation, including for domestic workers, and asks the Government to provide detailed information in this regard.

Restrictions on women's employment. Recalling the protective measures set out in section 149 of the Labour Code, confining women to jobs that are "suitable to their nature", the Committee notes the Government's indication that, while it does not consider this provision to be discriminatory, the need to repeal the provision is being seriously considered in the context of draft amendments to the Labour Code. The Committee also recalls that the criteria governing work that can be undertaken by women remains regulated by paragraph 2/A of Council of Labour Force Order No. 1/19M/1405 (1987), which establishes the following criteria for women to work: (a) the need for the woman to work; (b) permission of her guardian; (c) suitability of the work to a woman's nature and not distracting with regard to her household and marital duties; (d) sex-segregated workplace; and (e) women's compliance with notions of dignity and modesty and Islamic dress code. Recalling that protective measures limiting women's access to employment constitute obstacles to the recruitment and employment of women, the Committee urges the Government to amend section 149 of the Labour Code, and repeal paragraph 2/A of Council of Labour Force Order No. 1/19M/1405 (1987), with a view to ensuring that any protective measures are strictly limited to maternity protection. The Committee also again asks the Government to amend the Order of 21 July 2003 approving women's participation in international conferences suitable to them, to ensure that women are able to participate in international conferences in the course of employment and occupation on an equal footing with men.

Enforcement. Recalling the concerns raised regarding the inadequacy of the dispute resolution mechanisms in addressing issues of discrimination, including for migrant workers, the Committee notes that the Government stresses the importance of the continuous training provided to judges and labour inspectors, and refers again to Royal Decree No. 8382/mb of 28/10/1429 (2008) which provides for the establishment of women's units in courts and justice secretariats under the supervision of an independent women's administration. The Government, however, once again indicates that there have been no complaints relating to discrimination in employment and occupation. The Committee recalls that the absence of cases is likely to indicate a lack of an appropriate framework, lack of awareness of rights, lack of confidence in or absence of practical access to procedures, or fear of reprisals (see General Survey, 2012, paragraph 870). Noting the absence of complaints regarding discrimination, the Committee asks the Government to take steps to ensure there are accessible avenues for bringing and addressing cases of discrimination in employment and occupation, and to raise awareness of such procedures. Please also provide specific information in this regard, as well as on the implementation of Royal Decree No. 8382/mb. The Committee again requests the Government to clarify whether it is envisaged that women will be included on the Human Rights Commission and the courts, having the same status and responsibilities as men, and to provide information on any progress made in this regard. The Committee also asks the Government to provide specific information on the nature of the training provided to judges and labour inspectors, particularly as it relates to equality and non-discrimination in employment and occupation.

Sierra Leone

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1966)

Article 1(1)(b) of the Convention. The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the Prevention and Control of HIV and AIDS Act, 2007, section 23 of which prohibits discrimination on the grounds of actual, perceived or suspected HIV status in access to employment, and also with respect to transfer, promotion and termination. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the practical application of section 23 of the Prevention and Control of HIV and AIDS Act of 2007, including any exceptions permitted under subsection 2. Please provide copies of any relevant judicial or administrative decisions.

The Committee notes with regret, however, that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Lack of national policy. The Committee regrets that the Government does not provide any new information in respect to the Convention's application. Since Sierra Leone has ratified the Convention, the Government has consistently reported that no legislative or administrative regulation or other measures existed to give effect to the provisions of the Convention and the Government has failed to provide information on any measures taken in this regard. In its latest report the Government repeats the general statement that it had a broad-based policy which ensured jobs for all who apply and are willing to work, regardless of sex, religion, ethnicity or political opinion. The Committee is therefore bound to recall that under the Convention, Sierra Leone has the obligation to declare and pursue a national policy designed to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment and occupation, with a view to eliminating discrimination regarding vocational training, access to employment and particular occupations, as well as terms and conditions of employment.

In connection with the above, the Committee recalls that articles 7 to 9 of the 1991 Constitution establish economic, social and educational objectives for the State that potentially promote the application of the Convention. Article 15 guarantees the right to equal protection of the law irrespective of race, tribe, place of origin, political opinion, colour, creed or sex, and article 27 of the Constitution provides constitutional protection from discrimination. The Committee considers that these provisions may be an important element of a national equality policy in line with the Convention, but recalls that provisions affirming the principles of equality and non-discrimination in itself cannot constitute such a policy. As stated in the Committee's 1988 General Survey on the Convention, the national policy on equality of opportunity and treatment should be clearly stated and should be applied in practice, presupposing state implementation measures in line with the principles set out in Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention and Paragraph 2 of the accompanying Recommendation No. 111.

While being aware of the many challenges the Government is facing in the process of consolidating peace, the Committee encourages the Government to give serious consideration to the application of the Convention in law and practice as an integral part of its efforts to promote peace and social and economic stability. The Government is requested to provide information on measures taken or envisaged to promote and ensure equal access to technical and vocational training, public and private employment, as well as equal terms and conditions of employment, including through educational programmes and cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee also reiterates its previous requests to the Government to provide information in particular on the measures taken to ensure equality in employment and occupation between women and men and among members of the different ethnic groups.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Sri Lanka

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the Government's report in reply to the request made by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2012. The Committee also notes the observations by Education International (EI) and the All Ceylon Union of Teachers (ACUT) dated 31 August 2012.

Article 1 of the Convention. Work of equal value. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed concern regarding the absence of legislation providing for equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. The Committee recalls that the rights regarding wages arising from the wage boards and collective agreements appeared to be limited to equal wages for the same or substantially the same work, which is narrower than the principle set out in the Convention, which encompasses not only the same or substantially the same work, but also allows for the comparison of jobs that are of an entirely different nature, but which are nevertheless of equal value (see General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 673). The Committee notes the observations by EI and the ACUT calling on the Government to take action to enact national legislation speedily, in consultation with the social partners in different sectors of employment, to ensure full implementation of the Convention. The Committee again urges the Government to take steps to give full legislative effect to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. It hopes that progress will be made in the near future, and asks the Government to provide specific information on the concrete steps taken in this regard.

Additional emoluments. The Committee notes the Government's interpretation that the practice by certain employers in rural areas of providing meals, which are only provided to male workers, does not concern payment in kind under the Convention. The Committee also notes that the Government repeats that there are no national legal provisions for payment of wages in kind. The Committee recalls that the purpose of the broad definition of "remuneration", in particular, the reference to "any additional emoluments whatsoever", enshrined in Article 1(a) of the Convention is to capture all elements that a worker may receive for his or her work including additional allowances paid in kind, such as meals and housing facilities (General Survey, 2012, paragraphs 686, 690–691). The Committee again asks the Government to take measures to ensure that, in practice, all emoluments, whether in cash or in kind, are granted or paid without discrimination based on the sex of the worker, and to provide specific information on steps taken in this regard.

Article 2. Wage boards. The Committee recalls that sex-specific terminology remains in use in the wage board ordinances, and notes the Government's indication that the wage boards are reviewing the terminology with a view to eliminating it. The Committee also recalls that wage rates are set for a number of sectors through the wage boards, and that the classification of wages in various trades is differentiated based on the classification of categories such as "unskilled" "semi-skilled" and "skilled". With regard to the Committee's previous request regarding the process of determining minimum wage rates, the Government states that the classification of categories are based on factors such as education, knowledge and skills, etc. required to perform jobs. The Government also indicates that the social partners are involved in the process of fixing wages, and that there is no gender wage discrimination. The Government adds that certain occupations such as professionals and clerks, in which women constitute more than 50 per cent, are relatively highly paid, and therefore it is not shown that lower wages are set for sectors predominantly employing women. The Committee notes the statistical information provided by the Government on the share of men and women disaggregated by occupational group and sex in 2010: men constituted 91 per cent of plant and machine operators and assemblers; 76.3 per cent of senior officials and managers; and 74.1 per cent of proprietors and managers of enterprises. However, the Committee notes that the Government has not provided information regarding the respective level of wages for the different categories of the various sectors and trades, which would assist the Government and the Committee to assess the nature, extent and evolution of wage inequalities. The Committee asks the Government to take steps to ensure that rates of wages fixed by the wage boards are based on objective criteria free from gender bias, so that the work in female dominated sectors is not being undervalued compared to male dominated sectors. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the progress made in ensuring the use of gender neutral terminology in defining the various jobs and occupations in the wage board ordinances. The Committee again urges the Government to compile and analyse statistics on the respective earnings of men and women in the different occupational categories in the public and private sectors and to provide information on measures taken to reduce the gender pay gap.

Wage policy. The Committee previously noted the Government's intention to review the wage policy, to simplify the procedures for wage setting, and to establish a national minimum wage system. It recalls the Government's indication that the Cadre and Salary Commission was mandated to determine and revise the cadre and salary structure in the public service. The Committee notes the Government's indication that discriminatory wage policy concerning certain categories of the public sector under the Public Administration Circular 6/2006 has already been abolished, but no further information has been provided on the revision of the cadre and salary structure in the public sector. With respect to the private sector, the Government states that it is still under discussion at the National Labour Advisory Council, including discussions as to a national minimum wage system. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the progress made in developing a new wage policy, and to provide information on how the policy will promote and ensure the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value in both the public and private sectors.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Syrian Arab Republic

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the continuing human rights violations reported and the ongoing climate of violence (Report of the United Nations Secretary-General, A/HRC/21/32, 25 September 2012). The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes that the Human Rights Council condemned and expressed profound concern at the grave and systematic human rights violations in the Syrian Arab Republic (Resolution by the Human Rights Council at its 17th special session on the human rights situation in the Syrian Arab Republic, 23 August 2011 – A/HRC/S-17/2) and regretted the lack of progress made in the political reform process. The Committee recognizes that, without an inclusive, credible and genuine dialogue conducted in an environment without fear and intimidation, and without effective protection of human rights, the implementation of the Convention is seriously hindered, if not rendered impossible. However, given that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous comments, it is bound to repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Legislative developments. The Committee notes the adoption of a new Labour Law (No. 17/2010), section 75(a) of which provides that the employer shall apply the principle of "equal pay for work of equal value" to all workers without any discrimination, including discrimination based on gender. Section 75(b) then defines "work of equal value" as "work that requires equal scientific qualifications and professional skills, as attested by a work experience certificate". While welcoming the specific reference to "work of equal value" in the new Labour Law, the Committee is concerned that the definition in section 75(b) may unduly restrict the application of section 75(a), as it does not appear to allow a comparison of jobs requiring different qualifications and skills, which are nonetheless of equal value. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the practical application of section 75 of the new Labour Law, including any administrative or judicial decisions. Please also provide specific information regarding the scope of comparison permitted under section 75(b), and in particular whether it is possible to compare jobs of an entirely different nature, requiring different qualifications and skills, to determine whether they are of equal value under section 75(a).

Application in practice. The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no information in response to its previous observations regarding concrete measures taken to determine the nature, extent and causes of inequalities in remuneration that exist in practice, in order to identify specific measures to address these inequalities. The Committee once again urges the Government to undertake studies to determine the nature, extent and causes of inequalities in remuneration existing in practice between men and women for work of equal value in the public and private sectors, and to identify specific measures to address these inequalities. Please also provide full information on the occupational classification system referred to in the previous report, including information on the criteria used to ensure that this classification system is free from gender bias.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Turkey

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes the observations of the Turkish Confederation of Employer Associations (TİSK), which were attached to the Government's report.

Training and awareness raising. On several occasions the Committee has asked the Government to undertake awareness-raising and training activities specifically addressing the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value, as set out in the Convention and in the Labour Act. The Committee notes that according to the Government, the Prime Ministry Circular on Increasing Women's Employment and Achieving Equality of Opportunity No. 2010/14 has the objective of strengthening the socio-economic status of women, achieving equality between women and men in social life, increasing the employment of women and ensuring equal wages for men and women. It also creates a National Monitoring and Coordination Committee on Employment of Women. The Government further indicates that the gender equality branch of the General Directorate of Disadvantaged Groups created within the Ministry of Labour and Social Security is responsible for raising awareness regarding measures to promote and apply the principle of equal pay for men and women. While taking due note of the National Action Plan on Gender Equality (2008–13), the above initiatives and structures, as well as the information on activities to promote greater access of women to employment in general, the Committee notes the absence of information on any concrete awareness-raising activities regarding the principle of the Convention. The Committee urges the Government to carry out, in consultation with workers' and employers' organizations, specific activities, including activities carried out by the gender equality branch, to improve understanding and raise awareness among relevant target groups, including labour inspectors and judges, of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and to report in detail on the progress made in this regard.

Labour inspection. Regarding the ability of the labour inspection services to identify and establish data on the number, nature and outcome of infringements of section 5(4) of the Labour Act with regard to equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, the Committee notes the Government's indication that complaints-based investigations comprise the major part of the inspections, for which no classification of violations exist. Hence, data on the number, nature and outcomes of cases addressed by the labour inspectorate under section 5(4) are unavailable. The Committee stresses the need to collect and publish information on the nature and outcome of discrimination and equal remuneration complaints and infringements, as a means of raising awareness of the legislation and of the avenues for dispute resolution, and in order to examine the effectiveness of the procedures and mechanisms, and asks the Government to take appropriate measures to this end. Recalling that inadequate supervision by the labour administration may be one of the reasons for the persistence of unequal pay between men and women, the Committee asks the Government to take adequate measures to increase the capacity of labour inspectors to prevent, detect and remedy infringements of section 5(4) of the Labour Act.

Article 3 of the Convention. Objective job evaluation. The Committee welcomes the information provided by TİSK on the training and use of job evaluation by its affiliates, in particular the information that the Metal Industry Job Classification System (MIDS) was revised in July 2007 to bring it into line with new job structures and that workplace visits and presentations were given to introduce the system during 2008–10. It also notes the information provided by TİSK regarding the usefulness of the Occupational Proficiency System for determining remuneration. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the draft Turkish Code of Obligations includes provisions regarding the Convention and is being discussed by the General Assembly of the Grand National Assembly. The Committee recalls the importance of developing and implementing objective job evaluation methods to address persistent gender pay gaps, and asks the Government to take specific steps to promote such methods as envisaged in Article 3 of the Convention, in the public and the private sectors. In this context, the Committee also asks the Government to provide specific information on the measures taken, including for example in the context of the draft Turkish Code of Obligations, to ensure that equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is made an explicit objective of any job evaluation.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes the observations of the Turkish Confederation of Employer Associations (TİSK) and the Confederation of Turkish Trade Unions (TÜRK-IS), which were attached to the Government's report.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Discrimination based on political opinion. For a number of years the Committee has been requesting the Government to provide information on the practical application of the Anti-Terrorism Act and the Penal Code in cases involving journalists, writers and publishers expressing their political opinions. The Committee notes that according to TÜRK-IS, hundreds of journalists have been arrested or convicted because of their views; they also face lawsuits due to their political opinions. The Committee notes with regret that once again the Government has not provided any information on this issue and recalls that when protecting workers against discrimination with regard to employment and occupation on the basis of political opinion, the Convention implies that this protection shall be afforded to them in respect of activities expressing or demonstrating opposition to the established political principles and opinions – since the protection of opinions which are neither expressed nor demonstrated would be pointless (see General Survey on equality in employment and occupation, 1988, paragraph 57, and General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraphs 805, 832 and 833). The Committee requests the Government once again to provide information on the number and outcome of cases against journalists, writers and publishers, including a brief summary of the facts and specific charges brought. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures, including legislative measures, to ensure that no journalist, writer or publisher is restricted in the exercise of their employment or occupation because of the political opinions expressed by them.

Article 2. Equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government according to which the Prime Ministry Circular No. 2010/14 on increasing women's employment and achieving equality of opportunity has the objective of strengthening the socio-economic status of women, achieving equality of men and women in social life, increasing the employment of women and ensuring equal wages for men and women, and creates a National Monitoring and Coordination Committee on the Employment of Women. The Committee further notes the establishment of the Parliamentary Commission on Equality of Opportunities for Women and Men and the adoption of the National Action Plan on Gender Equality (2008–13) which has the objectives of improving the employability of women, ameliorating the situation of rural women workers and fighting against gender discrimination, and which contains various strategies to improve women's employment situation. The Government further indicates that in the context of the Strategic Plan 2008–12 prepared by the Directorate General on the status of women, "women-men equality and social gender equality training programmes" have been implemented, regional workshops were organized in 2009 and 2010, and a survey on the impact of already executed projects on employment and entrepreneurship for women by public institutions and non-governmental organizations is being carried out. The Government indicates that measures have also been taken in order to ensure that the Turkish Employment Organization provides a more efficient public employment service and facilitates access to more and better jobs for women. The Committee further notes the various projects and activities organized in order to raise awareness and to provide women with training mentioned by the Government in its Fourth National Report on the Implementation of the Revised European Social Charter submitted to the Committee on Social Rights of the Council of Europe on 16 February 2012 (RAP/RCh/TU/IV(2012)). The Committee further notes that the Bill concerning parental leave is currently before the National Assembly. Furthermore, the Committee notes that according to TİSK 30,986 women benefited from the incentives provided by the Government in 2009.

According to the statistical information submitted by the Government with respect to education, the Committee notes that the rate of school attendance by girls and boys at primary school was similar to the rate in 2010. However, the enrolment of girls in secondary school was 62.21 per cent in 2010 compared to 67.55 per cent of boys in the same period. The Committee also notes the information concerning the high participation of women in university studies.

While taking due note of the range of policies and measures adopted by the Government, the Committee observes that the Government provides scarce information on the concrete impact of these measures in increasing the participation of women in the labour market. Indeed, according to the statistics provided, it continues to be very low (for example 32,513 men and 6,668 women in the manufacture of leather and related products, 27,192 men and 6,658 women in the manufacture of paper and related products). The Committee notes that TÜRK-İS refers to the fact that traditional gender roles restrict women's choice of employment and occupation and segregates them in low paid and intensive working jobs. In this regard, the Committee observes that, according to the information provided by the Government, women appear to be concentrated in the education and health services sectors, the only sectors where their participation is higher than that of men. Furthermore, although the participation of girls in education has considerably increased in the last years, this does not seem to have had a consistent impact in their inclusion in the labour market.

The Committee highlights the importance of the Government continuing to take proactive policies and measures in order to overcome the persistent inequality between men and women in employment and occupation and to ensure that the girls that enrol in the education system today will be able in the future to participate fully in all economic sectors and occupations without discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to provide concrete information in accordance with Article 3(f) of the Convention on the results achieved by all the programmes and measures adopted, including those adopted in the framework of the National Action Plan on Gender Equality (2008–13). Please include specific information concerning women in rural areas and women over 45 years of age. The Committee further requests the Government to continue to provide detailed statistical information on the situation of men and women in the labour market, including their participation in the various sectors and occupations.

In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the number of female students expelled from universities for wearing headscarves on university premises, and to report on the measures taken to assess and review this matter. The Committee notes that the Government refers to the authorities responsible for dealing with the admission and registration as well as the expulsion of students but does not provide the information requested previously. The Committee understands that, according to the information from the website of the National Assembly, the Committee on Equality of Opportunities for Women and Men has examined a bill concerning freedom of dressing in the universities. The Committee once again recalls that while the existing prohibition of head coverings includes all forms of coverings and applies to men and women, these measures may have a discriminatory effect on women with regard to their access to university education. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take more active steps to obtain information on the number of female students expelled from universities for wearing headscarves on university premises, and to report on the measures taken to assess and review this matter. Please also provide information on any bill concerning freedom of dressing examined and discussed by the Committee on Equality of Opportunities for Women and Men, the result of such examination and any follow up thereto.

Articles 1, 2 and 3. Discrimination in respect of recruitment and selection. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to the fact that section 5(1) of the Labour Code which prohibits any discrimination based on language, race, sex, political opinion, philosophical belief, religion and sect or similar reasons in the employment relationship, does not prohibit discrimination at the recruitment stage. The Committee had noted, notwithstanding that pursuant to section 122 of the Turkish Penal Code a person practising discrimination on grounds of language, race, colour, sex, disability, political opinion, philosophical beliefs, religion, creed or other grounds, who makes the employment of a person contingent on one of these grounds or who prevents a person from carrying out an ordinary economic activity, shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a term of six months to one year or a judicial fine. The Committee previously requested the Government to provide information on the number, nature and outcome of criminal proceedings undertaken under section 122 of the Penal Code and to indicate whether persons considering themselves victims of discrimination in recruitment could bring complaints under section 122 of the Penal Code and whether they could obtain compensation or other remedies. The Committee observes that the Government provides no concrete information on this issue. However, according to the TİSK there is no possibility for persons who are victims of discrimination to claim compensation on the basis of section 122 of the Penal Code. While recognizing the important role of penal sanctions against those employers responsible for acts of discrimination, as they can be an effective deterrent for these kind of acts, the Committee highlights that discrimination causes material and moral harm to those that have been discriminated against, it is important that the victims of discrimination have access to judicial proceedings and benefit from suitable remedies (see General Survey, 1988, paragraphs 227 and 228, and General Survey, 2012, paragraphs 884–886). The Committee requests the Government to take measures so as to ensure that victims of discrimination in respect of recruitment and selection have access to adequate procedures and remedies and to provide information thereon. Please also provide information on the number, nature and outcome of criminal proceedings under section 122 of the Penal Code.

Enforcement. In its previous comments the Committee referred to the persistent discrimination denounced by trade unions and requested the Government to provide information on whether the labour inspectorate had dealt with any cases under section 5 of the Labour Code as well as to indicate whether the courts had decided any such cases. The Committee notes that according to the latest comments from TÜRK-İS the only remedies available for discrimination are in the context of lengthy and expensive legal proceedings. It further indicates that the burden of proof falls on the worker and that obtaining reinstatement in cases of dismissal is very difficult. The Committee notes that the Government provides no concrete information in this respect. The Committee highlights the importance of raising awareness of the relevant legislation, enhancing the capacity of the competent authorities, including judges, labour inspectors and other public officials, identifying and addressing cases of discrimination and also examining whether the applicable substantive and procedural provisions, in practice, allow claims to be brought successfully. The Committee also stresses the need to collect and publish information on the nature and outcome of discrimination complaints and cases, as a means of raising awareness of the legislation and of the avenues for dispute resolution, and in order to examine the effectiveness of the procedures and mechanisms (see General Survey, 2012, paragraph 871). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the complaints related to the implementation of section 5 of the Labour Code dealt with by the Labour Inspectorate as well as the cases brought before the judicial authorities. Please indicate the number, nature and outcome of such cases, including the number of reinstatements, and provide information on any assessment carried out on the effectiveness of the existing procedures, including the impact of the burden of proof, as well as any awareness-raising or capacity-building measures adopted.

Articles 1, 2 and 3(d). Application of the Convention in the civil service. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that civil servants are appointed on the basis of results of a centralized examination throughout the country. The Government further indicates that this selection is carried out in the framework of the “General Regulation on the examinations to be executed from those who shall be appointed to the public services for the first time” and the “Procedures and principles of the recruitment of workers in the public institutions and establishments” of 1 November 2009. According to the Government, this recruitment is done without any discrimination on the ground of sex, and career promotions are decided on the basis of prior examination. Furthermore, the Government indicates that positive measures are taken in favour of women to give them preference in certain posts related to “child improvement” and social services. The Committee notes, notwithstanding, that according to statistics provided by the Government in its latest report, there were 1,148,001 men and 592,923 women in the public service. The Committee considers that where measures are adopted in order to overcome the low participation of women in the public service, these measures should permit women to have access to all jobs at all levels including high-level jobs and those with career prospects. Moreover, measures that respond to historical attitudes and stereotypes regarding women’s and men’s aspirations, preferences and capabilities which increase or accentuate the existing sex segregation in the labour market should be avoided. The Committee requests the Government to take proactive measures to encourage women’s participation in the civil service and to address any allegations of gender discrimination in designations for positions or career promotion in the civil service and to report on the results achieved. It also requests the Government to ensure that both women and men can participate in practice in the examinations for different positions in the civil service on an equal footing. Please provide detailed information, disaggregated by sex, on how many people participate in these examinations and for which position and how many are designated for the different positions in the civil service.

In previous comments, the Committee referred to security investigations and expressed concern that they might lead to exclusions from civil service employment. The Committee understands from the Government’s reply that although the administrative courts may adopt a decision regarding exclusions from the civil service, these decisions constitute a mere statement that will not necessarily have an impact on the recruitment of a candidate. Noting that the Government does not provide information on the number of administrative decisions concerning security investigations on candidates for civil service positions, the number of administrative appeals against these decisions by those allegedly excluded from civil service on the basis of security investigations and the outcomes of those proceedings, the Committee reiterates its request to the Government to provide detailed information in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee notes the observations of 14 August 2012 of the Independent Trade Union Alliance (ASI) objecting that the Organic Labour Act (LOT), adopted through Decree No. 8938 on 7 May 2012, was not debated in Parliament. The ASI asserts in particular that the definition of sexual harassment in the LOT is incomplete because it does not include a reference to hostile working environment. The Committee notes that the ASI also refers to the status of women in the labour market stating that they are affected by unemployment, job instability and a lack of education. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these matters.

Yemen

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1969)

National policy on equality of opportunity with respect to political opinion, national extraction and social origin. The Committee notes that no information has been provided by the Government with respect to the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that no discrimination on the basis of political opinion, national extraction and social origin occurs in employment and occupation. The Committee recalls that the primary obligation of States that have ratified this Convention is to declare and pursue a national equality policy, and that the State cannot remain passive and implementation is measured by the effectiveness of the national policy and the results achieved (General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 734). The Committee therefore asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken to adopt and implement a national policy with respect to all the grounds set out in the Convention. The Committee also asks the Government to take immediate steps to collect and provide detailed information on all the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that no discrimination on the basis of political opinion, national extraction and social origin occurs in employment and occupation in accordance with Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 100 (Albania, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Armenia, Australia: Norfolk Island, Austria, Azerbaijan, Bahamas, Barbados, Belarus, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Plurinational State of Bolivia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Botswana, Brazil, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cambodia, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Côte d'Ivoire, Croatia, Cuba, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Eritrea, Estonia, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, France: French Polynesia, France: New Caledonia, Germany, Ghana, Grenada, Guinea, Guyana, Haiti, Hungary, Iceland, India, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Kazakhstan, Nigeria, Panama, Rwanda, Samoa, San Marino, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Sri Lanka, Syrian Arab Republic, Turkey, Uganda, Yemen); Convention No. 111 (Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Armenia, Austria, Azerbaijan, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belarus, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Plurinational State of Bolivia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Botswana, Brazil, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cambodia, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chile, China, China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Côte d'Ivoire, Croatia, Cuba, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Estonia, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, France: French Polynesia, France: New Caledonia, Germany, Ghana, Grenada, Guinea, Guyana, Haiti, Hungary, Iceland, India, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Republic of Korea, Kyrgyzstan, Liberia, Luxembourg, Mongolia, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Panama, Rwanda, Samoa, San Marino, Turkey, Uganda, Yemen); Convention No. 156 (Albania, Bulgaria, Croatia, Ethiopia, Finland, France, Guinea, Iceland, Japan, Niger, Norway, Peru, Portugal, Russian Federation, San Marino, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, Sweden, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Yemen).

The Committee noted the information supplied by the following State in answer to a direct request with regard to: Convention No. 111 (France: French Southern and Antarctic Territories).

Tripartite consultation

Botswana

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1997)

Effective tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's report received in September 2012 in reply to the 2009 observation. The Government indicates that section 143 of the Employment Act was amended in 2010 to increase the functions of the Labour Advisory Board to include advising and consulting the Minister on international labour standards. At the Labour Advisory Board meeting held on 26 January 2012, the Government reports that the Board discussed the possible ratification of the three governance Conventions not ratified by Botswana: the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129). The Board was also informed of the HIV and AIDS Recommendation, 2010 (No. 200), the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), and the Domestic Workers Recommendation, 2011 (No. 201). The Government indicates that Recommendation No. 200 was launched by the Minister of Labour and Home Affairs on 29 November 2011 and the social partners and other stakeholders were involved. In response to the Committee's request on the arrangements made for the financing of training on the consultative procedures, the Government indicates that a workshop on reporting on international labour standards was held in September 2012, which was facilitated by the standards specialist at the ILO Pretoria Office and included the social partners and other relevant stakeholders. The Government further indicates that efforts will be made to finance more necessary training in the future, funds permitting. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the consultations held on each of the matters concerning international labour standards listed in Article 5(1) of the Convention, and requests that the Government continue to provide information on the steps taken towards ratifying the governance Conventions. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information regarding its communications with the representative organizations of employers and workers, including the names of these organizations.

Burundi

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1997)

Tripartite consultation required by the Convention. Technical assistance to help member States fulfil their reporting obligations and comply with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee notes the comments by the Trade Union Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU) submitted to the Government in September 2012. The COSYBU points out that, despite efforts to introduce a culture of social dialogue, there is still a long way to go. The Committee notes with regret that it has been unable to examine a report from the Government since 2007. Referring once again to its 2007 observation, it requests the Government to submit a report containing detailed information on the content and results of tripartite consultations held since November 2007 on questions concerning international labour standards, and in particular on the reports to be made to the ILO as well as on the re-examination of unratified Conventions and Recommendations (Article 5(1)(c) and (d)). The Committee draws the Government's attention to the possibility of availing itself of the ILO's technical assistance to fill the gaps in the implementation of the Convention.

Chad

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its 2009 observation which read as follows:

Articles 2 and 5(1) of the Convention. Consultation mechanisms and effective tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's report received in October 2009. The Government refers to a Higher Committee for Labour and Social Security which is tripartite in composition. The Committee notes the Government's statement that no information is available on the consultations held during the period covered by the report on each of the items set out in Article 5(1). The Committee refers to the comments that it has been making since its examination of the first report and expresses the conviction that the Government and the social partners should endeavour to promote and strengthen tripartism and social dialogue on the matters covered by the Convention. The Committee refers to the 2008 Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization, which reaffirms that "social dialogue and the practice of tripartism between governments and the representative organizations of workers and employers within and across borders are now more relevant to achieving solutions and to building up social cohesion and the rule of law through, among other means, international labour standards". The Committee therefore hopes that the Government's next report will contain detailed information on the consultations held on all the items covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention, and on the other points raised in its previous observations in relation to Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Colombia

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1999)

Strengthening of social dialogue and tripartite consultations. In its observation of 2011 the Committee expressed its conviction that the Government and the social partners should endeavour to take tangible measures to promote and reinforce tripartism and social dialogue on matters relating to international labour standards covered by the Convention. The Government's report received in August 2012 states that on 24 May 2012 a tripartite Subcommittee on International Labour Matters was set up in the context of the Standing Committee for Dialogue on Wage and Labour Policies. The Committee notes with interest that one of the tasks of this Committee is to examine and be consulted on the subjects covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention. The Government also states that consultations were held with the social partners and in April 2012 the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), was submitted to the National Congress for ratification. The social partners were also consulted on the submission of 13 Conventions and a Protocol.

The National Employers' Association of Colombia (ANDI) indicates in its observations received in September 2012 that, in addition to the Standing Committee for Dialogue on Wage and Labour Policies, there are other forums for dialogue in which tripartite discussions are held on labour standards at national and international level. The International Organisation of Employers (IOE) also emphasizes the progress made in social dialogue and the many ways in which rapprochement has taken place between the social partners. Moreover, the Single Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CUT) and the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC) state in a joint communication of August 2012 that effective consultations should be held on an equal footing which ensure the fair participation of the most representative trade unions in all action relating to participation of the State vis-à-vis the ILO. The CUT states in an individual communication of August 2012 that the trade union movement is not only willing to engage in dialogue but also to support the ratification and implementation of international labour standards. The CUT drew up a list of pending issues with respect to which the ILO supervisory bodies have requested information in the reports on ratified Conventions.

The Committee refers to the resolution on tripartism and social dialogue adopted by the Conference at its 90th Session (2002), which emphasizes the fact that for tripartite consultations to be successful, the participants must demonstrate the necessary skills for social dialogue (capacity to be aware of the positions of the other parties, respect for each participant, abiding by commitments made, and a willingness to resolve differences). Furthermore, the Committee notes that the 2008 ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization identified Convention No. 144 as one of the most significant instruments in terms of governance. The Committee therefore expresses its conviction once again that there are new grounds for continuing to bring together the social partners and further intensify tripartite consultations. The Committee invites the Government to send information in its next report on the activities of the Tripartite Subcommittee on International Labour Matters and other consultations held on the subjects covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention.

Costa Rica

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1981)

Tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Committee notes the communication of the Confederation of Workers Rerum Novarum (CTRN), dated 30 August 2011. The CTRN indicated that in 2011 the Government did not consult the CTRN prior to sending reports to the Committee of Experts on the application of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), and the Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131). In the reply received in February 2012, the Government provided a copy of its letter dated 13 June 2011 forwarding to the representative organizations the comments of the Committee of Experts so that they could make the observations that they considered appropriate. The Committee also notes that on 26 August 2009 the Government forwarded a copy of the reports on ratified Conventions for the 2009 period to the office of the President of the CTRN and also to the presidents of other representative organizations. The Committee understands that the Government did not provide to the representative organizations the drafts of the reports before they were sent to the ILO.

The Committee recalls that the obligation to consult in advance the representative organizations concerning the reports that are to be made on the application of ratified Conventions, as established by Article 5(1)(d) of the Convention, must be distinguished from the obligation to provide copies of reports, set out in article 23(2) of the ILO Constitution. The Convention requires tripartite consultations to be held on questions arising out of the reports to be made to the ILO in relation to the application of ratified Conventions. These consultations must address the content of the replies to the comments of the supervisory bodies. The tripartite consultations that are required by the Convention therefore have to be held during the process of the preparation of the reports. When written consultations are held, the Government should transmit to the representative organizations a draft report in order to gather their opinions some period before preparing its definitive report (see General Survey on Tripartite Consultation, 2000, paragraph 93). The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the consultations held on each of the matters listed in Article 5(1) of the Convention. In particular, to ensure that the views of the representative organizations are taken into account, the Committee invites the Government to consider with the social partners the possibility of establishing a schedule for the preparation of reports (Article 5(1)(d) of the Convention).

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 2001)

Articles 2 and 5(1) of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. In its observation of 2010, the Committee noted the ministerial orders adopted after consultation of the National Labour Council in order to apply the Labour Code and the reports of the extraordinary meetings of the National Labour Council held in July 2005 and March 2008. In a brief report received in June 2011, the Government indicated that it will provide relevant information in the future on the effective submission to Parliament of the 28 instruments adopted at the 13 sessions of the Conference held between 1996 and 2010. The Committee refers the Government to its observation concerning the serious failure to submit the instruments adopted by the Conference with respect to the obligation established in article 19(5) and (6) of the ILO Constitution. It requests the Government to report on consultations held with the social partners concerning the proposals made to Parliament on the occasion of the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference. The Committee hopes that the Government will be in a position to announce further progress on tripartite consultations held on each of the matters relating to international labour standards covered by the Convention.

Article 3. Choice of employers' and workers' representatives. The Committee recalled in its previous observation that trade union elections were held for the fifth time between October 2008 and July 2009. It requests the Government to indicate who were the employers' and workers' representatives chosen for the purpose of tripartite consultations covered by the Convention and to state the manner in which it was ensured that they were freely chosen by their representative organizations.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Djibouti

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 2005)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It hopes that a report will be supplied for examination by the Committee at its next session and that it will contain full information on the matters raised in its 2008 direct request, which read as follows:

Articles 1 and 3(1) of the Convention. Participation of representative organizations. The Committee notes that, under section 215 of the Labour Code, the representative nature of trade union organizations shall be determined by the result of professional elections. Referring to the issues concerning freedom of association dealt with by the Committee on Freedom of Association, as well as its comments on the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Committee requests the Government to specify the manner in which the representatives of employers and workers were chosen, enabling them to freely undertake the tripartite consultations required by Convention No. 144.

Article 4(2). Financing of training. The Committee noted that two tripartite workshops have been organized. The Committee hopes that the Government will be able to indicate in its next report the arrangements made for the financing of the necessary training of participants in the consultative procedures.

Article 5(1)(c) and (e). Tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Government indicates that, in accordance with section 3 of Decree No. 2008-0023/PR/MESN of 20 January 2008 regulating the organization and operation of the National Council for Labour, Employment and Vocational Training, the Council may give technical and legal advice on the proper implementation or possible denunciation of the international labour Conventions to which Djibouti is a party. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the consultations held in the National Council for Labour, Employment and Vocational Training on each of the matters relating to international labour standards referred to in Article 5(1) of the Convention. Please also indicate whether tripartite consultations have been held on the ratification of the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135), Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158), and the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181).

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary actions in the near future.

Dominican Republic

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1999)

Tripartite consultations required by the Convention. Observations from trade union confederations. The Committee notes the detailed report from the Government received in October 2012 and the new observations from the National Confederation of Trade Union Unity (CNUS), the Autonomous Confederation of Workers' Unions (CASC) and the National Confederation of Dominican Workers (CNTD). In the observations sent to the Government in October 2012, the trade union confederations again express their concern at the fact that they did not receive the reports and questionnaires due from the Government. According to the trade union confederations, no institutional procedure was established for tripartite participation in the adoption, submission, ratification and application of international labour standards. The Government states in its report that it regrets that the trade union confederations have not received the reports by the deadline and in the form established by the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government undertakes to hold tripartite consultations with respect to the drafting of the reports called for under Article 5 of the Convention. The Committee also observes that the consultations on international labour standards required by the Convention are not included in the information provided for by the Government on the consultations held in the Labour Advisory Council in 2010, 2011 and 2012. The Committee invites the Government to ensure full compliance with the tripartite consultations required when preparing draft reports on the application of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(d) of the Convention). It also invites the Government to provide detailed information, in the next report due in 2013, on the consultations held on the matters relating to international labour standards provided for in Article 5(1) of the Convention.

Grenada

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1994)

Tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's brief report received in September 2012, in which it indicates that tripartism has existed in the country for many years, both in practice and in law. It also indicates that, although there are no legislative provisions with respect to the matters dealt with in Convention No. 144, the preparation of replies to Conventions and Recommendations and the composition of delegations to the International Labour Conference and regional and subregional conferences have included delegations from both the employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee further notes that the Labour Advisory Board, a tripartite body, meets at least once per month to discuss matters relating to labour. The Committee also notes that the Government's brief report does not discuss consultation activities pursuant to Article 5 of the Convention. The Committee again must invite the Government to provide detailed information on the consultations held on each of the matters concerning international labour standards listed in Article 5(1) of the Convention. It also invites the Government to include information on the activities of the Labour Advisory Board on the matters covered by the Convention.

Guatemala

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1989)

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. As in its 2011 direct request, the Committee notes the extensive documentation regarding the representatives appointed to the Tripartite Committee for International Labour Affairs sent by the Government in a report received in September 2012. Under one of the items addressed by the Tripartite Committee in May 2012, proposals were made by the three sectors for setting up a Decent Work Programme in Guatemala. The Government also provides the convening letters, attendance lists and minutes of the meetings held between August 2011 and July 2012. The Committee invites the Government to continue to send detailed information on the tripartite consultations held on the subjects relating to international labour standards covered by the Convention.

Observations on the application of the Convention. The Trade Union Confederation of Guatemala (UNSI TRAGUA), together with the Confederation of Workers of Guatemala (CGTG) and the Trade Union Confederation of Guatemala (CUSG) sent a communication to the Government in September 2012 expressing reservations about the development of social dialogue and the effectiveness of the consultations held in the Tripartite Committee. The Indigenous and Rural Workers Trade Union Movement of Guatemala (MSICG), in a communication sent to the Government in September 2012, asserted breach of the Convention in connection with the transmission of reports by the Government and a policy to create forums for social dialogue. The MSICG refers specifically to the adoption in January 2012 of the Act on the Organization of the Economic and Social Council. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on the abovementioned observations.

Guinea

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1995)

Effective tripartite consultations required by the Convention. Financing of training. The Committee notes the Government's report received in July 2012. The Government indicates that the activities of the Labour and Social Legislation Advisory Committee (CCTLS) were suspended and only resumed in 2011. The Advisory Committee held its first session from 8 to 23 November 2011 on the rereading of the draft Labour Code. It proposes to conduct an exchange on the items placed on the agenda of the next session of the Conference. In reply to the Committee's latest comments, the Government indicates that the cost of CCTLS sessions are covered by the national development budget. The Government refers in its report to the activities conducted in the context of the regional programme for the promotion of social dialogue in francophone Africa, including the tripartite workshop on training in collective bargaining techniques and the training workshop for members of the steering committee of the National Forum on Social Dialogue held in 2010. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information in its next report on the consultations held on the matters referred to in Article 5(1) of the Convention (reply to questionnaires, submissions to the National Assembly, re-examination of unratified Conventions and of Recommendations, reports to be made to the ILO) including information on the activities of the CCTLS in relation to the consultations required by the Convention (Articles 2 and 5). The Committee also requests the Government to describe, in its next report, the training activities which were conducted in relation to international labour standards (Article 4).

Guyana

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1983)

Effective tripartite consultations. The Committee notes the Government's very brief report received in May 2012 in reply to its previous comments. The Government indicates that the ILO Tripartite Committee is required to meet monthly but sometimes meetings are cancelled due to no quorum. The Government also reports that consultations on unratified Conventions have not been done seriously and this issue will be brought to the attention of the Subcommittee (Article 5(1)(c) of the Convention). The Committee refers to its 2012 direct request on the Unemployment Convention, 1919 (No. 2), in which it invited the Government and the social partners to contemplate ratifying more recent employment Conventions, that is, the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88), the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181). The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report information on any development with regard to tripartite consultations on unratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(c) of the Convention).

Replies to questionnaires, submissions to the Assembly of Parliament and reports to be made to the ILO. The Committee has been recalling for many years that certain subjects covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention (replies to questionnaires (a), submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to the Assembly of the Parliament (b), and reports to be made to the ILO (d)) involve annual consultation. The Committee hopes that the Government will be able to provide in its next report information on tripartite consultations held on the matters covered by Article 5(1)(a), (b) and (d).

Indonesia

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1990)

Tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in August 2012. The Government indicates that, to date, national tripartite consultations have been effective. In application of Article 5(1) of the Convention, the Government reports that it is conducting tripartite consultations with the most representative organizations of employers and workers with respect to the replies to questionnaires concerning items on the agenda of the Conference, the annual reporting on the application of ratified and unratified Conventions, and the submission of new international labour standards adopted by the Conference to the House of Representatives. However, the Government indicates that not all issues regarding international labour standards are discussed at the National Tripartite Cooperation Institution given the amount of priority issues and matters to discuss in the field of manpower. Nevertheless, there are always consultations between the Government and employers' and workers' organizations at the national level, which are mostly members of the National Tripartite Cooperation Institution. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report detailed information on the effective consultations held on each of the matters listed in Article 5(1) of the Convention, including information on the nature of any reports or recommendations made as a result of the consultations.

Ireland

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1979)

Tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report received in October 2012, in which the Government states that it continues to comply with Convention No. 144, as outlined in previous reports. The Committee notes that the previous report was received in October 2005. The Government indicates that the Department of Jobs, Enterprise and Innovation continues to consult the Irish Business and Employers Confederation and the Irish Congress of Trade Unions in relation to ILO matters. Department officials meet with the national social partners regularly throughout the year to discuss departmental business, which can include discussions on ILO Conventions. The Government adds that all reports submitted to the ILO concerning Conventions are sent to the national social partners for their observations. No decision is made with respect to the ratification or acceptance of Conventions and Recommendations prior to the receipt and consideration of the views of employers' and workers' representatives. The Committee invites the Government to provide updated information on the effective tripartite consultations held on replies to questionnaires concerning items on the agenda of the Conference, proposals made on submission to Parliament of the instruments adopted by the Conference, re-examination of unratified Conventions and Recommendations, questions arising out of the report to be made on the application of Conventions, and denunciation of Conventions (Article 5(1) of the Convention).

Jamaica

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1996)

Tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's report received in September 2012. The Government indicates that the Labour Advisory Committee (LAC) meets on a quarterly basis to discuss matters concerning the labour market, legislation and policy. It further indicates that matters relating to Article 5 of the Convention are not usually individually addressed at LAC meetings. However, particular issues which arise at the International Labour Conference are discussed. The Committee notes that in early 2012, the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), and issues relating to child labour were discussed at LAC meetings. The Committee recalls that the tripartite consultations covered by the Convention are essentially intended to promote the implementation of international labour standards and concern, in particular, the matters enumerated in Article 5(1) of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide detailed information in its next report on the effective tripartite consultations held by the LAC on each of the matters concerning international labour standards listed in Article 5(1) of the Convention (replies to questionnaires, submissions to the competent authorities, re-examination of unratified Conventions and Recommendations, reports to be made to the ILO).

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 2003)

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. Consultation mechanisms and effective tripartite consultations required by the Convention. In its 2011 observation, the Committee invited the Government to report on the content and outcome of the tripartite consultations held on the matters related to international labour standards. The Government states in its reply received in July 2012 that it will subsequently communicate information on further consultations held by the national Tripartite Committee which will be undertaken pursuant to Article 5(1) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the operation of the consultation mechanism, specifying the activities of the Tripartite Committee on each of the matters related to international labour standards covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention, and indicating the nature of any reports or recommendations made as a result of the tripartite consultations.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Kenya

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1990)

Effective tripartite consultations. The Committee notes the Government's brief report received in August 2012 in reply to the observation formulated in 2010. In its previous observation, the Committee noted that the National Labour Board (NLB) discussed the following unratified Conventions: the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988 (No. 168), the Maternity Protection Convention, 2000 (No. 183), the Safety and Health in Agriculture Convention, 2001 (No. 184), the Seafarers' Identity Documents Convention (Revised), 2003 (No. 185), the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187), and the Work in Fishing Convention, 2007 (No. 188). In its report, the Government indicates that the NLB International Labour Standards Committee has not been able to discuss the ratification of the unratified Conventions due to other urgent matters. However, the tripartite committee will endeavour to discuss them during this financial year, pending the enactment into law of the new process of ratification of international instruments. The Government also indicates that comments from the NLB on instruments submitted to the National Assembly are still being awaited and will be reported back as soon as received. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on consultations held within the National Labour Board on unratified Conventions and the outcome of such consultations (Article 5(1)(c)). It would also welcome receiving information on proposals which may have been made by the National Labour Board regarding the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 99th, 100th and 101st Sessions that were submitted to the National Assembly in August 2012 (Article 5(1)(b)). Please also provide information on the other matters covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention (replies to questionnaires concerning items on the agenda of the Conference and questions arising out of reports to be made on the application of ratified Conventions).

Republic of Korea

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1999)

Tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Committee notes the report provided by the Government for the period from July 2010 to May 2012 and the observations submitted by the Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU) in September 2012. It also notes the observations of the Korea Employers Federation (KEF), which were included in a position paper dated 8 August 2012. The Government reports that the International Labour Policy Council held meetings to discuss matters concerning the ratification of ILO Conventions. The Government further indicates that at a meeting held in December 2010, the Council approved a plan to pursue the ratification of the Unemployment Convention, 1919 (No. 2), the Forty-Hour Week Convention, 1935 (No. 47), the Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1957 (No. 106), and the Occupational Cancer Convention, 1974 (No. 139). The Committee notes with interest that Conventions Nos 2, 47 and 139 were ratified in November 2011, along with the Radiation Protection Convention, 1960 (No. 115). The KEF indicates that the Government has held written discussions four times within the past five years to gather opinions from workers' and employers' representatives of the International Labour Policy Council on matters concerning the ratification of ILO Conventions, and undertook consultations at least once a year to discuss matters pertaining to Article 5 of the Convention. The FKTU indicates that the Government has not fully implemented Article 5(2) of the Convention, that is, to convene meetings of the International Labour Policy Council at least once a year. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report information concerning the content and outcome of the consultations held on each of the matters listed in Article 5(1) of the Convention, including information regarding the frequency and the framework of these consultations (Article 5(2)). It also invites the Government to continue to provide information on the activities of the International Labour Policy Council on the matters covered by the Convention.

Kuwait

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 2000)

Effective tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Committee notes the reply supplied by the Government to its previous observation in a report received in August 2012. The Government indicates that the tripartite Consultative Committee for Labour Affairs established in 2010 has not yet held its first meeting due to the organizational problems experienced by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs in the last two years. It states that the fact that the tripartite Consultative Committee has not held any meetings does not mean that there are no effective tripartite consultations, as the establishment of the tripartite committee was made to enhance tripartite dialogue. The Committee invites the Government to indicate how effective tripartite consultations were held for the period 2010–12 on each of the matters relating to international labour standards set out in Article 5(1) of the Convention, stating their object and frequency, and also to indicate the nature of any reports or recommendations made as a result of the consultations.

Madagascar

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1997)

Articles 2 and 5(1) of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations required by the Convention. ILO technical assistance. In its 2010 observation the Committee invited the Government and the social partners to promote and strengthen tripartism and social dialogue on the issues relating to international labour standards covered by the Convention. In its reply of October 2012 the Government indicates that the criteria for representativeness of employers' and workers' organizations were established by Decree No. 211-490 of 6 September 2011 concerning trade union organizations and representativeness. The Government adds that the adoption of Decree No. 211-490 has been the subject of numerous discussion meetings within the National Labour Council (CNT) with a view to settling the problems linked to determination of the most representative employers' and workers' organizations. The Government further indicates that in the current period of crisis the CNT is endeavouring to discharge its mandate by focusing on subjects of direct interest to workers and employers. The Committee notes that the General Confederation of Workers' Unions of Madagascar (CGSTM), in its observations sent in August 2012, considers that the CNT has not been operating satisfactorily and that the CNT does not attach enough importance to ILO activities and to social dialogue, and the CGSTM affirms that, in certain cases, the opinions of the CNT have been ignored by the Government. The Committee notes that the social partners, faced with what they perceived to be a dysfunctional situation, called for ILO assistance to be requested in November 2011 in order to undertake a reform of the CNT. CGSTM declares that it is encouraging the Government to promote the use of tripartite consultations in accordance with Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that the 2008 ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization recognizes Convention No. 144 as one of the instruments that is most significant from the viewpoint of governance. The Committee hopes that the ILO technical assistance called for by the social partners can be provided and that the Government will then be in a position to provide detailed information enabling the Committee to establish that, as required by the Convention, effective tripartite consultations on international labour standards have taken place in practice. It hopes that the Government will be in a position to provide up-to-date and detailed information on the manner in which representatives of employers and workers have been chosen for the purposes of the Convention (Article 3 of the Convention) and on the content and outcome of tripartite consultations held on each of the matters referred to in Article 5(1).

Malawi

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1986)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its 2011 observation which read as follows:

Tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Committee notes a brief report received in June 2011. The Government indicates that the Tripartite Labour Advisory Council, the Social Dialogue Council, and the Wages Advisory Council ensure effective tripartite consultations. The Tripartite Labour Advisory Council is in charge of advising the Ministry of Labour on all employment-related issues. The Committee refers to its 2008 and 2010 observations and again asks the Government to submit a report containing detailed information on the tripartite consultations held on each of the matters related to international labour standards covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention. It also requests the Government to include information on the nature of any reports or recommendations made as a result of such consultations.

Article 5(1)(c) and (e). Prospects of ratification of unratified Conventions and proposals for the denunciation of ratified Conventions. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled that the ILO Governing Body recommended the denunciation of Conventions Nos 50, 64, 65, 86, 104 and 107 concerning indigenous workers and the ratification of the most updated instrument, the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169). In the Committee's 2005 direct request on the Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935 (No. 45), the Government was invited to give favourable consideration to the ratification of the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176), which shifts the emphasis from a specific category of workers to the safety and health protection of all mineworkers, and in turn to denounce Convention No. 45. The Committee again invites the stakeholders concerned to hold tripartite consultations to re-examine unratified Conventions – such as Conventions Nos 169 and 176 – in order to promote, as appropriate, their implementation or ratification and to denounce outdated Conventions.

Mozambique

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1996)

Tripartite consultations required by the Convention. ILO technical assistance. The Committee takes note of a brief report received in September 2012. The Government indicates that the Labour Advisory Commission's role is to promote social dialogue and partnership with respect to the Government's economic, social and labour policies. Negotiations to readjust national minimum wages and promote regulatory instruments, especially in the area of labour law, are conducted in the framework of social partnership. The Government also refers to consultation and social dialogue forums at the provincial level. The Committee once again requests the Government to submit a report containing detailed and updated information on the tripartite consultations concerning each of the matters covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention (replies to questionnaires, submissions to the competent authorities, re-examination of unratified Conventions and Recommendations, reports to be made to the ILO). It also requests the Government to include information on the nature of the reports or recommendations resulting from these consultations. In addition, the Committee invites the Government to provide detailed information on the content and results of the forums at provincial level to which it refers. In addition, the Committee once again draws the Government's attention to the possibility of seeking technical assistance from the Office in order to enable the provision of detailed information, allowing the Committee to examine, as the Convention requires, whether tripartite consultations on international labour standards are effectively carried out (Article 5(1) of the Convention).

Nepal

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1995)

Tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's report received in October 2012. The Government indicates that it has been promoting social dialogue on a bipartite and tripartite basis wherever and whenever possible. It recalls that tripartism has been firmly institutionalized and all the major policy decisions and legislative initiatives are the result of tripartite consultations and consensus. The Government reports that all committees established under the Ministry of Labour and Employment which are related to labour, industrial relations, occupational safety and health and child labour are tripartite in their composition. In addition, all matters related with the agenda of the International Labour Conference or articles 19 and 22 of the ILO Constitution are discussed with the social partners. The Government also reports that if any new problems or issues emerge in the future, they will also be sorted out through tripartite consultations and consensus. The Committee notes that the third National Labour and Employment Conference, held on 9–11 July 2012, was organized with technical and financial support from the ILO Nepal Office and concluded with the endorsement of a 15-point declaration. One point in the declaration refers to the development and promotion of good labour relations and the creation of a trusted tripartite environment. The Committee invites the Government to report on the adoption and operation of any new procedure that ensures effective consultations with respect to matters concerning the activities of the ILO set out in the Convention (Article 2(1) of the Convention). The Committee also asks the Government to include in its next report specific information on the content and outcome of the consultations held regarding international labour standards, as required by Article 5(1) of the Convention, and especially on questionnaires concerning items on the agenda of the Conference, submission of instruments adopted by the Conference to the National Assembly, and reports to be made on the application of ratified Conventions.

Nigeria

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1994)

Consultations with representative organizations. In reply to the comments formulated in 2006, the Committee notes the Government's brief report received in November 2012, in which it indicates that the National Labour Institutions Bill is still before the National Assembly. The Committee recalls that it is important for employers' and workers' organizations to enjoy the right to freedom of association, without which there could be no effective system of tripartite consultation. The Committee asks the Government to report on the results of the legislative reform and its impact on the improvement of consultations with representative organizations that enjoy freedom of association, as required under this Convention.

Tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Government indicates in its report that its replies to questionnaires concerning items on the agenda of the International Labour Conference and comments on proposed texts are usually forwarded to the social partners for their input. It also states that social partners participate in the rendering of reports. The Committee recalls that the tripartite consultations covered by the Convention are essentially intended to promote the implementation of international labour standards and concern, in particular, the matters enumerated in Article 5(1) of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide full and detailed information on the content and outcome of tripartite consultations dealing with:

- (a) the Government's replies to questionnaires concerning items on the agenda of the Conference and the Government's comments on proposed texts to be discussed by the Conference; and
- (b) questions arising out of reports to be made to the International Labour Office under article 22 of the ILO Constitution.

Prior tripartite consultations on proposals made to the National Assembly. The Committee recalls that the instruments adopted at the 95th Session of the Conference were submitted to the National Assembly for noting on 21 August 2006. The Government stated that there was no tripartite consultation as there was no request for their ratification. The Committee points out that, for those States which have already ratified Convention No. 144, effective prior consultations have to be held on the proposals made to the competent authorities when submitting the instruments adopted by the Conference (Article 5(1)(b)). Even if the Government does not intend to propose the ratification of a Convention, the social partners must be consulted sufficiently in advance for them to reach their opinions before the Government finalizes its decision. The Committee refers to the observation formulated again this year on the constitutional obligations under article 19 of the ILO Constitution and trusts that the Government and the social partners will examine the measures to be taken with a view to holding effective consultations on the proposals made to the National Assembly when submitting the instruments adopted by the Conference, as required by the Convention.

Operation of the consultative procedures. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate whether, in accordance with Article 6, the representative organizations have been consulted in the preparation of an annual report on the working of the consultation procedures provided for in the Convention and, if so, to indicate the outcome of these consultations.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Sao Tome and Principe

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observations which read as follows:

Mechanisms for tripartite consultations and the consultations required by the Convention. In a brief report received in March 2007, the Government refers to the tripartite consultations carried out through the National Council for Social Dialogue. The Government also indicates that the National Council meets regularly. The Committee refers to its previous observations and once again invites the Government to indicate in its next report the manner in which the National Council is involved in the consultations required by the Convention and to provide particulars of the consultations held on each of the matters on international labour standards referred to in Article 5(1) of the Convention, including information on the reports or recommendations made on international labour standards as a result of such consultations.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Serbia

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 2005)

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's detailed report received in September 2012 in response to the request made by the Committee in its 2011 observation and by the Conference Committee in June 2012. It also notes the observations submitted by the Trade Union Confederation Nezavisnost and the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions of Serbia (CATUS) in September 2012. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government indicating that, as a result of the submission procedures, it has the intention to ratify both the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), and the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189). The Government indicates that it submits a report each year on the implementation of ILO Conventions to the social partners and the Economic and Social Council. It adds that the opinions of the social partners are duly submitted to the ILO. With respect to the observations submitted by the Serbian Association of Employers, noted in the 2011 observation concerning the short deadline to provide comments on reports on the application of ratified Conventions, the Government replies that reports were submitted to all the social partners on 18 August 2011, with the deadline for submitting comments until 28 August 2011. Reports could not have been submitted earlier to the social partners due to delays in the delivery of contributions from other relevant institutions. The Government indicates that representatives of CATUS sought and were granted an extension of this deadline, and their comments were submitted by 15 September 2011. The Government adds that it has never happened that it does not accept a request to extend the deadline for the submission of contributions of any organization which is responsible for providing comments on the implementation of ILO Conventions. To avoid such situations in the future, the Ministry of Labour and Social Policy will inform social partners that they can always request additional time to submit comments, if needed.

The Committee notes that Nezavisnost reiterates its prior concerns, that while a regulatory framework for social dialogue exists formally, the Government's report does not include information on the functioning of the consultative mechanisms nor information on the activities of the Economic and Social Council. In addition, the CATUS indicates that a number of legal projects were submitted to Parliament for adoption without the opinion of the Economic and Social Council. The Committee invites the Government to provide information with respect to the issues raised by the social partners. It also invites the Government to provide in its next report information on the operation of the consultation mechanism, specifying the activities of the Economic and Social Council on the matters related to international labour standards listed in Article 5(1) of the Convention. Please also indicate the frequency of consultations held and the nature of any reports or recommendations made by the Economic and Social Council on the matters covered by the Convention as a result thereof (Article 5(2)).

The Committee notes that the Government provided an additional reply in late November 2012 to the comments from Nezavisnost. The Committee will examine this additional reply in 2013 at the same time it will consider the Government's further information requested above in this observation.

Sierra Leone

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1985)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observations which read as follows:

Effective tripartite consultations. The Committee notes the Government's report supplied in June 2004 indicating its commitment to promote tripartite consultation throughout the country as well as supporting the tripartite delegation to the International Labour Conference. The Committee hopes that the Government and the social partners will examine how the Convention is applied and that the Government's next report will contain indications on any measures taken in order to implement effective tripartite consultation in the sense of the Convention (Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention).

The Committee recalls that the Office has the technical capacity to help strengthen social dialogue and support the activities that governments and employers' and workers' organizations undertake for the consultations required by the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Uganda

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1994)

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Committee notes the communication of the National Organisation of Trade Unions (NOTU), which was transmitted to the Government in September 2012, concerning the application of the Convention. The NOTU indicates that the level of tripartism is still very low, especially on issues of labour standards and that the Government did not respond to their request to provide a copy of the report on the implementation of Conventions and Recommendations. The Committee requests the Government to transmit any comments it may wish to make in response to the observations of the NOTU.

Furthermore, the Committee notes with regret that the Government has not provided any information on the application of the Convention since June 2004. The Committee trusts that the Government will be able to provide a report, including information in reply to the points raised in 2004:

The Government indicated that the application of this Convention continues to depend on active tripartite participation, and that consultations were undertaken particularly at the time of revision of the national labour legislation. It also stated that training on the procedures and content of international labour standards might increase the effectiveness of tripartite consultation. The Government stated that it has received technical and financial assistance from the ILO to hold seminars and workshops on consultative procedures. The Committee invites the Government to report on any progress achieved in this field.

Tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide details on the consultations regarding international labour standards covered by the Convention (Article 5(1)).

Article 5(1)(c) and (e). The Committee recalls that the ILO Governing Body has invited States which are parties to certain Conventions that Uganda has ratified to contemplate ratifying the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), and denouncing Conventions Nos 50, 64, 65 and 86. States parties to the Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935 (No. 45), were invited to contemplate ratifying the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176). Please indicate if tripartite consultations are envisaged on this matter.

Article 6. The Committee again requests the Government to indicate whether the representative organizations were consulted with regard to the production of an annual report on the operation of the procedures covered by the Convention and, if so, to state the outcome of these consultations.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1983)

Communications from employers' and workers' organizations. Tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Committee notes the observations of the Independent Trade Union Alliance (ASI) sent to the Government in September 2011. It notes that according to the ASI, the information sent to the Committee of Experts has not been communicated to the workers' organizations, which affects their ability to make relevant observations on the application of ratified Conventions. In observations sent to the Government in September 2011, the Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Production of Venezuela (FEDECAMARAS) likewise referred once again to the absence of any bipartite and tripartite consultations. FEDECAMARAS again urged the Government to establish social dialogue and tripartite consultation as a genuine and sure path towards the social and economic development of the country. FEDECAMARAS again noted the lack of any consultation in the framing and adoption of various legislative texts. In observations sent to the Government in September 2012, the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV) states that it asked the Government to inform it of the content of the reports sent to the Committee of Experts in 2012, but was not given the opportunity to make relevant observations. In observations sent to the Government in September 2012, FEDECAMARAS again reports failure to consult the most representative employers' association of the country when a number of important laws were promulgated, including the Organizational Act on Labour and Men and Women Workers, in May 2012. In a communication received in August 2012, the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) expressed support for the observations made by FEDECAMARAS, asserting that the facts they recounted are evidence of a total absence of social dialogue in the country. The IOE adds that the very existence of independent employers' organizations, particularly FEDECAMARAS, the most representative employers' association in the country, is at risk. In replying to the social partners' observations received in November 2012, the Government explains that, on 4 September 2012, the CTV received a digital copy of 11 reports prepared for 2012. The Government reports that a committee consisting of all sectors in the country was established to discuss the new Organizational Act on Labour. The Committee refers to its observation of 2010 in which it reiterated its conviction that the Government and the social partners should undertake to promote and strengthen tripartism and social dialogue on the matters covered by the Convention. The Committee again invites the Government to indicate the manner in which the opinions expressed by the representative organizations consulted on each of the matters covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention are taken into account, with particular reference to how its practice has evolved with regard to tripartite consultation on draft reports on the application of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(d)).

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 144 (Armenia, Bahamas, Barbados, Belarus, Belize, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, China, China: Macau Special Administrative Region, El Salvador, France: French Polynesia, Gabon, Greece, Iceland, India, Iraq, Israel, Japan, Latvia, Lesotho, Liberia, Malaysia, Mali, Mexico, Republic of Moldova, Mongolia, Montenegro, Namibia, Netherlands: Aruba, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Trinidad and Tobago, Yemen, Zambia).

Labour administration and inspection

Angola

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1976)

ILO technical assistance and reform of the labour inspection system. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to keep the ILO informed of measures taken in the framework of the ongoing reform of the labour inspection system, particularly in respect of the recommendations made by the Office. The Government indicates that the implementation of the Institutional Development Plan is based on: (a) organic restructuring; (b) adequacy of human resources; (c) adequacy of infrastructure and means of action; and (d) institutional cooperation. It states that a draft organic statute on the general labour inspectorate has been prepared and submitted to the competent bodies for evaluation and approval.

The Committee also notes with interest the information provided in the Government's report and that contained in the 2010 and 2011 inspection reports, particularly concerning: (a) the recruitment by competition in 2011 of 78 new inspectors and the recruitment and initial training planned for 2012 of a further 58 inspectors; (b) the implementation of an initial 120-hour training course for labour inspectors on labour inspection and control activities, including an introduction to law and to occupational safety and health; (c) the organization of continuous training sessions, particularly in the areas of labour relations and occupational safety and health; (d) the acquisition in 2011 of 30 cars for use by local offices and the acquisition of another 30 planned for 2012; (e) the supply of computers to central and local offices and the supply of 50 laptops for 50 country units planned for 2012; (f) the renewal of much of the office furniture in central offices and in the Luanda local services; (g) the development of a data base, which, the Government hopes, will be finalized by the end of 2012; (h) the holding of a conference on the new occupational safety and health challenges organized with ILO support and attended by 50 labour inspectors, as well as employers' and workers' representatives; (i) the participation of inspectors from the ministries of industry, of health and of the interior in a visit to facilities of a nitrogen production plant; (j) the launching in 2010 and 2011 of campaigns on occupational accident and disease prevention in the civil construction sector; (k) the holding of and participation in conferences and seminars organized by enterprises on occupational safety and health, occupational accident and disease prevention and the responsibility of employers and workers in the application of standards on occupational safety and health. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the measures taken in the framework of the reform of the labour inspection system, particularly the measures to follow-up on the recommendations made in the context of ILO assistance for the implementation of the legislative reforms, describing their impact on the application of the Convention in the areas of occupational safety and health, conditions of service (remuneration and labour inspectors' career prospects), the functions of labour inspectors (with a view to relieving them of additional functions, such as mediation and conciliation), classification of breaches of labour law according to their gravity, determination of appropriate sanctions, the obligation to notify to the labour inspectorate cases of occupational accidents and diseases, and the need to ensure the enforcement of legal provisions. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would also provide a copy of any relevant texts or documents.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Antigua and Barbuda

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1983)

Articles 3(2) and 16 of the Convention. Functions of the labour inspectors and frequency of inspection visits. The Committee recalls that, according to the job description that had been provided by the Government in 2008, it would have been possible to entrust labour inspectors with duties which might not be part of the primary functions set out in Article 3(1)(a)–(c). It moreover recalls that, from 1997 to 2009, there was a high fluctuation in the number of labour inspections conducted (1997: 362; 1998: 75; 1999: 332; 2000: 75; 2001: 127; 2002: 81; 2003: 53). Consequently, the Committee asked the Government to provide information in relation to additional functions that might be entrusted to them, and on statistics on labour inspection visits. In its report, the Government refers to the functions of the Inspection Unit as provided by Labour Code Act No. 14 of 1975, and which are in conformity with the Convention, and indicates the number of inspections conducted in 2009 (248) and 2010 (128). In this context, the Committee also takes note of the information provided in a communication addressed to the Labour Commissioner's Office of 9 July 2012, which had been shared with the ILO, to the effect that job descriptions for all public service positions were being updated within the Public Sector Transformation Strategy.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government could provide the Office with an updated job description for labour inspectors, once completed. It also invites the Government to revisit the job description for labour inspectors within this Transformation Strategy, with regard to the comments which were already brought forward by the Committee.

It also asks the Government to explain the continuing high fluctuation in inspection numbers, with inspection visits having almost halved in 2010 compared to 2009.

Article 5. Cooperation between the labour inspection services and other Government services or public institutions and collaboration with employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee notes with regret that, despite long-standing comments, and previous commitments expressed by the Government, the Government is silent on the subject of collaboration with the Ministry of Health in particular, as it only refers to the comments made in its previous report. The Committee is therefore bound to again repeat its request for detailed information on the difficulties which prevent the adoption of practical measures to develop cooperation between the labour inspectorate and the Ministry of Health (such as on regular exchange of information and data, common training seminars or conferences), and asks the Government again to provide details on the content and modalities of any existing cooperation.

It reminds the Government that it may avail itself of ILO assistance in this area if it so wishes.

As far as collaboration with the social partners is concerned, the Government repeats information previously brought forward indicating that collaboration exists between the labour inspectors and social partners, and that all violations are reported to the labour inspection units and followed up accordingly. Noting the limited amount of information provided on this matter, the Committee is bound to repeat its previous request, encouraging the Government to seek for collaboration between the labour inspectorate and social partners, and to keep the ILO informed of the results achieved. Moreover, it requests the Government again to indicate whether the labour inspectorate is associated in the work of the National Labour Board.

Articles 6, 7 and 10. Number, status and qualifications of labour inspectors. The Committee recalls that the labour inspectorate comprises “non-established” and “established” labour inspectors, with all of them performing labour inspection functions, but with only one person being specialized in occupational safety and health. It also observed that labour inspectors were remunerated according to the scale of the department in which they were placed and that there were no requirements as to the qualification and the level of competence required, notably as far as “non-established” labour inspectors were concerned. Consequently, recalling the obligations set out in Articles 6, 7 and 10, the Committee requested the Government to take measures to staff the labour inspectorate with a sufficient number of labour inspectors, who are suitably qualified, to ensure a status which grants them stability of employment and adequate wages, and to specify the remuneration scale applicable to labour inspectors.

In this context, the Committee notes the Government’s reply indicating that it is in the process of merging the two existing systems in the public service, and that it is envisaged to recruit labour inspectors on the basis of the qualifications and level of competence required for such positions. It also notes from the communication from the Director of Public Sector Transformation of 9 July 2012, addressed to the Labour Commissioner’s Office, that it is intended, within the public sector reform that was approved by the Cabinet of Antigua and Barbuda in 2010, to complete a payroll audit in order to identify discrepancies between staffing levels and monies paid out in salaries, and to update job descriptions. Moreover, the Committee notes from this communication that the Civil Service Act had been redrafted and is currently being prepared by the Parliamentary Counsel for presentation to the September sitting of the Parliament.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of the civil service reform. It asks the Government to keep the Office informed of any progress made in this regard, and to elaborate in particular the way in which the points raised by the Committee are being addressed by the civil service law reform.

It asks the Government to submit the amended civil service legislation, once adopted by the Parliament, and information on the possible new salary scales applicable to labour inspectors by comparison to the remuneration of public officers with similar functions such as tax inspectors.

Noting that the Government has not replied to its previous comments, the Committee once again requests it to provide details on the training programmes provided to labour inspectors (subjects, duration, attendance, evaluation and impact) and to communicate copies of any relevant documents.

Articles 17–21. Number of penalties imposed and warnings issued. Submission of a consolidated annual inspection report. The Committee observes that the Government abstains from providing information on the number of warnings issued and prosecutions launched as previously requested. It recalls that, in accordance with Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention, the central authority should publish an annual general report on the work of the inspection services containing information and statistics on the subjects enumerated in Article 21(a)–(g), including on penalties imposed. With reference to its general observation of 2010 the Committee recalls that when well prepared, the annual reports offer an indispensable basis for the evaluation of the results in practice of the activities of the labour inspection service and, subsequently, the determination of the means necessary to improve their effectiveness. In this regard it notes with interest that the Government, with the help of the Office, is in the process of implementing a Labour Market Information System to ensure that data are available for annual reports to be completed within the prescribed deadlines (Article 20).

The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any progress made in this regard. It moreover asks the Government once again to provide detailed information on the number of warnings issued by labour inspectors and the number of prosecutions initiated, as well as on their outcome in practice.

Argentina

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1955)

The Committee notes the Government's report received on 30 October 2012, and the attached documentation. It also notes the successive comments made by the Confederation of Workers of Argentina (CTA), received on 31 August 2012, and 7 September 2012, and the comments of the General Confederation of Labour (CGT), 10 September 2012 and received 21 September 2012. The Committee requests the Government to provide any information or comments that it deems useful in this regard.

Articles 3(1)(a), 4, 10 and 11 of the Convention. Supervision and control of the labour inspection services by a central authority, and number of staff of the labour inspection services. The Committee previously requested the Government to indicate the manner in which effect is given to Article 4 of the Convention with respect to the structure and operation in practice of the labour inspection system, and especially the measures adopted to ensure coordination between the federal inspection authorities and the labour inspection authorities in the various provinces.

The CTA reiterates that uniform criteria have not been established throughout the country for labour inspection as a basis for effective supervision. The system of cooperation between the provinces and the Federal State, in addition to the scarcity of the human and material resources allocated to provincial offices, means that the inspection system is deficient, and that this deficiency is demonstrated by the high levels of informality. It emphasizes that entrusting the provinces with exclusive competence for the inspection of general conditions of work and occupational safety and health regulations has led to the undermining of the systems set up by the provinces, because of the shortage of human and material resources allocated to these offices. The number of inspectors is very inadequate in certain provinces where precarious forms of work and informality are very high. For this reason, greater resources should have been allocated to these provinces. The CTA considers that the absence of effective public policies for labour inspection is related to the pressure that can be exerted by local economic powers and major national and multinational enterprises subject to the jurisdiction of the provinces, and the importance of these enterprises in the local economy and employment structure is such that it discourages the intensification of inspection by the local authorities and allows the introduction of self-inspection. The trade union emphasizes that the failure to discharge the inspection function effectively has many negative consequences in relation to the promotion of decent work, for three basic reasons: the high level of unregistered or "black" work; the high incidence of employment accidents; and the low quality of employment and its increasingly precarious forms, which affect a significant number of workers. The CTA also refers to section 30 of Act No. 25.877 of 2004 on the labour system, creating the Integrated Labour and Social Security Inspection System (SIDITYSS), which provides that the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security (MTEYSS), in its capacity as the central authority may, following the intervention of the Federal Labour Council (CFT), discharge the corresponding functions when a local labour inspection service is not in compliance with the requirements of international Conventions or of the Act.

The Government indicates once again that the CFT promotes general inspection policies based on the principles of coordination, cooperation, co-participation and co-responsibility with a view to achieving greater effectiveness in the various jurisdictions. In this respect, it refers to the agreement concluded by the MTEYSS and the CFT, in which the latter undertakes to collaborate with the MTEYSS for the implementation of the National Plan to Regularize Labour (PNRT), and the agreements concluded by the MTEYSS and the provincial authorities for the same purpose.

With regard to the number of labour inspectors, the Government indicates that there are currently 472 labour inspectors in the MTEYSS, in addition to the number of inspectors in each province and those of the Government of the autonomous city of Buenos Aires. The Government adds that it is taking measures to unfreeze 510 posts in the permanent staff of the Ministry, which will subsequently be subject to a competition to fill posts, among others, of labour and social security inspectors, specialist labour and social security inspectors and professional labour and social security inspection analysts.

The Committee recalls, as it noted in paragraph 140 of its General Survey of 2006 on labour inspection, that the objective of a central authority is to facilitate the establishment of a single policy throughout the territory covered and to make it possible to use the available resources in a rational way, and that flexibility in the nature of the system in federal States must not be regarded as derogating from the principle of having a single authority, provided that the constituent units of the federal State have budgetary resources that are sufficient to discharge the functions of the labour inspectorate within their respective fields of competence. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide information in its next report on the measures adopted, including in the context of section 30 of Act No. 25.877 of 2004, with a view to giving effect to the Convention in terms of the need for a labour inspection system placed under the supervision and control of a central authority and based on common principles respecting its organization, methods of action and the distribution and management of human and financial resources.

The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide information on the geographical distribution and current number of the inspectors who are in post at federal level and in each of the provinces, in relation to the number and location of workplaces liable to inspection and the number of workers employed therein.

Finally, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the proportion of the national budget devoted to labour inspection and its distribution between the central and provincial structures, as well as information on the material resources available to them, including means of transport for the professional travel of inspectors.

Articles 3(1)(a), 16, 18 and 24. Supervisory function of labour inspectors, frequency and scope of inspections, and penalties. The Committee previously requested the Government to provide information on the frequency and scope of the inspections undertaken, including in cases where one single establishment is concerned, and on the impact of the Integrated Employment Promotion Plan: “More and better work” and the “National plan for the regularization of work” (PNRT).

The Committee welcomes the Government’s indication that the PNRT is designed to achieve the incorporation into the social security system of workers excluded following decades of increasing labour flexibility and the lack of the State’s involvement in inspection functions, which led to forms of precarious employment such as pseudo-cooperatives, enterprises for the provision of services and subcontracting arrangements, leaving certain sectors and activities in a situation of extreme vulnerability. It adds that the number of workers who are currently in a registered and legal job with legal protection is the highest for the past 36 years. Informality has been combated through measures to promote a decrease in informal work and an increase in quality jobs with social protection. These have included placing the issue on the public agenda, the simplification of procedures to regularize workers, the reinstatement of and increase in personnel, and the use of technology in inspection activities. The supervisory activities carried out over the past seven years, through the PNRT, are unprecedented; between September 2003 and July 2011, a total of 910,922 workplaces were inspected and the situations of 2,888,024 workers were examined. These inspection activities have undoubtedly contributed to the fall in the rate of unregistered employment. In the second half of 2003, 49.6 per cent of the total number of workers were not registered. This percentage fell to 36 per cent in 2010 (according to the Permanent Household Survey). Through inspection, as well as information, repression and penalties, the MTEYSS has endeavoured to identify violations of the requirement for employers to declare and to pay contributions to the social security system throughout the national territory. The measures have included: the strengthening of the authority of regional heads and delegates throughout the national territory; awareness raising for all officials; training; the purchase of vehicles; the improvement of the premises of regional delegations and directorates; the development of a computerized support application; and the planning of activities. Contributions were also made by the inspections carried out by the Federal Public Income Administration (AFIP) and the provincial labour administrations, through the CFT.

The Committee also notes that the amounts of the fines established in the event of the engagement of workers in a dependent relationship without the required registration and declaration in the context of the PNRT have been updated and increased as from 1 September 2012, in accordance with Decision No. 327/2012 of 8 August 2012 of the National Social Security Administration (ANSES).

The Committee notes this progress with interest and requests the Government to provide information on the frequency and scope of the inspections undertaken in a single workplace, including by provincial delegations. It would also be grateful if the Government would indicate the proportion of labour inspections devoted to combating undeclared work in relation to the proportion of inspections carried out with a view to enforcing the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers (such as the payment of wages, and occupational safety and health conditions), including in relation to unregistered workers, and the penalties imposed (with an indication of the respective legal provision).

Article 6. Stability of employment and conditions of service of labour inspectors. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide a copy of Decision No. 670/10 of the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security, as well as information on the measures adopted to ensure that labour inspectors benefit from working conditions in accordance with the principles of stability and independence laid down by this provision of the Convention. The Committee notes that this Decision contained the job descriptions for the posts of labour and social security inspectors and territorial planning analysts. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to guarantee labour inspectors, including those working at the provincial level, a legal status and conditions of service which ensure their stability of employment and independence from changes of government and improper external influences.

Article 7(3). In-service training for labour inspectors. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government to the effect that the level of studies of the inspectors and controllers recruited under the Framework Act to regulate national public employment (Act No. 25.164 of 1999) ranges from basic education (2 per cent) to postgraduate studies (13 per cent), including primary (7 per cent), secondary (53 per cent) and university (25 per cent) education. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide information on the measures adopted to ensure that labour inspectors working in the provinces receive adequate training that is adapted to new technologies and the conditions of work and workplaces liable to inspection, under the terms of the Convention, both when entering service and during employment.

Article 9. Collaboration of technical experts and specialists in certain inspection activities falling within the remit of labour inspectors. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided information in reply to its previous comment on this Article. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to describe the arrangements through which the labour inspection services in the various provinces benefit from the collaboration of technical experts and specialists and the cooperation of the Occupational Risks Supervisory Authority (SRT).

Articles 20 and 21. Annual inspection report. The CGT alleges that the Government is not in compliance with these Articles of the Convention. The Committee notes that the last annual inspection report received by the Office dates from 2000. The Committee reminds the Government of its obligation to ensure that an annual report on the work of the labour inspection services is published and transmitted to the ILO in the form and within the time limits envisaged in Article 20, and that this report contains the information required on each of the items indicated in Article 21. The Committee hopes that measures will be adopted rapidly to give full effect to these provisions of the Convention and that information, such as the number of workplaces liable to inspection (including at the provincial level) and the number of workers employed therein, as well as statistics of occupational diseases and of industrial accidents, will in future be included in the annual report, so as to ensure that it is a useful tool to evaluate and improve the operation of the labour inspection system.

Furthermore, noting that the Government has not replied to a number of previous comments, the Committee requests it to provide the requested information on:

Cooperation in the context of MERCOSUR. The Committee notes that according to the Government's report, the joint inspection operations in the context of MERCOSUR have continued and have been well received among the social partners in the region. Observing that the trade unions in Argentina asked for the inclusion of controls in relation to occupational safety and health and the work environment in the context of the MERCOSUR Regional Labour Inspection Plan (PRIM) and that the proposal was well received by the representatives of other countries, the Committee requests the Government to continue to supply information on the joint activities carried out in the framework of this plan and especially on their impact on the national labour inspection system. The Committee also requests the Government to supply information on any progress made in the formulation and implementation of the training plan for labour inspectors in the context of the PRIM.

Article 5. Cooperation between the inspection services and other institutions and collaboration with employers and workers. The Committee also notes that the SRT has been signing agreements with the provinces and with the autonomous city of Buenos Aires, with a view to conducting joint inspections and providing economic resources for the reinforcement of local labour inspection. The SRT has also signed agreements with the trade unions, with a view to providing economic resources for the training of union leaders and workers, and to developing projects and actions aimed at improving working conditions and the working environment. The Committee requests the Government to supply detailed information on the inspections carried out jointly by the SRT and the autonomous city of Buenos Aires and by the latter and the provincial delegations pursuant to the abovementioned agreements, and also on the impact of such collaboration with regard to the objective pursued by these agreements. It also requests the Government to provide information on any projects launched in the context of collaboration between the SRT and the trade unions, and on the results thereof.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government on other matters.

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 1985)

The Committee refers to its comments under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), in so far as they are concerned with the application of the present Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's report, received by the Office on 30 October 2011 and the successive observations from the Confederation of Workers of Argentina (CTA), dated 31 August 2012 and 7 September 2012, and the observations from the General Confederation of Labour (CGT), dated 10 September 2012.

The CTA declares that the lack of adequate inspection services has a direct impact on the quality of employment and the effective enjoyment of labour rights and that evidence of the laxity of inspection policies is visible in the high accident rates in the sector. According to the aforementioned confederation, the rural sector has a high rate of non-declared or "black" employment, and although it varies from one area to another, it reached a figure of 80 per cent in 2012, according to information from the Ministry of Labour itself. The CTA claims that this situation reflects the Government's lack of interest in taking action against non-declared employment and shows that the shortcomings in the inspection services are deliberately created. The confederation adds that employers in the sector do not notify occupational accidents and send most workers who have suffered accidents to a welfare organization belonging to the branch trade union to prevent these accidents being included in official statistics and thus avoid any inspection by the authorities and the risk insurers. The CTA denounces with concern the slavery-like conditions of work experienced by taraferos (workers engaged in artisanal harvesting of yerba maté) in the Province of Misiones, whose employment situation is extremely precarious and includes non-registered work, deplorable working conditions and safety and health conditions, failure to pay the remuneration prescribed by law, payment in the form of vouchers which workers must use in an agricultural cooperative at an exchange rate considerably lower than their face value. This situation has given rise to several days of protest between 2010 and 2012, including road closures and hunger strikes. After denouncing the slave labour camps detected at an undertaking in Caraguatay and on maté plantations in Guatambú, the Union of Maté Harvesters and Temporary and Unemployed Workers in the Province of Misiones has repeatedly requested the presence of the Ministry of Labour with a view to putting an end to the irregularities that exist in the sector, but no inspections have been carried out. The Committee requests the Government to send information or comments in response to the observations from the CTA and CGT.

Legislation. The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 26.727 of 21 December 2011 establishing regulations for employment in agriculture. It notes that, under section 99 of the Act, the authority responsible for enforcement is the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security. The Committee notes the Government's statement that, in relation to the Act, regulations regarding labour inspection in the sector are currently in the process of being adopted. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any developments in the adoption of implementing regulations relating to the abovementioned Act and to send a copy of any legislative text adopted in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government to send information with its next report, supported by statistics, on the impact of the application of the new Act on the objective of the Convention.

Furthermore, observing that the Government has not replied to its previous comments, the Committee is bound to repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

The Committee notes the Government's report received at the Office on 23 November 2010. It also notes the comments made by the General Confederation of Labour (CGT) in a communication dated 29 October 2010.

The Committee observes that the CGT, in the comments made in relation to the application of various Conventions ratified by Argentina, includes a copy of a communication from the Argentine Union of Rural Workers and Dockworkers (UATRE) addressed to the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security (MTEYSS) (Ministry of Labour), which contains observations with regard to the Government's compliance with the present Convention.

As regards the issues related to the present Convention, the Committee refers the Government to its observation concerning the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and raises the following points specifically relating to labour inspection in agriculture.

Lack of information on the functioning of the labour inspection services in agriculture. The UATRE states that it asked the Ministry of Labour to improve rural inspection activities by allocating adequate human resources, but no progress has been observed in this area at national level. The trade union also states that the establishment of the National Register of Rural Workers and Employers (RENATRE), aimed at monitoring the payment of employers' contributions to the integrated unemployment benefit system, has resulted in the registration of 800,000 workers.

The Committee notes that the Government does not supply the detailed information requested of it in a previous observation concerning the manner in which all provisions of the Convention are given effect in practice. The Committee hopes that the Government will send information in its next report on: (a) the number of labour inspectors exercising their functions in agriculture (disaggregated by provincial authority, if possible) (Article 14 of the Convention); (b) the material means (offices, transport facilities) at the disposal of each provincial authority (Article 15) to ensure that labour inspectors can perform their duties, in accordance with Article 6(1)(a) and (b); (c) the specific training given to labour inspectors to ensure the effective discharge of their functions related to prevention and control as provided for in Article 9(3) (including frequency, number of participants, subjects covered and duration, and preferably with a breakdown of the training activities organized for inspectors in the various regional offices); and (d) the manner in which collaboration is ensured between technical experts and the labour inspection services, especially in the provincial offices, in accordance with Article 11.

Articles 6(1)(a) and 24. Enforcement function of the labour inspectorate; adequate and effectively enforced penalties. The Committee observes that, according to information published on the website of the MTEYSS (<http://www.trabajo.gov.ar>) concerning labour inspection activities in 2010 and 2011, it appears that inspections have been restricted, at least during the aforementioned years, to checking the labour register. The Committee also notes, from the documentation attached to the report on Convention No. 81, the various agreements signed between the MTEYSS and the trade unions for combating undeclared work and ensuring effective inspection of conditions of work and child labour, in the context of the "Integrated employment promotion plan: more and better work" and the "National plan for the regularization of work" (PNRT). The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the enforcement activities of the labour inspection in agriculture, including with regard to child labour, and to send statistics relating to violations of the labour legislation found, stating the legal provisions concerned and the penalties imposed, and copies of court decisions relating to the latter.

Articles 17 and 19. Preventive control and notification of occupational accidents and cases of occupational disease. In reply to the Committee's previous comments in this respect, the Government indicates that the provincial authorities conduct on-the-spot routine inspections or inspections resulting from complaints using qualified staff when occupational accidents or diseases have been brought to their attention. The Committee observes that, according to statistics placed on the website of the Supervisory Authority for Occupational Risks (SRT), there was a substantial increase between 2008 and 2009 in accidents in the workplace in provinces such as Tucumán, a major global producer of lemons, and Jujuy, which, according to the same data, accounts for 65 per cent of the workforce in agriculture.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that labour inspectors are associated with the preventive control of new plant, new materials or substances and new methods of handling or processing products which appear likely to constitute a threat to health or safety (Article 17) and to send a copy of any relevant legal text. It also requests the Government to indicate the manner in which effect is given to Article 19 of the Convention, concerning the notification to the labour inspectorate of occupational accidents and cases of occupational disease (paragraph 1), or the association of the labour inspection services in agriculture with any inquiry into the causes of the most serious accidents or diseases that have affected a number of workers or had fatal consequences (paragraph 2).

Articles 26 and 27. Obligation to publish and send an annual report. The Government indicates that the statistics relating to occupational accidents and diseases compiled by the SRT can be consulted on <http://www.srt.gov.ar/data/fdata.htm>. The Committee observes that the statistics contained in the different reports that appear on the SRT website do not appear to distinguish between occupational accidents and cases of occupational disease.

The Committee refers the Government to its comments under Articles 20 and 21 of Convention No. 81 and requests the Government to keep the ILO informed of progress made in ensuring that the central labour inspection authority publishes and sends to the ILO, in accordance with Article 26 of the Convention, an annual report on the work of the labour inspection services in agriculture, either as a separate report or as part of its general annual report, containing the information required in Article 27(a)–(g). The Committee also reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

Armenia

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 2004)

The Committee notes the comments by the Republican Union of Employers of Armenia (RUEA) and the Confederation of Trade Unions of Armenia (CTUA), forwarded with the Government reports dated 28 October 2011 and 4 October 2012. The employers' comments are discussed below in relation to Articles 16 and 18 of the Convention.

Legislation. The Committee notes with regret that the documents requested in previous comments have still not been submitted to the ILO, thus preventing it from carrying out a first assessment of the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide the following texts as soon as possible:

- The Administrative Infractions Code of 6 December 1985.
- The Act of 17 May 2000 on the Organization and Conduct of Inspections, as amended on 23 June 2011.
- The Act of 13 December 2004 on Administrative Conduct and Principles.
- Government Decision No. 1146-N of 29 August 2004 establishing the State Labour Inspectorate within the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, confirming the statutes of the State Labour Inspectorate and amending previous Government Decision (14 November 2002) No. 1821-N.
- Government Decision No. 1893-N of 6 October 2005 on the provision of information to the State Labour Inspectorate.
- Government Decision No. 1698-N of 2 December 2010 repealing Government Decision No. 2301-N of 6 October 2005 adopting the procedure for the submission of quarterly reports by employers to the State Labour Inspectorate.
- Government Decision No. 115-N of 17 September 2009 on the reform of the labour inspection system.
- Government Decision No. 876-N of 16 June 2006 establishing the form, use and procedure for issuing a copy of a workbook.
- Government Decision No. 1882-N of 20 October 2005 on the procedure for publication, accounting, conservation and archiving of the employer's internal and private legal documents.
- The Public Service Act.
- Any further law which might have been adopted within the Labour Inspection Reform, and which applies the provision of the Convention.

Article 5(b) of the Convention. Collaboration between labour inspectorate officials and employers and workers or their organizations. Further to its previous comments which were based on an observation of the CTUA, the Committee notes with interest the information provided by the Government according to which labour inspectors have regular working meetings with social partners, and participate in seminars organized by the CTUA and sectoral branches of trade unions. According to the Government, 210 seminars were held in 2010, in which 5,200 representatives of employers and workers took part, and 303 seminars were organized in 2011, attended by 6,891 employers' and workers' representatives. Five advisory seminars on Armenian labour legislation were organized under the auspices of the labour inspectorate, the CTUA and branch trade unions. It also notes that, in accordance with section 9 of the Law on State Labour Inspection, labour inspectors are bound to provide information to employers, trade unions and employees on methods of application of labour legislation. In this regard, it notes that in 2011, 115 employers submitted written requests for advice regarding the application of the labour legislation. The Government adds that since 2010, the inspectorate has been operating an electronic system for the reception and examination of requests for assistance and advice, as well as complaints. In 2010 and 2011, 96 and 194 requests/complaints were submitted, respectively. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide information as to the frequency of working meetings held with social partners, and the subjects covered by such meetings and their outcome. It further asks the Government to indicate whether other methods of collaboration with social partners exist and draws the Government's attention to the guidelines provided in this regard in Part II of Recommendation No. 81 concerning labour inspection. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of the complaints lodged and the type of matters raised via the electronic enquiry system, and the possible follow-up by the labour inspectorate.

Articles 3, 12, 13, 16, 17 and 18. Effective exercise of labour inspection functions through inspection visits and measures to prevent their obstruction. In its previous comments the Committee noted that 137 inspection visits had not materialized and requested clarifications in this regard. The Government indicates that, due to the continuing labour inspection reforms, the planned inspections were temporarily suspended. The Republican Union of Employers of Armenia adds that these visits were suspended as a follow-up to studies carried out by the Government which had found that inspections were too frequent, uncoordinated and often irrelevant. There are three inspection bodies, the State Labour Inspectorate, the State Hygiene and Anti-Epidemic Inspectorate and the National Centre for Technical Safety whose competencies overlap. The level of information exchange between these bodies remains very limited and the inspection's mandate, competence and its purpose are often not clear, thus impacting adversely on the investment climate and the country's competitiveness. Consequently, the Government approved a reform of the inspection system under Decision

No. 1135-N of 17 September 2009. According to the information provided by the Republican Union of Employers of Armenia that all inspectorates should have a system of risk-based inspections with joint databases, and that inspections should be simple, transparent and foreseeable. Consequently the Law of 17 May 2000 on the Organization and Conduct of Inspections was amended on 23 June 2011, in order to reflect these new requirements. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that as a result of this amendment undertakings have been classified as high, middle and low-risk groups, and that the number of possible inspection visits might have been limited as a result of this classification. According to the Government, it is stipulated that an inspection visit in a high-risk undertaking may not be conducted more than once a year, every three years for a medium-risk undertaking and in a low-risk undertaking not more than every five years. It also notes that further limits to labour inspection visits appear to apply through ordinances or instructions issued by the head of the "respective state body".

The Committee recalls that under Article 3 of the Convention, the labour inspection functions exercised through inspection visits serve not only an enforcement but also an advisory and preventive purpose. Indeed, as indicated in paragraph 85 of the Committee's 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, the two functions of enforcement and advice are inextricable. The Committee also recalls that according to paragraphs 105–107 of the 2006 General Survey, the powers that labour inspectors have under Article 13 of the Convention, including powers of injunction with immediate effect, serve an exclusively preventive purpose as they are aimed at eliminating or at least reducing occupational risks and hazards which constitute a danger to the health or safety of the workers, irrespective of the existence of a violation of legal provisions. If hazards have arisen as a result of non-compliance with legal provisions, then Articles 17 and 18 of the Convention apply so that persons responsible for such violations are held accountable. The Committee is of the view that limiting the number of inspection visits to a specific number for a certain time period raises obstacles to the effective performance of labour inspection functions, including the important preventive functions entrusted upon labour inspectors by Article 13. Moreover, it goes against the principle of unannounced visits, which is reflected in Article 12 of the Convention, and is intended to ensure that inspectors may carry out inspections at any time, without previous notice both for preventive purposes and as a useful means to address attempts to conceal labour violations (paragraphs 261–263 of the 2006 General Survey).

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would communicate Decision No. 1155-N of 17 September 2009 on the reform of the labour inspection system and explain the impact of this reform on the structure, coordination, working methods and priorities of the labour inspectorate. In this context, the Committee refers to the labour inspection audit that was conducted in 2009 within the ILO project "Enhancing Labour Inspection Effectiveness" and requests the Government to detail whether the labour inspection reform took into account the findings and outcomes of the audit. It would also be grateful to receive a copy of the government study mentioned by the Republican Union of Employers of Armenia on the reform of the labour inspection system.

The Committee also requests the Government to communicate a copy of the amendments of 2011 to the law of 17 May 2000 on the organization and conduct of inspections and indicate whether the labour inspectorate still has the possibility to carry out unannounced visits or visits outside the schedule applicable to a workplace's risk classification for enforcement or preventative purposes, and whether labour inspectors have the power to issue injunctions with immediate effect in case of imminent danger to the health or safety of the workers. It also requests the Government to communicate any ordinances and instructions issued in relation to labour inspection activities and to indicate the nature of the bodies issuing such instructions within the labour inspection system.

The Committee notes that, according to the Republican Union of Employers of Armenia, the number of inspections was halved compared to the previous year, but revealed undeclared work cases were doubled. In this regard, it notes that according to the Government, during 2009–11, almost 2,650 cases of undeclared work were disclosed. Please also specify the measures ordered by the labour inspectorate when cases of undeclared work are discovered and the impact of these measures on the principal objective of the labour inspectorate under the Convention, which is the enforcement of legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work.

Articles 19, 20 and 21. Annual reports on the work of the labour inspectorate. The Committee notes that, once again, a consolidated annual report for the period under review, that contains the type of data and statistics set out in Article 21 of the Convention, was not submitted to the Office. It also notes the indications made by the Government that an annual inspection report for 2010 has been discussed with the social partners in the Republican Tripartite Commission, and that the annual inspection report for 2011 will be discussed at the upcoming session of this Commission. The Committee takes note of the comments of the Republican Union of Employers of Armenia, highlighting the delayed publication of the annual inspection report and the fact that up to the present, the annual inspection report for 2011 has not been discussed in the Tripartite Commission. With reference to its general observation of 2010 the Committee recalls that when well prepared, the annual reports offer an indispensable basis for the evaluation of the results in practice of the activities of the labour inspection service and, subsequently, the determination of the means necessary to improve their effectiveness. The Committee once again urges the Government to take all necessary measures for the elaboration and publication by the central labour inspection authority of an annual report containing all the information required under Article 21 of the Convention and to keep the Office informed of any progress made in this regard. The Committee also invites the Government to provide its views in relation to the comments of the Republican Union of Employers of Armenia as regards the delay in both the publication of annual inspection reports, and their submission to the Republican Tripartite Commission.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Australia

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1975)

The Committee notes the comments made by the Government in its report received on 7 September 2012 by the Office in reply to the communications of the Australian Council of Trade Unions (ACTU), dated 31 August and 25 October 2010. The Committee further notes the latest communication by the ACTU, dated 31 August 2012, concerning the application of the Convention in law and in practice, transmitted to the Government on 14 September 2012.

Article 3(1) and (2) of the Convention. Functions of the system of labour inspection. Contracting and precarious work. The Committee notes the concerns raised by the ACTU regarding the extent of “sham contracting”, and the growth in precarious forms of work, in Australian workplaces. According to the ACTU, just under 40 per cent of all workers in Australia are in “non-standard” work arrangements, including casual, short-term, contracting and labour hire arrangements. The ACTU refers to a recent independent inquiry commissioned by them to examine the extent of insecure work and its impact. The inquiry recommended that the Federal Government increase the resources allocated to the Fair Work Ombudsman (FWO) to improve enforcement and compliance, with a focus on developing new approaches to protect insecure workers.

Investigation into workers and trade unions. The ACTU raises further concerns over the extent to which the FWO expends its time, effort and resources investigating whether workers and trade unions have breached workplace laws, and most notably whether they have taken industrial action contrary to the restrictive provisions regulating this activity in the Fair Work Act 2009 (the FW Act). The ACTU indicates that this activity risks distracting the FWO from its core and critical task of assisting vulnerable workers in enforcing their rights.

Building and construction industry. The Committee takes note of the response provided by the Government with regard to its previous comment and the 2010 communications by the ACTU. The Committee notes in particular that the Building and Construction Industry Improvement Amendment (Transition to Fair Work) Act 2012 has been adopted, and that it abolishes the Office of the Australian Building and Construction Commissioner (ABCC), and replaces it with the Fair Work Building Industry Inspectorate, known as Fair Work Building and Construction (FWBC). The FWBC and the Fair Work (Building Industry) Act 2012 commenced operations on 1 June 2012. The Government indicates that the long-standing practice of referring wages and entitlements claims, including the underpayment of employees, to the FWO has been terminated, with the aim of turning the ABCC, and now the FWBC, into a full service regulator. The FWBC retains, however, the power to compulsorily obtain information and/or documents. The Government indicates that the retention of these powers is balanced by the introduction of significant new safeguards, including a sunset provision three years after they come into effect. The Committee notes that the ACTU, in its 2012 communication, again raises concerns in relation to these coercive powers for use in the investigation of industrial issues. The ACTU alleges that early indications show that the investigation and prosecution of workers and their organizations remain a key aspect of the FWBC’s work. The ACTU believes this continued focus on enforcing laws against workers and trade unions is inconsistent with the primary duties of inspectors as specified in Article 3 of the Convention.

The Committee invites the Government to respond to the concerns raised by the ACTU, and in particular concerning measures taken to address the increase in the use of “sham contracting” and precarious work, and regarding the use of the FWO’s time and resources to investigate workers and their organizations, including in the building and construction industry.

Article 4. Labour inspection under the supervision and control of a central authority. In response to the concerns raised by the ACTU in 2010, the Government indicates that it considers an independent body to oversee labour inspection in the building and construction industry would give best effect to the Wilcox report’s recommendation that the FWBC have “operational autonomy”, and that it is both appropriate and necessary to retain industry-specific regulation within a separate body while genuine cultural reform continues in the building and construction industry. The Committee notes that the ACTU’s most recent communication again raises concerns in relation to the creation of this second federal labour inspectorate, in particular given that the model adopted by the Government was specifically rejected by the Wilcox inquiry. The ACTU alleges that separate inspectorates inevitably lead to differing standards applying to workers within different sectors. The Committee invites the Government to respond to the concerns raised by the ACTU in relation to the risks associated with having separate inspectorates.

Article 5(b). Collaboration between officials of the labour inspectorate and employers and workers or their organizations. The Committee takes note of the response by the Government to its previous comment and the communication by the ACTU dated 31 August 2010, concerning collaboration between the FWO and employers’ and workers’ organizations. The Government indicates that an example of such collaboration was the AU$2.5 million Shared Industry Assistance Project (SIAP), designed to help specific industries transition to Modern Awards. In partnership with 15 employer and employee organizations, the FWO developed resources, including interpretive guides and tables, industry-specific helplines, fact sheets and handbooks. The Committee notes that the ACTU has again remarked on how the operation of the restrictions in the FW Act in relation to the right of access by unions to workplaces for compliance purposes is significantly limiting the capacity of unions to perform their monitoring and compliance activities. While the ACTU welcomes the introduction of new laws in 2012, which amend the current right of entry provisions to address sweatshop conditions for outworkers in the textile, clothing and footwear industry, it calls on the Government to amend the FW Act so as to permit agreements to improve on the statutory right of entry, and to ensure trade unions can enter premises where their members have been employed. The Committee invites the Government to respond to the concerns raised by the ACTU in relation to right of access by unions to workplaces for compliance purposes, and to continue to provide information on the collaboration between officials of the labour inspectorate and employers and workers or their organizations.

Article 18. Adequate penalties. The Committee notes the most recent communication by the ACTU, which indicates high levels of non-compliance of workplace instruments by employers, especially in smaller enterprises. In this regard, the ACTU calls on the Government to consider increasing fines for underpayment or non-compliance so as to increase deterrence. The Committee asks the Government to respond to the comments by the ACTU concerning the adequacy of penalties for non-compliance of workplace instruments by employers.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Austria

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1949)

The Committee takes note of the comments by the Federal Chamber of Labour (BAK) in its communication of 29 May 2012.

Articles 1, 2(2), 4, 7(3), 10 and 16 of the Convention. Impact of restructuring on the organization, structure and resources of the Labour Inspectorate. The Committee takes note of the Government's indication that the labour transport inspectorate has been incorporated into the Labour Inspectorate with effect from 1 July 2012 and that the Labour Inspection Act was amended so as not to exclude workplaces in the transport sector from its scope of application.

The Committee also notes the Government's reply to the BAK's previous comments on the limited number of labour inspectors in relation to their tasks. The Government acknowledges that personnel reduction measures have been taken in all federal agencies but adds that the competent ministry has undertaken to maintain the number of labour inspectors at a level which correlates with the complexity of functions to be performed, and that as from the end of 2013, a further reduction in personnel has been excluded. The Government furthermore indicates that six public servants with technical background have been transferred to the Labour Inspectorate even though the ratio of workers per labour inspectors in the country continues to be below recommended standards.

In this regard, the Committee notes the comments made by the BAK according to which the human resources situation is strained, despite the transfer of public servants from other services who had not yet been trained for their specific duties. The BAK expresses reservations in respect of a possible loss of expertise and knowledge in technically complex areas, such as railways, following the impact of the merger between the labour transport inspectorate and the Labour Inspectorate, which, even though agreed upon, would henceforth merit close follow-up.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government could keep the Office informed of the impact of the merger of the former labour transport inspectorate with the Labour Inspectorate in relation to the number of workplaces brought under the control of the latter, the complexity of the tasks entrusted on labour inspectors, the number of staff, the number of visits and the effectiveness of controls in technically complex areas such as railways, and to furnish an updated organizational chart of the labour inspection system. The Committee would also be grateful if the Government would provide information on the training made available to labour inspectors and its impact on the effective performance of their duties.

Articles 5(a) and 21(e). Effective cooperation between labour inspectors and other governmental bodies.

1. Common use of databases. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the legal prerequisites for the operation of a database on construction sites have been fulfilled in order to facilitate legal reporting and notification obligations from the side of the employer (such as advance notification of construction sites, construction operations, notification of hazardous construction works and asbestos works). This information can, once captured in the database, be accessed by the Labour Inspectorate, the tax administration and health insurance providers. The Committee would be grateful if the Government could keep the Office informed of the impact of this type of data exchange on the daily work of the Labour Inspectorate.

2. Effective cooperation between labour inspectorates and judicial bodies. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the Federal Ministry of Justice is about to draw up an order making the criminal courts aware of section 402 of the Code on Penal Procedure, according to which the criminal court has to formally notify a final court sentence to an interested body, if this sentence pronounces the loss of a right or would cause the loss of a right. The Government explains in this respect, that this provision applies for instance vis-à-vis bodies competent for issuing business licences and withdrawing them in the event of a criminal conviction. The Committee also notes that the BAK reiterates its concerns that the Labour Inspectorate is not systematically informed of the outcome of relevant criminal court procedures. In this context, the Committee recalls previous comments made by the Government, to the effect that data protection rules prevented the notification of criminal court rulings to the labour inspectorate in a general manner, except from those cases in which apprentices were concerned and in which the labour inspectorate was called upon to take part in criminal proceedings as a witness. The Government further indicated that the Labour Inspectorate has, in specific cases, such as industrial accidents, the right to apply for access to the criminal file or to receive a copy of the final court ruling. The Committee asks the Government to clarify the impact of section 402 of the Code of Criminal Procedure on administrative practice in relation to the direct notification of criminal court rulings to labour inspectorates, so that the outcome of such procedures can be captured in the annual inspection report as required by Article 21(e) of the Convention.

Cross-border collaboration with other labour inspectorates within the EU in the framework of the EU Directive 2006/123/EC on services in the internal market. The Committee notes with interest the new section 20, paragraph 9, of the Labour Inspection Act which sets the legal ground for a systematic collaboration between labour inspectorates from different EU countries. Under this section, labour law violations are to be notified to the Labour Inspectorate of the country, which hosts the head office of the employer who infringed the law in Austria. The Austrian Labour Inspectorate is obliged to provide information on employers' labour law compliance upon request from labour inspectorates located in other EU countries. It also notes in this regard the BAK's concerns, stating that these possibilities of inter-administrative collaboration appear not to be used in case of violations of provisions relating to the 2011 Act on wages dumping.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government could provide information on the impact of the new section 20(9) of the Labour Inspection Act on the enforcement of legal provisions pertaining to conditions of work and the protection of workers in practice. It also requests the Government to make any comment it deems appropriate on the BAK's observations concerning the enforcement of the Act on wages dumping in a cross-border context, and to provide statistics on cross-border cooperation, including on violations notified in this regard.

Article 18. Adequate penalties and deterrence of sanctions. In its previous comments the Committee asked for examples of administrative fines which were tax-deductible by the employer pursuant to section 19 of the Act on the penal liability of legal entities (VbVG). In this regard, the Committee notes the clarification provided by the Government, that fines could only be tax-deductible as business expenditure when they could not be attributed to the person penalized or when they were imposed for a minor fault. According to the Government, such cases of tax deductibility did not relate to violations of worker protection provisions. In this context, the Committee notes that the tax legislation has been modified in that fines that were previously paid by a corporation for the termination of prosecution under the Code of Criminal Procedure, or which were imposed under the VbVG, cease to be tax-deductible. This information is confirmed by the BAK, which expresses its satisfaction with regard to this development.

The Committee notes moreover with interest that, according to the new section 20, paragraph 10, of the Labour Inspection Act, the Labour Inspectorate may notify violations of worker protection rules to bodies that grant financial aid out of a federal budget to employers found to be non-compliant. The Committee would be grateful if the Government could provide information on the application of this legal provision and indicate the follow-up given to notifications of violations, as well as on its impact on compliance with legal provisions pertaining to conditions of work and the protection of workers.

Bahrain

The Committee notes the Government's report, the 2011 annual report of the labour inspectorate and the 2010 annual report of the Labour Market Regulatory Authority (LMRA).

Articles 1, 2 and 4 of the Convention. Labour inspection system. The Committee notes that, according to information provided by the Government, Act No. 36 enacting the Labour Act in the private sector was adopted on 26 July 2012, and that the Minister of Labour will soon draft the implementing decisions, including those concerning the labour inspectorate, as provided for under section 173(1) of the new Act. The Committee also notes that, according to the Government, the new Labour Act places greater emphasis on the labour inspectorate as a result of the reorganization of the Division for Safety in the Workplace; it is now incumbent upon the Ministry to monitor employers and prompt them to apply the provisions of the new Labour Act.

The Committee notes that although the new Act seems to restrict the labour inspectorate's competence to matters of safety and health, but that, on the other hand, it contains provisions accompanied by penalties for matters outside the area of safety and health, such as the employment of women and young people, wages, working hours and leave, labour regulation (register of workers), occupational accidents and cases of occupational disease, and the settlement of individual and collective disputes. The Committee requests the Government to specify the field of competence of the labour inspectorate and to send the Office a copy of the implementing decisions of the Labour Act concerning the labour inspectorate, as provided for under section 173(1) of the Act in question. It also asks it to send an organizational chart as well as any document and relevant report on the reorganization of the labour inspectorate and its functions.

Articles 3(1) and (2), 20 and 21. Transfer of competence for the enforcement of the legislation on the employment of foreigners and content of the annual report on labour inspection activities. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's indication that competence for the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to the employment of foreign workers has been transferred to the LMRA. The Committee encouraged this transfer as it believed it would have the effect of refocusing inspection activities on working conditions and the protection of both national and foreign workers while engaged in their work. However, it would seem from the information provided in the annual inspection report, especially the statistical data contained therein, that the labour inspectorate's functions still include the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to the employment of foreign workers, in particular the registration of notices that foreign workers have fled, in cooperation with the authorities responsible for monitoring the nationality, passports and residence of workers, and that these activities still result in the arrest of workers. The Committee also notes in the annual report of the LMRA that the main task of this body is to monitor the employment of foreign workers, but that it also looks into their working conditions as it verifies the payment of their wages electronically. The Committee therefore notes that there is no clear distinction between the functions of the labour inspectorate and the LMRA, as both have duties linked to working conditions and the application of immigration law.

In its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, the Committee recalled, in paragraph 78, that the primary duty of labour inspectors is to protect workers and not to enforce immigration law. Given that a large proportion of inspection activities are spent on verifying the legality of the immigration status, the Committee stressed the need to ensure that additional duties, which are not aimed at securing enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers, are assigned to labour inspectors only in so far as they do not interfere with their primary duties and do not in any way undermine the authority and impartiality which are necessary to inspectors in their relations with employers and workers. The Committee also pointed out that the partnership between the labour inspectorate and other bodies such as the internal and border police is not conducive to a climate of confidence, which is a prerequisite for good cooperation between the employers, workers and the labour inspectors. It must be possible for labour inspectors to be respected for their authority to report offences, and at the same time to be approachable as preventers and advisers.

The Committee therefore stressed that the function of verifying the legality of employment should have as its corollary the reinstatement of the statutory rights of all the workers if it is to be compatible with the objective of labour protection. This objective can only be met if the workers covered are convinced that the primary task of the inspectorate is to enforce the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers.

In this respect, the Committee notes that the labour inspectorate's annual report merely provides statistical data on the number of inspection visits, the enterprises that were visited, the complaints lodged by the workers and records of proceedings, etc., but it does not contain any information on inspection activities relating to working conditions such as working hours, leave, wages, and the work of women, young persons and children.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to separate the activities concerning foreign workers' employment, which is a matter for the Labour Market Regulatory Authority (LMRA) and immigration authorities, from those relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers that constitute the main functions of the labour inspectorate under Article 3(1) of the Convention. The Committee hopes that the Government will take all necessary measures so that labour inspectors are no longer involved in workplace controls aimed at arresting, imprisoning and repatriating workers in an irregular situation from the standpoint of immigration law and that they effectively secure the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers (Articles 2 and 3(1) of the Convention).

Furthermore, the Committee asks the Government to specify how the labour inspectorate monitors the way in which employers fulfil their obligations (such as the payment of wages and other benefits due for work effectively carried out) towards foreign workers, including those who are in an irregular situation, and in particular when these workers are subject to a deportation or expulsion order.

Referring to its general observation of 2010, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would ensure that future annual reports of the labour inspection authority contain information on the nature of the legal provisions relating to the conditions of work on which the authority has focused (wages, hours of work, holiday, weekly rest, the employment of children and the disabled, etc.), as well as on the protection of workers while engaged in their work (non-discrimination, social security, representation of workers, etc.), without consideration of the legal situation of workers employed in the workplaces inspected.

Articles 6, 10 and 11. The number of labour inspectors and the material means and logistics necessary for them to perform their inspection duties effectively. The Committee notes in the annual labour inspection report that the conditions of service of labour inspectors are inferior to those of inspectors working in the LMRA, and there are too few of them to cover the number of workplaces liable to inspection and to carry out the tasks with which they are entrusted. It also points out that: the statistical data and electronic files specific to the labour inspectorate are lacking; the material means and logistics are inadequate, especially with respect to suitable offices for work and portable computers to facilitate the preparation of reports; and there is a need to improve the capacity of the inspectors and cover their expenses when they use their private cars. The Committee notes that, under section 173(2) of the new Labour Act, the Ministry is bound to provide the occupational safety and health inspection authority with everything it requires to fulfil its functions, including equipment and measuring devices. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to improve the conditions of service and increase the staffing of the labour inspectorate and to place at its disposal the necessary material means and logistics to be able to carry out its duties effectively and efficiently, including service vehicles to carry out inspection visits or, failing this, to reimburse the travelling expenses.

Article 7(3). Strengthening the capacities of the labour inspection services. The Committee notes that, according to section 173(3) of the new Labour Act, the Ministry of Labour must organize specialized sessions and training programmes to improve the competencies and performance of labour inspectors and ensure that they have the required qualifications in the area of occupational safety and health. In its report, the Government voices its interest in strengthening the capacities of the labour inspectorate and refers to training activities and visits in the field organized in cooperation with the ILO. The Committee nevertheless notes that the number of participants in these training sessions is somewhat limited (two to four persons). The Committee requests the Government to send the Office details on the impact this training has had on the efficiency of the labour inspectorate and to provide information on the measures taken to improve the training of labour inspectors.

Article 14. Notification of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that under Order No. 1 of 2006, industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease must be notified by the employer not only to the Social Insurance Fund and the competent police station, in accordance with Act No. 24-76 on social insurance, but also to the Ministry of Labour. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the labour inspectorate receives this information and whether it is dealt with by the central inspection authority with a view to developing a policy on prevention focusing on high-risk occupations (construction, the chemical industry, the energy sector, work involving the operation of heavy machinery, activities involving overexposure to the sun, etc.). The Committee also asks the Government once again to provide details on the notification procedure for industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease and on the action taken in response to such notifications in practice. It requests it once again to provide a copy of any relevant legal text or document.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Belgium

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the comments of the Confederation of Christian Trade Unions (CSC) of 29 August 2012, which were forwarded by the Office to the Government on 18 September 2012. It also notes the Government's consolidated report received by the Office on 15 October 2012.

Articles 3(1)(a), 2, 5 and 16 of the Convention. Extension of the legislative areas covered by the inspection services. The Committee recalls the previous indications in the Government's reports, noted in its previous comments, that action against illegal work, including social fraud, social dumping and unfair competition among businesses, particularly in the context of abusive transboundary posting under Directive 96/71/EC on the posting of workers, is a particular focus of the legislative authorities. This has led, on one hand, as described in previous comments, to the establishment of specific coordinating and consultative structures dedicated to action against this phenomenon, such as the Social Research and Information Department (SIRS), in addition to shared databases and electronic notification systems. On the other hand, significant legislative initiatives have been taken, such as the adoption of the Social Penal Code in 2010, which regroups and repeals many previous Acts, such as the Act on labour inspection and the Act of 30 June 1971 concerning administrative fines, in order to establish the legal framework for a strategic and coordinated approach. The Code provides in section 2 that a strategic plan and an operational plan, setting out the action to be taken, IT projects to be developed and methods of implementation, shall be drawn up each year.

The various labour inspection services were assigned new tasks, and the Committee was therefore interested in the impact of these new structures on legal enforcement, the follow-up action by labour inspection services and the development of strategies in that area, while having due regard to the discharge of the primary functions of labour inspectorates.

The Committee notes the statistics provided by the labour inspectorate on the legislative framework to be implemented and the statistics on the infringements recorded and the action taken. It also notes the 2012 action plan, submitted in reply to its request. It notes that the plan provides for actions to be taken to combat social fraud by various inspection systems, including the social legislation inspection unit (CLS) of the Federal Public Service for Employment, Labour and Social Dialogue. It notes from the plan that 40 per cent of CLS activities are devoted to combating social fraud and 60 per cent to its core functions (compliance with individual and collective working conditions and remuneration, working time, hours of rest, including rest on Sundays and public holidays, organization of industrial relations), and that the CLS comprises 200 social controllers, supervised by 35 inspectors in its 24 divisions in the country. The Committee notes that, in this strategic framework, social legislation inspection will target social fraud more in the form of social dumping and transboundary fraud, which is in violation of Directive 96/71/EC on the posting of workers, as well as the phenomena of false self-employment and employment for umbrella companies. This is confirmed by the information provided by the CLS in reply to the questions raised by the Committee, according to which inspection of foreign enterprises is organized in collaboration with inspection services from other countries.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would continue providing information on the activities undertaken by the CLS, including in the SIRS district units, and to indicate the form of social fraud addressed and the activities undertaken in light of the broad definition in the Social Penal Code which defines social fraud and illegal work as any violation of social and labour legislation that falls within the scope of the federal authority (section 1 of the Social Penal Code).

Measures taken with regard to workers in an irregular situation, but whose situation does not amount to trafficking in persons or evident exploitation. The Government indicates that the inspection services – in the framework of their coordinated operation in the district units – endeavours not only to identify infringements regarding undeclared or irregular work, but also to enforce legal provisions and regulations concerning working conditions in terms of their health and safety.

The Committee recalls that neither Convention No. 81 nor Convention No. 129 contain any provision suggesting that any worker be excluded from the protection afforded by labour inspection on account of their irregular employment status. Foreign workers in an irregular situation are often doubly penalized in that, in addition to losing their jobs, they face the threat of expulsion, if not actual expulsion. The function of verifying the legality of employment should therefore have as its corollary the reinstatement of the statutory rights of all the workers if it is to be compatible with the objective of inspection (General Survey on labour inspection, 2006, paragraphs 77–78).

The Committee once again requests the Government to provide further information regarding the measures taken to ensure that workers in an irregular situation benefit from the same protection in respect of their working conditions as workers with a regular status, without fear of expulsion pursuant to the immigration laws, and therefore of a deterioration of their situation as a result of labour inspection. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on infringements detected and action taken including penalties imposed that further the protection of workers in an irregular situation.

Articles 10, 14 and 16. Inspection of workplaces as often and as thoroughly as is necessary. 1. Staff available in the federal inspection service for welfare at work of the Federal Public Service for Employment, Labour and Social Dialogue. The Committee notes the CSC's comments alleging a severe lack of staff in the only inspection service responsible for the enforcement of occupational safety and health legislation. According to the CSC, the staff available in this service is insufficient to inspect a significant proportion of employers, which has often been emphasized in the official reports of this inspection service. According to the figures in the service's 2009 report, the number of inspection visits carried out per inspector is in practice 320 a year, while each inspector would need to inspect 2,800 enterprises. One out of three employers is inspected several times a year and consequently the 320 visits carried out cover fewer employers. Given the number of employers (268,078 according to the National Social Security Office), each employer will theoretically be inspected once every 20 years. The union also indicates that this shortage has continued for many years and that, due to ineffective inspection, in 20 to 50 per cent of cases, important safety and health provisions are not given effect. The official annual report states that the Belgian system for prevention cannot result in a significant improvement in compliance with regulations and that the inspectorate is facing, in a considerable number of enterprises, a level of bad faith which it does not currently have the means to address. The union adds that, despite its various actions, the situation deteriorated further in 2010, as staff numbers fell by 13 from the 2009 figures, and only 12,606 employers were inspected. Its conclusions on the efficiency of the inspection services regarding occupational safety and health are confirmed by a study carried out under the auspices of the Committee of Senior Labour Inspectors (SLIC) of the European Commission, which had also underlined the severe staff shortage in Belgian labour inspection compared with the situation in the rest of Europe.

The Committee notes from the 2010 annual report of the federal service for supervision of welfare at work, which is available on its website, the indication that the number of enterprises liable to inspection seems to be very high compared with other EU Member countries, despite new recruitment. The total number of staff declined by 13 per cent in 2010 (249) compared with 2004 (269). According to the report, the 249 staff include 187 labour inspectors. The Committee notes that in 2010 1,668 inspections were carried out in the context of accident investigations and 1,597 following a complaint; there were, in comparison, 7,036 routine inspections. It also notes the indication in the annual report of the inspection service that, due to the limited capacity of the inspectorate, the selection criteria for opening cases following employment accidents are restricted to those resulting in temporary incapacity for work of at least 15 days and/or permanent incapacity of at least 5 per cent. In other regions, further restrictions are applied due to a critical lack of inspectors. In this context, the Committee also notes the indication of the CSC with reference to the 2002 annual report that significant employment accidents often occur in workplaces where the same failure to comply with regulations had already caused minor accidents and adequate preventive measures had not been taken. This situation applies primarily to enterprises in categories C and D, where there is no prevention adviser. The Committee invites the Government to indicate the measures taken to alleviate the staff shortage reported by the CSC and by the SLIC and the inspection service itself. It would be grateful if the Government would indicate the measures taken to ensure that industrial accidents regularly give rise to an investigation and to provide statistics on industrial accidents, as required by Article 21(f) of the Convention.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken, both in terms of prevention and of sanctions, to improve compliance with occupational safety and health legislation.

2. The Committee notes in the social inspection report the development of data mining, a new tool to improve detection of social fraud through the more effective targeting of inspections, which appears to be used by the social inspectorate and by the CLS. This tool functions by analysing indicators for fraud by an employer, for example, a sharp rise or drop in turnover, the sudden mass recruitment or dismissal of workers, etc. The tool also enables the detection of a wide variety of infringements, such as undeclared worksites or workers, breaches in respect of temporary unemployment, illegal subcontracting and wages paid “under the table”. According to the report, infringements were discovered in two-thirds of enterprises in the construction sector.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on data mining and to indicate how this tool facilitates the planning and coordination of labour inspection and the extent to which it could ease the workload of the CLS so that it can concentrate more on the inspection of working conditions in the strict sense of the term.

Articles 5(a), 17 and 18. Legal action and penalties. Decriminalization of penalties in the Social Penal Code. The Committee notes the CSC’s comments that the violations reported by the labour inspectorate rarely lead to effective sanctions, which is often explained by the failure of the courts to take action, which means that action is not taken against offenders, as well as by a slow and ineffective system of administrative fines. In particular, the reporting of violations is time consuming and only leads to a result after a long period. Of the 55,986 reports by the inspectorate in 2010, 51 per cent noted infringements. Reports of violations were drawn up for 931 of the most serious infringements, but only 241 cases resulted in a sanction or an out-of-court settlement, that is 26 per cent of cases. Between 2005 and 2010, this figure rose to 30 per cent.

Furthermore, the Committee notes with interest the Government’s information on the GINAA and e-PV (electronic reports of violations) IT projects. The Government specifies that, since 2010 the electronic pro justitias have been in operation in the Federal Public Service for Employment, Labour and Social Dialogue. This means that a report can now only be drawn up in an electronic online version, in a standardized format. The Committee notes from the report of the social legislation inspectorate that the e-PV should guarantee a better quality of reports of violations, owing to faster processing, and the more efficient exchange and classification of information. The electronic reports are electronically signed by their authors and are centralized in a data bank, facilitating the elaboration of internal and external statistics. The Government specifies that GINAA is the centralized database of the administrative fines service and the e-PV system incorporates GINAA data. The Committee invites the Government to indicate the impact of the electronic reports on the efficiency of labour inspection activities including on the enforcement of adequate penalties for violations of the legal provisions.

The Government adds that the Social Penal Code introduces the possibility of using an administrative fine instead of a penal sanction, thereby “decriminalizing” a part of penal social law. According to the Government, it is preferable to resort to administrative fines or a civil sanction rather than to lengthy judicial proceedings, which seems to concur with the concerns raised by the CSC.

In this regard, the Committee once again encourages the Government to continue providing information on the impact of this reform on the level of application and compliance with legal provisions on working conditions and the protection of workers. It invites the Government to provide information on the number and type of offences reported, as well as the measures ordered and the penalties (administrative and penal) handed down and the cases referred by labour inspectors in the field of working conditions and the protection of workers (including wages, hours of work and occupational safety and health etc.).

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate the measures taken to ensure a better follow-up by labour inspectors of cases referred to the criminal courts and draws attention, in this context, to its general observation of 2007 on effective cooperation between the labour inspection and the justice system.

Articles 20 and 21. Consolidated annual report on labour inspection activities. The Committee notes that the various inspection services publish a report on their respective websites but that, in all cases, some of the information required under Article 21(e), (f) and (g) is missing, such as statistics of the violations committed and penalties imposed, industrial accidents and occupational diseases. The Committee encourages the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the annual inspection reports include the information provided for under Article 21(e), (f) and (g) and are published in such a way that they give an overview of the functioning of the labour inspection system.

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee refers to its comments on the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), in so far as they are concerned with the application of the present Convention.

Article 6(1)(a) and (3) of the Convention. Enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and control of illegal employment. The Committee notes from the statistics that there has been a reduction in the number of labour inspection staff, decreasing from 299 in 2010 (32 inspectors and 267 labour controllers) to 272 in 2012 (31 inspectors and 241 labour controllers). It also notes that the number of inspection visits carried out in agriculture and horticulture decreased from 1,629 in 2008–10 to 1,330 in 2010–12. The Committee notes that most inspection visits carried out are in the context of action against undeclared work, with 1,223 out of a total of 1,629 visits in 2008–10 and 930 out of a total of 1,330 visits in 2010–12. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated to ensure that there are sufficient labour inspectors to undertake inspections with the necessary frequency to ensure the effective discharge of their duties. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee again requests the Government to provide information on the impact of enforcement activities targeting violations in the area of undeclared work on the inspection workload and the scope and effectiveness of the enforcement of legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers, including undocumented workers. In particular, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate the manner in which the labour inspectorate ensures the discharge of employers' obligations (such as the payment of wages and other benefits owed) with regard to undocumented workers in an employment relationship, in cases where such workers are subject to being taken back to the frontier or to expulsion pursuant to the immigration laws.

Articles 26 and 27. Publication of information on labour inspection in agriculture. While noting the information provided by the Government in its report on labour inspection activities and their results, the Committee again requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure the publication – as a separate report or as a separate section of the general report of the labour inspectorate – of an annual report on the work of the inspection services in agriculture, containing the information required by Article 27(a)–(g).

Plurinational State of Bolivia

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1973)

Recommendations made under the FORSAT–ILO multilateral technical cooperation project. In its previous comments the Committee noted that the most noteworthy contributions of this project (which lasted until April 2007) as far as labour inspection was concerned, were the proposals relating to: the updating of the Labour Inspection Regulations; the separation of labour inspection functions from those of conciliation and mediation; reports on inspection work; periodical inspection summaries; inspection records and inspection orders; work stoppage orders; notification of violations and proposed penalties; and an analysis of the situation regarding penalties. The project also included proposals for improving the Ministry of Labour's business register, the exchange of information and cooperation between institutions. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would be in a position to report measures implemented to define a legal and structural framework, as well as working methods and procedures with a view to developing an effective inspection system. However, it notes the Government's statement that since the end of the project, there has been no progress in this regard. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to follow-up the recommendations made in the context of the abovementioned project, and to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged to define a legal and structural framework and determine working methods and procedures with a view to developing an effective inspection service.

Articles 19, 20 and 21 of the Convention. Periodical reports and publication and communication of an annual report on the work of the inspection services. In its previous comments the Committee noted that the regional and departmental authorities have to prepare monthly reports that are submitted to the General Directorate of Labour and Occupational Health and Safety, but that, up to the present, no annual report had been published because data collection and registration are done manually, making it difficult to process the information in a timely manner. The Committee notes with interest that in the context of the "Bolhispania" cooperation agreement to improve the inspection system, concluded by the Spanish International Cooperation for Development Agency (AECID) and the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Welfare, the latter's departmental offices were provided with several computers, printers and other electronic equipment in 2009. The Committee hopes that the Government will dedicate this equipment for the use in recording and processing the data needed to prepare the annual inspection report. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in the publication and communication to the ILO of an annual report on the work of the inspection services within the time limits and in the form prescribed by Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention and, in particular, on the results of the formalities undertaken to obtain technical assistance from the Office with a view to implementing and designing an electronic system for labour inspection activities, in accordance with the wish expressed by the Government.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee refers the Government to the comments it is making under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), in so far as they are also concerned with the application of the present Convention.

Articles 6(1) and (2), 12(1) and 24 of the Convention. Cooperation among institutions to ensure the physical safety of labour inspectors in the performance of their duties in the agricultural sector and enforcement of penalties for obstructing inspectors in the performance of their duties. The Committee notes the Government's statement that inspection visits in remote rural regions (such as El Chaco) encountered problems when certain employers blocked them with a show of weapons. The Committee notes that, under section 7(3) of Resolution No. 346 of 28 November 1987, approving the labour inspection regulations, the labour inspectorate may request cooperation from the law enforcement authorities in the performance of its duties. It also emphasizes that, under Article 24 of the Convention, adequate penalties shall be provided for by national laws and enforced not only for violations of legal provisions enforceable by labour inspectors, but also for obstructing labour inspectors in the performance of their duties. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken with a view to strengthening the authority necessary to labour inspectors in agriculture in their relations with employers and workers in the sector. It also requests the Government to indicate the measures taken by law enforcement authorities to protect inspectors during their visits to certain agricultural undertakings where their physical safety is not guaranteed, and to provide information on the investigations opened and action taken against the authors of such acts, including measures taken in accordance with Article 24 of the Convention.

Articles 6(1), 15 and 21. Lack of adequate logistical resources and transport facilities to meet the needs of labour inspectors in agriculture. The Government makes reference to difficulties in carrying out inspection visits in agricultural undertakings owing to the lack of suitable vehicles and logistical resources, especially in the El Chaco and Amazon regions. The Committee recalls that, under Article 15 of the Convention, the competent authority shall make the necessary arrangements to make available to labour inspectors in agriculture local inspection offices suitably equipped in accordance with the requirements of the service, accessible to the persons concerned, in so far as possible, and located so as to take account of the geographical situation of the agricultural undertakings, and of the means of communication (paragraph 1(a)) and the transport necessary for the performance of their duties in cases where suitable transport facilities do not exist (paragraph 1(b)). The Committee emphasizes the crucial importance of providing labour inspectors with suitable transport facilities, since their mobility is essential for the fulfilment of their duties, particularly in agricultural undertakings, which are by nature located far from urban areas and are often spread over an area without public transport. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to evaluate these needs and to submit them to the financial authorities with a view to giving effect to the requirements of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any measures taken in this connection and on the results obtained.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Bulgaria

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1949)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 3(2) and 16 of the Convention. Additional functions entrusted to labour inspectors. The Committee notes that the number of inspections carried out in 2009 was according to the Government more than double the inspections carried out the previous year and the number of violations found was 26 per cent higher, as a result of the increase in the number of inspections. The Government attributes this increase to significant improvements in the organization, preparation, execution and reporting of the inspections as well as the reduction of the duration of a single inspection. The Government also reports that the labour inspectorate has at its disposal facilities in 30 locations and 143 motor vehicles of which 38 are off-road vehicles. Each labour inspector has an average workload of 588 enterprises and 7,250 "insured persons" and is provided with a notebook, mobile internet and mobile phone with limited calls covered by the budget of the General Labour Inspectorate Executive Agency (GLIEA).

The Committee notes from the Annual Report of the GLIEA that in 2009, emphasis was placed on ensuring wage payment in the context of the economic crisis and that consequently, delayed payments of wages and other remuneration were settled in the order of 39 million Bulgarian levs (BGN).

The Committee also notes however from the Government's report that the control on the compliance with the provisions of the Employment Promotion Act was also aimed at the lawful employment of foreigners. According to the 2009 activity report of the GLIEA, this control appears to take place on certain occasions with the involvement of representatives of the Ministry of the Interior following alerts that foreign citizens perform work without a permit. The Committee also notes that article 7(2) and (3) of the Labour Inspection Act sets out certain conditions under which joint investigations can be carried out with other agencies.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide details on the nature and scope of the activities carried out by the labour inspectorate in the area of controlling undeclared work and in particular the employment of irregular foreign workers, including information on the detected violations and the legal provisions concerned as well as the legal proceedings initiated, remedies applied and sanctions imposed. It requests the Government to specify the impact of the activities of the labour inspectorate focused on undeclared work in relation to the enforcement of provisions on conditions of work and the protection of workers, including undeclared workers.

In particular, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate the manner in which the labour inspectorate ensures the enforcement of the employers' obligations with regard to the rights of foreign workers in an irregular situation, such as the payment of wages and social security benefits for the period of their effective employment relationship, especially in cases where such workers are liable to expulsion from the country; and asks the Government to provide information on the number of cases where workers found to be in an irregular situation have been granted their due rights.

The Committee also requests the Government to describe the method and nature of the joint investigations carried out by the labour inspectorate with other agencies including the Ministry of the Interior.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Burundi

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee notes the report sent by the Trade Union Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU) dated 30 August 2012 concerning the insufficient material means provided to labour inspectors in order to promote Occupational Safety and Health (OSH) in the workplace. The Committee requests the Government to provide the relevant information in this respect.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Primary duties of labour inspectorates. In its previous comments the Committee had observed that labour inspectorates' activities focused mainly on dispute resolution issues, instead of activities aiming at the enforcement function provided for by Article 3(1) of the Convention. Its appreciation was based on the reports on 2000 and 2001 first-quarter labour inspection activities, showing also the performing of a huge amount of administrative tasks. The Committee notes that five out of the nine inspectors are entrusted with collective dispute resolution issues, only three others dealing with control of conditions of work, though all of them have participated in a seminar organized by the Programme for promoting social dialogue in African French-speaking countries (PRODIAF) on proceedings relating to labour dispute resolution, during the first quarter of 2006. This information confirms that labour inspection continues to be taken off its main role to be put on labour dispute resolution missions.

According to the Government, the absence of a special status, the lack of means of transport, of qualifications and of technical equipment seem to have led to a lack of confidence from the employers towards labour inspectors.

The Committee once again stresses that it is necessary for labour inspectors to focus on the enforcement of legal provisions on labour conditions and protection of workers while engaged in their work (Article 3(1)) and that any further duties entrusted to them should not interfere with the effective discharge of their primary duties or prejudice in any way the authority and impartiality which are necessary in their relations with employers and workers (paragraph 2). It also recalls the Government's obligation of the competent authority to take measures to make available to labour inspectors the necessary means, such as transport facilities where no appropriate public transport facilities exist and reimbursement of any travelling and incidental expenses which may be necessary for the performance of their duties (Article 11). It expresses the hope that appropriate financial support will soon be granted through international cooperation to this end. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate any steps taken and any progress achieved in this regard and communicate in the nearest future any available report on labour inspection activities in industrial and commercial workplaces, concerning the application of legal provisions on conditions of work and protection of workers.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Cameroon

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the Government's report received at the ILO on 1 September 2012. It also notes the observations made by the General Union of Workers of Cameroon (UGTC) in a communication of 29 October 2012, received at the ILO on 12 November 2012. The Committee asks the Government to send any comments it deems appropriate on these observations.

The Committee also notes with interest that in May 2011, the Government sought and received technical assistance from the ILO to carry out an assessment of the labour administration and labour inspection services. It notes that the recommendations made in the assessment, which was completed in May 2011, to a large extent reflect the Committee's previous comments on the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged, if necessary with financial assistance to be sought in the context of international cooperation, to gradually put in place a labour inspection system that meets the requirements of the Convention, in the light of the recommendations made in the abovementioned assessment.

The Committee raises other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Cape Verde

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1979)

Legislation. The Committee notes that new regulations for the labour inspectorate-general, which give effect to certain provisions of the Convention, were adopted by Legislative Decree No. 13/2012 of 26 January 2012.

Article 14 of the Convention. Notification to the labour inspectorate of cases of occupational disease. The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 17(1) of the new regulations of the labour inspectorate-general establishes the obligation to notify the competent regional delegation for labour inspection of fatal cases of occupational disease. This notification, as for fatal industrial accidents, must be made by the employer within 24 hours. It also notes that, according to section 18 of the same regulations, the employer is obliged to gather, collate and communicate to the labour inspectorate-general within ten days after the end of the relevant three-month period, quarterly data concerning diagnosed cases of occupational disease, and also industrial accidents which result in incapacity for work of more than one day. These data must be accompanied by an indication of the date and location of the accident or of the origin of the disease, its cause, the nature and extent of the injury, and the number of days of incapacity. The Committee requests the Government to send any legislative text adopted pursuant to the provisions of the abovementioned section 17, and also statistics of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease communicated to the various regional labour inspection branches during the period covered by the Government's next report, pursuant to the legislation in force.

Article 15. Scope of the obligation of professional secrecy. The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 34(1) of the new regulations of the labour inspectorate-general extends the obligation of professional secrecy that applies to labour inspectors beyond the end of their activity. The Committee requests the Government to indicate what would be the consequences for labour inspectors of non-compliance with the obligation of secrecy and also the obligation of confidentiality and the prohibition on personal interests prescribed by sections 34 and 35, respectively, of the new regulations, and to send copies, if applicable, of any relevant legislative texts.

Articles 20 and 21. Publication and communication of an annual report. The Government indicates in its report that, in view of the inadequacy of human resources and material means for the collection and processing of statistical information, the labour administration is still not in a position to collect and process statistical data. However, the Committee notes the internal annual report for 2011, copies of which have been made available to the social partners and the Office. This report contains information on the number of inspectors per branch; the number of inspections undertaken by the various inspection branches and by sector of activity; the number of compliance orders issued and the number of prosecutions initiated by branch office; the type of infringements reported; the number of requests for action submitted and the infringements to which they relate; the number of procedures initiated per infringement; the number of procedures concluded; the number of procedures referred to the court, the number of procedures archived, and the number of procedures per infringement in progress; and the number of industrial accidents and the percentage of accidents per sector of activity. The Committee invites the Government to refer to the guidance given in Part IV of Recommendation No. 81 concerning the manner in which the information required by Article 21 may be presented in the annual report to serve as a basis for evaluating the operation of the labour inspectorate and the level of application of the legislation under its supervision, and also the adoption of the necessary measures for its improvement. It also reminds the Government of the possibility of availing itself of technical assistance from the ILO in order to establish the necessary conditions for the preparation of an annual report, its publication and the communication thereof to the ILO, in accordance with Article 20, and the inclusion of the information required by Article 21 in such a report. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report information on the formal steps it might have taken in this respect.

Central African Republic

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 09-004 of 29 January 2009 establishing the Labour Code chapter II of which concerns labour inspection and gives effect to many provisions of the Convention.

Articles 3(2), 10, 11 and 16 of the Convention. Duties of labour inspectors and human and budgetary resources of the labour inspection service. The Committee notes that, according to the Government's report, the application of the Convention poses a problem in so far as the resources which should be available to labour inspectors for the performance of their duties are mostly lacking. Notwithstanding section 319(2) of the Labour Code, under the terms of which labour inspection services must have premises that are suited to their needs, the Government states that no significant measures have actually been adopted to this end. In particular, some offices lack even the most essential items, namely, doors, lights, chairs and tables, and are inaccessible when it rains because of flooding. Furthermore, according to the Government's report, no transport facilities have been established for inspectors since the ratification of the Convention and, apart from the transport expenses which they cover in the course of their duties, labour inspectors themselves pay the costs of communications, reprographics, printing, etc., necessary for the performance of their duties. The Government also states that out of the 53 inspectors, only 18 are assigned to enforcement duties. Some inspectors and controllers who were recruited in 2010 and 2011 are engaged in internships within the technical departments.

The Committee notes with concern the description that the Government has made of the situation faced by the labour inspection services, both from the point of view of human resources and material means. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided the information requested on any steps taken to obtain the technical assistance of the Office and to seek resources through international financial cooperation to improve on this situation.

The Committee urges once again the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance, including in order to obtain support in its search for the necessary funds in the framework of international cooperation, with a view to the progressive establishment of a labour inspection system which meets the requirements of the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on any formal step taken to this end.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Chad

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Further to its previous comments, the Committee once again notes with concern that the information sent by the Government is the same as that already received in April 2005 and 2006, and that the reports on the work of the inspectorate and the local inspection offices announced time and again in the Government's reports as being attached have still not been sent. Consequently, while noting that between 2005 and 2009 the number of labour inspectors rose from 15 to 23, the Committee is bound to draw the Government's attention once again to the commitments it made when it ratified the Convention, and accordingly to urge it to provide the Office with up to date information on the legislative and practical measures taken or envisaged to apply the Convention, and on any difficulties encountered.

Legislation. The Committee once again asks the Government to take steps for the adoption of texts giving effect to the provisions of the Labour Code on the powers and duties of labour inspectors and controllers and for the enactment of the draft decree issuing regulations governing labour inspectors and controllers to which the Government has been referring for many years. Please report any progress made in this regard.

Article 10 of the Convention. Increasing the numbers and qualifications of the labour inspectorate. The Committee requests the Government to specify the context in which the number of labour inspectors was increased and to indicate whether measures have been taken or are envisaged for the training of the staff of the inspectorate, either to update their skills or to give them further training to enable them to perform their duties effectively. Please describe any such measures and indicate their impact in terms of the achievement of the objectives of labour inspection.

Articles 11 and 16. Material resources and transport facilities made available to labour inspectors for the performance of their duties. Noting the information contained in an earlier report about possible financial support in the context of international cooperation, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide information on any developments in this matter in recent years and on any progress made in providing the labour inspection services with material resources for their work, particularly transport facilities, so that they are able to implement workplace inspection programmes. If the Government has been unable to obtain financial support, the Committee asks it to indicate the obstacles encountered and the measures envisaged for this purpose.

Articles 20 and 21. Publication and communication to the International Labour Office of an annual report on labour inspection activities. Further to its previous comments, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the central labour inspection authority publishes and sends to the ILO an annual report, in accordance with these provisions of the Convention and with section 469 of the Labour Code, and to provide information in this respect.

While aware of the financial difficulties that are preventing the strict application of the relevant provisions of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to provide all the information and documentation that is currently available on the legislation covered by the Convention (Articles 2, 3(1)(a) and 21(a)) and on the work of the inspectorate and the results achieved (Article 21(c)–(g)), to enable the Committee to assess the situation and provide useful recommendations for the progressive application of the requirements of the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

China

Hong Kong Special Administrative Region

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (notification: 1997)

Articles 3(1) and (2) and 17 of the Convention. Additional functions entrusted to labour inspectors. The Committee notes with interest from the Government's report that 26 posts of labour inspectors were created in 2011 to strengthen enforcement of labour legislation on conditions of employment. It also notes from the annual report of the Labour Department for 2010 the priority placed on preventive and enforcement action to ensure timely wage payment. The Committee notes however with concern, from the Government's report, that labour inspectors continue to be involved in joint operations which, by granting the police and immigration authorities access to workplaces, allow the latter to arrest workers on the grounds of their "illegal" residence situation.

The Government indicates that the number of joint operations has been relatively small compared to the total number of workplace inspections (217 and 193 joint operations compared to 140,267 and 138,395 inspections in 2010 and 2011, respectively), and that the role of labour inspectors in this framework is to collect intelligence and evidence on suspected "illegal" employment activities for the ultimate purpose of protecting the rights and benefits of workers and securing convictions against unscrupulous employers. According to the Government's report, as a result of stringent enforcement actions, the Labour Department secured a total of 4,397 convictions under different provisions of the Employment Ordinance, Chapter 57, in 2010 and 2011.

The Committee recalls once again, with reference to its previous comments, that a role for the labour inspectorate consisting of assisting the police and immigration authorities to target workers suspected of being "illegal" is in total contradiction with the protective function entrusted to labour inspectors by the Convention and is not conducive to the relationship of trust needed to create the climate of confidence that is essential to enlisting the cooperation of employers and workers with labour inspectors. It must be possible for inspectors to be respected for their authority to report offences, and at the same time to be approachable as preventers and advisers. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures as soon as possible to dissociate the functions of enforcing immigration law from those of controlling the observance of workers' rights by ensuring that labour inspectors are no longer involved in joint operations which, by granting the police and immigration authorities access to workplaces, allows the latter to arrest undocumented workers on the grounds of their irregular residence situation.

With reference to paragraph 78 of the 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, the Committee reminds the Government that, to be compatible with the protective function of labour inspection, the verification of the legality of employment by labour inspectors should have as its corollary the reinstatement of the statutory rights of all workers, including undocumented ones. This objective can only be met if the workers covered are convinced that the primary task for the labour inspectorate is to enforce the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the labour inspectorate ensures the discharge of employers' obligations (notably payment of wages and other benefits owed for work done during the period of the effective employment relationship) with regard to undocumented workers in an irregular situation from the point of view of residence status, including in cases where such workers are liable to expulsion or have already been expelled by the immigration authorities. In this regard, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide more detailed information on legal proceedings instituted, and remedies and sanctions imposed on employers found to be in violation of the legal provisions relating to workers' statutory rights including vis-à-vis undocumented foreign workers.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Colombia

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes the comments from: the National Employers' Association of Colombia (ANDI), dated 31 August 2011 and 5 September 2012, supported by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE); the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT) and the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC), dated 30 August 2011 and 31 August 2012; the General Confederation of Labour (CGT), dated 1 September 2011; and the Government's reply to the observations from the trade union organizations. It also notes the conclusions of the report of the ILO high-level tripartite mission to the country from 14 to 18 February 2011, in the context of the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Technical cooperation project on international labour standards

The Committee notes with interest the launching, in August 2012, of the project to promote compliance with international labour standards in Colombia, financed by the Government of the United States. The objectives of the project are: (1) to strengthen the institutional capacity of the Ministry of Labour, and particularly of the labour inspection services; (2) to strengthen existing social dialogue bodies and the social partners who participate in them; and (3) to strengthen the institutional capacity of the Government of Colombia to improve measures for the protection of trade union leaders, members, activists and organizers and to combat the impunity of perpetrators of acts of violence against them. The Committee also notes that the project envisages providing the necessary technical assistance as a priority to the units of the new Ministry of Labour responsible for combating the abuse of employment mediation (agencies) and other forms of contracting which are in violation of workers' rights (such as associated work cooperatives, simplified limited liability companies and temporary service enterprises) and to guarantee that collective accords are not used to undermine the position of trade unions or to prevent the conclusion of collective agreements. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of the project and its impact on strengthening the labour inspection services.

Articles 2, 4 and 10 of the Convention. Coordination of the inspection system and numbers of inspectors. The Committee notes that Act No. 1444 of 4 May 2011 re-established the Ministry of Labour through a restructuring of the Ministry of Social Protection and that Decree No. 4108 of 2 November 2011 determined the objectives, functions and structure of the Ministry of Labour, including with regard to labour inspection.

The Committee notes that the CUT and CTC welcome the creation of the Ministry of Labour but consider that the labour inspectorates of the departmental territorial directorates are uncoordinated in their action and that there is no labour inspection in rural localities, especially those where there are mining operations. The CUT, CTC and CGT continue to deplore the inadequate numbers of labour inspectors, despite the labour agreement concluded in 2011 with a view to updating the tripartite agreement signed in 2006, which contains the recommendations of the high-level mission including with regard to the importance and urgency of strengthening the labour inspectorate by increasing the number of inspectors. The CTC declares that although the total number of labour inspectors increased by 100, resulting in a new total of 524, the new inspectors have not yet taken up their duties. The CGT considers that assigning 100 out of the 480 extra labour inspectors at the Government's disposal in 2014 to supervise and monitor the sectors of horticulture, palm oil production, sugar production, dock work and mining is insufficient for these five sectors, where the greatest number of violations of workers' rights occur. According to the information from the CGT, there are 15,000 miners who, according to a recent report from the Ombudsman's Office, earn a living from some 3,600 illegal mines and many workers are subcontracted or outsourced in the major coal mining and petroleum companies. The CUT and CTC also allege that the country only has 16 safety inspectors for a total of 3,000 active mines and, according to the latter, the lack of inspection is visible in the increase in child labour, which is now said to involve 1,465,000 children in the country.

The ANDI, for its part, considers that the measures adopted by the Government and Congress (including the creation of new labour inspector posts and the implementation of the inspection plan for the key sectors) are proof of the country's commitment to observing the labour rights established by Convention No. 81. Of these measures, it highlights the budget allocations by the Government to recruit 480 new labour inspectors over a four-year period.

The Government in turn indicates that 100 new labour and social security inspector posts were created through Decree No. 1228 of 15 April 2011 and another 100 through Decree No. 1732 of 16 August 2012, thereby increasing the total number of inspectors, which stood at 424 in 2010, to 624 at the end of August 2012. Of this total, 451 had commenced their duties by the end of July 2012. It also indicates in its reports on the present Convention and Convention No. 129 that, by means of the restructuring, labour inspection services were created in the municipalities of Puerto Gaitán (Meta) and Orito (Putumayo) in addition to those that had already been set up in the municipalities of El Bague (Antioquia) and Jagua de Ibirico (César). The Committee also notes with interest that, in this context, an analysis of the structure, human resources, and location of all the territorial directorates, with regard to their central offices and to the labour inspectorates, was under way at the end of August 2012. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results of this analysis and its recommendations, and on any follow-up measures taken or contemplated and on any other measures taken with a view to extending or strengthening the coverage of the labour inspection system, particularly in remote rural localities.

The Committee also requests the Government to supply information on the manner in which the central labour inspection authority ensures effective coordination among the inspection services of the various territorial directorates and to send the updated organizational chart of the labour inspectorate and its structure at central, regional and municipal levels. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to state the number of inspectors currently in active service and their geographical distribution in relation to the number and location of workplaces liable to inspection and the number of workers employed therein.

Articles 3(1)(b) and 17. Implementation of a preventive approach to labour inspection. The CUT and CTC state that the “preventive inspection system” established by Decrees Nos 1293 and 1294 of 2009 and Decision No. 2605/09 has in practice turned into tolerance of violations of workers' rights.

According to the ANDI, the purpose of the “preventive inspection system” is to strengthen the monitoring function within enterprises. The lines of action of this system are to: raise awareness of and commitment towards the development of a culture of compliance; provide information on risks, disputes and non-compliance with labour obligations; streamline procedures; establish technologies and communications; ensure the participation of public and private enterprises and institutions; and reinforce the staff of the Ministry of Labour, with the focus on catering for users. The ANDI considers that the implementation of this system has promoted improvements in labour inspection in the country and has enabled the creation of forums for dialogue among the social partners and with the Ministry, the abolition of unnecessary procedures, the strengthening of the human resources of the Ministry and their qualifications, and producing changes in user behaviour.

According to the Government, this inspection model was presented to the Commission on Labour and Wage Policies, of which the CUT, CGT and CTC form a part. “Preventive inspections” were initially conducted in the formal sector and are not subject to authorization by the employer. Since the initial goal is the prevention and improvements to working conditions without having recourse to the imposition of penalties, communication is established with the enterprise to announce the presence of the inspector and explain his reasons for being there. “Improvement agreements” are concluded between the employer and the workers and in the event of non-compliance the inspector initiates a “reactive inspection” with a view to imposing penalties. Checks are carried out on the plant at the enterprise and, if documentation is involved, the employer may be requested to bring it to the inspection offices. Should the inspector detect infringements in the course of these checks, the relevant investigation must be conducted and the applicable penalties imposed.

The Committee reminds the Government, in the terms of the 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, paragraphs 279 and 282, that the advice and information provided for in Article 3(1)(b) of the Convention can only encourage compliance with legal provisions but should nonetheless be accompanied by an enforcement mechanism enabling those guilty of violations reported by labour inspectors to be prosecuted. The functions of enforcement and advice are inseparable in practice. This discretion provided for in Article 17(2) implies that inspection staff have the necessary capacity for judgement to be able to distinguish between serious or repeated wilful non-compliance, culpable negligence or flagrant ill-will, which call for a penalty, and an involuntary or minor violation, which may lead to a mere warning.

The Committee requests the Government to explain how, as far as “preventive inspections” are concerned, Article 17(2) is applied, under which it shall be left to the discretion of labour inspectors to give warning and advice instead of instituting or recommending proceedings.

The Committee also requests the Government to supply information and data for the period covered by the next report concerning the criteria for the planning of different types of inspections, the proportion of “preventive inspections” in relation to inspections of a general and “reactive” nature, the observations made by inspectors in the context of “preventive inspections”, the period and manner in which inspectors check the implementation of “improvement agreements” and what action they take if the results are unsatisfactory. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on any preventive measures which labour inspectors order or ensure are ordered, including immediately enforceable measures (Article 13(b)), when they identify defects in plant, equipment or working methods which may represent a danger to the health or safety of workers.

Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to state whether it has adopted measures to evaluate, with the participation of the social partners, the impact of the “preventive inspection system” on the effective application of the legislation relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers.

Article 3(1)(c). Associated work cooperatives and pre-cooperatives. In the comments which it had been addressing to the Government since 2008, the Committee has urged the Government to take steps to give effect in the context of associated work cooperatives to this provision of the Convention, which requires the labour inspection system to bring to the notice of the competent authority defects or abuses not specifically covered by existing legal provisions. The Committee notes that although the CTC recognizes that the Government has adopted a number of important measures such as legislation to monitor the job placement role performed by associated work cooperatives, it considers that these measures have not succeeded in putting a stop to informal or precarious employment or to anti-union practices. The Government indicates that on several occasions it has expressed its concern regarding the distortion of the role of associated work cooperatives and that many aspects of the situation have been rectified through legal instruments which have established regulations for associated labour, stating its nature and fixing the rules for its structure and operation, and have also established an inspection programme targeting the sector.

The Committee previously welcomed the provisions of Act No. 1233 of 2008, which prevented associated work cooperatives from acting as a means of evading the application of labour legislation, including with regard to trade union rights. The Committee points out that section 63 of Act No. 1429 of 29 December 2010 again permits associated work cooperatives to act as intermediary enterprises for the recruitment of staff for activities not considered to be “permanent assignments”. However, the Committee observes with interest that section 1 of Decree No. 2021 of 8 June 2011, which partially implements Act No. 1233 of 2008 and section 63 of the abovementioned Act No. 1429, stipulates that the placement of labour is a function that belongs to temporary employment agencies and is not permitted for associated work cooperatives. Under the same provision, “permanent assignment” means an activity or function directly related to the production of goods or the provision of services which are characteristic of the enterprise. The Committee notes that sections 4 and 9 of the abovementioned Decree establish penalties for violations of this legislation, consisting of fines and/or dissolution and liquidation of the cooperative. Section 10 of the same Decree provides for a reduction of the penalty in cases when a subcontracted worker is entrusted with prohibited permanent operations or assignments if an indefinite employment relationship is formalized by means of a written contract.

The Committee also notes with interest the information highlighted by the ANDI concerning the setting up for public use of an anonymous complaints system regarding violations of labour rights, the implementation of an exclusive telephone helpline for dealing with complaints relating to associated work cooperatives, the creation of a link to the Ministry’s website for making complaints or suggestions, and the preparation of a handbook for the conduct of inspections in relation to the placement of labour.

The Committee further notes that the 2011 programme for prevention, supervision and monitoring in relation to associated work cooperatives and associated work pre-cooperatives, which contains guidelines to be followed by the territorial directorates of the Ministry to prevent misuse of associated work cooperatives, includes: (i) exchange of information between the territorial directorates and the relevant bodies; (ii) training for labour inspectors; (iii) training actions targeting associated work cooperatives; (iv) improvement agreements; and (v) monitoring in its own right, giving priority to entities accounting for the largest number of complaints and investigations, those which have been penalized, those that have associated workers who provide services in high-risk sectors, and those which have contracts in the mining, horticulture, health-care and sugar cane harvesting sectors.

The Committee also notes with interest that the Government has assigned 100 labour inspectors exclusively to monitoring the improper use of associated work cooperatives for the purpose of flouting workers’ rights, and also the statistical information regarding penalties imposed on them in 2010 and the first four months of 2011 and the schedule of inspections that were due in associated work cooperatives in 2011. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on: (i) inspections conducted in associated work cooperatives (indicating their respective sectors and regions), infringements recorded (indicating the relevant legal provisions) and penalties imposed (fines, suspension and/or withdrawal of recognized legal status); (ii) the reduced penalties laid down under section 10 of the abovementioned Decree No. 2021 of 2011; (iii) any measures taken or contemplated to ensure that labour inspectors inspect both registered and non-registered associated work cooperatives premises and exercise all their powers, not just those of checking documents, as previously called for by the CUT and CTC; and (iv) the number of “improvement agreements” concluded under the programme for supervision and monitoring of associated work cooperatives and their impact on the objectives of the Convention.

Article 3(2). Removal of labour inspectors’ additional duties to ensure the effective discharge of their primary duties. As regards additional duties in labour inspection, the CGT alleges that labour inspectors continue to perform many duties, including conciliation, which undermines their impartiality and also reduces the time that they can devote to the discharge of their primary duties. Although the CUT recognizes that labour inspectors were relieved of certain tasks, it considers that they have still have an excessive workload, since new tasks have been added, others were merged and the conciliation role persists, and this prevents them from conducting in situ inspections.

The ANDI refers in this respect to the removal of tasks from the inspectors' workload relating to: the approval of internal work regulations; monetary compensation for holidays; the authorization of loans, advances, various deductions or compensation for wages and those related to the registration of retirees, by means of Act No. 1429 of 2010.

The Committee notes with interest the Government's indications that Act No. 1429 of 2010 abolished 13 tasks that previously had to be performed by labour inspectors and Decision No. 1286 of 20 April 2011 relieved inspectors of the task of processing authorizations for severance payments and for the registration of retirees. The Government states that, under the terms of the abovementioned Decision No. 2605/09, the role of conciliation between the parties was assigned to a specific group of inspectors and inspection and monitoring were assigned to another group.

The Committee recalls that the issue of relieving the labour inspectorate of tasks not provided for in Article 3(1) of the Convention and in particular those performed in the context of dispute resolution has been the subject of comments since 2000. The Committee requests the Government to send a copy of Decision No. 2605/09 and to state how it is applied in practice with regard to the distribution of conciliation and inspection tasks for labour inspectors, at the central office and in territorial and municipal offices. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of inspectors who perform conciliation duties and whether they are included in budget allocations for the labour inspectorate.

Articles 5(a), 17, 18 and 21(e). Effective cooperation between the labour inspection services and the judicial authorities. Adequate penalties and effective enforcement. The Committee notes that the high-level mission emphasized in its conclusions the crucial nature of strengthening enforcement of the legislation and of effective penalties with a view to ensuring that acts of anti-union discrimination, including dismissal and intimidation, can be prevented, remedied and penalized by means of rapid, accessible and effective procedures.

The Committee notes that the Government does not provide the information which it requested on the role of labour inspectors in legal proceedings against employers who infringe the labour legislation, including in associated work cooperatives (Article 17), and on the level of penalties so that they have a deterrent effect (Article 18). It draws the Government's attention to paragraphs 291–306 of the 2006 General Survey on labour inspection and emphasizes that it is essential for the credibility and effectiveness of the labour inspection system for violations to be identified by national legislation and for the proceedings instituted or recommended by labour inspectors against employers guilty of violations to be sufficiently dissuasive and to make employers in general aware of the risks they run if they fail to meet their obligations. The Committee requests the Government to send information on the measures taken to ensure the deterrent effect of penalties for violations of the legal provisions – including those relating to anti-union discrimination (dismissal and intimidation) – which are enforced by labour inspectors, and for obstruction of the latter in the performance of their duties, and to ensure that the aforementioned penalties are effectively enforced. The Committee also requests the Government to send statistics of infringements detected by labour inspectors indicating the legal provisions concerned, the penalties imposed and, if applicable, the judicial action taken.

The Committee further requests the Government to indicate all the measures taken or contemplated to promote effective cooperation between the labour inspection services and the justice system, with a view to encouraging due diligence and thoroughness in the treatment by judicial bodies of infringements reported to them by the labour inspectorate, and also disputes in the same sphere referred to them directly by workers or their organizations. In this regard the Committee considers that a system for the registration of judicial decisions to which the labour inspectorate has access will enable the central authority to make good use of such data with respect to its objectives and include them in its annual report, as provided for in Article 21(e). The Committee requests the Government to send information on the measures taken or contemplated with regard to establishing a register of judicial decisions accessible to the labour inspectorate.

Articles 6 and 15(a). Status, conditions of service and independence of labour inspectors. The Committee notes with interest that under Decree No. 1227 of 15 April 2012 the pay conditions of labour inspectors were improved, since there was a harmonization of grades which resulted in a pay increase of three steps. However, the Committee also notes that the CUT and CTC allege that more inspectors with temporary status are being appointed and the CGT claims that a large number of inspectors do not have any job security, which is contrary to the terms of the Convention and constitutes an obstacle to the effectiveness of labour inspection. According to the ANDI, labour inspector posts belong to the administrative career category and so selection and promotion of employees is undertaken on the basis of suitability, ability and merit. Moreover, in accordance with Decision No. 2180 of 2008, inspectors come from diverse professional backgrounds: lawyers, engineers, economists, etc. The ANDI adds that the harmonization of grades for inspectors carried out in 2011 has also resulted in an increase in salary.

The Government reiterates that labour inspector posts are administrative career posts. When new posts are created or vacant posts are filled, appointments are made on a provisional basis while the National Civil Service Commission holds the relevant competition.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate: (i) the current number of inspectors appointed on a provisional basis, compared with the number of inspectors who belong to the administrative career category; (ii) the duration of temporary appointments; (iii) the tasks assigned to temporary inspectors; (iv) the powers assigned to them; and (v) in what manner it is ensured that they are independent of changes of government and of improper external influences, as prescribed by Article 6 of the Convention.

Article 7(3). 1. Training of labour inspectors. As regards the allegations from the CUT and CTC that inspectors lack adequate and proper training and their competencies are not evaluated in the course of their duties, the Committee observes with interest that Decision No. 2180 of 2008 stipulates that one of the requirements for the post of labour inspector is to hold professional qualifications in law, medicine, industrial engineering, business administration or economics. As regards the recommendations of the high-level mission referred to above, concerning the implementation of an induction and training programme for labour inspectors, the Committee also notes with interest the information supplied by the Government to the effect that a specific training programme for labour inspectors has been implemented and it is planned to give them training en masse regarding analysis of labour hazards, the law of evidence and the updating of standards. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the specific programme implemented for the training of labour inspectors, stating: (i) its duration, with regard to both initial and further training; (ii) the number of inspectors who will benefit from this programme; (iii) the subjects covered, differentiating between initial and further training; and (iv) the training body. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures planned or adopted with a view to ensuring the durability of both initial and further training for labour inspectors. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which labour inspectors are evaluated in the course of their duties.

2. Training in the area of freedom of association. The Committee observes that during the ILO high-level mission to the country from 14 to 18 February 2011, in the context of the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), various trade union representatives highlighted the inadequacy or complete absence of replies from the labour inspectorate in relation to certain cases relating to freedom of association and collective bargaining, including anti-union conduct from certain inspection officials. They also emphasized that any initiative designed to strengthen labour inspection should include a component relating to freedom of association and collective bargaining. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or planned to ensure that programmes of initial and further training for labour inspectors include a specific module of awareness-raising and training with respect to freedom of association.

Articles 11, 12 and 15(a). Material means placed at the disposal of the labour inspectorate, and principles of freedom of entry and independence on the part of inspectors. The Committee notes with interest the information provided by the Government regarding adjustments to posts in 28 territorial directorates in 2009 and 2010, with investment in the form of 230 computers, printers, communication networks and Internet access. It also notes the documents cited by the Government containing statistical information on budget implementation by the territorial directorates of the Ministry, including budget items for transport costs and expense allowances.

With regard to means of transport, the Committee notes the CGT's statement that the cost of many inspections is borne by the trade unions or the employer. The CUT and CTC also emphasize the lack of material resources for travel, especially in rural areas. According to the CUT, Bill No. 139 which is before the Congress of the Republic leaves the possibility open for inspectors to receive assistance from employers with regard to their travel to remote areas, and this could undermine their impartiality.

The Committee recalls that in its comments in 2004 (92nd Session) and in paragraph 253 of the 2006 General Survey, it welcomed the fact that labour inspection staff in Colombia were forbidden, via a circular from the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, to use for professional purposes vehicles made available to them directly or indirectly by employers, trade unions or workers. It also recalls that, in accordance with paragraph 225 of the 2006 General Survey, the prohibition on labour inspectors having any interest whatsoever in the enterprises under their supervision applies to considerations or services offered by employers or workers.

In its previous comments the Committee stressed the fact that the travel expenses of labour inspectors are only reimbursed up to an amount of 4,000 Colombia pesos (COP) and so higher costs have to be borne by labour inspectors themselves, and it referred to the claim by the CUT and CTC that, in practice, travel expenses are not reimbursed when inspections are carried out without prior authorization from the director of the territorial directorate, which can take up to one week or more despite the urgent nature of certain situations. In their latest comments the CUT and CTC add that unforeseen expenses are not repaid either. With reference to paragraphs 265–266 of the 2006 General Survey, the Committee recalls the principle of inspectors' freedom to enter workplaces laid down by Article 12 of the Convention, which implies that certain obstacles to or restrictions on inspectors' free initiative, including prior authorization, may be contrary to the Convention.

The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to provide labour inspectors with adequate transport facilities for the performance of their duties, both in the central office at the Ministry and in the various territorial directorates and the labour inspectorates furthest removed from urban centres, and to reimburse labour inspectors for any unforeseen costs and any travel expenses necessary for the performance of their duties. The Committee requests the Government to keep the ILO informed of any progress made in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government once again to provide information on the application in practice of labour inspectors' right to enter freely, without prior authorization, workplaces liable to inspection (Article 12(1)(a)).

Article 15(c). Principle of confidentiality regarding the source of complaints. For a number of years the Committee has been urging the Government to take steps to establish the necessary legal basis to ensure that labour inspectors respect the confidentiality of complaints so as to protect workers from any reprisals from the employer or his representative. The Government indicates that it has been the usual practice of the Ministry to keep a record of the name of the complainant when the information is obtained verbally. It adds, however, that the Ministry will issue an administrative notice giving instructions regarding the discretion to be maintained by labour inspectors in accordance with this provision of the Convention and that the text of the draft notice will be forwarded to the Office. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that the necessary measures are taken without further delay to secure to workers the protection prescribed by this provision of the Convention and requests it to send a copy of any relevant legislative text which is adopted.

Articles 20 and 21. Annual report on the work of the inspection services. The Government indicates that through the Under-Ministry of Labour Relations, the Ministry of Labour issues a monthly bulletin containing information on inspection activities. The Government also declares that it will have available a computerized system for the registration and analysis of data on labour inspection, enabling access to and use of such information, which will consolidate and update all existing databases on labour inspection and be accessible to the user. The Committee notes with interest the statistical information sent by the Government on inspections carried out in 2010, 2011 and the first half of 2012, administrative investigations launched and penalties imposed during the same periods, and industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease that occurred in 2009, 2010, 2011 and the first half of 2012. The Committee draws the Government's attention to the guidance contained in Part IV of the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), concerning the form in which the information required by Article 21 may be presented. However, observing that no statistics have been provided of workplaces liable to inspection or the number of workers employed therein (Article 21(c)), the Committee reminds the Government that these data are essential to enable the central inspection authority to evaluate the rate of coverage provided by the labour inspection system and its needs in terms of human and material resources and to take account of these when approving the budget. The Committee invites the Government to refer to its general observation of 2009 with regard to the desirability of inter-institutional cooperation in relation to the establishment, improvement or updating of a register of workplaces liable to inspection. The Committee hopes that the Government will send in the near future an annual inspection report which meets the requirements of form and substance prescribed in Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention.

Article 22 et seq. Part II of the Convention. Labour inspection in commercial workplaces. The Committee requests the Government to send any information relating to examination, in consultation with the employers and workers, of a possible extension of the ratification of the Convention to commercial workplaces.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee refers the Government to its observation under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), in so far as they are also concerned with the application of the present Convention.

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the new comments from the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT) dated 31 August 2012, forwarded to the Government on 13 September 2012. The comments refer for the most part to matters already raised by the Committee, including the number of inspectors, their training, the number of visits to agricultural undertakings (212 in 2011, i.e. far too low to cover the 3,567,000 workers employed in this sector), the independence and autonomy of inspectors, the lack of transport facilities suited to the performance of inspection duties in remote farms, the lack of secretaries or auxiliaries and technical teams for the preventive control required by Article 17 of the Convention, and the lack of information on labour inspection in agriculture in the Ministry of Labour's reports. The Committee asks the Government to make any comments it deems appropriate in relation to the observations made by the CUT.

Articles 6(1)(a), 14, 21 and 24. Supervisory function of the system of labour inspection in agriculture, frequency and scope of inspection visits and adequate and effectively applied sanctions. The Committee notes the information from the Government that the Ministry of Labour devised a plan of inspection visits specifically targeting critical sectors such as agriculture, including flower, palm and sugar cane growing. According to the Government, inspection in the palm tree sector has been exemplary since a sizeable fine was imposed for the first time. The Government also states that the Ministry launched a campaign to formalize employment which includes visits to undertakings in the sugar and palm growing sector for the purpose of checking on compliance with social security obligations. The Committee notes the information set out in table form on inspection visits conducted in the agricultural sector between January and July 2012, on general inspections conducted in June 2012, and on the number of penalties imposed on undertakings in the sugar, flower and palm growing sectors between January and February 2012. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure, in accordance with Article 21 of the Convention, that agricultural undertakings are inspected as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions on conditions of work and the protection of workers, supervision of which is entrusted to labour inspectors. It also asks the Government to provide information on the number and location of the agricultural undertakings liable to inspection (Article 14(a)(i)) and the number and classes of persons working in such undertakings (Article 14(a)(ii)). The Committee furthermore requests the Government to provide detailed information on breaches of the labour provisions detected by inspectors in the course of their visits to agricultural undertakings (indicating the provision in question), the penalties imposed and any judicial action taken.

Article 6(1)(c). Associated work cooperatives and pre-cooperatives. The Committee refers the Government to its comments under Article 3(1)(c) of Convention No. 81. It takes note of the information supplied by the Government to the effect that the data on labour inspection visits in cooperatives are being systematized by sector in 2012, including in the agricultural sector. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide information on inspection visits to associated work cooperatives and pre-cooperatives in the agricultural sector, the infringements detected (indicating the legal provisions breached) and the penalties imposed (fines, annulment of legal status).

Articles 9, 14, 15 and 16. Inadequacy of the structures, personnel and material and logistical resources of the labour inspection services for agriculture. In its previous comments the Committee urged the Government to take the necessary steps to strengthen the structures and means of action available to labour inspectors in charge of agricultural undertakings (availability of premises, human and material resources, training that takes account of needs specific to agriculture, etc.). The Committee refers in this context to its comments under Convention No. 81 regarding the progress made in the setting up of labour inspection services in some towns, and to the human and material resources of the labour inspection services. It also refers to an international cooperation project "Promoting Compliance with International Labour Standards in Colombia" aiming among other things to strengthen the inspection and monitoring system, and to an assessment which was being carried out in this context at the end of August 2012, of the structure, human resources, technology resources and the location of all territorial directorates and labour inspection directorates. The Committee requests the Government to send information on the results of the assessment of labour inspection in agriculture and its recommendations, and on any follow-up measures taken or envisaged. It also asks the Government to provide information on any other measures implemented for the purpose of extending and reinforcing the coverage of the labour inspection system, in particular in remote rural areas (sufficient number of inspectors, adequate training accessible and sufficiently equipped local offices and necessary transport facilities for the performance of labour inspection functions in agriculture).

Article 17. Participation of labour inspectors in preventive control in agricultural undertakings. The Committee reminds the Government that it has been raising this issue since 2002. The Committee urges the Government to ensure that measures are taken to give effect both in law and in practice to this provision of the Convention according to which the labour inspection services in agriculture shall be associated, in such cases and in such manner as may be determined by the competent authority, in the preventive control of new plant, new materials or substances and new methods of handling or processing products which appear likely to constitute a threat to health or safety. The Committee asks the Government to provide information in its next report on any such measures taken, together with copies of any relevant texts. The Committee refers the Government in this connection to the guidance provided in Paragraph 11 of Recommendation No. 133, which supplements the Convention, on the instances and conditions in which inspectors could be associated in preventive controls.

Articles 26 and 27. Annual report. The Committee refers to its comments under Articles 20 and 21 of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81). It hopes that the Government will be in a position to send, at the earliest possible date, an annual report on the work of the labour inspection services in agriculture, either separately or as part of its general annual report.

The Committee raises other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Comoros

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

According to the information sent by the Government, a special appropriation for labour inspection will not be introduced in the budget until after the meetings to prepare the budget for the 2009 financial year. The Committee nonetheless notes that the labour administration has embarked on a diagnosis of the labour inspection services with a view to determining their budget and its inclusions in the 2009 national budget. It asks the Government to provide information on the results of this evaluation as soon as they are available.

The Committee notes that the Government has submitted a request for the inclusion in the Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP), currently under preparation, of an application for technical assistance to gradually train enough labour inspectors to cover the entire territory. ILO support has also been sought to train two labour inspectors at the National School of Administration (ENA) of Madagascar. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of results of these steps. It trusts that it will take all necessary steps to obtain, particularly in the context of the future DWCP, support and assistance from the ILO for the development of an efficient labour inspection service.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Congo

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Absence of practical information to enable the Committee to assess the operation of the labour inspectorate in relation to the provisions of the Convention and relevant national laws. The Committee notes that the report provided by the Government on the manner in which the Convention is given effect in law to a large extent reproduces the report received in 2008.

The Committee notes the updated information regarding the number and geographical distribution by category of labour inspection staff. It notes, by comparison with the data given in the report received from the Government in 2008, a substantial reduction in labour inspection staff, in particular labour inspectors (from 75 to 55) and principal controllers (from 96 to 72). The Committee recalls that, according to Article 10, in order to secure the effective discharge of the duties of the labour inspectorate, the number of labour inspectors must be determined with due regard to the importance of the duties which inspectors have to perform, in particular the number, nature, size and situation of the workplaces liable to inspection; the number and classes of workers employed in such workplaces; the number and complexity of the legal provisions to be enforced; the material means placed at the disposal of the inspectors; and the practical conditions under which visits of inspection must be carried out.

While the laws and regulations concerning labour inspection and its mandate and prerogatives are available, it must be noted that there are no numerical data on other areas defined in Article 10 and, as the Government admits, there are no specific measures for giving effect to the provisions of Article 11 concerning the material conditions of work of labour inspectors, who do not have access to the transport facilities required for them to carry out their duties. The Committee notes, on the other hand, that according to the Government, inspectors' travel and related costs are reimbursed by the competent authority on presentation of invoices, which was not always the case, according to the report received in 2008.

With regard to the tools needed to assess the operation of the labour inspection system in practice, namely, the reports on inspection activities (Article 19) and the annual report of the central inspection authority, which under the terms of Articles 20 and 21 has to be published and transmitted to the ILO, the Committee notes with regret that none of the regional labour inspection activity reports referred to by the Government as having been transmitted to the Office since the date of ratification of this Convention has actually been received to date. Furthermore, the Government has not communicated a copy of Decree No. 2009-469 of 24 December 2009 concerning the organization of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security.

The Committee notes, however, that the Government is preparing a memorandum with a view to improving the functioning of the labour inspection service and that the Labour Code is currently being revised, in particular with regard to the powers and prerogatives of the labour inspectors.

The Committee also notes that the Government refers for the first time to a draft text on the status and conditions of service of labour inspectors (Article 6), which was supposedly drawn up in 2000 and submitted to the ministry responsible for the civil service. According to the Government, the final examination of that draft will depend on the revision now under way of the general civil service statutes. The Committee notes that this document has not been received by the Office, although according to the Government it was transmitted.

The Committee once again requests the Government to provide in its next report all the available information needed to assess the application of the Convention in law and in practice. This information should cover, among other matters: (i) the up-to-date geographical distribution of public officials responsible for labour inspection as defined in Article 3(1) of the Convention; (ii) the geographical distribution of workplaces liable to inspection or, at the least, those for which the Government considers that the conditions of work require specific protection from the labour inspection services; (iii) the frequency, content and number of participants at the training courses provided for labour inspectors during their career; (iv) the level of remuneration and conditions for career advancement in relation to other public officials with comparable responsibilities; (v) the proportion of the national budget allocated to the public labour inspection services; (vi) a description of the cases in which inspectors visit enterprises, the procedure followed and the transport facilities that they use for this purpose, the activities that they carry out and their outcome; and (vii) the proportion of supervisory activities carried out by inspectors in relation to their conciliation duties.

The Committee also requests the Government to communicate a copy of any inspection activity reports originating from regional directorates, including the reports cited in the Government's reports sent to the ILO in 2008 and 2011; a copy of the draft or final text of the regulations relating to the status and conditions of service of labour inspectors; copies of the proposed amendments to the Labour Code, and of the memorandum which was reportedly sent to the ILO and is intended to improve the functioning of the labour inspection service.

In order to establish a labour inspection system that will respond to the social and economic goals which are the object of the Convention, the Committee urges the Government to make every effort to adopt the measures needed to implement the measures described in the Committee's general observations made in 2007 (concerning the need for effective cooperation between the labour inspection service and the judicial system), in 2009 (concerning the need for statistics on industrial and commercial workplaces subject to labour inspection and the number of workers covered, and 2010 (concerning publication of the content of an annual report on the functioning of the labour inspection system). The Committee recalls once again the possibility of obtaining technical assistance from the ILO and of requesting, within the context of international financial cooperation, financial assistance in order to give the necessary impetus to the establishment and operation of the labour inspection system, and would be grateful for any information on progress made and difficulties encountered.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Costa Rica

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the observations from the Confederation of Workers Rerum Novarum (CTRN), dated 31 August 2011 and 30 August 2012, concerning the following issues: (i) the insufficient number of labour inspectors in relation to their increased workload; (ii) the allocation of a significant proportion of inspectors' hours of work to conciliation; (iii) the performance of administrative tasks by labour inspectors owing to the lack of clerical staff; (iv) the infrequent nature of inspections; and (v) the inadequacy of transport facilities, travel allowances and office equipment. The Committee also notes the Government's reply of 2 January 2012 to the earlier observations referred to above and its communication of 22 November 2012 indicating that consultations are being held with the competent authorities in order to prepare a reply to the later observations from the CTRN. Lastly, the Committee notes the observations from the Costa Rican Federation of Chambers and Associations of Private Enterprise (UCCAEP), which were sent by the Government on 12 April 2012.

Articles 3, 10, 11, 16 and 21(c) of the Convention. Provision of adequate human resources and material and logistical means to enable the labour inspectorate to discharge its duties effectively. The Committee previously asked the Government to provide information on the number of industrial and commercial workplaces liable to inspection, together with their geographical distribution; the number and category of workers employed therein; the number of vehicles available for labour inspectors or the transport facilities that they may use in the course of duty; and any other information relevant to evaluation by the competent authority of the needs of the labour inspectorate in terms of human resources, material means and transport facilities. The Government indicates that, since September 2011, the National Directorate for Labour Inspection has access to information on workers registered in the centralized payment collection system of the Costa Rican Social Security Fund, and this facilitates the planning of workplace inspections. It also states that a total of 19 vehicles are at the disposal of labour inspectors for the performance of their duties, distributed as follows: five for the central region; three for the Huétar Norte region; and two each for the regions of Chorotega, Brunca, Pacífico Central and Huétar Atlántica, with inspectors also making use of public transport for their duty travel.

The Committee notes with interest that an assessment of the needs of the labour inspectorate was carried out with ILO technical assistance in response to a request from the Government in April 2012. It notes that the recommendations made as part of this assessment include establishing a database or adapting any existing database to which the labour inspectorate has access so that it contains data relevant to the labour inspectorate, such as data on workplaces liable to inspection. The Committee reminds the Government that the registration of workplaces liable to inspection, and the identification of activities carried out there and of the categories of workers employed therein, are key elements in determining labour inspection needs and priorities for action with a view to improving coverage. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate to what extent it intends complying with the recommendations regarding this field contained in the assessment and to state what measures have been taken or are envisaged in this respect.

The Government also states that, with a view to maintaining the operational capacity of the labour inspectorate, which is one of the goals of the Plan of Action (June 2012–September 2013) for the strengthening of the labour inspectorate in the context of technical assistance from the ILO, and in view of the impending retirement of a large number of labour inspectors and the austerity policy being implemented by the Government, it plans to take the necessary steps with regard to the budgetary authorities to ensure that the inspector posts that become vacant are not frozen and are filled, so as to maintain a total of 100 inspectors in active service. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any changes in the number of labour inspection staff.

Articles 5(a), 19, 20 and 21. Periodic reports and cooperation necessary for the publication of an annual report on the work of the labour inspectorate. The Committee noted that the “Cumple y Gana” project was revived at the end of 2008, so as to continue the collaboration on reinforcement of the labour inspectorate of the various countries of Central America, and was due to be completed in September 2012. Noting that no information has been sent on this subject, the Committee again requests the Government to send information on the results of the “Cumple y Gana” project and on the pilot experiment conducted in the construction sector and its impact in terms of compliance with the labour regulations.

The Committee notes that, according to the information contained in the abovementioned assessment of the needs of the labour inspectorate, the labour information and case administration system (SILAC) has been providing nationwide coverage since 2012 and can be used as a statistical, information and monitoring tool with regard to the work of the labour inspectorate at national level. It also notes that the recommendations in this assessment include the updating of SILAC, incorporating the administrative register of the National Directorate for Labour Inspection, so that, in addition to acting as an electronic register of inspection files, it can also be used to produce labour statistics. The Committee expresses the hope that technical assistance from the ILO will facilitate the adoption by the Government of the necessary measures to enable local inspection offices to prepare periodic reports on the results of their work, as required by Article 19 of the Convention, and that these reports will enable the central inspection authority to prepare an annual report in accordance with Articles 20 and 21. It requests the Government to send information on any progress made in this respect. The Committee refers in this regard to the guidance contained in Part IV of Recommendation No. 81, regarding the form in which the information required by Article 21 of the Convention may be presented.

Article 12(1)(a) and (b). Free access of labour inspectors to workplaces. The Committee notes that no measures appear to be provided for under the Plan of Action for strengthening the labour inspectorate to comply with the Committee's frequently repeated requests regarding the bringing of the national legislation into conformity with the Convention, so that labour inspectors are authorized to enter at night all workplaces liable to inspection, regardless of the working hours of those workplaces. The Committee therefore again requests the Government to ensure that measures are taken to bring the legislation into conformity with the relevant provisions of the Convention, to supply information on any progress made in this regard and to send copies of any relevant legal texts, once they have been adopted.

Articles 12(2) and 15(c). Notification of the inspector's presence when carrying out an inspection and the principle of confidentiality. In reply to the request which has been repeated since 2004 to take the necessary steps to grant labour inspectors the right to refrain from notifying their presence to the employer or his or her representative at the beginning of the inspection, when they consider that such notification may be prejudicial to the performance of their duties, the Government indicates that labour inspectors are governed by the provisions of Conventions Nos 81 and 129. The Committee urges the Government to take measures to ensure that the legislation authorizes labour inspectors to refrain from notifying their presence to the employer or his or her representative during an inspection, when they consider that such notification may be prejudicial to the performance of their duties. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this respect and to send copies of any relevant legislative texts.

With regard also to the need to take the necessary measures to amend the handbook of labour inspection procedures to incorporate the obligation of confidentiality with regard to complaints as provided for in Article 15(c) of the Convention, the Committee notes the Government's reference to plans to amend the handbook in 2012 and its hope that it will therefore be in a position to report in the near future that progress has been made in this respect. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on this matter in its next report.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee refers the Government to its observation under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), in so far as they are also concerned with the application of the present Convention.

The Committee notes the comments of 31 August 2011 from the Confederation of Workers Rerum Novarum (CTRN) and the Government's reply of 2 January 2012. It also takes note of new comments submitted by the CTRN dated 30 August 2012, and notes that the matters they raise are the same as those in the comments of 31 August 2012, which the Committee addressed in its previous observation. The Committee asks the Government to make any comments it deems appropriate in relation to the observations made by the CTRN.

The Committee raises other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Cuba

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1954)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the observations on the application of the Convention made by the Coalition of Independent Trade Unions of Cuba (CSIC) in a communication dated 30 August 2012. It also notes the Government's reply of 1 November 2012 to these observations.

The CSIC alleges that the labour inspectorate is more a mechanism of social control, intimidation and pressure than a mechanism for the protection of workers, and describes the lack of independence of the labour inspectorate vis-à-vis political pressure from the Communist Party, the Government and the Workers' Union of Cuba (CTC). The CSIC considers that where the State is the sole employer it becomes impossible to apply the principle of independence laid down in Article 15(a) of the Convention and that, further to the recent possibility of working on a self-employed basis, labour inspectors have become the enemies of self-employed workers with a system of disproportionate fines which frequently gives rise to abuses that threaten the existence and further development of self-employment. The Government disputes the allegations made by the CSIC. The Government states that the CSIC is not a trade union organization and is not made up of Cuban workers. The Government also states that it fulfils its obligations strictly and that tripartite consultations are held before it sends its information. The Government declares that the labour inspectorate is not a mechanism for pressurizing or intimidating workers but, in accordance with section 296 of the Labour Code, it enforces the applicable legislation relating to labour, social security and occupational safety and health. The Government adds that self-employed workers are not liable to inspection by this mechanism; it is a responsibility discharged by local government structures so that the provisions relating to aspects such as health, working conditions and transport in the branch of work concerned are observed. It points out that following long discussions involving the participation of Cuban citizens with diverse ideologies and religious beliefs from various sectors, a comprehensive process for the updating of the economic model of the country has been approved and this process recognizes and promotes, in addition to socialist state enterprises, other non-state modes of operation. The Government considers that it would therefore be contradictory, to say the least, to claim that the existence and development of the latter are under threat.

Articles 12 and 15(c). Restriction of the principle of inspectors' freedom of access to workplaces liable to inspection and the principle of confidentiality. For a number of years the Committee has noted that sections 11 and 12 of the Regulations of 2007 on the national labour inspection system establish the requirement for inspectors, at the beginning of each inspection visit, to present to the employer a copy of a written inspection order indicating, among other things, the purpose of the inspection, and has asked the Government to adopt measures to ensure that the national legislation is brought into conformity with Article 12(1), in conjunction with Article 15(c) of the Convention. The Government reiterates that confidentiality with regard to complaints and their sources is maintained in practice and that no prior notification or order is presented to the employer in the case of surprise inspections resulting from a complaint or any other cause. However, the Committee points out that sections 12 and 13 of the abovementioned Regulations, which require inspectors, at the beginning of each inspection visit, to present the employer with a copy of a written inspection order indicating the purpose of the inspection (section 11), are contrary to the provisions of the Convention in this regard, namely Article 12(1)(a), which stipulates that labour inspectors must be empowered to enter freely any workplace liable to inspection, and Article 15(c), which establishes the principle of confidentiality with regard to complaints and their sources. The Committee further recalls that, according to Article 12(2), labour inspectors should be authorized to refrain from notifying the employer of their presence during an inspection visit if they consider that such notification may be prejudicial to the performance of their duties. The Committee therefore again requests the Government to ensure that measures are taken without delay to amend the legislation in such a way that it gives full effect to the Convention in this regard, and to send a copy of any legislative text adopted towards this end.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1968)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 4, 5, 7, 10, 11, 20 and 21 of the Convention. Administrative decentralization and labour inspection. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report that labour inspection is a function that is considered to be an integral part of the national public service. The Government adds that it has prepared a draft Decree containing general provisions governing officials and managerial staff in the General Labour Inspectorate, and that this draft text has been submitted to the Prime Minister for signature. It adds that it undertakes to make the labour inspectorate a General Directorate and, at the 100th Session of the International Labour Conference, it referred to the reform of the General Labour Inspectorate into a specialized service enjoying administrative and financial autonomy to increase its effectiveness.

While noting these developments, the Committee also observes that the Government has not provided any documents enabling the Committee to assess the manner in which effect is given to the provisions of the Convention throughout the country. In particular, no report on the work of the inspection services has been received. With reference to previous comments, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the risk of the weakening of the labour inspection system following the decentralization of the respective functions and responsibilities, if this decentralization is not accompanied by the effective transfer of the necessary resources for the functioning of the decentralized labour inspection services, to guarantee the protection of the workers covered by the Conventions throughout the national territory. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide a copy of the Decree issuing general provisions governing officials and managerial staff in the General Labour Inspectorate as soon as it has been adopted, and to provide detailed information on the announced reform of the General Labour Inspectorate and the organizational plan of the labour inspection system at both the national and provincial levels. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide copies of any texts or documents, including any report on the activities of the labour inspection, which would enable the Committee to assess the manner in which effect is given to the provisions of the Convention in practice.

Articles 3(2), 6 and 15(a). Integrity, independence and impartiality of labour inspectors. In reply to the Committee's previous comments concerning the allegations of corruption of labour inspectors exercising parallel activities made by the Confederation of Trade Unions of Congo (CSC), the Government indicates that, in accordance with Act No.81-003 of 17 July 1981, labour inspectors cannot perform a second job. The Committee also notes that with a view to improving their status and conditions of service, a permanent bonus has been awarded for special duties to labour inspectors and controllers. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide clarifications on the status and conditions of service of labour inspectors at both the central and provincial levels and to transmit copies of the relevant legal texts. Please also indicate the percentage increase in the permanent monthly bonuses provided to labour inspectors and whether this increase covers the staff of the labour inspection in all the provinces of the country. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the disciplinary procedures and sanctions applicable in the event of violations of Act No. 81-003 of 17 July 1981 on the prohibition of the exercise of a parallel activity by labour inspectors.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150) (ratification: 1987)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Re-establishment of the exercise of the right to organize. The Committee notes that the work of the National Labour Council in 2004 gave rise to the adoption, among other regulatory texts on workers' right of representation, of Ministerial Order No. 12/CAB/MIN/TPS/VTB/053/2004 of 12 October 2004 lifting the suspension of trade union elections in enterprises and establishments of all types. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide information on the impact of this Order on industrial relations.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Djibouti

Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63) (ratification: 1978)

Failure to fulfil reporting obligations. Technical assistance to help member States fulfil their reporting obligations and comply with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not submitted information since October 2005. It hopes that a report will be provided for examination at its next session and that it will contain information on the establishment of an observatory on employment and training. The Committee invites the Government to submit a report containing full and detailed information on the measures taken to give effect to the Convention by replying to the questions in the report form under each of its provisions. The Committee draws the Government's attention to the possibility of seeking technical assistance from the specialized units in the Office to fill the gaps in the implementation of the Convention.

[The Government is invited to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

In its previous comments, the Committee referred to comments made by the General Union of Djibouti Workers (UGTD) in 2007 calling for an urgent review of the labour inspection system and the strengthening of its resources. In the absence of any recent statistics on the working of the labour inspectorate, the Committee also asked the Government to report in as much detail as possible on the following matters: (i) the supervision of working conditions and the protection of workers in enterprises in export processing zones excluded from the scope of the new Labour Code by section 1 of the Code; (ii) the impact of the conciliation work carried out by labour inspectors on the volume and quality of their inspection duties (Article 3(2) of the Convention); (iii) human resources and means of action of the labour inspectorate in relation to the requirement of Article 16 that workplaces shall be visited as often and as thoroughly as necessary; and (iv) the need to give effect to Articles 20 and 21 concerning the requirement that the central inspection authority shall publish and communicate to the ILO an annual general report on the work of the inspection services.

On the basis of the information sent by the Government, the Committee wishes to draw attention to the following points.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Supervision of working conditions and protection of workers in industrial and commercial establishments in export processing zones. The Committee noted in its previous comments that, under section 1 of the Labour Code, the Code applies throughout the national territory except in export processing zones (EPZs) which are governed by special legislation. According to the Government, not only are the EPZs beyond the competence of the labour inspectorate but the legislation applying to them, which has prompted objections in the country, grants excessive privileges to employers at the expense of the workers. The Government explains that supervision of the enterprises allowed to operate in EPZs is the responsibility of the ports and EPZs authorities, which also issue visas for foreign workers and deal with any disputes regarding the election of staff delegates in the zones. The Committee notes, however, that pursuant to section 31 of the EPZ Code issued by Act No. 53/AN/04 of 17 May 2004, "the Djibouti Labour Code governs labour relations in the export processing zones", and that the legislation on EPZs available at the ILO contains no provisions on this subject. The Government is asked to indicate whether section 31 of the EPZ Code has been repealed and if so, to provide the relevant text, and in any event to provide copies of the texts governing the working conditions and protection of the workers occupied in establishments in the EPZs together with the legal provisions respecting their enforcement.

Articles 3(1)(a) and (b), and 17. Need to ensure a balance between the enforcement and advisory functions of labour inspection. According to the Government, the work of inspection services pertaining to labour legislation focuses largely on persuasion and information. The Committee nonetheless notes that the national legislation contains, as the Convention requires, a whole set of legal provisions that also enable inspectors to prosecute those who are in breach of the law on working conditions. In paragraph 279 of its General Survey of 2006 on labour inspection, the Committee pointed out in this connection that although advice and information can only encourage compliance with legal provisions, it should nonetheless be accompanied by an enforcement mechanism enabling those guilty of violations reported by labour inspectors to be prosecuted. In keeping with its assertion that no labour legislation, however developed it may be, can exist for long without an effective labour inspection system, the Government should ensure that the inspection system is able to make use of all means of action available to it under the law to attain its objectives. A balance between the advisory and enforcement roles of the inspection services would, without doubt, contribute to reducing the number and scale of labour disputes. The Committee accordingly asks the Government to take the appropriate steps to ensure that, where necessary, inspectors exercise in practice the authority conferred by Article 17 of the Convention, to which section 196 of the Labour Code gives effect, themselves to initiate legal action before the competent jurisdiction against those who breach labour laws and regulations, on the basis of the provisions of Title IX of the Code which defines offences and establishes the penalties applying to them.

Article 3(2). Accumulation of tasks assigned to labour inspectors and its impact on the volume and quality of their inspection duties. In its observations of 2007, the UGTD expressed the view that in future the duties of the inspectorate should encompass conciliation and prevention. The Committee drew the Government's attention in this connection to Article 3(2), which places restrictions on the additional duties that may be required of labour inspectors, and asked the Government to send the Office information on the manner in which observance of this provision is ensured. The Government acknowledges that workplace inspection has its shortcomings. Furthermore, the data the Government provided on the work of the inspectorate in the area of occupational safety and health are slight in comparison with those pertaining to the settlement of individual and collective labour disputes. The Government nonetheless hopes that in future, the labour inspection service will be able to conduct three visits a week. The Committee notes this information with concern, observing that it bears out the UGTD's assertion that the labour inspection system needs to be reviewed and strengthened so that it can perform its duties fully. It furthermore regrets that it has not been informed of the number of workplaces subject to inspection and is therefore unable to assess the extent to which the needs for inspection are covered. Observing that the time and energy that labour inspectors spend in attempting to settle collective labour disputes interfere with the performance of their primary duties, the Committee suggests, in paragraph 74 of its General

Survey mentioned above, that conciliation or mediation in collective labour disputes be entrusted to a specialized body or officials. It notes in this connection that section 181 of the new Labour Code in fact provides for the establishment of an arbitration council to hear collective labour disputes that conciliation has failed to settle. It notes, however, that the Council will hear the dispute only after the labour inspector or labour director has attempted conciliation and referred the matter to it within eight full days (section 180 of the Code). The Committee reminds the Government of the specific warning in Paragraph 8 of Recommendation No. 81 that “the functions of labour inspectors should not include that of acting as conciliator or arbitrator in proceedings concerning labour disputes” and it urges the Government to envisage taking steps to relieve inspectors of their role as preliminary conciliators in labour disputes. It would be grateful if the Government would also take measures to ensure, as required by Article 16 of the Convention, that the strength of the inspectorate is sufficient to cover the workplaces liable to inspection and send the Office information with as much supporting documentation as possible on all progress made in this matter and on any difficulties encountered.

Articles 10, 11 and 16. Reinforcement of the labour inspection system. The Committee notes that in order to reinforce the labour inspection system, the Government plans to create four new sections of the inspectorate, two in the capital and two in the interior of the country, and to take advantage of technical support from the ILO Subregional Office in Addis Ababa to organize a training course for labour controllers and the single labour inspector at the ILO International Training Centre in Turin. It also notes that the Government is examining possibilities for cooperation between the labour inspectorate and the competent medical and technical institutions, and that a tripartite workshop on Convention No. 81 was to be organized by the ILO subregional office in 2008. The Committee hopes that the Government will not fail to keep the ILO informed of any developments relative to any of these matters.

Further to its previous comments, the Committee once again asks the Government to provide the most recent data available on the number and geographical distribution of the workplaces liable to inspection (including mines and quarries), the number of workers employed therein and the transport facilities available to the labour inspector and labour controllers for duty travel.

Such information is essential to the central inspection authority in evaluating the human and material resources needed in order to attain the objectives of labour inspection and hence to estimating the funding of the inspectorate in the national budget.

Articles 20 and 21. Publication, communication and content of the annual inspection report. While taking note of the table of statistics attached to the Government’s report on the work of the inspection services, the Committee observes that it covers a period of five years and that, in terms of activities and results, it is not sufficiently specific or relevant to be of use in evaluating the operation and efficiency of the labour inspection system. The Committee is therefore once again bound to ask the Government to take the necessary measures for the publication of an annual inspection report, as provided in section 192 of the Labour Code, within the time limits prescribed in Article 20 and containing the information required by Article 21. Emphasizing that such a report is an essential tool in evaluating the efficiency of the inspection system and in identifying the resources required for its improvement, in particular through appropriate budgetary estimates, the Committee requests the Government to pay due attention to the indications in Part IV of the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), as to the level of detail that would be appropriate in the information required by clauses (a) to (g) of Article 21 of the Convention. It recalls that it may request ILO technical assistance for this purpose.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Ecuador

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1975)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee takes note of the brief reports sent by the Government, received on 8 September 2009 and 19 October 2010, and the information on occupational safety and health inspection activities. It also notes the reports produced in the context of bilateral cooperation with the Ministry of Labour and Immigration of Spain on the one hand, and on the other, the Ministry of Labour of Argentina in November 2008 on the operation of the labour inspection system in the country, which contain recommendations for improvement.

Article 3(1)(b) of the Convention. Educational activities conducted by the labour inspectorate. The Committee notes the various training courses on rights at work and on safety and health run for workers, employers, representatives of trade unions and chambers of commerce and technical specialists, which involved visits to plantations and workplaces, and the compilation of a handbook of all existing labour standards subject to supervision by the labour inspectorate. Furthermore, it notes the “SIUDEL” website (www.derechosdeltrabajo.net) provided by the Government which contains a lot of information on labour law, illustrated to make it readily accessible to persons with limited reading ability or poor sight.

Evaluation of the labour inspection system. The Committee notes that the Government provides no information replying to the matters raised in the previous comments concerning the need to supplement the labour legislation in order to strengthen the labour inspection system, and the action taken on the recommendations of the ILO/FORSAT multilateral technical cooperation project, and the Pilot Inspection Plan for Guayaquil produced in the context of this project, which ended in April 2007. The Government merely indicates that action will be taken on the recommendations made in the context of the abovementioned bilateral technical cooperation and on the Committee of Experts’ observations, in the course of the process to reform the labour inspection system now under way.

The Committee observes that the recent diagnosis of the situation and the resulting recommendations largely reflect the findings of the report evaluating the ILO/FORSAT multilateral technical cooperation project of 2005 as concerns the situation of labour inspection in Quito, Guayaquil and Cuenca, namely: the absence of a national labour authority; insufficient human resources and material means; the absence of a body of rules governing the structure, organization, duties and functions of the labour inspection system, the status, powers and obligations of inspectors, and the absence of legal provisions defining offences against the legislation on working conditions and the protection of workers and setting penalties therefor; the absence of any planning and scheduling of inspection visits, and inadequate oversight of occupational safety and health obligations. Attention was also drawn to shortcomings such as the lack of a central labour inspection authority, the disparities between regional and provincial bodies, the absence of any regional safety and health bodies other than the Regional Directorate in Quito, a lack of cooperation between the inspectors of the Ecuadorian Social Security Institute (IESS) and labour inspectors, and overlap in the duties performed by the various categories of inspectors (inspector-controllers, IESS inspectors, inspectors responsible for supervising various projects, labour inspectors, child labour inspectors, only the last two of these categories having public servant status).

The Committee observes that the improvement – noted in its previous comments – in the system of labour registers resulting from the ILO/FORSAT multilateral technical cooperation project enabled the Government of Argentina to make a recommendation for the establishment of an integrated national system for labour statistics to include the various administrative registers, and for reactivation of the Special Committee on Labour Statistics.

To remedy the disadvantages of having several categories of labour inspectors of varying status and of creating a single category of general “integrales” inspectors, the Government states that pursuant to mandato constituyente No. 008, there is to be an integrated labour inspectorate and the administrative, operational and financial organization of the Ministry of Labour and Employment is to be strengthened.

Further to its observation of 2008, the Committee asks the Government once again to take measures to bring the legislation into line with the Convention as regards: determining the workplaces covered (Articles 2 and 23); the functions and organization of the system (Articles 3, 4, 5 and 9); the status and conditions of service of inspection staff (Article 6), its training (Article 7), eligibility of both sexes (Article 8), prerogatives and powers (Articles 12, 13 and 17), ethical (Article 15) and functional (Articles 16 and 19) obligations; the publication of an annual inspection report (Articles 20 and 21). The Government is also asked to supplement the legislation with provisions defining offences enforceable by labour inspectors and setting penalties therefor. Please also send information on any progress made and copies of any texts adopted for the abovementioned purposes.

The Government is again asked to provide the information that is now available thanks to the system for recording labour data such as the number, activities and geographical distribution of the industrial and commercial establishments that are under the supervision of the labour inspectorate; the number and categories of workers employed therein (men, women, young workers in particular) and any other information necessary for an evaluation by the competent authority of the labour inspectorate’s needs in human resources, material means and transport facilities, and to determining priorities for action in the light of Ecuador’s economic circumstances.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

El Salvador

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1995)

Articles 6, 7, 12(1)(a), (b) and (c)(i) and (2), and Article 17(2) of the Convention. Status and conditions of service of labour inspectors: scope of inspectors’ right to enter workplaces and their authority to investigate; freedom of inspectors to decide to issue warnings or advice instead of instituting or recommending proceedings. The Committee notes with interest the information sent by the Government to the effect that measures have been taken to promote the scheduling of night visits by inspectors, and the attached standard reports for night inspections. It also notes that according to the Government the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, with technical and financial support from the ILO in the context of the project “Verification of the implementation of the White Paper recommendations”, is pursuing its work to amend the Act on the organization and functions of the labour and social security sector (LOFT) so as to bring the law into line with the provisions of the Convention. The Government states that the draft amendments are currently under examination by the Higher Labour Council, which is tripartite. The Committee refers to its previous comments on the need to: (i) provide a basis in law for the right of labour inspectors to enter freely at any hour of the day or night any workplace liable to inspection (Article 12(1)(a)), and to enter by day any premises which they may have reasonable cause to believe to be liable to inspection (Article 12(1)(b)); (ii) to abolish the requirement for the employer, the workers or their representatives to be present during the inspection; and (iii) to authorize labour inspectors not to notify the employer or his representative of their presence if they consider this preferable in the interests of effective supervision. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the draft amendment of the LOFT reflecting the points raised is adopted shortly, and to send a copy of it to the Office.

Further to its previous comments, the Committee also asks the Government to keep the Office informed of any progress made in the revision of the LOFT regarding the following: (i) recognizing labour inspectors as public officials and assuring them of stability of employment and career prospects (category I inspectors, category II inspectors, supervisors) (Article 6); (ii) recruiting inspectors by competition (Article 7); (iii) discretion of labour inspectors to give offenders warning or advice before envisaging proceedings (Article 17(2)).

Article 14. Notification of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease to the labour inspectorate. In its previous comments the Committee referred to the need for the labour inspectorate to be informed of industrial accidents and instances of occupational disease with a view to preventing occupational risks. The Committee notes that according to section 8 of the Act on the general prevention of risks at work (LPRT), the programme on management of the prevention of occupational risks in enterprises must provide for an up-to-date record of accidents and other dangerous incidents. It also notes that according to LPRT section 66, injuries caused by occupational accidents must be notified in writing to the General Directorate of Social Welfare within 72 hours and all fatal accidents must be notified immediately to the same Directorate. Furthermore, the Government indicates that in order to give effect to the provision of section 66 and facilitate their application by employers, the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare has set up a National System for the Notification of Occupational Accidents (SNNAT). The Committee refers to paragraph 118 of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, and points out that it is vital that formal mechanisms be put in place to provide the labour inspection service with the data it needs to identify high-risk activities and the most vulnerable categories of workers and to carry out research into the causes of occupational accidents and diseases in establishments and enterprises liable to inspection. The Committee therefore urges the Government to ensure that measures are taken to define the instances of occupational accidents and diseases to be notified to the labour inspectorate and the procedure for doing so. The Government is asked to provide copies of any texts adopted in this connection.

Articles 19, 20 and 21. Publication and communication to the ILO of an annual inspection report. The Committee notes that significant progress has been made with the electronic case management system (SEMC). It notes with interest that the system has been installed in the 14 departmental offices, that an electronic register of cases is now operational, that the inspection visit procedures, the standard report forms and the method for treating cases have been revised and standardized and that reports and charts have been drawn up. The Government also indicates that with technical and financial support from the ILO it is working on a yearbook of labour statistics which should contain information on all the Ministry's activities, including labour inspection. The Committee hopes that the measures taken to improve the SEMC will help the local inspection offices in the preparation of the periodical reports on the results of their activities required by Article 19, and that such reports will be used by the central inspection authority as a basis for the annual report to be published and transmitted to the ILO in accordance with the provisions of Articles 20 and 21. The Committee reminds the Government in this connection of the guidance to be found in Part IV of Recommendation No. 81 as to how the information required by Article 21 might be presented.

The Committee raises other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 1995)

The Committee refers the Government to its comments under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), in so far as they are also concerned with the application of the present Convention.

Articles 9(3), 11, 14 and 15 of the Convention. Reinforcement of material facilities available to labour inspectors in agriculture, specific training of labour inspectors working in agriculture and collaboration between the inspection services in agriculture and other institutions. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest that, according to information communicated by the Government, over the past years the number of vehicles available to the labour inspection services working in agriculture has significantly increased, rising from eight vehicles in 2008 to 38 in 2012 (three of which have both front-wheel and rear-wheel drive). The Committee nevertheless notes that most of the vehicles (27) are assigned to the San Salvador office, while two other offices have three vehicles, five have one vehicle and six others have none. The Committee understands that, in the departments of Sonsonate and Ahuachapán, for example, which have one vehicle and no vehicles respectively, agriculture is the main activity. It would therefore be grateful if the Government would provide an explanation of the criteria taken into account for the distribution of vehicles among the various inspection services.

The Committee requested the Government to provide detailed information on the frequency, content and duration of the specific training courses organized for labour inspectors working in the agricultural sector, and on the number of inspectors who took part. It notes that this information is not reflected in the tables on training given to labour inspectors from 2009 to 2012 which feature in the Government's report. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to give labour inspectors in agriculture adequate training for the performance of their duties which takes particular account of the particularities inherent in the different worker categories, the type of work carried out and the specific risks to which the workers in agriculture and their families are exposed.

The Committee requested the Government to take measures to ensure that labour inspectors working in the agricultural sector may rely on the collaboration of duly qualified technical experts (doctors, chemists, security engineers) to solve problems requiring technical knowledge beyond the scope of their competence and to keep the ILO informed. The Government indicates that, when the need arises, labour inspectors working in agriculture have access to technical support from the General Directorate of Social Security. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would specify the ways in which these technicians collaborate with the labour inspection services in agriculture, including with those in departmental or regional offices.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 2005)

Article 3(1)(b) of the Convention. Preventive activities of the labour inspectorate. The Committee notes with interest the information contained in the Annual Labour Inspection Reports for 2009–11, available on the labour inspectorate's website, on the numerous information and training activities carried out by the labour inspectorate. These include the holding of information days at 26 high schools throughout the country and comprehensive training activities for 623 work environment specialists and managers of small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) in 2011, campaigns on different subjects, such as stress at work and working and rest time, and an electronic newsletter which is open to subscriptions with articles by the labour inspectorate published every two months. The Committee also notes with interest the comprehensive information in Estonian, Russian and English on the website of the labour inspectorate, including the texts of relevant laws in their current versions and a database of best practices on the work environment. It also observed that the majority of infringements detected during inspection visits in 2011 in the area of occupational safety and health (OSH) concerned the lack of safety instructions on work and work equipment or the lack of, or insufficient risk assessment by employers, and that an analysis of accidents at work shows that the majority of work accidents involve workers who have worked for less than a year which is assumed to be a result of insufficient instruction and training. In this context, the Committee particularly notes the launching of a prevention campaign on the reduction of work-related health risks (personal protective equipment) in 2011, as well as the publication of the following: “Personal protective equipment: A tedious obligation or happy future?”; “Slips and trips: How to prevent work accidents”; and “Training and instruction of workers at workplaces”. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the preventive measures carried out by the labour inspectorate. In particular, please provide information on measures taken to address areas where shortcomings have been detected previously or which have been identified as the cause of cases of occupational diseases or industrial accidents (awareness raising among employers about the importance of providing adequate safety instructions to workers, information and instructions about the conducting of adequate risk assessments, etc.).

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Ghana

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 12(1)(a) of the Convention. Right of labour inspectors to enter freely workplaces liable to inspection. In its previous comments, the Committee pointed out that section 124(1)(a) of the 2003 Labour Act, which limits the timing of workplace inspections to “working hours”, is not compatible with Article 12(1)(a) of the Convention. It notes the Government’s indication that the above provision of the Labour Act is sufficient to uncover clandestine moves by employers. Referring to its General Survey of 2006 on labour inspection (paragraphs 268–271), the Committee wishes to recall that the conditions for the exercise of the right of free entry to workplaces laid down by the Convention are intended to allow inspectors to carry out inspections, where necessary and possible, to enforce the application of legal provisions relating to conditions of work. The protection of workers and the technical requirements of inspection should be the primordial criteria for determining the appropriate timing of visits, for example to check for violations such as abusive night work conditions in a workplace officially operating during the daytime, or to carry out technical inspections requiring machinery or production processes to be stopped. It should be for the inspector to decide whether a visit is reasonable and inspections should only be carried out at night or outside working hours where this is warranted. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to remove the restriction on the right of labour inspectors to enter freely workplaces from section 124(1)(a) of the Labour Act of 2003 and to keep the ILO informed.

Article 3(1) and Articles 17 and 18. Inspection duties. Enforcement of legal provisions relating to the conditions of work and the protection of workers. Legal proceedings and provision of adequate penalties for violation of legislation. In its previous report, the Government indicated that it wishes to encourage compliance with legal provisions through the promotion of a social partnership attentive to the mutual interests of employers and workers, rather than through legal proceedings against employers who have committed a violation. The Committee requested the Government to provide practical information on any mechanisms established to that effect and to specify the role of labour inspectors in this regard. It notes that, in its report of 2008, the Government only reaffirms that it wishes to promote partnership and compromise between employers and workers. The report provides no information on the findings of the labour inspectors during the visits that they conducted in workplaces throughout the country in 2007, nor on any actions undertaken following such inspections. The Committee would like to draw the Government’s attention to paragraph 280 of its General Survey, in which it emphasizes that, even if the credibility of any inspectorate depends to a large extent on its ability to advise employers and workers on the most effective means of complying with the legal provisions within its remit, it also depends on the existence and implementation of a sufficiently dissuasive enforcement mechanism, the functions of enforcement and advice being inseparable in practice.

The Committee requests the Government to take appropriate measures to ensure that legal provisions relating to the conditions of work and the protection of workers are effectively enforced through legal proceedings where necessary. It further requests the Government to provide information on the violations reported by labour inspectors and the fines imposed to employers in accordance with section 38 of the Labour Regulations adopted in 2007, during the reporting period, and to specify the value of a “penalty unit” and the manner in which such value may be revised to remain dissuasive in the event of monetary inflation. The Government is also requested to indicate the measures taken to ensure that such penalties were effectively enforced.

Articles 19, 20 and 21. Periodical reports and annual report on the work of the labour inspection services. While noting the information on the number of inspections carried out in 2007 and during the first quarter of 2008, the Committee emphasizes that, by virtue of the ratification of the Convention, the Government undertook to ensure that practical measures would be taken to centralize information required under Article 21, with a view to preparing an annual labour inspection report, the main purpose of which is to serve as a basis for the periodical assessment by the central inspection authority of the adequacy of the available resources in relation to needs and, consequently, to determine priority areas of action. The Committee requests the Government take measures rapidly to establish the conditions in which the central labour inspection authority can collect data on the activities of the services under its control with a view to publish an annual report on the work of the inspection system containing information on the following subjects:

- (a) relevant laws and regulations;
- (b) staff of the labour inspection services (including the number, geographical location and distribution of inspectors by gender and by category);

- (c) statistics of workplaces liable to inspection (number and geographical distribution) and the number of workers employed therein (men, women, young persons);
- (d) statistics of inspection visits (unannounced, scheduled and follow-up visits, visits following a complaint, etc.);
- (e) statistics of violations and penalties imposed (number of violations reported, legal provisions concerned, types of sanctions imposed, etc.);
- (f) statistics of industrial accidents (number of fatal and non-fatal accidents); and
- (g) statistics of cases of occupational disease (number and causes by industry and occupation).

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Greece

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1955)

The Committee takes note of the Government's reports dated 31 August and 22 October 2012, the first of which also contains the Government's reply to the comments made under article 23 of the ILO Constitution by the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE) in a communication dated 28 July 2011.

Articles 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 10 and 11 of the Convention. ILO technical assistance for the reinforcement of the labour inspection system. In its previous comments, the Committee notes the findings of the ILO high-level mission which visited the country in September 2011, and emphasized the crucial role of the labour inspection function in times of crisis in ensuring that workers' rights are respected, so that the crisis does not serve as a pretext for lowering labour standards. The Committee noted with interest that following its previous comments, the Government availed itself of ILO technical assistance in the area of labour inspection and that, in this framework, two technical missions visited the country in September and October 2012, so as to carry out a needs assessment of the Greek Labour Inspectorate (SEPE). The objective of strengthening the labour inspection system was part of the first Memorandum of Understanding between the Greek Government and the "Troika" (International Monetary Fund (IMF), European Commission (EC), European Central Bank (ECB)) concluded in May 2010 and incorporated in Act No. 3845/2010. Moreover, as indicated in the Government's report, the carrying out of an independent assessment of the SEPE was one of the commitments in the second Memorandum of Understanding of February 2012 which was enacted into law by Act No. 4042/2012.

In this context, the Committee notes with interest that the ILO missions which visited Greece benefited from the collaboration of the EC Task Force for Greece. It also notes with interest that, as observed by the two missions that visited the country and indicated by the Government in its report under the Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150), an IT project has been launched in order to electronically link all SEPE offices, and a database linking the SEPE with the Manpower Employment Organization (OAED) and the Social Insurance Institute (IKA) has been set up in the framework of collaboration with the European Union (EU), in order to simplify administrative procedures and enhance the effectiveness of the SEPE's actions.

The Committee also notes, however, that in its report under Convention No. 150, the Government refers to drastic budgetary adjustments in the SEPE which have resulted in a sweeping reduction of the material means and incentives previously available for conducting of inspections, especially in the regions. With reference to the findings of the ILO high-level mission of September 2011, the Committee once again draws attention to the need to strengthen the governance of the labour inspection system, build capacities and ensure sufficient resources and means of action if the labour inspection system is to achieve the economic and social goals assigned to this public function. The Committee requests the Government to keep the ILO informed of the measures taken on the basis of the findings and recommendations of the ILO needs assessment, once available, and their impact on strengthening the labour inspection system and its coordination, ensuring sufficient human and material resources and realizing the primary objective of the Convention according to Article 3(1), which is the enforcement of legal provisions concerning the conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work.

Articles 3, 5(a), 17 and 18. Functions entrusted to the labour inspectorate, cooperation with other bodies and enforcement of sufficiently dissuasive sanctions. Control of undeclared work. The Committee notes that in its comments of July 2011, the GSEE referred to a staggering increase in non-standard forms of work (part-time and reduced time rotation work contracts), widespread precariousness in the labour market, and a considerable volume of unregistered work as a result of the dismantling of the industrial relations framework and employment protection legislation. As indicated by the GSEE, in a context of steadily increasing unemployment, these trends rendered jobseekers all the more vulnerable. According to the GSEE, in 2011, after the first year of the implementation of the programme associated with the international loan mechanism for the Greek economy, labour relations in Greece had qualitatively and quantitatively regressed by two decades, a fact which increased fears that the situation was out of control with harmful consequences to workers, especially women and youth, that might well be irreversible.

The Committee recalls that the high-level mission of September 2011 emphasized among other things that the high incidence of undeclared work – which was indeed alarming – raised questions as to the governance of the entire labour market and clearly needed to be addressed by the labour inspection system, with priority placed on wage payment and non-discrimination. The Committee also recalls from its previous comments that in this context, Act No. 3996/2011 (in combination with Act No. 3655/2010) entrusted the SEPE with additional functions, some of which had been previously carried out by social security inspectors, such as the control of undeclared work, as well as the control of the legality of the employment of foreign workers originating in EU and non-EU countries (third countries).

In its report the Government indicates that since the beginning of 2010, regular inspections have been conducted by joint teams of the SEPE and the Special Insurance Inspection Service of the IKA to control undeclared work. During 2011 (after the adoption of Act No. 3899/2010), these joint teams conducted 20,246 inspections in companies that account for 2.5 per cent of the total number of businesses in the country. The number of workers in the companies checked was 66,615 and the number of undeclared workers found was 19,968. The Government also provides some aggregate data on the inspection activities of the SEPE for the year 2011, according to which 31,515 inspections had been conducted by the Industrial (labour) Relations Service and 3,738 fines had been imposed amounting to a total of €10,937,418. Another 28,150 inspection visits had been carried out by the occupational health and safety service, and 590 fines had been imposed amounting to €1,704,111. The Committee understands from these data that a large proportion of the activities of the SEPE, notably its Industrial Relations Service, focused on the control of undeclared work. With reference to paragraph 77 of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, the Committee notes that the Convention does not contain any provision suggesting that any worker be excluded from the protection afforded by labour inspection on account of their irregular employment status and that the primary duty of labour inspectors is to ensure the enforcement of legal provisions relating to conditions of work (e.g. wages, hours of work, occupational safety and health) and the protection of workers (e.g. equality and non-discrimination, freedom of association, eradication of forced labour and child labour). Noting that the annual report of the SEPE for 2011 is not yet available, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide in its next report detailed information on the activities carried out by the SEPE in the framework of the implementation of Act No. 3996/2011 and their results (number of workplaces inspected, violations found, legal provisions concerned, advice provided and sanctions imposed) as well as the impact of these activities on reducing undeclared work and regularizing the situation of workers concerned.

Measures to ensure the payment of wages and benefits. The Committee also notes from the 2010 annual report of the SEPE, that over half of workers' complaints concerned the non-payment of wages. In its previous comments, the Committee welcomed certain measures introduced by Acts Nos 3996/2011 and 3863/2010 such as the labour stamp and the obligation to pay wages electronically via bank accounts, which can be an effective guarantee of the payment of wages and social security contributions and be of great help in reducing the incidence of undeclared work and illegal employment. It recalls, however, from the report of the high-level mission of September 2011 that, at the time, the two measures had not yet produced any results. There was need for awareness raising on the labour stamp to promote its use, while the ministerial decision for the entry into force of the electronic payment of wages had not yet been issued.

In its latest report, the Government does not provide information on steps taken to promote the use of the labour stamp which it describes as a simple and easy way for employers to be fully protected against any complaint of illegal employment and the employees to safeguard their pension and health care rights. It also does not make any reference to measures for the introduction of the electronic payment of wages. The Committee reiterates its request for the Government to take necessary awareness-raising measures to promote the use of the labour stamp, as well as the necessary legal and practical steps for the implementation of the electronic system for the payment of wages (including the issuance of a ministerial decision for the entry into force of the relevant provisions of Act No. 3863/2010), and to keep the Office informed of progress made in this regard.

Positive incentives to encourage compliance. In its previous comments, the Committee took note of financial incentives introduced by section 24 of Act No. 3996/2011 (e.g. 80 per cent reduction of fines imposed) to persuade employers to discharge in a timely manner their obligations for the payment of outstanding wages and benefits due to workers. The Government indicates that this provision constitutes an innovation aimed at enabling the labour inspectorate to take immediate enforcement measures (imposition of sanctions for infringements of the labour law) and make reductions in certain cases (30 per cent reduction in case of immediate payment of the fine and 80 per cent reduction in case of the employer's compliance). However, in order for this provision to enter into force, additional measures have been necessary in collaboration with the Ministry of Finance, like the issuance of a Revenue Code Number which was only introduced in 2012 by Circular 20585/25-01-2012 of the SEPE Directorate of Administrative and Technical Support. As a result, there are no data on the implementation results of this provision for the year 2011. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the impact of section 25 of Act No. 3996/2011, now that administrative measures have been taken for its entry into force, in relation to the level of compliance with legal provisions on conditions of work and the protection of workers, including wage payment and the regularization of the situation of undeclared workers.

Control of legality of employment of migrant workers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that according to section 2(2)(a)(iv) of Act No. 3996, the SEPE is entrusted with the control of the legality of the employment of third country nationals and that section 2(2)(b) of the Act authorizes the SEPE to investigate, discover, identify and prosecute, in parallel and independently from other authorities and organizations, those who violate the provisions that are supervised by the SEPE. In its report, the Government indicates that in 2011, out of 19,968 workers who were found to be undeclared, 8,147 were foreign nationals, accounting for 39.49 per cent of the total number of foreign workers found during inspections in the companies checked (20,632 out of 66,615). The Government does not indicate how many of these foreign workers were nationals of third countries.

The Government also indicates that the primary objective of labour inspectors is to protect the labour rights of the said group of workers and adds that Act No. 4052/2012 on “Sanctions and Measures Against Employers of Illegally Staying Third Country Nationals in order to Combat Illegal Immigration” was adopted in 2012 in order to harmonize Greek legislation with EU Directive 2009/52/EC. This Act prohibits the employment of illegally staying third country nationals and entrusts labour inspectors with: (i) keeping records of employers against whom an administrative sanction has been imposed for infringing the prohibition of employing illegally staying third country nationals, keeping track of relevant judicial decisions and issuing relevant certificates; (ii) conducting regular and extraordinary inspections by sector of activity based on relevant risk assessments, in order to control the employment of illegally staying third country nationals; and (iii) notifying the Minister of Labour and Social Security of inspections conducted during the previous year as well as of their outcomes both in absolute figures and as a percentage of the employers for each sector (sections 79(1) and 90 of Act No. 4052/2012).

The Government explains that until recently, the SEPE acted in the same manner as regards foreign nationals who were illegally staying in the country and those who were legally staying but had no permit to work (e.g. cases of family reunification), by informing the regional authorities so that they might impose legal sanctions on employers (pecuniary fine and/or closure of business). Following the recent amendment of section 86 of Act No. 3386/2005 by section 14 of Act No. 3846 of 2010, and in accordance with the provisions of section 85 of Act No. 4052/2012, when the SEPE inspectors find evidence of illegal employment of foreign nationals from third countries, they themselves impose fines on employers. The Government does not specify whether labour inspectors continue to notify the regional authorities about their findings. The Government indicates that the functions of controlling irregular employment are to be exercised both together with and independently from the police but does not specify whether labour inspectors actually take part in any joint operations with the police or have any direct or indirect involvement in return procedures for workers who are illegally staying nationals of third countries.

The Committee once again recalls from paragraph 78 of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection that any association of the labour inspectorate with the police and immigration authorities to target irregular workers is not conducive to the relationship of trust needed to create the climate of confidence that is essential to enlisting the cooperation of employers and workers with labour inspectors and that efforts to control the use of migrant workers in an irregular situation require the mobilization of considerable resources in terms of staff, time and material resources, which inspectorates can only provide to the detriment of their primary duties.

The Committee also recalls from paragraph 78 of its General Survey that, while usually only employers are to be held accountable for illegal employment as such, with the workers involved being seen in principle as victims, where the workers concerned are foreigners residing illegally in the country, they are doubly penalized in that, in addition to losing their job they face the threat of expulsion, if not actual expulsion. Nonetheless, the fact that labour inspection in general has the power to enter establishments without prior authorization allows it more easily than other institutions to put an end to abusive working conditions of which foreign workers in an irregular situation are often the victim, and to ensure that workers benefit from recognized rights. In these circumstances, the function of verifying the legality of employment should have as its corollary the reinstatement of the statutory rights of all workers if it is to be compatible with the objective of labour inspection. This objective can only be met if the workers covered are convinced that the primary task of the inspectorate is to enforce the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and protection of workers and not immigration law.

In this regard, the Committee notes with interest that Act No. 4052/2012 envisages penal sanctions for employers guilty of persistent infringements in respect of the simultaneous employment of a significant number of illegally staying third country nationals accompanied by particularly exploitative working conditions, including of minors (sections 87 and 88) and that a residence permit for humanitarian reasons may be provided to the victims of such practices (section 89). It also, notes however, that the penal sanctions introduced for such acts do not appear to be sufficiently dissuasive (minimum of five months’ imprisonment or minimum of six months where the victims are children).

The Committee requests the Government to specify the sanctions imposed by the courts on employers found to be guilty of particularly exploitative working conditions including of minors and to communicate the texts of relevant court decisions. It also requests the Government to indicate any steps taken to revise sections 87 and 88 of Act No. 4052/2012 so as to ensure that the minimum sanctions applicable for such acts are sufficiently dissuasive. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the activities carried out by the SEPE in the framework of the implementation of Acts Nos 3996/2011 and 4052/2012, and to furnish data on the impact of these activities on the punishment of employers guilty of trafficking and other forms of exploitation and on the payment of outstanding wages and benefits due to workers who are illegally staying nationals of third countries, including where they are liable to expulsion or after they have been expelled.

The Committee requests the Government to specify the role of labour inspectors in detecting infringements and in recommending or facilitating the filing of complaints and the institution of criminal proceedings vis-à-vis employers so as to extend further the protection of the statutory rights of workers in an undocumented situation and to ensure that workers who are illegally staying nationals of third countries have effective access to the justice system, and to provide data and examples of decisions rendered in this regard.

The Committee requests the Government to specify whether labour inspectors are associated in any police and/or immigration operations in the framework of combating illegal immigration and whether they have any direct or indirect involvement in expulsion procedures of workers who are illegally staying nationals of third countries. If that is the case, the Committee once again requests the Government to take measures so as to progressively dissociate the functions of enforcing immigration law (legality of employment of third country nationals) from those of supervising the observance of workers' rights (e.g. protection of fundamental rights at work and payment of wages and statutory benefits) which constitute their primary duties under Article 3(1) of the Convention, and to keep the Office informed of progress made in this regard.

Implementation of the principle of equal opportunity and treatment for men and women at work. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the SEPE contributes to the greatest extent possible to the increase in women's participation in employment and, as such, constitutes one of the key guardians and promoters of the principle of equal treatment in employment and occupation. The Government provides data which show a marked increase in the number of discrimination cases referred to the Ombudsman from 16 cases in 2011 to 21 in the first half of 2012. It also indicates however, that although Act No. 3488/2006 establishes institutionalized cooperation between the SEPE and the Ombudsman, the practical aspects of this cooperation have not been standardized through circulars or instructions, leading to confusion and a need to clarify the new competencies and roles.

The Committee also notes from the 2011 report of the Greek Ombudsman, that even though collaboration with the SEPE has been positively assessed, room for progress exists in some areas so as to address: (i) the occasional transfer of files to the Ombudsman only after a meeting has taken place at the SEPE for the resolution of the dispute, which may restrict the margin of intervention by the Ombudsman; (ii) the occasional lack of notification to the Ombudsman of the final outcome of a case especially when it has recommended that a fine be imposed; (iii) the occasional practice of limiting labour inspectors' roles to taking note of the parties' opinions and recommending that they take their dispute to court without making any finding as to labour law violations; and (iv) the limited role of labour inspectors in sexual harassment cases where they usually avoid taking any position or action, and simply take note of the parties' views before transferring the case to the Ombudsman.

Noting that according to the high-level mission report, priority attention should be placed on equality and non-discrimination in the current context of the labour market, the Committee requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or envisaged by the SEPE central authority in order to strengthen the cooperation with the Ombudsman in the area of non-discrimination, such as through the issuance of circulars delineating roles and responsibilities and enhancing cooperation, as well as through training made available to labour inspectors, as previously suggested by the Ombudsman, so as to increase awareness of relatively new concepts concerning discrimination. Furthermore, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate any steps taken, including training of labour inspectors on investigation methods, to strengthen protection against sexual harassment.

The Committee also notes that according to the Government, in matters relating to disabled employees, the labour inspectors may cooperate on a case-by-case basis with experts appointed by the National Federation for the Disabled. The Committee requests the Government to provide additional information on the activities of the SEPE on matters relating to workers with disabilities, including cooperation with experts and training, and to indicate their impact on ensuring equality of opportunity and treatment for this category of workers.

Conciliation functions entrusted to labour inspectors. The Government indicates that Act No. 3899/2011 added the functions of an "Industrial Relations Conciliator" to those of Industrial Relations Inspectors. According to section 4 of Act No. 3996/2011, the Conciliator is a labour inspector with increased qualifications serving at the Industrial Relations Inspection Department where the application for conciliation is submitted. According to the Government, the Industrial Relations Conciliators perform their duties in a fully independent manner with objectivity and impartiality, at local, regional or national level. The Government adds that in 2011, 21,345 labour disputes were treated, 9,843 of which were resolved and €19,875,087 were paid to workers, thereby ensuring, to a large extent, the payment of accrued wages and the protection of labour rights.

The Committee recalls from its previous comments, that by virtue of Act No. 3899/2010, the scope of unilateral recourse to arbitration of collective disputes was limited to the issue of wages, leading to an increased need for conciliation of collective labour disputes on non-wage matters – a task now entrusted to the labour inspection system by Act No. 3996/2011. It also recalls that, according to section 3(7) and (9) of this Act, the conciliator (of both individual and collective disputes) should aim on the one hand, at ensuring the strict implementation of the applicable legislation and, on the other hand, at bringing the views of the parties closer together, by proposing solutions for reaching an agreement which the parties can accept, so as to ensure a quick resolution of disputes and industrial peace in the best interest of employers and workers.

The Committee once again refers to paragraphs 72–74 of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection which emphasize the importance of avoiding overburdening inspectorates with tasks, which by their nature may be understood as being incompatible with their primary function of enforcing legal provisions. It recalls that the time and energy that inspectors spend on seeking solutions to collective labour disputes is often at the expense of their primary duties and that carrying out supervisory functions more consistently would lead to better enforcement of the legislation and hence a lower incidence of labour disputes. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the functions of conciliation are separated from those of inspection and entrusted to a distinct body. It would be grateful if the Government would provide information on any progress made to this end and, in the meantime, to indicate the number of labour inspectors who carry out the advisory and enforcement functions provided in Article 3(1)(a)–(b) of the Convention, and those who carry out conciliation functions.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150) (ratification: 1985)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report dated November 2011, which was received in the Office on 23 February 2012 and contained a reply to the comments made under article 23 of the ILO Constitution by the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE) in a communication dated 28 July 2011. It also notes the Government's report dated 31 August 2012.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Abolition of the Workers' Housing Organization (OEK) and the Workers' Social Fund (OEE) in the framework of austerity measures. The Committee notes that according to the Government's report of 31 August 2012, the OEK and OEE, which are described by the Government as public bodies corporate under the supervision of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, were abolished and their competences transferred to the Manpower Employment Organization (OAED) by virtue of Act No. 4024/2012 and Ministerial Cabinet Decree No. 7/28-2-2012. The Committee recalls that the OEK and OEE were managed by tripartite boards on the basis of Acts Nos 2091 of 1992 and 2224 of 1994, which had been adopted following long-standing comments by the supervisory bodies under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), (Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, June 1995). In this regard, the Committee takes note of the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association at its 365th Session (November 2012) in Case No. 2820 concerning Greece. It notes from this case that according to the GSEE, these bodies were crucial to trade union social work and funding workers' housing and that they provided an indispensable social function (e.g., nurseries, summer camps for children, social tourism for low-income workers during the low season, cultural activities including subsidized tickets for theatres, sports, libraries) which did not burden the state budget, being financed exclusively from employers' and workers' contributions. One of the functions of the OEE was to secure minimum financing for trade unions in order to support their operating needs; it has also been the main source of financing for the Organization for Mediation and Arbitration (OMED), enabling it to preserve its autonomy vis-à-vis the State to provide independent mediation and arbitration services for the resolution of collective labour disputes. The Committee refers to its comments under Convention No. 87 on this question. It also requests the Government to indicate, in its report under this Convention, any measure taken or envisaged to ensure the continuation of OEK and OEE projects under the auspices of the OAED, the changes made to the governance structure of these organizations, and whether and how the assets of the OEK and OEE have been distributed.

Articles 4, 5, 6, 9 and 10. Coordination of the system of labour administration in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations and resources at the disposal of labour administration staff. In its comments of 2011, the GSEE described a stifling economic environment in the labour market generated through unilateral legislative interventions which resulted in wage freezes and continuous erosion of workers' income, redundancies and widespread precariousness. The GSEE referred to unprecedented unemployment levels (which in the meantime reached 25.1 per cent in July 2012 according to Eurostat, from 10.2 per cent in December 2009), which in turn deprived social security funds of vital resources thus making their future viability uncertain and leading to the withering of social dialogue into a summary and superficial procedure.

In its report received in February 2012, the Government refers to extensive budgetary cuts in the Ministry of Labour and Social Security which raise obstacles to the fulfilment of its mission and the proper functioning of its services. The Government also refers to the adoption of Act No. 4024/2011 on "Regulations concerning pensions, unified pay scale and grading system, labour reserve and other provisions for the implementation of the medium-term fiscal strategy framework 2012–15" which, according to the Government, attempts to restructure the system of matching activities with human resources and to connect such a system with a system of incentives related to career and pay in the public administration. The Government indicates that within the framework of Act No. 4024/2011, mainly section 35, a restructuring of the Central Service of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security and the OAED, which is the main social policy actor in the field of employment, is fully under way in an attempt to reduce the Ministry's services by 30 per cent in order to satisfy the need to restructure and modernize the units of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, improve its structure and operation and serve the citizens' true needs. For this reason, a Restructuring Committee was established within the Ministry of Labour and Social Security in order to do a mapping of the existing organizational structure and needs in personnel and to identify the service units which are devoid of object or which have a clearly limited object. On the basis of the findings, a redeployment of classified posts by category and field is being undertaken in order to transfer staff with specific skills to service units that need to be reinforced. According to the Government, Act No. 4024/2011 also provides for automatic dismissals, pre-retirement suspension of permanent public officials and the measure of the “labour reserve” for workers in the public sector under a private law contract (i.e., these workers will be paid 60 per cent of their basic salary without working for 12 months after which they will be dismissed). According to the Government, these measures deprive the public administration, including the labour administration, of capable and experienced personnel with know-how. According to the Government, new administrative needs are likely to arise from such dismissals and in combination with the freeze on public sector recruitment introduced by sections 10 and 11 of Act No. 3833/2010 and section 37(37) of Act No. 3986/2011, there will be consequences on the proper delivery of services to the citizens.

In its report of 31 August 2012, sent after the national elections of May and June 2012, the Government indicates that its primary choice is a new model for the organization and functioning of the State and of public administration with a view to providing the country with a rationally organized, functional and efficient administrative system that will serve the public interest, ensure social cohesion, simplify the decision-making process and provide, inter alia, upgraded services to citizens and businesses. Within this framework and in application of section 35 of Act No. 4024/2011, the Ministry of Labour participated (through the preparation of legislative provisions) in the drafting of the Bill on the “Reorganization of Ministries and Public Bodies Corporate” which is to be introduced in Parliament by the Ministry of Administrative Reform and E-Governance. This Bill aims at reorganizing and substantially modernizing the public administration, including the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, in order to achieve effective and rational organizational structures to the benefit of citizens and businesses. The ultimate goal of this effort is to strengthen the administrative capacity of the Ministry’s units in order to better serve citizens, by providing better quality services and increasing satisfaction levels and confidence in the administration. Furthermore, the best use of available resources and especially of human resources is one of the expected results.

The Committee takes note of the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2820 concerning Greece, according to which it is of critical importance, given the massive impact that measures like restructuring programmes, successive wage cuts and the labour reserve in the public sector can have, that the Government now engage in constructive dialogue with the social partners to consider appropriate steps for mitigating the consequences of these measures on their employment and working conditions and planning the occupational future of these workers in the light of the country’s opportunities [document GB. 316/INS/9/1, November 2012, paragraph 991]. The Committee refers to its comments under the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), in this regard.

The Committee notes that according to Article 10 of the Convention, the staff of the labour administration system should have the status, the material means and the financial resources necessary for the effective performance of their duties. While being fully aware of the difficulties the country is currently facing, the Committee wishes to underline that sufficient resources for the labour administration system are important in conditions of austerity, unprecedented unemployment and mounting poverty which place increasing pressure on this system. It recalls from the conclusions on labour administration reached by the International Labour Conference at its 100th Session (2011) that experience from the recent financial and economic crisis has shown that labour administration has an essential role among government institutions, as good labour policies and efficient institutions can help to address difficult economic situations, by protecting workers and enterprises against the worst impact of an economic crisis and mitigating its economic and social consequences while facilitating economic recovery [paragraph 3 of the conclusions, Provisional Record No. 19, page 89].

The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the impact of the current restructuring of the labour administration system on the effective performance of its functions and the number, status and conditions of its staff as well as on any steps taken to ensure that this restructuring is carried out in consultation with the organizations representing the workers in the labour administration, so as to mitigate any adverse consequences of austerity measures on their employment and working conditions and plan, to the extent possible, their occupational future in the light of the country’s opportunities.

Furthermore, recalling from its previous comments the need to ensure close coordination of policies pursued in parallel to the framework of structural reforms in the areas, for example, of collective bargaining, wages, social security and employment, the Committee once again urges the Government to indicate the steps taken to ensure an effective coordination of the functions and responsibilities of the system of labour administration in order to address as effectively as possible the grave circumstances with which the country is currently faced.

Article 10(1). Qualifications and training of the staff of the labour administration system. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the need to build capacities in the area of operational programmes under the European Social Fund (ESF) so that they can be managed in a results-based manner, taking into account that 50 per cent of these funds are devoted to human resource development and another major portion to education and lifelong learning. In its report, the Government indicates that the design of all ESF operational programmes contains monitoring and assessment indicators, a significant proportion of which is based on results. Operational assessments for ESF operational programmes managed by the Ministry are ongoing. The Committee requests the Government to communicate the results obtained through these operational programmes and the outcomes of their assessments once they are available along with information on any steps taken in order to address potential areas for improvement, including through training.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Guinea

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1959)

Articles 1, 3, 4, 7, 10 and 11 of the Convention. Functioning of the labour inspectorate and available means of action. The Committee recalls that since 2005 it has expressed concern at the persistent inadequacy of the means of action available to the labour inspection service. It notes with interest that in the first report it has sent since 2006, the Government indicates that 80 new officials have been assigned to the labour inspectorate, and seeks support from the ILO to devise a programme of training for labour controllers and inspectors to provide the new officials with the requisite qualifications. The Committee nonetheless notes with concern that, according to the Government, the means of action available to the labour inspectorate – apart from a four-wheel drive vehicle made available to the General Labour Inspector – are scarce owing to the austerity plan the country has adopted. The Committee observes that, consequently, only 11 technical inspection visits for occupational safety and health were conducted in 2011. However, inspectors appear to devote much of their time to tasks that go beyond their main duties, such as dispute settlement, supervision of union elections, the negotiation of social claims, study of the internal rules of enterprises and job classifications. The Committee concludes from this that there is no real distinction between labour inspection and labour administration. It further notes with concern from the Government's report on Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150) that, according to an inquiry conducted by the National Committee against Corruption and for Economic and Financial Accountability (CNLC) in 2004, the General Labour Inspectorate is cited as one of the least effective public services. The Committee also notes from the Government's report on Convention No. 150 that the Government requested assistance from the ILO for a study on the organization and functioning of the Ministry of Labour and the Public Service with a view to regrouping the labour administration services into a single department and building their capacity, and that the study was to be validated in the first quarter of 2012. The Committee hopes that the study will afford an opportunity to draw a clear distinction between the functions of the labour administration system and those of the labour inspectorate more particularly. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's statement that it plans to make the necessary arrangements to provide the labour inspectorate with more resources to enable it to operate effectively, and that it will keep the ILO informed as soon as conditions allow.

The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to reinforce the resources, functioning and coordination of the labour inspection system to enable it to meet the requirements of the Convention. It asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken gradually to relieve labour inspectors of duties other than the labour inspection duties set out in Article 3(1) of the Convention, namely the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers. It also invites the Government to make a formal request to the ILO for technical assistance in training new inspectors and to extend its request to cover support in seeking the necessary sources in the context of international cooperation to provide the labour inspectorate with the material means it needs to perform its duties, including transport facilities suited to conditions in the country. It asks the Government to provide information in its next report on the measures taken or envisaged to these ends.

Articles 5, 20 and 21. Annual inspection report. The Committee notes with concern, that despite its repeated requests, the Government has not sent a labour inspection report since the one for the period from October 1994 to October 1995. The Government's last report under article 22 of the ILO Constitution provides only scant information on the activities of the labour inspectorate. The Committee recalls its general observation of 2010, in which it stressed the importance it attaches to the publication and communication to the ILO of an annual inspection report, as an essential basis for evaluating in practice the activities of the labour inspection services and, subsequently, determining the means necessary to improve their effectiveness. Furthermore, referring to its general observation of 2009, the Committee recalls that a regularly updated register of enterprises should allow the central inspection authority to fix priorities for action to ensure, as a minimum, the protection of the most vulnerable workers or those most exposed to occupational hazards and to defend its requirements in human, material and logistical resources on the basis of relevant data from national and international financial authorities, so that an adequate budget can be allocated to them, in so far as national conditions permit. A programme of inspections could be drawn up according to the available resources for each labour inspection structure, and periodical reports on inspections, as provided for by Article 19, could be sent to the central authority for the production of the annual report required by Articles 20 and 21. Such a report would inform the social partners, the other government bodies concerned and the ILO's supervisory bodies of the progress made and the shortcomings of the labour inspection system so that they can provide their opinions for improvement.

The Committee accordingly urges the Government to encourage, as required by Article 5(a) of the Convention, effective cooperation between the labour inspectorate and other competent government bodies (including the tax authorities and social insurance funds) for drawing up a list of workplaces liable to inspection, with register entries indicating at least their geographical location, the branch of activity, the number and categories of workers employed there and their distribution by gender. It expresses the hope that such measures will be taken in the near future so that an annual report on inspection activities containing the information required by each subparagraph from (a) to (g) of Article 21 can be produced and published by the central labour inspection authority.

Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150) (ratification: 1982)

Article 10 of the Convention. Functioning of the labour administration system. The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government to the effect that the labour administration system is difficult to assess because its functions are shared among several ministerial departments. The Committee notes with concern the findings of a survey carried out in 2004 by the National Committee against Corruption and for Economic and Financial Accountability (CNLC), in conjunction with the World Bank, the Users' Committee and Stat View International (SVI) provided by the Government. According to a summary of the abovementioned survey as regards governance, the misuse of public funds and corruption in the public sector seem to be the main problems facing the country. The survey indicates that only three ministerial departments, and the Ministry of Labour is not among them, are deemed to be effective. As regards recruitment in the public administration, the report points out that vacancies are not always filled by the best qualified candidates.

In this context, the Committee notes with interest the information that the Government has applied to the ILO for assistance to carry out a study on the organization and running of the Ministry of Labour and the Public Service with a view to regrouping the labour administration services into a single department and building their capacities, and that the study was scheduled to be validated in the first quarter of 2012. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the formal steps taken to obtain assistance from the Office and on any progress made in reorganizing the system of labour administration and strengthening of its functions, coordination, staff and financial resources. Please also provide the Office with a copy of the final report of the CNLC containing the recommendations and indicate any follow-up measures in this connection.

[The Government is asked to report in detail in 2015.]

Guinea-Bissau

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee takes note of the comments on the application of the Convention by the National Union of Workers of Guinea (UNTG-CS), sent with the Government's report.

Articles 3, 7, 10, 11 and 16 of the Convention. Comments by workers' organizations. The UNTG-CS considers that it is necessary to build the financial, technical and material capacity of the inspection services so as to optimize the performance of their supervisory duties, and to reinforce the authority of the courts so that they in turn are in a position to ensure that the provisions are better applied.

The Government indicates that the General Labour Inspectorate (IGT) is having serious difficulty in carrying out its functions: (1) the numbers of inspectors are too low; (2) their facilities are cramped and are therefore an impediment to the confidentiality needed for the proper discharge of the inspectors' duties; and (3) only one vehicle is available, so inspectors lack the mobility they need to meet the demands of the labour market.

The Committee also notes that, according to the Government's report, the IGT consists of 16 inspectors and provides conciliation services for employers and workers for the settlement of disputes. The Committee is bound to stress in this connection that the main role of the labour inspectorate is to enforce the legal provisions on conditions of work and the protection of workers. It also points out that according to Article 3(2) of the Convention, if duties other than those set in this provision are entrusted to labour inspectors, they shall not be such as to interfere with the effective discharge of their primary duties or to prejudice in any way the authority and impartiality which are necessary to inspectors in their relations with employers and workers. Furthermore, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the obligations laid down in Articles 7 and 11 of the Convention under which the competent authority shall make the necessary arrangements to furnish labour inspectors with adequate training for the performance of their duties, offices suitably equipped in accordance with the requirements of the service and accessible to all persons concerned, and the transport facilities necessary for the performance of their duties in cases where suitable public facilities do not exist, and to reimburse to labour inspectors any travelling and incidental expenses which may be necessary for the performance of their duties. The Committee therefore asks the Government to take measures to ensure that the primary duties of labour inspectors pertain to the supervisory functions set forth in Article 3(1) of the Convention; and to ensure that measures are promptly taken to provide labour inspectors with adequate financial and material resources to cover their needs, including training, so that they may discharge their functions effectively. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would inform the Office of any such measures to this end, including in the context of international cooperation, and to point out any difficulties encountered. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office should it so wish.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Guyana

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1966)

Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention. Communication and content of the annual inspection report. The Committee notes with regret that the last annual report of the Industrial Relations Department of the Ministry of Labour, Human Services and Social Security was received in 2006 and concerned the year 2004. It notes moreover with regret that the Government has still not provided a reply to the Committee's comments on this report made in 2007, and repeated in 2008, 2009, 2010 and 2011. The Committee is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments, which read as follows:

The Committee notes the communication, within the time limits prescribed by Article 20, of the annual report for 2004 of the Industrial Relations Department of the Ministry of Labour. However, it notes once again that information such as the number of industrial and commercial workplaces liable to inspection and the number of workers employed therein (Article 21(c)), which is essential for evaluating the extent to which the Convention is applied, is not always available. In addition, statistics of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease (Article 21(f) and (g)) have never been provided, which makes it impossible to assess the work of the labour inspectorate in the area of occupational safety and health. The Committee strongly hopes that the Government will not fail to take the necessary measures quickly, in particular by calling for the cooperation of other competent public and private institutions, in particular the tax services, to establish a register of workplaces liable to inspection to enable each inspection service to plan its interventions with a view to prevention, while continuing to respond to specific requests.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would also take measures to ensure that, in accordance with Article 14 of the Convention, labour inspectors are notified of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease so that, on the one hand, they are in a position to identify the occupational risks inherent in the various activities carried out in the workplaces liable to inspection and to take appropriate preventive action and, on the other, that they are able in turn to provide relevant information to the central inspection authority for the purposes set out in the Convention.

Finally, the Committee invites the Government to draw the attention of the central labour inspection authority to the valuable guidance provided in Part IV of Recommendation No. 81 on the manner in which the information required by Article 21 could be presented in order to reflect usefully the labour inspectorate's work in practice.

The Committee recalls moreover that the obligation to provide an annual report on the work of the inspection services under Article 20 of the Convention is an ongoing one and requests the Government to publish such a report and communicate it to the ILO within the time limits set in paragraphs 2 and 3 of this Article.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future and reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Obligation to report pursuant to article 22 of the ILO Constitution. The Committee notes the communication by the Government, in reply to its previous request, of the circulars (notices) of 18 March 2005 designating the authorities which must be notified of occupational accidents and cases of occupational disease, in relation to Article 19 of the Convention. It also notes the communication of the annual report for 2004 from the Industrial Relations Department of the Ministry of Labour, containing brief information on labour inspection activities in the agricultural sector. However, the Committee notes that no detailed report on the application of the Convention has been sent for more than ten years. The Committee therefore requests the Government to supply, in its next report under article 22 of the ILO Constitution, all the information required by each part of the Convention report form.

Articles 26 and 27 of the Convention. Objectives and content of the annual report on the work of the labour inspectorate. The Committee notes that, despite the high number of strikes in sugar plantations and agriculture in 2004 and their socio-economic impact (227 strikes resulting in the loss of 82,880 workdays and wages amounting to 129,061,000 dollars) the labour inspectorate only performed six inspections for the whole sector. The Committee considers that these figures testify both to poor conditions of work and lack of vigilance on the part of the inspection authorities responsible for monitoring conditions of work in agricultural undertakings. In any event, they call for the adoption of measures to curb the deterioration of the social climate, particularly by means of inspection activities and initiatives to provide employers and workers with information. However, the Committee notes that the Government has not supplied any information indicating that such measures have been taken or are envisaged. It also notes that the content of the report does not allow any assessment to be made of the level of coverage of the labour inspection system in relation to worker protection requirements in the sector, these needs not being defined, particularly with regard to occupational safety and health. The significant lack of statistics relating to inspection visits (Article 27(d)) and violations (clause (e)) and the total lack of information regarding the laws and regulations giving effect to the provisions of the Convention (clause (a)), the number of staff of the labour inspection service (clause (b)), the number of agricultural undertakings liable to inspection and the number of persons working therein (clause (c)), and also the lack of statistics with respect to penalties imposed (clause (e)), occupational accidents, including their causes (clause (f)) and occupational diseases, including their causes (clause (g)), make it impossible for the Committee to perform its role of monitoring the practical application of the Convention. The Committee reminds the Government that the requirement to publish an annual report on inspection activities and send it to the ILO serves an important purpose at both the national and international level. It is an essential tool for evaluating the operation of the labour inspection system and for making improvements to it, with the participation of employers and workers and their respective organizations (Articles 26 and 27). The Committee invites the Government to refer to paragraphs 320–328 of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection and requests it to take the necessary measures, if need be with technical assistance from the Office, to enable the central labour inspection authority to include all the information required by each of clauses (a) to (g) of Article 27 in the annual report on its work.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain a reply to its previous comments concerning the functions of the tripartite Committee chaired by the Minister of Labour, made in 2007 and repeated in 2009, 2010 and 2011. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments which read as follows:

Article 5. Functions of the tripartite Committee. In the Committee's previous request, the Government was asked to indicate the functions of the tripartite committee chaired by the Minister of Labour, as well as those of the six subcommittees to which it referred in its 1999 report. The Government states in reply that this question was dealt with comprehensively under the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). While the Committee has not found the information requested in the Government's report, it wishes nevertheless to emphasize that the tripartite consultations referred to in that instrument are distinguished clearly by virtue of their purpose – activities of the International Labour Organization – from the tripartite consultations referred to in Article 5 of this Convention, which concern the various areas of national labour policy. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to indicate the functions of the tripartite committee chaired by the Minister of Labour, as well as those of the subcommittees referred to in its report received in 1999, and to report to the Office any other arrangements made, at the national, regional and local levels, to ensure the consultation, cooperation and negotiation provided for by Article 5. It would be grateful if the Government would also provide copies of any reports or extracts of reports relating to the work of these various tripartite bodies, their purpose and their results.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future and reminds the Government that it may avail itself of ILO technical assistance, if it so wishes.

Haiti

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1952)

Offer of technical assistance. The Committee notes the Government's report, which focuses on the priorities established in the context of the efforts to revive the country following to the earthquake of January 2010, including through the promotion of employment, particularly in the construction sector, and on the obstacles encountered in the application of Convention No. 81.

The Committee further notes the observations of 31 August 2011 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), according to which the abrupt deterioration in working conditions which followed the earthquake highlights the existence of increasingly precarious and even dangerous forms of work, including for young children, and underlines the urgent need for a sound employment policy which focuses on strengthening labour inspection services in the capital and the provinces, including in the construction sector, which is likely to be the main source of jobs in the years to come.

Aware of the difficulties faced by the Government and the efforts which the latter must make to create the necessary conditions for application of the Convention, the Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of technical assistance from the ILO if it so wishes, including support for seeking the necessary resources in the context of international cooperation with a view to the progressive establishment of a labour inspection system which meets the requirements of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any formal steps taken to this end.

Articles 3, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17 and 18 of the Convention. Discharge of primary duties of the labour inspectorate. Further to the Committee's previous comments, the ITUC stresses the need to reform the Labour Code, especially section 411, which stipulates that labour inspectors shall provide employers and workers with technical information and advice "where necessary". The ITUC calls for full effect to be given to Article 3(1) of the Convention, despite the difficulties faced by the country. It refers to the information provided by the Confederation of Haitian Workers (CFOH), according to which labour inspectors have not produced any report since 1992 on any action taken and that they show a certain partiality with regard to enterprises, even where there are clear violations of workers' rights. The ITUC also underlines the importance of activities linked to the export processing zone in terms of jobs created, especially for young women.

The Committee notes the Government's proposal to modify the expression "where necessary" in section 411 as part of the revision of the Labour Code, which is due to take place with technical support from the ILO, with a view to harmonizing the Labour Code with the international labour Conventions ratified by Haiti. The Government also emphasizes that, despite the wording of section 411 of the Labour Code, inspections have been conducted regularly over the last three years in Port-au-Prince and certain departments of the country.

The Committee recalls that the role of the labour inspectorate must not be limited to reacting to requests from workers or employers, and that inspections of workplaces, whether scheduled or not, should be conducted as often and as thoroughly as necessary throughout the country (Article 16), in order to enable the labour inspectorate to discharge its primary duties, as provided for in Article 3(1). The Committee notes that the effectiveness of the inspection system and the credibility of inspectors for employers and workers depends largely on the manner in which inspectors exercise their prerogatives (right to enter workplaces, direct or indirect powers of injunction, reporting infringements, initiating proceedings, etc.) and meet their obligations (such as displaying probity and observing confidentiality), as established by Articles 3, 12, 13, 15, 17 and 18 of the Convention.

The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any progress made regarding the revision of section 411 of the Labour Code, so that the provision of technical information and advice to employers and workers is recognized as a permanent function of the labour inspectorate in conformity with Article 3(1)(b).

The Committee also requests the Government to supply detailed information together with statistics on the planning and implementation of systematic inspections throughout the country, including in the export processing zones, and also their results (identification of infringements or irregularities, technical advice and information, observations, injunctions, notices of infringement, legal proceedings initiated or recommended, penalties imposed and enforced), and to indicate any obstacles to the full application in practice of the prerogatives and obligations of labour inspectors.

Finally, the Committee requests the Government to send a copy of the report form on violations and of some of such reports which have already been completed.

Article 6, 8, 10 and 11. Human and material resources available to the labour inspectorate. The Government refers to the obstacles encountered in the application in practice of the Convention which, according to its report, are numerous: inadequate numbers of labour inspectors in view of the number, nature and size of workplaces liable to inspection and the complexity of the provisions of the Labour Code in force; lack of logistical resources; insufficient budget resources for paying reasonable salaries to labour inspectors; lack of mobile resources to facilitate the transportation of inspectors and enable them to fully perform their duties; premises inaccessible to certain persons (especially persons with disabilities).

According to the ITUC, the labour inspection services continue to lack the resources to be fully operational and show deficiencies in terms of supervision on the ground. According to the information supplied by the CFOH to the ITUC, as regards the total number of 100 serving labour inspectors, more than half (53 inspectors) are in a single department in the west of the country, while the numbers of inspectors in the other nine departments range from six to 20.

The Committee requests the Government to supply detailed information on the measures taken or envisaged, including having recourse to international financial aid, to obtain the necessary funds to build the capacities of the labour inspection system, especially by increasing the number of labour inspectors and the material and logistical resources available to the labour inspectorate.

The Committee also refers to paragraph 209 of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection. While being fully aware of the problems faced by the Government, it is bound to emphasize the importance that it places on the treatment of labour inspectors in a way that reflects the importance and specific features of their duties and takes account of personal merit. The Committee requests the Government to indicate all the measures taken or envisaged to improve the status and conditions of service of inspectors, so that they correspond to the conditions of public officials performing comparable tasks, such as tax inspectors.

Articles 5(a) and 21(e). Effective cooperation with other government departments and with employers' and workers' organizations. The ITUC underlines the need to provide statistics that make it possible to assess any cooperation and procedures for such cooperation with other government departments and with employers' and workers' organizations. The Government, for its part, refers to cooperation between the labour inspectorate and other government departments, such as the National Office for Old-Age Insurance (ONA), the Office for Occupational Accident, Sickness and Maternity Insurance (OFATMA), the Office for the Protection of Citizens (OPC), and also civil society organizations for the defence of human rights. The Committee requests the Government to provide details of this cooperation and its impact on the effectiveness of the action of the labour inspectorate, with a view to the application of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work.

The Government also refers to cooperation between the labour inspectorate and the labour tribunal, to which files are referred for the imposition of penalties provided for by the law further to a report of non-compliance. The Committee recalls its general observation of 2007, in which it stressed the importance of measures enabling effective cooperation between the labour inspection system and the justice system, in order to encourage due diligence and attention in the treatment by judicial bodies of violations reported by labour inspectors, and in the disputes concerning the same fields which are submitted directly to them by workers or their organizations. The Committee requests the Government to provide statistics on the follow-up to reports of infringements submitted by the labour inspectorate to the judicial bodies and to state whether measures have been taken or envisaged to strengthen cooperation between the labour inspectorate and the justice system, for example by the creation of a system for the registration of judicial decisions accessible to the labour inspectorate, to enable the central authority to use this information to achieve its objectives, and to include them in the annual report, in accordance with Article 21(e) of the Convention.

The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to strengthen collaboration between the labour inspectorate and employers' and workers' organizations (Article 5(b)), including in the construction sector, which, in the opinion of the Government constitutes a priority for the revival of the country. The Committee recalls the guidance given in Paragraphs 4–7 of Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), regarding collaboration between employers and workers in relation to safety and health.

Article 7(3). Training of inspectors. Further to the Committee's comments on this subject, the ITUC notes certain gaps in the area of training, whereas the Government refers to a number of training courses in 2008 and 2011 with the support of the ILO and international donors. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to develop a training strategy, and to provide information on the frequency, content and duration of training given to labour inspectors, and also on the number of participants and the impact of this training on the effective performance of labour inspection duties.

Article 14. Notification and registration of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease. The Committee notes the comments of the ITUC on the need to provide data on this subject and the information provided by the Government according to which industrial accidents are notified to the general inspectorate of OFATMA. The Committee requests the Government to describe in detail the system for the notification of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease and to indicate the measures taken or envisaged following the earthquake, in order to collect and supply statistics on this subject, including in the construction sector.

Articles 20 and 21. Annual inspection report. The ITUC also underlines the need to provide detailed statistics with a view to the publication of an annual report, as provided for in Article 20, containing information on the subjects listed in Article 21(a)–(g). The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government according to which the statistics were lost in the aftermath of the 2010 earthquake, but that efforts have been made since then to establish a new statistical database.

The Committee draws the Government's attention to its general observation of 2010, in which it underlines the importance that it attaches to the preparation and publication of an annual report on the work of the labour inspection services. When properly drawn up, the annual report is an essential basis for evaluation of the operation in practice of the labour inspectorate and, consequently, for determining useful resources for improving its effectiveness. The publication of the annual inspection report, especially via modern technological means, can also facilitate the development of exchanges in the areas of conditions of work and protection of workers at regional and international levels, including through technical and financial cooperation. The Committee also recalls its general observation of 2009, in which it underlined the vital importance of the availability of a register of workplaces and enterprises liable to inspection, containing data on the number and categories of all workers employed there.

The Committee urges the Government, as a preliminary stage in the preparation of an annual inspection report and in order to evaluate the situation of the labour inspection services in terms of their needs, to compile an inventory and register of industrial and commercial workplaces liable to inspection (number, activity, size and geographical situation) and of the workers employed in them (number and categories), and to keep the Office informed of any progress made in this field.

Honduras

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes the observations received in August 2011 from the Single Confederation of Workers of Honduras (CUTH), and the Government's reply to them. The CUTH refers to the conditions in which Miskito workers carry out dive-fishing for lobster and shrimp. These observations are addressed in the Committee's comments on the application of the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169).

The Committee requests the Government to reply to the comments the Committee made in 2011, which read as follows:

The Committee notes the comments of the Honduran National Business Council (COHEP) 6 October 2010, as well as the Government's reply. It also notes the comments of the Honduran United Confederation of Workers (CUTH), dated 31 August and received by the Office on 19 September 2011 respectively, as well as the Government's reply dated 9 November 2011.

Legislation. In its comments of 2008, the Committee had noted that the draft revision of the Labour Code was being discussed by the Government and the social partners. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide information on progress made in the aforementioned revision process.

Articles 3, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11 and 16 of the Convention. Functioning of the Labour inspection system. The COHEP notes that: (i) the staff of the Labour Ministry is insufficient and does not have the qualifications necessary for the carrying out of labour inspection visits in workplaces; (ii) the budget allocated to the labour inspection is insufficient; (iii) the inspection services do not have access to vehicles or petty cash; (iv) according to the data provided by the General Labour Inspectorate, its activity has been focused on special inspections or on complaints received, which represent between 80 and 90 per cent of the inspections carried out in the last few years; (v) the inspection has salary limitations due to the low ranking of inspectors within the civil service and the fact that anyone who can read and write is hired; (vi) inspectors have a biased attitude towards the worker and the General Labour Inspectorate does not always respond to requests by employers to check worker wrongdoings; (vii) although section 629 of the Labour Code stipulates that labour inspectors will have the assistance of technical experts during inspections, in practice multi-purpose or multidisciplinary inspections are not carried out.

The Government states that: (i) the General Labour Inspection currently has 108 inspectors at the national level, 22 of which are lawyers, ten are interns and 76 have a title of secondary education; (ii) all the organs of the State, including the ministries, must comply with the provisions of the national budget and do not have the right to exceed the limits set in the budget; (iii) the central headquarters of the General Labour Inspectorate has sufficiently equipped units and four vehicles are distributed among the different regional units, even though there is no budgetary allocation to cover travel expenses for labour inspectors, and in the regional units in the rest of the country there is a lack of logistical support and budget to cover transportation costs; (iv) regular general inspections are carried out, at six-month intervals; (v) General Labour Inspection officials are governed by the Civil Service Act and its regulations and, although they do not have their own statute, they enjoy job security, as it is unusual for them to be dismissed when governments change; (vi) recruitment of labour inspectors is carried out once candidates have passed the examination provided for in the aforementioned legislation; (vii) the project aimed at strengthening public administration systems to ensure the inspection service is professional, unified and polyvalent, undertaken by the ILO with the financial cooperation of USDOL, conducted a study into posts and salaries and standardized the posts of inspectors I, II and III into two categories of inspectors and supervisors; (viii) the Ministry of Labour and Social Security has occupational doctors and safety and health technical experts, who have responsibility for monitoring compliance with legal provisions in the area of occupational health and safety through visits to workplaces.

The Committee highlights that the issue of establishing the budget share allocation for the functioning of the labour inspection system, so as to take into account the clearly specified needs and requirements of the Convention, has been raised in its comments since 2006. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the actions and measures taken, with ILO technical assistance, to carry out a needs assessment of the labour inspection services in the areas of human resources and training, and financial and material resources, and to ensure that the budget share allocation for labour inspection within the national budget is set in proportion to the priority that must be accorded to labour inspection. It also requests the Government once again to provide precise information on the arrangements for the use of the vehicles (four) allocated to the different regional units for labour inspectors while performing their professional duties.

The Committee also points out that for a number of years it has been asking the Government to ensure that legal provisions are adopted rapidly to guarantee that the conditions of service of inspection staff are such as to ensure they have job security and that they are independent of any changes in government and of any improper external influences. The Committee requests the Government once again to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to complement national legislation with the inclusion of specific legal provisions to guarantee inspection staff job security and independence of any changes in government and of any improper external influences.

Articles 12(1)(a) and (2), and 18. Free access for labour inspectors to workplaces liable to inspection. In its comments of 2006, the Committee had noted that, according to the Government, the Ministry of Labour and Social Security had taken firm measures to extend the right of health and safety inspectors to enter workplaces. In the Inspection Protocols and Labour Inspection Handbook of Procedures, attached to the Government's report form, the Committee finds, however, that the situation has failed to progress sufficiently in practice in that regard. It therefore draws the attention of the Government to the provisions of the Convention pursuant to which the labour inspectors who are provided with proper credentials must be empowered to enter freely and without previous notice, at any hour of day or night, any workplace liable to inspection (Article 12(1)(a)) and, on the occasion of an inspection visit, they must notify the employer or his representative of their presence, unless they consider that such a notification may be prejudicial to the performance of their duties (Article 12(2)). The Committee also highlights that pursuant to Article 18, national legislation must set forth appropriate penalties, which must be effectively applied in cases where labour inspectors are obstructed in the performance of their duties. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure that both law and practice are brought into line with the requirements of the Convention in that regard.

Furthermore, noting that the Government has not responded to its previous comments on the number of joint visits carried out by the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, the Human Rights Commissioner, the Minister for Security and the Procurator General, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would specify the purpose of, and nature of, the participation of each of the above authorities in these inspections.

Article 14. Notification of occupational diseases to the labour inspectorate. The Committee recalls that, the need to complement legislation through a provision stipulating the obligation to notify cases of occupational disease to the labour inspection services has been addressed since the 1990s, and draws the Government's attention to paragraph 118 of its Labour Inspectorate General Study of 2006, in which the importance of establishing a systematic information mechanism to enable the labour inspectorate to have access to the data necessary to determine which activities present a risk and the categories of workers most at risk, and to investigate the causes of occupational accidents and diseases in workplaces and companies under its control. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the steps taken or envisaged to ensure that national legislation provides for the conditions and the manner in which cases of occupational disease should be notified to the labour inspectorate.

Article 15. Obligations and limits to be respected by labour inspectors. The Committee notes with the ministerial decision attached to the Government's report which contained the Labour Inspectorate's Code of Ethics and was signed on 28 June 2011. It notes that the text includes the expression of values and commitments to which all members of the labour inspectorate must adhere and in particular those prohibiting them from accepting any gifts, presents, subscriptions, favours, gratuities, promises or special advantage and rejecting any kind of direct or indirect offering of bribery, sale or financial profit from workers or employers that might interfere with the fulfilment of their duties. The Committee notes, however, that this text does not take on board the comments that the Committee has been raising since the 1990s concerning the need to specifically prohibit labour inspectors from having any direct or indirect interest in undertakings under their supervision. The Committee therefore requests the Government once again to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure that specific provisions are adopted without delay establishing the prohibition of labour inspectors from having any direct or indirect interest in undertakings under their supervision, pursuant to Article 15(a) of the Convention.

Articles 17 and 18. Appropriate penalties. COHEP considers that the penalties provided for in article 625 of the Labour Code are obsolete, hence they have not been amended since its entry into force. According to the Government, the aforementioned article of the revised Code sanctions the offences listed below with fines varying between 50 and 5,000 lempiras, depending on the individual circumstances of each case, its recurrent character and the capacity of the offending company to pay: (i) non-respect of the orders issued by labour inspectors, within the limit of their legal authority; (ii) obstructing the fulfilment of the duties that labour inspectors are legally entitled to carry out; (iii) physical and psychological aggression towards labour inspectors; (iv) violation by employers of the legal provisions that are not subject to any special penalty. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide a copy of the revised text of article 625 of the Labour Code referred to by the Government in its report form.

Articles 19, 20 and 21. Periodical reports and drawing up and publication of an annual inspection report. The Committee notes with regret that since the ratification of the Convention in 1983, no annual report on the activities of the inspection services has been communicated, as stipulated in Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure that the local inspection units produce periodical reports on the results of their activities, as stipulated in Article 19, and that these reports enable the central inspection authority to produce an annual report in accordance with Articles 20 and 21. In that regard, the Committee reminds the Government of the guidance provided in Part IV of the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), on how the information required under Article 21 may be broken down.

Labour inspection and child labour. In its comments of 2006, the Committee had noted that inspectors specializing in child labour were operating in Tegucigalpa and San Pedro de Sula and had requested the Government to specify why it had decided to appoint child labour inspectors to carry out duties in these locations, and to provide information on the results of their activities. As the Government has not made this information available, the Committee requests it once again to communicate it and to provide statistical information on the number of visits carried out by labour inspectors, in particular in these regions, the offences found and penalties imposed, and on the advice and information that may have been provided on the matter to employers and workers.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Japan

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1953)

The Committee notes the comments made by the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC-RENGO) in communications dated 2 September 2010 and 26 August 2011 and by the National Confederation of Trade Unions (ZENROREN) in a communication dated 28 September 2010, as well as the Government's reply to all the above.

Articles 3(1)(b), 5, 13, 14, 16 and 17 of the Convention. Preventive activities of labour inspectors, collaboration with workers' and employers' organizations and programming of inspections. The Committee notes that in its comments, the JTUC-RENGO deems the existing preventive activities of the labour inspectorate inadequate and indicates that it has requested the Government within the tripartite Labour Conditions Panel to adopt further regulatory measures that ensure compliance with labour standards and prevent industrial accidents. The JTUC-RENGO also objects to the replacement of the system of industrial accident prevention instructors by a group of experts on safety, health and industrial relations established at the level of prefectural labour offices at the end of the financial year 2010. In its 2011 comments, the JTUC-RENGO claims that the system has yet to be provided with adequate budgetary and material resources.

In its reply to the comments, the Government refers to awareness-raising activities such as the dissemination of pamphlets on national labour standards, including on the revised Industrial Safety and Health Law, and to activities conducted in collaboration with the Industrial Injury Prevention Organization including specialized support provided to small and medium enterprises. The Government further indicates that the incidence of industrial accidents and related workers' reports are subject to an analysis by the Labour Standards Inspection Organization in order to target inspections and direct guidance for specific workplaces. Inspections are programmed on the basis of a circular, the "Local Administrative Operation Plan" that identifies priority sectors and issues that have to be considered.

With regard to the replacement of the system of industrial accident prevention instructors, the Government indicates that the Ministry has established the Industrial Safety and Health Experts Conference of Labour and Management, operating at the level of Prefectural Labour Offices, which consists of experts who are familiar with the state of worksites and occupational safety and health (OSH) matters, for more effective and efficient administration of OSH-related policies. The Ministry will hear the experts' opinions on preventive measures against industrial accidents, measures of maintenance and promotion of workers' health, etc., so that the Conference will be able to take action to achieve its objectives. At the same time, the Ministry will hear the opinions of labour and management organizations for more effective OSH activities. The Government also indicates that it is in the process of setting up a budget for the activities of the Conference.

In this context the Committee notes from the annual inspection reports for 2009 and 2010 that the number of reported casualties increased in 2010 compared to 2009 (by 2,041 workers), whereas in 2009, the number of reported casualties had significantly decreased (by 13,573 workers) compared to casualties reported in 2008. At the same time, the average number of on-site inspections carried out per labour standards inspector increased from 37 inspections in 2009 to 43 inspections in 2011.

The Committee requests the Government to elaborate on the reasons for the reform of the industrial accident prevention system and the composition, structure, mandate and activities of the Conference as well as its impact from the point of view of prevention of industrial accidents (Articles 3(1)(b) and 13). It also requests the Government to indicate how the social partners participate in the activities of the Conference (Article 5(b)).

The Committee asks the Government to provide details on the technical information and advice provided to small and medium enterprises in the field of accident prevention in collaboration with the Industrial Injury Prevention Organization (Articles 3(1)(b) and 5(a)).

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the follow-up to the concerns expressed by the JTUC-RENGO within the tripartite Labour Conditions Panel as to the effectiveness of preventive activities.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide more information on the manner in which data on industrial accidents are collected as well as any explanations for the fluctuations in these data between 2009 and 2010 (Article 14).

The Committee requests the Government to provide disaggregated data by sector on the various categories of casualties reported, the findings of investigations carried out following industrial accidents, and any measures taken or recommended by labour inspectors to minimize risks, prevent the recurrence of similar incidents and punish any parties guilty of labour law violations (Articles 13, 14 and 17).

It would also be grateful if the Government would describe how data on industrial accidents are introduced into the inspection planning process in accordance with the Local Administrative Operation Plan as indicated by the Government (Article 16).

Article 13. Preventive measures including orders with immediate executory force vis-à-vis the emergency operation of the Nuclear Power Plant Fukushima 1. The Committee notes that the JTUC-RENGO expresses concerns about the working conditions of the workers involved in the emergency operations at the Nuclear Power Plant Fukushima 1 and underlines the lack of mid- to long-term measures to monitor their exposure to radiation and the need for surveillance from the administration and for preventive measures to be taken by the nuclear operator. The Committee notes from the Government's reply that an on-site survey had been conducted on the plant and that the nuclear operator Tokyo Electric Power Company (TEPCO) was instructed to take measurements of radiation doses, to take corrective measures with a view to complying with the radiation dose limits applicable to emergency workers and to fully enforce preventive measures against heat stroke. It moreover notes that a database for the long-term tracking of the exposure dose and its health effect on workers engaged in emergency works was being set up. The Government also indicates that it took measures under the lead of the "Office on Countermeasures for Health of Workers at TEPCO Fukushima 1 Nuclear Power Plant", which has been set up within the Ministry of Health, Labour and Welfare. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide further information in relation to the mid- to long-term measures taken by the labour inspection in order to monitor the exposure to radiation of the workers involved in the emergency operations at the Nuclear Power Plant Fukushima 1 as well as any follow-up by the operator on advice and instructions given by the labour standards inspectors.

In view of the serious and urgent nature of the matter, the Committee would appreciate information on the measures taken under the lead of the Office on Countermeasures for Health of Workers at TEPCO Fukushima 1 Nuclear Power Plant for the supervision of the application of laws on safety and health of workers.

Articles 5(b), 6, 10, 11 and 16. Reorganization of labour standards inspection offices and reduction in the number of newly recruited labour inspectors. Status and conditions of service of labour inspectors.

Reorganization of inspection offices. The Committee notes the Government's reply to its previous comments in relation to the reduction of the number of labour standards inspection offices throughout the country following a reorganization. According to the Government, consultations on specific plans for this reorganization had taken place with the social partners within the tripartite Labour Policy Council, and with the workers and employers of the regions affected by the reorganization. Elements taken into account in the framework of the reorganization included "changing demands for administrative bodies" and transport considerations when selecting the offices subject to reorganization. The Committee notes that JTUC-RENGO and ZENROREN expressed their opposition to the restructuring in their 2010 comments. The Committee requests the Government to provide details on the outcome of the consultations which took place with the social partners on the reorganization of inspection offices and to indicate the specific factors taken into consideration in this framework, including clarifications as to the "changing demands for administrative bodies" mentioned by the Government. It also requests the Government to indicate the impact of the reorganization on the application of Article 11 of the Convention, according to which the labour inspectorate should have accessible local offices, and on the effective functioning of the labour inspection system more generally.

Reduction in the number of newly recruited labour inspectors. The Committee notes that JTUC-RENGO and ZENROREN refer to the inadequate number of labour inspectors in relation to the high number of workplaces covered by the labour inspection system. The JTUC-RENGO and ZENROREN indicate that the Government decided in 2010 to reduce the annual recruitment of government officials and that, consequently, the number of labour standard inspectors' recruits was reduced from 216 in 2009 to 177 in 2010. This information was confirmed by the Government in its report of 2011. The Government indicated that a cabinet decision had been issued in order to reduce the number of newly employed labour standards inspectors to around half of those recruited in 2009. In order to mitigate the adverse effects of this reduction and avoid any regression in terms of labour inspection administration and labour standards enforcement, the reappointment of mandatorily retired ex-public officers had been allowed on a full-time or part-time basis. The JTUC-RENGO criticizes this measure and underlines the need for long-term planning in order to maintain the effectiveness of labour law enforcement through new recruitments rather than the re-employment of retired inspectors.

Referring to paragraph 174 of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, the Committee wishes to highlight that although it is aware of the severe budgetary restrictions governments often face, the number of labour inspectors should be sufficient to secure the effective discharge of the important duties of the inspectorate, taking into account the number, nature, size and situation of the workplaces liable to inspection, the number and range of categories of workers employed in such undertakings, and the number and the complexity of legal provisions to be enforced. It notes in this regard the wide scope of application of the Labour Standards Law, as set out in its section 8, including in sectors such as mining and electricity generation, which are by nature prone to OSH risks and even major hazards. It also observes that section 2 of the Industrial Safety and Health Law has the same wide scope of application as the Labour Standards Law. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the recent reduction in the number of newly recruited inspectors, both from the standpoint of budgetary resources and effectiveness of the labour inspection functions, and to give details as to the contractual arrangements and conditions of service applied to labour inspectors who are re-hired after their retirement.

The Committee also requests the Government to specify whether the reform has had any impact on the status and conditions of service of currently serving labour inspectors and to provide relevant legislative texts, if any.

Article 8. Gender distribution in the labour inspection staff. The Committee notes with interest the information provided by the Government according to which the percentage of women among newly appointed labour standards inspectors increased from approximately 20 per cent in the financial year 2009 to 27 per cent in the financial year 2010, and that the proportion of the number of women among newly employed labour standards inspectors has tended to increase in recent years. It also notes with interest the reported efforts undertaken to promote the employment of female inspectors; these include appointing female labour inspectors as panellists in information sessions on the work in labour standards inspection offices, sending them as resource persons to information seminars on the public service at the university, and publishing information on their work on the website of the National Personnel Authority. The Committee invites the Government to keep the ILO informed of the share of female labour inspector recruits and of the distribution of the inspection staff by gender in the various positions and grades. Moreover, it reiterates its request for the Government to examine the reasons for the low number of women in the labour inspection staff and to continue its efforts to stimulate the interest of potential female candidates for the labour inspection service.

Articles 20 and 21. Compilation of information on workplaces. The Committee notes with interest that the labour standards inspection offices use the Labour Standards Administrative Information System in order to process information gathered from several sources on workplaces and on labour law compliance. The Committee recalls its general observations of 2009 and 2010 on the importance of statistics of industrial and commercial workplaces liable to labour inspection in the framework of the elaboration and publication of an annual labour inspection report. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide information on the operation of this information system, the type of information it includes, and the possible use made of the information in this system in the framework of the elaboration and publication of the annual labour inspection report.

With reference to its general observation of 2007, the Committee would also be grateful if the Government would provide further information on collaboration between the labour inspection services and the justice system, including through the possible creation of a system of recording of judicial decisions that is accessible to the labour inspectorate to enable the central authority to make use of this information in pursuance of its objectives and to include it in the annual report as envisaged in Article 21(e).

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Kenya

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes with interest the Government's indications that it is currently studying with a view to their implementation some of the recommendations made by the labour administration and inspection needs assessment conducted in 2010 (2010 audit) following a request by the Government for technical assistance. The recommendations of the assessment correspond to a large extent to the Committee's previous comments on the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the steps taken or envisaged with a view to providing for the application in law and practice of the provisions of the Convention, in light of the recommendations made in the 2010 audit, and to provide a copy of any texts adopted in this regard. Please also indicate any steps taken to obtain access to the necessary funds for this purpose through international cooperation.

Article 14 of the Convention. Reporting and investigation of occupational accidents and cases of occupational disease. The Committee notes that the Government, in reply to the Committee's request to indicate the number of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease reported in comparison with the number of investigations actually conducted, as well as the action taken following these investigations, merely states that 162 cases of occupational disease were reported to the Department of Occupational Safety and Health services (DOSHS) without providing further details. The Committee also notes the information contained in the annual report of the Commissioner for Labour for 2011 on the total of 6,033 accidents in 2011, disaggregated by economic sector (of which 249 were fatal, and 5,774 non-fatal), and the indication that no data are available on the number of occupational diseases. The Committee has previously noted that section 25 of the Occupational Safety and Health (OSH) Act provides for the development and maintenance of an effective programme for the collection, compilation and analysis of OSH statistics covering occupational accidents and diseases, as well as the existence of an accident database in which information sent through the relevant accident reporting form (DOSHS 1) is entered. In this regard, the Committee notes with interest the reference in the 2011 annual report of the Commissioner for Labour that arrangements to disaggregate data are being introduced. It also notes the indication in the Government's report that the Labour Department is currently developing a database which will improve the data capture system and the collection of OSH statistics, and therefore give effect to the above section of the OSH Act. However, the Committee notes that the Government has not responded to its request to provide information on the measures taken to sensitize medical practitioners, which was indicated as a major cause of the inadequate functioning of the system of notification to the DOSH in practice. The Committee once again asks the Government to indicate the number of occupational accidents and cases of occupational disease reported in comparison with the number of investigations actually conducted, as well as the action taken following these investigations (improvement or prohibition notices, prosecutions and penalties imposed). It also once again asks the Government to take measures to sensitize medical practitioners (e.g. through awareness campaigns, the distribution of brochures or the organization of training sessions).

Please also provide information on any further progress made in the development of the above database to improve the data capture system and the collection of OSH statistics.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 1979)

The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), that it is currently studying with a view to their implementation, some of the recommendations contained in the labour administration and inspection needs assessment conducted by the ILO in 2011, of which many also relate of the functioning of the labour inspection services in agriculture. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the steps taken or envisaged with a view to the implementation of the recommendations contained in the needs assessment in so far as they also concern the application of the present Convention (e.g. the provision of adequate transport facilities, arrangements to share such facilities, the reimbursement of travel expenses, etc.)

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Lebanon

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the Government's report, but observes that it contains only information on comments the Committee made in its previous direct request and does not reply to the comments made in its observation. It is therefore bound to repeat the latter, which read as follows:

Article 3(2) of the Convention. Additional duties entrusted to labour inspectors in connection with union matters. For many years the Committee has been asking the Government to take steps to limit intervention by labour inspectors in the internal affairs of trade unions and confederations solely to cases of complaints which might be addressed to them by a significant number of members. The issue was raised by the Committee with regard to section 2(c) of Decree No. 3273 of 26 June 2000, under the terms of which the labour inspectorate has the power to monitor vocational organizations and confederations at all levels in order to check whether the latter, in their operations, are exceeding the limits prescribed by law and by their rules of procedure and statutes. The Committee stated in a direct request of 2002 that such powers were tantamount to the right to interfere in the internal affairs of professional organizations. The Government then announced that an amendment to the Labour Code would settle the issue. However, Memorandum No. 35/2 of 12 April 2006 from the Director-General of the Ministry of Labour reproduced the criticized provision using identical wording.

Section 163(3) of the version of the draft Labour Code submitted to the ILO in 2007 for opinion stated that the Labour Inspection and Occupational Safety and Health Department of the Ministry of Labour would be responsible for monitoring the application of laws, decrees and regulations relating to terms and conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work, including the provisions of ratified international and Arab conventions and, more specifically ... "(3) to conduct inquiries further to complaints relating to trade unions and confederations at all levels".

In its 2009 report, the Government indicates that this provision is contained in section 161(3) of the current version of the draft Labour Code and will have the effect of removing any power from the labour inspectorate to monitor trade union affairs, as this power would be assigned to the trade union council. It explains that the powers of the labour inspectorate with regard to occupational organizations will therefore be limited to the examination of complaints submitted to it by the latter. Since the current wording of the text in no way lends itself to such an interpretation, it is essential, in order to avoid any ambiguity in this regard, for the drafting to be reviewed in the appropriate way. Noting that the draft amendments to the Labour Code have been under discussion for more than ten years, the Committee requests the Government, pending the definitive adoption of the Code, to contemplate cancelling, in the forms provided for by law in such matters, the provision of Memorandum No. 35/02 of 12 April 2006 of the Director-General of the Ministry of Labour under the terms of which labour inspectors retain the power to monitor trade union activities. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the progress made in this respect.

The Committee raises other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will do its utmost to take the necessary measures in the near future.

Lesotho

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the Government's report in which it expresses its commitment to overcome several of the persistent difficulties identified in the Committee's previous comments. In this regard, the Committee notes with interest the fact that one of the envisaged outcomes of the Lesotho Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP) for 2012–17, is to promote and enhance the effectiveness of the labour administration and labour inspection systems, notably by setting up a national tripartite mechanism on labour inspection, implementing an information management system and promoting staff training.

Article 3(1) and (2) of the Convention. Performance of the primary duties of labour inspectors. In reply to the Committee's previous comments, the Government specifies that labour inspectors have always had and still carry out routine inspections along with inspections arising out of complaints. It adds however, that as an inherent and historical function of the inspectorate, labour inspectors still attend to labour disputes reported within various district labour offices by the public. In this regard, the Committee would like to emphasize once again, with reference to paragraph 72 of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, that the time and energy that labour inspectors spend on seeking solutions to collective labour disputes, especially in a situation where resources are scarce, are often at the expense of the performance of their primary duties, as defined in Article 3(1) of the Convention. The Committee noted in its previous comments that inspectors' duties in the area of dispute settlement continued as long as the Directorate of Dispute Prevention and Resolution was not yet operational. The Committee reiterates its request to the Government for measures to be taken so that labour inspectors quickly resume their primary duties as defined in Article 3(1) of the Convention to enable them to carry out inspections in the highest possible number of industrial and commercial workplaces liable to inspection, and to relieve labour inspectors from conciliation duties which normally pertain to the Directorate of Dispute Prevention and Resolution.

Article 5(b). Collaboration with workers' and employers' organizations. According to the Government's report, it is envisaged to strengthen collaboration with workers' (through the reporting of violations) and employers' organizations (through the encouragement of their members to respect legislation). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on steps taken or envisaged in this regard and on their impact.

Article 7(3). Training of labour inspectors. The Government reports that it has undertaken to professionalize its inspectorate and, to this end, it intends to approach the ILO Decent Work Team in Pretoria to assist in structuring a course for the inspectorate to be offered by the National University of Lesotho. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on progress made in the introduction of the training course as well as on its content, duration, attendance and impact on the effective discharge of the duties of labour inspectors, including the enforcement of legal provisions concerning conditions of work and the protection of workers, the provision of technical advice and information on the most effective means of complying with these provisions and the identification of any legislative gaps relating to protection at work.

Articles 6, 7, 10 and 11. Status, recruitment procedure and number of labour inspectors and material means placed at their disposal. The Committee notes that the Ministry of Labour intends to approach the Ministry of Public Service with a view to improving the employment conditions of the labour inspectorate. The Government refers to the filling of the long-standing vacancy of the position of inspection manager in May 2011 and to improvements in the transport facilities at the disposal of the labour inspectorate (six motorcycles which labour inspectors should be able to use after they have been provided with protective clothing). It adds that while it is committed to ensuring the necessary resources for the labour inspectorate to provide its functions efficiently, the improvements envisaged may not be realized in the near future due to financial constraints.

The Committee recalls its previous comments on the shortage of labour inspectors and the fact that they are not recruited based on a personal interest in carrying out labour inspection duties, but under a system of compulsory placement, which according to the Government has an adverse effect on their motivation. Furthermore, the lack of any specific training after they take up their duties, their very low remuneration and the shortage of office equipment and transport facilities means that inspectors lack the enthusiasm that is essential to the performance of inspection duties and are less likely to remain in their posts, the most experienced among them moving on in search of better career prospects. The Committee once again strongly encourages the Government to take concrete measures, including in the context of the 2012–17 DWCP, in order to identify the financial resources necessary to meet the most urgent priorities for the improved functioning of the labour inspection system. In particular, the Committee reiterates its request for the Government to take all necessary measures so as to ensure the full application in both law and practice of Article 6 concerning the status and conditions of service of inspection staff and Article 7 concerning the criteria and methods for selecting candidates for the profession as well as the training of inspection staff. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any concrete steps taken in this regard and once again reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

Articles 5(a), 17 and 18. Effective enforcement of sufficiently dissuasive penalties and cooperation with the justice system. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the amendment of the provisions establishing penalties for the violation of labour legislation constitutes an essential part of the revised draft Labour Code, which is currently being examined by the Parliamentary Council prior to its submission to Parliament. Moreover, the filling of the long-standing vacancy of the position of inspection manager, who is competent to refer matters for prosecution, should contribute towards improving the number of administrative or penal actions taken in response to the violations observed by labour inspectors. The Committee recalls that these measures constitute a follow-up to recommendations made in 2005 by the ILO in the framework of an assessment aimed at improving the operation of the labour inspectorate. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on progress made in relation to the amendment of the provisions establishing sufficiently dissuasive penalties for the violation of labour legislation and the increase in the number of administrative or penal actions taken in response to the violations observed by labour inspectors.

Articles 20 and 21. Annual labour inspection report. According to the Government's report, the Ministry of Labour is in touch with the ILO Decent Work Team in Pretoria in order to seek assistance for the revamping of the computer system of the labour inspectorate which, as the Committee has previously noted, is an essential step for the elaboration, publication and communication to the ILO of an annual labour inspection report. The Committee once again requests the Government to take concrete measures to create a computerized labour inspectorate so that the central inspection authority is able, in accordance with Article 20, to publish and transmit to the ILO an annual inspection report gradually containing all the information required in paragraphs (a) to (g) of Article 21.

The Committee hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to report to the Office on concrete progress made on all the subjects raised above.

Madagascar

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee notes the comments of the General Confederation of Workers' Unions of Madagascar (CGSTM) dated 26 August 2011.

Articles 6, 7 and 11 of the Convention. Status, conditions of service and work of labour inspectors. Means at the disposal of the labour inspectorate. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed its concern at the situation described not only by the Government but also by the Autonomous Trade Union of Labour Inspectors (SAIT) with respect to the severe lack of material means available to the labour inspectorate in relation to the numerous and complex duties that inspectors are required to carry out. This situation seemed to be exacerbated by a clear lack of consideration on the part of the authorities towards labour inspection staff, resulting in a weakening of the public institution to which they belonged, the role of which was to enforce the labour legislation. Inspectors were therefore discredited in the eyes of the social partners due not only to the severe lack of means available to them, but also, and above all, to their precarious status compared to the status of other public servants with similar qualifications and responsibilities. The Committee also noted that the rare information provided by the Government concerning the operation of the labour inspectorate in practice indicated a clear lack of understanding of the value and socio-economic role of this public institution. Recalling that the independence of labour inspectors from any change of government and from any undue external influence is one of the key principles laid down in the Conventions concerning labour inspections, the Committee noted that the documents provided by the SAIT concerning the dismissal and transfer of labour inspectors to very remote locations in December 2009, which took place in the month following their participation in industrial action, seemed to confirm the SAIT's opinion that these measures were designed to punish trade union membership or activity.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report merely states that, due to the increase in the number of inspectors who have graduated recently, redeployment measures were taken at the level of the ministry, accompanied by a decision to assign inspectors to the regions, without any consideration of their trade union membership. However, according to the Government, the assignments were suspended because of political instability. The Government adds that the draft Decree concerning the special regulations for senior labour inspectors has yet to be finally adopted and enacted by the competent authorities on account of the present crisis. The Committee notes that, without this Decree, the labour inspectors are at present in a legal vacuum as regards their specific status (given that Decree No. 61-226 establishing a body of labour and social inspectors and establishing the specific status of this body seems to have been repealed by Act No. 2003-11 on the general regulations for civil servants). The Committee recalls that the Higher Council of the Public Service had already approved this draft Decree in 2007 with a view to improving inspectors' working conditions which, according to the SAIT, are far inferior to those of other bodies of civil servants with comparable qualifications and similar functions, such as civil administrators, tax inspectors, etc., thereby constituting an unjustified discrimination. The Committee notes finally that, in its recent comments, the CGSTM confirms that the number of labour inspectors and means at their disposal are inadequate to ensure an efficient job of labour administration and inspection, which might even, in some cases, lead to some inspectors being influenced by employers.

In paragraphs 218 and 219 of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, the Committee referred to situations in which labour inspectors' conditions of service were very precarious, and in which mistrustful attitudes as to their integrity, rather than any concern to keep them in the service, appeared to underlie their career management, with labour inspectors being transferred without any consideration for the negative effects on their family and social life. The Committee emphasizes that the competent authority at national level should strive to ensure that labour inspectors are treated with the respect to which their everyday responsibilities entitle them to and with due regard to the social importance of their duties, namely the continued improvement of conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work and, by the same token, as is now widely recognized, the improvement of the economic performance of the enterprise (2010 general observation). They should legitimately be able to expect career prospects that value their seniority, enthusiasm and commitment, and any unprofessional conduct on their part should be penalized, depending on its severity, in accordance with formal procedures which protect them from arbitrary decisions. As the Committee emphasized in its 2006 General Survey (paragraphs 202 and 204), inspectors cannot act in full independence, as required by their functions, if their service or their career prospects depend on political considerations. It is vital that inspectors' levels of remuneration and career prospects, as well as the material resources and training put at their disposal, be such that high-quality staff are attracted, retained, and protected from any improper influence.

The Committee once again firmly hopes that the Government will undertake an in-depth examination of the transfers reported by the trade union SAIT. It asks the Government to keep the Office informed of the measures taken in this respect and to indicate whether the Government intends reviewing the decisions to transfer officials in question, which have been suspended for the time being.

The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the draft Decree on the status of labour inspectors be adopted and enacted as soon as possible and to keep the Office informed of any progress in this respect.

The Committee strongly encourages the Government to request technical assistance from the Office with a view to restoring the normal functioning of the labour inspection system and identifying donors for this purpose.

Articles 19, 20 and 21. Reporting obligations. Coordination of the submission of periodical reports by a central authority. The Committee notes with regret that the Office has not received a consolidated annual inspection report since 1995, as the statistics contained in the Government's report only cover the region of Analamanga. The CGSTM also referred to this reporting failure in its comments. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that there are apparent difficulties in the collection and delivering of data from other regions. Referring to its 2010 general observation, the Committee recalls the importance of collecting and publishing information on labour inspection activities in an annual report, to be able to assess the functioning of the labour inspection system, the identification of priorities and the formulation of appropriate budget estimates based on consultation with the social partners. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of a periodical report of the local inspection offices (Article 19) and to indicate the way in which these reports are compiled and submitted to the central authority, with a view to identifying any possible shortcomings in the system of drafting an annual report, in accordance with Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request that it is addressing directly to the Government.

Malawi

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains vague information on the application of the Convention. The report indicates in particular that a total of 1,169 labour inspections have been carried out and 1,413 visits have also been made to various workplaces. It is also indicated that approximately 40 inspectors and 46 assistant labour inspectors are distributed in every one of the 28 districts of Malawi. While taking due note of this information, the Committee notes that the Government does not reply to the Committee's previous comments. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 4(1) of the Convention. Need to re-establish a central authority entrusted with control and supervisory powers in the labour inspection system. According to the Government's vague indications in reply to the observation made by the Committee on the basis of the recommendations of an ILO technical mission which visited the country in May 2006: (1) the labour inspection system is in the process of being developed in consultation with social partners; (2) the Ministry has already started putting in place measures to come up with a labour inspection policy and set guidelines, and a meeting was held in 2009 to kick-start the process; (3) the Ministry has placed emphasis on the planning of inspections, and sweeping inspections have been carried out in the major cities, while some joint inspections with labour inspectors and safety and health inspectors have been undertaken, for example in the northern region of the country; (4) the functional review of the Ministry, under which the Inspection Services Unit is to be strengthened to enable it to set annual targets and conduct inspections in the field, is awaiting approval; and (5) the Ministry has undertaken supervisory visits to field offices and organized some training for inspectors, including those responsible for occupational safety and health with a view to developing an integrated inspection system.

In addition, the Committee notes from the Government's report under the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), that the budgeting and funding of labour inspection is decentralized in such a manner that each office is allocated funds directly by Treasury according to the latter's priorities. Consequently, offices with motorcycles or motor vehicles cover fuel and maintenance, while the Ministry only receives reports on the activities performed. Based on this information, the Committee observes that the very notion of a central labour inspection authority seems to have become devoid of all substance, as the Ministry's only residual role consists of receiving activity reports from labour inspection offices, without any power to determine the needs of the labour inspection services in terms of financial and material resources with a view to their proper operation. The objective of the ILO technical mission was to help the Government to anticipate the effects of globalization on working conditions and workers' rights, to secure the commitment of the social partners to the principle that an effective labour inspection service allows the twofold interests of social protection and improved productivity, and to raise the Government's awareness of the importance of the tripartite dimension of labour administration. Although it made no reference to a decentralized labour inspection system, the mission emphasized, on the contrary, that there were no inherent or structural barriers for the operation of an effective and efficient labour inspection service; and that there was considerable room for improvement, in particular in policy, planning, management procedures, communications, equipment and training, and that this could be done by rationalizing, streamlining and consolidating the inspection functions of the Labour Directorate in the field structure. The decentralized operation of the labour inspection system, as described by the Government in the report on the application of Convention No. 129, is not such as to meet the economic and social objectives of the labour inspection Conventions. The obligations deriving from the ratifications of a Convention in any event remain the responsibility of the State. Consequently, the Government is bound, among other obligations, to: (i) observe the principle of placing the labour inspection system under a central authority, pursuant to Article 1; (ii) ensure that the number of labour inspectors is determined on the basis of the criteria listed in Article 10; and (iii) make the necessary arrangements to equip labour inspectors with the material means and transport facilities, and to reimburse any travelling and incidental expenses necessary for the performance of their duties (Article 11). The Government is also bound under the Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150), which has also been ratified by Malawi, to ensure that the staff of the labour administration system have the status, the material means and the financial resources necessary for the effective performance of their duties. Consequently, the allocation to labour inspectorates of material means and financial resources should be left to the discretion of the decentralized authorities, but should be determined by the Government at the central level in accordance with the priorities of labour inspection and national economic and financial possibilities. Only if the central labour inspection authority is entrusted with the powers laid down in the Convention can the Government's commitments, as reaffirmed in its report, be fulfilled and an annual report on labour inspection activities, as provided for in Articles 20 and 21, be published and serve as a basis for the assessment by the central authority of the respective needs and priorities. The technical assistance mission recommended the strengthening of the Office of the Chief Labour Officer in order to allow it to play a more important role in the setting of annual targets, the monitoring of performance by both the field and headquarters and the evaluation of the quality of inspections themselves. It added that more work is required in Malawi if the goals of decent work are to be achieved and expressed the view that as the country has embarked on a process of attracting foreign investment in agriculture and manufacturing, especially textiles, there is a need to strengthen institutions that will promote a good and fair labour market.

The Committee urges the Government, to provide details of the measures announced in its report as a follow-up to the recommendations of the ILO technical mission and to provide copies of all relevant texts or documents. It also urges it to adopt all the necessary measures to secure an inspection system operating under the supervision and control of a central authority (Article 4) that is provided with adequate human resources in terms of both numbers and skills (Articles 6, 7 and 10) and the material conditions necessary for the exercise of its functions in relation to labour inspections (Article 11), and to keep the ILO informed of any developments in law and in practice in this respect.

Articles 20 and 21. Annual report on labour inspection activities. The Committee notes with concern that the statistics of inspections covering all the sectors of the economy, as published in the Labour Statistics Yearbook, show a significant decrease from 3,043 in 2006 to 1,088 in 2007. Recalling that an annual report on labour inspection activities, which has to be published and communicated to the ILO in accordance with Article 20, shall contain information on each of the topics listed in Article 21, the Committee observes that the above statistics do not allow any appraisal of the effect of this decrease in inspections on compliance with the legislation covered by this Convention. It draws the Government's attention to Paragraph 9 of the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), which provides guidance on the manner in which such information could be presented. The Committee therefore asks the Government to provide the available statistics on the types of industrial and commercial workplaces and indications of the legal areas targeted by inspections and the results achieved during the period covered by the next report. It also asks the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure the publication of an annual report, as provided for in Articles 20 and 21.

Labour inspection activities targeting child labour. According to the Government's report, 3,000 children were removed from employment in the framework of the ILO-IPEC programme, instead of the target of 1,500. Noting that the project mostly targets child labour in agriculture, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide the ILO with the latest statistics on labour inspection activities pertaining to child labour, specifically in industrial and commercial workplaces, and the action taken as a result.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee draws the Government's attention to its observation under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and asks it to provide the ILO with information relating to the points raised as far as they also concern the present Convention.

Article 7 of the Convention. Need to re-establish a central authority entrusted with control and supervisory powers over the labour inspection system in agriculture. With reference in particular to the indication by the Government that the budgeting and funding of labour inspection is decentralized in such manner that officers with motorcycles or motor vehicles take care of the fuel and maintenance, and the Ministry only receives reports on the activities performed, the Committee would like to emphasize the overall crucial importance for labour inspectors to have at their disposal appropriate transport facilities to be in a position to perform their duties in most undertakings liable to labour inspection. Taking into consideration that agriculture is the major economic sector of the country, the Committee notes with concern, according to the description by the Government of the way that decentralization operates, that it is not the obligation of the Government to provide for appropriate conditions of work for labour inspectors in agriculture, as this is left to the discretion of each district authority. As emphasized in the observation under Convention No. 81, the allocation to the labour inspectorates of material means and financial resources should not be determined by decentralized labour administration authorities, but by taking into account nationwide labour inspection priorities and national economic and financial possibilities. Only if the central labour inspection authority is entrusted with the powers laid down in the Convention can the Government fulfil its commitments, including the obligation to ensure the publication of an annual inspection report containing the information required by Article 27 in order to give the central authority the necessary basis for the identification of the priority actions to be undertaken. The Committee also draws the Government's attention to the specific recommendation made by the ILO technical assistance mission which visited the country in 2006 concerning the need to strengthen the labour inspection system in agricultural undertakings with a view to securing decent work in the most attractive sector in the country for foreign investments.

The Committee is bound to urge the Government, in the light of the above: to provide details of the progress achieved in the implementation of the measures announced in its report to follow up the recommendations of the ILO technical mission, in so far as they relate to labour inspection in agriculture; to provide copies of all relevant texts or documents and to adopt all measures that are essential to secure a labour inspection system in agriculture under the supervision and control of the central authority that is provided with human resources and material conditions of work adapted to the specific needs of the agricultural sector (Articles 8, 9, 14 and 15); and to keep the ILO informed of any developments in this regard. It also urges the Government to send a copy of any relevant legal texts and documents.

The Committee notes with concern that the statistics of inspection visits covering all sectors of the economy published in the Labour Statistics Yearbook show a significant decrease (from 3,043 in 2006 to 1,088 in 2007). The Committee recalls in this respect the requirements for the publication and communication to the ILO of an annual report on labour inspection activities, as provided for in Article 26, containing information on each of the topics listed in Article 27 relating to labour inspection in agricultural undertakings. The Committee observes that the above statistics do not allow any appraisal of the extent to which the decrease in inspection visits affects the application of the Convention. The Committee therefore asks the Government to provide any available statistics on the types of agricultural undertakings and legal areas targeted by the inspections and the results achieved during the period covered by the next report.

Labour inspection activities targeting child labour. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, instead of the target of 1,500, a total of 3,000 children were removed from employment in the framework of the ILO-IPEC programme. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate the role played by labour inspectors in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Malaysia

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1963)

Articles 3(2) and 5(a) of the Convention. Duties entrusted to labour inspectors in relation to the enforcement of immigration law. The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that there are no separate data available on labour inspection activities relating to migrant workers and that, contrary to the Government's indications in its last report, any collaboration between the labour inspectorate and the Department of Immigration, the Department of Police or other relevant departments is not intended to enforce immigration law. Each department addresses its own issues which are under its jurisdiction and based on the legislations that it is responsible for enforcing. However, the Committee notes from the information contained in the annual reports of the Labour Department for Sabah, the Labour Department for Sarawak and the Labour Department for Peninsular Malaysia that, since the 2010 amendments to the Anti-Trafficking People and Smuggling of Migrants Act 2007, labour officers have assumed enforcement functions in this area.

The Committee observes that through the 2010 amendments, the title of the Act has been amended to "the Anti-Trafficking in Persons and Anti-Smuggling of Migrants Act," and under section 27(1)(e) of the Act, all labour officers (including labour inspectors) are included among the enforcement officers for the purpose of the Act along with police officers, immigration officers, customs officers and the Malaysian Maritime Enforcement Agency Officers. A new section (Part IIIA) has been inserted specifically relating to the offense of smuggling of migrants and a distinction introduced between trafficked persons and "illegal migrants" who, according to the explanatory statement attached to the bill, "normally seek and finance the illegal migration themselves and the only danger of exploitation faced is cruel or inhuman or degrading treatment of being endangered in the course of their journey". Indeed, while the Act still provides immunity to trafficking victims for immigration offences such as illegal entry, unlawful presence and possession of false travel documents (section 25) and entitles trafficked persons to victim care, section 51(1)(a) of the Act entrusts enforcement officers, including labour inspectors, with investigating into the circumstances of each case for the purpose of reporting to a magistrate as to whether a person is a trafficked person entitled to protection or otherwise qualifies as an "illegal migrant" who is excluded from the protection of the Act. Furthermore, in the case where victims are identified as trafficked persons by enforcement officers, section 51(3) provides that if the magistrate is satisfied that the person is a trafficked person who is a foreign national, he/she may order that such trafficked person be placed in a place of refuge for a period not exceeding three months and thereafter to release him to an immigration officer for necessary action in accordance with the provisions of the Immigration Act 1959/63. In case the magistrate finds that the person is not a trafficked person and is a foreign national, he/she may order that person to be released to an immigration officer for necessary action in accordance with the provisions of the Immigration Act 1959/63. Section 51(5) provides that an extension of the protection order may be granted only for the purpose of completing the recording of evidence by the trafficked person.

In relation to the scope of the Convention with regard to victims of trafficking or workers who have been smuggled into the country at their own will, the Committee would like to refer to paragraphs 76–78 of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, in which it emphasized, in relation to the assignment to labour inspectors of the task of supervising the legality of employment and prosecuting violations, including migrant workers in an irregular situation, that the primary duty of labour inspectors is to secure the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers and not to enforce immigration law, and that the Convention does not contain any provision suggesting that any worker be excluded from the protection afforded on account of their irregular employment status. Given the potentially large proportion of inspection activities devoted to verifying legality of immigration status, the Committee has emphasized that additional duties that are not aimed at securing the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers should be assigned to labour inspectors only in so far as they do not interfere with their primary duties and do not prejudice in any way the authority and impartiality which are necessary to inspectors in their relations with employers and workers.

The Committee also wishes to emphasize that entrusting labour inspectors with the function of enforcing the Anti-Trafficking People and Smuggling of Migrants Act 2007, as amended, may not be conducive to the relationship of trust needed to create the climate of confidence that is essential for enlisting the cooperation of employers and workers with labour inspectors, as the final outcome seems to be that irrespective of their status as victim of trafficking or smuggled worker, foreign workers may be doubly penalized by not only losing their jobs, but also facing expulsion. The Committee recalls that the function of verifying the legality of employment should have as its corollary the reinstatement of the statutory rights of all the workers if it is to be compatible with the objective of the Convention. This objective can only be met if the workers covered are convinced that the primary task of the inspectorate is to enforce the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers.

The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged, including the amendment of section 27(1) of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons and Anti-Smuggling of Migrants Act 2007, so as to ensure that the functions of enforcement officer in relation to trafficking in persons and smuggling of migrant workers are dissociated from those of inspecting the observance of workers' rights.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would describe the role of the labour inspectorate and the justice system in ensuring the application of sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against employers as well as the enforcement of employers' obligations with regard to the rights of foreign workers in an irregular situation, irrespective of whether they have been smuggled or trafficked, such as the payment of wages, social security and other benefits for the period of their effective employment relationship even where they are subject to expulsion or after they have been expelled. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the number of cases in which workers found to be in an irregular situation have been paid their due employment-related rights.

In cases where relevant provisions have not yet been adopted, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures for the introduction of swift and effective procedures enabling foreign workers to recover wages and benefits due and to keep the Office informed.

Noting that foreign workers found to be smuggled are not granted immunity for immigration offences such as illegal entry, unlawful presence and possession of false travel documents, the Committee requests the Government to specify any sanctions imposed for these violations and to communicate the relevant legal texts.

Please also specify the nature of the cooperation between labour inspectors and police, immigration and customs officers in the exercise of their respective areas of competence.

Articles 5(a), 20 and 21 of the Convention. Obligation to publish and communicate an annual report on the work of the labour inspectorate and the value of registers of workplaces in this regard. The Committee notes that an annual report of the work of the labour inspection services has not been received. It notes however, that some elements relating to the subjects covered in Article 21 (a)–(g) of the Convention are provided in the annual reports for 2010 of the Department of Occupational Safety and Health (DOSH) and the Labour Departments for Peninsular Malaysia, Sabah and Sarawak, which are available through the website of the Ministry of Labour (MOHR). However, this information is insufficient to allow for an informed appreciation of the application of the Convention in practice. The Committee would like to recall that these data must be published as an integral part of an annual report on the work of the labour inspection services (Article 20(1) of the Convention).

In this regard, the Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to its general observation of 2010, where it emphasized the benefits to be derived from drawing up and publishing an annual report on the work of the labour inspectorate. When well prepared, the annual report offers an indispensable basis for the evaluation of the results in practice of the activities of the labour inspection services and, subsequently, the determination of the means necessary to improve their services. In this context, it also recalled that the ILO supervisory bodies, including the Committee of Experts, based on all the information contained in the annual report, are able to provide support to governments in the most relevant manner possible in the implementation of the commitments deriving from the ratification of the Convention.

The Committee would also like to draw the Government's attention, once again, to its general observation of 2009, in which it emphasized the importance of establishing and updating a register of workplaces and enterprises liable to inspection and the number of workers employed therein, which would provide the central labour inspection authorities with the data that are essential to prepare the annual report. Having previously noted the establishment of an electronic database system for the recording of new workplaces and data on inspection activities at the Labour Department Sarawak, the Committee hopes that such registers will also be established at the DOSH and the Labour Departments Sabah and Peninsular Malaysia, in order to enable the Government to fulfil its reporting obligations under the abovementioned Articles.

The Committee once again requests the Government to take all necessary measures under Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention with a view to publishing and transmitting to the Office an annual report on the work of the inspection services under the control of the central labour inspection authority in its entirety, including on the work of the DOSH and the Labour Departments Sarawak and Sabah. Please provide information on any steps taken in this regard.

In particular, please provide information on the efforts made to establish or, where appropriate, to improve a register of workplaces liable to inspection, including inter-institutional cooperation between the labour inspection services and other government bodies and public or private institutions (tax services, social security bodies, technical supervisory services, local administrations, the judicial authorities, occupational organizations, etc.) in possession of relevant data (Article 5 of the Convention).

Mauritania

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes the communication made by the Government delegation within the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 101st Session of the International Labour Conference in June 2012, and the Government's report received at the Office on 12 September 2012. It also notes the observations from the General Confederation of Workers of Mauritania (CGTM) dated 30 August 2012.

Articles 3, 6, 10, 11, 14, 16, 20 and 21 of the Convention. Status, recruitment, training, powers, activities and material means of the labour inspectorate. Annual inspection report. The Committee notes with interest the information contained in the Government's report to the effect that 40 labour inspectors and labour controllers were recruited in 2009 and received a two-year period of training at the National School of Administration (ENA) before being subsequently appointed to the ten regional inspectorates in the country. In addition, about ten training workshops have been organized by the ILO since 2008 in the context of the ADMITRA and PAMODEC projects, in addition to the training given at the Tunis and CRADAT centres; the labour inspectorate has been equipped with a methodological guide which has enabled an increased number of inspections in the field; and a "toolkit" for labour inspectors has been devised by the Dakar office and will be distributed to inspectors in the course of this year. The Government also refers to improvements in the equipment of the regional labour inspectorates through a World Bank project (the PRECASP project) but does not state whether this equipment has already been distributed to the regional services.

However, the Committee notes with regret that once again no annual report has been received which would enable the Committee to evaluate the application of the Convention in practice, despite the undertaking made by the Government representative in the Committee on the Application of Standards to send to the ILO all annual reports of the labour inspectorate in addition to an evaluation of the impact of the strengthening of human and material resources on the application of the laws and regulations in Mauritania. It also notes with regret that the Government merely reiterates, for the third time, its intention to put a stop, in conjunction with the Ministry of Finance, to the unequal treatment received by labour inspectors, who have been the only public servants who have not received an allowance granted by a decree of 2007 to all other branches of the administration.

Despite the adoption in 2007, after several years of preparation, of special regulations for the labour administration establishing the status of labour inspectors and controllers, the Committee notes that, according to the CGTM, labour inspectorates do not have the independence necessary for the performance of their duties, since they depend on a Directorate of Labour which can "use" labour inspectors, transfer them or lay them off. According to the CGTM, no cases have ever been seen in which labour inspectorates of their own initiative, as provided for by law, have dealt with a violation, infringement or reprimand concerning an employer as part of establishing better labour relations within enterprises. The CGTM refers to cases of occupational disease such as silicosis, which, it claims, is taking a serious toll in the National Industrial and Mining Company (SNIM), and cyanide and lead poisoning which are allegedly decimating the workforce of the Mining and Copper Company (MCM), and also refers to apparatus used at the autonomous port of Nouakchott, which allegedly causes frequent fatalities among dockers. Moreover, according to the CGTM, labour inspection staff do not have satisfactory conditions of work, and even less motivation, to enable them to perform their duties. Rather, they are simply seeking a means of subsistence and are not feared by any employer. The CGTM notes the dire lack of financial and material resources necessary for the labour inspectorate to do its work effectively, to the extent that labour inspectors are obliged to make use of the services of private individuals for the drafting and printing of their reports, including infringement reports. Lastly, the CGTM emphasizes that the level of qualifications of inspectors is low owing to the fact that recruitment is carried out under conditions which lack transparency and impartiality.

The Committee requests the Government to send any comments which it considers appropriate in response to the observations from the CGTM. It also requests the Government to supply further details of the progress of the World Bank project for improving the equipment of the regional directorates, and on the impact of the methodological guide to inspections drawn up with ILO support, sending copies, where applicable, of any relevant documents or reports.

The Committee requests the Government once again to take steps as soon as possible to ensure that allowances are paid to labour inspectors that take account of the specific nature of their duties, and to keep the Office informed of any further developments in this respect.

Noting the Government's indication that a Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP) for Mauritania is due to be signed in the coming months, the Committee again requests the Government to make use of this programme to take all necessary steps to reinforce the labour inspectorate, with technical support from the ILO, with a view to establishing a labour inspection system that operates on the basis of the provisions of the Convention as regards scope (Articles 1 and 2); duties (Article 3); organization under the supervision of a central authority (Article 4); cooperation with other bodies and with employers and workers or their organizations (Article 5); status and conditions of service of labour inspectors (Article 6); requisite qualifications for recruitment and training (Article 7); criteria for determining the number of inspectors (Article 10); material and logistical resources needed for the performance of their duties (Article 11); inspectors' prerogatives (Article 12); their powers (Articles 13 and 17); and their obligations (Articles 15, 16 and 19); and also in terms of the central authority's obligation to publish and to communicate to the ILO an annual report on the work of the inspection services under its control (Article 21).

In order to establish a labour inspection system which meets the social and economic objectives pursued by the Convention, the Committee requests the Government also to ensure, as far as possible, the implementation of the measures described in the general observations made by the Committee in 2007 (on the need for effective cooperation between the labour inspectorate and judicial bodies), in 2009 (on the availability of statistics concerning industrial and commercial workplaces liable to labour inspection and the number of workers covered, as basic information for an evaluation of the application of the Convention in practice), and in 2010 (on the publication and content of an annual report on the operation of the labour inspection services).

Mauritius

Labour Statistics Convention, 1985 (No. 160) (ratification: 1994)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report, received in September 2012, in reply to the request made by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2012.

Article 3 of the Convention. Consultations with the representative employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee notes that in reply to its 2011 observation, the Government indicates that the last meeting by Statistics Mauritius (previously known as the Central Statistics Office) with employers' and workers' organizations was held in April 2010 in the context of an ILO expert mission. The Government further indicates that such meetings are organized on an ad hoc basis. However, Statistics Mauritius consults ministries and departments each year to assess their data needs and includes them in the form of additional questions in the Continuous Multi-Purpose Household Survey (CMPHS) questionnaire. Furthermore, no change has been brought to the design of concepts, definitions and methodology used for the collection, compilation and publication of the statistics covered by Articles 7–10 and 13–15 of the Convention. The Committee invites the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or envisaged in order to comply with the obligation to consult the social partners, in the event of designing or revising the concepts, definitions and methodology used in respect of the statistics required under this Convention (Articles 7–10 and 13–15).

Article 8. Statistics on the structure and distribution of the economically active population. The Government indicates that the 2011 methodological report on population census will become available by 2013 and that census results giving statistics on the structure and distribution of the economically active population will become available by December 2012. The Committee invites the Government to supply the abovementioned information once it becomes available.

Articles 9(2) and 10. Compilation of statistics on time rates of wages and normal hours of work, and statistics on wage structure and distribution. In its previous comment, the Committee had noted with satisfaction that the CMPHS had started to collect data disaggregated by sex. In addition, the Committee had also noted with satisfaction that statistics on the distribution of the employed population by hours of work, industry and occupation and on earnings by industry, occupation and sex had been published in June 2010. In its last report, the Government indicates that the average monthly income by industrial sector and occupational group based on the CMPHS data has been published in the annual Economic and Social Indicators on Labour Force, Employment and Unemployment for the year 2011, in May 2012. In addition, data on the distribution of employed population by hours of work, industry, occupation, as well as data on income from work by industrial sector and sex were also published in May 2012. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would continue to regularly provide information on these publications as well as the resulting statistics.

Article 14. Statistics on occupational injuries and diseases. In reply to the Committee's previous comments, the Government indicates that the implications and practical aspects of the introduction of measures to cover self-employed workers have to be carefully examined in consultation with all ministries and divisions, prior to being in a position to communicate its stand on the issue. The Committee welcomes the Government's request for technical assistance from the ILO on how best to implement the provisions of this Article. The Committee therefore hopes that ILO technical assistance on the matter will allow the Government to provide information relating to future developments with regard to the application of Article 14.

Article 15. Statistics on industrial disputes. The Government indicates that, following the coming into force of the Employment Relations Act (EReA) 2008, unless resolved voluntarily between parties or as a result of conciliatory services provided by the Ministry of Labour, Industrial Relations and Employment or the Ministry of Civil Service and Administrative Reforms, all labour disputes are reported to the Commission for Conciliation and Mediation. The Committee notes with interest that it is envisaged to consult the social partners at the level of the Labour Advisory Council with regard to compilation of the relevant statistics, given the new legal set-up in the EReA concerning dispute reporting and resolution. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report further definitions and methodology and relevant information on any further developments.

Article 16. Acceptance of obligations. The Committee takes note of the Government's reply. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would continue to indicate to the ILO, in accordance with Article 16(4), the position of its law and practice in relation to statistics on labour costs and any new development in this respect.

Mexico

Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150) (ratification: 1982)

The Committee notes the comments of 30 August 2011 from the National Union of Federal Roads and Bridges Access and Related Services (SNTCPF), and the Government's report received on 4 September 2012.

Follow-up to the recommendations of the tripartite committee (representation under article 24 of the ILO Constitution). The Committee refers to its comments on the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), and reminds the Government that, in the recommendations approved in March 2009 by the Governing Body regarding the representation made under article 24 of the ILO Constitution concerning an industrial accident that occurred in February 2006 in the Pasta de Conchos mine, the Government was invited, in consultation with the social partners, to continue to take the necessary measures, inter alia, to monitor closely the organization and effective operation of its system of labour inspection taking due account of the Labour Administration Recommendation, 1978 (No. 158), including its Paragraph 26(1) and to review the potential that the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), provides to support the measures the Government is taking in order to strengthen the application of its laws and regulations in the area of occupational safety and health in mines (document GB.304/14/8(Rev.), paragraph 99(6)(b)(iv) and (d)). The Committee draws the Government's attention to the following points in this connection.

Articles 4 and 5 of the Convention. Organization and effective operation of the labour inspection system as part of the system of labour administration. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to step up the coordination of the labour inspection system with the system of labour administration, of which it is a part. The Committee welcomes the information sent by the Government reporting the development of an electronic information system (SAPI) for the implementation, follow-up and supervision of inspection visits, which should facilitate the programming of inspections, the creation of indicators and the production of the reports and documents needed to carry out visits. It also notes with interest that an inter-institutional grouping, composed of the Ministry of the Economy, the Mexican Social Security Institute (IMSS), the Secretariat of Labour and Social Insurance (STPS), the Office of the Federal Prosecutor for the Protection of the Environment (PROFEPA) and the Office of the Federal Prosecutor for the Defence of Labour (PROFEDET) has been established with a view to exchanging data for the purpose of creating a single directory of mining enterprises, which will facilitate the supervision of safety and health conditions in mines. It also notes the information from the Government to the effect that in May 2012 there were 30,458 mining licences in operation, 2,436 of which were in the State of Coahuila. Of these, 970 were for coalmines. Of the 297 coal pits identified thanks to support from the Mexican Geological Service (GEOINFOMEX), 149 had been inspected at the beginning of September 2012.

The Committee notes in this connection that the SNTCPF draws attention to difficulties in identifying the responsible subcontracted mining enterprise. The SNTCPF also states that the 100 work centres that the Government said would be inspected include not even 50 per cent of the "pocitos" in operation. Furthermore, at the end of August 2012, only 10 per cent of the 100 "pocitos" were actually inspected, which shows the STPS' inability to enforce the obligations incumbent on employers. Consequently, according to the SNTCPF, between the 2010 Conference and September 2011, 33 miners died in industrial accidents.

The SNTCPF refers to a lack of inspection visits to supervise occupational safety and health and accident prevention, failure to apply the principle of reasonable diligence, a lack of human and material resources in the labour inspection services and failure on the part of employers to implement the measures prescribed by the labour inspectorate. The organization also points out the disparity of the criteria applied by labour inspectors in the course of their visits, and a tendency to negligence or bribery where enterprises are in breach of their obligations.

The SNTCPF also objects to the agreements concluded at the "coal summit", which was not attended by any union representatives or representatives of the victims' families. According to the trade union, the proposal the Government made at the summit to devote 50 million Mexican pesos to the purchase of occupational safety and health equipment for the mining enterprises in the region will not solve the problems given the serious hazards of mining in the "pocitos".

The SNTCPF also objects to the amendment, on 11 August 2011, of Official Mexican Standard NOM-032-STPS-2008 on safety in underground coalmines, which allows employers to call on the services of the "verification units". According to the organization, in some cases the units are economically reliant on the enterprise concerned, which bars them from being independent.

The SNTCPF also refers to recommendations 85/2010 and 12/2011 of the National Human Rights Commission, the aim of which is to improve the inspection system.

The Committee refers the Government to its comments under Convention No. 155 and would be grateful if the Government would send information on the impact of the initiative to strengthen the labour inspection system as part of the system of labour administration, inter alia, by establishing a directory of mining enterprises, including subcontracted enterprises, and the development of the SAPI, in particular in relation to the programming, the conduct of labour inspection visits and their follow-up in the mining sector. The Committee also asks the Government, in consultation with the social partners and the organization for the families of the deceased mine workers in the mine Pasta de Conchos, to continue to take measures to secure close supervision of the organization and effective operation of its labour inspection system as part of the system of labour administration, and to continue to provide information on the number of mines inspected.

Furthermore, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would state whether employers' and workers' organizations participate in the "verification units" established by Standard NOM-032-STPS-2008. It also asks the Government to send detailed information on the means available to the STPS to ensure that the "verification units" are operating in accordance with national laws and regulations and are adhering to the objectives assigned to them (Articles 2 and 9 of the Convention).

Articles 5 and 6. Consultations with the social partners. The Committee notes the information sent by the Government that the draft reform of the Federal Labour Act submitted in March 2010 provides for a significant increase in the amounts of fines and for the federal labour inspectorate to be empowered to close a workplace where it detects dangers and risks to the physical integrity of the workers. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would keep the ILO informed of any progress made in the adoption and implementation of this draft. It also asks the Government to indicate the most representative organizations of employers and workers that were consulted on the drafting of the reform of the Federal Labour Act and the amendment in 2011 of Standard NOM-032-STPS-2008.

Articles 5 and 8. Consultations with the social partners on the national policy concerning international labour affairs. The Committee previously urged the Government to examine, in consultation with the workers' and employers' organizations, the potential the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) would provide to support the measures the Government was adopting to improve application of the legislation on health and safety in mines. The Government indicates that, in accordance with article 19 of the ILO Constitution, the Convention was submitted to the competent authority in 1950 with a view to ratification, but the authority in question gave a negative opinion on the ground that the national laws and regulations were not consistent with Articles 3 and 6 of the Convention. The Government further states that, as it informed the ILO in 2008, 2009, 2010 and 2012, it does not envisage ratifying the Convention since the situation has not changed as far as the national legislation is concerned. The Committee notes that in its comments, the SNTCPF regrets that the Government has not taken a decision regarding the ratification of Convention No. 81.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate the most representative organizations of employers and workers that were consulted during the recent discussion of the possibility of ratifying Convention No. 81, and to provide detailed information on the results of the consultation.

Article 10 of the Convention and Paragraph 26(1) and (2)(a) and (b) of the Labour Administration Recommendation, 1978 (No. 158). Human resources and material means made available to the labour inspectorate as part of the labour administration system. Regional or local bodies, human resources and material means. The Committee notes with interest that a labour secretariat has been created in the State of Coahuila and that it went into operation in December 2011. It also notes that an agreement providing for specific safety and health measures has been concluded between the new secretariat and the government of the State of Coahuila. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on how the creation of the secretariat has affected the operation of the labour administration system, and particularly on the labour inspection system in connection with the application of the legislation on safety and health and the prevention of industrial accidents, particularly in underground coalmines and "pocitos". It also asks the Government to specify the objectives of the abovementioned agreement and its early effects in terms of attaining the objectives.

Increase in the number of inspectors' posts. The Committee also notes the information supplied by the Government that, thanks to the measures it has taken to increase the number of posts for federal inspectors and experts (personal dictaminador), the federal budget for 2012 authorized the creation of 400 new posts for federal inspectors. The number of labour inspectors, which stood at 376 in 2011, thus rose to 776 by early September 2012, and the Coahuila coalfield, which had ten inspectors in 2010, now has 25. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether these labour inspectors have already reported for duty, to specify the number of inspectors who perform safety and health supervisory duties, particularly in mines, and to provide details of the duties performed by experts (personal dictaminador), the number and geographical distribution of the experts and their areas of specialization.

Inspectors' training. The Committee also notes the information supplied by the Government on various training courses organized for labour inspectors which covered mining among other subjects. It further notes that 11 federal inspectors were certified by the STPS under the competency standard "Monitoring observance of occupational safety and health standards". The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide further details of this certification, describing how the certification and the courses available to labour inspectors affect their qualifications and skills, particularly in the area of safety and health in mines.

Material resources. The Government also mentions the material means made available to labour inspectors in the State of Coahuila (telephone hotline for complaints, production of a guide on evaluating the application of safety and health standards for small-scale coalmines, provision of laptops and cellphones for all labour inspectors, and access to a van). The Committee requests the Government to describe the material means, including means of transport and safety equipment, available to inspection staff for the performance of their duties, particularly in underground coalmines and "pocitos".

Part IV of the report form and Paragraphs 20 and 25(2) of Recommendation No. 158. The Committee observes that the Government has not sent the statistical data (annual report) requested on the inspection activities carried out in the mining sector, particularly in coalmines. It nonetheless notes the tables included in the report on Convention No. 155 giving statistics of “major accidents in the mining industry” that occurred between 16 February 2006 and 18 May 2012, and on occupational hazards broken down by economic activity for 2010. The Committee again asks the Government to provide copies of the periodical reports produced by the labour inspectorate as part of the labour administration system, containing statistical information on the inspection activities carried out in the mining sector, particularly in coalmines.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2014.]

Niger

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1979)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes that the Government’s report provides information on the provisions of the national legislation vis-à-vis the provisions of the Convention. It notes in particular that, under Article 11 of the Convention concerning working conditions as well as logistical and material resources of labour inspectors, the Government indicates that, in the event of labour inspectors incurring expenses as part of their displacement or the performance of their duties, the costs are reimbursed through the national budget. However, it states that some inspectors do not even have a vehicle to carry out visits and usually perform requisitions. In addition, under Part IV of the report form for the Convention, the Government states that the general difficulties related to the implementation of the Convention lie within the limited human, material and logistical resources available to labour inspectors and to the National Labour Directorate resulting in the impairment to effectively fulfil their mission.

In its previous comments, the Committee had referred on several occasions to the findings of the high-level investigation mission carried out by the Office from 10 to 20 January 2006 (in the context of controlling the implementation of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182)), which highlighted the fact that the Labour Inspectorate was “severely deprived of material and humane means necessary to accomplish its various missions”, and recommended an audit of that institution to determine the exact nature and extent of needs in this area and considered that, once that was done, the Government would work with support from the ILO and that of other UN agencies and interested donors in order to mobilize resources.

In its report received in 2009, the Government committed itself to trying to make every effort to ensure that the audit would take place as soon as possible and to inform the Office of any developments in this regard. The Committee notes that the Government has not taken the measures in question but that, in response to the observation of 2010 on the need for an audit, while referring to the poor conditions within the labour inspection services, it has formally requested support and assistance from the ILO in order to strengthen the operational capabilities of its inspection services and address particular mining prospects.

The Committee must draw the Government’s attention to the fact that the establishment of a labour inspection system meeting the socio-economic objectives covered by the Convention should take in due account the measures recommended by the Commission particularly in its General Survey of 2006 on labour inspection and in its general observations of 2007 (the need for effective cooperation between the labour inspection services and the judiciary), of 2009 (the availability of statistics on industrial and commercial establishments liable to labour inspection and the number of workers covered as baseline information for assessing the implementation of the Convention in practice) and of 2010 (the publication and content of an annual report on the functioning of the labour inspection). In the absence of basic information on the functioning of the labour inspection (statistics on labour inspection activities and their results, geographical distribution of industrial and commercial undertakings covered by the Convention and workers occupied therein), the Committee is not in a position to assess the effect given in practice to the Convention or to the relevant national legislation.

Consequently, the Committee hopes that the Government’s request for ILO support in order to establish, in law and in practice, a labour inspection system as prescribed by the Convention will be satisfied rapidly and requests the Government to take, in consultation with organizations of employers and workers and in cooperation with the ILO Office in the region, the necessary measures for this purpose. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of the progress achieved and any difficulties encountered.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Norway

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee notes the comments by the Confederation of Norwegian Business and Industry (NHO) of September 2011, received with the Government’s report on 18 April 2012.

Articles 6, 13 18 and 24 of the Convention. Labour inspection activities in agriculture. The Committee notes the comments made by the NHO indicating that the number of inspection visits in agriculture has increased following the declaration of a collective agreement in agriculture in 2010 as being generally applicable. It notes that the inspections were aimed at controlling wage levels to prevent “social dumping”. However, only a few breaches concerning wage conditions were detected, while some general injunctions in the area of occupational safety and health (OSH) were made. The Committee also notes the information provided by the NHO that, in 2009, the Norwegian Agricultural Employers Association started a pilot project entitled “The farmer as employer (of foreign workers)”, which ended in May 2011, although the intention is to follow it up. As Norwegian agriculture consists of many very small units and the farmers often have little experience of being employers, and consequently also have little knowledge of legal and contractual matters, the objective of the project was to make the farmers more aware of their responsibilities as employers and to increase their knowledge of legal and contractual matters. According to the NHO, this should lead to better working conditions in agriculture, including in the area of OSH. The Committee also notes the information provided on the website of the National Labour Inspectorate concerning the rights and duties of migrant workers, including the terms and conditions of employment, and pay and working hours in agriculture. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on the impact of the increased inspections and awareness-raising activities in collaboration with the social partners in the agricultural sector on conditions of work and the number of occupational accidents and diseases in this sector. In particular, the Committee asks the Government to provide statistics on the infringements registered, the sanctions imposed and the injunctions ordered by labour inspectors.

Articles 13 and 19. 1. Collaboration between the labour inspectorate and the social partners. The Committee takes note of the information provided by the NHO on the conclusion of a protocol by the social partners in agriculture for the conduct of an OSH campaign in agriculture, aimed at reducing the number of occupational accidents and diseases, to be implemented by the “OSH service for agriculture”. This project will be financed by the social partners in agriculture and by private actors. This project is also anchored in the “National Cooperation Forum for OSH in Agriculture” which is chaired by the Minister of Food and Agriculture. Furthermore, the Committee notes that the NHO refers to the plan to establish an OSH committee, which will be modelled on the committees already existing in forestry and fisheries, and which will begin working this year. The Committee invites the Government to provide detailed information on the above projects (activities carried out and impact of these activities on the conditions of work in agriculture and the number of occupational accidents and diseases in this sector, etc.), as well as on the contribution or participation of the labour inspectorate in this regard. Please also provide information on the mandate and composition of the “OSH service for agriculture” and the OSH committee.

2. Notification of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease. In relation to the progress made with the establishment of a special module for the recording of occupational accidents as part of the national database on accidents and injuries, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that the module is expected to be fully implemented in the near future. Furthermore, in relation to the progress made with the establishment of an electronic reporting system for occupational accidents and diseases known as “Health Net”, the Government refers to technical difficulties, but indicates that work is continuing for its establishment in collaboration with the Norwegian Medical Association and the Ministry of Health. Following up to its previous comments in this regard, the Committee also notes that the copy of the document on the mandatory quality management system, including occupational safety and health aspects, established by the Norwegian Agricultural Cooperation and client companies of agricultural undertakings, which the Government indicates as being attached to the report, has still not been provided. The Committee hopes that the Government will be able to inform the ILO in the near future of progress achieved in terms of the provision to the labour inspectorate of data on occupational accidents and diseases and its impact on activities for the prevention of occupational risks in workplaces and their results.

The Committee once again asks the Government to provide a copy of the document relating to the mandatory quality management system, including occupational health and safety aspects, established by the Norwegian Agricultural Cooperation and client companies of agricultural undertakings.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Pakistan

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1953)

The Committee notes the Government’s reply of 12 March 2012 in response to the comments provided by the Pakistan Workers Confederation (PWC), which were received on 21 November 2011.

Articles 1, 2, 3(1)–(2), 6, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 16, 17, 20 and 21 of the Convention. Implementation of a new labour inspection policy and revision of labour laws. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in response to the comments of the PWC on the implementation of a labour inspection policy, which had been developed in the 2006 and 2010 documents on labour inspection policy. In particular the 2006 document envisaged various measures, including the establishment of computerized registries, the implementation of the “one inspector, one enterprise” approach, capacity building for labour inspectors, the increase in preventive measures, the introduction of risk assessment and the recruitment of qualified technical experts. The Government indicates that, following a constitutional amendment, the subject of labour has been delegated to the provincial legislative powers. The Committee notes that the concurrent list of legislative powers in schedule IV of the Constitution, which had displayed labour as a concurrent subject, was declared void, along with the 18th Constitutional Amendment of 2010. The Government further notes in its report that the provinces are about to adopt labour legislation and are drafting new labour laws, in accordance with their own local requirements, including in the field of occupational safety and health (OSH) and the rationalization of their labour laws in the context of the ILO Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP). It adds that the provinces are consequently responsible for the adoption or implementation of all measures in connection with the 2006 and 2010 documents on labour inspection policy. Furthermore, under the terms of the 18th Constitutional Amendment, there will be a coordination mechanism at the federal level, replacing the national inspection authority that had previously been planned.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government could clarify the extent to which the provinces, following the Constitutional Amendments of 2010, are still subject to legally binding guidance given at the federal level in the field of labour, including on labour inspection, and the extent to which competence in the field of labour in this respect will remain at the federal level.

The Committee asks the Government to specify the implementation measures that have been taken at provincial level with regard to the subjects and points raised by the Committee previously in relation to the 2006 and 2010 labour inspection policy documents and if so to specify those measures.

It would be grateful if the Government could provide copies of any labour laws adopted in the provinces and indicate any other legal texts which, in accordance with Parts I and II of the report form, implement the provisions of the Convention at the provincial level. It finally requests the Government to provide information on the mandate and operation of the coordination mechanism at the federal level, and any institutional arrangements envisaged and/or created in this respect.

The Committee notes with interest the information provided by the Government in response to the longstanding concerns raised by the PWC in relation to the cession of labour law enforcement in the provinces of Punjab and Sindh. The PWC alleged that their labour inspection system became inoperative following the adoption of restrictive policies in these provinces, under which labour inspection visits required prior permission by the employer concerned, and that inspections had been abandoned in favour of an exclusively voluntary self-declaration mechanism. The All Pakistan Federation of United Trade Unions also drew attention in previous comments to the restricted inspection policy at the federal level, including the banning of inspection in industry by the previous Government, thus causing an increase in child labour.

The Government explained in its report that inspection had been banned in the industrial units of Punjab under the Punjab Industrial Policy 2003, which had introduced the procedure of self-declaration for employers. However, this procedure did not appear to be achieving the desired results, due to a lack of cooperation from employers. Finally, the Government transmitted to the Office a notification from the Punjabi Government and indicated that the Government of Punjab had withdrawn the Punjab Industrial Policy 2003, thus allowing regular inspections once again. The Government adds that the Government of Punjab organizes seminars, in collaboration with local chambers of commerce, to highlight the benefits of inspection under various labour laws.

The Committee asks the Government to clarify whether the restrictive policy banning labour inspections has also been abandoned in the province of Sindh and/or in other provinces, and if not, to indicate the measures taken at the competent level to bring the labour inspection policy into line with the requirements of the Convention so that labour inspectors can perform their duties in accordance with the provisions of the Convention.

Parts I and II of the report form. Implementation of the Convention at the provincial level. The Committee notes the brief description of the labour inspection system in the provinces of Punjab and Sindh provided in reply to its previous comments. It notes the division of competencies between labour inspectors and labour officers, which may vary according to the undertaking liable to inspection, and the indications concerning the hierarchy of labour inspection staff.

Noting that the Amendment to the Constitution may result in changes in the organization and legal framework applicable to the labour inspection system in the provinces, the Committee expresses its wish to receive more information, in accordance with Parts I and II of the report form, including, but not limited, to:

- the organizational structure (if possible with an organizational chart) and administrative arrangements; the central authority at the provincial level competent for labour inspection in each province;
- the legislative framework for labour inspection at the provincial level, including any laws on labour inspection, concerning the status, powers and obligations of labour inspectors in each province;
- statistics on the number of labour inspection staff per office in each province; and
- the material means available, such as office facilities, means of transport, for inspections and applicable reimbursement rules.

Articles 20 and 21. Publication of an annual inspection report. The Committee recalls its longstanding comments in which it emphasized the need to publish an annual inspection report. It recalls in this respect that the regular communication of the annual report to the Office enables the ILO supervisory bodies to assess the performance and difficulties that arise in establishing and implementing the labour inspection system, and to support the Government's efforts to meet the objectives laid down in the ILO's instruments. It also recalls that the annual report provides the social partners, and public and private bodies concerned, with the opportunity to better understand the work and objectives of the labour inspectorate, as well as the problems it faces, and to contribute their views on how it could be improved (General Survey on labour inspection, 2006, paragraphs 331 and 332). In its previous comments, it also requested information on the extent to which tools for the registration and processing of the relevant data (e.g. enterprise registries) were implemented. The Government indicates in this respect that the Chief Inspectors of Factories in the provinces maintain a register of enterprises, and that provincial Governments are advised to publish inspection reports annually. In addition, it provides statistics on factory inspection, the warnings issued and the number of prosecutions by district. The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that annual inspection reports are published by each province containing detailed and up-to-date information on the subjects covered by Article 21.

Panama

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1958)

The Committee notes the new comments made by the National Federation of Public Employees and Public Service Enterprise Workers (FENASEP) in a communication dated 24 August 2012. The Committee notes that these comments mainly concern the issues that were the subject of its previous observation. They also refer to the drop in the number of labour inspectors and the low pay they receive.

Noting that the Government has not replied to its previous observation, the Committee is bound to repeat it as follows:

The Committee notes the comments made by the National Federation of Public Employees and Public Service Enterprise Workers (FENASEP) on the application of the Convention, dated 25 August 2011, as well as the Government's reply dated 8 November 2011.

Articles 3(1), 6, 7, 10, 15(a), 16, 17 and 18 of the Convention. Comments of trade union organizations. According to the FENASEP, labour inspectors do not enjoy the stability or independence, which they should be assured of under the Convention in accordance with Article 6 of the Convention, as they are employees which are subject to free appointment and removal from office. The trade union indicates that, in view of their status, the Labour Ministry has dismissed more than 90 per cent of the labour inspectors appointed by the previous Government without providing any reasons, while the previous Government had in turn dismissed the labour inspectors appointed by the former Government. The FENASEP also alleges that the new labour inspectors were appointed on the basis of political affiliation and not for their competency or merit and that they do not have the required knowledge for the performance of their duties, but that they nevertheless receive higher wages than their predecessors. Furthermore, according to the FENASEP, labour inspectors do not receive adequate training and, although their number has been recently increased, they are not sufficient, in view of the number of complaints received and the number of enterprises registered. The trade union also reports the absence of manuals on inspection procedures and protocols and alleges that labour inspectors engage in practices that are not in line with ethical standards. In addition, the FENASEP indicates that higher authorities in the Ministry have the discretion to decide in each case on who will be inspected, warned or punished.

The Government, in reply to these allegations, indicates that the 134 inspectors currently working at the Ministry of Labour and Employment Development (MITRADEL) are all civil servants and that 25 per cent of them were appointed under past administrations. The grounds for termination of the staff is that 70 per cent of them did not meet expectations set for the performance of their functions, 5 per cent were dismissed for breach of internal rules or misconduct, whereas 20 per cent resigned and 5 per cent left office without justification. The Government adds that the selection of inspectors is carried out in conformity with the requirements prescribed in the handbook of procedures of the Ministry, denies that the new inspectors have higher wages than the previous ones and explains that the new appointments were made to fill vacant posts with the same wages. It also states that the Institutional Human Resources Office and the National Directorate of the Labour Inspectorate have carried out jointly national training days for their staff on topics such as drawing up of technical reports, the discharge of their duties, the organization of the public sector, alternative means of conflict resolution, reports intended for inspectors and security officers, among others. In addition, the National Directorate of the Labour Inspectorate received technical assistance from specialists of the Spanish Labour Ministry with the support of the Programme for the Strengthening of Labour Institutions (FOIL) and the Spanish Cooperation Agency. According to the Government, the National Directorate of the Labour Inspectorate developed, in coordination with the Institutional Planning Office of the MITRADEL, a handbook on procedures, which describes the functions of the departments of the labour inspection services and the different steps to be followed for routine and scheduled inspections. In addition, labour inspectors, prior to taking up their functions, receive training on questions relating to ethical conduct in the public sector and the sanctions applicable for serious misconduct.

The Committee recalls that, in conformity with Article 6 of the Convention, the inspection staff shall be composed of civil servants whose status and conditions of service are such that they are assured of stability of employment and are independent of changes of government and of improper external influences. It draws the Government's attention to paragraphs 202 to 204 of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, where it emphasized that labour inspectors cannot act in full independence, as required by their functions, if their service or their career prospects depend on political considerations and that it is vital that the levels of remuneration and career prospects of inspectors are such that high-quality staff are attracted, retained and protected from any improper influence. It has emphasized, that as public servants, labour inspectors are generally appointed on a permanent basis and can only be dismissed for serious professional misconduct, which should be defined in terms that are as precise as possible to avoid arbitrary or improper interpretations. Therefore, a decision to dismiss an inspector, like any other decision to apply a sanction with serious consequences, should be taken, or confirmed, by a body offering the necessary guarantees of independence or autonomy with respect to the hierarchical authority and in accordance with a procedure guaranteeing the right of defence and appeal.

The Committee further draws the Government's attention to the fact that, in conformity with the requirements of Article 7 of the Convention, labour inspectors should be recruited with sole regard to their qualifications and should be adequately trained for the performance of their duties and that Article 15(a) of the Convention provides that labour inspectors are prohibited from having any direct or indirect interest in the enterprises under their supervision.

The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide clarifications on the reasons for the removal of 70 per cent of the civil servants, who were considered not to meet the performance expectations, and those 5 per cent, who were dismissed for breach of internal rules or misconduct, and to indicate the relevant legal provisions, whether any appeals have been lodged in this framework and their outcome.

The Committee would also be grateful if the Government would provide clarifications on the possible reasons for the resignation or departure of 25 per cent of labour inspection staff as well as on the measures taken or envisaged to retain qualified and experienced staff, (improvement of career prospects and their wage scales, notably in relation to other comparable categories of public officials) and on the safeguards of independence of labour inspectors.

The Committee also requests the Government to transmit the Code of conduct to be observed by inspectors in the discharge of their functions and the texts applicable in the event of non-compliance with this Code, and to indicate the relevant sanctions.

The Committee would also be grateful if the Government would provide information on the conditions and procedures for the recruitment of labour inspectors as well as the measures taken or envisaged in order to ensure that they are adequately trained on a regular basis, both when they enter the service as well as in the course of their employment, to enable them to perform their duties effectively (Article 7).

The Committee further requests the Government to communicate the text of the handbook on procedures developed by the National Directorate of the Labour Inspectorate in coordination with the Institutional Planning Office of the MITRADEL as well as to provide data on inspections (routine inspections and inspections as a result of a complaint, frequency of inspections performed in the same undertaking, scope of inspections), the violations detected by inspectors (and the legal provisions to which they relate) and the sanctions imposed, as well as the number of workplaces liable to inspection and the number of workers employed therein.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the future.

Paraguay

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1967)

Articles 3(1), 5(a), 20 and 21 of the Convention. Failure to submit an annual report on the labour inspection activities. Absence of information on the establishment of a register of employment relationships. The Committee notes with regret that since the ratification of the Convention in 1967, the Government has never sent a complete annual labour inspection report to the Office as required by Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention. Moreover, the Government's latest report does not contain the information previously requested by the Committee on the implementation or impact of Decree No. 580/2008 which requires all employers to register employment relationships in the Unified System of Business Registration (SUAE), a database which is to be shared by several governmental institutions.

The Committee urges the Government to ensure that the necessary measures are taken by the labour inspection authority with a view to the preparation, publication and communication to the ILO of an annual labour inspection report under Article 20 of the Convention containing information on all the subjects covered by Article 21(a)–(g). In this regard, and with reference to its general observations of 2009 and 2010, the Committee once again asks the Government to provide information on the progress made in the implementation of Decree No. 580/08 and on the establishment of the SUAE, as well as the latter's impact on the activities of the labour inspection, in relation to ensuring the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work (Article 3(1)).

Regional cooperation and other efforts to enhance coordination and coherence. The Committee notes that the Government's report contains the text of an audit carried out in 2010 by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) on the role and sanctioning system of the public inspection services (hereinafter the "2010 audit"), which, while pointing to a number of problems in the labour inspection system relevant to the application of the Convention, also notes that joint inspection visits in border areas between Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay and Uruguay organized within the framework of the Common Market of the Southern Cone (MERCOSUR), have contributed to the implementation of unified criteria for inspection procedures in these countries. The Committee also notes that the Government has requested assistance in the framework of a partnership agreement between the ILO and the Government of Brazil for the promotion of South–South cooperation in Latin America, aimed at extending social security coverage in the country. In this context, it was envisaged inter alia to establish a forum of inspectors from the different inspection services for the coordination of their work (including through biannual meetings, but more importantly through internet and telephone contacts) and the design of model reports for easy reference on issues of interest to the respective governmental institutions. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide information on the impact of international cooperation within the framework of MERCOSUR in relation to the discharge of the labour inspectors' preventive and enforcement duties in the area of conditions of work and the protection of workers. Noting that the Government has requested technical assistance in the framework of the partnership agreement between the ILO and the Government of Brazil, the Committee invites the Government to take formal steps in this regard and to keep the Office informed.

Articles 6, 10 and 16. Number and conditions of service of labour inspectors and number of inspection visits. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the number of labour inspectors decreased from 34 in 2009 to 31 in 2011 and the number of inspection visits fell from 1,641 in 2009 to approximately 1,204 in 2010. Moreover, according to the Government, while the proportion of labour inspectors who are permanent officials has now increased from 85 to 93.5 per cent, their level of remuneration remains very close to the legal minimum wage. The Committee reiterates its request for the necessary measures to be taken so as to improve the conditions of service of labour inspectors and controllers (increased remuneration, or at least adaptation to the level of other inspectors discharging similar functions, and improved career prospects, including variations in remuneration based on education, training, merit or length of service). It requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or envisaged to increase the number of labour inspectors, with a view to ensuring that workplaces are inspected as often and as thoroughly as necessary.

Article 7(3). Training of labour inspectors. The Committee notes that the Government does not provide information on any measures taken to improve the initial and subsequent training of labour inspectors, as previously requested. It therefore once again requests the Government to take measures to improve the initial training provided to labour inspectors to enable them to carry out their duties as effectively as possible and to offer them subsequent training in the course of employment thereby updating their knowledge and skills and allowing them to adapt to technological or other developments in the world of work.

Furthermore, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the labour inspection manual produced in cooperation with the trade unions: the Paraguayan Central of Workers (CPT), the National Union of Workers (CNT) and the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT); and employers' organizations: the Industrial Union of Paraguay (UIP) and the Federation of Production, Industry and Commerce (FEPRINCO).

Article 11. Material and logistical means available to the labour inspectorate. The Committee notes that the Government reports some improvements in the material and logistical resources available to labour inspectors (purchase of seven computers and printers and installation of a telephone line). The Committee asks the Government to continue providing information on any measures taken to improve the material and logistical resources available to labour inspectors, which the Government describes as scarce.

Articles 12(1)(a) and (2)(c), and 15. Restrictions on the initiative of inspectors to enter freely workplaces liable to inspection. The Committee notes that Decision No. 1278 of September 2011, which is attached to the Government's report, still requires a formal authorization of inspection visits through an inspection order to be issued by the Deputy Minister of Labour and Social Security and the Director-General for Labour "where appropriate". It recalls that it has been raising this issue for a number of years in its comments under Articles 12 and 15. The Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures, including the amendment of Decision No. 1278 of September 2011, to ensure that inspectors are empowered both in law and in practice to enter freely at any hour of the day or night any workplace liable to inspection, as provided in Article 12(1)(a) of the Convention and that the requirement of prior authorization of inspection visits is brought to an end.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Poland

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1995)

The Committee notes the Government's detailed report received by the ILO on 28 August 2012, as well as the annual reports of the National Labour Inspectorate for 2009, 2010 and 2011. It also notes the Act on the effects of employing foreigners who are illegally resident in the territory of the Republic of Poland of 6 July 2012, attached to the Government's report. According to the Government, the Act implements Directive 2009/52/EC and provides for minimum standards on sanctions and measures against employers of illegally staying third-country nationals and introduces new Regulations that de facto serve to protect the rights of foreign nationals. The Committee will examine the Government's report as soon as a translation of this Act is available in one of the working languages of the ILO.

The Committee further notes the comments made by the independent and self-governing trade union "Solidarnosc" in a communication dated 30 August 2012 and received by the ILO on 3 September 2012. While awaiting the translation of the above Act, the Committee asks the Government to make any comments it deems appropriate in relation to the comments made by the "Solidarnosc".

Russian Federation

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1998)

Parts I and V of the report form. Legislation and general appreciation of the application of the Convention. The Committee notes that following a restructuring in 2004, the labour inspectorate has been operating within the Federal Service on Labour and Employment (Rostrud) established under the auspices of the Ministry of Health and Social Development. In reply to the Committee's previous requests, the Government indicates in its latest report, that Rostrud operates in the framework of the National Labour Code, the Code of Administrative Offenses, the Federal Law No. 134-Ø3 of 8 August 2001 on the protection of the rights of legal entities and individual entrepreneurs during inspections, Governmental Decree No. 324 of 30 June 2004 on the status of the Rostrud and Governmental Decree No. 156 of 6 April 2004 on the model regulations for territorial authorities of the Rostrud, approved by Ministerial Order No. 378n of July 2009, and the regulations for the territorial authorities of the Rostrud relating to state labour inspections in the constituent units of the Russian Federation. The Committee asks the Government to provide an organizational chart of the labour inspection system and, once again, to:

- (a) provide a copy of the above documents of a legislative, regulatory or administrative nature relating to the matters covered by the Convention (including a copy of the current version of Governmental Decree No. 324 on Rostrud, the model regulations for territorial authorities of the Rostrud, approved by Ministerial Order No. 378n of July 2009, the regulations for the territorial authorities of the Rostrud relating to state labour inspections in the constituent units of the Russian Federation and of any applicable texts setting out the functions of labour inspectors);

- (b) give a general appreciation of the manner in which the Convention is applied, including, for instance, extracts from official reports and information on any practical difficulties encountered in its application; and*
- (c) indicate whether employers' and/or workers' organizations have made any comments on the application of this Convention and, if so, transmit them to the ILO.*

Articles 2(1), 3(1), 16, 17 and 23 of the Convention. Labour inspection activities relating to the protection of workers. The Committee notes the reference in the Government's report to the cases of child labour detected, although it does not provide any statistics or information on the activities of the labour inspection services in this regard. The Committee also notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2758 (365th Report, November 2012) relating to the investigation of anti-union persecution by the competent authorities including the labour inspectorate, in the Russian Federation, as well as the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Rantsev v. Cyprus and Russia (Application No. 25965/04) on the obligation to prevent trafficking and protect victims, including the obligation to investigate situations of potential human trafficking. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to enforce the legal provisions pertaining to fundamental rights at work, including equality and non-discrimination, freedom of association, the eradication of forced labour practices and child labour, as well as the results achieved. Please also include relevant statistics in the annual report of the labour inspectorate.

Articles 3(1), 8, 10, 11 and 16. Number and functions of labour inspectors, material resources at their disposal, and impact of the labour inspection system. The Committee notes from the information provided in the activity report of the Rostrud for 2010 (available in Russian on its website www.rostrud.ru), that of the 3,666 people that worked within the services of the Rostrud as at 31 December 2010, 2,852 were officials authorized to carry out state supervision and control over observance of laws and regulations on labour, i.e. 1,251 labour inspectors in the area of labour legislation and 1,601 in the area of occupational safety and health (OSH). These labour inspectors carried out a total number of 183,435 inspections of which 89,000 related to OSH.

The Committee notes with interest that the Government's report refers to the positive impact of the work of the federal labour inspection service on the overall state of compliance with the requirements of labour law in workplaces. For instance, according to the Federal State Statistical Service (Rosstat), on 1 January 2011 the total outstanding wage arrears amounted to 2.4 billion roubles (RUB), a drop of RUB 827 million or 25.6 per cent, by comparison to 1 December 2010, and almost 33 per cent by comparison to the beginning of 2010. The Government emphasizes that this is the lowest recorded figure for wage arrears in the Russian Federation for the past ten years and adds that in 2010, employers had settled wage arrears owed to 632,000 workers, amounting to over RUB9 billion. Positive trends were also noted in the absolute numbers of serious accidents at work, including fatal accidents which decreased to a total of 10,295 in 2010 from 10,809 in 2009. The total number of fatalities fell by 2.5 per cent. Employers rescinded 1,543 unlawful dismissals and over 2,300 unlawfully imposed disciplinary sanctions. Over 2,000 sets of equipment were stopped and 170 workplaces were temporarily shutdown pending correction for defects posing a risk to workers' lives and health. The relative number of breaches of labour law identified by inspectors on average during a single inspection fell by 11.5 per cent in 2010 by comparison to 2009, which can be seen, according to the Government, as a positive sign of the effectiveness of the steps taken to prevent infringements of the law in the workplace.

The Committee also notes, however, that the number of labour inspectors appears to have decreased by 14 per cent since 2003, and by 31 per cent since 1995 while the total number of undertakings liable to inspection amounted to 8,171,000 in 2010, which means that the workplaces actually inspected were 2.4 per cent of the total. Moreover, the material resources (e.g. 324 cars) available for the 82 regional inspection offices throughout the country do not appear to be sufficient for the effective discharge of the functions of the labour inspection, especially in remote regions.

In the light of the important socio-economic role performed by labour inspection and the positive results produced during the reporting period, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide detailed information on any steps taken or envisaged in order to meet the needs of the labour inspection system in terms of human resources in the light of the number of workplaces liable to inspection and the number of workers employed therein and to provide further information on the category, geographical distribution, fields of specialization of labour inspectors in service. Finally, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the proportion of women in the labour inspection staff at all levels of responsibility and, where appropriate, the special tasks assigned to men and women inspectors, respectively.

The Committee also requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or envisaged in order to improve the material resources at the disposal of labour inspectors, in particular transport facilities to enable the effective inspection of remote workplaces. It also requests the Government once again, to communicate any legislative text concerning the reimbursement to labour inspectors of travel expenses incurred in the performance of their duties, as well as a copy of a reimbursement form and information on the average length of procedures for reimbursement.

Article 3(1)(b). Preventive activities by the labour inspection services. The Committee notes with interest the reference in the Government's report to various activities relating to the provision of information and advice on labour legislation and labour rights by the labour inspection services of the Rostrud throughout its territorial structure to citizens, employers and workers and their organizations, the public administration and the public at large. In this regard, the Government refers, for example, to the provision of advice through a dedicated hotline, the conduct of a very large number of symposia, periodic campaigns and awareness-raising activities on current issues through media and modern technologies and online conferences. It also notes that workers and employers may post questions and receive detailed answers on the website of the Rostrud. The Government is asked to provide details on the preventive activities carried out by the labour inspection services, especially vis-à-vis small and medium-sized enterprises, including information on the number of questions answered, the subjects covered and the impact of these activities on compliance with the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers.

Article 3(2). Additional functions entrusted to labour inspectors. The Committee notes that under the terms of Governmental Decree No. 324 of 30 June 2004 on the status of the Rostrud, the Rostrud is entrusted with multiple functions, among others, with the provision of services in the areas of employment promotion, protection from unemployment and "internal migration" as well as the settlement of collective labour disputes. The Committee refers to paragraph 69 of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection where it underlined that the primary duties of inspectors are complex and require time and resources; in this respect, Article 3(2) stipulates that any further duties which are entrusted to labour inspectors should not be such as to interfere with the effective discharge of their primary duties (enforcement and advice). The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide clarifications on the functions carried out by labour inspectors and, in particular, whether they are entrusted with additional tasks other than those relating to advisory and enforcement functions as provided for in Article 3(1)(a) and (b) of the Convention, such as for instance, "internal migration", protection from unemployment and the settlement of collective labour disputes. If that is the case, the Committee requests the Government to indicate any steps taken or envisaged to dissociate these functions from the primary duties of labour inspectors so that they can devote themselves more fully to securing the enforcement of legislation on conditions of work and the protection of workers.

Articles 5(a), 17 and 18. Cooperation with the justice system and enforcement of penalties for violation of legal provisions enforceable by labour inspectors. The Committee notes from the Government's report that a large number of cases submitted to the Public Prosecutor's Office by the labour inspection (14,700 in 2008 and 12,700 in 2010) related to sections 143, 145 and 145.1 of the national Labour Code concerning industrial accidents resulting from negligence of provisions on protective measures, non-payment of wages and other benefits, and dismissal of women protected by provisions on maternity. Nevertheless, the Committee notes a discrepancy between the cases reported, the criminal investigations initiated and the number of convictions pronounced. In 2008, for instance, 13,756 cases reported on investigations on industrial accidents resulted in 277 criminal investigations and the conviction of 50 persons; 924 cases on the non-payment of wages or other benefits resulted in 23 criminal investigations and the conviction of eight persons.

The Committee further notes in this regard that despite its repeated requests since 2004, the Government has still not sent a copy of any legal provisions adopted for the implementation of sections 362 (responsibility for infringements of the labour legislation), 363 (responsibility for obstructing the activities of state labour inspectors) and 419 (types of responsibility for infringement of the labour legislation) of the national Labour Code.

With reference to its general observation of 2007, where it emphasized the importance of effective cooperation with the justice system in order to achieve the effective enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers as required by Article 3(1)(a) of the Convention, the Committee asks the Government to describe the procedure to be followed by labour inspectors in the case of detected violations of labour legislation, particularly in relation to wage payment, OSH and non-discrimination and to indicate any steps taken or envisaged so as to enhance the cooperation between the labour inspection services and the judicial authorities. It also once again requests the Government to provide a copy of any relevant legislative texts in their current versions, including the previously requested texts adopted for the implementation of sections 362, 363 and 419, and to specify the sanctions applicable for violations of labour law provisions.

Article 12(1)(c)(i). Investigation powers. The Committee notes that the Government does not provide a reply to its previous comments on this question. In its previous report, the Government had indicated that, pursuant to section 357 of the Labour Code, labour inspectors have the right to interrogate, alone or in the presence of witnesses, the employer or his/her representative on any matter related to the labour inspector's visit and that according to section 229 of the Labour Code, staff may be interrogated only in case of the investigation of accidents at the workplace. The Committee once again notes that Article 12(1)(c)(i) of the Convention does not limit labour inspectors' right to interrogate staff in cases of accidents and that this right forms part of the labour inspectors broader power "to carry out any examination, test or inquiry which they may consider necessary in order to satisfy themselves that the legal provisions are being strictly observed". Consequently, the Committee requests the Government to take, in the near future, the necessary measures aimed at bringing the legislation into compliance with Article 12 and keep the ILO informed of progress achieved to this end.

Article 14. Notification of cases of occupational disease to the labour inspectorate. The Committee notes with interest that according to the Government's report, in 2010, 17,800 workplaces were inspected to ensure compliance with the established procedure for the reporting and investigation of industrial accidents, as a result of which over 37,000 breaches of procedure of various kinds were identified and 1,686 unreported accidents were discovered and properly investigated, including 55 collective incidents, 1,023 serious accidents and 326 fatal accidents.

The Committee also notes, however, that while the activity report of the Rostrud for 2010 contains statistics of industrial accidents, it does not seem to contain information on cases of occupational disease. The national Labour Code does not seem to contain any provision stipulating the need to notify cases of occupational disease to the labour inspection services (in its report of 2007, the Government referred to articles 228–230 of the national Labour Code, and indicated that there were accompanying documents and guidelines for the reporting and investigation of industrial accidents only). The Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to paragraph 118 of the 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, in which it emphasized the importance of establishing a systematic information mechanism to enable the labour inspectorate to have access to the data necessary to determine which activities present a risk and the categories of workers most at risk, and to investigate both the causes of occupational accidents and diseases in workplaces and enterprises under its control. In this regard, it also wishes to draw the Government's attention to the ILO code of practice on the recording and notification of occupational accidents and cases of occupational disease which offers guidance on the collection, recording and notification of reliable data and the effective use of such data for preventive action (available at www.ilo.org/safework/info/standards-and-instruments/codes/WCMS_107800/lang--en/index.htm). The Committee requests the Government to indicate the steps taken to ensure that national legislation provides for the conditions and the manner in which cases of occupational disease should be notified to the labour inspectorate. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on whether labour inspectors inform employers and workers about the importance of notifying industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease so as to encourage compliance with the relevant legal provisions in pursuance of Article 3(1)(b). In addition, the Committee draws the attention of the Government to Paragraphs 6 and 7 of the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81) on the collaboration of employers and workers in regard to health and safety.

Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention. Publication and communication to the ILO of the annual report on labour inspection activities. The Committee notes that the Government has again not communicated an annual report on the work of the labour inspection services. It notes however that the activity reports of the Rostrud, of which the Russian labour inspectorate is part, are regularly published online at www.rostrud.ru. Furthermore, the Committee notes that the Government, in the reports communicated in 2009–10, refers to laws and regulations relevant to the supervisory and inspection work of the Rostrud; and contains some information on the number of the staff of the labour inspection service; statistics of inspection visits; statistics of violations and penalties imposed, as well as statistics of industrial accidents. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate any steps taken or envisaged in order to publish a consolidated labour inspection report containing detailed information on all the items listed in Article 21(a)–(g) of the Convention, and ensure its regular transmission to the ILO, as required by Article 20(3) of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Rwanda

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1980)

Articles 1, 4, 6, 7, 10, 11, 16, 19, 20 and 21 of the Convention. Application of the Convention in the context of the decentralization of labour inspection. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed concerns in relation to the decentralization of the labour inspection system, as it appeared to be accompanied by a weakening of human and budgetary resources. The Committee noted that a decentralization of the labour inspection system may only be acceptable under Article 4 if the units at the decentralized level have the resources necessary for the implementation of the labour inspectorate functions within their jurisdiction (General Survey on labour inspection, 2006, paragraph 140). It emphasized that decentralization characterized by a general and chronic inadequacy of resources, bears the intrinsic risk of both the volume and quality of inspection, being negatively affected, in addition to the ability of inspectors to fulfil their reporting obligations to the central authority, as envisaged in Article 19, so as to allow for a general assessment of the labour inspection system through the establishment of annual reports pursuant to Articles 20 and 21. In particular, the budget allocation appears to be managed at the prefectural level, with the result that decisions on resource allocation at the decentralized level are taken by the local authority, which results in the absence of a single policy in labour inspection throughout the territory in terms of the planning of inspections and communication, recruitment and training, and the allocation of material resources, such as transport and office facilities. The management of resources at the local level in this manner appears to result in the recruitment of labour inspectors at the local level, and in inspectors being placed under the supervision of the prefect or the mayor at the district level, as indicated by the Government in its previous reports. The Committee noted previously that any instruction or policy of a technical nature by the Ministry of Labour with a view to ensuring a single policy throughout the provinces, is likely to remain a dead letter, as the budget allocated to labour inspection depends on the local prefect or mayor. It also noted that the provision of adequate budgetary resources is essential to ensure that labour inspection staff are independent from improper external influences, as required by Article 6.

In this context, the Committee notes the indications made by the Government in response to its comments that an adequate budget is allocated to labour inspectors in the districts, and that budget allocation is coordinated by the central authority in cooperation with local governments. The Government adds that district labour inspectors are required to report to the central authority, namely the Ministry in charge of labour, and that the latter assumes a technical coordination role, providing supervision on ethical questions, giving policy guidance and providing technical support. It also notes from the website of the Ministry of the Public Service and Labour a number of policy documents relating to the Public Administration Reform in Rwanda, such as the Policy Framework for Rwanda's Civil Service Reform.

The Committee requests the Government to provide more details on the criteria for budget allocation for labour inspection among local governments. It also asks the Government to clarify whether a particular budget line is dedicated to labour inspection only at the district and/or state level. It further asks the Government to specify the manner in which disagreements are resolved on the use of budgetary resources between local governments and the central authority in the field of labour inspection, and whether the central authority is vested with final powers of decision in such cases.

It asks the Government to provide any legal text which serves as a basis and which it deems useful in this regard in order to enlighten the Office on the nature of the cooperation described in budget allocation.

The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the resource situation within the labour inspection system, including the number of staff by district and at the central level, the means of transport and office space available for labour inspectors in each of the districts.

Finally the Committee asks the Government to keep the Office informed of any development in the public administration reform, and to describe its possible impact on the status and conditions of service of labour inspectors, and on the organization of the labour inspection system.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

San Marino

Labour Statistics Convention, 1985 (No. 160) (ratification: 1988)

The Committee notes that the Government provided its last report for the period ending in 2006. It hopes that a report will be supplied for examination by the Committee at its next session and that it will contain full information on the matters raised in its previous comments, which read as follows:

Part I of the report form. Legislation. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate any new legal provision relating to matters covered by the Convention and international standards used in designing or revising the concepts, definitions and methods used in the collection, compilation and publication of the statistics required thereby.

Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the application of the latest international standards and to specify, for each Article of the Convention for which the obligations were accepted (i.e. Articles 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14 and 15), which standards and guidelines are followed.

Article 7. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the concepts, definitions and methodology used to produce the official estimates of labour force, employment and unemployment in San Marino.

Article 8. The Committee invites the Government to provide methodological information on the concepts and definitions relating to the register-based labour force statistics in pursuance of Article 6 of this Convention be provided to the ILO.

Article 9(1). Noting that the annual statistics of average earnings and hours actually worked are not yet broken down by sex, the Committee asks the Government to take necessary steps to this end and to keep the ILO informed of any future developments in this field.

Article 9(2). The Committee asks the Government to ensure that statistics covered by these provisions are regularly transmitted to the ILO.

Article 10. The Committee asks the Government to take necessary steps to give effect to this provision and to keep the ILO informed of any developments in this field.

Article 11. The Committee notes that no information is available on the structure of compensation of employees by major components. It therefore asks the Government whether it is possible to compile such statistics for more than four groups in manufacturing, and to communicate these to the ILO as soon as practicable, in accordance with Article 5 of this Convention.

The Committee also asks the Government to indicate the measures taken to produce, publish and communicate to the ILO specific methodological information on the concepts, definitions and methods adopted to compile statistics of average compensation of employees in pursuance of Article 6.

Article 12. The Committee invites the Government to provide the methodological information on the new consumer price indices (CPI) (base December 2002=100) in pursuance of Article 6 of this Convention.

Article 13. The Committee notes that detailed statistics on household expenditures are regularly published by the Office of Economic Planning, Data Processing and Statistics in the annual publication, Survey on the consumption and the San Marino families life style. However, no information is available in this publication about the sources, concepts, definition and methodology used in collecting and compiling household income and expenditure statistics. The Committee invites the Government to:

- (i) indicate whether the representative organizations of employers and workers that were consulted when the concepts, definitions and methodology used were designed (in accordance with Article 3); and*
- (ii) communicate a detailed description of the sources, concepts, definition and methodology used in collecting and compiling household income and expenditure statistics as required under Article 6.*

Article 14. The Committee requests the Government to provide more comprehensive information about the statistical system, with particular reference to the concepts and definitions used for statistics on occupational injuries.

Article 15. As no data on strike and lockout (rates of days not worked, by economic activity) were provided, the Committee invites the Government to communicate data in accordance with Article 5 of this Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the future.

Sao Tome and Principe

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1982)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 14 of the Convention. Information on industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease. The Committee notes the Government's commitment, in response to its previous comments, to making every possible effort to ensure that the labour inspectorate is informed of industrial accidents and occupational diseases. It asks the Government to provide in its next report information on the procedures introduced and the specific measures taken to this effect.

Articles 19, 20 and 21. Inspection activity reports. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government has not provided any information on measures taken to ensure the publication and communication to the ILO of an annual report on the work of the labour inspectorate. It therefore asks the Government to take, in the very near future and with ILO technical assistance if necessary, measures to ensure that the central inspection authority fulfils its obligations under Articles 20 and 21, on the basis of regular inspection reports submitted to it, in accordance with Article 19, by the services under its control. The Committee asks the Government to keep the Office informed of any progress made in this respect and to provide in its next report any available information on inspection visits carried out during the period covered and on the results of these visits (including, in particular, details of the number and categories of inspected establishments, the contraventions reported, the measures prescribed, and the penalties imposed and effectively enforced).

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Solomon Islands

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1985)

The Committee notes the Government's report received by the Office on 30 September 2011, as well as the joint comments of the representative employers' and workers' organizations attached thereto (the Solomon Islands Chamber of Commerce and Industry (SICCI), the Solomon Islands Chinese Association (SICA), the Solomon Islands Indigenous Business Association (SIIBA), the Solomon Islands Women in Business Association (SIWIBA), the Association of Solomon Islands Manufacturers (ASIM), the Solomon Forestry Association (SFA), the Solomon Islands Council of Trade Unions (SICTU), the Solomon Islands Public Employees' Union (SIPEU), the Solomon Islands National Union of Workers (SINUW) and the Solomon Islands National Teachers' Association (SINTA)). According to the representative employers' and workers' organizations, there is a need for capacity building of the Labour Department and the social partners on the content and application of international labour standards. The Committee notes in this regard that the Government expressed its appreciation for the technical assistance provided by the Office for the preparation of article 22 reports and the facilitation of the discussion of the reports with the social partners. The Committee invites the Government to take formal steps so as to avail itself of further ILO technical assistance aimed at capacity building in the area of labour inspection and to keep the Office informed of developments in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Sri Lanka

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the observations made by the Lanka Jathika Estate Workers' Union (LJEWU) dated 8 November 2011, and received by the Office on 2 December 2011, in which the trade union recalls the points it previously raised, and invites the Government to reply to the relevant comments made by the Committee in its last observation.

Article 12(1)(a) of the Convention. Right of inspectors to freely enter any workplace liable to inspection. According to the observations made by the LJEWU, labour inspections in export processing zones (EPZs) are restricted and require prior approval due to unwritten and undeclared concessions granted to investors by the Government. The Committee recalls that it noted, in its previous observation, the Government's indications that labour inspectors have the right to freely enter workplaces in EPZs, without prior approval or notice to the Board of Investment. The Committee asks the Government to make any observations it deems appropriate in relation to the comments made by the LJEWU and to furnish relevant data, including on the number of announced and unannounced visits in EPZs and their results.

The Committee recalls that it requested the Government to report in 2013 on the issues raised in its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 3, 8, 10, 11, 16, 20 and 21 of the Convention. Functioning of the labour inspection system. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the impact of the restructuring of the labour inspection system on the effective discharge of the labour inspection functions has not been evaluated yet. Nevertheless, the Government provides information on the number of workplaces liable to inspection (a total of 86,619), including information on their distribution by economic sector, and the number of workers employed therein (a total of 345,730).

The Committee notes the Government's statement at the 100th Session of the International Labour Conference according to which further assistance is needed, particularly to help inspectors deal with the challenges of outsourcing, occupational safety and health (OSH), and working conditions in the informal economy. According to the Government, an intensive training programme for the numerous newly recruited labour inspectors is urgently needed. The Government also emphasized the need to use new technologies to assist labour inspection activities, especially in export processing zones (EPZs) (source: ILC 2011 Provisional Record No. 19, page 14). The Committee notes that ILO technical assistance is given in this framework for the training of labour inspectors.

The Committee also notes that according to the Government's report and the annual inspection report, the number of inspections in factories has slightly decreased (from 4,197 in 2008/2009 to 4,074 in 2010/2011) even though the number of the staff of the labour inspectorate has continued to increase (from 544 officers in 2009 to 608 officers in 2011). It also observes that the Government has not yet provided any information on inspection visits in EPZs or the number of inspection visits in the different economic sectors even though it indicates that initial steps have been taken for the collection of data on this question.

The Committee once again asks the Government to provide detailed information on the impact of the restructuring of the labour inspection system on the effective discharge of labour inspection functions, including in EPZs, as soon as it is available.

The Committee requests the Government to keep the ILO informed of progress made in the collection of data and once again reiterates its requests under Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention for the publication of an annual inspection report containing information and data on the number of inspection visits in different sectors, including in EPZs, the violations detected and the penalties imposed with reference to the legal provisions concerned, cases brought to the courts and outcomes of the proceedings, number and subject of complaints investigated and results obtained.

Noting the information provided by the Government on the training of labour inspectors, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide details in this regard and to indicate the impact of the technical assistance provided by the ILO in this area.

Recalling also from its previous comments that the Government had referred to the need for ILO technical assistance in relation to data collection, the Committee requests the Government to indicate any formal steps taken for the provision of such assistance and to indicate whether further assistance is needed in other areas.

Noting also that the number of female inspectors has further increased to 227 out of 608 labour inspectors (from 154 out of 544), the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the impact of the recruitment of female labour inspectors in terms of the effective discharge of labour inspection functions in sectors with a predominantly female workforce, such as the textile sector, and to keep the ILO informed of progress made in terms of the further recruitment of female staff.

Finally, recalling that the number of labour inspectors increased, among other things, through the absorption of 178 field officers entrusted with the enforcement of the Employees' Provident Fund Act (i.e. the social security law covering the private sector), the Committee notes with interest the figures provided on the number of cases filed and considerable amounts to be recovered for violations of the Act, and once again requests the Government to indicate the progress made in recovering social security contributions.

Article 11(1)(b). Travelling expenses. The Committee notes that the travelling allowance for labour inspectors, previously criticized as being inadequate by the LJEWU and the National Trade Union Federation (NTUF), has been increased from 10 Sri Lankan rupees (LKR) per mile (approximately US$0.09) to LKR12 per mile (approximately US$0.108) by Public Administration Circular (PAC) No. 9 of 2010. However, PAC No. 9 of 2010, attached to the Government's report, still provides for limitations on the mileage that is reimbursed, while it allows for exceptions in special cases to be decided upon by the Commissioner General of Labour. For example, the monthly reimbursement limit for a Labour Officer (District) is set at LKR5,750 (approximately US$52.17), which the Committee understands to mean that labour inspectors at that grade are reimbursed for travel for up to 483 miles per month. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the circumstances in which travel costs exceeding those set out in PAC No. 9 of 2010 are reimbursed. If available, please provide a copy of a reimbursement form and information on the average length of procedures for reimbursement.

Articles 3, 7, 9, 13, 14, 17, 21(f) and (g). Role of the labour inspectorate in the field of occupational safety and health. Statistics of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease. Recalling from its previous comments, the observations made by the World Confederation of Labour (WCL) (WCL now merged into the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC)) and the NTUF on the persistent shortage of factory inspecting engineers, medical officers and occupational hygienists to carry out routine inspections in industrial enterprises. With regard to the commitment made by the Government in previous reports to develop the prevention side of labour inspection in the framework of the restructuring of the labour inspection system, the Committee notes that according to the Government, section 100 of the Factories Ordinance No. 45 of 1942 (FO) has been consolidated in order to make provision for the maintenance of health, safety and welfare of workers in factories and that the OSH staff has increased from 27 to 42, now encompassing 38 factory inspecting engineers, two medical officers and two research officers in order to carry out routine inspections in the various industrial sectors.

The Committee notes that the annual report of the labour inspection service for 2010 and 2011 provides no information on the activities of the labour inspectorate in the field of occupational safety and health, and indicates that no industrial accidents have been notified under the Factory Ordinance No. 45 of 1942, despite the fact that the same report also provides data on the total number of fatal accidents. The Committee notes from this data that fatal accidents have risen from 49 in 2008 to 62 in 2010 and non-fatal accidents have decreased from 1,525 in 2008 to 1,456 in 2010. It notes the Government's statement that both fatal and non-fatal accidents are likely to be much higher due to deficiencies in reporting as well as the lack of coverage of the informal sector. Finally, the Committee notes that no information has been provided on the number of cases of occupational disease.

The Committee would like to recall that the activities of the labour inspectorate in the area of occupational safety and health should focus both on securing the enforcement of the relevant legislation (Article 3(1)(a)) and preventing industrial accidents and occupational diseases including through the provision of technical information and advice (Article 3(1)(b)), as well as measures with immediate executory force in the event of imminent danger to the health or safety of workers (Article 13(2)(b)). The Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to the fact that the establishment of a system that ensures access of the labour inspectorate to information on industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease (Article 14) is essential to the development of the prevention policy to which the Government has committed itself in the framework of the restructuring of the labour inspection system. The Committee notes that even though sections 61 and 63 of the FO clearly indicate the cases and circumstances in which such incidents are to be notified to the District Factory Inspecting Engineer, it is essential in order for such a system to function effectively in practice, that comprehensive regulations exist on the procedure for notification and the penalties that apply in the event of negligence. In this regard, the Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the ILO code of practice on the recording and notification of occupational accidents and diseases which offers guidance on the collection, recording and notification of reliable data and the effective use of such data for preventive action (available at www.ilo.org/safework/normative/codes/lang--en/docName--WCMS_107800/index.htm). The Committee also wishes to emphasize that labour inspectors can inform and sensitize employers and workers about the importance of notifying industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease so as to encourage compliance with the relevant legal provisions in pursuance of Article 3(1)(b) and of Paragraphs 6 and 7 of the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81).

The Committee once again requests the Government to provide detailed information on the labour inspection activities carried out in the area of OSH, including the adoption of measures with immediate executory force in the event of imminent danger to the health or safety of the workers. It also asks the Government, once again, to provide information on the difficulties encountered in enforcing OSH legislation vis-à-vis employers pursuant to the comments previously made by the NTUF.

Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that the labour inspectorate is duly informed of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease and that relevant statistics are included in the annual labour inspection report, in accordance with Article 21(f) and (g), if possible in the manner indicated in Paragraph 9(f) and (g) of Recommendation No. 81.

The Committee finally requests the Government, once again, to provide information on any arrangement to associate technical experts and specialists from the National Institute of Occupational Safety and Health with the work of the labour inspectorate for the purpose of securing the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to the protection of the health and safety of workers and investigating the effects of processes, materials and methods of work on the health and safety of workers.

Articles 17 and 18. Amendments to legislative acts concerning enforcement procedures and dissuasive sanctions. The Committee previously noted that steps had been taken to update the fines and penal provisions in all legislative acts relating to conditions of work and had asked the Government to keep the ILO informed of the progress made in the adoption of the relevant bills. In this regard, it notes that amendments to the Industrial Disputes Act (IDA) have been approved by the Cabinet of Ministers and that the Bill has been submitted to Parliament. Further, it notes the Government's indication that initial steps have been taken for the envisaged amendments to be introduced in the Wages Boards Ordinance so as to facilitate enforcement in cases of subcontracted work. The Committee asks the Government to continue to keep the ILO informed of any progress made in the adoption of the relevant bills, including with regard to the Shop and Office Employees' Act, the Maternity Benefits Ordinance, and the Termination of Employment of Workmen (Special Provisions) Act.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Sudan

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1970)

Context and developments relating to labour inspection. In its previous comments the Committee noted that the adoption of a transitional Constitution in 2005 had resulted in the transfer of most administrative powers to the provinces (wilayats) and the revision of all Sudanese legislation so as to be in conformity with the new federal rule. The Committee notes the 2012 country analysis in the context of the United Nations Development Assistance Framework (UNDAF) for Sudan, according to which "weak governance in numerous sectors, an ineffective civil service, perceptions of corruption, inadequate grass-roots consultation and participation, and a lack of data to formulate and monitor policies and their impact all drain the system of resources needed for development. Issues of poor coordination within and among core institutions and between the centre and the decentralized level are core obstacles to effective development." (page 40). The report proposes that the support provided in the context of UNDAF should focus on four main areas, including governance, the rule of law and basic services (pages 74–75).

The Committee notes that the Government makes no further reference to the communication of a new draft Labour Code to the ILO for comments, and indicates that the Code is being revised and that a copy of it will be sent to the Office, once it has been adopted by the National Assembly. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of technical assistance from the ILO with a view to strengthening the labour inspectorate and adopting legislation that is in conformity with the provisions of the Convention, in the context of the objectives laid down in UNDAF. It requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any formal steps taken in this regard and, if the abovementioned assistance has been received in the meantime, to indicate the results achieved.

Article 4(1) and (2) of the Convention. Labour inspection under the supervision and control of a central authority. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour has been reorganized and a public department of labour inspection and labour legislation has been established with a view to greater efficiency, in accordance with the provisions of the Convention and the conclusions of the resolution of the International Labour Conference concerning labour administration and labour inspection adopted in June 2011. The Committee recalls that the resolution states that: “labour inspection is a public function and is at the core of effective labour law with wide powers and functions, including enforcement and sanctions that should be sufficiently dissuasive to deter violations of labour legislation while also providing corrective, developmental and technical advice, guidance, prevention tools and promoting workplace best practices. These functions should be regulated and balanced as part of a comprehensive compliance strategy in order to ensure decent working conditions and a safe working environment.” The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report an organizational chart of the Public Department of Labour Inspection and the legislative texts by which it is established. The Government is also requested to send an up-to-date list of regional and local labour inspection structures at labour offices and also information on their available resources for action.

Article 5(a). Cooperation between the inspection services and the judicial system. According to the Government’s report, no cases relating to labour inspection have been brought before the courts. However, the Government indicated in its previous report that some cases were referred to the courts after measures taken by labour inspectors, consisting of advice, warning or reprimands, had all failed. The court had issued its judgement, imposing a fine and a sentence of imprisonment. The Committee further notes that, according to the UNDAF country analysis (page 34), “the justice sector has been severely degraded in some areas of the country, such as Darfur” and “awareness of the right to justice remains very low, necessitating further support to adoption of public policies addressing access to justice for the poor and marginalized”. Referring to its 2007 general observation, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to strengthen cooperation between the labour inspection system and the judicial system and to secure from the judicial authorities the diligence and substantive treatment which should be given to infringement reports drawn up by labour inspectors, and to disputes concerning the same fields which are directly submitted to them by workers or their organizations.

The Committee also requests the Government once again to provide the ILO with copies of extracts from court decisions issued for violations of the legislation relating to conditions of work, and also information on the effective implementation of these decisions in practice and on their impact with regard to observance of the applicable legislation.

Article 7(3). Adequate training for labour inspectors for the performance of their duties. The Committee notes that the Government is requesting assistance from the ILO with regard to training for labour inspectors. It hopes that this assistance will be provided in the near future and requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to submit an official request to this effect and also the results achieved.

Articles 19, 20 and 21. Preparation, publication and communication to the ILO of an annual report. The Committee notes that the Government emphasizes the importance of publication of the annual labour inspection report. Referring to its general observation of 2010, the Committee recalls that, when well prepared, the annual report offers an indispensable basis for the evaluation of the results in practice of the activities of the labour inspection services and, subsequently, the determination of the means necessary to improve their effectiveness. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that an annual labour inspection report, containing information on all the points covered by Article 21, is drawn up and published as soon as possible and requests it to send a copy to the ILO.

Swaziland

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1981)

Articles 2, 3(1) and (2), 10, 11, 16 and 17 of the Convention. Functioning and resources of the labour inspection system. The Committee notes from the limited information provided in the Government’s report that the total number of inspections increased from 2,866 in 2009 to 3,548 in 2010, thus contributing, according to the Government, to a better awareness of national labour standards among employers. The Government refers to a single targeted inspection campaign conducted in the apparel industry during the reporting period and specifies that labour inspectors only carry out inspections pursuant to complaints due to the lack of transport facilities. According to the Government, despite the purchase of new cars, all the vehicles have been grounded due to cash flow problems. The Government also indicates that despite the fact that it has managed to fill all vacancies in the labour inspectorate, there is still need to establish new posts as the number of workplaces liable to inspection is increasing.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report does not provide the information previously requested by the Committee on the steps taken or envisaged for the amendment or abrogation of the provisions of section 82 of the Industrial Relations Act and sections 1, 2, 4, and 5 of the Guidelines for intervention by the Commissioner of Labour, so that the Commissioner of Labour may be exempted from carrying out functions of conciliation and resolution of industrial disputes. The Committee refers to Article 3(1) and (2) of the Convention and notes that these functions are likely to interfere with the effective discharge of the primary enforcement and advisory duties of labour inspectors as identified in Article 3(1), or prejudice the authority and impartiality which are necessary to inspectors in their relations with employers and workers. In this respect, the Committee recalls the orientation provided by the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), according to which the labour inspectors’ functions should not include that of acting as conciliator or arbitrator in labour disputes. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures so as to bring the Industrial Relations Act and the Guidelines for intervention by the Commissioner of Labour into conformity with Article 3(2) of the Convention by clearly dissociating the inspection and conciliation functions, so that labour inspectors can focus on their primary duties under Article 3(1), and to keep the ILO informed of all progress made in this regard.

Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention. Annual report. The Committee notes that no annual report of the Department of Labour has been received in the ILO since 2005 under Article 20 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in order to recommence the publication and regular communication to the ILO of annual reports of the Department of Labour which should contain the information listed in Article 21 of the Convention, including detailed information on the part of the activities of the Commissioner of Labour which concern the enforcement of legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers as provided for in Article 3(1)(a) and (b). In the absence of an annual report, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the number of workplaces liable to inspection and the number of workers employed therein, the staff of the labour inspection service, statistics of inspection visits, violations detected and penalties imposed, as well as data on industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease.

The Committee recalls moreover that recommendations towards strengthening the labour inspection system of Swaziland were made by the ILO as early as 2005 in the framework of the “Improving Labour Systems in Southern Africa” (ILSSA) project. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any steps taken or envisaged as a follow-up to these recommendations, and encourages the Government to continue to avail itself of ILO technical assistance, including in order to obtaining support in its research for the necessary funds in the framework of international cooperation, with a view to the progressive establishment of a labour inspection system which meets the requirements of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Turkey

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1951)

The Committee notes the comments made by the Confederation of Turkish Trade Unions (TÜRK-İS) dated 17 May 2011 which were received with the Government’s report on 8 November 2011.

Articles 2, 3(1) and (2), 10, 11 and 16 of the Convention. Labour inspection activities in the informal economy.

1. The Committee notes that the brief data provided by the Government do not include the information previously requested by the Committee on the content and results of the Action Plan for the Strategy to Combat the Informal Economy nor the text of the Social Insurance and General Health Insurance (SIGHI) Act, section 59 of which requires inspection officers to determine whether or not employees are insured, and submit to the social security institution within a maximum of one month the names, citizen ID numbers and wages of those who are employed without insurance. Moreover, no data is provided on the number of unregistered workplaces and uninsured workers, as previously requested. The Committee requests the Government once again to provide a copy of the SIGHI Act in its amended version as well as information on the content and results of the Action plan to combat the informal economy. It further requests updated statistics on the number of cases notified to the social security institutions and the kind of follow-up given by the labour inspectors and the social security institutions including any positive incentives to ensure the regularization of undeclared workers.

2. The Committee notes from the brief data communicated by the Government that despite the existence of the Action Plan for the Strategy to Combat the Informal Economy, the overall number of inspections decreased from 56,095 in 2009 to 46,969 in 2010, while the most important decrease concerns the social inspections (from 36,386 in 2009 to 29,685 in 2010). It also notes that according to the Confederation of Turkish Trade Unions (TÜRK-İS), labour inspectors generally carry out inspections following complaints. The Committee requests the Government to identify the reasons for the decrease in the number of inspections and the proportion of complaints-based inspections in relation to the total number of visits.

The Committee notes moreover with interest from the Government’s report the introduction of a new inspection approach in 2010–11, which consists in planning inspections in function of risk, sector or area, and which is also based on the negotiation of inspection priorities with other public bodies, social partners and relevant professional interest groups. The Committee requests the Government to describe the impact of the new inspection approach in planning targeted labour inspection visits, explain how the negotiation of inspection priorities works in practice, identify these priorities and the bodies involved in the negotiations and communicate the relevant legal texts.

3. The Committee notes with interest that Act No. 6111 creates 1,000 new posts for labour inspectors which are in the process of being filled. In addition, the current number of labour inspectors was 840 at the time of the report, while an additional 137 labour inspectors were under training and 32 were to be appointed in 2011. According to TÜRK-İS, even though this increase is a positive development, a further increase of labour inspectors is indispensable in order to combat irregular employment effectively. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the progress made in appointing assistant labour inspectors to fill in the newly created posts, and to specify the number of existing labour inspectors and senior labour inspectors broken down by province.

4. The Committee also notes that the Government has not made any observation on the previous comments of the Turkish Confederation of Employers' Associations (TİSK) which criticized the expanded powers of labour inspectors in verifying subcontracting employment relationships and authorizing short-term employment relationships due to the general economic crisis. The Committee requests the Government to communicate data on the activities of the labour inspectorate in relation to subcontracting and short-term work as well as the results obtained in terms of fighting collusion and protecting workers' rights in this context.

Articles 3(1)(b), 5(b), 13, 14, 16, 17 and 18. Preventive and enforcement activities in the area of OSH. The Committee takes note of the information provided by the Government in reply to an observation by TİSK concerning the balance between proactive measures and sanctions. The Government indicates that the improvement of information and awareness levels by employers and workers is one of its priorities and therefore a total of 10,534 representatives of workers, employers and the social partners were trained in seminars, symposia and information meetings and handbooks were prepared for them on several subject matters in the field of occupational safety and health and general working conditions. The labour inspection also carried out campaigns targeting better compliance with employment legislation in the apparel sector, in the tourism sector, health care and retail stores. The Committee takes note of this information.

The Committee notes the information provided by TÜRK-IS, according to which fatal occupational accidents and diseases reported to social insurance institutions increased by 35 percent, from 866 in 2008 to 1,171 in 2009 while the total number of industrial fatal accidents must be much higher. TÜRK-IS suggests that due to globalization, OSH is among the first areas to be subject to expenditure cuts by employers leading to large-scale industrial accidents in several provinces during the last couple of years. The Government refers to various inspection campaigns and trainings conducted from 2009 to 2010, targeting the improvement of OSH in the construction and mining sectors, and in relation to explosives. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the new inspection approach mentioned earlier on, has facilitated the identification of high risk sectors and the planning of visits leading to preventive and enforcement activities by the labour inspection. It requests the Government to communicate data on the number of visits, the preventive measures ordered such as injunctions with immediate effect in case of imminent danger to the health and safety of the workers, violations found and sanctions and penalties imposed in the area of OSH broken down by sector and province, as well as the evolution of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease.

Articles 4 and 5(a). Placement of labour inspection under the supervision and control of a central authority and effective cooperation between the various services entrusted with labour inspection. The Committee notes that the Government has once again not provided any information on the comments made by TİSK in 2007 concerning the transfer of inspection duties from the Ministry of Labour and Social Security to other ministries (Ministry of Health, Ministry of Defence, Ministry of Energy and Natural Resources) and to municipalities, thereby raising obstacles to the coordination of labour inspection activities by a central body. The TİSK adds that, although section 95(2) of the Labour Law establishes the requirement to inform the responsible regional authorities of the results of inspections, this requirement is often not met, with the result that neither inspection records nor the relevant statistics are up to date.

The Committee notes that Act No. 6111 of 13 February 2011 amended the Labour Law by adding a provision according to which grievances arising from termination of contracts are to be examined by Regional Directorates of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security while complaints of workers with ongoing employment contracts are to be examined by the labour inspectors. The Committee requests the Government to provide clarifications on the aim and effect of this provision, and supply detailed information on any measures adopted or envisaged to improve the exchange of information between inspection services and regional directorates as well as their impact on the compilation of statistics by the Labour Inspection Board.

Moreover, with reference to its 2007 general observation, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on any measures adopted or envisaged to promote effective cooperation between the labour inspection services and the judiciary with a view to the achievement of the economic and social objectives of the labour inspection services.

Article 6. Status and conditions of service of labour inspectors. The Committee notes the repeated statements by TÜRK-IS according to which labour inspectors should work with total independence, to which the Government has not responded. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the status and conditions of service of labour inspectors which guarantee their independence of changes of government and undue external influences as required by Article 6.

Articles 20 and 21. Annual report on the work of the labour inspection services. The Committee notes that a consolidated annual report for the period under review was not submitted to the Office and could not be found online. The Committee refers to its general observation of 2011 according to which when well prepared, the annual report offers an indispensable basis for the evaluation of the results in practice of the activities of the labour inspection services and, subsequently, the determination of the means necessary to improve their effectiveness. It underlines the importance of making the fullest possible information available on each of the subjects enumerated in Article 21 on an annual basis, including the human resources and institutional, logistical and material means available to the labour inspection, its field of personal competence (enterprises, establishments and other workplaces liable to inspection as well as the workers occupied therein), its means of operation (inspection, notifications of violations or non-compliance, technical advice and information, observations, warnings, the initiation of recommendation of prosecutions, the imposition of penalties) and finally, data on industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure the preparation and publication in due time of an annual labour inspection report containing the information indicated in Article 21, and its communication to the Office within the deadlines set in Article 20.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Uganda

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1963)

Articles 1 to 24 of the Convention. Need to establish a labour inspection system that meets the requirements of the Convention. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has still not provided a reply to the Committee's comments made in 2009, which it was bound to repeat in 2010 and 2011. It notes the comments made by the National Organisation of Trade Unions (NOTU), received by the ILO on 31 August 2012, in which the organization points once more to the absence of a standalone Ministry of Labour, the lack of human and material resources of the Directorate of Labour, Employment and Occupational Safety and Health of the Ministry of Gender, Labour and Social Development (MGLSD) and the virtual absence of labour inspection activities at the central level. With regard to the local level, the organization once more deplors that, despite the requirement in law that there should be one labour officer per district, more than half of the districts in the country do not have labour officers.

The Committee further notes that an ILO labour administration and inspection needs assessment (ILO assessment) was carried out in the framework of an ILO technical assistance mission in November 2011 at the request of the MGLSD. The Committee understands from the assessment that while the serious problems raised in the Committee's previous comments still persist, the MGLSD seems to be envisaging a better monitoring and guidance of the functions of labour administration and employment, including labour inspection at the local government level. The Committee also notes from the assessment however, that according to statements by senior MGLSD officials, there are no prospects for reversing the decentralization policy which led to the dismantling of the labour inspection system in the first place, as this policy is anchored in the national Constitution.

The Committee is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments which read as follows:

The Committee notes that the Government has not sent the report requested by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards concerning the measures taken to follow up its conclusions adopted at its session in May–June 2008. However, it notes the information received by the ILO on 11 November 2008 concerning the adoption in 2006 of Employment Act No. 6 and Occupational Safety and Health Act No. 9, and the views expressed by the Central Organization of Free Trade Unions (COFTU) and the National Organization of Trade Unions in Uganda (NOTU) at a tripartite workshop on the application of the Convention. The Committee also notes that, as recommended by the Conference Committee in 2001, 2003 and 2008, an ILO technical assistance mission was received from 13 to 17 July 2009 and that, together with the Government and the social partners and various public bodies, it examined the reasons for the deterioration in the labour inspection system since the 1990s, with a view to remedying it.

Need to establish a labour inspection system that meets the requirements of the Convention

The ILO technical assistance mission noted that the dismantling of the labour inspection system that followed its decentralization observed by an earlier ILO mission in 1995, has progressively worsened. The many interviews it had with staff of the labour administration and other public departments and with the social partners provided the mission with information betraying a level of distress that demands the urgent re-establishment of a labour inspection system able to ensure the supervision of the legal provisions related to conditions of work and the protection of workers, in accordance with Article 3, paragraph 1(a), of the Convention and to provide both employers and workers in industrial and commercial workplaces with useful information for their implementation, as required by Article 3(1)(b).

The field visits proposed to the mission were limited to two very large foreign-owned agro-food companies located in areas of very intense industrial activity (Kampala and Jinja) and the mission regretted that it had not been in a position in which it could assess working conditions in small and medium-sized Ugandan establishments. However, the gradual deterioration in the labour inspection situation can be discerned from the information contained in the annual inspection reports received at the ILO in 1994 and 1996. According to the report covering 1994, the Labour Department had 83 employees, of whom 62 worked in the districts. Despite limited resources, the inspection staff managed to carry out 280 fully fledged visits, 292 visits to monitor implementation and 436 visits for other purposes. As prescribed by Article 3(1)(a) of the Convention, these inspections focused on application of the provisions on working conditions (general conditions and occupational safety and health) and the protection of workers. Of the many complaints from workers that had reached it, the labour inspectorate was able to deal with 1,252 and refer 32 to the courts. The annual inspection report for 1994, as well as providing detailed information on the work of the inspectorate, supplied statistical data together with relevant analyses and comments, including on occupational accidents, placing special emphasis on the lack of general safety and health standards in small and medium-sized establishments.

In 1995, an ILO technical assistance mission found that the labour administration was only represented in 20 of the country's 39 districts and had lost over 75 per cent of its human resources. For example, of the 67 posts planned for the occupational safety and health department, only two existed, one in Jinja, the other in Mbala, notwithstanding the significant number of establishments covered by the 1964 Factories Act and the fact that they were located throughout the country.

The annual inspection report for 1996 referred to 17 collective labour disputes concerning trade union rights, the refusal by employers to pay wage arrears and retirement benefits, and unfair dismissals of unionized workers. With the restructuring of the country's administration, unemployment was compounded by the dismissals of public employees. During the period covered, supervision of working conditions appears to have been marginalized in relation to employment policy and to no longer have been a matter of concern for the Government. The central labour administration's resources had been so reduced that no vehicles were left for travel outside the capital to supervise the operation of district services, some of which were unattainable by telephone. During the year covered by the above report, only 13 of the 21 district labour services were able to communicate information on their work: in all, 1,151 inspection visits were carried out, for some of which transport was provided by the employers. In total, there were 19 occupational safety and health inspection staff. Out of the 104 occupational accidents notified, only eight were investigated. Records showed that 25 per cent of the accidents were in construction and 33 per cent in government services and private security bodies. The 26–30 age group accounted for 34.61 per cent of the accidents, but no legal proceedings had been initiated during the period covered. The industrial court nonetheless apparently played an important role in pacifying and harmonizing industrial relations and, in most of its decisions it found for the workers. Its impact was attributed to its functional and financial independence.

In the observations it made in the years that followed, the Committee repeatedly noted that the Convention was not applied and reminded the Government of the obligations arising out of ratification, asking it to take the necessary steps to remedy the situation of the labour inspection services. Such measures involve, in particular, placing the inspection services under the supervision and control of a central authority and recruiting qualified and properly trained personnel. Financial, material and logistical resources are also essential for the control of the industrial and commercial establishments covered by the Convention and of the relevant national legislation (suitably equipped offices, provision of appropriate technical equipment for inspections and transport facilities and repayment of duty travel expenses). The diversity and complexity of the labour inspection functions defined in the Convention also require labour inspectors to devote most of their time to these duties, in their capacity as public officials who are assured of stability of employment and are independent of improper external influences.

Nevertheless, due to the decentralization of the labour administration as a whole, the Ministry of Labour as such soon disappeared and its component parts were absorbed by a succession of ministries. The labour administration is now a department in the Ministry of Gender, Labour and Social Development (MGLSD). Its resources have been significantly reduced, as has its authority over the decentralized services. While decentralization was designed as a response to the demands of a policy to encourage investment, both national and international, in the interests of developing the national economy and creating jobs, its implementation has become increasingly detrimental to workers because it has overlooked issues relating to conditions of work, which is in violation of the Convention.

The Local Governments Act, No. 1 of 1997, transferred labour issues to the districts, together with services and activities for social rehabilitation, probation and well-being of street children and orphans, the role of women in development, community development, youth, culture and information services. With this transfer of authority, the districts are now exercising powers formerly held by central government, such as formulating development plans on the basis of priorities defined at the local level including raising, levying, managing and assigning resources through separate budgets, and establishing or abolishing public service bodies. As labour administration issues were no longer given priority, district labour departments were consequently reduced to rudimentary structures, and in some instances disappeared altogether. Furthermore, the number of districts increased from 56 to 75 in 2005 and to 80 in 2009, and is likely to increase further in the near future. Only the district of Kampala, which has a special status, is administered by the country's central authorities. COFTU and NOTU have expressed concern at the fragmentation of the country's administration at a time of drastic reductions in labour administration personnel and have called for amendment of the Constitution so that labour inspection can be placed back under the control and supervision of a central authority in a fully fledged ministry of labour endowed with the necessary capacities to fulfil its functions effectively. Although a similar view was expressed by nearly all the political and administrative officials and other stakeholders it met, the mission concluded that there is no such prospect on the agenda.

On 15 September 2008, the Local Governments Act was again amended with a view to the further decentralization of the administration taking account of a distinction between rural and urban entities. In accordance with section 77 of the Act, local governments will have the right and duty to formulate, approve and execute their budgets and plans subject to compulsory budgetary equilibrium (paragraph 1). Subject to the obligation to give priority to the objectives set out in national programmes (paragraph 2), urban governments are given financial independence, provided that their plan is incorporated into the district plan (section 79). The Committee notes that, according to section 83 (paragraph 2), central Government allocates to local governments to finance the operation of decentralized services, an unconditional minimum amount calculated in accordance with Chapter 7 of the Constitution, equal in value to the amount of the previous tax year for the same item.

In its report received in November 2008, the Government stated that it was seeking funds within the framework of the Decent Work Country Programme adopted in May 2007, while pointing out that the enhancement of labour inspection is a key element of a strategy for improvement of industrial relations through the promotion of rights at work. It undertakes to address all the issues raised by the Committee in the report due in 2009, taking into account the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2008. However, the Government has not sent the report as announced, but documented information gathered by the ILO mission of July 2009 shows that, while the MGLSD received an additional budgetary allocation in the course of the year, the labour inspectorate had no place in the MGLSD's budgetary allocations for the current fiscal year and that, moreover, labour administration issues in general are not included in any of the projects or strategies developed for the short and medium term by the Ministry in charge of local governments.

The Committee nevertheless hopes that, as soon as possible, the labour inspectorate will be given a key role in the country's social and economic development strategy, in particular through the process for revising the Decent Work Country Programme adopted in 2007, through the enactment of the above new legislation on employment and occupational safety and health, and to ILO technical assistance in fulfilling the objectives of the Convention. The Committee recalls that labour inspection is a function of the public administration that needs its own operating budget allowing the recruitment of suitable personnel and adequate resources to be made available. It is for the ministry responsible for labour to define requirements for this purpose and to raise awareness among governmental authorities and the social partners, particularly employers, of the positive impact of efficient labour inspection on a country's economic development and enterprise financial results.

The Committee notes the re-establishment of an Industrial Court financed by the state budget. In accordance with Act No. 8 of 2006 on labour disputes (arbitration and settlement), the court hears disputes that the labour inspector has been unable to settle or appeals by one of the parties where there has been no decision within 90 days. However, if the Industrial Court is to play its role fully, it would be advisable for the legislation on the functioning and powers of the labour inspectorate to be revised so as to adapt it to developments in the world of work, and for the legislation on conditions of work to be supplemented by regulations to give it practical effect under the supervision of the labour inspectorate. The Committee notes the indication to the technical assistance mission that a parliamentary process is under way for this purpose. The Committee notes that the Employment Act, No. 6 of 2006, and the Occupational Safety and Health Act, No. 9 of 2006, contain provisions that are largely consistent with the Convention, and requests the Government to take measures promptly to give effect to them in practice. In particular, it requests it to ensure that effect is given in the near future to section 3(1) of the Occupational Safety and Health Act (No. 9) and section 9 of the Employment Act (No. 6), concerning the recruitment of the necessary inspection staff to ensure the implementation of these Acts, and that the number of inspectors will be determined in each district on the basis of the technical and geographical criteria referred to in Article 10 of the Convention. The Committee therefore urges the Government to ensure that the necessary conditions are created to establish effective cooperation between the labour administration and the other public services and private institutions that possess useful data (such as the ministries of finance, justice, tourism, commerce and industry, the Bureau of Statistics, the Investment Authority and the National Social Security Fund (NSSF)) for the establishment of a company's register providing the labour inspectorate with the necessary information to develop an inspection programme that takes into account the branches of activity in which workers are the most vulnerable in view of the general conditions of work and the risks for their safety and health.

The Committee notes that, in accordance with section 20 of the Employment Act (No. 6), an annual report containing information on labour inspection must be published by the labour commissioner at the ministry responsible for labour, which seems at least to suggest a return to the idea of a central labour inspection authority within the meaning of Article 4 of the Convention to supervise and control the work done by the district inspection services. An annual report, prepared in accordance with Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention, will also enable the national authorities concerned, as well as the social partners and the ILO's supervisory bodies, to gain a sufficiently clear idea of the way the labour inspection system functions and hence to envisage or propose, as the case may be, the necessary means of improving it.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken in pursuit of the above objectives, together with any relevant documents. It would be grateful in particular for information on the manner in which it plans to give effect to Article 4 of the Convention in terms of organizing and running the labour inspection system in practice in the context of the application of the current version of the Local Governments Act. The Committee finally requests the Government to ensure that an annual inspection report, containing the information available on the subjects listed at Article 21 of the Convention and reflecting both progress made and the shortcomings of the labour inspection system, will be published and that a copy will be sent to the ILO.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

United Arab Emirates

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1982)

Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention. Publication of an annual report on the work of the labour inspection services. The Committee notes with interest that the Government submitted the 2010 annual inspection report which contains information and data on the implementation of the Convention in practice, including statistics on the enterprises subject to labour inspection by emirate and the number of workers employed in these enterprises. Noting that the obligation to submit the annual report to the ILO is an ongoing obligation under Article 20(3) of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to continue submitting the annual report within the deadlines established by this article. Furthermore, the Committee would be grateful if the Government could communicate, to the extent possible, statistics on the workers employed in the workplaces subject to inspection disaggregated by sex and origin (nationality).

The Committee is raising other points in a request that it is addressing directly to the Government.

United Kingdom

British Virgin Islands

Labour Inspectorates (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 85)

Articles 2, 3, 4 and 5 of the Convention. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes with interest the text of the Labour Code, No. 4 of 2010, which meets the requirements of Articles 4 and 5 of the Convention. The Committee also notes however that, according to the Government's report, labour inspectors have found no contraventions during the reporting period. In this regard, the Committee notes that under section 24 of the Labour Code, the Commissioner of Labour should produce an annual report with information on the inspections undertaken, the infringements detected, the complaints received from workers and employers, and a status report on occupational safety and health. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would communicate the annual report in order to illustrate the manner in which the powers and obligations of labour inspectors envisaged in sections 13–15 and 155 of the Labour Code are exercised in practice.

Finally, the Committee reiterates its request for the Government to provide full and detailed information on the questions raised in Parts I–V of the report form.

Gibraltar

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81)

Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention. Failure to submit an annual report on the work of the labour inspection services. Referring to its comments since 1990 in this regard, the Committee notes with regret that the Government has never sent an annual labour inspection report to the Office containing full information on all the subjects as required in Article 21 of the Convention, namely: (a) laws and regulations relevant to the work of the inspection service; (b) staff of the labour inspection service; (c) statistics of workplaces liable to inspection and the number of workers employed therein; (d) statistics of inspection visits; (e) statistics of violations and penalties imposed; (f) statistics of industrial accidents; and (g) statistics of occupational diseases. The Committee notes that the Government again provides information on the number of registered employers (which are taken to reflect the number of workplaces) and the number of workers employed therein, but does not provide updated statistics on the other subjects mentioned above. The Government repeats its indication made in its last report, that both the labour inspectorate and the health and safety inspectorate can provide statistics and other information relating to their work and that the Committee is invited to seek any specifically related information as it may require. The Committee has repeatedly emphasized and would like to recall once more the importance of publishing an annual inspection report by the central authority as part of a mechanism for the ongoing improvement of the functioning of the labour inspectorate and the health and safety inspectorate. The Committee urges the Government to ensure that the necessary measures are taken by the labour inspection authority with a view to the preparation, publication and communication to the ILO of an annual labour inspection report under Article 20 of the Convention containing information on all the subjects covered by Article 21(a)–(g). It requests the Government to describe such measures or indicate the difficulties encountered in this regard.

Uruguay

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 1973)

Articles 6(1)(a) and (b), 17, 18 and 19 of the Convention. Role of labour inspection in agriculture with regard to safety and health. The Committee notes with concern the information sent by the Government, to the effect that agriculture is the sector with the second highest rate, after the industrial sector, of occupational accidents in the country and that these accidents represent 20 per cent of the total number of accidents into which investigations have been launched. According to the Government, the main causes of accidents in agriculture include the use of machinery without the necessary safety devices, problems in electrical installations, the use of chemicals without any proper planning of risk prevention, lack of training for workers and lack of personal protective equipment. Referring to its previous comments on this subject, the Committee stresses the need to associate labour inspectors in agriculture in the preventive control of new plant, new materials or substances and new methods of handling or processing products which appear likely to constitute a threat to health or safety, in accordance with Article 17 of the Convention. It invites the Government to refer in this regard to the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Recommendation, 1969 (No. 133), as regards the possible association of the labour inspectorate in preventive controls by means of prior consultation on the putting into operation of such plant, materials or substances, and methods, and on the plans of any plant in which dangerous machines or unhealthy or dangerous work processes are to be used (Paragraph 11). The Committee also draws the Government's attention to the measures envisaged in the Recommendation with a view to undertaking education campaigns for employers and workers in agriculture, such as the use of the services of rural promoters or instructors; the distribution of posters, pamphlets, periodicals and newspapers; the organization of film shows, and radio and television broadcasts; arrangements for exhibitions and practical demonstrations on hygiene and safety and any other appropriate subjects in the teaching programmes of rural schools and agricultural schools; the organization of conferences for persons working in agriculture who are affected by the introduction of new working methods or of new materials or substances; the participation of labour inspectors in agriculture in workers' education programmes; and the organization of lectures, debates, seminars and competitions with prizes (Paragraph 14). The Committee therefore requests the Government to ensure that measures are taken quickly by the competent authority to determine the cases and conditions in which the labour inspection services in agriculture should be associated in the preventive control of new plant, new materials or substances and new methods of handling or processing products which appear likely to constitute a threat to health or safety. It also requests the Government to take steps to ensure the mobilization of the resources needed to eliminate the most frequent causes of occupational accidents in agriculture, as referred to above, including the provision by labour inspectors of relevant technical information and advice to employers and workers. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or contemplated in this respect, and to send copies of any legislative text which has been adopted or any draft in this area.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1967)

In its observation in 2011, the Committee noted the Government's report, as well as the comments made by the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV) in a communication dated 29 August 2011 and by the Independent Trade Union Alliance (ASI) in a communication dated 30 August 2011, and also the Government's reply to the comments of the CTV and ASI dated 30 November 2011. However, the Government's reply was received too late to be examined at the Committee's last session. The Committee further notes that, in a communication dated 31 August 2012, the CTV repeats its 2011 comments, and that the ASI, in a communication dated 14 August 2012, makes comments under the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), which also concern the application of the present Convention. The Committee notes the Government's reply to these comments by the CTV and ASI in two separate communications dated 9 November 2011.

Articles 3(1) and 13 of the Convention. Labour inspection activities in occupational safety and health (OSH). The Committee notes the observations made by the ASI in its communication dated 30 August 2011, according to which there is a traditional lack of supervision in the field of OSH, although there have been improvements since the establishment of the National Health and Safety Prevention Institute (INPSASEL).

The Committee noted, in its 2011 observation under Convention No. 155, the comments made by the ASI and CTV, according to which there has been an increase in the number of industrial accidents compared with ten years ago, including a dramatic increase of industrial accidents in the petroleum industry over the past eight years, the condition of some installations of the Venezuelan Petroleum Enterprise (PVDSA) are poor and there are inadequate OSH conditions in the gas plants throughout the country. The Committee also notes the Government's communication dated 9 November 2012, in which it refers to the introduction of new procedures by INPSASEL for the strengthening of the labour inspection services in OSH. In this regard, it refers to the introduction of "integrated inspections" by multidisciplinary teams from the different technical services of the state occupational health directorates (DIRESATs) targeting, among others, enterprises with a high occurrence of occupational accidents, and the so-called "updating operations" in DIRESATs with a high number of reported industrial accidents. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the number of labour inspection visits in the area of OSH, in particular in sectors with a high risk of occurrence of industrial accidents, such as in the construction sector and the petroleum industry, as well as information on enforcement measures taken by the labour inspection services, the legal provisions to which they relate, and the nature of penalties imposed, and to include this information in the annual labour inspection reports.

Please also provide information on any preventive activities carried out, including the provision of information and advice and the adoption of measures with immediate effect in case of imminent danger to the health or safety of the workers (Articles 3(1)(b) and 13 of the Convention).

The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the impact of the abovementioned activities and operations by INPSASEL on the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers.

Noting that the Government has not provided information in this regard, it is asked to provide information also on the number of inspectors engaged in the area of OSH supervision within the structures of INPSASEL.

Article 3(2). 1. Conciliation duties entrusted to labour inspectors. The Committee notes that labour inspectors, in accordance with section 507, indent (10) of the revised Organic Law on Labour and Workers (LOTTT), are required to intervene and act as conciliators to facilitate the negotiation of collective agreements and settle collective labour disputes. The Committee wishes to emphasize, as it has done in its previous comments since 2002, that labour inspection personnel should not be overburdened with other tasks to the detriment of their primary duties. This is particularly true where human and material resources are scarce, as suggested by the comments of the ASI in its communication of 30 August 2011. The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary legislative and practical measures to relieve labour inspectors of conciliation duties so that they can devote themselves fully to ensuring the application of legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers, thereby contributing to the prevention of situations that give rise to labour disputes.

2. Duties of labour inspectors in the area of undeclared work. Furthermore, the Committee understands, from the information in the Government's report, that the National Economic and Social Development Plan for 2007–13 targets, amongst others, undeclared work, and that joint inspection visits are regularly being carried out together with the People's Ministry of the Interior and Justice (MPPRIJ), the Tax and Customs Administration Service (SENIAT) and the People's Ministry of Defence (MPPD). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the purpose and scope of the abovementioned inspections and the impact of these activities by the labour inspection services on the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers. Please also provide information on the number of infringements detected, the legal provisions concerned, the remedial measures taken and the sanctions imposed.

Articles 6 and 7 of the Convention. Status and conditions of service of labour inspectors. Principle of independence of labour inspectors of any change of government and of any undue external influence. The Committee notes the indications made by the ASI in its communication dated 30 August 2011 concerning the inadequacy of the conditions of service of labour inspectors, including the absence of employment stability, the lack of career prospects, the low levels of remuneration and insufficient training. The Committee also notes that, according to the CTV in its communications dated 29 August 2011 and 31 August 2012, the effectiveness and professionalism of the labour inspection system is affected by the precarious status of the labour inspectorate, its politicization and corruption. The CTV alleges that the labour inspectorate is used as a political instrument to strengthen the Government's objectives, as well as those of the ruling party, and is often directed against unions at promoting parallel organizations with close ties to the Government. Furthermore, according to the comments of the ASI dated 14 August 2012 under Convention No. 155, the labour inspection services were unprofessional and suffered from "clientelism" in the past, although the Committee understands from the ASI's comments that measures have been taken in this regard. The Government in its communication dated 30 November 2011 refutes the allegations of the CTV and refers to sections 19 and 34 of the Act on the status of the public service, which stipulates that public servants enjoy absolute stability in their employment and are appointed after successful public competitions, and are prohibited from propaganda, public coercion or the display of their political affiliation in the exercise of their functions. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the status and conditions of service (stability of employment, remuneration, career prospects, etc.) of the different categories of personnel exercising labour inspection functions, such as the "enforcement inspectors", "labour inspectors" and "labour supervisors" mentioned in the LOTT and "special labour commissioners" mentioned in the Government's report.

The Committee requests the Government to provide an organizational chart of the labour inspection system and information on the reporting lines throughout its structures.

The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the criteria and procedures followed for the recruitment of labour inspection staff at the different hierarchical levels (Article 7(1) of the Convention), including for the new categories of labour inspectors introduced in the LOTT, such as the 'enforcement inspector' (body responsible for the recruitment, duration and methods used to assess qualifications, number of applicants and number of candidates selected, etc.).

Articles 3(1)(a) and (b) and 17, 18 and 21. Increased sanctions and implementation of other penalties for the violation of labour legislation. Balance between preventive and enforcement activities of the labour inspectorate. The Committee notes the observations made by the ASI, in its communication dated 14 August 2012 under Convention No. 155, that the granting of so-called "labour compliance", which is a prerequisite for contracts with the State to receive foreign currencies or obtain import or export licences, was introduced as a means of applying pressure and controlling private enterprises and is aimed at those employers who politically opposed the Government in the past. According to the ASI, there is a wide range of discretion concerning the withdrawal of labour compliance and there is no guarantee of due process in law.

In this context, the Committee notes that, following the coming into force of the revised version of the LOTT of May 2012, the level of sanctions and enforcement powers of labour inspectors has been strengthened. Section 512 of the LOTT introduces the function of "enforcement inspector" in each inspectorate for the enforcement of administrative instructions with special effects. Enforcement inspectors are empowered to request the withdrawal of "labour compliance" provided for in Decree No. 4248 of 30 January 2006, until employers comply with these administrative instructions and, in the case of obstruction by employers against the implementation of these administrative instructions, they may request the support of the public security forces or request the arrest of employers by the public prosecutor's office.

The Committee notes that, according to section 3 of Decree No. 4248 of 30 January 2006 establishing the labour compliance, the administrative certificate issued by the People's Ministry for Labour and Social Security (MINPPTRASS) is valid for one year and is a prerequisite for entering into contracts and agreements with all governmental bodies, such as the granting of loans by the public finance system, authorization to apply for funding for the import of raw materials, authorization to receive foreign currencies from the National Public Administration and the granting of export or import licences. Under the terms of section 553 of the LOTT, where employers do not comply with the obligations set out therein, they can be denied the "labour compliance", or it can be revoked. Under section 4 of Decree No. 4248, labour inspectors are required to deny the issuance or revoke this administrative document if an employer is: (a) in breach of an order, instruction or other decision of the Minister of State or Minister of Labour; (b) refuses to give effect to an administrative order or decision by the labour inspectorate; (c) disregards any decision by the competent supervision and inspection officials; (d) fails to comply with any decision by the Venezuelan Social Insurance Institute (IVSS) or the INPSASEL; (e) fails to give effect to a decision by the labour or social security courts; (f) fails to pay contributions in time, including contributions to the social security system; or (g) is in violation of the rights of freedom of association, collective bargaining or the right to strike. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its communication of 30 November 2011 that this document is currently in the process of being digitalized to allow for easier verification of labour compliance.

As the Committee outlined in paragraphs 280 et seq. of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection for the labour inspectorate, the functions of enforcement and advice are inseparable in practice. It further indicates that violations may be the result of failure to understand the terms or scope of the applicable laws or regulations. Therefore the labour inspector must always have discretion to choose not to impose penalties as a means of enforcing legal provisions. To this end, Article 17(2) of Convention No. 81 provide(s) that it shall be left to the discretion of labour inspectors to give warning and advice instead of instituting or recommending proceedings. This discretion implies that inspection staff have the necessary capacity for judgement to be able to distinguish between serious or repeated wilful non-compliance, culpable negligence or flagrant ill will, which call for a penalty, and an involuntary or minor violation, which may lead to a mere warning. Competent and experienced inspectors are aware of the value of advice and warnings as incentives for the proper application of legal requirements.

The Committee asks the Government to reply in detail to the allegations made by the ASI on the impact of the labour compliance in practice and the absence of due process safeguards. It also asks the Government to provide data on the cases in which the labour compliance was denied or revoked by labour inspectors, and particulars of the relevant infringements according to the legal provisions to which they relate. Furthermore, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on the nature, frequency and content of the “administrative instructions with special effects” imposed on employers, with reference to relevant legal provisions, and to provide copies of such instructions. It also asks the Government to provide information on the number of cases in which labour inspectors have asked to be supported by the public security forces for the enforcement of these administrative instructions and whether employers have been detained.

The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the manner in which labour inspectors exercise in practice the discretion provided for in Article 17 of the Convention to give warning and advice instead of instituting or recommending proceedings, and to indicate the manner in which it is ensured that labour inspectors apply the appropriate measures to achieve compliance with labour legislation and strike a reasonable balance between their educational and enforcement functions. Please also provide a copy of any relevant internal instructions in this regard.

Given that the Government has not provided information on the number of violations detected and the sanctions imposed following inspections, the Committee asks the Government to provide statistics of violations and penalties, including: (i) the number of infringements reported to the competent authorities; (ii) particulars of the classification of such infringements according to the legal provisions to which they relate; (iii) the number of convictions; and (iv) particulars of the nature of the penalties imposed by the competent authorities in the various cases (fines, imprisonment, revocation of labour compliance, etc.) and to include such information in the annual report on the activities of the labour inspectorate.

Article 11. Material resources available to labour inspection personnel. The ASI in its comments dated 30 August 2011 indicates that the MINPPTRASS has the lowest budget in the public administration, which would limit the supervision of labour standards, and in its comments dated 14 August 2012, refers to insufficient transport facilities of the labour inspection services.

The Committee notes with interest the Government’s indication that significant efforts have been made which have resulted in all labour supervisors now being equipped with laptop computers, all labour inspection units having an Internet connection and the establishment of a telephone number to receive claims from workers. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide detailed information on the material means available throughout the structures of the labour inspection services under the MINPPTRASS and INPSASEL, including the number and type of transportation means available. Please also provide information on the proportion of the national budget allocated to the MINPPTRASS and INPSASEL, and to their respective labour inspection services.

Article 14. Notification of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease. In its observation in 2011 under Convention No. 155, the Committee noted that according to the CTV, statistics on the number of industrial accidents were not reliable and that the ASI estimates that 90 per cent of occupational accidents were not reported. It further notes that, in its comments dated 29 August 2011 under Convention No. 155, the CTV alleged that INPSASEL weights or amends for political reasons the register of industrial accidents, and that there is evidence of workers who have been denied the right to register cases at INPSASEL, for instance industrial accidents that occurred in installations of the PVDSA.

In this regard, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government under Convention No. 155 on industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease for the first six months of 2011, when 29,020 industrial accidents and 1,130 cases of occupational disease were reported, as well as for the first six months of 2012, when 30,907 industrial accidents and 1,328 cases of occupational disease were reported. According to the Government, these cases were reported by workers and employers through the Internet and registered by the system for the declaration of cases of occupational disease of INPSASEL which, according to the Government, is in its first stage of development. While the most recent data on industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease on the website of INPSASEL relate to 2006 and 2007 respectively, the Committee also notes the Government’s indications that INPSASEL is in the process of reviewing the statistics of industrial accidents for the years 2008, 2009 and 2010.

The Committee notes in this respect that section 56(10) of the Organic Law for Prevention, Conditions and Environment in the Workplace (LOPCYMAT) clearly sets out the obligation for employers to report industrial accidents, cases of occupational disease and any other pathological conditions that may occur in the workplace to INPSASEL, and that section 73 of the same law sets out a delay of 24 hours for the notification of industrial accidents by the employer. However, the Committee notes that the ASI indicates, in its communication dated 14 August 2012 under Convention

No. 155, that there are separate regulations on the notification procedure for industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease, which are difficult to manage in practice. Emphasizing the need for comprehensive and practicable regulations for the effective functioning of the notification procedure in practice, the Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the ILO code of practice on the recording and notification of occupational accidents and diseases, which offers guidance on the collection, recording and notification of reliable data and the effective use of such data for preventive action (available at www.ilo.org/safework/normative/codes/lang--en/docName--WCMS_107800/index.htm).

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would describe the procedure for the notification, registration and investigation of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease, and communicate a copy of any applicable text.

The Committee asks the Government to reply in detail to the comments made by the CTV and ASI. In particular, referring to its observations in 2011 and 2012 under Convention No. 155, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide its comments on the issues related to the under-reporting of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease. Furthermore, the Committee asks the Government to make the necessary efforts, so as to provide the relevant statistical information on industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease from 2007 up to the present, and to include this information in the annual report of the labour inspection services.

Articles 12(2) and 15(c). Confidentiality of the source of the complaint and of any links between a complaint and an inspection visit. Following up on its comments since 2002, the Committee notes that section 514 of the LOTTT still requires labour inspectors to notify employers upon their arrival in the establishment of the reason for the inspection. As the Committee has repeatedly emphasized, under these provisions of the Convention, labour inspectors should, on the one hand, be able to assess the appropriateness of warning employers of their presence and, on the other hand, should be prohibited from revealing to the employer or his/her representative the fact that the inspection has been occasioned by a complaint. The purpose of the obligation of confidentiality is to ensure that workers are protected from the risk of any reprisals by the employer as a result of the complaint. A guarantee of confidentiality is essential to ensuring the necessary trust in relations between workers and labour inspectors. The Government is therefore asked once again to ensure that measures are taken to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention on these points and to provide information on the progress achieved. Please also provide a copy of any relevant texts.

Articles 20 and 21. Preparation and publication of an annual report on the work of the labour inspection services. Implementation of a computerized register of enterprises. The Committee notes that no annual report on the labour inspection services was received with the Government's report and that no complete annual inspection report has been received by the ILO since 1998. However, it notes that the Government's report contains some information relating to: (a) the number of labour inspectors and their geographical distribution; (b) the number of enterprises registered and their geographical distribution; (c) the number of inspections and follow-up inspections carried out in the different regions and the total number of workers concerned; and (d) the total number of inspections targeting specific categories of workers. The Committee also notes the establishment, organization and operation of the Register of Enterprises by Decisions Nos 4224 of 21 March 2006 and 4225 of 22 March 2006, on the basis of Decree No. 4248 of 30 January 2006. The Register is a computerized system aimed at compiling data on labour and social security for all enterprises and workplaces in the country, including data on the compliance of employers with instructions of the labour inspectorate and other administrative authorities, and the issuance or withdrawing of the labour compliance. Registration is compulsory for all enterprises operating in the country. Referring to its general observation of 2009 in which the Committee emphasized that a register of workplaces liable to inspection would provide the central labour inspection authorities with the data that are essential to prepare the annual report, it hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to fulfil its obligations under Articles 20 and 21. The Committee once again asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that, as provided by Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention, the central labour inspection authority publishes and communicates to the ILO each year within the required time limits an annual report containing updated information on all the matters set out in Article 21(a) to (g) of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Viet Nam

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1994)

The Committee notes with interest that the Government received ILO technical assistance in the form of a labour inspection needs assessment in March 2012 and that the recommendations made in the assessment correspond to a large extent to the Committee's previous comments on the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the steps taken or envisaged with a view to the progressive establishment of a labour inspection system which fully meets the requirements of the Convention and any steps taken or envisaged in order to obtain access to the necessary funds to this effect in the framework of international cooperation.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Yemen

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes with interest that a labour inspection audit was carried out by the ILO at the request of the Government in October 2009 giving rise to a number of recommendations on ways to reinforce the labour inspection system which correspond to a number of the Committee's previous comments. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the steps taken or envisaged with a view to the progressive establishment of a labour inspection system which fully meets the requirements of the Convention. In this regard, the Committee encourages the Government to seek international financial assistance to enable it to ensure the effective functioning of the labour inspection services and to keep the ILO informed of any measures taken and the results achieved in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 81 (Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Armenia, Australia, Bahrain, Plurinational State of Bolivia, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Cameroon, Cape Verde, China: Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Ecuador, El Salvador, Estonia, Fiji, Finland, France: New Caledonia, Ghana, Greece, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Honduras, Iceland, Ireland, Kenya, Lebanon, Liberia, Madagascar, Malaysia, Malta, Republic of Moldova, Netherlands: Aruba, Netherlands: Curaçao, Panama, Paraguay, Russian Federation, Rwanda, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Slovenia, Solomon Islands, Swaziland, Tajikistan, Trinidad and Tobago, Turkey, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom: Jersey, Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen); Convention No. 85 (United Republic of Tanzania: Zanzibar); Convention No. 129 (Plurinational State of Bolivia, Burkina Faso, Colombia, Costa Rica, Estonia, Fiji, Finland, France: New Caledonia, Iceland, Kenya, Malta, Republic of Moldova, Norway, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Slovenia, Uruguay); Convention No. 150 (Democratic Republic of the Congo, Guyana, Liberia, Malawi, San Marino, Trinidad and Tobago); Convention No. 160 (Swaziland).

Employment policy and promotion

Algeria

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1969)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy. The Committee notes the report submitted in September 2011 in reply to the observation made in 2010, and the general explanations in the report on government policy for the promotion of employment. The statistical data provided show a clear improvement in the employment situation, with a fall in the unemployment rate from 15.3 per cent in 2005 to 10 per cent in 2010, in a context of strong demographic growth, as the active population rose by over 1.1 million persons over that period. The activity rate of women, although slightly higher, at 15.1 per cent (compared with 14 per cent in 2000) remains well below that of men, which is around 70 per cent. The Committee observes that the participation of women in employment, which has the effect of lowering the figures for unemployment, also has the disadvantage of reducing the country's wealth creation potential. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information in its next report on the progress achieved in improving the participation of women in the labour market. It also invites the Government to provide updated data on the active population and its distribution, the nature, extent and trends of unemployment and underemployment, disaggregated by age, sex and region, as well as on other categories for which data are available.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. In reply to the previous comments, the Government indicates that the National Economic and Social Pact, concluded in September 2006, has been the subject of three evaluations in a tripartite setting. In a tripartite meeting held in December 2009, the Pact was renewed and strengthened. In its 2010 observation, the Committee noted the adoption in April 2008 of a plan of action to promote employment and combat unemployment, setting out the government employment strategy for the period 2008–13. In its latest report, the Government indicates that programmes based on the three focus areas have been implemented in relation to placement on the employment market, youth employment and micro-enterprise development. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the implementation of the measures envisaged by the plan of action for employment ending in 2013. It hopes that the next report will contain precise information on the contribution of the social partners to the formulation of a new plan of action for employment and to the revision of the employment policies and programmes already implemented. Please also indicate the manner in which the views of "representatives of other sectors of the economically active population", and particularly those working in the rural sector and in the informal economy, have been taken into account so that they cooperate fully in the formulation of employment policies and help to enlist support for the measures taken in this respect.

Youth employment. In its report the Government provides updated statistics on the vocational integration assistance mechanism (DAIP), which is intended to facilitate the conclusion of various contracts for young persons. Nearly 600,000 young persons benefited from the mechanism up to June 2011. In February 2011, further measures were adopted by the Council of Ministers to extend the coverage of mechanisms allowing a personalized approach with a view to providing young persons with support for vocational integration adapted to their needs. The Committee invites the Government to provide detailed information in its next report on the vocational integration of young beneficiaries of the DAIP, particularly in relation to the long-term integration of the most under-privileged young persons into the labour market and its impact in terms of reducing unemployment.

Promotion of micro-, small and medium-sized enterprises. The Committee notes the various measures envisaged with a view to the creation of 200,000 SMEs over the period 2010–14. Further incentives for enterprises and investment were decided upon at a tripartite summit on 28 May 2011. Moreover, specific measures have been envisaged to facilitate the economic activity of micro-enterprises. The Committee invites the Government to provide detailed information in its next report on the results achieved through these initiatives in terms of job creation.

Employment market policies for workers with disabilities. The Government indicates that, in the context of the Five-Year Programme 2010–15, it was planned to create nine establishments: four work support centres, to be established in Algiers, Oran, Ouargla and Constantine, and five learning farms, to be located in Algiers, Bistra, Mascara, Bouira and Illizi. Persons who obtain satisfactory results in these centres may have access to employment in a sheltered workshop or a centre for the distribution of homework. The Committee invites the Government to continue providing information on the operation of these centres and to supply any relevant indications on the integration of workers with disabilities into the labour market.

Angola

Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88) (ratification: 1976)

Contribution of the employment service to employment promotion. The Committee notes the brief report provided by the Government in May 2010 and in 2012. In its 2008 observation, the Committee had noted that, in the context of its policy to combat unemployment and poverty, public policies were established with a view to stimulating employment. Furthermore, employment and vocational training were one of the ten priorities of the Poverty Reduction Strategy, which was to channel the resources obtained from oil to create favourable opportunities for productive employment for young persons and to reduce the informal economy. The Committee observed that the social indicators were a source of great concern – 70 per cent of the population survive on less than US$2 a day and enrolment in primary schools is increasing very slowly (from 50 per cent in 1990 to 53 per cent in 2000). The Committee therefore emphasized the need to guarantee the essential function of employment services to promote employment in the country. The Committee once again asks Government to provide a report containing the available information on the number of public employment offices established, the number of applications for employment received, vacancies notified and persons placed in employment by such offices (Part IV of the report form). Please also provide information in the next report on the following matters:

- the consultations held with representatives of employers and workers on the organization and operation of the employment service, and on the development of employment policy (Articles 4 and 5 of the Convention);
- the manner in which the employment service is organized and the activities which it performs to effectively carry out the functions set out in Article 6;
- the activities of the public employment service in relation to socially vulnerable categories of jobseekers, with particular reference to workers with reduced mobility or with disabilities (Article 7);
- the results of the measures adopted to give effect to Act No. 1 of 2006 to encourage young persons seeking their first job (Article 8);
- the measures proposed by the Training Centre for Trainers (CENFOR) and other institutions to provide training or further training for employment service staff (Article 9(4));
- the measures proposed by the employment service in collaboration with the social partners to encourage the full use of employment service facilities (Article 10); and
- the measures adopted or envisaged by the employment service to secure cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies (Article 11).

The Committee recalls that the Office is in a position to provide the Government with technical advice and assistance for the establishment of a public employment service, as required by the Convention.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Austria

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1972)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Employment trends and active labour market measures. Following the 2010 observation, the Government provided a review of the labour market situation and the measures envisaged under the Integrated Economic and Employment Policy Guidelines for the Europe 2020 Strategy. The Committee notes that already in March 2010 the trend in the Austrian labour market reversed, following the economic recovery in the second half of 2009. The number of unemployed persons registered with the labour exchange services (AMS) has continuously decreased. The unemployment rate (in percentage of persons gainfully employed, according to Eurostat) was 4.8 per cent in February 2011. Until 2014, the Austrian Institute for Economic Research (WIFO) envisages a further decrease of the unemployment rate to 3.9 per cent. Real growth of GDP of more than 3 per cent is expected in 2011 (in 2010, GDP growth was estimated at 2.1 per cent). The increase in GDP is primarily fostered by the export economy and private consumer spending. The Committee further notes efforts mentioned by the Government to increase the employment rate of 20 to 64 year-olds to between 77 and 78 per cent, with a focus on a significantly greater share of employment among older workers, especially by raising the effective retirement age to 62. Measures relating to the raising of the retirement age would be further developed and extended by adult training. The Government also refers to the employment campaign for the integration of persons with disabilities (some €135 million were allocated in 2010). The focus was on preserving jobs for persons with disabilities, which was achieved by the temporary introduction of short-time working. A new immigration system for non-European Union nationals and European Economic Area States was introduced based on the admission without quota of highly skilled workers and specialists where there is a shortage. The Government recalls that social dialogue plays an increasing and decisive role. No important decision can be taken by the Government without the agreement of the social partners' organizations. The Committee notes the performance of the Austrian economy and sustained job growth. It looks forward to receiving from the Government, in its next report, an assessment of the impact of its active labour market measures, in particular, with regard to vulnerable groups, such as low-skilled workers, persons with disabilities and immigrant workers. The Committee would also appreciate continuing to receive information and data on successes, problems encountered and lessons to be learned from the experience of social partners in Austria with regard to the application of the Convention.

Youth employment. The Committee notes the detailed information communicated by the Federal Chamber of Labour regarding young workers and apprentices. It notes that the number of places for trainees in the courses run under the Youth Guarantee Act decreased from 4,097 in 2008 to 414 in 2010. This apparently shows that it was not possible to place all the young apprenticeship seekers in in-house apprenticeships, since the industry has been withdrawing more and more from apprenticeship training over the past few years and the supply of places for apprentices has not kept pace with demand. According to the Federal Chamber of Labour, the authorities considered that pressure is continuing on the apprenticeship market despite some new measures introduced to promote apprentice training. Further measures must therefore be taken to enable apprenticeship seekers to obtain consistent training and thus ensure that young persons complete their vocational training as a basis for their future working life and have good prospects in the labour market. The Government indicated in its report that key focus was given to the optimization of labour market opportunities for young persons as it was the 15–24 year age group that was seriously affected by the financial and economic crisis which shaped labour market policy in 2009 and 2010. Among other measures, new vocational schools were established to provide young persons with basic schooling as well as social and educational support for a gradual introduction into the labour market through a combination of work and learning. The Committee invites the Government to include detailed information in its next report on the efforts made to provide skills to young persons, and the results achieved in terms of ensuring lasting employment for young persons who enter the labour market.

Barbados

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1976)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy. The Committee notes the information contained in the Government's report received in October 2011 in reply to its 2009 observation. The Government indicates that pursuing the objectives of full, productive and freely chosen employment was affected by the economic recession brought about by the global financial crisis and the rapid increase of energy and commodity prices. In the first quarter of 2010, the labour force participation rate was 67.2 per cent (73.5 per cent for men and 61.4 per cent for women) and the employment rate was 89.4 per cent (89.5 per cent for men and 89.3 per cent for women). The unemployment rate almost doubled from 6.7 per cent in June 2007 to 12.1 per cent in June 2011 with a higher increase in tourism, construction, and wholesale and retail trade sectors (from 9.8 per cent in June 2007 to 16 per cent in June 2011). The Government indicates that active employment measures are outlined in the 2010–14 Medium-Term Development Strategy and Medium-Term Fiscal Strategy documents. The Manpower Research and Statistical Unit of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security is drafting the National Employment Policy. These policies are supported by the social partnership. They primarily aim at maintaining macroeconomic stability, stimulating economic growth and development, raising standards of living, meeting manpower requirements, and reducing unemployment and underemployment. In a communication of August 2011, the Barbados Workers' Union states that it welcomes any policy interventions which promote access to employment in conformity with the standards as enunciated in the Decent Work Agenda. The Government indicates that it received ILO technical assistance for developing the Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP). The last version of the DWCP will be submitted to the Cabinet once the tripartite consultation process is completed. The Committee notes that one of the priorities of the DWCP is strengthening employment policies through, inter alia, enhancing the labour market information system and the capacity of the National Employment Bureau. The DWCP also aims at developing a culture of entrepreneurship and strengthening local entrepreneurs to be competitive. The Committee invites the Government to provide in its next report information on the impact of the active measures taken for promoting employment, including in the framework of the National Employment Policy, on reducing unemployment and underemployment and increasing employment levels within the framework of a coordinated economic and social policy. The Committee also requests the Government to provide detailed information on the impact of the measures taken to address the needs of vulnerable categories of workers, such as women, young people, older workers and workers with disabilities. Please also provide information on the impact of the employment promotion activities carried out under the DWCP.

Education and vocational training. The Committee notes that the Barbados Vocational Training Board (BVTB) conducts a range of courses for both employed and unemployed persons of various ages in order for them to upgrade their skills, to be retrained or to acquire new skills. The training is intended to develop multiskilled individuals and is delivered through apprenticeship, in-plant training and evening programmes. The Government indicates that the most recent study conducted by the BVTB on 459 persons who attended at least one of its training courses during a 12-month period revealed that about 60 per cent of those surveyed are employed after the training, but 40 per cent have responded that they are employed in areas outside their training. The Committee notes that one of the priorities of the DWCP is to enhance technical and vocational education and training, to promote lifelong learning and to equip the labour force with the skills to function in the global economy. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on the impact of the measures adopted in collaboration with the social partners to improve the education and training system and to enhance its labour market relevance so as to align the demand and supply of skills.

Participation of social partners. The Government indicates that the social partnership, which includes leaders of the Government, employers' and workers' organizations, engages in quarterly discussions on social and economic issues confronted by the country. Social partners also participate in annual national consultation on the economy, which is held among representatives across all economic sectors. The Committee invites the Government to provide in its next report other examples of the manner in which the views of the social partners are taken into account in the development, implementation and review of employment policies and programmes. The Government is also requested to provide information on whether consultations are carried out with representatives of the rural workers and the informal economy.

Brazil

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1969)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy in the framework of a coordinated economic and social policy. The Committee notes the Government's report received in November 2011 in reply to its 2009 observation. The report prepared by the Secretariat for Public Employment Policies (SPPE) contains brief information on the labour market, a review of the activities of the Public Employment, Labour and Income System (SPETR) and of the activities of the Job and Income Generation Programme (PROGER). The Committee notes the significant reduction of informal work and the increase of 6.5 per cent in the number of registered employees in major urban centres. Although the acceleration of economic growth fell off in 2011, it is hoped that economic growth will increase once again in 2012 (the growth rate fell from 7.5 per cent in 2010 to 2.9 per cent in 2011, and a growth rate of 3.5 per cent is forecast for 2012). The Government emphasizes that the positive dynamic of macro-economic indicators resulted in the unemployment rate being reduced from 7.5 per cent in May 2010 to 6.4 per cent in May 2011. According to the data published by the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC) and the ILO, over 2 million jobs were created in 2011. The Committee observes that the unemployment rate of women fell from 8.8 per cent in 2010 to 7.7 per cent in 2011, and that the youth unemployment rate fell from 16.7 per cent in 2010 to 15 per cent in 2011. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the policies and programmes adopted to promote full employment. The Committee would like to examine a report containing indications on the manner in which the policies and programmes implemented have resulted in productive and long-term job opportunities for young persons and women, and the manner in which the social partners collaborated in their implementation. Please also provide information on the efforts made to continue the integration into the formal economy of unregistered workers. The Committee invites the Government to provide up-to-date information on the situation and trends in the labour market, disaggregated by state, sector, age, sex and skills, particularly with regard to socially vulnerable groups, such as young persons, women jobseekers, ethnic minorities and persons with disabilities (Articles 1(2) and 2(a) of the Convention).

Support for small and micro-enterprises and for cooperatives. The Committee notes the efforts made by the Government through the distribution of significant resources to democratize productive credit through the PROGER programme. In 2010, approximately 8,036 million reales were distributed (equivalent to around US$4,450 million) for entrepreneurial activities in 3,477 municipal areas. In February 2011, further measures were adopted to promote small enterprises in the formal economy and self-employed workers. The Government also provides information on the positive impact in terms of job creation of the loans made available to micro- and small enterprises in the context of the urban PROGER programme between 2000 and June 2009. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the activities of the PROGER programme and their impact in promoting productive employment. Please also indicate whether a new legal framework for cooperatives has been developed with a view to promoting job creation.

Contribution of the employment services. The Government refers in its report to the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88), and indicates that the Public Employment Labour and Income System (SPETR) includes a series of public policies seeking to be more effective in placing workers in productive activities with the objective of achieving social inclusion through employment, labour and income. According to the Government, the public system developed in a fragmented manner and its consolidation is an important challenge for the Ministry's programme. The Committee invites the Government to describe in its next report the progress achieved in ensuring that the public employment services contribute fully to the achievement of the objectives of the Convention.

Article 2(a). Collection and use of employment data. The Government recalls that two principal registers are kept of the functioning of the labour market: the General Register of Employed and Unemployed Persons (CAGED) and the Annual Social Information Report (RAIS). Moreover, a monthly survey on employment and unemployment is carried out (PED). The Committee invites the Government to specify in its next report the manner in which the information compiled contributes to the adoption and review of the policies and programmes implemented to promote full employment.

Educational and vocational training policies. In its previous observation, the Committee noted that the Social and Vocational Training Programme (QSP) had been the channel through which vocational training was provided to 664,850 workers between 2003 and 2007 to provide them with the necessary qualifications for employment. In 2008, a total of 39 training programmes were carried out for specific economic sectors. Furthermore, focusing on the construction sector, the Government promoted initiatives for vocational training and the placement of beneficiaries of the Bolsa Familia programme. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the impact of the QSP and other initiatives adopted to offer workers the opportunity to receive the necessary training to enable them to find appropriate employment and to use their training and skills in such jobs. The Committee also invites the Government to provide information on the consultations held with the social partners in the context of education and training policies and on their relation to employment opportunities.

Cambodia

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It hopes that a report will be supplied for examination by the Committee at its next session and that it will contain full information on the matters raised in its 2011 observation.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Coordination of social and economic policy with poverty reduction. In its report received in August 2011, the Government referred to the implementation of the Rectangular Strategy Plan, Phase II 2009–13. The Committee noted that the Government's six priorities in setting up the aforementioned action plan are as follows: (1) employment creation; (2) improving working conditions; (3) enforcement of the rule of law in social security matters; (4) building and development of technical and vocational skills; (5) expansion and strengthening of gender mainstreaming in the labour market; and (6) strengthening cooperation between institutions, work efficiency and accountability. The Committee also noted that the Government has set up a policy on labour migration. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the results achieved and the difficulties encountered in attaining the employment policy objectives in the Rectangular Strategy Plan, Phase II 2009–13. In addition, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on how it intends to meet, in the context of its new labour migration policy, the employment needs of migrant Cambodian workers.

Employment trends. The Committee noted in its previous observation that data concerning labour market and employment trends are compiled by the Department of Labour Market Information operating under the auspices of the Ministry of Labour and Vocational Training. Due to a lack of resources and reorientation of officials responsible for the data collection to other positions, the Government was unable to submit new relevant information on employment trends. The Committee hopes that the Government will supply detailed statistical information in its next report on the nature and extent of the country's labour market and employment trends. It also requests the Government to indicate the manner in which labour market data is collected and used to determine and review employment policy measures.

ILO technical assistance. The Government indicated in its August 2011 report that the "Better Factories Cambodia" programme has led to improved compliance by Cambodian export garment factories of national and international labour standards. This has contributed to Cambodia's national social and economic growth as export garment factories continue to win over and retain key international buyers who are weary of poor labour standards. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report updated information on the implementation and results of the "Better Factories Cambodia" programme in terms of employment creation.

Regional development and rural employment. The Committee previously noted that the Cambodia–Laos–Viet Nam Development Triangle Area (CLV–DTA) is a multilateral agreement that focuses on economic, political and social objectives in the subregion. Among the social objectives mentioned in the report, the Government referred to several labour-related objectives, such as hunger eradication and poverty reduction. The Committee requests the Government to provide additional information on how the measures taken under the CLV–DTA have promoted the objective of full and productive employment. Please also indicate how the objectives of overcoming poverty, eradicating hunger, reducing social inequalities and ensuring sustainable development have been achieved. The Committee invites the Government to continue to include information on the measures taken to reduce regional disparities so as to attain a better balance in the labour market.

Youth employment. The Committee previously requested information on the specific measures adopted by the Government aimed at generating employment opportunities for youth. The Committee once again invites the Government to provide in its next report detailed information on the adoption of a youth policy action plan and the results achieved to promote productive employment of young persons.

Educational and training policies. The Committee previously requested that the Government continue to provide information on the effects of educational and training measures adopted by the National Training Board. The Committee once again invites the Government to provide in its next report detailed information on the measures taken to improve qualification standards and coordinate education and training policies with employment opportunities.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. The Committee previously requested information as to how the Government involves representatives of employers and workers in the formulation and implementation of employment policies. The Committee once again invites the Government to address this essential issue in its next report by demonstrating how representatives of employers and workers are consulted at the policy planning and implementation stages so that their experience and views are taken into account.

Chile

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1968)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Declaration and pursuance of an active employment policy. In reply to the 2010 observation, the Government provided a report received in September 2011 containing a list of the principal programmes established to promote employment. The Government identifies the five main programmes implemented by the National Training and Employment Service (SENCE) to generate employment and promote the integration into the labour market of women, young persons and workers in a precarious situation. The "Investment in the Community" programme includes initiatives implemented by SENCE or the regional authorities for the direct and transitional recruitment of unemployed persons in areas with high levels of dismissals. The "Recruitment Bonus" programme consists of the distribution of subsidies to enterprises covering the payment of 30 per cent of the minimum monthly income. The "Employment Support" programme is intended for unemployed persons covered by the Chile Solidario social protection system to help them develop their skills with a view to strengthening their employability. A specific programme is intended to develop the labour skills of women. The Government has also adopted measures to provide tax breaks and training vouchers for persons wishing to obtain training. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report quantitative and qualitative data disaggregated by programme so that it can examine the manner in which the programmes adopted have enabled beneficiaries to obtain productive and long-term jobs. The Committee notes that, according to the data published by the ILO in Panorama Laboral 2011, the economy grew by 6.8 per cent in the second quarter of 2011 (with an annual growth rate of 8.4 per cent in the first quarter). Between January 2010 and September 2011, the urban employment rate increased (from 53.2 to 55.5 per cent) and the unemployment rate also fell between 2010 and 2011 (from 8.5 to 7.3 per cent). The Committee refers to its previous observations and recalls that it is fundamental to be able to assess the manner in which the political commitment to achieve full employment is reflected in government policy documents and in the general legal context. The Committee hopes that the Government will include in its next report detailed information on the adoption and implementation of an active employment policy, as required by Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. The report should also provide up-to-date data on the size and distribution of the labour force and the nature, extent and trends of unemployment and underemployment.

Youth unemployment. The Government also describes the SENCE programmes intended to ensure decent employment conditions for young persons entering the labour market. The Committee notes the requirements that have to be met to receive the monthly subsidy that the Government offers employers which recruit a young person up to 25 years of age. The Government also refers to the skills training programme for young persons and apprentices up to 25 years of age. The Committee notes that the average unemployment rate for young persons between 15 and 24 years of age in the first nine months of 2011 was around 17.5 per cent, which is 1.1 per cent lower than the corresponding rate for the same period in 2010. The Committee invites the Government to provide in its next report information on the results achieved by the measures adopted for the integration of young persons into the labour market and to help them obtain high-quality jobs.

Coordination of vocational education and training measures with employment policy. The Government indicates that the training programmes provided by ProEmpleo are designed to be adapted not only to the interests of beneficiaries but also to labour market demand. Through this coordination, it is ensured that training and skills development facilitate the integration of beneficiaries into the labour market. The Committee invites the Government to provide up-to-date information in its next report so that it can assess the manner in which the beneficiaries of the measures taken by the SENCE find long-lasting employment. The Committee also requests the Government to provide more precise information on the coordination of vocational education and training policies with employment policy.

Participation of the social partners. In its previous comments, the Committee invited the Government to provide information on the manner in which the experience and views of the social partners are fully taken into account, their full cooperation secured and their support enlisted for the formulation and implementation of employment policy. The Government indicates that the Ministry of Labour has a social dialogue unit, which has a training programme and holds social dialogue meetings. The Committee notes that the objective of the social dialogue meetings is to promote the generation of dialogue machinery at the national and regional levels in high-priority sectors, such as employment policy, so as to influence the establishment of public policies which resolve the problems identified. The social partners participate in social dialogue meetings. The Government also refers to the existence of regional dialogue meetings, depending on the productive sector. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the consultations held with the social partners for the design and implementation of an active employment policy. In this respect, the Committee emphasizes the importance of taking into account the views and securing the support of the social partners so as to ensure that the programmes implemented generate high-quality jobs (Article 3). In particular, the Committee reiterates its interest in examining information on formal consultation procedures with the social partners on the matters covered by the Convention at both the national and regional levels, including representatives of the rural sector and the informal economy.

ILO technical assistance. The Government indicates that in 2011 ProEmpleo held two workshops with ILO assistance. In the first, emphasis was placed on the need to ensure the follow-up of programmes to promote the reintegration into the labour market of the unemployed. In the second, the need was identified to give priority to access to employment and recruitment subsidies for the most vulnerable persons in the labour recruitment incentives programme. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the action taken as a consequence of assistance or advice received from the ILO for the adoption and implementation of an active employment policy, as required by the Convention (Part V of the report form).

China

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1997)

Formulation and implementation of an active employment policy. The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government in September 2011 in reply to its previous observation. It notes the 12th Five-Year Plan for National Economic and Social Development, which sets out employment strategies based on the development of the industry and service sectors. The Committee also notes the adoption of the National Human Rights Action Plan of China (2012–15) which refers to, inter alia, the right to work and the right to basic living standards. The Government reports on the establishment of the Inter-Ministerial Joint Meeting System on Employment to ensure policy coordination and help promote employment. Tripartite dialogue has been strengthened to cope with the global financial and economic crisis and seek common development goals. In response to the crisis, measures taken by the Government to promote employment include boosting domestic consumption, reducing social insurance contributions of enterprises, and offering subsidized targeted training opportunities to workers, jobseekers and unemployed persons. The Government also reports that the employment situation has been stabilized by creating 11.68 million new jobs for urban residents, re-employing 5.47 million laid-off workers, and employing 1.65 million persons from groups with employment difficulties. The Committee notes that the urban registered unemployment rate dropped to 4 per cent in 2011 (as per IMF data) from 4.1 per cent in 2010 and 4.3 per cent at the end of 2009. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information in its next report on the formulation and implementation of an active employment policy with the involvement of the social partners and on the impact of the measures taken to generate productive employment (Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention).

Impact of legislation on employment creation. The Government indicates that, in order to attain the objective of full employment, it implements active employment policies and incorporates such policies into legislation through the Employment Promotion Law. New legislation also provides for the adoption of measures aimed at increasing employment in the areas of tax, finance, social insurance, unemployment insurance and other matters. With respect to labour and social insurance policies, the Government indicates that it will take measures to gradually improve and implement flexible labour and social insurance policies that are compatible with flexible employment, including part-time employment, providing help and services to employees under flexible employment. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the impact and results achieved in terms of productive employment creation and the improvement of employment security for workers through legislation and related practice and implementation.

Vulnerable groups. The Government indicates that it attaches great importance to youth employment. The Committee notes that China is facing challenges with regard to the employment of graduates from institutions of higher learning and young migrant workers. The number of graduates has increased from 3.38 million in 2005 to 6.3 million in 2010. The Government indicates that it has formulated policies to promote employment for graduates, including plans to increase employment opportunities, a plan to guide business start-up and a plan of employment service and assistance. It reports that employment internships were provided to 1 million graduates with allowances paid by governments or employers, and that 450,000 graduates will benefit from the business start-up plan in the 2010–12 period. With respect to young migrant workers, the Government reports on measures easing their access to employment in urban areas, support measures to start up businesses, and vocational and technical training measures. It also reports on the measures to promote the employment of migrant workers based on the principle of fair treatment without discrimination. The Government indicates that it will improve management and overall planning of urban and rural areas, taking measures in accordance with the local conditions and providing guidance based on specific needs. Furthermore, the Committee notes the information on measures targeting the employment of women, including social security and vocational training subsidies, entrepreneurial trainings and measures to improve the maternity insurance system. The Government indicates that these measures have effectively promoted the employment of women. By the end of 2009, urban employers employed a total of 125.3 million persons, of which 46.785 million were women (37.2 per cent). It also provides data indicating that, from 2005 to 2009, public employment service agencies helped a total of 94.807 million persons obtain jobs, of which 44.514 million were women. With respect to persons with disabilities, the Government provides updated statistics indicating that 4.412 million persons with disabilities were employed in urban areas and 17.497 million in rural areas in 2010. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government on measures to promote the employment of ethnic minorities. They include the formulation and improvement of employment policies, the increase of employment aid for college graduates of ethnic minorities facing difficulties in finding jobs, the development of special training activities and work programmes, and the increase in financial support. The Committee invites the Government to provide in its next report information on the impact of the measures taken in order to promote productive employment for vulnerable categories of workers. Please also include updated data on the situation and trends of the active population, employment, unemployment and underemployment disaggregated by sector, age, sex, in particular for vulnerable groups such as young persons, women, persons with disabilities, rural workers and ethnic minorities.

Ensuring re-employment of laid-off workers by state-owned enterprises. The Government reports that the unemployment insurance system has basically covered most laid-off workers of state-owned enterprises. It further reports that in 2008, following the implementation of the Employment Promotion Law, the proactive employment policies continued, expanding from focusing on addressing the re-employment of laid-off and unemployed persons of state-owned enterprises to focusing on addressing the overall plan of employment of various groups in urban areas. The Government indicates that this has expanded the scope of objects, extended the validity period of policies and its increased efforts. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information in its next report on this matter.

Consistency and transparency of labour market information. The Government reports that it has established a city-based labour market information network. Over 80 per cent of public employment service agencies have set up information systems and in some locations these networks have extended to rural areas. The Government further indicates that a decision was taken in 2010 to establish an employment information monitoring platform to track the employment and unemployment status of jobseekers. It is estimated that approximately five years will be needed in order for the information network to cover the whole country. Furthermore, in 2011 the Government decided to set up a national public recruiting information service platform in order to increase consistency and transparency of the labour market and help jobseekers obtain timely and accurate labour market information. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the progress made in order to obtain accurate employment data and how it is being used to formulate and review employment policies (Article 2).

Constructing a unified labour market. The Government indicates that it has abolished policies and regulations that restrict the rural labour force to be employed in urban areas and transregionally. It further indicates that it is steadily and proactively pushing forward the reform of the household registration system. The Committee notes that conclusions are to be drawn from the experiences in the pilot efforts for coordinating urban and rural employment, and the scope of the pilot efforts is to be expanded. It further notes that in 2010 public employment service agencies at all levels nationwide provided gratuitous employment service to migrant workers, distributed over 35 million employment information cards, held nearly 20,000 special recruitment fairs for migrant workers, recommended jobs to more than 23 million persons, of which 12.5 million succeeded in obtaining employment, and arranged for over 30.9 million workers to obtain employment abroad. The Committee invites the Government to provide further information on the measures taken to unify employment management and the results achieved by the employment services in providing the same level of services in the country. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report an evaluation on how a balanced growth between economic development and employment has been achieved among the different regions of the country.

Strengthening employment services. The Government previously indicated that, in 2008, 99 per cent of the urban neighbourhoods and 80 per cent of towns had set up public employment services that provide assistance and job placement services. The Government reports in 2011 that 90 per cent of towns have set public employment services. Furthermore, the Committee notes that by the end of 2010, more than 10,000 private employment agencies operated in the country. The Committee invites the Government to provide detailed information on the operation of private employment agencies. It also invites the Government to continue to report on the achievements made in strengthening public employment services and regulating private employment agencies. Please also provide information on the measures taken to ensure cooperation between the public employment services and private employment agencies and measures that the Government is taking to encourage private employment services to improve the quality of their services in order for them to fulfil their employment promotion functions.

Promoting small and medium-sized enterprises. The Committee noted in its previous observation that 82 cities had been selected to pilot a new initiative aimed at promoting small and medium-sized enterprises. In its report, the Government indicates that it has made efforts to create entrepreneurial cities in 85 cities. It further indicates that it is conducting an assessment of the work performance of these entrepreneurial cities, evaluating the work completed and the actual results in the cities undertaking the tasks through information reviews, data comparisons and survey questionnaires. The Government also reports on measures to support entrepreneurship and promote small and medium-sized enterprises. These measures include reducing administrative barriers, enhancing entrepreneurial training, improving financial services to entrepreneurs and granting preferential tax rates to entrepreneurs and small and medium-sized enterprises. The Committee notes that the Government has set up a technology innovation fund which grants financial support to scientific and technological innovation projects. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report information on the impact of measures promoting small and medium-sized enterprises with respect to employment creation.

Vocational training and education policies. The Committee invites the Government to include information in its next report on how the human resource development policies are coordinated with employment policies and on how the Government is strengthening the coordination between vocational institutions. It also invites the Government to report on how the local entities and social partners participate in the design and implementation of training policies and programmes.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. The Government indicates in its report that more than 10,000 tripartite consultation organizations have been established at all levels across the country. It further reports that the 16th National Tripartite Conference of Labour Relations Coordination was convened in 2011. The conference adjusted the composition of the members of the State Tripartite Conference and its office; revised the Tripartite Conference System; reviewed the national harmonious industrial relations models of enterprises and industrial parks; and thematically studied the work to further put forward the implementation of special actions for the small business contract scheme, and the implementation of the collective contract scheme of the “Rainbow Programme”. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the consultations held with the social partners concerning the formulation and implementation of an active employment policy.

ILO technical cooperation. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the results obtained through ILO technical assistance on the matters covered by the Convention and also on the results derived from the implementation of the Decent Work Country Programme (2006–10).

Djibouti

Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not sent a reply to its 2007 observation. Nevertheless, noting the information provided by the Government in its reports received in May 2008 on the application of the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88), the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), and with reference to its previous comments on Convention No. 96, the Committee requests the Government to provide a report containing information in response to the following questions:

Part II of the Convention. Progressive abolition of fee-charging employment agencies conducted with a view to profit. Previous observations reveal that the proliferation of private employment agencies following the liberalization of employment under Decree No. 11/PRE/97 has resulted in a reduction of the activities of the public employment service. According to previous observations from the General Union of Djibouti Workers (UGTD) and the Labour Union of Djibouti (UGT), fee-charging employment agencies have been legalized in Djibouti and are acting as filters for recruitment. Furthermore, the unions alleged that these agencies charge jobseekers and even deduct sums illegally from workers' wages. The Committee notes that section 7 of Decree No. 2004-0054/PR/MESN of 1 April 2004 concerning private employment agencies expressly prohibits the latter from imposing charges or fees on workers. Moreover, section 14 of the same Decree provides that private employment agencies are required to send the labour inspector and the National Employment Service (SNE) a monthly summary of contracts concluded. The Committee notes that, under section 31 of Act 203/AN/07/5th L of 22 December 2007 establishing the National Agency for Employment, Training and Vocational Placement (ANEFIP), one of the tasks of the latter is to monitor the application of the provisions of Decree No. 2004-0054/PR/MESN concerning private employment agencies. The Committee requests the Government to state the specific measures taken to monitor the activities of agencies covered by the Convention, providing a summary of the reports of the inspection services, information on the number and nature of infringements reported and also any other available information, particularly with regard to the recruitment and placement of workers abroad.

Revision of Convention No. 96. The Committee recalls that, the ILO Governing Body, during its 273rd Session in November 1998, invited the State parties to Convention No. 96 to contemplate the possibility of ratifying, if appropriate, the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181). Such ratification would entail the immediate denunciation of Convention No. 96. Consequently, as long as Convention No. 181 has not been ratified by Djibouti, Convention No. 96 remains in force in the country, and the Committee will continue to examine the application of Part II of the Convention in national law and practice. In this regard, the Committee refers to its comment on Convention No. 144 and requests the Government to indicate whether tripartite consultations have been held within the National Council for Labour, Employment and Vocational Training with a view to the ratification of Convention No. 181.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It hopes that a report will be supplied for examination by the Committee at its next session and that it will contain full information on the matters raised in its 2008 observation, which read as follows:

Article 1 of the Convention. Coordination of employment policy with poverty reduction. The Committee notes the creation of the National Employment, Training and Vocational Integration Agency (ANEFIP), which is responsible for implementing national policies and programmes relating to employment, vocational training and vocational integration. The Committee also notes the establishment of the Djibouti Social Development Agency (ADDS), which has the task of contributing to the eradication of poverty among vulnerable groups and reducing disparities between regions. The Government intends, in the context of the implementation of the poverty reduction strategy, to promote labour-intensive activities, vocational training, the development of small and medium-sized enterprises and microfinance. With regard to microfinance, funding given to women's organizations seems to have met with some success. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information in its next report on the results achieved by the ANEFIP and ADDS to implement an employment promotion and poverty reduction strategy, including updated quantitative information on the development of the programmes put in place to promote the objectives of the Convention.

Article 2. Collection and use of employment data. The Government indicates that the development of information on employment is one of the tasks of the ANEFIP. To that end, section 32 of Act No. 203/AN/07/5thL provides for the creation of an Employment and Qualifications Observatory. The Observatory will be responsible in particular for establishing an employment database and carrying out specific surveys in this field. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the progress made by the Employment and Qualifications Observatory in collecting data on employment as well as on the employment policy measures adopted following the establishment of the new labour market information systems.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any consultations held on employment policies in the National Labour, Employment and Vocational Training Council.

Part V of the report form. ILO technical assistance. The Committee notes that, under the ILO's Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP) in Djibouti for 2008–12, priority is given to job creation, with particular emphasis on women and young people, and to access to employment through vocational training. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the results achieved during the implementation of the DWCP in terms of job creation.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Ecuador

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1972)

Formulation of an employment policy. Labour market situation. The Committee notes the Government's report received in October 2011 containing replies to its 2010 comments and a copy of the Ecuador Productive Agenda. The Ecuador Productive Agenda 2010–13 envisages improving labour productivity, decent wages and the generation of job opportunities without any type of discrimination. The Government indicates in its report that priority is given in the action of the Ministry of Labour Relations to intensive vocational training, especially targeted at the most vulnerable social groups, the abolition of precarious forms of labour, the creation of employment programmes for youth and the articulation of the supply of vocational training with the National Economic Inclusion Plan. The Committee observes that the Ecuadorean economy grew by 8 per cent in 2011. According to ECLAC in its Preliminary Overview of the Economies of Latin America and the Caribbean, economic growth continues to be led by internal demand, the principal motor of which has been strong public expenditure. The unemployment level fell from 7.6 per cent in 2010 to 6 per cent in 2011. There was also an improvement in the quality of employment as the underemployment rate was 46 per cent in September 2011, 4 percentage points lower than the rate in September 2010. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information to enable it to examine the progress made in achieving the objectives of full and productive employment set out in Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on the discussions held in the National Labour Council on the formulation and implementation of an active employment policy. The Committee hopes that the Government will include examples of the manner in which citizen's participation in people's assemblies has made it possible to take into account the views and experience of the persons affected by employment policy measures, and particularly those working in the rural sector and the informal economy (Article 3).

Compilation of labour market data. Coordination of employment policy with economic and social policy. The Committee welcomes the inclusion in the Government's report of the detailed employment statistics of the National Institute for Statistics and Censuses (IMEC). The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide up-to-date information on the situation, level and trends of employment, unemployment and underemployment and on the employment situation of the most vulnerable categories of workers, such as women, youth and rural workers. The Committee also invites the Government to indicate the manner in which the information that is compiled has contributed to the analysis of the labour market and to the adoption of new employment policy measures in the framework of a coordinated economic and social policy.

Youth employment. The Government indicates that the programme Mi Primer Empleo has achieved good results by providing the opportunity to undertake paid traineeships for young persons between 18 and 29 years of age studying in institutions recognized by the Higher Education Council. Five per cent of the internships are for young persons with disabilities. In 2011, something over US$2 million was available to subsidize internships. The Committee invites the Government to provide further information in its next report on the effect achieved by the measures adopted to help young persons find long-term employment and remain in the labour market.

Regional integration and rural development. In reply to its previous comments, the Government enumerates the functions of the Undersecretariat for National and Territorial Planning and Public Policies. The Committee invites the Government to provide more detailed information on regional development policies to ensure a balanced distribution of economic activity in the country.

Small and medium-sized enterprises. The Government indicates that the Undersecretariat for Micro, Small, Medium-Sized Enterprises has a budget of US$90 million to implement support programmes over three years for micro-, small and medium-sized enterprises, intended to improve their productivity and competitiveness and to develop productive networks. The Committee invites the Government to provide more detailed information on the labour market impact of programmes to promote the creation of productive employment through micro-, small and medium-sized enterprises. The Committee reiterates its request to the Government to indicate the most effective programmes to help precarious workers and those in the informal economy to find productive and lasting employment.

Coordination of education and training policy with employment opportunities. In reply to previous comments, the Government indicates that productive assets, such as land and credit, are badly distributed in the country, and labour is the only real asset available to people for integration into productive life and to overcome poverty. The relatively low unemployment rate conceals a structural problem of precarious work in the labour market and the quality of the work that is in demand. The analysis made in the Productive Agenda shows that sectors with low added value are those in which the largest proportion of the labour force, mainly low-skilled, is concentrated. The national survey of micro-, small and medium-sized enterprises in the manufacturing industry, carried out in January 2008 at the initiative of the Ministry of Industry and Competitiveness and the National Federation of Chambers of Small Industry of Ecuador (FENAPI), found that, of the 4,000 enterprises assessed in all provinces in 2007, those which prepared their employees the most were medium-sized enterprises and small enterprises (76 per cent and 58 per cent of enterprises, respectively). The enterprises that contributed the least to developing the productive skills of their workers were micro-enterprises, which only trained 33 per cent of them. According to the Productive Agenda, it is necessary to work intensively in cooperation with employers to develop the productive skills of their employees. In its General Survey concerning employment instruments, 2010, the Committee also emphasized the increasingly important role of the social partners and training institutions in determining human resources development strategies. The Committee invites the Government to indicate in its next report the manner in which workers' and employers' representatives have contributed to the development of vocational training mechanisms. The Committee reiterates its interest in being able to examine information enabling it to assess the impact of the measures adopted by the National Vocational Training Council for the coordination of vocational education and training policies with employment opportunities.

El Salvador

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1995)

The Committee notes the full information received from the Government in September 2011 in relation to the 2010 direct request.

Active policy intended to promote full employment. The Government indicates in its report that the efforts of the public and private sectors to intervene and contribute to the generation of decent employment, including the micro-enterprise sector, are articulated around the establishment of the National Employment Network (RENACEMPLEO) and employment grants. The Government includes information on the activities undertaken by the RENACEMPLEO and the employment fairs in 2009, 2010 and January–July 2011. The Government adds that it received technical assistance from the Government of the United States (USAID) to make an assessment of the form in which employment fairs are held and from the Japan International Cooperation Agency (JICA) to improve the labour mediation system. The Committee notes that a process of consultation was initiated for the formulation of a national employment policy. In June 2010, the Higher Labour Council decided to work on the development of a national employment policy based on the consensus points agreed to in a national employment pact. The Committee notes that, according to official projections, the working-age population will rise from 3,790,000 to 4,240,000 persons between 2010 and 2020, which will require the generation of approximately 455,000 new jobs by the end of the decade, that is an average of a little over 45,500 jobs annually during the period under consideration. According to the data published by ECLAC, 12,500 formal jobs were created in the first half of 2010. The Committee refers to paragraph 785 of its General Survey of 2010 concerning employment instruments, in which it indicated that there are three fundamental steps to achieving full, productive and freely chosen employment. The first is to make a political commitment to achieve full employment. The Committee recalls that Article 2 of the Convention sets out that member States shall implement a framework of a coordinated economic and social policy, which is to be clearly defined and declared. The Committee invites the Government to indicate whether a national employment plan has been established so as to implement an active policy intended to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment. The Committee hopes that updated information will be included in the next report on the activities carried out by the RENACEMPLEO with a view to identifying the size and distribution of the labour force, and the nature and extent of unemployment as an essential phase in implementing an active employment policy within the meaning of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to include information on the efforts made to hold consultations with the social partners, as required by Article 3 of the Convention. In this respect, the Committee emphasizes the importance of taking into account the views and securing the support of the social partners in order to ensure that the programmes implemented generate quality employment. The Committee reiterates its request for information to be included on the consultations held with all the sectors affected, including representatives of the rural sector and the informal economy.

Impact of trade agreements. The Government indicates that the impact of trade agreements is seen through the development of programmes to generate employment in public works and the support that is provided to micro-enterprises and self-employment in rural areas of the country. The Committee invites the Government to include information in its next report on the impact on the labour market of the development of export-oriented productive sectors, both for manufactured products and for goods of the rural economy.

Vulnerable groups. The Government indicates that 51 per cent of the clients of the Public Employment Service are women. In addition, a government programme was established for women (Ciudad Mujer) intended to provide specialized services gathering together at the same location the state institutions offering specialized services for women. Self-employment fairs are held for older adult women. Using World Bank funding, temporary income support is provided in the 25 urban municipal areas identified as those most in need for women heads of household and young persons between 16 and 24 years of age without formal employment and belonging to poor households. The Committee also notes other initiatives to support employment and rural production. The Government recognizes that the promotion of youth employment is a challenge and is aiming to reduce the levels of youth unemployment and poverty by providing young persons with a process of support through vocational training and labour market integration initiatives. The Committee hopes that the next report will include more specific information on the measures adopted to strengthen programmes to facilitate the integration of youth and women into the labour market and on the results achieved through such measures. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the situation, level and trends of employment, unemployment and underemployment, with an indication of the extent to which the most vulnerable sectors are affected (women, youth, the poorest sectors of the rural population and workers in the informal economy). The Committee would be grateful to continue examining information that enables it to assess the impact achieved by the measures adopted to facilitate the entry into the open labour market of persons with disabilities.

Micro-, small and medium-sized enterprises. The Committee notes the action taken between June 2009 and May 2010 in the context of the Support Strategy for Small and Micro-Enterprises 2010–14, including the data on the number of services provided and beneficiary entrepreneurs. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the impact of the measures adopted to promote entrepreneurial development and to improve the competitiveness and sustainability of micro-, small and medium-sized enterprises.

Germany

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1971)

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy. Following the 2010 observation, the Government provided in September 2011 a general review of the economic situation and labour market developments for the period June 2009 to May 2011. During the period considered, the Government's objective was to overcome the drastic decline in economic growth as rapidly as possible and to set new impulses for a stable, dynamic recovery. Labour market employment opportunities were improved for young persons and the fiscal burden was lowered on companies and employees. The Committee notes that developments in the German labour market have been positive. The number of unemployed in the second quarter of 2010 was below the 3 million mark (April–June 2010: 2,919,100 persons were unemployed, and a further reduction was observed in the same period of 2011: 2,472,000 were in unemployment in April–June 2011 according to the data made available to the ILO). The Government stated that the decline in unemployment, which was reached before the global economic crisis started affecting the labour market in October 2008, was not exclusively the result of cyclic effects but due to the success of labour market reforms, such as the reform of the Federal Employment Agency. Under new legislation, it was possible to reduce structural unemployment and measures were taken to counteract the consolidation of long-term unemployment (since 2007, long-term unemployment has fallen by more than eight percentage points). The Government indicates that the reforms notably increased the matching efficiency of the labour market. Candidates find work more quickly and easily and thus spend less time looking for jobs. A further prerequisite for matched placement is that the people concerned should be appropriately qualified to satisfy job market requirements. People with insufficient qualifications have lower chances of finding work and are at greater risk of remaining unemployed. The Committee expressed in its 2010 observation its appreciation of the efforts in implementing under the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88), measures to achieve the best possible organization of the employment market through the public employment service in an extremely difficult period. The Committee looks forward to receiving from the Government, in its next report on Convention No. 122, an assessment of the impact of its active labour market measures, in particular the actions taken to secure the supply of skilled labour and to monitor the labour market. It also invites the Government to provide information on the consultations held on the matters covered by the Convention with the social partners, including details of their contribution in the implementation of an active employment policy.

Long-term unemployment. The Government indicates that to combat long-term unemployment, people have to be given consistent, timely support. Support that is tailor-made to suit the individuals concerned allows them to rapidly find employment at living wages on the regular job market. The Committee notes that a draft law for improving the chances of integration into the labour market was passed in May 2011. Job centres with partners of the regional networks will be more involved in developing and targeting implementation of their own instruments to assist the long-term unemployed to find work. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report information on the results achieved in terms of ensuring job opportunities for the long-term unemployed.

Youth unemployment. The Committee notes that in May 2011 some 258,000 young people between 15 and 25 years of age were unemployed (-15.6 per cent compared with May 2010). The decline in youth unemployment compared with 2010 was more pronounced in western parts than in eastern parts of Germany. The Government indicates that, among other initiatives, a new proactive approach to improving job market opportunities for young people is initially tested in 20 regions for optimizing collaboration among the social security centres, the public employment offices and the youth welfare offices. The national pact for the training of a new generation of skilled workers was extended in October 2010 until 2014 including representatives of the Ministers of Education and Cultural Affairs as well as the federal authority responsible for integration. The Committee invites the Government to include detailed information in its next report on the results obtained in terms of ensuring lasting employment for young persons who enter the labour market, as well as on the efforts made to provide appropriate skills to young persons within the implementation of the programmes adopted.

Greece

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1984)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Employment policy measures implemented under the adjustment programme. The Committee notes the Government's report received in February 2012 for the period ending in May 2011, and an additional report received in August 2012 in reply to the 2011 observation. The Government indicates in the report received in February 2012 that the current short-term decline in economic activity and the rise of unemployment are unavoidable consequences resulting from the adjustment of investment and consumer expectations as well as from the frontload and rapid fiscal consolidation, which is nevertheless necessary in order for the public debt to become manageable and for the country's growth potential to be improved. The Government indicates that the National Reform Programme 2011–14 was prepared by following the ten guidelines included in the Joint Employment Report. In the context of the programme, under the Europe 2020 Strategy, the Government has set 70 per cent as the national target for overall employment at national level in 2020 and pointed out specific bottlenecks in the labour market. The Committee notes that challenges include bottlenecks in entering, re-entering and staying in the labour market for specific groups, such as women, young persons and older workers; the need to reinforce the central role of the Public Employment Service (PES), as well as to establish and activate decentralized intermediate structures in policy implementation; skills mismatch; and undeclared work. The Government indicates that the uncontested fact is that the obligations arising from the Memorandum of Understanding (May 2010) and its successive supplements restrict and define the framework of implementation of the national employment policy. The Committee notes the information provided by the labour inspectorate for the first five months of 2011, which points out a decrease of 27.67 per cent in full-time employment contracts and a rise of 11 per cent in rotation employment. The Government indicates that it is evident that more and more full-time employment contracts are being converted into part-time or rotation work contracts. In reply to the 2011 observation, the Government indicates in the report received in August 2012 that in the last two years, given the adverse economic conditions, a series of legislative interventions have taken place, within the framework of the Memorandum of Understanding and the relevant adjustment programmes of the country, with the aim of improving the functioning of the labour market. Moreover, the Government reports that measures are being promoted in order to improve access to basic social services, along with the effective reorganization of labour market institutions, with a view to mitigating the social impact from the crisis. Since the beginning of 2010 up to and including May 2012, more than 905,000 persons, as workers, self-employed freelancers or trainees, have joined 57 specific programmes of the Employment and Labour Organization (OAED) with a total budget of €3.5 billion relating to job retention, promotion of employment and vocational training. The Government estimates that on completion of such programmes, the beneficiaries will exceed 1.1 million persons. It also estimates that, due to these actions, the growth rate in unemployment has been reduced by 5 per cent in the 2010–11 period. The Committee notes the statistics published by the Hellenic Statistical Authority (ELSTAT) indicating that the unemployment rate in July 2012 was 25.1 per cent compared to 17.8 per cent in July 2011. The number of employed persons amounted to 3,763,142, the number of unemployed persons amounted to 1,261,604, and the number of inactive persons reached 3,356,276. Employed persons decreased by 329,086 and unemployed persons increased by 377,991 when compared with July 2011. The Committee notes from these statistics the staggeringly high youth unemployment rate with the 15–24 age group reaching 54.2 per cent unemployment in July 2012. Taking into account that the next report on the Convention is due in 2013, the Committee invites the Government to further specify how, pursuant to Article 2 of the Convention, it keeps under review the measures and policies adopted according to the results achieved in pursuit of the objectives of full, productive and freely chosen employment, specified in Article 1. It recalls that, in the terms of that Article, an active employment policy should be pursued “as a major goal”, which may be complemented by other measures to attenuate the consequences of unemployment. It also invites the Government to include in its next report information on the results of the measures adopted in order to overcome the impact of the debt crisis on the labour market, and information on the number of programme beneficiaries obtaining lasting employment.

Promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs). The Committee notes the information on the measures to promote SMEs. These measures include a programme to support micro-, small and medium-sized enterprises in the manufacturing sector; a youth entrepreneurship and female entrepreneurship programme aiming at offering start-up support on entrepreneurial activities and creating new jobs; a clothing and footwear programme; and the new innovative entrepreneurship programme which aims at enhancing the creation of new businesses. In addition, the Government indicates that the Hellenic Fund for Entrepreneurship and Development has been established by virtue of Act No. 3912/2011 in order to improve the business climate and grant loans under favourable terms to finance investment projects. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the impact of the measures taken to improve the business environment in order to promote the development of SMEs and create employment opportunities for the unemployed.

Modernization of labour market institutions. The Committee noted in its previous observation that the Government had underscored the need to give priority to the modernization of labour market institutions. The Committee once again refers to its observation on the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88), and invites the Government to provide in its next report on Convention No. 122 further information on the effectiveness of the reorganization of its labour market institutions.

Vulnerable categories of workers. The Government states in the report received in August 2012 that policies to contain unemployment and enhance employment are top priority, especially for the vulnerable population groups that are dropped out of the labour market or are at risk of poverty and social exclusion. To this end, the Ministry of Labour is taking measures to mitigate the adverse effects of the crisis and to support the employment of the most vulnerable workers. Employment support programmes are aimed at workers and unemployed persons, focusing on population groups most affected by unemployment, such as young persons and vulnerable groups that face great difficulties in entering the labour market. Furthermore, a concerted effort is made to use the available resources and adapt programme planning to the Greek reality. With respect to young persons, the Government indicates that an employers' subsidy programme is being implemented by the OAED, according to which the insurance contributions for pension, health-care services and occupational hazards of young persons aged 16–24 are fully subsidized by the OAED. Young unemployed people are also benefiting from programmes targeted at all unemployed persons. Some of these programmes provide special priority for young persons. Moreover, in order to facilitate youth transition into the labour market and address high unemployment rates for this age group, targeted active employment policies as well as programmes supporting youth entrepreneurship are planned and/or implemented, aiming at facilitating the integration of the youth into the labour market by enhancing their skills and acquiring work experience. To this end, the following programmes are being implemented: subsidy programmes for the acquisition of work experience for enterprises with the aim of recruiting unemployed graduates of universities and technological institutes (up to 35 years old), community service programmes in the sector of culture for young people, as well as training programmes for the youth, with the use of training vouchers so that they can acquire work experience either generally or targeted in industries. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the impact of the measures taken to ensure lasting employment for young persons and other vulnerable categories of workers.

Education and training policies. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in the report received in August 2012 indicating that vocational training was provided to 374,798 workers through 16 programmes of the Fund for Employment and Vocational Training (LAEK) and programmes of structural adjustment. With respect to young people, 26,664 students attended vocational training programmes in 51 apprenticeship schools, 31 Vocational Training Institutes (IEK), as well as two model units for persons with disabilities. Furthermore, the Government provides information on actions taken by the Ministry of Labour, such as training programmes for unemployed persons on basic skills (computers and communications) with a view to combating unemployment and improving the professional skills of the workforce in sectors strongly affected by the economic crisis. The Committee once again invites the Government to include in its next report information on progress made to activate the National System for Linking Vocational Education and Training with Employment (ESSEEKA).

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. The Government reiterates that the social partners participate in the OAED's Board of Directors, which decides on the preparation and implementation of the programmes designed and implemented by the OAED. It adds that the social partners also participate in the Council for Lifelong Learning and Employment. The Committee invites the Government to indicate in its next report the manner in which account is taken of the opinions and experiences of the representatives of employers' and workers' organizations in the formulation and implementation of the labour market measures included in the adjustment programme.

Guatemala

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1988)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Coordination of employment policy and poverty reduction. In reply to the comments made in the 2010 observation, the Government provides information in the report received in September 2011 on the results of the National Emergency and Economic Recovery Programme (PNERE). The Committee notes that the objectives and aims of the employment policy of the PNERE facilitated the creation of jobs through investment to finance the construction of productive and social infrastructure, the granting of loans to small and medium-sized enterprises and the creation of jobs in the education, health and public sectors. The Government adds that the stimulus provided for public works in the fields of physical and social infrastructure made it possible to reduce the impact of the recession. Over 4,500 million Guatemalan quetzal (GTQ) were invested in the construction of road infrastructure, as well as a first down payment of GTQ332 million for the construction of the Northern Transversal Highway. In the field of education, around 2,000 classrooms, 800 sanitary services and 86 new school centres were equipped. The Committee invites the Government to provide updated information in its next report so that it can examine the manner in which the new employment objectives set out in government programmes have been achieved.

Article 2. Labour market information. The Committee notes that the data from the employment and income survey of 2010 are the first formal and official employment data for the country that have been available since the previous survey in 2004. The economically active population has risen by 16.3 per cent in relation to 2004 (and now numbers 5,769,262 persons). Around 202,876 persons are unemployed (3.52 per cent of the economically active population), while over 3,400,000 persons are underemployed or in the informal economy. The Committee observes that almost 60 per cent of the economically active population are without statutory benefits. The Government acknowledges that underemployment is becoming one of the most serious and complex problems confronting the country. Its seriousness lies in the magnitude and persistence of a phenomenon with devastating social consequences. The Committee invites the Government to provide in its next report updated information on the situation, level and trends of the labour market showing the impact of the measures adopted to promote employment for the most vulnerable sectors (women, youth, workers in the rural sector and the informal economy). The Committee requests the Government to provide updated information in the report on the size and distribution of the labour force, and the nature and extent of unemployment and underemployment.

Impact of trade policy in meeting the demand for jobs. In reply to its previous comments, the Government indicates that, despite the fact that Guatemala is a medium- to low-income country, its education system and the lack of social protection mechanisms are similar to low-income countries. The Government recognizes that the country will reap the benefits of access to the world market if human development strategies are included as an integral part of its growth and competitiveness strategy. The structure of exports was changing over the past decade (exports of manufactured products increased, services grew and agricultural exports decreased). The Government expresses concern that exports are dominated by agricultural and unsophisticated manufactured products, which generates low-quality jobs. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the impact of trade agreements on the generation of productive employment.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. The Government indicates that an executive board composed of ministerial representatives was set up for the implementation of the PNERE. The crisis committee included representatives of the private sector, cooperatives and civil society. The Committee considers that greater participation by the social partners would make it possible to achieve better results in terms of employment and to overcome the persistent labour market difficulties. The Committee invites the Government to provide detailed information on the efforts made to hold the consultations with the social partners required by the Convention, which are intended for the design and implementation of an active employment policy. In this respect, the Committee emphasizes the importance of taking into account the views and securing the support of the social partners in order to ensure that the programmes implemented generate high-quality employment. The Committee reiterates its request for the inclusion of information on the consultations held with all the sectors concerned, including representatives of the rural sector and the informal economy.

Coordination of education and training policy with employment opportunities. In reply to its previous comments, the Government recalls the role played by the social partners on the governing board of the Technical Institute for Training and Productivity (INTECAP), in which plans and programmes are defined for the provision of vocational training and technical assistance for enterprises to improve national productivity. The Government refers to various initiatives adopted by the authorities and indicates that the illiteracy rate has fallen to 18.46 per cent (in 2005 the adult illiteracy rate was around 26 per cent). The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the impact of INTECAP plans and programmes, as well as those implemented by the Ministry of Education and the National Employment System to ensure that each person who has acquired training can find suitable employment and endowments in such employment (Article 1(2)(c)).

Guinea

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1966)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Coordination of employment policy with poverty reduction. The Committee notes the Government's report received in July 2012. The Government indicates that employment is at the heart of the socio-economic development process and in 2007 it incorporated this dimension into the second poverty reduction strategy paper (PRSP). In this context, the Government undertook to create better conditions for the effective implementation of programmes and projects to achieve full employment for all. To this end, the Ministry of Youth and Youth Employment and the Ministry of Employment, Technical Education and Vocational Training were established. The Government indicates various measures in its report intended to promote youth employment and women's employment, including the formulation of the National Support Programme for Youth Employment (2007), the setting up of the National Fund for the Integration of Young People (FONIJ), the establishment of two support funds (30 billion Guinean francs for young people and 100 billion Guinean francs for women) for employment promotion and poverty reduction and the implementation, in partnership with the World Food Programme, of the "food for apprentices" programme for 1,000 disadvantaged young persons (2010). It also refers to the measures to improve the provision of vocational and technical training, including the establishment of a programme for the rehabilitation and equipment of vocational and technical training centres and the training of young persons in labour-intensive techniques by the Guinean Agency for Work in the Public Interest (AGETIP). The Government indicates that the plan of action for the implementation of the national employment promotion policy in Guinea of December 2003 has not yet been put into effect because of the social unrest experienced by the country since that time. The Committee further notes that, according to the PRSP 2011–12, the unemployment rate increased from 10.2 per cent to 15 per cent in Conakry and fell from 6.7 per cent to 3.2 per cent in the other cities between 2002 and 2007. Overall, underemployment affected 9.1 per cent of the active population in 2007 compared with 11.8 per cent in 2002. Women are worse affected by underemployment than men (7.5 per cent for men and 10.5 per cent for women). The proportion of the active population which is underemployed is higher in rural areas (11.1 per cent) than in urban areas (5.4 per cent). The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the results achieved, particularly for young persons and women, by the measures for employment promotion and for better provision of vocational and technical training. It also invites the Government to provide information on progress made on putting into effect the plan of action for the implementation of the national employment promotion policy.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners in the formulation and implementation of policies. The Government indicates that it includes the social partners in all stages of conception, formulation and implementation of employment policies. The Committee invites the Government to provide detailed information in its next report on consultation of the social partners in the process of formulation and implementation of employment policies.

ILO technical assistance. The Committee notes the request for technical assistance relating to implementation of the national employment policy made by the Government in its report. In view of the difficulties faced by the Government in recent years in meeting its obligation to submit reports on the application of the Convention, the Committee notes that the preparation of a detailed report containing the information required in the present observation and by the report form will certainly give the Government and the social partners the opportunity to evaluate the effectiveness of the employment policy in achieving the objectives of full and productive employment which are set out in the Convention. The Committee considers that technical assistance from the competent units of the ILO might be useful to help the Government with bridging the gaps in the implementation of an active employment policy in accordance with the Convention.

Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159) (ratification: 1995)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that the Community-Based National Rehabilitation Programme (PNRBC), initiated by the Ministry for Social Affairs and the Advancement of Women and Children, provides for vocational rehabilitation measures, including the integration of children with disabilities in schools, vocational training and promotion of the employment of persons with disabilities. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the measures adopted in the context of the PNRBC and a copy of the annual report referred to in its previous reports. Please also provide any other document containing statistics, studies or surveys on the matters covered by the Convention (Part V of the report form).

Article 4. The Committee notes that rules are applied to guarantee equality of opportunity and that a bill has been prepared on the protection and advancement of persons with disabilities. Please provide information on the content of the acts and to send a copy of the abovementioned text when it has been adopted.

Article 7. The Committee notes the existence of a department responsible for the occupational integration of persons with disabilities in the National Directorate of Technical Education and Vocational Training and that the National Office for Vocational Training and Further Training has established a special section responsible for the training of young persons with disabilities. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the action taken in practice by these services for securing, retaining and advancing persons with disabilities in employment.

Article 8. The Committee notes that vocational rehabilitation and employment of persons with disabilities at their place of origin (rural areas and remote communities) is an essential objective of the PNRBC in collaboration with the Guinea Federation of Disabled Persons (FE.GUI.PAH). Furthermore, some measures have been taken, such as the establishment of branches of the National Orthopaedic Centre in the interior of the country (Mamou and N'Zérékoré) and the granting of tax and duty exemptions for any enterprise of persons with disabilities. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the development of services for persons with disabilities in rural areas and remote communities.

Article 9. The Government indicated previously that a National Orthopaedic Centre has existed since 1973 for the rehabilitation and apprenticeship of persons with disabilities of all ages. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the number of persons trained and made available to persons with disabilities.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Hungary

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1969)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Employment policy measures implemented under the adjustment programme. The Committee notes the detailed report provided by the Government which sets out and defines several of its employment programmes during the reporting period ending in May 2011. Following the global economic crisis in 2008–09, the Hungarian national economy experienced severe difficulties, including limited access to market financing. To this end, the Government requested assistance from the European Union (EU) and the International Monetary Fund (IMF). To encourage and support economic recovery, the Government has been expected to meet headline fiscal targets. In this regard, the Committee notes that, in March 2011, the Government announced a Structural Reform Programme (Széll Kálmán Plan) to align with the long-term objectives of the Europe 2020 Strategy, which is set out in a two-part package: the 2011–15 Convergence Programme and the April 2011 National Reform Programme. In this regard, the Committee notes that restructuring the labour market benefits in accordance with the structural reform programme has been identified as a main objective of the Government's 2012 budget. The Committee further notes the information provided by the Government that its negative trend of decreasing employment halted in 2010, when the employment rate remained at 55.4 per cent; however, this rate remains one of the lowest employment rates in the EU. The unemployment rate increased from 9.7 per cent in the first three months of 2009, to 11.2 per cent in 2010, to 10.9 per cent in 2011, and 10.5 per cent in 2012. The Government indicates that its economy is expected to continue developing slower than its neighbouring countries. The Committee further notes that the employment rate for persons aged 20–64 years was 60.6 per cent and was anticipated to increase to 61.1 per cent in 2011 and to 62.4 or 62.6 per cent in 2012, and that this low rate of employment has been attributed to loose labour market conditions affecting persons entering the labour market under the age of 25 or those above the age of 45 with lower levels of education. The Committee notes that, according to the National Reform Programme, the national economy may accelerate to a growth rate of 4–6 per cent from 2013, and the number of those employed may increase by 400,000 by 2015, owing to the indirect impact of structural reforms and improvements in competitiveness. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its report due in 2013 on how measures taken by the adjustment programme, including the National Reform Programme and Convergence Programme, are coordinated so as to effectively translate into productive employment creation.

Implementation of active labour market measures. The Committee notes the measures and programmes outlined by the Government, including three programmes, “Job security”, “Road to work” and “New perspectives”, to provide job security and creation. The Government further reports on measures undertaken in 2010 to promote the gradual improvement of corporate profitability and the creation of new employment. The Committee invites the Government to provide in its next report information on the effects of these measures on the labour market.

Equitable regional development. The Committee notes that the National Reform Programme aims to achieve balanced and sustainable regional development, and that, pursuant to this programme, the Government places priority on national targets that aim to help regional convergence by incorporating regional considerations in its implementation of individual measures. The Government indicates in its report that, until April 2011, the total contracted amount of support reached 40,235,000,000 Hungarian forints in the framework of the application schemes announced for the most disadvantaged subregions. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report information on the impact of the regional development policies adopted to generate employment in the low-income areas.

The Roma minority. The Committee notes that, on 20 May 2011, the Government concluded a framework agreement with the National Roma Self Government (ORÖ) in order to facilitate the achievement of the goals set out in the Convention. The Committee notes that, pursuant to the framework agreement, special emphasis is placed on job creation and cooperation in the field of education, and that a key priority is to replace abuse of power and discrimination with serving of the public interest, including the Roma community. To this end, the Committee notes Government Decree 1136/2011 and its accompanying action plan, which aim to: (i) involve 100,000 unemployed Roma persons in the labour market; (ii) implement a comprehensive educational reform; (iii) provide competitive vocational training for around 50,000 adult Roma persons with no higher than apprenticeship education and 80,000 additional adult Roma persons in basic skills training; and (iv) involve 150,000 Roma persons in organized permanent medical consultation. The Committee asks the Government to report in detail on the impact of the action taken within the framework agreement and measures to increase active employment policies and social cohesion of the Roma minority.

Youth employment. The Committee notes that the unemployment rate of young persons rose from 20 per cent in 2008 to 27 per cent in 2009, but then declined to 24.3 per cent in 2011, i.e. about 5 per cent above the EU average. The Government states that this high rate of unemployment is attributable to the low level of education, lack of work experience, and location in which they are seeking employment. The Committee further notes, in this respect, the measures set out in the Convergence Programme, including the development of a higher education and quota system that better conforms to the needs of the labour market. Pursuant to the National Reform Programme, in order to improve the chances of school drop-outs on the labour market, the Government introduced the early start of vocational training at grade 9, which will be mandatory from the 2012–13 school year and will make possible that, after finishing grade 8 of elementary school, pupils can directly enter a vocational training course. The Government further reports the introduction and development of a dual training system, which it states will be more responsive to the needs of the economy. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report information on the progress of the development and implementation of the above measures, as well as the results of its new training system, to ensure that the skills acquired meet the demands of the labour market.

Other vulnerable categories of workers. Pursuant to the measures set out in the National Reform Programme, in order to increase the employment of persons with disabilities, the Government will support the organizations that employ these workers in order to stimulate their return to the labour market. In addition, new programmes launched in 2011 aim to train adults with disadvantages, and provide an opportunity for obtaining basic education. The National Reform Programme indicates that a programme will be started which aims to improve prioritized key competencies, such as foreign languages and information technology, and promote lifelong learning to enhance the adaptability of the adult population. The Committee invites the Government to supply information on these new measures and programmes to promote employment for vulnerable categories of workers, such as persons with disabilities, women and older workers, and on the results achieved in terms of introducing these workers in lasting and productive employment.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners in employment policy formulation and implementation. The Committee notes that, following the adoption in December 2011 of the Labour Code, the National Economic and Social Council (NGTT) has replaced the tripartite National Conciliation Council (OÉT). The Committee understands that the new provisions may alter the previous participation of the social partners. The Committee invites the Government to submit updated information on the manner in which it is ensured that consultations will take place with representatives of employers and workers concerning employment policies, with a view to taking fully into account their experience and views and securing their full cooperation in formulating and enlisting support for such policies, as laid out in the Convention.

Iceland

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1990)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Employment trends and active labour market measures. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in a report prepared with the Icelandic Tripartite ILO Committee and received in August 2012. The Government reports that unemployment has fallen from its peak level in 2009. In June 2009, unemployment reached 8.1 per cent, falling to 7.6 per cent in June 2010, and 6.7 per cent in June 2011. Unemployment is greater among young persons (aged 16 to 24) than among older persons (aged 60 and over). According to the labour market surveys by Statistics Iceland, 16 per cent of young people were unemployed in 2009 and 16.2 per cent in 2010. The Government indicates that its main tasks in the employment sphere are to cut unemployment by deliberate means, to eradicate long-term unemployment and to create a more solid foundation for the Icelandic business sector in the future. It also indicates that it is committed to promoting the formulation of a comprehensive employment policy for Iceland, based on equality of status between the occupational sectors, gender equality, healthy commercial practice and “green” economic development in accordance with the principles of sustainable development. This policy is to be implemented by means of consultation between central and local government, the social partners and the academic community. The Government further indicates that a broad campaign to generate employment will include measures aimed at enabling companies to take on people who are registered as unemployed in temporary positions with the support of the Unemployment Insurance Fund, improving the business environment for start-ups and innovative companies by adjustments to the tax legislation, prioritizing state-funded projects that call for large manpower input, and creating job opportunities for young persons. With respect to young persons, a total of ISK250 million was allocated by the Unemployment Insurance Fund in 2010 to create summer jobs for students in a campaign called “856 New Jobs”. The same approach was used in 2011 with a campaign to increase the number of jobs available in state and municipal bodies for students and other jobseekers. The Committee notes that the Government intends to initiate wide-range consultation under the leadership of the Office of the Prime Minister on regional development projects aimed at building up employment and future quality of life. Collaboration with the social partners is to be sought on active labour market measures to combat unemployment. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the impact of the measures taken to generate employment through the implementation of an active employment policy. It also invites the Government to include in its next report further information on the employment measures implemented at the regional level in cooperation with the social partners (Article 3).

Youth employment. The Government reports that in autumn 2009, the Minister of Social Affairs and Social Security appointed a task force to examine the remedies available and educational options open to people who had lost their jobs, and to propose improvements. Extensive data was gathered on the circumstances of the unemployed, and when this was analysed, priority was given to establishing the position of young people as unemployment is highest in the under-30 age group. The Government indicates that the main aim in combating the negative effects of unemployment among young people was to reduce the number of persons who were inactive while receiving unemployment benefits. Further measures were seen as necessary to activate this group and enable continuing education centres, upper-secondary schools and foundation course departments to admit these individuals. It was proposed that attention be given to expanding the range of vocational training courses and increasing the number of courses designed to keep people involved in social activities. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken to combat youth unemployment.

Education and training policies. The Government reports that as of 2011 the Business Sector’s Educational Centre has administered the Educational Fund. Previously, grants for vocational training in the business sector were made by the Vocational Education Council. The role of the Educational Fund is to encourage the provision of suitable educational opportunities for persons with little formal education. The Committee notes that, as a further measure, the Government plans to set up the Workplace Study Fund. In this regard, the Government has decided to earmark ISK450 million for workplace study schemes in 2012–14. Furthermore, the programme “Study is a Viable Way” is based on proposals from a consultative group appointed by the Prime Minister and representing government ministries, all the parties represented in Parliament, the social partners and students’ movement. The financing for the programme was secured by agreement between the Government and the social partners in connection with collective wage agreements. The Committee notes that the programme aims to reduce the proportion of people aged 20–66 who have not completed upper-secondary education from 30 per cent to 10 per cent by 2020. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on the impact of the measures taken in the area of education and training policies and on their relation to the obtainment of productive employment for the beneficiaries of these measures.

Business development. The Government indicates that a collaborative programme, Entrepreneurial Enterprise, which is administered by the Directorate of Labour and Innovation Centre Iceland, aims at creating jobs for young people by supplying training and guidance to enable them to put their own entrepreneurial ideas into practice. With respect to business development and women, the Committee notes that the Women’s Credit Guarantee Fund was restored in March 2011. Its role is to support women to take part in employment and innovation by granting security for loans they obtain. The Fund’s priorities are to support women who own and operate small enterprises, to strive to increase the number of women owning and operating enterprise, to augment women’s access to capital for the purpose of running a business, to generate employment and encourage innovation in the business sector, and to encourage marginal groups of women (immigrants) to participate in business ventures. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the impact of business development measures on employment creation and decent work.

Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159) (ratification: 1990)

Promotion of employment for persons with disabilities. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in a report prepared in consultation with the Icelandic Tripartite ILO Committee and received in August 2012. It notes that the report was prepared in response to the request made by the Conference Committee in June 2012. The Committee notes with interest that the statement of objectives in the Disabled Persons Act, which took effect on 1 January 2011, defines the aim of the Act as being to guarantee persons with disabilities equality and quality of life comparable with that of other citizens and to create conditions in which they are able to live a normal life. The Government also indicates that the Programme of Action on Disabled Persons' Affairs for 2012–14 defines measures aimed at making workplaces accessible, supporting persons with disabilities in the private sector and making the labour market more accessible to them. The aim is that 85 per cent of persons with disabilities of working age should be employed, or be involved in measures to increase their involvement, or in programmes of studies, by the end of 2014. The Committee notes with interest the adoption on 12 June 2012 of Act No. 60/2012 on Employment-Related Vocational Rehabilitation and the Operation of Vocational Rehabilitation Funds. The Government indicates that the aim of the Act is to ensure that individuals with reduced working capacity following illness or accidents will have access to vocational rehabilitation as one part of a comprehensive rehabilitation programme in which vocational rehabilitation funds and institutions operated by central and local government collaborate as far as possible and strive to define and fulfil their roles with the aim that as many people as possible are enabled to remain active in the labour market. The origins of the Act go back to the collective agreements of 2008 between the social partners, and the Vocational Rehabilitation Fund (VIRK) was established to give effect to the collective agreements, as noted in the 2010 observation. The Committee would welcome continuing to receive information on the measures adopted to promote employment opportunities for persons with disabilities. Please also include practical information, including statistics (disaggregated as much as possible by age, gender and the nature of the disability), extracts from reports, studies or inquiries on the matters covered by the Convention (Part V of the report form).

India

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1998)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Formulation and implementation of an active employment policy. The Committee notes the detailed information and statistics provided by the Government in a report received in August 2012 in response to the request made by the Conference Committee in June 2012. The Government indicates that, from 2004–05 to 2010–11, the Indian economy has enjoyed an unprecedented 8.5 per cent growth, despite the fact that this was a period that saw a severe global financial and economic crisis. The crisis slowed down the growth rate to 6.8 per cent in 2008–09, but the economy rebounded with a robust growth rate of 8.6 per cent in 2010–11. This was composed of 5.4 per cent growth in agriculture, 8.1 per cent in industry and 9.6 per cent in services. The performance in agriculture has been particularly satisfying, with farmers producing more than 235 million tonnes of food grains. The Government indicates that India weathered the 2008 global crisis well by using the available fiscal space for inclusive growth through higher spending for employment generation and poverty alleviation programmes. Unlike other developed countries where the measures to counter job losses were ad hoc and contained elements of protectionism, in the Indian case, the programmes for employment generation were planned with a long-term outlook free of any elements of protectionism. Employment generation programmes like the Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Act (MGNREGA) have been instrumental in creating employment opportunities and placing additional income in the hands of the poor and disadvantaged sections of society. The Government also states that it is working to develop the knowledge, skills and attitudes of stakeholders involved in rural development so as to introduce them to the newest concepts, techniques and information to enable them to act as catalysts for qualitative development. The Committee invites the Government to indicate in its next report to which extent measures implemented under the Five-Year Plan 2007–12 have managed to improve the quality of the employment generated and alleviate both unemployment and underemployment. Please also provide information on the efforts made to improve the employment situation for young persons and workers in the unorganized sector and the results achieved in terms of designing targeted programmes and incentives for the promotion of sustainable job creation for the youth and for those working in the informal economy.

Labour market trends. The Government reports that underemployment in various segments of the labour force is quite high. During 2009–10, the proportion of usually employed women who were found not to be employed during the week preceding the date of the survey was 15 per cent in rural India and nearly 6 per cent in urban India. The Committee notes from the 44th Session of the Indian Labour Conference held in February 2012 that the female labour force participation rates in the country are low and have remained more or less constant over the past decades. The Government further reports that employment estimated on a usual basis has increased from 459.1 million in 2004–05 to 465.48 million in 2009–10, which shows an increase of about 6.4 million people able to find employment during that period. The number of young jobseekers in the 15–29 age group, not all of whom may necessarily be unemployed, registered with employment exchanges was 270 million on 31 December 2008. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government indicating that workers from scheduled castes, scheduled tribes and minorities are predominantly engaged in the labour market as casual workers, self-employed in agriculture, small manufactures and traders. The proportion of regularly employed workers is as low as 6.7 per cent among scheduled tribes and a little over 12 per cent among scheduled castes and minorities. The Committee would welcome continuing to receive relevant data on the situation and trends of the labour market disaggregated by state, sector, age, sex and skills, in particular for socially vulnerable groups, such as young persons, women jobseekers, scheduled castes and scheduled tribes, ethnic minorities and persons with disabilities (Article 1(2) and Article 2(a)).

Employment generation programmes. The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government on the different employment generation programmes implemented in order to create employment opportunities for unemployed persons, including young persons and rural workers. During the 11th Five-Year Plan 2007–12, a number of employment-oriented programmes like the MGNREGA have been implemented resulting in employment generation. It further indicates that the employment generation programmes are constantly reviewed and assessed for better performance. In the 2011–12 financial year (up to December 2011), 37.7 million households were provided employment with an average of about 32 days of employment generated per household. The Government reports that the enhanced wage earnings have led to a strengthening of the livelihood resource base of the rural poor in India as 72 per cent of the funds utilized were in the form of wages paid to workers. Furthermore, the Ministry of Rural Development has decided to redesign the ongoing Swarnjayanti Gram Swarojgar Yojana (SGSY) programme into the National Rural Livelihood Mission (NRLM) to make it universal in application, focused in approach, and time bound for poverty eradication by 2014–15. The idea has been conceived as a cornerstone of the national poverty reduction strategy. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the impact of the MGNREGA and other major employment generation programmes in enhancing job growth and sustainable employment for poor workers in the rural sector.

Article 3. Consultation with the representatives of the persons affected. The Committee notes with interest the information provided by the Government concerning tripartite consultations. The Government reports that the 44th Session of the Indian Labour Conference included discussions on issues such as the possibilities of enhancing female labour force participation, skills development for young persons, minimum wages, social security, employability and employment. Furthermore, the Government indicates that an Act like the MGNREGA, seeking to empower poor rural communities and transforming traditional hierarchical relationships through its rights-based processes, is bound to encounter a host of challenges. The Ministry of Rural Development has taken various initiatives to address these issues and strengthen the implementation of the MGNREGA through active participation by the social partners. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide examples of questions addressed and decisions reached on employment policy through tripartite bodies. It would also appreciate continuing to receive information on the involvement of the social partners in the implementation of the major employment generation programmes.

Part V of the report form. ILO technical assistance. The Government indicates that the Decent Work Country Programme – India Document (2007–12) is being implemented in collaboration with the ILO. The National Policy on Skill Development, National Policy on Safety, Health and Environment at Work Place and National Policy on HIV/AIDS and the World of Work were also formulated with inputs and technical expertise from the ILO. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken as a result of the assistance received from the ILO with respect to the matters covered by the Convention.

Ireland

Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

The Committee notes that the Government's last report was provided in October 2005. Following the deterioration that took place in the employment situation since 2008, the Committee invites the Government to provide information on the measures adopted by the public employment service to achieve the best possible organization of the employment market and to meet the needs of the economy and the active population (Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention). It also invites the Government to provide relevant information concerning the number of public employment offices established, the number of applications for employment received, the number of vacancies notified, and the number of persons placed in employment by such offices in each region of the country (Part IV of the report form).

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1967)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Employment policy measures implemented under the adjustment measures. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report received in August 2012 and the information provided by the Department of Education and Skills. The Committee notes that the previous report was received in 2005, and since then the country has been hard hit by the economic and financial crisis and has experienced a sharp rise in unemployment. It notes that the Irish Government has received financial support from the European Union and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) in order to address the banking crisis. The Government indicates in its report that around 325,000 jobs have been lost since employment peaked at 2.14 million in the final quarter of 2007, a fall of 15 per cent (real GDP, by comparison, declined by 12.5 per cent from its peak). While both male and female employment has declined, the impact on the former (-20.4 per cent) has been more significant than the latter (-8.4 per cent) given their dominance in the construction sector. The impact on young persons (aged 15–24) has also been substantial, accounting for more than half of the total employment decline. The Committee notes the training and education measures introduced by the Government and notes that in 2011, there were approximately 276,000 training and further education places available for the unemployed to access. It also notes the Eurostat statistical data indicating that unemployment reached 15 per cent in Ireland in August 2012. The Government indicates in its report that it believes that the bottlenecks in the Irish labour market include weak labour market demand, particularly in domestic services; long-term and structural elements of unemployment, with long-term unemployment accounting for 51.5 per cent of total unemployment; access to opportunities for up-skilling and re-skilling; the challenge of targeting cost-effective activation programmes to those most at risk of losing contact with the labour market and drifting into long-term unemployment; developing a more effective and streamlined response to the needs of the unemployed and removing disincentives to participation in training, education and employment opportunities. While many labour market bottlenecks need to be addressed, the Government's key focus remains on employment creation through export growth and improved competitiveness. The Committee notes that initiatives outlined in the National Recovery Plan 2011–14 in relation to activation policies include a rationalization of the National Employment Action Plan towards greater capacity and efficiency; more frequent and intense intervention with priority cohorts; the development of a Profiling and Case Management system in 2011; sanctions in the cases of unemployed persons on the Live Register unreasonably refusing to cooperate with the plan and/or with appropriate training, education and employment interventions; changes to the provision for One Parent Families to alter the passive nature of income maintenance that prevails currently. The Government indicates that it is committed to creating an environment that will create new jobs as well as support existing ones. To further this aim, a Ministerial portfolio has been created with a focus on jobs. In addition, the Government announced its intention to bring forward a Jobs Initiative and committed the Government to adhere to the structural reforms required to accelerate growth, job creation and debt sustainability broadly in line with the provisions of the EU/IMF/ECB programme of financial support for Ireland. In this regard, the Government is committed to reversing the recent cut in the national minimum wage, while offsetting any effect on business costs through a reduction in the amount of pay-related social insurance that employers must pay. Taking into account that the next report is due in 2013, the Committee invites the Government to further specify how, pursuant to Article 2 of the Convention, it keeps under review the measures and policies adopted according to the results achieved in pursuit of the objectives of full, productive and freely chosen employment, specified in Article 1. It recalls that, in the terms of that Article, an active employment policy should be pursued "as a major goal". It also invites the Government to include in its next report information on the impact of its active labour market measures adopted in order to address labour market bottlenecks and overcome the negative effects of the adjustment measures.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. The Committee notes that there is no information in the Government's report concerning the participation of the social partners in the formulation and implementation of employment policies. The Committee recalls that in its concluding remarks of the 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments, it emphasized that social dialogue is essential in normal times and becomes even more so in times of crisis (General Survey, 2010, paragraph 794). It therefore again asks the Government to provide information on consultations held with the social partners, both at the formulation and implementation stages of employment policies.

Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159) (ratification: 1986)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It hopes that a report will be supplied for examination by the Committee at its next session and that it will contain full information on the matters raised in its previous and present comments. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on measures adopted to promote employment in favour of persons with disabilities in the context of its national policy and international cooperation. It also invites the Government to provide a report, describing in detail the national policy on vocational rehabilitation and employment for workers with disabilities, including practical data on the achievements in promoting employment opportunities for persons with disabilities in the open labour market, in particular for women workers with disabilities, as required by the Convention (Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention). The report should include detailed information on the efforts to achieve effective equality of treatment between men and women workers with disabilities and other workers (Article 4); the manner in which representative employers' and workers' organizations, as well as representative organizations of and for persons with disabilities are consulted on the implementation of the policy (Article 5); the vocational guidance and training, placement, employment and other related services provided to enable persons with disabilities to secure, retain and advance in employment (Article 7); the services provided for persons with disabilities without financial resources (Article 8); and the measures adopted in practice to ensure the availability of suitably qualified staff in the field of vocational rehabilitation (Article 9). Please also include information on the manner in which the Convention is applied including, for example, statistics, disaggregated by age and sex, extracts from reports, studies and inquiries, concerning the matters covered by the Convention.

Italy

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1971)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Employment trends. The Committee notes the replies provided by the Government in December 2011 to the matters raised in its 2010 observation. The Government recalls that its strategy to tackle the effects of the global crisis on the labour market consisted of a mix of initiatives aimed at extending social safety nets and promoting active labour market measures for the re-employment of workers. Measures adopted between 2009 and 2011 focused on further broadening the coverage and extending the duration of income support schemes, providing income support to categories of workers not covered by existing schemes, providing employment subsidies to employers hiring workers benefiting from income support mechanisms and to unemployed workers setting up their own businesses, and enhancing the education and training system. In April 2011, an Agreement was signed between the State and regions which envisaged active labour market measures for the retraining and re-employment of workers. It targeted improving labour market information databases (Excelsior and Cliclavoro websites), expanding the role of inter-professional joint funds and bilateral bodies managed by the social partners in providing training, and narrowing the use of income support schemes. The data of the National Institute for Statistics (ISTAT) showed that economic growth was stagnating (GDP growth was 0.1 per cent and 0.3 per cent, respectively in the first and second semester of 2011), due to weak internal demand and a decrease in export volumes. The unemployment rate reached 8.9 per cent (2,243,000 unemployed persons) in December 2011, more than half being long-term unemployment. The Employment Outlook 2011 of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) indicates that the Italian labour market is becoming more segmented, with more mature workers in stable, protected jobs and many young workers in more precarious jobs. In this regard, the Committee recalls that new legislation was adopted regulating the limitation of temporary employment contracts. The Government also reports that, according to trade unions, in many cases derogations allowed by collective agreements pursuant to the new legislation were exceeded, resulting in many workers not benefiting from a stable employment relationship. In 2011, about 67,000 persons employed in the education sector working on a temporary basis were employed under permanent contracts. In October 2011, the Government expressed its intention to review structural fund programmes by focusing on education and employment with the aim of improving the conditions to enhance growth and tackle the regional divide. The Committee refers to its 2011 observation on the application of the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181), in which it noted that temporary work agencies were used for replacing workers with permanent employment thus contributing to labour market segmentation; temporary workers, including those employed by temporary work agencies, were the most affected by the crisis. The Committee invites the Government to provide in its next report information on the measures adopted to address labour market segmentation and their impact on achieving the objectives of the Convention. It also requests the Government to specify how it keeps under review the policies and measures adopted to achieve the objectives of full, productive and freely chosen employment (Article 2 of the Convention). Please also provide information on the effects of the measures adopted on closing the gap of employment levels between the various regions of the country.

Youth employment. The Government indicates that the Italia 2020 – Action Plan for Youth Employability through Training and Employment (€1.1 billion earmarked), was presented to the social partners in August 2011. The Government also reports on the initiatives undertaken by the Ministry of Youth to promote employment and training for youth through job placement services and a fund for financing training initiatives. The Committee notes that the youth unemployment rate rose from 24 per cent in the second trimester of 2009 to 31 per cent in December 2011, with rates in southern regions double those in northern regions. The Committee also notes that the gap between the youth and adult long-term unemployment rates is extremely large, with young people three times more likely to be unemployed for at least one year compared to adults. The Committee invites the Government to provide detailed information in its next report on the efforts made to improve the employment situation for young persons and the results achieved in terms of job creation and sustainable employment as a result of the programmes adopted.

Women and other specific categories of workers. The Government indicates that the increase in occupation levels registered in the second trimester of 2011 compared to the same trimester of the previous year mainly concerned women, whose employment rate increased by 2.5 percentage points, reaching 46.7 per cent (compared to 67.8 for men). The Government reports on the legislative measures taken in 2010 to strengthen the regulatory framework on non-discrimination between men and women in respect of employment, as well as to encourage work/life balance for women through flexible working time, the strengthening of public childcare services and support to entrepreneurship. The Government indicates that the Welfare to Work Plan, 2009–11 was launched in order to assist vulnerable workers. Targeting 230,000 workers benefiting from income support mechanisms and 25,000 workers not covered by unemployment benefits, this plan relies on individual training plans and economic incentives for enterprises willing to re-employ workers as well as for workers setting-up their own businesses. The Committee invites the Government to provide in its next report information on the impact of the Welfare to Work Plan, 2009–11, and other measures designed to encourage and support the employment of women and other specific categories of workers, such as the long-term unemployed.

Education and training policies. The Government recalls that in February 2010 the Government, regions, autonomous provinces and social partners signed an agreement to define guidelines for training. The agreement, which was renewed for the period 2011–12, enhances the role of social partners and their bilateral bodies in offering education and training matching with labour market needs. The Government indicates that, following the adoption of Legislative Decree No. 167/2011, the apprenticeship system was reformed. This reform enhances the collaboration between the State, regions and the social partners with respect to training, as well as the role of enterprises in providing training. Moreover, training possibilities under the third-level apprenticeship (high-level training) are broadened. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on the impact of education and training measures, including the reform of apprenticeship, on the employability of young persons and other categories of vulnerable workers.

Cooperatives. The Government indicates that anti-crisis measures regarding the temporary broadening of income support mechanisms also apply to workers in cooperatives. It further refers to data showing that since 2000 employment levels in cooperatives increased by 37 per cent and continued to grow during the crisis. Women accounted for 59 per cent of the workers in cooperatives and foreign workers for 22 per cent. 90 per cent of workers in cooperatives were hired under regular employment contracts. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide in its next report information on the measures taken to promote productive employment through cooperatives in line with the Promotion of Cooperatives Recommendation, 2002 (No. 193).

Japan

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1986)

The Committee notes the Government's report received in October 2011, which includes replies to its 2010 observation. The report also included observations from the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC–RENGO) and replies to the observations submitted by the Japan Postal Workers' Union (YUSANRO) in October 2010. The Committee further notes the observations made by the National Confederation of Trade Unions (ZENROREN), which were forwarded to the Government in September 2011. It finally notes the supplementary remarks submitted by YUSANRO, which were forwarded to the Government in June 2012.

Article 3 of the Convention. Participation of the social partners in the formulation of employment policies. In reply to the Committee's previous comments, the Government indicates that opinions expressed at relevant committees have been reflected in the planning and drafting of employment policies. JTUC–RENGO expresses again its concern that the views and opinions expressed by workers' and employers' representatives were not taken into consideration when discussing the draft bill for supporting jobseekers within the Labour Policy Council. As a result, the discussion at the Labour Policy Council was restricted. JTUC–RENGO emphasizes that consultations with the social partners in decision-making regarding employment policies should be fully respected. The Government indicates that it takes this criticism seriously as the Labour Policy Council found it extremely regrettable. The Committee invites the Government to provide examples of how the views of workers' and employers' representatives expressed in the framework of the Labour Policy Council and other councils, have been used concretely in the formulation, review and implementation of employment policies. In this regard, the Committee asks the Government to focus on the consultative procedures that enable it to take the views and experiences of persons affected by employment policy measures fully into account in order to secure their full cooperation in formulating and enlisting support for these measures.
